Cartas de Eça de Queiroz aos seus editores Genelioux e Lugan (1887–1894). 1961.
Páginas esquecidas, edited by Alberto Machado da Rosa. 5 vols., 1965–66.
Eça de Queiroz e Jaime Batalha Reis: Cartas e Recordações do Seu Convívio. 1966.
Folhas soltas (travel writing). 1966.
Páginas de jornalismo. 2 vols., 1980.
Correspondência. 2 vols., 1983.
Cartas inéditas. 1987.
Love Letters Written by Anna Conover and Mollie Bidwell to José Maria Eça de Queiroz in Cartas de amor de Anna Conover e Mollie Bidwell para José Maria Eça de Queiroz, Cônsul de Portugal em Havana (1873–1874), introduction by Alice Lomath Ferreira. 1998.
Editor, with José Sarmiento and Henrique Marques, O almanaque enciclopédico para 1896 [1897]. 2 vols., 1896–97.
Translator, As minas de Salomão, by Henry Rider Haggard. 1891.

*

Bibliography: Lengua y estilo de Eça de Queiroz: Bibliografía queirociana sistemática e anotada by Ernesto Guerra da Cal, 6 vols., 1975–84.

Critical Studies: Eça, Fialho, Aquilino by C. da Costa, 1923; Estudos críticos by Castelo Branco Chaves, 1932; História literária de Eça de Queiroz by Álvaro Lins, 1939, revised edition, 1964; Eça de Queiroz by Antônio Cabral, 1936; Eça de Queiroz by Clovis Ramalhetta, 1939; O realismo de Eça de Queiroz e a sua expressão artística by Manuel de Paiva Boléo, 1941; Eça de Queiroz: o homem e o artista by João Gaspar Simões, 1945; Eça de Queiroz: uma estética da ironia by Mário Sacramento, 1945; Eça de Queiroz: In Memoriam edited by Eloy de Amaral and Cardoso Martha, 1947; As ideias de Eça de Queiroz by Antônio José Saraiva, 1947; Crítica social de Eça de Queiroz by Djacar Menezes, 1950, revised edition, 1962; Lengua y estilo de Eça de Queiroz by Ernesto Guerra, 1954; “amalho Ortigão and the Generation of 1870” by Walter J. Scherr, in Hispania, 44, 1961; Eça e Wilde by A. Casemiro da Silva, 1962; Eça, discípulo de Machado? by Alberto Machado de Rosa, 1963; “Eça de Queiroz as a Literary Critic” by Peter Demetz, in Comparative Literature, 19, 1967; Ensaio queirocianos by António Coimbra Martins, 1967; “Alves e Ca. as Comedy” by Timothy Brown, Jr., in Kentucky Romance Quarterly, 16, 1969; Eça de Queiroz e a questão social by Jaime Cortesão, 1970; Eça, político, 1970; Eça de Queiroz e o seu tempo, 1972, and Eça de Queiroz e a Geração de 70, 1980, all by João Medina; Eça de Queiroz e o século XIX by Vianna Moog, 1977 (6th edition); “Presentation of Protagonist in Alves & Ca.,” in Kentucky Romance Quarterly, 25, 1978, and “The Opera Motif in Eça’s Lisbon Novels,” in Luso-Brazilian Review, 16, 1979, both by Robert M. Fedorchek; Introdução a leitura d’Os Maias by Carlos Reis, 1978(?); Eça de Queiroz and European Realism by Alexander Coleman, 1980; A vida de Eça de Queiroz by Luís Viana Filho, 1983; Imagens do Portugal queirociano by A. Campos Matos, 1987; Dicionário de Eça de Queiroz edited by A. Campos Matos, 1988; Os vencidos da vida by the Circulo Eça de Queiroz, 1989; A construção da narrativa queirociana by Carlos Reis and Maria do Rosário Milheiro, 1989; O leitor e a verdade oculta: ensaio sobre Os Maias by Alan Freeland, 1990; Eça e Os Maias: actas do 1º Encontro Internacional de Queirocianos, 1988, 1990.

* * *

José Maria de Eça de Queirós, beyond dispute the greatest Portuguese novelist of the 19th century, has long deserved wider recognition among the major European novelists of the last century. It is as a novelist that he is best known in Portugal and beyond, yet the major novels only amount to half a dozen or so works while the rest of his very considerable literary output consists of hundreds of journalistic articles on a whole range of topics, as well as novels, short stories, tales of fantasy and imagination, essays, travel notes, a translation of King Solomon’s Mines and numerous collections of letters to family and friends.

Eça de Queirós’s earliest writings, Prosas bárbaras [Barbaric Tales], dating from as early as 1866 and 1867, reveal the contemporary prevailing taste for romanticism, imported from France and Germany; their pervading atmosphere of fantasy, Satanism, grotesqueness and mystery is enhanced by the rhythmic, lyrical and evocative style. Already Eça de Queirós’s concern with the expressive potential of language is evident.

A few years later, in 1871, in a revolutionary public lecture, The New Literature, given in Lisbon, Eça de Queirós severely criticized and rejected the traditional Portuguese Romantic manner of writing as being conventional, sentimental, escapist, limited in interest, and lacking in purpose and originality, and expounded realism/naturalism after the French manner as the only way forward for literature. He declared that literature should teach and correct, that society should be depicted just as it was so that the evils of society could be condemned. This enthusiastic embracing of realism and the accompanying critical attitude to traditional practices and values gave rise to a series of Farpas [Barbs] in which Eça de Queirós condemned the state of torpor and stagnation he saw in society, literature and politics, and to his first major novel, O crime do Padre Amaro (The Sin of Father Amaro). This was a landmark, the first Portuguese work of realist fiction and Eça de Queirós’s strongest reaction against romanticism. The novel provided the perfect opportunity for Eça de Queirós to put his theories into practice and the hypocrisy and immorality of provincial society and in particular, the greed and lust of the clergy, are scrutinized and depicted without reserve. In his second realist work, O primo Basílio (Cousin Basilio), “the most doctrinal work printed in Portugal to date,” the decadence, indolence, and false values of the Lisbon bourgeoisie are attacked. Os Maias (The Maias), Eça de Queirós’s longest and most ambitious work, generally considered to be his masterpiece, tells the story of the decline of an ill-fated aristocratic family. In this Portuguese equivalent of Galdós’s Fortunata and Jacinta Eça de Queirós paints a vast canvas of Lisbon high society, with gatherings of intellectuals, cosmopolitan types, fashionable women, intrigues, contemporary customs, excursions in and around Lisbon and many detailed descriptions of interiors and gardens, as part of his mission to depict contemporary Portugal with all its flaws.

With O mandarim (The Mandarin), which appeared less than ten years after Eça de Queirós had rebelled against tradition to uphold the cause of realism, he broke away from the realist novel in favour of a tale of invention, not observation, a world of fantasy, mystery, and exoticism, which was much more in harmony with his natural preferences. Similarly with A relíquia (The Relic) some years later Eça de Queirós is no longer the critical observer but revels in the role of storyteller. Fantasy combines with realism to create a tale of adventure, whose aim was to entertain rather than simply instruct and censure, though the greed and duplicity of the anti-hero, Teodorico, received their just deserts. Here we see Eça de Queirós’s humour at its best, no longer the caustic irony of his realist period but a more playful brand, sometimes a rather macabre juxtaposition of comic and tragic, a bathetic cutting down to size of pompous behaviour or an impressive event, or imparting a lighter, frivolous touch to a sad, even tragic scene.

Eça de Queirós spent many years away from Portugal, returning only for occasional short vacations and the last 12 years of his life were spent in Paris. Years before this would have given him great pleasure and satisfaction, but ironically France, the French way of life, literature, culture, and attitudes had lost its charm for him while his former critical appraisal of Portugal and most things Portuguese had mellowed. This latter nostalgic mood is echoed in his two final novels, A ilustre casa de Ramires (The Illustrious House of Ramires) and A cidade e as serras (The City and the Mountains). The setting for The Illustrious House, which could be described as a historical novel dealing with contemporary life and the glories of the past, is not Lisbon or a seedy provincial town but a remote rural area. In the final novel Eça de Queirós presents his version of the popular contemporary theme of urban civilization versus the simple country life. Humour abounds in the descriptions of the hero's Parisian mansion with its wealth of gadgetry and the latest aids to easy living. The enforced return of the protagonist to his estate in northern Portugal provides the opportunity to contrast the wholesome pastoral existence in which he eventually finds happiness and fulfilment with the evils of super-civilization, epitomized by his former life in Paris.

Eça de Queirós's journalistic works and his letters, particularly those of his invented character, Fradique Mendes, who wrote on all manner of subjects (as Eça de Queirós himself says, "from the immortality of the soul to the price of coal"!), provide a fascinating insight into Eça de Queirós's personal thoughts—his nostalgia for his country, his opinion on politics, literature, culture, and controversial contemporary issues. In addition, in these writings Eça de Queirós expresses his views of many of his fictional works and his perpetual dissatisfaction with his writing, plagued by his apparent inability to provide a great work or create a new and vital style.

As well as boldly rejecting what he regarded as the fetters of traditional Portuguese literary norms in order to embrace the cause of realism/naturalism, thereby changing the course of development of the novel, Eça de Queirós rebelled against the heavy rhetorical, bombastic literary manner to create a very personal style that he strove to perfect throughout his literary career. From the lyrical, sonorous prose of Prosas bárbaras, overlaid with adjectives, Eça de Queirós's style became more disciplined, versatile, flexible, and expressive. He always sought the precise word or combination of words to express the desired effect, and Eça de Queirós's capacity to create a humorous or ironic impression by means of verbal dexterity is without par. He combined words in novel, unexpected ways, made ironic use of paradox and hyperbole and is the master of the transferred epithet. His letters reveal that this gift for innovation and flexibility, whose influence is still felt today, was not simply a literary device to be used in novels but an essential part of his persona.

Although he has been described as the Zola of Portugal, naturalism in Eça de Queirós's case was, as he himself admitted, always more theoretical than practical. Naturalism played its part in his literary evolution by disciplining his imagination and leading him to base his novels on the critical observation of society, but he was essentially too much an artist and man of imagination to maintain the realist/naturalist stance with conviction and his socio-critical works are best described as semi-realist depictions of society, a mix of comedy and tragedy. No other Portuguese novelist has painted such a gallery of colourful, acutely observed portraits, accompanied by such mordant wit or playful humour.

Throughout his literary evolution his writings reveal a fusion of styles and genres which, together with his very personal use of humour and irony, his concern for words and their effect, his fondness for storytelling, his fascination with the exotic and fantastic, his underlying tolerance towards his characters, make his work defy easy definition. Eça de Queirós frequently attempted to define the Portuguese character, often contrasting his countrymen with the French, as in his preface to The Mandarin where he describes the Portuguese as man of imagination not reason, always preferring a beautiful phrase to a precise idea, and Eça de Queirós himself, in spite of the strong French influence on his early career and his admiration for French novelists, particularly Flaubert, could never escape his own essential Portugueseness.

—Shirley Clarke

ECO, Umberto

Born: Alessandria, Italy, 5 January 1932. Education: Received his doctoral degree at University of Turin. Military Service: Served in the Italian Army, 1958–59. Family: Married Renate Ränge, one son and one daughter. Career: Cultural editor for RAI, Italian Radio-Television, 1954–59; as a journalist, has written frequently in newspapers and magazines; taught at universities of Turin, Milan and Florence; Honorary President of the International Association for Semiotic Studies (IASS/AIS); Visiting Professor at Yale (1977 and 1980–81), Columbia (1984), Harvard (1992–93), and Paris (1992–93); appointed professor of Semiotics at University of Bologna, 1971, where he still teaches. Awards: Strega prize, 1981; Viareggio prize, 1981; Anghiari prize, 1981; Medicis prize, 1982; McLuhan Teleglobe prize, 1985. Received the Legion d'Honneur in France, 1993; Doctor Honoris Causa of 25 universities around the world, among them Brown, 1988; Paris Sorbonne Nouvelle, 1989; Tel Aviv, 1994; Buenos Aires, 1994; Athens, 1994; and Berlin Free University, 1998.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

- Diario minimo.* 1963; as Misreadings, translated by William Weaver, 1993.
Il costume di casa. 1973.
Dalla periferia dell'Impero. 1977.
Il secondo diario minimo. 1992; as How to Travel with a Salmon and Other Essays, translated by William Weaver, 1994.
Sette anni di desiderio. 1983; as Travels in Hyperreality: Essays, translated by William Weaver, 1990.

Essays

- Il problema estetico in San Tommaso.* 1956; as The Aesthetics of Thomas Aquinas by Hugh Bredin, 1988.
Sviluppo dell'estetico medievale. 1959; as Art and Beauty in the Middle Ages, translated by Hugh Bredin, 1985.
Opera aperta: forma e indeterminazione nelle poetiche contemporanee. 1962, revised edition 1972; as The Open Work, translated by Anna Cancogni, 1989.
Apocalittici e integrati. 1964, revised edition 1977; as Apocalypse Postponed, edited by Robert Lumley, 1994.
Il Caso Bond: el origini, la natura, gli effetti del fenomeno 007, with Oreste del Buono. 1965; as The Bond Affair, translated by R.A. Downie, 1966.
La poetische di Joyce: dall "summa" al "Finnegans Wake". 1966; as The Aesthetics of Chaosmos: The Middle Ages of James Joyce, translated by Ellen Esrock, 1989.
La definizione dell'arte. 1968.
La struttura assente. 1968.
Le forme del contenuto. 1971.
Il segno. 1973.
Il costume di casa. 1973.
Beato di Liébana. 1973.
Semiotica della letteratura in URSS. 1974.
Trattato di semiotica generale. 1975; as A Theory of Semiotics, 1976.
Il superuomo di massa. 1976.
Come si fa una tesi di laurea. 1977.

- Lector in fabula: la cooperazioni interpretativa nei testi narrativi*. 1979; partly translated as The Role of the Reader: Explorations in the Semiotics of Texts, 1981 (this book contains essays from other works).
- Sette anni di desiderio*. 1983.
- Postille al nome della rosa*. 1983; as Postscript to The Name of the Rose, translated by William Weaber, 1984.
- Semiotica e filosofia del linguaggio*. 1984; as Semiotics and the Philosophy of Language, 1984.
- Sugli specchi e altri saggi*. 1985.
- Lo strano caso della Hanau 1609*. 1989.
- Limiti dell'interpretazione*. 1990; translated as The Limits of Interpretation, 1990.
- Stelle e stelletta*. 1991.
- Vocali*. 1991.
- Sguardi venuti da lontano*. 1991.
- La ricerca della lingua perfetta nella cultura europea*. 1993; as The Search for the Perfect Language, translated by James Fentress, 1997.
- Povero Pinocchio: giochi linguistici di studenti del corso di comunicazione*. 1997.
- Six Walks in the Fictional Woods*. 1994.
- In cosa crede chi non crede?*, with Carlo Maria Martini. 1996; as Belief or Nonbelief?: A Confrontation, translated by Minna Proctor, 2000.
- Kant e l'ornitorrinco*. 1997; as Kant and the Platypus: Essays on Language and Cognition, translated by Alastair McEwen, 1997.
- Cinque scritti morali*. 1997; as Five Moral Pieces, translated by Alastair McEwen, 2001.
- Serendipities. Language and Lunacy*. 1998.
- Tra menzogna e ironia*. 1998.
- La bustina di Minerva*. 2000.
- Experiences in translation*. 2000.

Fiction

- Il nome della rosa*. 1980; as The Name of the Rose, translated by William Weaber, 1983.
- Il pendolo di Foucault*. 1988; as Foucault's Pendulum, translated by William Weaber, 1989.
- L'isola del giorno prima*. 1994; as The Island of the Day Before, translated by William Weaber, 1995.
- Baudolino*. 2000; as Baudolino, translated by William Weaber, 2002.

Other

- Tre cosmonauti* (children's book). 1975; as The Three Astronauts, translated by Eugenio Carmi, 1989.

*

Bibliography: Il "caso" Eco by Margherita Ganeri, 1991.

Critical Studies: Umberto Eco and the Open Text: Semiotics, Fiction, Popular Culture by Peter Bondanella, 1997; Reading Eco. An Anthology, edited by Rocco Capozzi, 1997; Umberto Eco's Alternative. The Politics of Culture and the Ambiguities of Interpretation, edited by N. Bouchard and V. Pravadelli, 1998; Umberto Eco: Philosophy, Semiotics and the Work of Fiction by Caesar Michael, 1999; Naming the Rose: Eco, Medieval Signs and Modern Theory by Theresa Coletti, 1988; Out of Chaos. Semiotics. A Festschrift in Honor of Umberto Eco, edited by E. Tanner, et al, 1991; Swinging Foucault's Pendulum by Carl Rubino, 1992; Umberto Eco's Alternative: The Politics of Culture and the Ambiguities of Interpretation, edited by Norma Bouchard and Veronica Pravadelli, 1998; Literary Philosophers?: Borges, Calvino, Eco, edited by Jorge J.E. Gracia, Carolyn Korsmeyer, and Rudolphe Gasché, 2002.

* * *

Umberto Eco is a leading figure of contemporary Italian culture. He was born in Alessandria, in the Piedmonte Province of Italy, 60 miles south of Milan, to a large family of thirteen children. As a child he watched the shoot-outs between Fascists and Partisans during World War II. Urged by his father to become a lawyer, he entered the University of Turin, but abandoned his studies of law, and against his father's wishes, he took up medieval philosophy and literature.

He has an extensive oeuvre in the fields of Aesthetic, the Middle Ages, Literary Criticism, Semiotics, Cultural Analysis, and fiction for adults and children. Eco also has a journalistic production as a columnist for newspapers and magazines. His articles cover a wide range of topics, from football to airplane food, and many of them have been collected in books. Since 1960, when he began collaborating to the press, he has written for two separate audiences—academic specialists on one hand, and general readers on the other. He graduated in Philosophy in 1954 from the University of Turin at the age of 24, with a thesis on the aesthetics of Thomas Aquinas, and began his research as a Medievalist. His first publications pursued the focus he developed as a student, as in his first book, an extension of his thesis, Il problema estetico in San Tommaso (The Aesthetics of Thomas Aquinas). But soon his interest combined a strong erudition on the Middle Ages with a concern for the new discipline of semiotics.

In 1962 he published Opera aperta (The Open Work), his first major work in the field of semiotics. His academic career was very successful for the next two decades through his activity as a professor and author of books on semiotics and theory of signs. Two important books established his position in the field: Trattato di semiotica generale (A Theory of Semiotics) and Semiotica e Filosofia del linguaggio (Semiotics and the Philosophy of Language). Both works study a theory of codes and of sign production discussing key concepts developed in the writings of Charles Sanders Peirce. The first one marks the shift from medieval aesthetics into a more general interest in cultural values and literature as a whole. In the second book he argues that a sign is not only something that stands for something else, but must also be interpreted.

But Eco's most important contribution to the study of culture probably lies in the role he attributed to the reader. While taking many of the fundamentals of the structuralist theory of Ferdinand de Saussure, Claude Levy-Strauss, and Roman Jakobson, he drastically differs from them. In The Open Work and Lector in Fabula (The Role of the Reader) he criticized the view that meaning is the production of a structure, and saw that the reader uses two main concepts in the process of interpretative cooperation: the reader inserts in the text the "possible worlds" and the "frames," situations or sequences of action, in order to complete its meaning. The addressee of the work of art, therefore, becomes an active element in bringing that work to provisional completion. In a recent statement on reading and interpretation, Eco has stressed that the “anything goes” version of post-modern criticism is not what is implied in the notion of an open work. Rather, every literary work can be said to propose a “model reader” corresponding to the real possibilities set by the text. For Eco, to propose that an infinite number of readings is possible for any text is a wholly empty gesture. On the contrary, every work of art implies an “encyclopedia of the reader” that implies a specific amount of knowledge necessary to understand that work of art.

By the late 1970s he had established a solid reputation as a semiotician, but no one expected the radical shift his career would take when he published his first novel Il nome della rosa (The Name of the Rose) in 1980, of which more than 26 million copies have been sold. The book launched his career as a writer of fiction, that today includes four novels and two books of fiction for children. In his novels, Eco makes reference to many of the topics he has written in his academic production, such as problems of literary interpretation, reader's competence, Medieval culture, and classic philosophy. His books of criticism and fiction have been translated to more than twenty languages. He continues teaching and contributing weekly to Italian magazines and newspapers.

—Alvaro Fernández Bravo

See the essay on The Name of the Rose.

EDUARDO

See DE FILIPPO, Eduardo

EICH, Günter

Born: Lebus/Oder, Mecklenburg, Germany, 1 February 1907. Education: Educated at Leipzig Gymnasium, graduated 1925; studied Chinese and Law, University of Berlin, 1925–27; Leipzig University, 1927–29; the Sorbonne, Paris, 1929–30. Military Service: Served during World War II; prisoner of war, 1945, released 1946. Family: Married the writer Ilse Aichinger (second marriage) in 1953; one son and one daughter. Career: Full-time writer from 1946. Awards: Gruppe 47 prize, 1950; Bavarian Academy of Fine Arts literature prize, 1952; Büchner prize, 1959; Schiller prize, 1968. Died: 20 December 1972.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Gesammelte Werke, edited by Ilse Aichinger and others. 4 vols., 1973.

Gedichte, edited by Ilse Aichinger. 1973.

Tage mit Hähern: Ausgewählte Gedichte, edited by Klaus Schumann. 1975.

Pigeons and Moles: Selected Writings, translated by Michael Hamburger. 1990.

Verse

Gedichte. 1930.

Abgelegene Gehöfte. 1948.

Untergrundbahn. 1949.

Botschaften des Regens. 1955.

Ausgewählte Gedichte, edited by Walter Höllerer. 1960.

Zu den Akten. 1964.

Anlässe und Steingärten. 1966.

Nach Seumes Papieren. 1972.

Valuable Nail: Selected Poems, translated by Stuart Friebert, David Walker, and David Young. 1981.

Plays

Die Glücksritter. 1933.

Träume (radio plays; includes Geh nicht nach El Kuwehd; Der Tiger Jussuf; Subeth; Träume). 1953.

Stimmen: Sieben Hörspiele (radio plays; includes Die Andere und ich; Allah hat hundert Namen; Das Jahr Lazertis; Die Mädchen aus Viterbo; Zinngeschrei; Festianus Märtyrer; Die Brandung vor Setúbal). 1958.

Die Brandung vor Setúbal, Das Jahr Lazertis: Zwei Hörspiele (radio plays), edited by Robert Browning. 1963; as Journeys: Two Radio Plays, The Rolling Sea at Setúbal, The Year Lacertis, translated by Michael Hamburger, 1968.

In Anderern Sprachen: Vier Hörspiele (radio plays; includes Meine sieben jungen Freunde; Die Stunde des Huflattichs; Blick auf Venedig; Man bittet zu läuten). 1964.

Unter Wasser; Böhmisches Schneider: Marionettenspiele. 1964.

Fünfzehn Hörspiele (radio plays). 1966.

Radio Plays: Das festliche Jahr, with Martin Raschke, 1936; Zinngeschrei, 1955; Die Brandung vor Setúbal, 1957; Allah hat hundert Namen, 1957; Die Mädchen aus Viterbo, 1960; Festianus Märtyrer, 1966.

Fiction

Katharina. 1936.

Kulka, Hilpert, Elefanten. 1968.

Maulwürfe. 1968.

Ein Tibeter in meinem Büro. 1970.

Other

Ein Lesebuch, edited by Susanne Müller-Hanpft. 1972.

Semmelformen, drawings by Sven Knebel. 1972.

Translator, Lyrik des Ostens: China (verse), edited by Wilhelm Gundert, A. Schimmel and Walther Schubring. 1958.

Translator, Aus dem Chinesischen (verse). 1973.

*

Critical Studies: Günter Eich by Egbert Krispyn, 1971; Günter Eich edited by Bernd Jentsch, 1973; Committed Aestheticism: The Poetic Theory and Practice of Günter Eich by Larry L. Ricardson, 1983; Career at the Cost of Compromise: Günter Eich's Life and Work in the Years 1933–1945 by Glenn R. Cuomo, 1989; Der eigenen Fehlbarkeit begegnet: Günter Eichs Realitäten 1933–1945 by Axel Viereg, 1993; Günter Eich und der Rundfunk: Essay und Dokumentation by Hans-Ulrich Wagner, 1999; Günter Eich 1907–1972: Nach dem Ende der Biographie, edited by Peter Walther, 2000.

* * *

Günter Eich was among those writers who helped provide a sense of continuity in German literature from the early 1930s through to the post-World War II period. In the pre-war years he gradually gained public recognition; however, unlike many writers, he remained in Germany after Hitler came to power and served his country during the war.

Eich's first collection of verse, Gedichte [Poems], published in 1930, warrants his description of himself as a late expressionist and nature poet, and reflects his association with the literary group at Dresden centred on the journal Die Kolonne. Such poems as "Die Flüsse entlang" [Along the Rivers] and "Der Anfang kühlerer Tage" [The Start of Cold Weather] illustrate this mood and approach at the time. The 1930s also marked the beginning of a lifelong involvement on Eich's part with the radio play. Schwitzke has noted several plays and their broadcasts between 1932 and—interestingly in the historical context—the late 1930s.

In an American prisoner-of-war camp in 1945 Eich resumed his interest in poetry and soon after embarked upon literary collaboration with Hans Werner Richter. He contributed to numerous journals and became a founding member of the newly established Gruppe 47 and the first recipient of its prize in 1950 (it was only the first of several literary recognitions awarded to Eich over the years). By that time Eich had established himself as a leading post-war writer in West Germany.

In 1948 his first post-war collection of verse, Abgelegene Gehölfte [Isolated Farms] was published. Eich's occupation with the theme of remoteness, be it of time or place, is already suggested in the title poem or in "Wiepersdorf, die Arminschen Gräber" and "Wie grau es auch regnet." In Eich's evocation of bygone times there is evidence of the melancholic tone which becomes an increasingly characteristic feature of his verse. These poems in fact are still a reminder of the Kolonne period, but the volume also contains a number that starkly relate to his war experiences. "Inventur" [Stocktaking], one of the best-known of all early post-war poems, catalogues matter-of-factly and with the sparsest language the few yet precious belongings of the prisoner-of-war; it is rightly regarded as typically illustrating the so-called Kahlschlag technique. The rhyming juxtaposition of "Hölderlin/Urin" in "Latrine," may have caused offense to some readers' susceptibilities at the time, but Eich's concern was always to challenge. Lines from his radio play Träume [Dreams] effectively serve as a motto for his work: "no, don't sleep, while those who order the world are busy!/Be mistrustful of their power. . . !. . . /Do that which is not useful, sing the songs that are not expected from your mouth!/Be irritating, be sand, not oil, in the world machine!"

Träume [Dreams] was but one of the barrage of radio plays from Eich's pen and some 40 plays are credited to him in the span of a quarter of a century after the war. The development of the radio play as a literary genre in the 1950s is synonymous with Eich's own work in the field. The medium encouraged anti-naturalist techniques, with the use of acoustic devices, and these Eich exploited to the full. In this context the titles of his first collections of radio plays are pertinent: Träume (it was to prove highly popular, with over 50,000 copies sold) and Stimmen [Voices]. The individual pieces show the ready transposition of dream and reality. In Der Tiger Jussuf, for instance, the soul of a lion enters different people, while in Die Andere und ich [The Other Woman and I] Ellend Harland, a rich American woman, experiences the miserable existence of an Italian fisherman's wife. Catarina in Die Brandung von Setúbal (The Rolling Sea at Setúbal) is similarly placed in a transformational situation, as Eich juggles with the theme of time and the two worlds of life and death. The presence of a strong comic-absurd, satiric, even grotesque dimension here as elsewhere in his work serves to heighten the underlying seriousness of Eich's intent. One may seek to play out the game of fulfilling logic through dreams, but as Goldschmidt reminds us in Die Mädchen aus Viterbo [The Girls from Viterbo], there comes a point when the time for dreaming is over. For three years during World War II the old Jew and his granddaughter have fearfully awaited the knock on the door that portends death. To combat their fears they indulge themselves with the story of schoolgirls lost with their teacher in the catacombs of Rome. The interplay, perhaps rather the counterbalancing, of make-believe and reality allows Eich once more to present a marginal situation. Only when the knock does come is the moment reached of recognizing life for what it is, including the notion that God too is a component in the established order of evil, lies, and illusion. It is a viewpoint that Eich formulates both in his radio plays and in his verse. Anarchy or the perceived sense of ordered life is the challenge Eich poses himself and us. Man bittet zu läuten [Please Ring the Bell], Eich's penultimate radio play, is arguably his most powerful expression of indictment, but equally is seen as marking a departure from the conventional understanding of the hörspiel (radio play) towards the sprechstück (spoken drama).

By the time Eich's third post-war and most popular volume of verse, Botschaften des Regens [Messages of the Rain], was published in 1955 (the second Untergrundbahn [Subway] had appeared in 1949), the melancholic tone had become more marked and the language more sparse. The simple routine and details of everyday life is not completely absent (for example in "Weg zum Bahnhof" [The Way to the Station]), but an actual journey can become also the journey of the mind ("D-Zug-München-Frankfurt" [The Munich to Frankfurt Express]). A locality can conjure up memories, but also evoke darker responses: "Der Beginn der Einsamkeit, Das Schilf der Verzweiflung/der trigonometrische Punkt/Abmessung im Nichts" [The beginning of solitude, the need of despair/of the trigonometric point/measurement in the void] ("Der grosse Lübbe-See"). The emphasis still lies on the theme of transience, as the first poem of the collection, "Ende eines-Sommers" [End of a Summer], immediately establishes. The initial positive note in the poem gives way before the awareness of the inevitability of the process of death. Equally, the title poem spells out the gloomy portents carried by the rain—portents of despair, privation, and guilt.

Zu den Akten did not appear until almost a decade later, in 1964. By then Eich had travelled extensively through North America, but more significantly to the Orient, and his apparent growing preference for the latter's way of life is reflected not only in the poem "Fussnote zu Rom" [Footnote to Rome], but also in the very title of the subsequent collection Anlässe und Steingärten [Reasons and Rockeries]. Objects themselves become the sources of existential experience, as in the case of the stones placed artificially in the sand in those places of meditation, the Japanese stone gardens. In “Zum Berspiel” Eich becomes engaged with the difficulty experienced in translating meaning and truth by a word (“ein wort in ein Wort übersetzen”) inferring the need rather for “transposition.” For Eich, it becomes a matter of seeking a symbol instead of a metaphor. With the passing years, his distrust of life increases and his goals correspondingly appear to lessen. Occasionally, the old aggressive note surfaces (“Seminar für Hinterbliebene” [School for Survivors], “Geometrischer Ort” [Geometrical Point], “Optik” [Optics]), even a trace of bitter humour and self mockery can be detected (“Zuversicht” [Optimism]), to become subsumed in the more prevailing mood of a resigned acceptance of ultimate silence. Thematically, the late poems centre on departure and death.

Eich would expound occasionally on the nature of poetry, but essentially he never saw himself as a theoretician. A poem such as “Kunsttheorien” would confirm that view, as would a series of short prose pieces undertaken by Eich towards the end of the 1960s. Under the title Maulwürfe [Moles] (1968; a second collection, Ein Tibeter in meinem Büro [A Tibetan in My Office] was published in 1970), they are fundamentally short paragraph-like passages that illustrate Eich’s apparent unwillingness to make a direct statement. They constitute a deliberate jumbling of aphorisms, clichés, and touches of lyricism that produce an odd mixture of sense and nonsense. The anarchic factor still proclaims itself: “If I were a negative writer, I’d rather be a negative carpenter, long live anarchy!” (“Späne” [Woodshavings]). Basically, the passages reflect the view that nothing is self-evident in life or in literature.

Despite his limited verse output, Eich proved a significant influence on the development of the German lyric after World War II, while the progress of the radio play during that same period (and particularly in the 1950s) is indelibly linked with Eich’s own creative performance in that field.

—Ian Hilton

EICHENDORFF, Joseph (Karl) Benedikt, Freiherr von

Born: Lubowitz, Silesia, Germany, 10 March 1788. Education: Educated at Katholisches Gymnasium, Breslau, 1801–04; Halle University, 1805–06; Heidelberg University, 1807–08; continued to study law in Vienna, 1810–12. Military Service: Served in the volunteer forces during the War of Liberation, 1813–14 and 1815; commissioned 1813. Family: Married Aloysia (Luise) von Larisch in 1815 (died 1855); two sons and three daughters. Career: Undertook a walking tour through the Harz mountains, 1805; travelled to Paris and Vienna, 1808; returned to Lubowitz to manage father’s estate, 1809; lived in Berlin, 1809–10; dispatch clerk, War Ministry, Berlin, 1815; trainee civil servant, 1816–19, and assessor, 1819–21, Prussian Royal Government; government councillor, Danzig, 1821, Ministry of Education and Cultural Affairs, Berlin, 1823, 1831–44, and Königsberg, 1824. Died: 26 November 1857.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

- Sämtliche Werke*. 6 vols., 2nd edition, 1864.
Vermischte Schriften. 5 vols., 1866–67.
Werke, edited by Richard Dietze. 2 vols., 1891.
Werke, edited by Ludwig Krähe. 2 vols., 1908.
Sämtliche Werke, edited by Wilhelm Kosch and August Sauer; continued by Hermann Kunisch and Helmut Koopmann. 9 vols., 1908–50; 2nd edition, 1962–.
Gedichte, Erzählungen, Biographisches, edited by Max Wehrli. 1945.
 [Selected Poems], edited by Gerhard Prager. 1946.
Neue Gesamtausgabe der Werke und Schriften, edited by Gerhart Baumann and Siegfried Grosse. 4 vols., 1957–58.
Werke, edited by Ansgar Hillach and Klaus Dieter Krabiel. 5 vols., 1970–88.
Werke, edited by Wolfgang Frühwald, Brigitte Schillbach and Hartwig Schultze. 6 vols., 1985–.

Fiction

- Ahnung und Gegenwart*. 1815.
Aus dem Leben eines Taugenichts und Das Marmorbild. Zwei Novellen nebst einem Anhang von Liedern und Romanzen. 1826; reprinted 1981; as Memoirs of a Good-for-Nothing, translated by Charles Godfrey Leland, 1866, also translated by Bayard Quincy Morgan, 1955; Ronald Taylor, 1966; as The Happy-Go-Lucky, translated by A.L. Wister, 1906; as The Life of a Good-for-Nothing, translated by Michael Glenny, 1966; Das Marmorbild as “The Marble Statue,” translated by F.E. Pierce, in Fiction and Fantasy of German Romance, edited by Pierce and C.F. Schreiber, 1927.
Viel Lärmen um Nichts, in Der Gesellschafter, edited by F.W. Gubitz. 1832.
Dichter und ihre Gesellen. 1834.
Das Schloss Dürande. 1837.
Die Entführung. 1839.
Die Glücksritter. 1841.
Libertas und ihr Freier. 1864.
Eine Meerfahrt. 1864.
Auch ich war in Arkadien. 1866.
Novellen. 1927.
Erzählungen. 1946.
Erzählungen, edited by Werner Bergengruen. 1955.
Das Wiedersehen, edited by Hermann Kunisch. 1966.

Verse

- Gedichte*. 1837; revised edition, 1843.
Neue Gedichte. 1847.
Julian. 1853.
Robert und Guiscard. 1855.
Lucius. 1857.
Gedichte aus dem Nachlasse, edited by Heinrich Meisner. 1888.
Joseph und Wilhelm von Eichendorffs Jugendgedichte, edited by Raimund Pissin. 1906.
Eichendorffs Jugendgedichte aus seiner Schulzeit, edited by Hilda Schulhof. 1915; reprinted 1974.
Gedichte, edited by A. Schaeffer. 1919.

The Happy Wanderer and Other Poems, translated by Marjorie Rossy. 1925.
Gedichte. Ahnung und Gegenwart, edited by Werner Bergengruen. 1955.

Plays

Krieg den Philistern!. 1824.
Meierbeths Gluck und Ende, in Der Gesellschafter, edited by F.W. Gubitz. 1827.
Ezelin von Romano. 1828.
Der letzte Held von Marienburg. 1830.
Die Freier. 1833.
Das Incognito: Ein Puppenspiel. Mit Fragmenten und Entwürfen anderer Dichtungen nach den Handschriften, edited by Konrad Weichberger. 1901; also edited by Gerhard Kluge, with Das Loch; oder, das wiedergefundene Paradies: Ein Schattenspiel, by Ludwig Achim von Arnim, 1968.

Other

Die Wiederherstellung des Schlosses der deutschen Ordensritter zu Marienburg. 1844.
Zur Geschichte der neueren romantischen Poesie in Deutschland. 1846.
Über die ethische und religiöse Bedeutung der neueren romantischen Poesie in Deutschland. 1847.
Die geistliche Poesie in Deutschland. 1847.
Der deutsche Roman des achtzehnten Jahrhunderts in seinem Verhältnis zum Christenthum. 1851.
Zur Geschichte des Dramas. 1854.
Geschichte der poetischen Literatur Deutschlands. 2 vols., 1857.
Aus dem Nachlass. Briefe und Dichtungen, edited by Wilhelm Kosch. 1906.
Fahrten und Wanderungen 1802–1814 der Freiherren Joseph und Wilhelm Eichendorff, edited by Alfons Nowack. 1907.
Lubowitzer Tagebuchblätter, edited by Alfons Nowack. 1907.
Liederbuch, illustrated by Josua Leander Gampp. 1922.
Schlesische Tagebücher (diaries), edited by Alfred Riemen. 1988.
 Editor, Gedichte, by Lebrecht Dreves. 1849.
 Translator, Der Graf Lucanor, by Juan Manuel. 1840.
 Translator, Geistliche Schauspiele by Pedro Calderón de la Barca. 2 vols., 1846–53.
 Translator, Fünf Zwischenspiele, by Miguel de Cervantes, edited by A. Potthoff. 1924.

*

Critical Studies: Der Dichter des Taugenichts: Eichendorffs Welt und Leben, geschildert von ihm selbst und von Zeitgenossen edited by Paul Stöcklein and Inge Feuchtmayer, 1957, and Eichendorff heute edited by Stöcklein, 1960; “Zum Gedächtnis Eichendorffs” by Theodor W. Adorno, in Akzente, (5), 1958; Eichendorff: Aus dem Leben eines Taugenichts by G.T. Hughes, 1961; Versuche über Eichendorff by Oskar Seidlin, 1965, 2nd edition, 1978; “The Metaphor of Death in Eichendorff,” in Oxford German Studies, (4), 1969, and “Eichendorff und Shakespeare,” in German Romantics in Context: Selected Essays, 1992, both by Elisabeth Stopp; Eichendorff: The Spiritual Geometer by Lawrence Radner, 1970;

Eichendorff-Kommentar by Ansgar Hillach and Klaus-Dieter Krabiel, 2 vols., 1971–72; Joseph von Eichendorff by Egon Schwarz, 1972; Spatiotemporal Consciousness in English and German Romanticism. A Comparative Study of Novalis, Blake, Wordsworth, and Eichendorff by Amala M. Hanke, 1981; Eichendorff und die Spätromantik edited by Hans-Georg Pott, 1985; Hieroglyphenschrift. Untersuchungen zu Eichendorffs Erzählungen by Klaus Köhnke, 1986; Lyric Descent in the German Romantic Tradition by Brigitte Peucker, 1986; Joseph von Eichendorff by Wolfgang Frühwald and Franz Heiduk, 1988; Ansichten zu Eichendorff. Beiträge der Forschung 1985 bis 1988 edited by Alfred Riemen, 1988; Eichendorff Issue of German Life and Letters, 42(3), 1989; Hindeutung auf das Höhere: A Structural Study of the Novels of Joseph von Eichendorff by Judith Purver, 1989; Lebendige Allegorie. Studien zu Eichendorffs Leben und Werk by Robert Mühlher, 1990; Eichendorff's Scholarly Reputation: A Survey by Robert O. Goebel, 1994; Classical Rhetoric and the German Poet 1620 to the Present: A Study of Opitz, Bürger and Eichendorff by Anna Carrdus, 1996; Schumann's Eichendorff Liederkreis and the Genre of the Romantic Cycle by David Ferris, 2000; Italy in the German Literary Imagination: Goethe's Italian Journey and Its Reception by Eichendorff, Platen, and Heine by Gretchen L. Hachmeister, 2002.

* * *

Joseph von Eichendorff's fame as the quintessential German Romantic writer rests primarily on a narrow segment of his total output: a selection of his lyric poetry and two or three stories, the most celebrated of which is Aus dem Leben eines Taugenichts (Memoirs of a Good-for-Nothing). Since very little of his work, apart from this tale and a few poems, has been translated into English, he is best known in the English-speaking world through the musical settings of his lyrics by such composers as Mendelssohn, Schumann (especially “Dichterliebe,” Opus 39, 1840), Brahms, Hugo Wolf, Hans Pfitzner (the cantata “Von deutscher Seele” [Of the German Soul], Opus 28, 1921), and Richard Strauss. His poems have been set to music more frequently than those of almost any other German writer; thus his importance in the context of the German Lied and its development is considerable. His work also influenced more 19th-century German poets than that of any other writer except Goethe, and has been assimilated, imitated, parodied, praised, and quoted to a remarkable degree by a wide variety of authors, from Theodor Storm and Theodor Fontane to Thomas Mann, Hermann Hesse, and Günter Grass.

The full range of Eichendorff's literary and other writings is, however, still relatively little known. He wrote over 500 lyric poems, nine stories, five plays, three epic poems, two novels, and a number of narrative, dramatic, and autobiographical fragments. His diaries (1798 to 1815) reveal many of the decisive influences on his formative years, including the Romantic thinkers and writers Joseph Görres, Friedrich Schlegel, Henrik Steffens, Achim von Arnim, Clemens Brentano, and the Grimm brothers, whose example probably inspired him to begin, in 1808–09, a collection of Upper Silesian fairytales. In his later years, he again followed the Romantic example, both by translating from Spanish a number of ballads, as well as dramas by Calderón and Cervantes, and a 14th-century prose text, El Conde Lucanor [Count Lucanor] by Don Juan Manuel, and by composing several essays and treatises on literature, the last and most comprehensive of which, Geschichte der poetischen Literatur Deutschlands [History of the Poetic Literature of Germany], appeared in 1857, the year of his death. In the same year, he began a biography of St. Hedwig, the patron saint of Silesia. In connection with his career in the Prussian Civil Service, Eichendorff also produced a number of historical and political writings, including pieces on secularization, constitutional questions, and press censorship, and on the two great symbolic Prussian architectural undertakings of the time, the completion of Cologne Cathedral and the restoration of the Marienburg castle near Danzig, with both of which he was, personally as well as professionally, closely involved. His correspondence, while less extensive than that of some of his contemporaries, provides valuable insights into his life, work, and thought, and into the unsettled times in which he lived.

The chaotic period of the Napoleonic Wars forms the background to Eichendorff's first novel, Ahnung und Gegenwart [Divination and the Present], written 1810–12 in Vienna, but not published until 1815. Eichendorff's intention in this work was to provide a "complete picture . . . of that strange time of expectation, longing and grief, heavy with foreboding of the storm to come" which had preceded the Wars of Liberation in the German lands. Though by no means devoid of realistic detail, the novel is not a mimetic portrayal of the period, but rather an attempt to create, in the spirit of the theory and practice of the novel among the German Romantics, a structural and symbolic counterpart both to the confusion of the times, as it appeared to Eichendorff, and to the underlying order of the universe, guaranteed for him by his Catholic faith and his trust in an ultimate divine purpose shaping the world as a whole and the individual human life within it. Characteristically, the lyrical prose of the novel is interspersed with a large number of poems, among which are some of Eichendorff's best known, such as "Das zerbrochene Ringlein" ["The Broken Ring"], "Abschied" ["Farewell"], and "Waldgespräch" ["Conversation in the Forest"].

Apart from Memoirs of a Good-for-Nothing, two of Eichendorff's shorter narrative works, Das Marmorbild ("The Marble Statue") and Das Schloss Dürande [Dürande Castle] deserve special mention. The first is based on a traditional European story concerning the betrothal of a young man to a statue of Venus, a theme which preoccupied Eichendorff throughout his life and which he here uses to reveal the psychological roots and destructive potential of the erotic drive, as well as the lure of an unbridled poetic imagination, both of which he saw as manifestations of the demonic forces of subjectivism which could only be controlled by Christianity. He saw the same forces at work in the French Revolution, which provides the subject matter of Das Schloss Dürande. Yet while he regards the Revolution as an unmitigated disaster, he is also sharply critical of the behaviour of the nobility which led up to it.

The first edition of Eichendorff's collected poems appeared in 1837. Characteristic of his lyric vocabulary is the recurrence of a limited number of archetypal words and images, particularly nouns (often in the plural) referring to basic features of the landscape, such as mountains, forests, valleys, and rivers, verbs conveying movement and sense impressions, and unspecific but emotionally charged adjectives. These combine to give his verse an incantatory quality and an instantly recognizable tone, adapted from the folk-song tradition as transmitted through Arnim and Brentano's collection Des Knaben Wunderhorn (The Boy's Magic Horn). Eichendorff's conscious use of elements of popular tradition has often been misinterpreted as naive; in fact, it is subtle and ambivalent, stirring unconscious depths in the reader and evoking, through a densely woven net of symbols, a transcendent sphere beyond the physical world. He is also a fine prose stylist and spirited polemicist, using satire and irony to attack, in a manner somewhat reminiscent of his ideological opponent, Heine, both Romantic excesses and unromantic philistinism.

—Judith Purver

See the essay on Memoirs of a Good-for-Nothing.

ELIADE, Mircea

Born: Bucharest, Romania 9 March 1907. Education: Spiru Haret Lyceum, Bucharest, 1917–25; studied philosophy, University of Bucharest, 1925–28, doctorate in philosophy, 1933; studied Indian philosophy, Calcutta, 1929–31. Military Service: Artillery regiment, 1932. Family: Married 1) Nina Mareş, 1934 (died 1944); 2) Christinel Cotrescu, 1950. Career: Lecturer, University of Bucharest, 1933–39; cultural attaché, Romanian legation, London, 1940–41; cultural counselor, Romanian legation, Lisbon, Spain, 1941–45; lecturer, École Pratique des Hautes Études, Paris, 1946–48; lecturer, Sorbonne, Paris, 1948–56; fellow, Bollingen Foundation, 1951–55; visiting professor, 1956–57, and professor, 1957–86, of the history of religions, University of Chicago. Awards: Numerous honorary doctorates, including Yale, 1966, Oberlin, 1972, and the Sorbonne, 1976. Member: American Academy of Arts and Sciences, 1966; Royal Academy of Belgium, 1975; corresponding member, Austrian Academy of Sciences, 1973. Died: Chicago, Illinois, 22 April 1986.

PUBLICATIONS

Fiction

- Isabel și apele diavolului*. 1930.
Maitreyi. 1933; as Bengal Nights, 1993, translated by Catherine Spencer.
Întoarcerea din rai. 1934.
Lumina ce se stinge. 1934.
Huliganii. 2 vols. 1935.
Domnișoara Christina. 1936.
Șarpele. 1937.
Nunta în cer. 1939.
Secretul doctorului Honigberger and Nopti la Serampore. 1940; as Two Tales of the Occult, translated by W. A. Coates, 1970.
Pe strada Mântuleasa. 1968.
La țigănci și alte povestiri. 1969.
Noaptea de Sânziene. 2 vols, 1971; as The Forbidden Forest, translated by M. L. Ricketts and M. P. Stevenson, 1978.
Tales of the Sacred and Supernatural. 1981.
Mystic Stories: The Sacred and the Profane, translated by Ana Cartianu. 1992.

Nonfiction

- India*. 1934.
Alchimia Asiatică. 1935.
Yoga: Essai sur les origines de la mystique indienne. 1936.
Cosmologie și alchimie babiloniană. 1937.
Metallurgy, Magic, and Alchemy. 1938.
Mitul reîntegrării. 1942.
Comentarii la legenda Meșterului Manole. 1943.

- Traité d'histoire des religions*. 1949; as Patterns in Comparative Religion, translated by R. Sheed, 1958.
- Le Mythe de l'éternel retour*. 1949; as The Myth of the Eternal Return, translated by W. R. Trask, 1954.
- Le Chamanisme et les techniques archaïques de l'extase*. 1951; as Shamanism. Archaic Techniques of Extasy, translated by W. R. Trask, 1964.
- Images et symboles. Essai sur le symbolisme magico-religieux*. 1952; as Images and Symbols, translated by P. Mairet, 1961.
- Le Yoga: Immortalité et liberté*. 1954; as Yoga: Immortality and Freedom, translated by W. R. Trask, 1958.
- Forgerons et alchimistes*. 1956; as The Forge and the Crucible, translated by S. Corrin, 1962.
- Das Heilige und das Profane*. 1957; translated from the French manuscript by E. Grassi; as The Sacred and the Profane: The Nature of Religion, translated by W. R. Trask, 1959.
- Mythes, rêves et mystères*. 1957; as Myths, Dreams, and Mysteries, translated by P. Mairet, 1960.
- Naissances mystiques: Essai sur quelques types d'initiation*. 1959; as Birth and Rebirth: The Religious Meaning of Initiation in Human Culture, translated by W. R. Trask, 1958.
- Méphistophélès et l'Androgyne*. 1962; as Mephistopheles and the Androgyne, translated by J. M. Cohen, 1965.
- Patanjali et le Yoga*. 1962; as Patanjali and Yoga, translated by C. L. Markmann, 1969.
- Aspects du mythe*. 1963; as Myth and Reality, translated by W. R. Trask, 1963.
- The Quest: History and Meaning in Religion*. 1969.
- De Zalmoxis à Gengis Khan*. 1970; as Zalmoxis: The Vanishing God, translated by W. R. Trask, 1972.
- Australian Religions: An Introduction*. 1973.
- Occultism, Witchcraft, and Cultural Fashions: Essays in Comparative Religions*. 1976.
- Histoire des croyances et des idées religieuses*. 3 vols. 1976–83; as A History of Religious Ideas, 3 vols., translated by W. R. Trask, A. Hildebeitel, and D. Apostolos-Cappadona, 1978–85.
- The Eliade Guide to World Religions*, with Ioan P. Couliano and Hillary S. Wiesner. 1991.
- Biblioteca Maharajului*. 1991.
- Erotica mistică în Bengal*. 1994.
- Misterele și inițierea orientală: Scrieri din tinerețe*. (1926), 1998.

Essays

- Soliloquii*. 1932.
- Oceanografie*. 1934.
- Fragmentarium*. 1939.
- Insula lui Euthanasius*. 1943.
- Symbolism, the Sacred, and the Arts*, edited by Diane Apostolos-Cappadona. 1985.

Other

- Șantier*. 1935.
- Amintiri. I* (1907–28). 1966.
- Fragments d'un journal*. 1973; as No Souvenirs: Journal, 1957–1969, translated by F. H. Johnson, Jr., 1977.

- L'Épreuve du labyrinthe: Entretiens avec Claude-Henri Rocquet*. 1978; as Ordeal by Labyrinth: Conversations with Claude-Henri Rocquet, translated by D. Coltman, 1982.
- Autobiography*, translated by Mac Linscott Ricketts, 2 vols., 1981–88.
- Journal I* (1949–1955), II (1957–1969), III (1970–1978), IV (1979–1985). 1989–90.
- L'histoire des religions a-t-elle un sens?: correspondance, 1926–1959*, edited by Natale Spineto. 1994.
- Editor, Zalmoxis. 1938–42.
- Editor, From Pimitives to Zen: A Thematic Sourcebook of the History of Religions. 1967.
- Editor in Chief, Encyclopedia of Religion. 16 vols, 1987

*

Bibliography: Mircea Eliade: An Annotated Bibliography by Douglas Allen and Dennis Doering, 1980.

Critical Studies: Religion on Trial: Mircea Eliade and His Critics by Guilford Dudley III, 1977; Mircea Eliade, in Cahiers de l'Herne, no. 33, edited by Constantine Tacou, 1978; Hermeneutica lui Mircea Eliade by Adrian Marino, 1980; Waiting for the Dawn: Mircea Eliade in Perspective, edited by David Carrasco and Jane Swanberg, 1985, 1991; Mircea Eliade: The Romanian Roots, 1907–1945 by Mac Linscott Ricketts, 2 vols., 1988; The Theology and Philosophy of Eliade: A Search for the Centre by Carl Olson, 1992; Mircea Eliade's Vision for a New Humanism by David Cave, 1993; Mircea Eliade, spirit al amplitudinii by Eugen Simion, 1995; Reconstructing Eliade: Making Sense of Religion by Bryan S. Rennie, 1996; Changing Religious Worlds: The Meaning and End of Mircea Eliade, edited by Bryan Rennie, 2000; Dosarul Eliade, 5 vols., by Mircea Handoca, 1998–2001.

* * *

Mircea Eliade pursued two careers throughout his life, that of the scholar and that of the creative writer. He first achieved fame in his native Romania as a novelist in the decade before the outbreak of World War II. It was a time when he was deepening his knowledge of Indian religions and myths and publishing the first of a remarkable series of works on these subjects. After he left Romania he gained an international reputation as an exegete of religions and myths, initially in France, from 1945 to 1956, and then in the United States, from 1956 to 1986. He ranged widely in his chosen field from the occult beliefs of the ancient Dacians to the mythologies of India and the supernatural in Australian aboriginal religions. His work was pioneering, and he contributed enormously to the advancement of the humanistic sciences. Scholarship now came first, and fiction was a secondary preoccupation, though he wrote several of his prose masterpieces during these later years.

Eliade himself perceived no barrier between science and fiction. For him, the one illuminated the other. His main concern was to grasp the human spirit and to chart the human destiny, tasks, he was convinced, that could best be accomplished if culture were taken as a whole and not separated into compartments. Not surprisingly, then, certain themes are common to both his scholarly research and his literary creativity. His studies of Indian civilization in India between 1929 and 1931 exerted an enormous enduring influence on him as a scholar, a teacher, and a novelist. He was struck especially by the contrast between India, a civilization that had preserved a mysterious link to the world of myth and the spirit, and the West, a civilization in thrall to rationalism and technology. Thus Maitreyi (Bengal Nights) is both a love story between a European man and an Indian woman and a philosophical novel on the impermeability of civilizations, while Noaptea de Sânziene (The Forbidden Forest), his other masterpiece of fiction, combines the real and the fantastic and draws on his investigations of myth and his skill at delineating character.

In contrast to his scholarly works, Eliade's fiction is little known outside Romania. But in Romania, ever since the appearance of his first important novels in the early 1930s, his literary work has aroused lively criticism and discussion. His admirers and even some of his detractors recognize his innovations of theme and character as powerful stimulants in the development of the Romanian novel. He took the Romanian novel out of its traditional modes, endowing it with another kind of conflict. His heroes were no longer the young men from the countryside who struggled to adapt to urban life or the small town intellectuals who were overwhelmed by the inertia of provincial life. Rather, they thought differently about the world, and they perceived their own destiny differently from that of their fathers as traditional values crumbled and nothing filled the void.

Eliade was intent on "renewing" the Romanian novel by introducing new subject matter and "authentic" characters. He championed the novel of ideas and strong characters who experienced ideas and had their own view of the world and a consciousness of their place in it. He changed the emphasis in the novel from the sentimental drama to the drama of cognition. Perhaps this is why he gave young men, rather than old men and women, a privileged place in his novels; he thought them better able to endure the curse of existence. As for form, he was conservative. Although he was reading Gide, Huxley, Joyce, and others who were experimenting with form, he insisted that the novel preserve traditional structures. He thought that the "novel should be a novel," that the author should let his characters be themselves and refrain from analyzing them or even commenting upon them.

Eliade's novels fall into several stylistic categories. The first consisted of his "Indian" novels, notably Bengal Nights, which gained recognition for him in Romania as a significant writer. Based on his own experiences in Calcutta, Bengal Nights recounts his love for a charming and puzzling young Indian woman. But love is also a mode of cognition; through it he discovers the Indian spirit and experiences a revelation of his own soul. In Huliganii [The Hooligans] he tried a formula new to Romanian literature—the existentialist revolt. He thus moved from the autobiographical novel to the novel of observation and the creation of character types. It is realistic, as he turns to Romanian society and the younger generation, frenetic, confused, and certain that it was descending into tragedy. In this novel of ideas Eliade has captured the spirit of a society that is slowly disintegrating, where the hooligans test various philosophies of existence but are united in their abandonment of the moral values their parents defended. The solutions he proposed—revolt, a philosophy of despair, the experience of the tragic—were unusual for readers of the time.

Eliade was a master of the fantastic tale, and Domnișoara Christina [Miss Christina] was the first modern fantastic novel in Romanian literature. It tells of a woman, dead at a young age, who returns as a ghost in the dreams of persons staying at her sister's house through her will, not theirs. Eliade, drawing upon Romanian folklore, is intrigued by the ways in which the fantastic manifests itself in normal people and how they cope with the chaos it causes.

The Forbidden Forest, which Eliade composed between 1949 and 1954 and which many critics regard as his masterpiece, combines in one vast fresco the major themes of his fiction. It is a novel of manners, a political novel, and an erotic novel that portrays Romanian society in the fateful years between 1936 and 1948. But it is, above all, an intellectual novel and a mystic novel. It is about young men who are desperate to escape from history and time and who seek to live in some other dimension and in accordance with other rules.

In his fiction no less than in his explorations of religions and myths, Eliade was moved by the urge to pose fundamental questions about existence. Novels served him as tools to sound the inner life of man in search of the eternal.

—Keith Hitchins

ÉLUARD, Paul

Born: Eugène-Émile-Paul Grindel in Paris, France, 14 December 1895. Education: Educated at École communale, Aulnay-sous-Bois, 1901–09; École primaire supérieure Colbert, Paris, 1909. Military Service: Served in the French army during World War I and World War II. Family: Married 1) Hélène Dimitrovnie (Gala) Diakonova in 1917 (separated 1930), one daughter; 2) Maria Benz in 1934 (died 1946); 3) Dominique Lemor in 1951. Career: Confined in a sanatorium in Davos, 1912–14; leading member of the Surrealist movement between 1919 and 1938; co-founder La Révolution surréaliste, 1924; joined Association of Revolutionary Writers and Artists, Paris, 1931; worked for the Resistance, from 1942; founder, with Louis Parrot, L'Éternelle Revue, 1944; travelled to Czechoslovakia, Italy, Yugoslavia, Greece, and Poland after World War II. Member: Communist Party, 1927–33, and from 1938. Died: 18 November 1952.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

- Poésies choisies*, edited by Claude Roy. 1959.
Anthologie Éluard, edited by Clive Scott. 1968.
Oeuvres complètes, edited by Marcelle Dumas and Lucien Scheler. 2 vols., 1968.
Poèmes choisis, edited by Pierre Gamarra and Rouben Melik. 1982.
Oeuvres poétiques complètes, edited by Hubert Juin. 6 vols., 1986.
Selected Poems, translated by Gilbert Bowen. 1987.
Ombres et soleil: Shadows and Sun: Selected Writings of 1913–1952, translated by Lloyd Alexander and Cicely Buckley. 1995.
The Automatic Message; The Magnetic Fields; The Immaculate Conception by André Breton, Paul Éluard and Philippe Soupault, translated by David Gascoyne, Antony Melville and Jon Graham. 1997.

Verse

- Premiers poèmes*. 1913.
Le Devoir et l'inquiétude. 1917.
Poèmes pour la paix. 1918.
Les Animaux et leurs hommes. Les Hommes et leurs animaux. 1920.
Répétitions. 1922.
Les Malheurs des immortels, with Max Ernst. 1922.
Mourir de ne pas mourir. 1924.
152 proverbes mis au goût du jour, with Benjamin Péret. 1925.
Capitale de la douleur. 1926.
Les Dessous d'une vie ou la pyramide humaine. 1926.
L'Amour la poésie. 1929.
A toute épreuve. 1930.
La Vie immédiate. 1932.
La Rose publique. 1934.
Facile. 1935.
Nuits partagées. 1935.
Les Yeux fertiles. 1936.
Thorns of Thunder: Selected Poems, edited by George Reavey, translated by Samuel Beckett and others. 1936.
Les Mains libres, illustrated by Man Ray. 1937.
Cours naturel. 1938.
Chanson complète. 1939.
Donner à voir (includes prose). 1939.
Le Livre ouvert I (1938–1940). 1940.
Choix de poèmes, edited by A. Bosquet. 1941; revised edition, 1946.
Sur les pentes inférieures. 1941.
Le Livre ouvert II (1939–1941). 1942.
Poésie et vérité. 1942; as Poetry and Truth, translated by Roland Penrose and E.L.T. Mesens, 1944.
Poésie involontaire, poésie intentionnelle (selection). 1942.
Les Sept poèmes d'amour en guerre. 1943.
Dignes de vivre. 1944.
Le Lit, la table. 1944.
Au rendez-vous allemand. 1944; revised edition, 1946.
Pour vivre ici. 1944.
Doubles d'ombre, illustrated by Éluard. 1945.
Lingères légères. 1945.
Une longue réflexion amoureuse. 1945.
Poésie ininterrompue I. 1946.
Le Dur Désir de durer. 1946; as Le Dur Désir de durer, translated by Stephen Spender and Frances Cornford, 1950.
Corps mémorable. 1947.
Le Temps déborde. 1947.
Choix de poèmes, edited by Louis Parrot. 1948.
Poèmes politiques. 1948.
Voir: Poèmes, peintures, dessins. 1948.
Le Bestiaire. 1949.
Une leçon de morale. 1949.
Pouvoir tout dire. 1951.
Le Phénix. 1951.
Les Sentiers et les routes de la poésie. 1952.
Poésie ininterrompue II. 1953.
Deux poèmes, with René Char. 1960.
Derniers poèmes d'amour. 1966; as Last Love Poems of Paul Éluard (bilingual edition), translated by Marilyn Kallet, 1980.
Max Ernst: Peintures pour Paul Éluard. 1969.
Poésies 1913–1926. 1970.

- Uninterrupted Poetry: Selected Writings*, translated by Lloyd Alexander. 1975.
Poèmes de jeunesse, edited by Lucien Scheler and Clavreuil. 1978.
L'Enfant qui ne voulait pas grandir. 1980.

Other

- Les Nécessités de la vie et les conséquences des rêves*. 1921.
L'Immaculée Conception, with André Breton. 1930.
Appliquée. 1937.
A Pablo Picasso. 1944.
A L'Intérieur de la vue. 1948.
Selected Writings, translated by Lloyd Alexander. 1951.
Lettres de jeunesse, edited by Robert D. Valette. 1962.
Anthologie des écrits sur l'art. 3 vols., 1952–54; 1 vol., 1972.
Le Poète et son ombre: Textes inédits. 1963; revised edition, 1989.
Lettres à Joë Bousquet, edited by Lucien Scheler. 1973.
Lettres à Gala: (1924–1948), edited by Pierre Dreyfus. 1984.
Seconde nature. 1990.
Dictionnaire abrégé du surréalisme, with André Breton. 1991.
 Translator, Oeuvres choisies, by Christo Botev, 1966.

*

Critical Studies: Le Je universal chez Paul Éluard by P. Emmanuel, 1938; Paul Éluard by Louis Perche, 1963; Le Poète et son ombre, 1963, and Éluard: Livre d'identité, 1967, revised edition, 1968, both by Robert D. Valette; Paul Éluard: L'Amour, la révolte, le rêve, 1965, and Paul Éluard: Biographie pour une approche, 1965, both by Luc Decaunes; La Poésie de Paul Éluard et le thème de la pureté by Ursula Jucker-Wehrli, 1965; Éluard par lui-même, 1968, and La Poétique du désir, 1974, both by Raymond Jean; Album Éluard by Roger J. Ségalat, 1968; The Poetry of Dada and Surrealism: Aragon, Breton, Tzara, Éluard and Desnos by Mary Ann Caws, 1970; Le Vocabulaire politique de Paul Éluard by Marie-Renée Guyard, 1974; Paul Éluard by Robert Nugent, 1974; "Nuits partagées" and The Prose Poem in Éluard by Eric Hill Wayne, 1976; Éluard; ou, le pouvoir du mot by Jean-Yves Debreuille, 1977; Les Mots la vie by C. Guedj, 1980; Éluard; ou, le rayonnement de l'être by Daniel Bergez, 1982; La Poésie de Paul Éluard: La rupture et le partage 1913–1936 by Nicole Boulestreau, 1985; Paul Éluard; ou, Le Frère voyant by Jean-Charles Gateau, 1988.

* * *

Paul Éluard was a prolific if uneven poet. Between 1916 and 1952 he composed verse and prose poems of astonishing lyrical power and verbal invention. His reputation as a major 20th-century lyric poet rests chiefly on his surrealist love poetry (1924–38) and his Resistance poems (1940–44). He also produced Dadaist poems, surrealist experimental collaborations (with Breton on the Dictionnaire abrégé du surréalisme [Abridged Dictionary of Surrealism] and on L'Immaculée Conception [The Immaculate Conception])—a linguistic exploration of madness using automatic writing techniques, poetic translations (of García Lorca, Botev), critical writings on poetry, demagogical communist verse, political pamphlets, anthologies of poetry and of writings on art, and scripts for a series of radio broadcasts. The broad trajectory of his work reflects an increasing commitment to militant communism, although many critics feel that his later work does not rise above sentimentality or dogma.

In Éluard's poetry a language of an amoral sensory world is pitched against that of moral statement. Fighting alongside fellow Surrealists in a crusade against artificially maintained rational categories, Éluard believed that the moral and sensory domains are inseparable. For Éluard there is an immediacy of perception by the self of the world. Moreover, all the world's objects cooperate in the act of perception by mutually foregrounding each other. Éluard called this idea "transparency." This transparency is observed in many of the poems in Capitale de la douleur [Capital of Pain]: "The space between things has the shape of my words/ . . . The space has the shape of my looks" (from "Ne plus partager"); "Tes yeux sont livrés à ce qu'ils voient/Vus par ce qu'ils regardent" [Your eyes are delivered to what they see/Seen by what they observe] (from "Nusch"). Transparency is ensured by the figure of Woman that for Éluard is a principle of Being ("resemblance").

This myth of seeing is predominant in many of Éluard's poems presenting the world altered by the radical perception of lovers. However, the proliferation of perspectives and matter created and sustained by Éluard's vertiginous visual imagery points up a disturbance at the heart of looking. The purity of vision paradoxically requires impurity in the form of dissolved identity. A poem such as "L'Amoureuse" celebrates the marvellous, yet shows it to be a burden. The full presence of the external world both delights and oppresses: "Elle est debout sur mes paupières" (she is standing on my eyelids). The event of looking takes place inside the eye, as experience accrues in an endless set of transparencies. The unsettling nature of this sensory plenitude is in evidence in poems such as "Le plus jeune" and in many of the poems in "La vie immédiate" and La Rose publique [The Public Rose].

The highly volatile universe of images in the Éluardian sensory world is matched by the equally destabilizing moral diction in the poems. This is as true of Éluard's first serious political poem "La Victoire de Guernica," as in these opening lines from "Premièrement": "La terre est bleue comme une orange/Jamais une erreur les mots ne mentent pas" [The earth is blue like an orange/Never an error words do not lie]. The dizzying, and irritating, effect of these lines resides in the way in which both domains collide. The programmatic symmetry here moralizes the sensory, just as the moral is made sensory; the reader witnesses simultaneous substitution and interpenetration.

Such strategies are to be found in Poésie ininterrompue I [Uninterrupted Poetry I], a long poem that demonstrates the full range of Éluard's poetic language. This extraordinary work, which is at the same time an autobiographical apologia and a poem of the Liberation, grafts surrealist techniques (used long after his objective break with Breton and the Surrealists in 1938) onto a vision of communist utopia. The peculiar rhetoric of this poem presents the paradise experienced by the reader as the next and inevitable evolutionary step for humankind. As elsewhere in Éluard's work, but here concentrated and refined, the "linguistic democracy" of Éluard's syntax reflects his anti-hierarchical views, creating a poetic Marxism in which all classes are dissolved. Paratactic enumeration and sententious aphorism, which Éluard had exploited in earlier poems, gather momentum through hallucinatory verbal incantation. In Poésie ininterrompue I, with its wearisome and elating intertwining of programmatic exhortations and surrealist imagery, Éluard achieved a new kind of poem.

If the themes of Éluard's love poetry are perennial—purity, passion, the lovers' look, the world made marvellous by the state of romance, the loneliness experienced in the absence of love—he nevertheless proves to be an unconventional poet, in two essential ways. Firstly, an analysis of his poetic language reveals a specific and idiosyncratic revitalizing of stock, contemporary, diction. A micro-history of the period is detectable in the incestuous surrealist magazines and, during the war, in the echoes and loans of key words in the many Resistance journals to which Éluard subscribed and contributed. Secondly, Éluard promulgated in his poems the belief that love, like poetry itself, was a revolutionary act capable of transforming both perception and societal life. In so doing, the amorous couple is placed at the service of humanity, as an example and a building block for an abundant world.

Although Éluard wrote some execrable verse ("Joseph Staline" for example) at a time (1950) when the French Communist Party was nurturing its cultural mascots, his overall project was not to incorporate Marxist ideas into poems, but to set down his sympathies for victims of social injustice and of the stultification of perception in bourgeois life. To this end, Éluard created a hybrid poetry of moral didacticism and pure lyricism. Not since Hugo has there been such an intriguing conflation of private imagination and public pronouncement in French poetry.

—Rolf Venner

See the essay on "You the only one."

ELYTIS, Odysseus

Born: Odysseus Alepoudelis in Heraklion, Crete, 2 November 1911. Education: Studied law at the University of Athens, 1930–33, no degree; studied literature at the Sorbonne, Paris, 1948–52. Military Service: Served in the First Army Corps, in Albania, 1940–41: Lieutenant. Career: Programme director, National Broadcasting Institution, 1945–47, 1953–54; art and literary critic, Kathimerini newspaper, 1946–48, adviser to Art Theatre, 1955–56, and Greek National Theatre, 1965–68. President of the Governing Board, Greek Ballet, 1956–58, and Greek Broadcasting and Television, 1974; member of the Administrative Board, Greek National Theatre, 1974–76. Member: Order of the Phoenix, 1965; Grand Commander, Order of Honour, 1979; Commandeur de l'Ordre des Arts et des Lettres (France), 1984; Commandeur, Légion d'honneur (France), 1989. Awards: National prize for poetry, 1960; Nobel prize for literature, 1979; Royal Society of Literature Benson medal (UK), 1981. D.Litt.: University of Salonica, 1976; the Sorbonne, 1980; University of London, 1981. Died: 18 March 1996.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

The Collected Poems of Odysseus Elytis, translated by Jeffrey Carson and Nikos Sarris. 1997.

Eros, Eros, Eros: Selected and Last Poems, translated by Olga Broumas. 1998.

Verse

Prosanatolismi [Orientations]. 1936.

O Ilios o Protos, mazi me tis Parallayes pano se mian Ahtida [Sun the First Together with Variations on a Sunbeam]. 1943.

- Asma Iroiko ke Penthimo yia ton Hameno Anthipolohago tis Alvanias* [Heroic and Elegiac Song for the Lost Second Lieutenant of the Albanian Campaign]. 1945.
- I Kalosini stis Likopories* [Kindness in the Wolfpasses]. 1946.
- To Axion Esti*. 1959; as The Axion Esti, translated by Edmund Keeley and G.P. Savidis, 1974.
- Exi ke Mia Tipsis yia ton Ourano* [Six and One Regrets for the Sky]. 1960.
- To Fotodendro ke i Dekati Tetarti Omorfia* [The Light Tree and the Fourteenth Beauty]. 1971.
- O Ilios o Iliatoras* [The Sovereign Sun]. 1971.
- Thanatos ke Anastasis tou Konstantinou Paleologou* [Death and Resurrection of Constantine Palaiologos]. 1971.
- To Monogramma* [The Monogram]. 1972.
- To Ro tou Erotas* [The Ro of Eros] (songs). 1972.
- Clear Days: Poems by Palamas and Elytis, in Versions by Nikos Tselepidis*, edited by Kenneth O. Hanson. 1972.
- Villa Natacha*. 1973.
- O Fillomantis* [The Leaf Diviner]. 1973.
- Ta Eterothali* [The Stepchildren]. 1974.
- The Sovereign Sun: Selected Poems*, translated by Kimon Friar. 1974.
- Maria Nefeli*. 1978; as Maria Nefeli, translated by Athan Anagnostopoulos, 1981.
- Selected Poems*, edited and translated by Edmund Keeley and Philip Sherrard. 1981.
- Tria Poemata me Simea Evkerias* [Three Poems under a Flag of Convenience]. 1982.
- Hemerologio henos atheatou Apriliou* [Diary of an Unseen April]. 1984.
- O Mikros Naftilos*. 1985; as The Little Mariner, translated by Olga Broumas, 1988.
- What I Love: Selected Poems of Odysseas Elytis*, translated by Olga Broumas. 1986.
- Krinagoras*. 1987.
- Ta Elegia tis Oxopetras* [The Elegies of Oxopetras]. 1991.

Other

- O Zografos Theofilos* [The Painter Theophilos]. 1973.
- Anoichta Hartia* [Open Book]. 1974; as Open Papers, translated by Olga Broumas and T. Begley, 1995.
- He Mageia tou Papadiamantis* [The Magic of Papadiamantis]. 1976.
- Anafora ston Andrea Embiriko* [Report to Andreas Embirikos]. 1980.
- To Domatio me tis Ikones* [The Room of Images]. 1986.
- Ta Dimosia ke ta Idiotika* [Public and Private Matters]. 1990.
- I Idiotiki Odos* [Private Way]. 1990.
- En Lefko* [In White]. 1992.
- Translator, Defteri Graphi [Second Writing] (poems of Lorca, Rimbaud, Éluard, Maiakovskii, and others). 1976.
- Translator, Ioannis, I Apokalipsi [St. John, Apocalypse]. 1985.
- Translator, Sappho—Anasynthesi ke Apodosi [Sappho—Synthesis and Rendering]. 1985.

*

Critical Studies: Elytis issue of Books Abroad, Autumn 1975; Odysseus Elytis: Anthologies of Light, edited by Ivar Ivask, 1981;

“Maria Nefeli and the Changeful Sameness of Elytis: Variations on a Theme” by Andonis Decavalles, and “Elytis and the Greek Tradition” by Edmund Keeley, both in Charioteer, 1982–83; “Odysseus Elytis and the Discovery of Greece” by Philip Sherrard, in Journal of Modern Greek Studies, 1(2), 1983; “Eliot and Elytis: Poet of Time, Poet of Space” by Karl Malkoff, in Comparative Literature, 36(3), 1984; “Odysseus Elytis in the 1980s” by Andonis Decavalles, in World Literature Today, 62(1), 1988.

* * *

Ever since Odysseus Elytis first appeared on the Greek literary scene in 1935, critical attention has focused on the new world his poetry created: a world of sun and sea, the Aegean landscape, love, and communion with nature. Yet the world of Elytis, consistently developed since the poet’s earliest collection, Prosanatolismi [Orientations], would seem to be rather more complex than some critics have allowed. His subsequent work indicates that this world is correlative to his view of poetry as an alternative to reality. Within this world, as Elytis has said with reference to a fellow poet, Andreas Embirikos, actual problems may not be solved, but something more radical occurs: the logic that created these problems is abolished.

One of the methods Elytis has employed for the creation of his world is surrealism. Together with Embirikos, Nikos Engonopoulos, and Nikos Gatsos, he introduced surrealism into Greek literary life in the 1930s and 1940s. Having experimented with surrealism before publishing anything, Elytis finally rejected certain surrealist techniques, such as automatic writing, but adopted some aspects of its philosophy, viewing surrealism as a quest for spiritual health and a reaction against the rationalism prevalent in Western thought. Another method he used is the establishing of connections between the natural elements of his poetic world and attitudes to life; as he says in O Mikros Naftilos (The Little Mariner), the exploration of the hidden relationships between meanings leads to poetry which, like one’s view of the sky, depends on one’s vantage point.

The “Greekness” of Elytis’s poetic landscape has frequently been the subject of critical commentary. If, however, at the beginning of his poetic career, this landscape was a celebration of love, in To Axion Esti (The Axion Esti) it also becomes a place where the joy and pain of existence and creation combine with the historical adventures of the Greek nation, where good fights against evil, universal values are established, and death is defeated. This world, created by and simultaneously with poetry, is proclaimed in the end to be eternal, while the poet states that “WORTHY is the price paid.” The tragic aspects of this sunlit world are also confronted in Exi ke Mia Tipsis yia ton Ourano [Six and One Regrets for the Sky]. There, the poet affirms “the lawfulness of the Unhoped-For,” and at the same time states: “Well then, he whom I sought I am”—an achievement that Elytis has elsewhere characterized as the most difficult thing in the world, defining the process of becoming what one is as poetry.

When the components of Elytis’s world have acquired these new dimensions, some of which are explored through the dialogue of a girl called Maria Nefeli [Maria Cloud] and her interlocutor who seems to represent the poet, in Maria Nefeli, they manage to incorporate death too. Aspects of death are explored in Hemerologio henos atheatou Apriliou [Diary of an Unseen April] and in Ta Elegia tis Oxopetras [The Elegies of Oxopetras]. Through its polymorphous connections with sun, sea, gardens, and love, death is proclaimed in the latter collections to be the blue, endless sea and the unsetting sun, while in the former ones, the poet contemplates the “Unknown” and declares that he has worked there for years and that his fingers were scorched just as he was about to see Paradise opening. Thus, death is not presented as the reverse of love, since antitheses in the world of Elytis are often resolved into a synthesis; as the poet said about himself in Prosanatolismi, from the other side he is the same.

This sameness persists in the “other side” of Elytis’s main poetic work, that is, in his songs and essays. His songs were published in 1972 under the general title To Ro tou Erosa [The Ro of Eros] and many of them were set to music, as also was a large part of The Axion Esti, by Mikis Theodorakis. Apart from the subject matter, one of the obvious resemblances between these songs and Elytis’s poems is found in the insistence on magic numbers: most of these songs are grouped in sevens or multiples of seven, a number which occurs both in titles of collections (Exi ke Mia Tipsis yia ton Ourano, To Fotodendro ke i Dekati Tetarti Omorfia [The Light Tree and the Fourteenth Beauty]) and in the structure of his collections and compositions. His preoccupation with numbers is probably related to his preoccupation with the metrical forms of his poems. Although his verse usually falls under the general heading of “free verse,” Elytis has himself commented on the strict metrical and formal rules he imposes on his verse. Most of his essays have been collected in a book entitled Anoichta Hartia (Open Papers), where he gives a chronicle of his literary generation (the “Generation of the 1930s”), describes their explorations and poetics, and deals with surrealism and dreams, painters, and poets. One of his other, separately published, essays takes the form of Anafora ston Andrea Embiriko [Report to Andreas Embirikos], combining memories of his friend and fellow poet with an account of surrealist poetics. The integral position which Elytis’s translations occupy in his work is apparent from the titles he gives them: Defteri Graphi [Second Writing] for translations of Lorca, Rimbaud, Éluard, Maiakovskii, and others; Sappho—Anasynthesi ke Apodosi [Sappho—Synthesis and Rendering] for his arrangement and translation of the Sapphic fragments.

The creation of the poetic world, adjacent to the real one, both dependent on and independent from it, makes the poet’s role a dangerous one, quite different from the image of the “carefree Elytis” projected by critics of his early work. In To Fotodendro ke i Dekati Tetarti Omorfia the poet defines his position as painful but unshakeable (“still standing firm with burnt fingers”) in a world of his own creation.

—Elli Philokyprou

ENDŌ Shūsaku (Paul)

Born: Tokyo, Japan, 27 March 1923. Education: Educated at Keio University, Tokyo, B.A. in French literature 1949; University of Lyons, 1950–53. Family: Married Junko Okada in 1955; one son. Career: Contracted tuberculosis in 1959. Former editor of the literary journal Mita Bungaku; chair, Bungeika Kyōkai (Literary Artists’ Association); manager, Kiza amateur theatrical troupe. President, Japanese PEN. Awards: Akutagawa prize, 1955; Tanizaki prize, 1967; Grupo de Oficial da Ordem do Infante dom Henrique (Portugal), 1968; Sancti Silvestri (award by Pope Paul VI), 1970; Noma prize, 1980; Mainichi cultural prize; Dag Hammarskjöld prize. Honorary doctorate: Georgetown University, Washington, DC; University of California, Santa Clara. Member: Nihon Geijutsuin (Japanese Arts Academy), 1981. Died: 29 September 1996.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Five by Endo: Stories, translated by Van C. Gessel. 2000.

Fiction

Aden made [Till Aden], in Mita bungaku. November 1954.

Shiroi hito [White Man]. 1955.

Kiiroi hito [Yellow Man]. 1955.

Aoi chiisana budō [Green Little Grapes], in Bungakukai. January–June 1956.

Umi to dokuyaku. 1957; as The Sea and Poison, translated by Michael Gallagher, 1972.

Kazan. 1959; as Volcano, translated by Richard Schuchert, 1978.

Obakasan, in Asahi shinbun. April–August 1959; as Wonderful Fool, translated by Francis Mathy, 1974.

Otoko to kyūkanchō [Three Men and a Starling], in Bungakukai. January 1963.

Watashi no mono. 1963; translated as “Mine,” in Japan Christian Quarterly, 40(4), 1974.

Watashi ga suteta onna. 1964; as The Girl I Left Behind, translated by Mark Williams, 1994.

Aika [Elegies] (stories). 1965.

Ryūgaku, in Gunzō. March 1965; as Foreign Studies, translated by Mark Williams, 1989.

Chinmoku. 1966; as Silence, translated by William Johnston, 1969.

Taihen daa! [Good Grief!]. 1969.

Shikai no hotori [By the Dead Sea]. 1973.

Iesu no shogai. 1973; as A Life of Jesus, translated by Richard Schuchert, 1978.

Yumoa shōsetsu shū [Collection of Humorous Stories]. 1973.

Waga seishun ni kui ari [Regrets for Our Youth]. 1974.

Kuchibue o fuku toki. 1974; as When I Whistle, translated by Van C. Gessel, 1979.

Sekai kikō [Travels Around the World]. 1975.

Hechimakun [Master Snake-Gourd]. 1975.

Kitsunegata tanukigata [In the Shape of a Fox, in the Shape of a Badger]. 1976.

Gūtara mandanshū [Lazybones]. 1978.

Marie Antoinette. 1979.

Jūichi no iro garasu [11 Pieces of Stained Glass] (stories). 1979.

Samurai. 1980; as The Samurai, translated by Van C. Gessel, 1982.

Onna no isshō [A Woman’s Life]. 1982.

Akuryō no gogo [Afternoon of the Evil Spirit]. 1983.

Stained Glass Elegies: Stories (includes stories from Aika and Jūichi no iro garasu), translated by Van C. Gessel. 1984.

Sukyandaru. 1986; as Scandal, translated by Van C. Gessel, 1988.

Hangyaku [Rebellion]. 2 vols., 1989.

The Final Martyrs: Stories, translated by Van C. Gessel. 1993.

Fukai kawa. 1993; as Deep River, translated by Van C. Gessel. 1994.

Plays

- Ōgon no kuni* (produced 1966). 1969; as The Golden Country, translated by Francis Mathy, 1970.
Bara no yakata [A House Surrounded by Roses]. 1969.

Other

- Furansu no daigakusei* [Students in France, 1951–52]. 1953.
Seisho no naka no joseitachi [Women in the Bible]. 1968.
Korian vs Manbō, with Kita Morio. 1974.
Bungaku Zenshū [Collected Literary Works]. 11 vols., 1975.
Ukiaru kotoba [Floating Words]. 1976.
Ai no akebono [Dawn of Love], with Miura Shumon. 1976.
Nihonjin wa kirisuto kyō o shinjirareru ka [Can Japanese People Believe in Christianity?]. 1977.
Kirisuto no tanjō [The Birth of Christ]. 1978.
Ningen no naka no X [X Inside Human Beings]. 1978.
Rakuten taishō [Great Victory of Optimism]. 1978.
Kare no ikikata [His Way of Life]. 1978.
Jū to jūjika (biography of Pedro Cassini). 1979.
Shinran, with Masutani Fumio. 1979.
Sakka no nikki [Writer's Diary]. 1980.
Chichioya [Father]. 1980.
Kekkonron [On Marriage]. 1980.
Endō Shūsaku ni yoru Endō Shūsaku [Endo Shusaku According to Himself]. 1980.
Meiga Iesu junrei [Pilgrimage to Famous Pictures of Jesus]. 1981.
Ai to jinsei o meguru danso [Faults in Love and Life]. 1981.
Ōkoku e no michi [The Way to the Kingdom]. 1981.
Fuyu no yasashisa [The Gentleness of Winter]. 1982.
Watakushi ni totte kami to wa [My View of God]. 1983.
Kokoro [Heart]. 1984.
Ikiru gakkō [School of Life]. 1984.
Watakushi no aishita shōsetsu [A Novel I Have Loved]. 1985.
Rakudai bōzu no rirekisho [Resumé of a Failed Priest]. 1989.
Kawaru mono to kawaranu mono: hanadokei [Things That Change and Things That Do Not Change: Flower-Clocks]. 1990.

*

Critical Studies: “Shusaku Endo: The Second Period” by Francis Mathy, in Japan Christian Quarterly, 40, 1974; “Tradition and Contemporary Consciousness: Ibuse, Endo, Kaiko, Abe” by J. Thomas Rimer, in his Modern Japanese Fiction and Its Traditions, 1978; “Mr. Shusaku Endo Talks about His Life and Works as a Catholic Writer” (interview), in Chesterton Review, 12(4), 1986; “The Roots of Guilt and Responsibility in Shusaku Endo’s The Sea and Poison” by Hans-Peter Breuer, in Literature and Medicine, 7, 1988; “Rediscovering Japan’s Christian Tradition: Text-Immanent Hermeneutics in Two Short Stories by Shusaku Endo” by Rolf J. Goebel, in Studies in Language and Culture, 14(63), 1988; “Graham Greene: The Power and the Glory: A Comparative Essay with Silence by Shusaku Endo” by Kazuie Hamada, in Collected Essays by the Members of the Faculty (Kyoritsu Women’s Junior College), 31, February 1988; “Christianity in the Intellectual Climate of Modern Japan” by Shunichi Takayanagi, in Chesterton Review, 14(3), 1988; “Salvation of the Weak: Endo Shusaku,” in The Sting of Life: Four Contemporary Japanese Novelists, 1989, and “The Voice of the Doppelgänger,” in Japan Quarterly, 38(2), 1991, both by Van C. Gessel; The Image of Christ in the Fiction of Endō Shūsaku by Leith Morton, 1994; Endō Shūsaku: A Literature of Reconciliation by Mark B. Williams, 1999.

* * *

Ever since his emergence on the literary scene, Endō Shūsaku has consistently sought resolution of the conflict he has perceived between, on the one hand, his “adopted” religion, Christianity, and, on the other, his chosen profession as author. Derived in part from his study of several French Catholic novelists, and informing his entire oeuvre, is the desire for a reconciliation between his perceived duty, as Christian, to seek within man the potential for salvation and the necessity, accruing to him as author, to remain totally honest to his observations of human nature. In the case of Endō, a Japanese national, moreover, the tension was further exacerbated by the need to operate within a cultural and spiritual framework that provides less encouragement for the development of literary themes dealing with the spiritual drama of the relationship between God and man, leading him to conclude: “As a Christian, Japanese and an author, I am constantly concerned with the relationship and conflict created by these three tensions . . . Unfortunately, these three tensions continue to appear as contradictory in my mind.”

The result, in the case of Endō, is an author whose self-professed desire “to find God on the streets of Shinjuku and Shibuya, districts which seem so far removed from Him” has been constantly tempered by a realization that he was “not writing in order to proselytize,” and that, if he were, his “works would certainly suffer as literature.” Thereafter, the more he has found himself drawn to privilege his obligations as literary artist, the more he has come to recognize the need to create “living human beings,” a task that requires, not merely external observation, but also scrutiny of the internal psychology of his creations, a faithful depiction of their inner being, however unattractive. The result is a body of works that increasingly mirrors Endō’s conviction that “to describe man’s inner self, we must probe to the third dimension [within the unconscious] . . . to the territory of demons. One cannot describe man’s inner being completely unless one closes in on this demonic part.”

The paradox is readily apparent: in focusing on a realm in which “our desire for Good conflicts with our penchant for Evil, where our appreciation of Beauty conflicts with our attachment to the Ugly,” Endō was drawn increasingly to focus on the weakness of human nature, in the belief that only thus could he portray, behind the sin depicted, “the glimmer of light . . . the light of God’s grace”—the potential for salvation which he saw as underlying the entire human drama. The consequent vision of the unconscious as both the fount of all sin and the “place where God works and has His being” is reflected in the Endō text by an increasing focus on the “monstrous duality of man,” this assuming the literary guise of a gradual fusion of two qualities, initially established as in opposition. In several texts, like Chinmoku (Silence) and The Samurai, the central dichotomy thus established is that between East and West, with the distance between the two, initially depicted as unfathomable (as evidenced by the Western missionaries appearing unable to penetrate the “mudswamp” of Japan), steadily eroded during the course of the novels as a result of the author’s increasing focus, not on external distinctions, but on internal similarities that allow for meaningful communication across various national, religious, and cultural divides. Thus, at the outset of

Silence, Rodrigues, the Portuguese missionary, is portrayed as entirely confident of his own inner resources. Confronted by the choice, imposed upon him by the Japanese shogunate authorities, between on the one hand adherence to his faith and the consequent death of the Japanese converts being tortured before his eyes, and, on the other, renunciation of all that his life to date had stood for, Rodrigues ultimately succumbs and tramples on the crucifix that had been placed before him in an outward act of apostasy. Internally, however, there is evidence, supported in the text by the erosion of the apparently irreconcilable distinction between the “strong” martyr and the “weak” apostate, of the protagonist’s augmented love of God at the end of the novel, the narrator acknowledging Rodrigues’s decision, following shortly after his act of public apostasy, to hear the confession of the Japanese man who had betrayed him to the authorities: “He may have been betraying [his fellow priests], but he was not betraying ‘that man, [Christ].’ He loved Him now in a totally different way. ‘Everything in my life to date was necessary in order to know that love. I am still the last priest in this land.’”

A similar process can be seen at work in The Samurai, a novel in which the distance between the “Western” missionary, Velasco, and the lower-ranking samurai, symbol of “Eastern” values, is initially portrayed as unfathomable. As the novel progresses, however, so Endō’s narrator succeeds in breaking down the various obstacles to reconciliation, this being acknowledged at the personal level by Velasco in his eventual recognition: “It was as if a firm bond of solidarity had formed between the envoys and myself.”

In these, and other examples of oppositions subjected to similar fusion in Endō’s novels, the emphasis is on a steady growth in self-awareness and, as the Endō protagonist becomes more and more aware of some previously unconscious aspect of his being, so he appears increasingly well equipped to participate in this process of reconciliation. Seen in this light, Endō’s 1986 novel, Sukyandaru (Scandal), a text heralded by several critics as an abrupt abandonment of earlier Endō motifs, comes to appear rather as a progression, a work that addresses more directly than ever before the inherent human duality. During the course of the novel, the protagonist, Suguro, grows steadily in his conviction that the “impostor” he initially dismisses as a chance look-alike is none other than his own double—that “he could no longer conceal that part of himself, no longer deny its existence”—the pervading impression being of an author confident in the assessment of human nature he offered at the time: “Man is a splendid and beautiful being, and, at the same time, man is a terrible being as we recognized in Auschwitz—God knows well this monstrous dual quality of man.”

—Mark Williams

See the essay on Silence.

ENNIUS, Quintus

Born: Rudiae, Calabria, southern Italy, 239 bc. Probably of Greek extraction. Career: Served in the Roman army in Sardinia, where in 204 bc he met Cato the Elder, who took him to Rome; in 189 bc went on the Aetolian campaign with consul M. Fulvius Nobilior, through whose son he acquired Roman citizenship, 184 bc. Became a friend of Scipio Africanus the Elder. Died: 169 bc.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

[Works], edited by I. Vahlen. 1854, 2nd edition, 1903.

Fragments, edited and translated by Eric H. Warmington, in Remains of Old Latin [Loeb Edition], vol. 1, 1935; as The Tragedies of Ennius, edited by H.D. Jocelyn, 1967.

Works

Annales, as The Annals, edited and translated by E.M. Stuart. 1925; also translated by Otto Skutsch, 1953; with introduction by Enrico Flores, 2000.

*

Critical Studies: Die Formenlehre des Ennius by R. Frobenius, 1907; Ennius und Vergilius by E. Norden, 1915; Ennius und Homer by H. von Kameke, 1927; Studia Enniana (in English) by Otto Skutsch, 1968.

* * *

Quintus Ennius, the acknowledged father of Latin epic poetry, was an innovative poet who made striking advances in several literary genres. A Messapian from Rudiae, he came in 204 bc to Rome, aged 35, where he worked as a teacher, poet, and playwright. Ennius boasted of possessing three hearts, tria corda, meaning the Oscan, Greek, and Latin languages. His literary achievement owed much to his familiarity with the entire Greek heritage, from Homer to the Hellenistic writers.

The work which established Ennius’ reputation for posterity was his epic poem, the Annales (The Annals), whose title recalled that of the Pontifical Annals, although it bore little resemblance to those arid records. Ennius’ poem covered the whole range of Roman history from the sack of Troy to at least 179 bc. It contained 15 (later extended to 18) books, each of between 1,000 and 1,700 lines (compared with an average of just over 800 for those of Virgil’s Aeneid). Only about 600 lines survive, but these suffice to indicate the general pattern of the work, which was arranged in groups, each consisting of three books. Of these I–III dealt with Aeneas’ flight from Troy and the Roman kings; IV–VI with Rome’s Italian wars down to the time of Pyrrhus; VII–IX with the Punic Wars; X–XII with the wars against Philip V of Macedonia and Nabis of Sparta; and XIII–XVI with the Syrian War. Books XVI–XVIII recounted “more recent wars” (after 187 bc), but the content of this triad is obscure.

There were Hellenistic precedents for historical epic, but a poem which took the whole history of a single people as its theme was unique. Ennius’ work soon became a classic, to be studied at school, and it influenced writers in all fields down to the first century bc. Its wide appeal rested on its patriotic theme, as it dealt largely with wars, and its stress on traditional Roman qualities, reflecting the ideals of an aristocratic society, in particular virtus (manliness), enlisted in the service of Rome. The Annals were intended to replace Naevius’ poem on the First Punic War as the national epic of Rome, and Ennius’ success was achieved partly by his rich and highly original narrative style, marked by bold effects of alliteration and assonance; partly by his use of the Greek hexameter (in place of Naevius’ ungainly Saturnians); and partly by the varied contents of his verse, which incorporated biographical details, polemic, and a scattering of philosophical and learned comments.

Ennius conjures up a variety of moods, now light, now solemn, by his vivid style, which used, for example, archaisms such as “induperator” for “imperator” (general), or weighty spondaic lines at critical moments: “olli respondit rex Albai Longai” (to him replied the king of Alba Longa). Some aspects of his style, it is true, struck later generations as primitive; to Ovid his native genius (ingenium) was undeniable, but he lacked literary subtlety (ars). Occasionally he pushed his effects to the point of bathos, as in the alliterative lines “At tuba terribili sonitu taratantara dixit” (But the trumpet with frightening sound said “taratantara”) or “O Tite, tute, Tati, tibi tanta, tyranne, tulisti” (such terrible evils, Titus Tatus, broughtest thou, tyrant, on thyself). Ennius’ hexameter was still rough, with its tolerance of elided “s” before a consonant, non-elision of “m” before a vowel, and laxity regarding the caesura. However, among the surviving lines are several famous for their lapidary dignity, like the famous comment on Fabius, the opponent of Hannibal: “Unus homo nobis cunctando restituit rem” (one man by procrastinating gave us back our state). Ennius kept the “Olympic machinery” of Homer and in a famous prologue to Book I, invoking the Muses, recounted a dream in which Homer appeared to him to announce his reincarnation in the Latin poet. It is unclear how far this was symbolic and how far to be taken seriously, for Ennius wrote at a time when Pythagorean ideas of reincarnation were prevalent in Rome.

The Annals were written only in Ennius’ later years, but he composed tragedies throughout his life. Some 24 titles and about 400 lines survive. Except for two works, Sabine Women and Ambracia, based on Roman themes, Ennius followed the stories of Greek mythology. Up to a dozen titles are based on Euripides, his Eumenides on Aeschylus and Achilles on a work by Euripides’ contemporary, Aristarchus. Ennius’ tragedies, however, were far from being literal translations. Cicero remarks that Ennius gives us the sense (vis) rather than the word (verba) of his models. Moreover, he occasionally combined two Greek plays to make one: thus his Medea draws on both the Medea and the Aegeus of Euripides. More importantly, however, Ennius adapted his originals to suit a Roman audience, compressing or expanding, modifying the presentation, and introducing powerful bombastic and emotional language. The chorus had a smaller role and frequent arias, cantica, contributed a melodramatic tone, which in some ways foreshadowed Seneca.

Besides epic and tragedy, Ennius was prolific in other fields. He wrote some comedies. His four books of Satires combined moralizing and homespun philosophizing in a variety of metres and in a way that points ahead to Lucilius and Horace. And there were other works, now lost: the Euhemerus, a translation of that author’s Sacred Relation, the Hedyphagetica, probably a parody of epic dealing with food, Scipio praising Africanus, and Sota, a translation of scurrilous verses by Sotades. Ennius also composed epigrams, including his own alliterative epitaph (in elegiac metre):

nemo me lacrimis decoret nec funera fletu
faxit. cur? volito vivus per ora virum

(Let no one honour me with tears nor weep at my funeral. Why? Because I live, flitting from mouth to mouth)

Ennius dominated Roman poetry down to Virgil’s time; but the Aeneid ousted The Annals from its position as the great Roman epic.

There was a reaction against Ennius in Nero’s time, but a revival under Hadrian, who preferred him to Virgil.

—Frank W. Walbank

EÖTVÖS, Baron József

Born: Buda, Hungary (then in the Austrian Empire), 3 September 1813. Education: Educated at home, then at schools in Buda until 1824; University of Pest, from 1826. Family: Married Ágnes Rosty in 1842. Career: Attended parliament in Pozsony, 1832; served as deputy clerk of Fehér County; travelled in Switzerland, England, France, and Germany, 1836–37; appointed Minister of Religion and Public Education in Hungary, 1848; resigned and left the country several months later; returned to Buda, 1851; reappointed Minister of Religion and Public Education, 1867–71. Member: Hungarian Academy, 1835. Died: 2 February 1871.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Összes munkái [Complete Works], edited by Mór Ráth. 13 vols., 1886–93.

Összes munkái [Complete Works], edited by Géza Voinovich. 20 vols., 1901–03.

Fiction

A karthausi [The Carthusian], in Budapesti Árvizkönyv. January 1839–July 1841; in book form, 2 vols., 1842.

A falu jegyzője. 3 vols., 1845; as The Village Notary, translated (from German) by Otto Wenckstern, 3 vols., 1850.

Magyarország 1514-ben [Hungary in 1514]. 1847.

A nővérek [The Sisters]. 1857.

Elbeszélések [Short Stories]. 1859.

Verse

Költményei [Poems]. 1868.

Plays

A házasság [Getting Married]. 1833.

Bosszú [Revenge]. 1834.

Other

A kritikus apotheosisa [The Apotheosis of the Critic]. 1831.

Vélemény a fogházjavítás ügyében [An Opinion on Prison Reform]. 1838.

Die Emanzipation der Juden [The Emancipation of the Jews]. 1840.

Kelet népe és a Pesti Hírlap [People of the East and Pesti Hírlap]. 1841.

Emlékszó Kőrösi Csoma Sándor felett [Memorial Speech on Sándor Kőrösi Csoma]. 1842.

Reform [Reform]. 1846.

A XIX. század uralkodó eszméinek befolyása az álladalomra [The Dominant Ideas of the 19th Century and Their Influence on the State]. 2 vols., 1851–54; translated by D. Mervyn Jones, 1996.
Die Garantien der Macht und Einheit Oesterreichs [Guarantees for the Power and Unity of Austria]. 1859.
Die Sonderstellung Ungarns vom Standpunkte der Einigkeit Deutschlands [The Exceptional Position of Hungary from the Perspective of German Unity]. 1859.
Emlébeszéd gróf Széchenyi István felett [Memorial Speech on Count István Széchenyi]. 1860.
Felelet báró Kemény Gábor néhány szavára [Reply to a Few Remarks by Gábor Kemény]. 1860.
Gondolatok [Thoughts]. 1864.
A nemzetiségi kérdés [The Nationality Problem]. 1865.
 Translator, Angelo, by Victor Hugo. 1836.

*

Bibliography: Hungarian Authors: A Bibliographical Handbook by Albert Tezla, 1970; A magyar irodalomtörténet bibliográfiája, 1772–1849 by György Kókay, 1975.

Critical Studies: Báró Eötvös József, mint regényíró [Baron József Eötvös as a Novelist] by Jenő Péterfy, 1901; ‘‘József Eötvös’’ by D. Mervyn Jones, in Five Hungarian Writers, 1966; Eötvös József by István Sötér, 2nd enlarged edition, 1967; Baron József Eötvös by Béla Várdy, 1969; Joseph Eötvös and the Modernization of Hungary by Paul Bödy, 1972.

* * *

Baron József Eötvös’s works include verse, drama, novels, short stories, and political studies, but his literary reputation rests mainly on his four novels. He believed firmly that all writing must have a serious purpose, but should also give pleasure, though this was never to be its main aim. He was a determined reformer of the Hungarian social and political system, and he viewed literature as a means of conveying his message.

An extended visit to Western Europe in 1836–37 had a profound effect on his thought: he then saw how the revolution of July 1830 in France had failed to usher in a new and better era and how the ideals of the 1789 French Revolution had faded. His reflections, spurred by a chance encounter at the Grande Chartreuse, inspired his first novel, A karthausi [The Carthusian]. It takes the form of a memoir containing the confessions of a selfish young French count; overcome with self-disgust after two unhappy love affairs, he withdraws from the world to seek peace among the Carthusians. He gives his confessions to a friend, who records his death, noting that he had not found the solace he sought. The novel is intensely introspective and emotional, and contains lengthy reflective passages. While there are some splendid descriptive and dramatic episodes, many of the characters seem overdrawn and reliance upon coincidences betrays the inexperienced novelist. Yet his message is clear: it is a warning against selfishness and the corruption of high ideals, and is as applicable to Hungary as to France.

Eötvös’s second and best-known novel, A falu jegyzője (The Village Notary), appeared in 1845 when political reform was under active discussion. It is a full-blooded attack on the Hungarian county-system, which the author viewed as corrupt and hostile to reform. He depicts a fictitious county, exposing all its shortcomings and the social evils generated by them. It embraces all classes from the aristocracy to the outlaw, and the resulting unflattering picture led early critics to declare that it was more like a reformist leading article than a novel. Yet the scene is not entirely bleak; hope for the future rests with the young nobility, whose reforming zeal contrasts sharply with the arid conservatism of their elders. Here Eötvös’s style is appropriate to his contemporary theme; it is incisive, dramatic and satirical, laced with sardonic humour. He weaves skilfully the varied episodes into a convincing whole, and only occasionally holds up the action to reflect on a particular concern such as prison reform. In this novel he best achieved his aim of combining entertaining fiction with a political message, and the result was widely acclaimed, notably in Britain.

If The Village Notary portrayed contemporary reality, Eötvös’s third novel, Magyarország 1514-ben [Hungary in 1514], explored the origins of the social system then prevailing. In 1514 an abortive crusade against the Turks turned into full-scale peasant revolt. The rebellion was crushed and the leaders savagely punished—at the very time when the legal rights of the various classes were being codified. So the punitive legislation of 1514 relating to non-nobles passed into laws which remained in force till 1848. Eötvös’s novel places history in the foreground, as his copious footnotes attest.

The action proceeds in a series of personal conflicts, without any central heroic figure; this is deliberate, since it allows Eötvös to express his doubts about revolution as a means to improve the lot of mankind and his misgivings about such ideals as liberty and equality, themes which occupied him in his later works. Justice, according to Eötvös, cannot be achieved by violence. The novel, again on a vast scale, maintains an uneasy balance between history and fiction; it seeks to interpret history, not to use it as a background. Thus while the historical characters are vividly portrayed, their fictional counterparts are somewhat drab, indicating an unresolved conflict between the historian and the novelist, to whom the message was more important than the medium.

The message came too late. Eötvös left Hungary before revolution erupted in 1848. In exile till 1850, he expounded his political views in A XIX. század uralkodó eszméinek befolyása az álladalomra [The Dominant Ideas of the 19th Century and Their Influence on the State], a magisterial survey demonstrating how the ideals inherited from the French Revolution—liberty, equality, and nationality to replace fraternity—might well prove incompatible in mankind’s endeavours to progress, and offering his own solution to the problem. Published in two volumes in 1851 and 1854, in both German and Hungarian, it received wider recognition abroad than in Hungary.

On his return to Hungary in 1851, Eötvös resumed his literary pursuits. A number of skillfully written short stories set in rural Hungary were followed by his novel A nővérek [The Sisters] in 1857. Here new problems are faced, including the decay of the Hungarian gentry, a theme pursued by many later writers. Eötvös introduces the superfluous aristocrat, whose life is characterized by uneventfulness, boredom, and illusion. It is a psychological novel, remarkable for its insight into feminine psychology. Alongside the main theme, the author stresses the importance of children’s education, a subject that he was to pursue vigorously after 1867 as Minister of Religion and Public Education. Once again he suits his style to his theme: it is muted and colourless, prompting critics to deplore the lack of his previous vitality, even in a comparatively brief work.

Such strictures ignore his unrivalled skill, at a time when the novel was an undefined genre, of altering both form and style to suit his theme; no other writer attempted such variety, from the memoir to realistic description, history, and psychology, to proclaim his views. Eötvös served his age not only as statesman and political thinker, but also as thought-provoking novelist.

—G.F. Cushing

See the essay on The Village Notary.

ERASMUS, Desiderius

Born: Rotterdam, The Netherlands (then under Spanish rule), probably 27/28 October 1467. Education: Educated at a school in Gouda, ages 4–9; at Deventer, 1478–93; a seminary at 's Hertogenbosch. Career: Entered monastery of Canons Regular of S. Augustine, Steyn, 1487; ordained priest, 1492; released from monastic confinement, and entered secretarial service of Bishop of Cambrai, 1493–95; studied at College of Montaigue, Paris, 1495–99, 1500–01; became Doctor of Divinity, University of Turin, 1506. Lived or travelled in England, 1499, 1505–06, 1509–14 (lectured on Greek in Cambridge), 1515, 1516, 1517; lived in Italy, 1506–09; lived in Louvain, 1517–21; general editor of John Froben's press, Basle, 1521–29; lived in Freiburg, 1529–35, and in Basle again, 1535–36; declined offer of becoming a Cardinal. Died: 12 July 1536.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Opera omnia, edited by Jean Leclerc. 10 vols., 1703–06.

The Essential Erasmus, edited by John P. Dolan. 1964.

Essential Works, edited by W.T.H. Jackson. 1965.

Opera omnia. 1969– (9 vols. to 1983).

Collected Works. 1974– (72 vols. to 1992).

The Erasmus Reader, edited by Erika Rummel. 1990.

Works

Adagia. 1500, and later augmented editions; as Proverbs or Adages, translated by Richard Taverner, 1539; translated anonymously, 1622; as Adages, translated by Margaret Mann Phillips, in The Adages: A Study, 1964; also translated by R.A.B. Mynors, in Collected Works, 1982.

Enchiridion militis Christiani. 1503; as The Manual of the Christian Knight, translated by William Tyndale, 1533, reprinted 1905; also translated by Anne M. O'Donnell, 1981; as The Christian Manual, translated by John Spier, 1752; as The Handbook of the Militant Christian, translated by John P. Dolan, 1962; as The Enchiridion, translated by Raymond Himelick, 1963.

Encomium moriae. 1511; revised edition, 1514; edited and translated by Hoyt H. Hudson, 1941; as The Praise of Folly, translated by Thomas Chaloner, 1549; also translated by John Wilson, 1668, reprinted 1961; White Kennett, 1683; James Copner, 1878; Leonard F. Dean, 1946; A.H.T. Levi and Betty Radice, 1971; Clarence H. Miller, 1979.

De ratione studii. 1512; revised edition, 1514; edited by Jean-Claude Margolin, in Opera omnia, 1971; translated as On the Aim and Method of Education, edited by W.H. Woodward, 1904; as A Method of Study, translated by Brian McGregor, in Collected Works, 1978.

De copia. 1512; revised edition, 1514; as On Copia of Words and Ideas, translated by Donald B. King and H. David Rix, 1963; as On Copia, translated by Betty I. Knott, in Collected Works, 1978.

Institutio principis Christiani. 1516; as The Education of a Christian Prince, translated by Lester K. Born, 1936; also translated by Neil M. Cheshire and Michael J. Heath, 1997.

Julius Exclusus. 1517; as The Dialogue Between Julius the Second Genius and Saint Peter, translated anonymously, 1534; translated as The Pope Shut Out of Heaven Gates, 1673; also translated by J.A. Froude, in Life and Letters of Erasmus, 1894, reprint edited by Edwin Johnson, 1916.

Colloquia familiaria. 1518, and later augmented editions; edited by L.-E. Halkin, F. Bierlaire, and R. Hoven, in Opera omnia, 1972; as The Colloquies, translated by H.M. London, 1671; also translated by Roger L'Estrange, in Twenty Select Colloquies, 1680, revised edition, 1923; Nathan Bailey, 1725, reprinted 1905; Craig R. Thompson, 1965; in part as Ten Colloquies, translated by Craig R. Thompson, 1957.

De libero arbitrio. 1524; edited by J. Walter, 1910; as Discourse on the Freedom of the Will, edited and translated by Ernest F. Winter, 1961.

Dialogus Ciceronianus. 1528; edited by Pierre Mesnard, in Opera omnia, 1971; as Ciceronianus; or, A Dialogue on the Best Style of Speaking, edited and translated by Izora Scott, 1900.

Aphorismes, translated by Nicholas Udall. 1542, reprinted 1877.

The Complaint of Peace, translated by Thomas Paynell. 1559; revised edition, 1946.

Life and Letters of Erasmus, translated by J.A. Froude. 1894, reprinted 1916.

Opus epistolarum, edited by P.S. Allen and others. 12 vols. (in Latin and English), 1906–58; as The Epistles, edited and translated by Francis M. Nichols, 3 vols., 1901–18; as Correspondence, translated by R.A.B. Mynors and D.F.S. Thomson, annotated by Wallace K. Ferguson, James K. McConica, and Peter G. Bietenholz, in Collected Works, 1974.

Opuscula, edited by W.K. Ferguson. 1933.

The Poems, edited by Cornelis Reedijk. 1956.

Erasmus and Cambridge: The Cambridge Letters, edited by H.C. Porter, translated by D.F.S. Thomson. 1963.

Christian Humanism and the Reformation: Selected Writings, edited by John C. Olin. 1965.

Erasmus and Fisher: Their Correspondence 1511–1524, edited by Jean Rouschause. 1968.

Erasmus and His Age: Selected Letters, edited by Hans J. Hillerbrand. 1970.

De conscribendis epistolis, as On the Writing of Letters, edited and translated by Charles Fantazzi, in Collected Works. 1985.

De pueris . . . instituendis declamatio, as A Declamation on the Subject of Early Liberal Education for Children, edited and translated by Beert C. Vorstraete, in Collected Works. 1985.

De recta latini graecique sermonis pronuntiatione, as The Right Way of Speaking Latin and Greek, edited and translated by Maurice Pope, in Collected Works. 1985.

The Praise of Folly, and Other Writings. 1990.

Paraphrase on The Acts of the Apostles, edited by John J. Bateman, translated and annotated by Robert D. Sider, 1995.

Erasmus on Women, edited by Erika Rummel, 1996.

Expositions of the Psalms, edited by Dominic Baker-Smith, translated and annotated by Michael J. Heath, 1997.

Editor and translator (into Latin), Novum instrumentum [New Testament]. 1516; revised edition, 1527.

Translator (into Latin), with Thomas More, Lucian. 1506.

Translator (into Latin), Hecuba, Iphigenia in Aulide, by Euripides. 1506.

Also edited works by Ambrose, Aristotle, Augustine, Basil, Cato, Chrysostom, Cicero, Cyprian, Hilary, Irenaeus, Jerome, Lactantius, Origen, Plutarch, Pseudo-Arnobius, Seneca, and others; commentary on the Bible.

*

Bibliography: Renaissance Translations of Erasmus: A Bibliography to 1700 by E.J. Devereux, 1983.

Critical Studies: Erasmus and the Northern Renaissance, 1949, and The Adages of Erasmus: A Study, 1964, both by Margaret Mann Phillips; Thomas More and Erasmus by Ernest E. Reynolds, 1965; Erasmus and Luther by Rosemary D. Jones, 1968; Erasmus of Christendom by Roland H. Bainton, 1969; Twentieth Century Interpretations of The Praise of Folly edited by Kathleen Williams, 1969; Erasmus of Rotterdam, 1971, and Essays on the Work of Erasmus, 1978, both edited by Richard L. DeMolen, and The Spirituality of Erasmus of Rotterdam by DeMolen, 1987; Erasmus: The Growth of a Mind by James D. Tracy, 1972; The Tragedy of Erasmus by Harry S. May, 1975; Desiderius Erasmus by J. Kelley Sowards, 1975; Erasmus on Language and Method in Theology, 1977, Christening Pagan Mysteries: Erasmus in Pursuit of Wisdom, 1981, and Rhetoric and Reform: Erasmus' Civil Dispute with Luther, 1983, all by Marjorie O'Rourke Boyle; Phoenix of His Age: Interpretations of Erasmus, c. 1550–1750, 1979, and Man on His Own: Interpretations of Erasmus c. 1750–1920, 1992, both by Bruce Mansfield; Six Essays on Erasmus, and a Translation of Erasmus' Letter to Carondelet, 1523 by John C. Olin, 1979, and A Biography of Erasmus, edited by Olin, 1988; Erasmus: The Right to Heresy by Stephan Zweig, 1979; Erasmus: Ecstasy and The Praise of Folly by M.A. Screech, 1980; Le Neveu de Rameau and The Praise of Folly: Literary Cognates by Apostolos P. Kouidos, 1981; Erasmus and His Times edited by G.S. Facer, 1982; The Praise of Folly: Structure and Irony by Zoja Pavlovskis, 1983; Erasmus and the Jews by Shimon Markish, 1986; Erasmus Grandescens: The Growth of a Humanist's Mind and Spirituality, 1988, and Erasmus of Europe: The Making of a Humanist, 1990, both by Richard J. Schoeck; Erasmus and His Catholic Critics by Erika Rummel, 1989; Humanist Play and Belief: The Seriocomic Art of Desiderius Erasmus by Walter M. Gordon, 1990; Erasmus: His Life, Works and Influence by Cornelius Augustijn, translated by J.C. Grayson, 1991; Erasmus by James McConica, 1991; Erasmus, Colet and More: The Early Tudor Humanists and Their Books by J.B.

Trapp, 1991; Erasmus, Lee and the Correction of the Volgate: The Shaking of the Foundations by Robert Coogan, 1992; Erasmus: A Critical Biography by Leon E. Halkin, translated by John Tonkin, 1992; Erasmus, Man of Letters: The Construction of Charisma in Print by Lisa Jardine, 1993; Rhetoric and Theology: The Hermeneutic of Erasmus by Manfred Hoffmann, 1994; Erasmus the Reformer by A.G. Dickens and Whitney R.D. Jones, 1994; Erasmus, Utopia, and the Jesuits: Essays on the Outreach of Humanism by John C. Olin, 1994; Erasmianism: Idea and Reality, edited by M.E.H.N. Mout, H. Smolinsky and J. Trapman, 1997; Conversing with God: Prayer in Erasmus' Pastoral Writings by Hilmar M. Pabel, 1997; Silenos: Erasmus in Elizabethan Literature, edited by Claudia Corti, 1998; Erasmus, the Anabaptists, and the Great Commission by Abraham Friesen, 1998; Erasmus and the Middle Ages: The Historical Consciousness of a Christian Humanist by István Pieter Bejczy, 2001.

* * *

Desiderius Erasmus of Rotterdam was the most famous man of letters of early 16th-century Europe, a figure who dominated the intellectual world of his time as clearly as Petrarch, Voltaire, or Goethe did theirs. He was acclaimed “the prince of humanists.” He was the leading biblical scholar of his time, and the editor of the first modern critical text of the Greek New Testament. He was an advocate of educational reform and an author of textbooks and educational tracts. He was a passionate advocate of peace. Additionally, and perhaps most important of all, he was one of the most tireless advocates of religious reform in the age of the Reformation. The titles of his books run into the hundreds, but his most famous works were his satirical books, especially the Encomium moriae (The Praise of Folly) and the Colloquia familiaria (The Colloquies).

The Praise of Folly, Erasmus' single best-known book, is a complex, multi-layered satire of the outworn classical form of the oration of praise, a parody of such worthy abstractions as Dame Philosophy or The Seven Liberal Arts—in this case the goddess Folly. Folly, arising before the court of mankind, intends to praise herself, since no one else will praise her. She proves with impeccable logic that all important actions and accomplishments are owing to her influence. She claims as hers all manner and conditions of men, from kings and nobles and wealthy merchants to calamity-ridden and tormented teachers of grammar, even husbands and wives, parents and children. But Folly also claims theologians with their pride of learning and endless hair-splitting definitions; monks with their empty formalism and self-serving piety; and the powerful, cynical rulers of the church, including the popes, the vicars of Christ so unlike him in every way. Then Folly claims that true Christians are the greatest of fools, that no people behave more foolishly, giving away their goods, overlooking wrongs and injuries, forgiving their enemies. And finally, Folly argues, Christ himself became something like a fool to cure the folly of mankind by the foolishness of the cross.

The serious religious-reforming purpose of The Praise of Folly is equally clearly expressed in Erasmus' other major satiric work, The Colloquies. This was probably the most frequently printed of Erasmus' books in his lifetime. It began as a series of brief and simple Latin conversational exercises for students which proved to be so popular that Erasmus prepared expanded editions through the 1520s and early 1530s, adding many new colloquies. Most are little satiric dialogues directed at the targets of his reforming efforts—corrupt monks and ignorant priests; the excesses of the veneration of saints and relics and pilgrimages; the senseless preference for the formalities of religion to the neglect of its spirit; and his hatred of war. Several of the colloquies—Charon, Naufragium (The Shipwreck), Peregrinatio Religionis ergo (The Pilgrimage for Religion's Sake), Abbatis et eruditae (The Abbot and the Learned Lady), Exorcismus, sive spectrum (Exorcism or the Spectre)—can be compared with the best satiric writing of the 16th century.

—J. Kelley Sowards

See the essays on The Colloquies and The Praise of Folly.

ESENIN, Sergei Aleksandrovich

Also known as Sergey Yesenin. Born: Konstantinovo, Riazan' Province, Russia, 3 October 1895. Education: Educated at the Konstantinovo primary school, 1904–09; church school, Spas-Klepiki, 1909–12; Shaniavskii University, 1913. Military Service: Military service, 1916; deserted, 1917. Family: Married 1) Anna Romanova Izriadnova in 1914 (divorced), one son; 2) Zinaida Nikolaevna Raikh in 1917 (separated 1918, divorced 1921), one daughter and one son; 3) the dancer Isadora Duncan in 1922 (divorced 1924); 4) Sof'ia Tolstaia in 1925 (separated); also had a son in 1925. Career: Made poetic debut in Petrograd, 1915; settled in Moscow, 1918; member of the Imaginist poetic movement, 1919; travelled to Turkestan and Tashkent, 1921; travelled through Belgium, Germany, France, Italy, and the United States, with Isadora Duncan, 1922–23; returned to Russia, 1923; suffered from declining mental health from c. 1922, with spells in sanatoriums, 1924–25; travelled in the Caucasus, 1924–25. Died: (suicide) 28 December 1925.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

- Sobranie stikhotvorenii* [Collected Poetry]. 4 vols., 1926–27.
Sobranie sochinenii [Collected Works], 5 vols., 1961–62, 1966–68.
Sobranie sochinenii [Collected Works], edited by Iu.L. Prokushev. 3 vols., 1970.
Sochineniia [Works], edited by P.S. Vykhodtsev. 1975.
Sobranie sochinenii [Collected Works], edited by V.G. Bazanov. 6 vols., 1977–80.
Sochineniia, 1910–1925 [Works, 1910–1925], edited by V.G. Bazanov. 1980.
Izbrannye sochineniia [Selected Works], edited by Aleksei Kozlovskii. 1983.
Sochineniia [Works], edited by Aleksei Kozlovskii. 1988.
Sobranie sochinenii [Collected Works], edited by Iu.L. Prokushev. 2 vols., 1990.
Stikhotvoreniiia; Poemy: Izbrannoie [Poetry; Narrative Verse; Selections], edited by D.A. Ovinnikov. 1992.
I Do Not Regret: Selected Poems, edited by Uolter Mei. 1997.

The Collected Poems of Yesenin, translated by Gregory Brengauz. 2000.

Verse

- Radunitsa*. 1916.
Preobrazhenie [Transfiguration]. 1918.
Sel'skii chasoslov [A Village Prayerbook]. 1918.
Inoniia. 1918.
Goluben' [Azure]. 1920.
Treriadnitsa. 1920.
Ispoved' khuligana [Confessions of a Hooligan]. 1920.
Pugachov. 1922.
Stikhi skandalisa [Scandalous Poems]. 1923.
Tovarishch; Inoniia [Comrade; Inoniia]. 1923.
Moskva kabatskaia [Moscow of the Taverns]. 1924.
Stikhi [Poems]. 1924.
Rus' sovetskaia [Soviet Russia]. 1925.
Berezovyi sitets [The Birch-Tree Cotton Print]. 1925.
Persidskie motivy [Persian Motifs]. 1925.
Stikhotvoreniiia [Poetry]. 1940.
Stikhotvoreniiia. Poemy [Poetry. Narrative Verse]. 1956.
Stikhotvoreniiia i poemy [Poetry and Narrative Verse]. 1957.
Zarianka. 1964.
Slovesnykh rek kipenie i shorokh [The Boiling and Rustle of the River of Words]. 1965.
Otchee slovo [The Father's Word]. 1968.
Sinii mai. Lirika [Dark Blue May. Lyric Poems]. 1973.
Confessions of a Hooligan: Fifty Poems, translated by Geoffrey Thurley. 1973.
Anna Snegina. 1974.
Riabinyi koster: Stikhotvoreniiia [The Rowan-Tree Bonfire: Poetry]. 1975.
Plesk golubogo livnia [The Splash of the Blue Downpour]. 1975.
Zlatoi posev [Golden Crops], edited by S. Koshechkin. 1976.
Neskazannoe, sinee, neznoe [Unspeakable, Dark Blue, Tender]. 1978.
Belykh iablon' dym [White Smoke of the Apple-Trees] 1978.
Selected Poems, translated by Jessie Davies. 1979.
Volnuias' serdtsem i stikhom. . . [Agitated in My Heart and Verse]. 1981.
Izbrannye stikhotvoreniiia i poemy/Selected Poetry (bilingual edition), translated by Peter Tempest. 1982.
"Ia bolee vsego vesnu liubliu. . ." [I More than Anything Love Spring]. 1984.
Snezhnye vetry [Snowy Winds]. 1985.
Serdtzu snitsia mai: Stikhi o liubvi [A Heart Dreaming of May: Love Poems]. 1985.
Sin', upavshaia v reku [Blue Colour, Falling into the River]. 1985.
Stikhotvoreniiia i proza [Poetry and Prose]. 1985.
Cheremukha [Bird-Cherry]. 1985.
Poemy i stikhotvoreniiia [Narrative Verse and Poetry]. 1986.
Zakruzhilas' listva zolotaia [The Twisted Gold Foliage]. 1988.
Strana negodiaev [A Country of Scoundrels]. 1991.

*

Critical Studies: Esenin: A Life by Gordon McVay, 1976; Sergey Esenin by Constantin V. Ponomareff, 1978; Sergei Yesenin: The Man, the Verse, the Age by Yuri Prokushev, 1979; Sergei Esenin: Poet of the Crossroads by Lynn Visson, 1980; Esenin: A Biography in Memoirs, Letters, and Documents edited and translated by Jessie Davies, 1982; Poetika Esenina by A.N. Zakharov, 1995.

* * *

Sergei Esenin led a short and turbulent life, which quickly passed into legend and myth. From his meteoric literary debut in Petrograd in 1915 until his suicide in a Leningrad hotel in 1925, Esenin assumed in rapid succession a number of literary “masks”—pastoral angel (1915–16), peasant prophet (1917–18), last poet of the village, tender hooligan (1919–21), tavern rake (1922–23), ex-hooligan (late 1923), would-be bard of the new Soviet Russia (mid-1924 until March 1925), and, finally, elegiac foreteller of his own imminent death (1925).

Although Esenin’s poetry is highly autobiographical and even “confessional,” the connection between the private man and his poetic persona is not entirely straightforward. By single-mindedly dedicating himself to the writing of poetry and the achievement of fame, Esenin blurred the boundaries between his “mask” and his “real face,” sacrificing the possibility of ordinary human happiness.

A peasant from Riazan’ province, Esenin enjoyed conspicuous success in the pre-revolutionary literary salons of Petrograd. His first volume of poetry, Radunitsa, reflected the decorative, traditional aspects of village life. Rus’, his ancient Russian motherland, was already the beloved heroine of his verse, a motherland which may be sad and impoverished, yet is also calm and imbued with a simple peasant religiousness. Jesus and the saints wandered as lowly pilgrims in the forests and along the paths of rural Rus’, and the poet knelt in prayer before the temple of Nature.

Esenin’s life was drastically affected by the February and October Revolutions of 1917. He welcomed these upheavals enthusiastically but vaguely in a series of longish “Scythian” poems, couched in abstruse religious and animal symbolism. These poems, which alternate between optimism and anxiety, prayerfulness and blasphemy, maintain a lofty cosmic tone far removed from the grim reality of earth-born Bolshevism.

By 1919, Esenin appeared a promising peasant poet, whose natural gifts displayed the influence of folk poetry, Kliuev, and Blok. Thenceforth, however, pursuing national fame, he sought creative independence within Moscow’s anarchic literary bohemia. The last six years of Esenin’s life witnessed the blossoming of his poetic talent and the disintegration of his inner peace.

As a founding member of the enterprisingly avant-garde “Imagist” group, Esenin achieved instant notoriety by emphasizing the unresolved dissonances in his personality and plight. Voicing his deep-rooted romantic attachment to old-fashioned, non-industrialized Rus’, he lamented the imminent encroachment of the “iron guest” (urban industrialization) in “Ia poslednii poet derevni” [I’m the Last Poet of the Village] (1920), and cursed the “vile guest” (the train which defeats the living horse) in “Sorokoust” (1920). In Ispoved’ khuligana [The Confessions of a Hooligan], his lyrical hero is coarse and tender, desperate and kind; full of provocative vulgarity, and yet also “gently sick with childhood recollections.”

After his marriage to Isadora Duncan in 1922, and an ill-starred 15-month tour of western Europe and the United States, Esenin composed the controversial cycle Moskva kabatskaia [Moscow of the Taverns]. The setting is the tavern, the inhabitants are prostitutes and bandits, syphilitic accordionists, down-and-outs seeking to drown their misery in alcohol and dreams. Written in a universally understandable, non-Imagistic language, these poems immediately appealed to thousands of Russians who saw in them a reflection of their own anguish.

The poetry of Esenin’s last two years, after his return to Russia in 1923, combines a new-found “Pushkinian” simplicity of style with a mood of ever-deepening tragic isolation. In the cycle “Liubov’ khuligana” [A Hooligan’s Love], his lyrical hero sought to break with hooliganism, passing into autumnal resignation. A profoundly elegiac mood permeates the outstanding lyrics of 1924, “My teper’ ukhodim ponemnogu” [We Are Now Gradually Departing] and “Otgovorila roshcha zolotaia” [The Golden Grove Has Ceased to Speak].

Esenin had never been openly counter-revolutionary and, after his disillusioning travels in the west, he strove at times to compose pro-Soviet verse, praising Lenin and endeavouring to accept the changed face of Russia. Such attempts often proved poetically lifeless, however, with many critics doubting his sincerity and aptness for such topics.

Towards the end of 1925 Esenin’s poetry entered its most tragic phase. Isolated, alcoholic, vulnerable, and despairing, he created a sequence of short poems set in a winter landscape. Instead of autumnal fading, his mood was now echoed by wintry iciness, evoking memories of lost youth and lost happiness. On 12–13 November 1925 he wrote down the only extant version of his poem “Chernyi chelovek” [The Black Man], revealing his desperate struggle against alcoholic hallucinations and a tormented conscience. On 27 December Esenin wrote his last poem, “Do svidan’ia, drug moi, do svidan’ia” [Goodbye, My Friend, Goodbye], in his own blood, and the next day he was found hanging in a Leningrad hotel room.

As a literary phenomenon, Esenin has been compared with Robert Burns and Arthur Rimbaud, with Dylan Thomas and, above all, François Villon; yet such is his complexity that he has also been characterized as the “Don Quixote of the village and the birch-tree” (V. Shershenevich, in Trud, Klinty, 19 January 1926), and even likened to St. Francis of Assisi. He has been called a poet of death, and a poet of eternal youth.

Despite a prolonged period of disfavour during the Stalin years, Esenin remains the most popular and most widely read Russian poet of the 20th century. He is exceptionally “Russian,” a temperamental peasant embodying tragic pathos and the forlorn dream of a rural idyll. Scholars in the West (mainly non-Russian urban intellectuals) often disparage the simplicity, emotionality and melodiousness of Esenin’s verse, preferring the sophisticated subtlety of Pasternak, Mandel’shtam, Akhmatova, and Tsvetaeva. It is perhaps time to challenge this elitist judgement. A Russian critic perceptively observed during Esenin’s lifetime (Andrei Shipov [Ivan Rozanov], in Narodnyi uchitel’, 2, 1925):

In certain respects Esenin should without doubt seem inferior to some of his contemporaries: he lacks the sweep and crude strength of Maiakovskii, the cultural saturation of Mandel’shtam, or the dazzling lyrical intensity of Boris Pasternak, but he has a quality which is perhaps the most valuable of all for a lyric poet—the ability to reach the reader’s heart and even—a thing to which we are now especially unaccustomed—the ability at times to move and touch us. . . . Mandel’shtam and Pasternak are too intellectual as poets, in the last resort they are poets for the few . . . Esenin, on the other hand, can be understood by everyone from the lowly to the grand . . .

—Gordon McVay

“The Problem Facing the Writer Today” translated by Judith Sollosy, in Partisan Review. 1996.

*

ESTERHÁZY, (Count) Péter

Pseudonym: Lili Csokonai. Born: Budapest, Hungary, 1 April 1950. Education: Studied mathematics at Eötvös Loránd University, Budapest, 1969–74. Military Service: Served in the army. Family: Married Gitti Reen in 1973; four children. Career: Began publishing in literary journals in the 1970s; works as an independent writer. Lives in Budapest, Hungary. Awards: Research fellow, Andrew W. Mellon Foundation; Kossuth prize (Hungary), 1996; Berliner Wissenschaftskolleg, 1996–97; Österreichischen Staatspreis for European Literature, Vienna, 1999; Hungarian Literary award, 2001; Capo Circeo, Rome, 2001; Herder prize, Vienna, 2002. Member: Society of Digital Immortals (Hungary).

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Bevezetés a szépirodalomba (novels). 1986.
A kitömött hatyú (essays). 1988.

Fiction

Fancsikó és Pinta. 1976.
Pápai vizeken ne kalozkodj. 1977.
Termelési regény. 1979.
Függő. 1981.
Ki szavatol a lady biztonságáért?. 1982.
Ágnes. 1982.
Fuhasok. 1983; as The Transporters, translated by Ferenc Takacs, in A Hungarian Quartet. 1991.
Kis magyar pornográfia. 1983; as A Little Hungarian Pornography, translated by Judith Sollosy, 1995.
A szív segédigéi. 1985; as Helping Verbs of the Heart, translated by Michael Henry Heim, 1991.
Tizenhét hatyúk. 1986.
Hrabal könyve. 1990; as The Book of Hrabal, translated by Judith Sollosy, 1993.
Hahn-Hahn grofno pillantása. 1991; as The Glimpse of Countess Hahn-Hahn (Down the Danube), translated by Richard Aczel, 1994.
Búcsúszimfónia. 1994.
Egő nő. 1995; as She Loves Me, translated by Judith Sollosy, 1997.
Harmonia Caelestis. 2000.

Other

“Investigating the Bath Tub” in Index on Censorship. 1988.
“On Laziness” translated by Zsuzsanna Ozváth and Martha Satz, in Partisan Review. 1989.
“God’s Hat” translated by Michael Henry Heim, in Partisan Review. 1990.
“Want to See Golden Budapest?” in Cross Currents. 1990.

Critical Studies: “Mekhanizm literary: Pushkin i Esterkhazi” by E. Boitar, translated by Nadezhda Nikulina, in Studia Slavica Academiae Scientiarum Hungaricae, vol. 28, nos. 1–4, 1982; “Peter Esterhazy” by Ferenc Takacs, in The Hungarian P.E.N./Le P.E.N. Hongrois, vol. 26, 1985; “Torment and Sacrifice” by Miklos Gyorffy, in New Hungarian Quarterly, vol. 26, no. 97, 1985; “(Selbstzensur) und (Textverderben): Konflikte und Losungen in den neuesten Schriften von Peter Esterhazy” by Tiborc Fazekas, in Festschrift für Istvan Futaky, edited by Wolfgang Veenker and Tibor Keszyus, 1986; “Irasok” by Gyorgy Poszler, in Kortars: Irodalmi Es Kritikai Folyoirat, vol. 32, no. 7, 1988; “Delicate Balance: Coherence and Mutual Knowledge in a Short Story” by Istvan Siklaci, in Poetics, vol. 17, nos. 4–5, 1988; “Textualität und Dialogizität: Versuch der Wesensbestimmung der ‘Postmoderne’ bei P. Esterhazy” by Laszlo Onodi, in Neohelicon, vol. 16, no. 1, 1989; “The Concealed Eye/The Elusive ‘I’: An Update on Peter Esterhazy” by Marianna D. Birnbaum, in Cross Currents, vol. 11, 1992; “Peter Nadas, Peter Esterhazy und die deutsche Literatur im Zeitalter der Moderne und Postmoderne” by Arpad Bernath, in Neohelicon, vol. 20, no. 1, 1993; “Peter Esterhazys ‘Hilfsverben des Herzens’ und Peter Handkes ‘Wunschloses Unglück’: Ein komparatistischer Versuch” by Maria Kajtar, in Die Zeit und die Schrift: Österreichische Literatur nach 1945, edited by Karlheinz Auckenthaler, 1993; “Postmodernism in Hungary: The Example of Peter Esterhazy against the Background of Analysing John Barth’s Later Fiction” by Judit Friedrich, in Anachronist, 1996; “Introducing Péter Esterházy” in Hungarian Rhapsodies by Richard Teleky, 1997; “Gender Benders: Naughtiness in the post-Communist World” by John Updike, in The New Yorker, 25 May 1998; “Der religiöse Horizont in den Romanen Peter Esterhazys” by Istvan Dobos, translated by Christina Kunze, in Epoche-Text-Modalität: Diskurs der Moderne in der ungarischen Literaturwissenschaft, edited by Erno Kulcsar-Szabo and Mihaly Szegedy-Maszak, 1999; “Configurations of Postcoloniality and National Identity: In-between Peripherality and Narratives of Change” by Steven Totosy de Zepetnek, in The Comparatist, vol. 23, 1999.

* * *

Péter Esterházy is one of the most popular and successful writers in Hungary. Born a count, Esterházy is the scion of one of the oldest noble Hungarian families. His relatives were patrons of Haydn and Liszt, while the Duke Pál Esterházy (who died in 1713) is remembered for his sacred cantatas, collected as Harmonia Caelestis. Recently, Péter Esterházy has himself used the title of his ancestor’s musical collection for a long narrative history of his family. Harmonia Caelestis, published in 2000, has been a bestseller in Hungary and in German translation as well.

Although Esterházy has had great critical and commercial success in his native Hungary and is well-known throughout Europe, Anglophone critics’ response to Esterházy’s works has been mixed. Only six of his novels have been translated into English, due perhaps in equal parts to the difficulty of Hungarian and of Esterházy’s writing. Although he calls them “novels,” Esterházy does not write novels in the 19th century sense. He eschews linear plots and sustained character development, preferring instead shifting, discontinuous scenes and anonymous narrators. In addition, until 1989 Hungary was part of the USSR, and that cultural and political reality forms the background (and occasionally the foreground) of Esterházy's works. Termelési regény [Production Novel], a satire of socialist production, and Ki szavatol a lady biztonságáért? [Who Does Guarantee the Lady's Security?], which is about transvestites, are in part a reaction against the Socialist Realism imposed by the Soviets. As a result, very little in Esterházy's writing could be termed realism, socialist or not.

In his defiance of the conventions of the traditional novel, Esterházy's works tend to be short (Termelési regény is about 50 pages) and combine various genres (historical drama, romance, psychological realism, verse, and travelogue) in an eclectic rhapsody. Yet the word "postmodern," often applied to his novels, misses the point. Esterházy has said that Hungary never experienced modernism; therefore, his works may be termed "pre-modern," while true Hungarian modernism remains in the future. That being said, however, Esterházy's novels nonetheless share elements of postmodernism, including fractured narratives and relentless intertextuality. The author quotes from sources as diverse as contemporary journalism, American blues standards, German philosophy, and his favorite authors. In Kis magyar pornográfia (A Little Hungarian Pornography), Esterházy warns the reader, "if you find an especially clever sentence in the book, the chances are better than even that it is a quote. If it is clever but you don't know what it means, it is from Wittgenstein." The narrator further explains that introducing a "foreign text (body)" creates "tension" between the various voices and points of view. Historical figures may also become characters to engage in impossible and anachronistic conversations; in Hrabal könyve (The Book of Hrabal), Charlie Parker teaches God (who has some attributes very similar to Esterházy's) to play the saxophone.

In A szív segédigéi (Helping Verbs of the Heart), the narrator mourns the death of his mother. To underscore the universal nature of grief, Esterházy refers to the family members not by names, but by their relationship to the narrator: Mother, Father, Sister, Brother. The book consists of two parts: the first is the son's narrative, while in the second half the mother discusses her life and her family. One critic interpreted the novel's final sentence, "Some day I'll write about all this in more detail," as the author's admission of failing to convey the profundity of his subject; others contend that Esterházy has already told all he could possibly say about death, leaving only the inexpressible for the readers to imagine for themselves.

European history is another topic for Esterházy's invention. His particular relationship to history goes against the conventions of dialectical Marxism: Esterházy's history is largely plotless and non-chronological—even anti-chronological. The incompleteness of the historical record prevents a deeper understanding of those events and their interrelatedness. Esterházy recognizes this overvaluation of the importance and sanctity of fact, and presents events in his narratives outside their chronology and stripped of most of their specifying—and thus limiting—facts and dates. Anna, the heroine of The Book of Hrabal, realizes history's deceptiveness when she confesses that she never really knew her mother. Her mother's generation, born before World War II and the Communist takeover, had witnessed terrible destruction. When Anna was still a teenager, her mother criticized her boldness; only years later does Anna begin to understand her mother's quiet will to survive. Boldness is not necessarily courage, and timidity is not necessarily cowardice. With this in mind, Anna redeems Bohumil Hrabal, the great Czech writer castigated for his allegiance to the Soviet Party's 1975 congress. History is thus shown to obscure as much as it reveals.

By the same token, for readers who pick up Hahn-Hahn grofnó pillantása (The Glance of the Countess Hahn-Hahn) expecting a history lesson on East Central Europe or the political significance of the Danube, the author's coyness with dates and facts can be frustrating. Yet what Esterházy tries to achieve with his reordering of events is history as it is experienced subjectively. Even the map in the front of the book flouts convention; cities and rivers are marked, but although the names of countries appear on the map, their political boundaries are conspicuously absent. In other words, though geographic variations exist and people have come to identify with their regions, political borders are neither natural nor inevitable. Questioning the assumptions of unchallenged ethnic or national identity, the narrator asks, "What does it mean to be Austrian?" His narrator records changes in his state of mind as he travels from the source of the Danube in the Black Forest to its mouth at the Black Sea. In Ulm, Germany, he feels one way, in Vienna, Austria, another; in his native Hungary, he thinks of himself differently, whereas in Romania the narrator modifies his behavior completely. Esterházy would likely agree with Sander Gilman's statement that identity is not who you are, but where you are.

In Egő nő (She Loves Me), Esterházy challenges ideas of romance and character development. The book consists of 97 chapters, some no more than a few sentences in length. Each chapter begins with some variant of "There's this woman, she loves me," or "she hates me," although not all of the love objects are women. Esterházy explores the variety of relationships covered by the umbrella term "love," a love that is sometimes indistinguishable from hate, and hatred that is occasionally indistinguishable from love. Ultimately the novel is not about the object of love, but love itself.

Péter Esterházy continues to be prominent in Hungarian society. One of Esterházy's novels is the basis for the 1996 Hungarian film by Andras Solyom, Erzekes Iskolaja (School of Sensitivity). In 2001 Esterházy supported France's involvement in the fate of Roma refugees and he has been commended for his promotion of inter-ethnic relations in Europe.

—Natalie Smith

EURIPIDES

Born: 480 or 485 bc. Family: Married to Melito; three sons. Career: Held a local priesthood at Phlya; not prominent politically, but did go on an embassy to Syracuse; also went to the court of Archelaus in Macedon, c. 408 bc; first competed in the City Dionysia in 455 bc; won four prizes during his lifetime, and one posthumously; of the 92 plays he is said to have written, 80 titles are known, and 19 are extant. Died: Before February/March 406 bc.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

[Plays], edited by Gilbert Murray, 3 vols., 1902–13; also edited by James Diggle, 3 vols., 1982–94; as The Tragedies, translated by Robert Potter. 2 vols., 1781–83; as The Nineteen Tragedies, translated by Michael Woodhull, 4 vols., 1782; also translated by T.A. Buckley, 2 vols., 1850; W.B. Donne, 1872; Arthur S. Way, 3 vols., 1894–98, revised edition [Loeb Edition], 4 vols., 1912; Percy Bysshe Shelley and others, 2 vols., 1906; Moses Hadas and J.M. McLean, 1936; edited by David Grene and Richmond Lattimore, various translators, in Complete Greek Tragedies, 5 vols., 1955–59; translated (prose) by Edward P. Coleridge, 2 vols., 1891; as Euripides, edited and translated by David Kovacs, 1994; as After the Trojan War: Women of Troy, Hecuba, Helen: Three Plays, translated and introduced by Kenneth McLeish, 1995; as Alcestis and Other Plays, translated by John Davie, 1996; as Plays: Three, introduced by J. Michael Walton and Kenneth McLeish, 1997; as Plays: Four, introduced by J. Michael Walton and Kenneth McLeish, 1997; as Plays: Five, introduced by J. Michael Walton and Kenneth McLeish, 1997; as Plays: Six, introduced by J. Michael Walton, Frederic Raphael and Kenneth McLeish, 1997; as Medea; Hippolytus; Electra; Helen, translated with notes by James Morwood, 1997; as Euripides, edited by David R. Slavitt and Palmer Bovie, 1998; as Electra and Other Plays, translated by John Davie, 1998; as Iphigenia Among the Taurians; Bacchae; Iphigenia at Aulis; Rhesus, translated by James Morwood, 1999; as Women on the Edge: Four Plays, translated and edited by Ruby Blondell, 1999; as Hecuba; The Trojan Women; Andromache, translated by James Morwood, 2000; as Orestes and Other Plays, translated by Robin Waterfield, 2001.

Plays

Alcestis (produced 438 BC). Edited by W.S. Hadley, 1896; also edited by E.H. Blakeney, 1899, revised edition, 1933, Amy Marjorie Dale, 1954, revised edition, 1978, and Antonio Garzya, 1980; edited and translated (with commentary) by Desmond J. Conacher, 1988; as Alcestis, translated by Robert Browning, 1871; also translated by H. Kynaston, 1906; Gilbert Murray, 1915; Richard Aldington, 1930; Dudley Fitts and Robert Fitzgerald, 1933; D.W. Lucas, 1951; Philip Vellacott, in Three Plays, 1953, revised edition, 1974; Richmond Lattimore, in Complete Greek Tragedies, 1955; Alistair Elliot, 1965; C.R. Beye, 1973; William Arrowsmith, 1974; Ted Hughes, 1999.

Medea (produced 431 BC). Edited by A.W. Verrall, 1881; also edited by Clinton E.S. Headlam, 1897, Denys L. Page, 1938, and Alan F. Elliott, 1969; as Medea, translated by Gilbert Murray, 1910; also translated by John Jay Chapman, in Two Greek Plays, 1928; Countee Cullen, 1935; R.C. Trevelyan, 1939; Rex Warner, 1944, in Complete Greek Tragedies, 1955, and in Three Great Plays, 1958; Frederick Prokosch, in Greek Plays in Modern Translation, 1947; D.W. Lucas, 1950; Moses Hadas and John McLean, in Ten Plays, 1960; Philip Vellacott, in Medea and Other Plays, 1963; Peter D. Arnott, in Three Greek Plays, 1964; Michael Townsend, 1966; Kenneth McLeish, 1970; Jeremy Brooks, in Plays One, 1988; D. Egan, 1991; Nicholas Rudall, 2000.

Heracleidae (produced c. 430–28 BC). Edited by Antonio Garzya, 1972; also edited by John Wilkins, 1993; as Children of Heracles, translated by Ralph Gladstone, in Complete Greek Tragedies, 1955; also translated by Philip Vellacott, in Orestes and Other Plays, 1972; Henry Taylor and Robert A. Brooks, 1981; John Wilkins, 1993.

Hippolytus (produced 428 BC). Edited by J.P. Mahaffy and J.B. Bury, 1881; also edited by W.S. Hadley, 1889, W.S. Barrett, 1964, and John Ferguson, 1984; as Hippolytus, translated by Gilbert Murray, 1900; also translated by David Grene, in Three Greek Tragedies, 1942, and in Complete Greek Tragedies, 1955; Rex Warner, 1949, and in Three Great Plays, 1958; Philip Vellacott, in Three Plays, 1953, revised edition, 1974; E.P. Coleridge, in Three Great Greek Plays, 1960; Donald Sutherland, in Hippolytus in Drama and Myth, 1960; Kenneth Cavander, 1962; Robert Bragg, 1974; Gilbert and Sarah Lawall, 1986; Michael R. Halleran, 1995.

Andromache (produced c. 426–25 BC). Edited by Philip Theodore Stevens, 1971; also edited by Antonio Garzya, 1978; as Andromache, translated by Hugh Meredith, in Four Dramas, 1937; also translated by L.R. Lind, 1957; John Frederick Nims, in Complete Greek Tragedies, 1958; Philip Vellacott, in Orestes and Other Plays, 1972; Michael Lloyd, 1994; Susan Stewart and Wesley D. Smith, 2001.

Hecuba (produced c. 424 BC). Edited by Michael Tierney, 1946; also edited by Stephen G. Daitz, 1973, and C. Collard, 1991; as Hecuba, translated by Hugh Meredith, in Four Dramas, 1937; also translated by William Arrowsmith, in Complete Greek Tragedies, 1958; Peter D. Arnott, 1969; Janet Lembke and Kenneth J. Reckford, 1991; as Hecabe, translated by Philip Vellacott, in Medea and Other Plays, 1963; as Eupriides Hekabe: Freely Translated from the Greek by Robert Emmet Meagher, 1995.

Supplices (produced c. 423–22 BC). Edited by Christopher Collard, 2 vols., 1975; as The Suppliants, translated by L.R. Lind, 1957; as The Suppliant Women, translated by Frank Jones, in Complete Greek Tragedies, 1958; also translated by Philip Vellacott, in Orestes and Other Plays, 1972; as Suppliant Women, translated by Rosanna Warren and Stephen Scully, 1995.

Electra (produced c. 422–16 BC). Edited by C.H. Keene, 1893; also edited by J.D. Denniston, 1939; edited and translated by Arthur S. Way, 1919; Martin J. Cropp, 1988; as Electra, translated by Gilbert Murray, 1905; also translated by Moses Hadas, 1950; D.W. Lucas, 1951; Emily Townsend Vermeule, in Complete Greek Tragedies, 1959; Philip Vellacott, in Medea and Other Plays, 1963; David Thompson, 1964; Janet Lembke and Kenneth J. Reckford, 1994.

Ion (produced c. 421–13 BC). Edited by A.S. Owen, 1939; also edited by Werner Biehl, 1979, and K.H. Lee, 1992; as Ion, translated by Ronald Frederick Willetts, in Complete Greek Tragedies, 1958; also translated by HD, 1937; D.W. Lucas, 1950; Philip Vellacott, in The Bacchae and Other Plays, 1954; A.P. Burnett, 1970; David Lan, 1994; Peter Burian, 1996.

Heracles (produced c. 417–15 BC). Edited by Godfrey W. Bond, 1981; as Heracles, translated by Robert Browning, in Aristophanes' Apology, 1875; also translated by Hugh Meredith, in Four Dramas, 1937; William Arrowsmith, in Complete Greek Tragedies, 1956; Philip Vellacott, in Medea and Other Plays, 1963; Michael R. Halleran, 1988; Shirley A. Barlow, 1996; Tom Sleight, 2001; as The Madness of Heracles, translated by Peter D. Arnott, 1969.

Troades (produced 415 BC). Edited by F.A. Paley, 1881; also edited by Robert Yelverton Tyrrell, 1882, revised edition, 1897, Werner Biehl, 1970, and K.H. Lee, 1976; as The Trojan Women, translated by Gilbert Murray, 1905; also translated by Edith Hamilton, in Three Greek Plays, 1937; Richmond Lattimore, in Greek Plays in Modern Translation, 1944, and in Complete Greek Tragedies, 1958; Nell Curry, 1946; Shirley A. Barlow, 1986; as The Women

- of Troy*, translated by Philip Vellacott, in The Bacchae and Other Plays, 1954; also translated by Don Taylor, in The War Plays, 1990; translated by Brendan Kennelly, 1993; Nicholas Rudall, 1999.
- Iphigenia Taurica* (produced c. 414–13 BC). Edited by E.B. England, 1926; also edited by C.B. Watts, 1930, Maurice Platnauer, 1938, and David Sansone, 1981; as Iphigenia in Tauris, translated by Gilbert Murray, 1910; also translated by Witter Bynner, 1915, and in Complete Greek Tragedies, 1956; Philip Vellacott, in Three Plays, 1953, revised edition, 1974; Richmond Lattimore, 1974; as Iphigenia in Taurica [Loeb Edition], translated by Arthur S. Way, 1912; as Iphigenia Among the Taurians, translated by Nicholas Rudall, 1997; M.J. Cropp, 2000.
- Helena* (produced 412 BC). Edited by A.Y. Campbell, 1950; also edited by Amy Marjorie Dale, 1967, and Richard Kannicht, 1969; as Helen, translated by J.T. Sheppard, 1925; also translated by Rex Warner, 1951, and in Three Great Plays, 1958; Philip Vellacott, in The Bacchae and Other Plays, 1954; Richmond Lattimore, in Complete Greek Tragedies, 1956; Neil Curry, 1981; James Michie and Colin Leach, 1981; R.E. Meagher, 1986; Don Taylor, in The War Plays, 1990.
- Phoenissae* (produced c. 412–08 BC). Edited by Donald J. Mastronarde (with commentary), 1994; as The Phoenician Women, translated by Elizabeth Wychoff, in Complete Greek Tragedies, 1959; also translated by Philip Vellacott, in Orestes and Other Plays, 1972; Peter Burian and Brian Swann, 1981; Elizabeth M. Craik, 1988; David Thompson, in Plays One, 1988.
- Orestes* (produced 408 BC). Edited by C.W. Willink, 1986; edited and translated by M.L. West, 1987; as Orestes, translated by Hugh Meredith, in Four Dramas, 1937; also translated by William Arrowsmith, in Complete Greek Tragedies, 1958; Philip Vellacott, in Orestes and Other Plays, 1972; John Peck and Frank Nisetich, 1995.
- Bacchae* (produced c. 405 BC). Edited by J.E. Sandys, 1880; also edited by E.R. Dodds, 1960, and E. Christian Kopff, 1982; as The Bacchae, translated by Henry Hart Milman, 1865; also translated by Margaret Kinmont Tennant, 1926; D.W. Lucas, 1930; Philip Vellacott, in The Bacchae and Other Plays, 1954; Henry Birkhead, 1957; William Arrowsmith, in Complete Greek Tragedies, 1959; G.S. Kirk, 1970; Neil Curry, 1981; M. Cacoyannis, 1983; J. Michael Walton, in Plays One, 1988; John Buller, 1992; Robert Emmet Meagher, 1995; Richard Seaford, 1996; Nicholas Rudall, 1996; Paul Woodruff, 1998; Herbert Golder, 2001; Reginald Gibbons, 2001.
- Iphigenia Aulidensis*, completed by another writer (produced c. 405 BC). Edited by E.S. Headlam, 1939; as Iphigenia in Aulis, translated by F.M. Stawell, 1929; Charles R. Walker, in Complete Greek Tragedies, 1958; Philip Vellacott, in Orestes and Other Plays, 1972; Kenneth Cavander, 1973; W.S. Merwin and George E. Dimock, Jr., 1978; as Iphigenia at Aulis, translated by Don Taylor, in The War Plays, 1990; Nicholas Rudall, 1997.
- Cyclops*, edited by Jacqueline Duchemin. 1945; also edited by R.G. Ussher, 1978, and Richard Seaford, 1984; as Cyclops, translated by J.T. Sheppard, 1923; also translated by William Arrowsmith, in Complete Greek Tragedies, 1956; Roger Lancelyn Green, in Two Satyr Plays, 1957; Peter D. Arnott, in Three Greek Plays, 1964; Heather McHugh, 2001.
- Hypsipyle* (fragmentary play), edited by G.W. Bond. 1963; also edited by W.E.H. Cockle, 1987.
- Phaethon* (fragmentary play), edited by James Diggle. 1970.
- Rhesus* (probably not by Euripides), edited by James Diggle, in Fabulae, vol. 3. 1994; as Rhesus, translated by Richmond Lattimore, in Complete Greek Tragedies, 1958; also translated by Richard Emil Braun, 1978.
- Four Dramas* (includes Andromache; Hecuba; Heracles; Orestes), translated by Hugh Meredith. 1937.
- Three Plays* (includes Hippolytus; Iphigenia in Taurica; Alcestis), translated by Philip Vellacott. 1953; revised edition, 1974.
- The Bacchae and Other Plays* (includes Ion; The Women of Troy; Helen), translated by Philip Vellacott. 1954.
- Three Great Plays* (includes Helen; Hippolytus; Medea), translated by Rex Warner. 1958.
- Ten Plays*, translated by Moses Hadas and John McLean. 1960.
- Medea and Other Plays* (includes Medea; Hecabe; Electra; Heracles), translated by Philip Vellacott. 1963.
- Orestes and Other Plays* (includes The Children of Heracles; Andromache; The Suppliant Women; The Phoenician Women; Orestes; Iphigenia in Aulis), translated by Philip Vellacott. 1972.
- Plays One* (includes Medea; The Phoenician Women; Bacchae), translated by Jeremy Brooks, David Thompson, and J. Michael Walton. 1988.
- The War Plays: Iphigenia at Aulis; The Women of Troy; Helen*, translated by Don Taylor. 1990.
- Plays Two* (includes Hecuba; The Women of Troy; Iphigenia at Aulis; Cyclops), translated by Don Taylor, Peter D. Arnott, and J. Michael Walton. 1991.

*

Critical Studies: Chronology of the Extant Plays of Euripides by Grace Harriet Macurdy, 1911; Euripides and His Age by Gilbert Murray, 1913, revised edition, 1946; Euripides and His Influence by F.L. Lucas, 1924; The Drama of Euripides by G.M.A. Grube, 1941; Essays on Euripidean Drama by Gilbert Norwood, 1954; The Political Plays of Euripides, 1955, revised edition, 1963, and An Inquiry into the Transmission of the Plays of Euripides, 1966, both by Gunther Zuntz; Euripides by W.N. Bates, 1961; Notes on Euripides' Medea and Electra by Robert J. Milch, 1965; Euripides and the Judgement of Paris by T.C.W. Stinton, 1965; Euripidean Drama: Myth, Theme, and Structure by Desmond J. Conacher, 1967; The Tragedies of Euripides by T.B.L. Webster, 1967; Euripides: A Collection of Critical Essays edited by Erich Segal, 1968; The Imagery of Euripides: A Study in the Dramatic Use of Pictorial Language by Shirley A. Barlow, 1970; Catastrophe Survived: Euripides' Plays of Mixed Reversal by Anne P. Burnett, 1971; The New Oxyrhynchus Papyrus: Hypothesis of Euripides' "Alexandros" by R.A. Coles, 1974; Euripides and the Full Circle of Myth by Cedric H. Whitman, 1974; Ironic Drama: A Study of Euripides: Method and Meaning by Philip Vellacott, 1975; Colloquial Expressions in Euripides by P.T. Stevens, 1976; "God, or not God, or Between the Two?" Euripides' Helen by George E. Dimock, 1977; Existentialism and Euripides: Sickness, Tragedy and Divinity in The Medea, The Hippolytus and The Bacchae by William Sale, 1977; On the Concept of Slavery in Euripides by Katerina Syodinou, 1977; Terms for Happiness in Euripides by Marianne McDonald, 1978; The Violence of Pity in Euripides' Medea by Pietro Pucci, 1980; The Trojan Trilogy of Euripides by Ruth Scodel, 1980; Euripides by Christopher Collard, 1981; Studies on the Text of Euripides: Supplices, Electra, Heracles, Troades, Iphigenia in Tauris, Ion, 1981, The Textual Tradition of Euripides' Orestes, 1990, and Euripides: Collected Essays, 1994, all by James Diggle; The Textual Tradition of Euripides' Phoinissai by Donald J. Mastronarde, 1982; Dionysiac Poetics and Euripides' Bacchae by Charles Segal, 1982; Euripides' Bacchae: The Play and Its Audience by Hans Oranje, 1984; New Directions in Euripidean Criticism: A Collection of Essays edited by Peter Burian, 1985; Ritual Irony: Poetry and Sacrifice in Euripides by Helene P. Foley, 1985; Stagecraft in Euripides by Michael R. Halleran, 1985; Euripides' Medea and Electra: A Companion to the Penguin Translation of Philip Vellacott by John Ferguson, 1987; The Heroic Muse: Studies in the Hippolytus and the Hecuba of Euripides by David Kovacs, 1987; Euripides and the Tragic Tradition by Ann Norris Michelini, 1987; Aspects of Human Sacrifice in the Tragedies of Euripides by E.A.M.E. O'Connor-Visser, 1987; Two Lost Plays of Euripides by Dana F. Sutton, 1987; The God of Ecstasy: Sex-Roles and the Madness of Dionysos by Arthur Evans, 1988; Time Holds the Mirror: A Study of Knowledge in Euripides' Hippolytus by C.A.E. Luschnig, 1988; A New Creed: Fundamental Religious Beliefs in the Athenian Polis and Euripidean Drama by Harvey Yunis, 1988; Euripides' Medea: The Incarnation of Disorder by Emily A. McDermott, 1989; The Noose of Words: Readings of Desire, Violence and Language in Euripides' Hippolytus by Barbara E. Goff, 1990; Euripides, Women and Sexuality by Anton Powell, 1990; Euripides and the Instruction of the Athenians by Justina Gregory, 1991; Ambiguity and Self-Deception: The Apollo and Artemis Plays of Euripides by Karelisa V. Hartigan, 1991; Narrative in Drama: The Art of the Euripidean Messenger-Speech by I.J.F. de Jong, 1991; The Agon in Euripides by Michael Lloyd, 1992; Anxiety Veiled: Euripides and the Traffic in Women by Nancy Sorokin Rabinowitz, 1994; Euripidean Polemic: The Trojan Women and the Function of Tragedy by N.T. Croally, 1994; Euripidea: Collected Essays by James Diggle, 1994; Euripidea by David Kovacs, 1994; Wild Justice: A Study of Euripides' Hecuba by Judith Mossman, 1995; The City of Dionysos: A Study of Euripides' Bakchai by Vladis Leinieks, 1996; Tragedy's End: Closure and Innovation in Euripidean Drama by Francis M. Dunn, 1996; Theseus, Tragedy, and the Athenian Empire by Sophie Mills, 1997; Euripides and Alcestis: Speculations, Simulations, and Stories of Love in the Athenian Culture by Kiki Gounaridou, 1998; Euripides and the Sophists: Some Dramatic Treatments of Philosophical Ideas by Desmond J. Conacher, 1998; Eurykleia and Her Successors: Female Figures of Authority in Greek Poetics by Helen Pournara Karydas, 1998; Intimate Commerce: Exchange, Gender, and Subjectivity in Greek Tragedy by Victoria Wohl, 1998; Nothing Is As it Seems: The Tragedy of the Implicit in Euripides' Hippolytus by Hanna M. Roisman, 1999; The Andromache and Euripidean Tragedy by William Allen, 2000; Euripides' Use of Psychological Terminology by Shirley Darcus Sullivan, 2000.

* * *

Euripides was the youngest of the famous tragedians of 5th-century Athens; he is regarded by some as responsible for a breakdown in the lofty spirit of Greek tragedy from which it never recovered; by others as introducing a new and enduring humanism, a sense of the pathos of the human condition, which expressed more powerfully than that of his predecessors the tragic realities of life.

To some degree, perhaps, the impression of contrast which the Euripidean corpus of plays provides with that of Aeschylus and Sophocles may be due to the fact that we possess a greater number of his plays (18 or 19 as compared with seven of each of the other two) and so a wider variety of Euripidean themes. However, this explanation of "the difference" is, at best, a very partial one, for all of Euripides' plays betray, to a greater or lesser degree, a distinctly new tragic style and approach to traditional myth.

These "new directions" of Euripidean tragedy are in part traceable to two major influences, those of the sophistic movement and of the Peloponnesian War, both of which appear to have affected Euripides more than they did his elder contemporary Sophocles. The sophists (the first professional teachers in Greece) imbued Euripides with their rationalistic way of looking at traditional beliefs and values and strongly influenced his dramatic style by the rhetorical emphasis of their teaching. In a very different way, Euripides' tragic outlook was also affected by certain dire events of the Peloponnesian War and their effects on Athenian morale and policy.

As implied above, Euripides was something of an iconoclast, a "reducer" of the ancient mythological tradition on which the plot material of Greek tragedy was, by convention, based. Thus he tended to reinterpret and reformulate the tales of arbitrary, often vengeful anthropomorphic gods and of heroes from a remote and glorious past in ways which related them more closely to recognizable human experience. In a few plays, such as Hippolytus and Bacchae (which I shall call "the mythological tragedies") these anthropomorphic gods still play a major role, but even here, though they are presented physically as dramatically real personages in the tragedies, they clearly symbolize mysterious forces governing the emotional and irrational areas of human experience. Thus, in Hippolytus, Aphrodite, goddess of sexual passion, declares that she will take vengeance on the hero for his refusal to do her honour. However, the actual action of the play (once the intentions of the goddess have been expressed in the Prologue) is worked out in essentially human terms: the catastrophe comes about from the conflict between the woman-hating Hippolytus and his stepmother Phaedra, the unwilling victim of guilty love for him. Here the poet makes it clear that it is the excess of Hippolytus' scorn for sex and his failure to understand the power of sexual passion that leads to his destruction. So, too, in Bacchae King Pentheus, the puritanical rationalist, suffers for suppressing in his state the mystical ecstasy and emotional release brought by the communal singing, drinking, and dancing of Dionysian worship.

In other, quite different plays of Euripides, such as Medea and Electra, the catastrophe occurs as a result of the destructive power of hate and vengeance within the soul of the individual tragic figure. Here the mythological dimension is notably less marked, since no divine figure is needed to represent the actively destructive power now embodied in the tragic personality itself. Medea is perhaps the most powerful example of this kind of Euripidean tragedy, which presents in psychologically "realistic" terms the destructive power of passion. Medea, who loves her children, slays them in order to be avenged on her faithless husband Jason. "My passion is stronger than my reason!" she exclaims at the climax of her struggle between mother-love and vengeful fury: a very Euripidean expression of what this poet felt to be one of the mainsprings of human tragedies. Other plays which I would describe (despite certain supernatural overtones) as psychologically "realistic" human tragedies are Electra and Hecuba (in which the same power of vengeful hatred, in very different circumstances, corrupts and destroys noble tragic figures) and (apart from its melodramatic finale) Orestes, which studies the effects of guilt and social rejection on the condemned matricide Orestes.

"Tragedies of War and of Politics [in the broadest sense]" might be selected as the label (with all the inadequacies which such labelling entails) for a third group of Euripidean tragedies. Here the issues are almost exclusively human and social, and the tragic situations arise, not from any divine vengeance (however “symbolically” understood) or from individual human passions, but from man’s more impersonal inhumanity to his fellow men. In Supplikes (The Suppliant Women) and Heracleidae (Children of Heracles), “just wars” are fought by legendary Athenian kings on behalf of just such victims of human cruelty, but in each case the plays end with an ironic undermining of the noble purpose of the war or else of the just pretensions of the suppliants themselves. In Troades (The Trojan Women) and Hecuba (which belongs as well in this group as in the preceding one), we witness the destructive results of war’s cruelties on the helpless survivors of the defeated: in the one case, collectively, on the women and children of the slain Trojan heroes, in the other, individually, on the tragic (and initially noble) figure of the Trojan Queen. Again the setting is in the mythological past, but the themes are universal and, mutatis mutandis, apply in some respects all too tellingly to certain historical circumstances and events of Euripides’ own day.

Another group of Euripidean plays, very different from the sombre “war plays,” comprises such plays as Ion, Helena (Helen), and Iphigeneia Taurica (Iphigenia in Tauris), which have been variously described by modern critics as “tragicomedy,” “romantic tragedy,” and (here some would include Orestes) “melodrama.” Of these, Helen is, perhaps, at the furthest remove from traditional Greek tragedy. Euripides bases this play on a variant version of the Trojan War myth according to which Helen spent the Trojan War secretly hidden away in Egypt while the goddess Hera caused a wraith of Helen to be substituted (and mistaken) for the real Helen of Troy. The plot includes a highly comic “recognition scene” (in which shipwrecked Menelaus, returning from Troy with the wraith, has great difficulty in recognizing his “real,” and somewhat indignant, wife) and an ingenious and exciting “escape” sequence, in which Helen and Menelaus outwit the wicked Egyptian King and escape over the seas to Sparta with the King’s ship and generous provisions of arms and supplies. In this and similar plays the poet seems to be taking traditional myth rather less seriously than in the more properly “tragic” plays and to adopt a satirical tone (not always absent even in the most “serious” tragedies) concerning the more improbable and anthropomorphic treatments of the gods. However, even in these less tragic plays, there are sometimes serious overtones: the Trojan War, the Chorus reminds us in Helen, was fought for a wraith: perhaps all wars, including the war currently ruining the poet’s own beloved city, could be avoided if men allowed words and reasoning (logoi) instead of bloody strife (eris) to settle their differences.

This brief account inevitably fails to do justice to the great variety in the Euripidean treatment of human experience and human folly. If the reader has been left with the wrong impression that, in questioning traditional mythology, Euripides rejects the supernatural element in that experience, he should read Bacchae, one of the last, and surely the most terrifying, of Euripides’ extant tragedies. Here he will discover, with King Pentheus, what sort of fate awaits those scorning the timeless and universal powers (“even stronger than a god, if that were possible,” as we are reminded of Aphrodite in Hippolytus) which Euripides recognized as dominating certain crucial areas in the life of man.

—Desmond J. Conacher

See the essays on Electra, Hippolytus, Ion, Medea, Orestes, and The Trojan Women.

EVTUSHENKO, Evgenii (Alexandrovich)

Also known as Yevgeny Yevtushenko. Born: Stantsiia Zima, Irkutsk region, Siberia, 18 July 1933. Education: Educated at the Gor’kii Institute, Moscow, early 1950s. Family: Married 1) Bella Akhmadulina in 1954 (divorced); 2) Galina Semenova; 3) Jan Butler in 1978; 4) Maria Novika in 1986; five sons. Career: Went on geological expeditions with father to Kazakhstan, 1948, and the Altai, 1950. Member, Congress of People’s Deputies of USSR, since 1989; vice president, Russian PEN, since 1990. Lives in Moscow. Member: Honorary member, American Academy of Arts and Sciences, 1987. Awards: USSR Committee for Defence of Peace award, 1965; Order of Red Banner of Labour (twice); State prize, 1984.

PUBLICATIONS

Collection

The Collected Poems 1952–1990, edited by Albert C. Todd, various translators. 1991.

Verse

- Razvedchiki griadushchevo* [The Prospectors of the Future]. 1952.
Tretii sneg [Third Snow]. 1955.
Shosse entuziastov [Highway of the Enthusiasts]. 1956.
Stantsiia Zima, in Oktiabr’, 10. 1956; as Winter Station, translated by Oliver J. Frederiksen, 1964.
Obeshchanie [Promise]. 1957.
Dye liubimyykh [Two Loves], in Grani, 38. 1958.
Luk i lira [The Bow and the Lyre]. 1959.
Stikhi raznykh let [Poems of Several Years]. 1959.
Iabloko [The Apple]. 1960.
Red Cats. 1961.
Vzmakh ruki [A Wave of the Hand]. 1962.
Selected Poems, translated by Peter Levi and Robin Milner-Gulland. 1962.
Nezhnost’: novye stikhi [Tenderness: New Poems]. 1962.
Posle Stalina [After Stalin]. 1962.
The Heirs of Stalin, in Current Digest of the Soviet Press, 14(40). 1962; as Nasledniki Stalina, 1963.
Selected Poems. 1962.
Selected Poetry. 1963.
Khochu ia stat’ nemnozhenko staromodnym [I Want to Become a Bit Old-Fashioned], in Novyi mir, 7. 1964.
The Poetry of Yevgeny Yevtushenko, edited and translated by George Reavey. 1964; revised edition, 1981; as Early Poems, 1989.
Bratskaia GES. 1965; as The Bratsk Station, in New Works: The Bratsk Station, 1966.
Khotiat li russkie voiny? [Do They Want Russian Wars?]. 1965.
So mnoiu vot chto proiskhodit: izbrannaia lirika [Here’s What Happens to Me: Selected Lyrics]. 1966.
Kater sviazi [Torpedo Boat Signalling]. 1966.
Kachka [Swing-Boat]. 1966.
New Works: The Bratsk Station, translated by Tina Tupikina-Glaessner, Geoffrey Dutton, and Igor Mezhakoff Koviakin. 1966; as The Bratsk Station and Other New Poems, 1967.

- Yevtushenko Poems* (bilingual edition), translated by Herbert Marshall. 1966.
- Poems*, translated by Herbert Marshall. 1966.
- Poems Chosen by the Author*, translated by Peter Levi and Robin Milner-Gulland. 1966.
- The City of Yes and the City of No and Other Poems*. 1966.
- Stikhi* [Poems]. 1967.
- New Poems*. 1968.
- Tramvai poezii* [Tram of Poetry]. 1968.
- Tiaga val'dshnepov* [Roding Woodcock]. 1968.
- Idut belye snegi* [The White Snows Are Falling]. 1969.
- Flowers and Bullets, and Freedom to Kill*. 1970.
- Ia sibirskoi porody* [I'm of Siberian Stock]. 1971.
- Stolen Apples*, translated by James Dickey. 1971.
- Kazanskii universitet*. 1971; as Kazan University and Other New Poems, translated by Eleanor Jacks and Geoffrey Dutton, 1973.
- Doroga nomer odin* [Highway Number One]. 1972.
- Poiushchaia damba* [The Singing Dam]. 1972.
- Poet v Rossii—bol'she, chem poet* [A Poet in Russia Is More than a Poet]. 1973.
- Intimnaia lirika* [Intimate Lyrics]. 1973.
- Otsovskii slukh* [Father's Hearing]. 1975.
- Izbrannye proizvedeniia* [Selected Works]. 1975.
- Proseka* [The Track]. 1976.
- Spasibo* [Thank You]. 1976.
- From Desire to Desire*. 1976; as Love Poems, 1977.
- V polnyi rost: novaia kniga stikhov i poem* [At Full Growth: New Book of Poetry and Verse]. 1977.
- Zaklinanie* [A Spell]. 1977.
- Utrennii narod: novaia kniga stikhov* [The Morning Crowds: New Book of Poetry]. 1978.
- Prisiaga prostoru: stikhi* [An Oath to Space: Poems]. 1978.
- A Choice of Poems by Evgeny Evtushenko*. 1978.
- Kompromiss Kompromissovich* [Compromise Kompromissovich]. 1978.
- The Face Behind the Face*, translated by Arthur Boyars and Simon Franklin. 1979.
- Ivan the Terrible and Ivan the Fool*, translated by Daniel Weissbort. 1979.
- Tiazhelee zemli* [Heavier than Earth]. 1979.
- Kogda muzhchine sorok let* [When a Man Is 40]. 1979.
- Doroga, ukhodiashchaia vdal'* [The Road, Leading Far]. 1979.
- Svarka vzyvom: stikhotvoreniia i poemy* [Explosion Welding: Poetry and Narrative Verse]. 1980.
- Tret'ia pamiat'* [Third Memory]. 1980.
- Poslushaite menia* [Listen to Me]. 1980.
- Tochka opory* [Fulcrum] (includes Pirl-kharbor [Pearl Harbour]). 1981.
- Ia sibiriak* [I'm a Siberian]. 1981.
- Dve pary lyzh* [A Pair of Skis]. 1982.
- Belye snegi* [White Snows]. 1982.
- A Dove in Santiago* (novella in verse), translated by D.M. Thomas. 1982.
- Mama i neitronnaia bomba i drugie poemy* [Mother and Neutron Bomb and Other Poems]. 1983.
- Otkuda rodom ia* [Where I Come From]. 1983.
- Sobranie sochinenii* [Collected Works]. 3 vols., 1983–84.
- Dva goroda* [Two Towns]. 1985.
- More* [Sea]. 1985.
- Pochti naposledok: novaia kniga*. 1985; as Almost at the End, translated by Antonina W. Bouis and Albert C. Todd, 1987.
- Poltravinochki* [Half a Blade of Grass]. 1986.
- Stikhi* [Poems]. 1986.
- Zavtrashnii veter* [Tomorrow's Wind]. 1987.
- Stikhotvoreniia* [Poetry]. 1987.
- Sud* [The Trial], in Novyi mir, 11. 1987.
- Stikhotvoreniia i poemy 1951–1986* [Poetry and Narrative Verse]. 3 vols., 1987.
- Posledniaia popytka: stikhotvoreniia iz starykh i novykh tetradei* [Last Attempt: Poetry from Old and New Books]. 1988.
- Pochti v poslednii mig* [Almost at the Last Moment]. 1988.
- Nezhnost'* [Tenderness]. 1988.
- Poemy o mire* [Verses on Peace]. 1989.
- Stikhi* [Poems]. 1989.
- Grazhdane, poslushaite menia. . .* [Citizens, Listen to Me. . .]. 1989.
- Liubimaia, spi. . .* [Loved One, Sleep . . .]. 1989.
- Pomozhem svobode!* [We Will Help Freedom!], in Znamia, 4. 1990.
- Ne umirai prezhde smerti* [Don't Die Before Death], in Ogonek, 10. 1992; as Don't Die Before You're Dead, translated by Antonina W. Bouis, 1995.
- Pre-morning: A New Book of Poetry in English and Russian*. 1995.
- The Best of the Best: A New Book of Poetry in English and Russian*. 1999.

Fiction

- Chetvertaia meshchanskaia* [Four Vulgar Women], in Iunost', 2. 1959.
- Iagodnye mesta*. 1982; as Wild Berries, translated by Antonina W. Bouis, 1984.
- Ardabiola*. 1984.
- Izbrannaia proza*. 1998.

Plays

- Bratskaia GES* (produced 1968). 1967.
- Under the Skin of the Statue of Liberty* (produced 1972).
- Screenplays: Screenplays: Kindergarten, 1984; Detskii sad Moscow, 1989.

Other

- Avtobiografiia*. 1963; as A Precocious Autobiography, translated by Andrew R. MacAndrew, 1963.
- Yevtushenko's Reader: The Spirit of Elbe, A Precocious Autobiography, Poems*. 1966.
- Izbrannye proizvedeniia* [Selected Works]. 2 vols., 1975.
- Talent est' chudo nesluchainoe* [Talent Is a Miracle Coming Not by Chance]. 1980.
- Invisible Threads*. 1981.
- Voina—eto antikulturna* [War Is Anti-Culture]. 1983.
- Divided Twins = Razdel ennye blizne t sy: Alaska and Siberia*, photographs by Evtushenko and Boyd Norton. 1988.
- Politika privilegiia vsekhi* [Everybody's Privilege]. 1990.
- Propast'—v dva pryzhka?* [The Precipice—in Two Leaps?]. 1990.

Fatal Half Measures: The Culture of Democracy in the Soviet Union, with Antonina W. Bouis. 1991.

Translator, Mlechnyi put', by D. Ulzhyuev. 1961.

Translator, Seti zvezd, by T. Chiladze. 1961.

Translator, Na koleni ne padat'!, by G. Dzhagarov. 1961.

Translator, Tiazhelee zemli: stikhi o Gruzii, poety Gruzii. 1979.

*

Critical Studies: "Herbert and Yevtushenko: On Whose Side Is History?" by George Gömöri, in Mosaic, 3(1), 1969; "The Politics of Poetry: The Sad Case of Yevgeny Yevtushenko" by Robert Conquest, in New York Times Magazine, 30 September, 1973; "An Interview with Evgeniy Evtushenko" by Gordon McVay, in Journal of Russian Studies, 1977; "Women in Evtushenko's Poetry" by Vickie A. Rebenko, in Russian Review, 36, 1977; "Yevtushenko as a Critic" by Vladimir Ognev, in Soviet Studies in Literature, 18(3), 1981; "Yevgeni Yevtushenko's Solo: On His 50th Birthday" by Yevgeni Sidorov, in Soviet Literature, 7(424), 1983; "Two Opinions about Evgenii Evtushenko's Narrative Poem: 'Man and the Neutron Bomb': And What If This Is Prose? And What If It Is Not?" by Adol'f Urban and Gennadii Krasnikov, in Soviet Studies in Literature, 20(1), 1983–84; "The Poetry of Yevgeny Yevtushenko in the 1970's" by Irma Mercedes Kaszuba, in USF Language Quarterly, 25(1–2), 1986; "Evtushenko's Jagodnye mesta: The Poet as Prose Writer" by Richard N. Porter, in Russian Language Journal, 40(135), 1986; "'Queuing for Hope': About Yevgeni Yevtushenko's Poem 'Fuku!'" by Pavel Ulyashov, in Soviet Literature, 9(462), 1986; "Yevtushenko's Stantsiya Zima: A Reassessment" by Michael Pursglove, in New Zealand Slavonic Journal, 2, 1988.

* * *

In the 1950s and 1960s Evgenii Evtushenko became the poet and spokesman for the younger post-Stalinist generation of Russian writers. He was responsible for reviving the brash, slangy, and direct poetic language of the revolutionary poets like Maiakovskii and Esenin, and reintroducing the personal and love lyrics so frowned upon by the authorities. The open demands he made on the international scene for greater artistic freedom, and for a literature based on aesthetic criteria rather than ideological standards, were partially responsible for the gradual easing of control over writers in the USSR.

Evtushenko's writing has always been rooted in the autobiographical. His poetry is topical and journalistic, as in Stantsiia Zima (Winter Station), a celebration of his birthplace, a small provincial town situated on the famous Trans-Siberian railway, in the Irkutsk region. This poem records a visit in the summer of 1953 to Zima, describing the relatives and other people he encounters there, and his endeavours to come to terms with his anxieties and the public moral problems raised by Stalin's death and the revelations that followed. Similarly, in "Svad'by" ("Weddings"), 1955, he records the atmosphere of the terrible years he spent as a child evacuee from Moscow at Zima Station during the war. Not only did Zima Station provide a source for country characters and scenery, but Evtushenko also began to be influenced by Siberian folklore and folk song, an impact which was to shape many of his later poems.

Evtushenko's poetic career began in earnest when he was given the chance to study at the Gor'kii Literary Institute in Moscow, the official training school for many of the Soviet writers after the war. He published widely in established journals in the 1950s, and his early books, Tretii sneg [Third Snow], Shosse entuziastov [Highway of the Enthusiasts], and Obeshchanie [Promise], made him famous and controversial with their outspokenness and flamboyance. Luk i lira [The Bow and the Lyre] followed, a volume that was the result of a stay in Georgia and contains many translations of Georgian poetry, and then the final volume of this series, Stikhi raznykh let [Poems of Several Years]. His poetry demonstrated a distinctive lyrical note in his treatment of nature, love, and various patriotic beliefs, celebrating the original ideals of the Revolution and condemning their corruption at the hands of the bureaucrats. It is compared frequently with the poetry of Maiakovskii with whom Evtushenko shares a dislike of hypocrisy and decadence, and a forthright, declamatory style.

Evtushenko began to write more boldly and to touch upon issues that had until then been kept under wraps. Such concerns included admitting the terrible mistakes of the Stalinist purges of the 1930s and 1940s and insisting that the truth be told. Such poems naturally caused a great deal of displeasure in certain circles: "It will go hard with me at times, and they will say: 'He'd better hold his tongue!'" This sharp political edge to the poetry went hand in hand with the youth's general desire to reassess the direction of the revolution. Poetry for Evtushenko was not merely negative and critical; rather, it was a form of aesthetic affirmation and ideal statement. In "Rakety i telegi" ("Rockets and Carts"), 1960, he declared the need for rocket-like art against the persistence of dull, plodding, "cart-like" novels and operas. This stance, adopted by Evtushenko and others like Voznesenskii, was hugely popular and caused a large increase in book sales and attendances at poetry readings. In a poetry that desires "art to be/as diverse as myself," Evtushenko sought to write a more dynamic verse that challenged the orthodoxy of Soviet Realism with the emergence of a new subjective element. As he declared in "Svezhesti" ("Freshness") (1960), "Freshness!/Freshness!/We want freshness!"

Evtushenko's work and activities in the early 1960s were often stimulated by his wide travels, including visits to England, France, Catalonia, Ghana, Liberia, Togo, and Bulgaria, and in April 1961 to the United States. These years saw the publication of one of his most notable collections, Vzmakh ruki [A Wave of the Hand], which contains many of his poems written as a result of his worldwide travels; and Nezhnost' [Tenderness], which includes more of his travel poems and impressions of foreign cultures and societies, particularly the last section with its poems on Cuba, which he had visited in 1962. Nevertheless, his political poems continued, with immense popularity: the controversial "Babii Iar" (1961), a poem that mourns the Nazi massacre of Ukrainian Jews but which also attacks the vestiges of Soviet anti-semitism; Nasledniki Stalina (The Heirs of Stalin), published originally in Pravda, satirizes Stalin's politics and his followers; "Kar'era" ("A Career"), which deals with Galileo's fight for truth against the authority of the church; and "Iumor" ("Humour"), in which the power of laughter emerges triumphant over despotic power. However, the publication in Paris of his Avtobiografiia (A Precocious Autobiography), with its vivid sequence of scenes from his life and his idiosyncratic interpretation of Soviet history without submission to the Soviet censors, incurred official disfavour and privileges were withdrawn.

Favour was restored with the publication in 1965 of an ambitious cycle of poems entitled Bratskaia GES (The Bratsk Station), in which he juxtaposes the symbol of a Siberian power plant generating light in Russia with Siberia's symbolic status as a prison throughout Russian history. The poems sought to reconnect modern Russia with its past, and were later adapted and performed as a play. More recently, he has turned increasingly to prose and the theatre. His play Under the Skin of the Statue of Liberty, composed of selections from his earlier poems about the United States that attack its violence but celebrate the idealism of its youth, was performed in Moscow to great acclaim. This was followed by a novel, Iagodnye mesta (Wild Berries), and the novella Ardabiola.

Evtushenko has always demonstrated commitment in his writing and although appearing to be slapdash in style he nevertheless shifts adroitly from intimate to public themes. He has been influential principally as a consolidator of certain revived traditions, while his ringing militancy, stylistic versatility, and challenging self-assertiveness in poetry have encouraged his contemporaries to emulate him.

—Tim Woods

F

FERDOWSI, Abu'ī Qāsim

Born: Persia (now Iran), c. 932–36. Came from a landowning family near Tus, Khorāsān. Family: Had one daughter. Career: According to tradition, began writing his epic poem the Shāh-nāma at about the age of 35, dedicating it to the Ghaznavid Sultan Mahmud, whose failure to reward it generously led Ferdowsi to write a satire about him and then return to his birthplace. Died: c. 1020.

PUBLICATIONS

Verse

Shāh-nāma, edited by Djalal Khaleghi-Motlagh. 6 vols., 1988– (3 vols. to 1992); as Shahnama, translated by Arthur George Warner and Edmond Warner, 9 vols., 1905–25; abridged versions translated by J. Atkinson, 1814, Alexander Rogers, 1907, and as The Epic of the Kings, Shah-Nama, the National Epic of Persia, translated by Reuben Levy, 1967; part as The Poems of Ferdosi, translated by J. Champion, 1785; part as The Tragedy of Sohrab and Rostam: From the Persian National Epic of Shahname, translated by Jerome W. Clinton, 1987; part as The Legend of Seyavash, translated by Dick Davis, 1992.

Fathers and Sons, translated by Dick Davis. 2000.

The Lion and the Throne, translated by Dick Davis. 1998.

*

Critical Studies: in Early Persian Poetry by W. Jackson, 1920; Ferdowsi: A Critical Biography by A. Shapur Shahbazi, 1991; Epic and Sediton: the Case of Ferdowsi's Shahnameh by Dick Davis, 1992; Poet and Hero in the Persian Book of Kings by Olga H. Davidson, 1994; Comparative Literature and Classical Persian Poetics: Seven Essays by Olga H. Davidson, 2000.

* * *

Abu'ī Qāsim Ferdowsi was born between 932 and 936 and the date of his death is placed in either 1020 or 1021. He lived in Khorāsān, in the environs of Tus near present-day Mashhad and was apparently a small farmer of the dehqan class, a squirarchy that in early Islamic times may have represented a stratum of landlords reduced in status following the Arab conquest in the 7th century. He is justly regarded as one of the world's greatest poets for his composition of Iran's national epic, the Shāh-nāma (Shahnama or The Epic of the Kings). It is an epic which has the distinction of encompassing the whole history of ancient Iran from about the 9th century BC to the 7th century AD—legendary as well as factual, and in so far as there is a subtle layer of the facts of human experience in mythology, basically factual enough to have universal appeal. It is, not surprisingly, one of the world's longest poems, of some 50,000 rhyming couplets in the same martially inspiring mutaqarib metre throughout; it is chanted to furnish the rhythm for athletes exercising in Iranian zurkanehs, "Houses of Strength," the traditional gymnasiums.

The chronological scheme of the work provides unity as it moves from monarch to monarch, although scope is given to the gestes of Herculean heroes who at times overshadow less competent kings, as is especially evident in the feats and courage of Rustam. He is known to readers of English literature through Matthew Arnold's Sohrab and Rostum, published in 1853, after Arnold had seen Sainte-Beuve's Causerie du Lundi of February 1850, which reviewed Jules Mohl's French translation of Le Livre des Rois, begun in 1838; Arnold was already aware of the story, of a father's slaying the son he did not recognize, from Sir John Malcolm's reference to it in his History of Persia, published in 1815. Various other English versions of the Shahnama exist, but the translation of the whole by Arthur George Warner and Edmond Warner, is recommended.

Ferdowsi's sources may be summarized as a recension of ancient Iranian history by an Abu Mansur; tales retained in folk memory; and, more than probably (he explicitly speaks of reports from a venerable mobed, a Zoroastrian priest, and his mythical kings are named in the Avesta) sources related to Iran's pre-Islamic religion and scriptures. His lofty purpose, in a work to which it seems he devoted nearly 30 years of his life, was apparently to remind Iran of past glories, not least in the continuing conflict between the sedentary, cultivating people of its north-eastern province and pastoralist invaders from the Central Asian Steppes. A dominant theme is war between Iran and Turan: the latter has been read as the land of the Turks beyond the River Oxus. In taking up the unfinished few verses of a predecessor, Daqiqi, who was murdered sometime between 976 and 981, Ferdowsi might have started his epic as a paean befitting the regime then still in power, that of the Iranian Samanids, sympathetic to memorials of Iran's pre-Islamic eras. The paean became more of a nostalgic lament when these rulers were ousted at the end of the 10th century, to be replaced in Iran by the House of their former Turkish military commanders, called the Ghaznavids.

Pessimism and an element of dignified resignation to the blows of fate tinge the overall melancholy strain of an epic concerned, not least in the poet's asides, with life's mutabilities and man's inability to control them. It is tempting to attribute the story of initial rejection of the work at the hands of the ruler whose patronage Ferdowsi sought on its completion, the Ghaznavid Sultan Mahmūd, who ruled from 998 to 1030, to the latter's seeing it as an innuendo against the Turks, but it would be pure speculation. A 12th-century writer, Nizami the Prosodist, attributed the rigorously orthodox Sultan's underpayment of the poet to Ferdowsi's alleged inclination for Muslim heresies with echoes of older Iranian beliefs. Fable has it that, on perceiving encouragement of military bravery in one of Ferdowsi's verses, the great warlord repented. Returning from conquest in India he sent Ferdowsi recompense in a caravan of indigo, but as the caravan entered one gate of Ferdowsi's hometown, the poet's bier was being carried to the grave out of another. Ferdowsi's only child, his daughter, refused the gift, which was devoted to providing a resthouse for travellers.

In his Chahar Maqala (Four Discourses) Nizami the Prosodist gives an illuminating, if partly fabulous, account of Ferdowsi, noteworthy for his remark that Ferdowsi's verse had a "sweet fluency to resemble running water." It must be added that, in spite of its length, the poem never sinks to mediocrity and contains memorable depictions of nature and colours, those of banners before and the dust and blood during battles, for example, which later Persian miniaturists revelled in presenting in illustrations to some of the great manuscripts of the Shahnama that have reached our museums and libraries despite tumults of the time in the lands where they were produced. The text has suffered through time, copyists having often been ignorant of dialect usages of Ferdowsi's day in Khorāsān, but at last, after a fine effort by Soviet scholars, a more reliable text than even theirs is now appearing, edited by Djalal Khaleghi-Motlagh and based, for as much as the manuscript covers, on the very ancient text discovered in Florence in 1977.

—Peter Avery

FEYDEAU, Georges (Léon-Jules-Marie)

Born: Paris, France, 8 December 1862, son of the writer Ernest-Aimé Feydeau. Education: Educated at boarding school, 1871–79. Military Service: 1883–84; Family: Married Marianne Duran in 1889 (divorced 1914); one son, Jacques, and other children. Career: Lawyer's clerk, 1879; began writing and reciting monologues in the early 1880s; established career with the long run of Champignol malgré lui, from 1892; lived at the Hôtel Terminus, Paris, 1909–19; suffered declining mental health, due to syphilis, after 1916; committed by his family to a sanatorium in Rueil-Malmaison, 1919. Died: 5 June 1921.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Théâtre complet. 9 vols., 1948–56.

Théâtre complet. 4 vols., 1988–89.

Plays

La Petite Révoltée (monologue). 1880.

Le Mouchoir (monologue). 1881.

Par la fenêtre (produced 1881). 1887; as Wooded and Viewed, translated by Norman Shapiro, in Four Farces, 1970; in Feydeau, First to Last, 1982.

Un Coup de tête (monologue). 1882.

J'ai mal au dents (monologue). 1882.

Un monsieur qui n'aime pas les monologues (monologue). 1882.

Trop vieux! (monologue). 1882.

Notre futur (produced 1894). 1882; as Ladies' Man, translated by Norman Shapiro, in Feydeau, First to Last, 1982.

Le Diapason. 1883.

Le Potache. 1883.

Aux antipodes (monologue). 1883.

Patte-en-l'air (monologue). 1883.

Le Petit Ménage (monologue). 1883.

Amour et piano (produced 1883). 1887; as Romance in a Flat, translated by Norman Shapiro, in Feydeau, First to Last, 1982; as The Music Lovers, translated by Reggie Oliver, 1992.

Gibier de potence (produced 1884). 1885; as Fit to Be Tried; or, Stepbrothers in Crime, translated by Norman Shapiro, in Feydeau, First to Last, 1982.

Les Célèbres (monologue). 1884.

Le Volontaire (monologue). 1884.

Le Billet de mille (monologue). 1885.

Le Colis (monologue). 1885.

L'Homme économe (monologue). 1885.

Les Réformes (monologue). 1885.

L'Homme intègre (monologue). 1886.

Fiancés en herbe (produced 1886). 1886; as Budding Lovers, translated by Barnett Shaw, 1969.

Tailleur pour dames (produced 1886). 1888; as A Gown for His Mistress, translated by Barnett Shaw, 1969; as Fitting for Ladies, translated by Peter Meyer, in Three Farces, 1974; as Love By the Bolt, translated by J. Paul Marcoux, in Three Farces, 1976.

Les Enfants (monologue). 1887.

La Lycéenne, music by G. Serpette (produced 1887). 1887.

Le Fiancé de Loche, with Maurice Desvallières. 1888.

Le Chat en poche (produced 1888).

Un bain de ménage (produced 1888). 1889.

L'Affaire Édouard, with Maurice Desvallières (produced 1889). 1889.

Monsieur Nounou, with Maurice Desvallières (produced 1890).

C'est une femme du monde!, with Maurice Desvallières (produced 1890). 1890; as Mixed Doubles, translated by Norman Shapiro, 1982.

Tout à Brown-Séquant! (monologue). 1890.

Le Mariage de Barillon, with Maurice Desvallières (produced 1890). 1890; as On the Marry-Go-Wrong, translated by Norman Shapiro, in Four Farces, 1970; as All My Husband, translated by J. Paul Marcoux, in Three Farces, 1976.

Madame Sganarelle (produced 1891).

Monsieur Chasse (produced 1892). 1896; as 13, Rue de L'Amour, translated by Mawby Green and Ed Feilbert, 1972; as The Happy Hunter, translated by Barnett Shaw, 1973; as A-Hunting We Will Go, translated by Ray Barron, 1976.

Champignol malgré lui, with Maurice Desvallières (produced 1892). 1925; as A Close Shave, translated by Peter Meyer, in Three Farces, 1974.

Le Système Ribadier (produced 1892). 1925.

Un fil à la patte (produced 1894). 1899; as Cat Among the Pigeons, translated by John Mortimer, 1970; as Not by Bed Alone, translated by Norman Shapiro, in Four Farces, 1970; as Get Out of My Hair!, translated by Frederick Davies, 1973.

L'Hôtel du Libre-Échange, with Maurice Desvallières (produced 1894). 1928; as Hotel Paradiso, translated by Peter Glenville, 1956; as A Little Hotel on the Side, translated by John Mortimer, in Three Boulevard Farces, 1985; as Paradise Hotel, translated by Nicholas Rudall, 1990.

Le Ruban, with Maurice Desvallières (produced 1894). In Théâtre complet, 1948–56.

Le Dindon (produced 1896). In Théâtre complet, 1948–56; as There is One in Every Marriage, translated by Suzanne Grossmann and Paxton Whitehead, 1970; as Sauce for the Goose, translated by Peter Meyer, in Three Farces, 1974; as The French Have a Word for It, translated by Barnett Shaw, 1983; as An Absolute Turkey, translated by Nicki Frei and Peter Hall, 1994.

Les Pavés de l'ours (produced 1896). In Théâtre complet, 1948–56; as The Boor Hug, translated by Norman Shapiro, in Feydeau, First to Last, 1982.

Séance de nuit (produced 1897). In Théâtre complet, 1948–56.

Dormez, je le veux! (produced 1897). In Théâtre complet, 1948–56; as Caught with His Trance Down, translated by Norman Shapiro, in Feydeau, First to Last, 1982.

La Bulle d'amour, music by F. Thomé (ballet scenario; produced 1898).

Le Juré (monologue). 1898.

Un monsieur qui est condamné à mort (monologue). 1899.

La Dame de chez Maxim (produced 1899). 1914; as The Lady from Maxim's, translated by Gene Feist, 1971; also translated by John Mortimer, 1977.

La Duchesse des Folies-Bergères (produced 1902). In Théâtre complet, 1948–56.

Le Billet de Joséphine, with J. Méry and A. Kaiser (produced 1902).

La Main passe (produced 1904). 1907; as Chemin de Fer, translated by Suzanne Grossmann and Paxton Whitehead, 1968.

L'Âge d'or, with Maurice Desvallières, music by L. Varney (produced 1905). In Théâtre complet, 1948–56.

Le Bourgeon. 1907.

La Puce à l'oreille (produced 1907). 1909; as A Flea in Her Ear, translated by John Mortimer, 1968; also translated by Barnett Shaw, 1975; Frank Galati, from a literal translation by Abbott Chrisman, 1989; Graham Anderson, 1993.

Feu la mère de Madame (produced 1908). 1923; as Better Late, translated by Peter Mayer, 1976; as Night Errant, translated by Michael Pilch, 1990.

Occupe-toi d'Amélie (produced 1908). 1911; as Keep an Eye on Amélie, translated by Brainerd Duffield, in Let's Get A Divorce and Other Plays, edited by Eric Bentley, 1958; also translated by Robert Cogo-Fawett and Braham Murray, 1991; as Look After Lulu, translated and adapted by Noël Coward, 1959; as That's My Girl, translated by J. Paul Marcoux, in Three Farces, 1976.

Le Circuit, with Francis Croisset (produced 1909). In Théâtre complet, 1948–56.

On purge bébé (produced 1910). 1910; as Going to Pot, translated by Norman Shapiro, in Four Farces, 1970; as The Purging, translated by Peter Barnes, 1977.

Mais n'te promène donc pas toute nue! (produced 1911). 1912; as Put Some Clothes on Clarisse!, translated by Reggie Oliver. 1990.

Léonie est en avance; ou, Le Mal joli (produced 1911). 1920.

Cent millions qui tombent (produced 1911).

On va faire la cocotte (produced 1913). In Théâtre complet, 1948–56.

Je ne trompe pas mon mari, with René Peter (produced 1914). 1921.

Complainte du pauvre propriétaire. 1915.

Hortense a dit: "Je m'en fous!" (produced 1916). In Théâtre complet, 1948–56; as Tooth and Consequences; or, Hortense Said: "No Skin off My Ass!", translated by Norman Shapiro, 1978; also translated by Shapiro, in Feydeau, First to Last, 1982.

Four Farces (includes Wooed and Viewed; On the Marry-Go-Wrong; Not By Bed Alone; Going to Pot), translated by Norman Shapiro. 1970.

Three Farces (includes Fitting for Ladies; A Close Shave; Sauce for the Goose), translated by Peter Meyer. 1974.

Three Farces (includes Love By the Bolt; All My Husband; That's My Girl), translated by J. Paul Marcoux. 1976.

Feydeau, First to Last: Eight One-Act Comedies, translated by Norman Shapiro. 1982.

Three Boulevard Farces (includes The Lady from Maxim's; A Flea in Her Ear; A Little Hotel on the Side), translated by John Mortimer. 1985.

The Pregnant Pause; or, Love's Labor Lost, translated by Norman Shapiro. 1987.

Five by Feydeau, translated by J. Paul Marcoux. 1994.

From Marriage to Divorce, translated by Peter Meyer. 1998.

*

Bibliography: Théâtre complet 1, 1988.

Critical Studies: "Suffering and Punishment in the Theatre of Georges Feydeau" by Norman R. Shapiro, in Tulane Drama Review, 5(1), 1960; Georges Feydeau (in English) by Jacques Lorcey, 1972; Georges Feydeau: Textes de Feydeau, points de vue critique, témoignages, chronologie, bibliographie, illustrations by Arlette Shenkan, 1972; Georges Feydeau (in English), 1975, and Eugène Labiche and Georges Feydeau, 1982, both by Leonard C. Pronko; Le Théâtre de Georges Feydeau by Henry Gidel, 1979; Georges Feydeau and the Aesthetics of Farce by Stuart E. Baker, 1981; Georges Feydeau (in English) by Manuel A. Esteban, 1983; "Feydeau 1862–1921: Dossier" by Henry Gidel, in Comédie-Française 139–140, 1985; Georges Feydeau by Henry Gidel, 1991.

* * *

Georges Feydeau's lengthy and successful dramatic career falls into four fairly distinct periods. During the first, from 1881 to 1886, he developed his skills by producing a series of dramatic monologues and short skits called saynètes which provided amusing entertainment in the fashionable drawing rooms of the period. Although necessarily possessing little of the manic activity and complex imbroglions of the brilliant later works, these early essays still offer certain features and themes that form the basis of later and more elaborate works—misunderstood or deceitful spouses, amorous intrigues, absurdly logical complications arising from outré premises, titillating misunderstandings, eccentric characters in bizarre situations. Such features mark Amour et piano (The Music Lovers), the one-act play that was Feydeau's first work produced in Paris.

Tailleur pour dames (Love By the Bolt) inaugurated a new phase in Feydeau's career; it was his first three-act comedy and his first major success. Already he had achieved considerable skill in weaving together a number of complex plots and subplots and an almost continuous web of misunderstandings and deceptions. The basic intrigue of the play is typically built on a romantic intrigue—Dr. Moulineaux's attempted seduction of Suzanne—but in standard Feydeau fashion, Moulineaux's wife, Suzanne's husband, and a variety of others are drawn one after another into an escalating round of mistaken identity, misdirection, and inopportune encounters. The plays immediately following Love By the Bolt, several, such as L'Affaire Édouard [The Edouard Affair], written in collaboration with Maurice Desvallières, were distinctly less successful, and in 1890 Feydeau took a two-year voluntary "exile" from the stage to polish his craft. According to his later collaborator René Peter, he gave particular attention to three contemporary authors who had gained considerable success in vaudeville and farce—Henri Meilhac for his dialogue, Eugène Labiche for his keen observation of contemporary characters and society, and Alfred Hennequin for his skill at dramatic construction.

Whatever his activities during this retreat, he returned with enormous energy and success, producing seven major plays, alone or in collaboration, during the next four years. These include some of his most famous and most elaborate imbrolios of marital intrigue, Monsieur Chasse (A-Hunting We Will Go), again with Desvallières, Le Système Ribadier [The Ribadier System] with Alfred Hennique's son Maurice, Champignol malgré lui (A Close Shave), L'Hôtel du Libre-Échange (Paradise Hotel), with Desvallières, Un fil à la patte (Cat Among the Pigeons), and Le Dindon (The French Have a Word for It). Although the actual or attempted amorous escapades of a bourgeois husband provide a departure point for almost all of these works, some, such as A-Hunting We Will Go, give major attention to the domestic situation and to the wife, often not above a bit of romancing herself but stoutly opposed to any such activity on the part of her partner, while others, such as Cat Among the Pigeons, pay more attention to the coquette who arouses the husband's interest, and to her quest for material success. Such character configurations recur again and again in Feydeau, so that La Puce à l'oreille (A Flea in Her Ear) may be classified as a "wife" play, and Occupe-toi d'Amélie (Keep an Eye on Amélie) a "coquette" play.

During the mid-1890s Feydeau attempted to depart from the rather mechanical farce to attempt a comedy of character in Le Ruban [The Ribbon] with Desvallières, written for the Odéon, France's second national theatre. Dr. Paginet, a scientific researcher whose passion to be awarded a prestigious national decoration recalls the obsessive drives of characters in the Molière tradition, was well received, but producers and public seemed to prefer the less thoughtful comic structures of Feydeau's successes in the boulevard theatres, and he returned to that approach with new one-act pieces and another of his comic masterpieces La Dame de chez Maxim (The Lady from Maxim's), his longest and most complex work. When the happily married Dr. Petypon wakes up one morning, on the floor of his bedroom, after an evening at Maxim's, and with a strange dancer from the Moulin Rouge in his bed, we are plunged at once into a racy and outrageous world of bizarre events and unexpected turns that never allows a moment of relaxation until the final masterful tying off of every loose end.

After such a success, a certain falling-off was perhaps inevitable, and although the public strongly supported La Duchesse des Folies-Bergères [The Duchess of the Folies-Bergère], critics suggested that Feydeau's themes and technique were beginning to show signs of wear. It may have been such criticism that encouraged Feydeau during his final period to divide his attention fairly equally between new examples of his most successful formulas and more "serious" comedies of character and personal relationships rather more in the style of his earlier Le Ruban. The most serious of the later works, indeed it is rather closer to drama than comedy, is Le Bourgeon [The Bud], dealing with a young seminarian's struggle with carnality. Immediately after this, however, came A Flea in Her Ear and Keep an Eye on Amélie, two of Feydeau's most elaborate and most successful farces.

In his final one-act and full-length plays, beginning with Feu la mère de Madame (Night Errant) and continuing through Hortense a dit: "Je m'en fous!" (Tooth and Consequences), Feydeau concentrated on confusions and conflicts within married life. The serious tonality that characterized much of his later work is found in all of these plays, but shot through with inventive comic elements. Although such plays as Mais n'te promène donc pas toute nue! (Put Some Clothes on Clarisse!) have lost nothing of the humour that marks all of Feydeau's best work, this humour no longer draws significantly upon such farce material as disguises, elaborate deceptions, or unexpected and unlikely encounters, but upon the irritants of everyday married life. The befuddled husbands and outrageous wives of these plays are developed with an intensity that at times almost suggests Strindberg in the mode of farce. The increasing grimness of the husband-wife relationship in these final works is suggested by Feydeau's plan to gather them in a collection to be called "From Marriage to Divorce."

—Marvin Carlson

See the essay on A Flea in Her Ear.

FILIPPO, Eduardo de

See DE FILIPPO, Eduardo

FLAUBERT, Gustave

Born: Rouen, France, 12 December 1821. Education: Educated at Collège Royal, 1831–39 (expelled); baccalauréat, 1840; studied law at École de Droit, Paris, 1841–45. Career: Suffered a seizure in 1844 which left him in poor health; after 1845 lived with his family at Croisset, near Rouen, where he stayed for the rest of his life; spent winters in Paris after 1856; visited Egypt and the Near East, 1849–51; publication of Madame Bovary, 1857, led to unsuccessful prosecution for indecency; returned to North Africa, 1858. State pension, 1879. Award: Chevalier, Légion d'honneur, 1866. Died: 8 May 1880.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

- Oeuvres complètes* (includes correspondence). 35 vols., 1926–54.
- Oeuvres*, edited by Albert Thibaudet and René Dumesnil. 2 vols., 1946–48.
- Complete Works*. 10 vols., 1926.
- Oeuvres complètes*, edited by Bernard Masson. 1964.
- Oeuvres complètes*, edited by M. Bardèche. 16 vols., 1971–75.

Fiction

- Madame Bovary*. 1857; as Madame Bovary, translated by Eleanor Marx-Aveling, 1886; numerous subsequent translations including by Gerard Hopkins, 1949; Alan Russell, 1950; J.L. May, 1953; Francis Steegmuller, 1957, reprinted 1993; Lowell Bair, 1959; Mildred Marmur, 1964; Paul de Man, 1965; Geoffrey Wall, 1992.
- Salammbô*. 1862; edited by P. Moreau, 1970; as Salammbô, translated by J.S. Chartres, 1886; numerous subsequent translations including by E. Powys Mathers, 1950; A.J. Krailsheimer, 1977.
- L'Éducation sentimentale*. 1869; edited by C. Gothot-Mersch, 1985; as Sentimental Education, translated by D.F. Hannigan, 1896;

- numerous subsequent translations including by A. Goldsmith, 1941; Robert Baldick, 1964; Douglas Parmée, 1989.
- La Tentation de Saint Antoine*. 1874; edited by C. Gothot-Mersch, 1983; as The Temptation of Saint Anthony, translated by D.F. Hannigan, 1895; numerous subsequent translations including by Lafcadio Hearn, 1932; Kitty Mrosovsky, 1980.
- Trois Contes* (includes Un cœur simple; La Légende de Saint Julien l'hospitalier; Hérodias). 1877; edited by S. de Sasy, 1973; as Three Tales, translated by George Burnham Ives, 1903; also translated by Mervyn Savill, 1950; Robert Baldick, 1961; A.J. Krailsheimer, 1991.
- Bouvard et Pécuchet*. 1881; edited by Alberto Cento, 1964, and by C. Gothot-Mersch, 1979; as Bouvard and Pécuchet, translated by D.F. Hannigan, 1896; also translated by A.J. Krailsheimer, 1976; reprinted in part as Dictionnaire des idées reçues, edited by Lea Caminiti, 1966; as A Dictionary of Platitudes, edited and translated by E.J. Fluck, 1954; as The Dictionary of Accepted Ideas, translated by Jacques Barzun, 1954; also translated by Robert Baldick, 1976.
- La première Éducation sentimentale*. 1963; as The First Sentimental Education, 1972.

Plays

- Le Candidat* (produced 1874). 1874.
- Le Château des coeurs*, with Louis Bouilhet and Charles d'Osmoy (produced 1874). In Oeuvres complètes, 1910.

Other

- Par les champs et par les grèves*. 1886.
- Mémoires d'un fou*. 1901.
- Souvenirs, notes, et pensées intimes*, edited by L. Chevally-Sabatier. 1965, and by J.P. Germain, 1987; as Intimate Notebook 1840–1841, edited by Francis Steegmuller, 1967.
- November*, edited by Francis Steegmuller. 1966.
- Flaubert in Egypt: A Sensibility on Tour*, edited by Francis Steegmuller. 1972.
- Correspondance*, edited by Jean Bruneau. 3 vols., 1973–91.
- Letters*, edited and translated by Francis Steegmuller. 2 vols., 1980–82.
- Correspondance*, with George Sand, edited by Alphonse Jacobs. 1981; as Flaubert-Sand: The Correspondance, translated by Francis Steegmuller and Barbara Bray, 1993.
- Flaubert and Turgenev: A Friendship in Letters: The Complete Correspondance*, edited and translated by Barbara Beaumont, 1985.
- Carnets de travail*, edited by Pierre-Marc de Biasi. 1988.
- Early Writings*, translated by Robert Griffin. 1991.
- Correspondance*, with Guy de Maupassant, edited by Yvan Leclerc. 1994.
- Editor, Dernières chansons, by Louis Bouilhet. 1872.

*

Bibliography: Bibliographie de Flaubert by D.L. Demorest and R. Dumesnil, 1947; Bibliographie des études sur Gustave Flaubert, edited by D.J. Colwell, 1988–90.

Critical Studies: Flaubert and Madame Bovary by Francis Steegmuller, 1947; Flaubert and the Art of Realism by Anthony Thorlby, 1956; On Reading Flaubert by Margaret G. Tillet, 1961;

Flaubert: Madame Bovary by Alison Fairlie, 1962; Flaubert: A Collection of Critical Essays edited by Raymond D. Giraud, 1964; The Novels of Flaubert: A Study of Themes and Techniques by Victor Brombert, 1966, revised edition, 1968; Madame Bovary and the Critics edited by Benjamin F. Bart, 1966, Flaubert, 1967, and The Legendary Sources of Flaubert's Saint Julien, 1977, both by Bart; Flaubert by Stratton Buck, 1966; The Sentimental Adventure by Peter Cortland, 1967; Flaubert by Enid Starkie, 2 vols., 1967–71; Three Novels by Flaubert: A Study of Techniques by R.J. Sherrington, 1970; The Discovery of Illusion: Flaubert's Early Works, 1835–37, 1971, and Madame Bovary: The End of Romance, 1989, both by Eric L. Gans; The Greatness of Flaubert by Maurice Nadeau, 1972; Flaubert: The Uses of Uncertainty by Jonathan Culler, 1974, revised edition, 1985; Flaubert: The Problem of Aesthetic Discontinuity by Marie J. Diamond, 1975; Sartre and Flaubert by Hazel E. Barnes, 1981; The Family Idiot: Gustave Flaubert 1821–1857 by Jean-Paul Sartre, translated by Carol Cosman, 5 vols., 1981–93; Saint/Oedipus: Psychocritical Approaches to Flaubert's Art by William J. Berg, 1982; Flaubert and the Historical Novel: Salammbô Reassessed by Anne Green, 1982; Madame Bovary on Trial by Dominick La Capra, 1982; Towards the Real Flaubert: A Study of Madame Bovary by Margaret Lowe, 1984; Flaubert and Postmodernism by Naomi Schor and Henry F. Majewski, 1984; Madame Bovary: A Psychoanalytical Reading by Ion K. Collas, 1985; Flaubert's Characters: The Language of Illusion by Diana Knight, 1985; Flaubert and the Gift of Speech: Dialogue and Drama in Four Modern Novels, 1986, and The Madame Bovary Blues: The Pursuit of Illusion in Nineteenth Century French Fiction, 1987, both by Stirling Haig; Critical Essays on Gustave Flaubert by Laurence Porter, 1986; The Perpetual Orgy: Flaubert and Madame Bovary by Mario Vargas Llosa, translated by Helen Lane, 1986; Gustave Flaubert's Madame Bovary edited by Harold Bloom, 1988; Rape of the Lock: Flaubert's Mythic Realism by Robert Griffin, 1988; The Free Indirect Mode: Flaubert and the Poetics of Irony by Yaheed R. Ramazani, 1988; The Hidden Life at Its Source: A Study of Flaubert's L'Éducation sentimentale by D.A. Williams, 1988; Madame Bovary by Alastair B. Duncan, 1989; Madame Bovary by Rosemary Lloyd, 1989; Flaubert: A Biography by Herbert Lottman, 1989; Gustave Flaubert by David Roe, 1989; Flaubert Remembers: Memory and the Creative Experience by William VanderWalk, 1990; Flaubert's Straight and Suspect Saints: The Unity of Trois Contes by Aimée Israel-Pelletier, 1991; Gustave Flaubert: Madame Bovary by Stephen Heath, 1992; Sentimental Education: The Complexity of Disenchantment by William Paulson, 1992; The Script of Decadence: Essays on the Fictions of Flaubert and the Poetics of Romanticism by Eugenio Donato, 1993; Realism and Narrative Modality: The Hero and Heroine in Eliot, Tolstoy and Flaubert by Jill Felicity Durey, 1993; When Flaubert Lies: Chronology, Mythology and History by Claire Addison, 1996; Gustave Flaubert by William J. Berg and Laurey K. Martin, 1997; Processes of Literary Creation: Flaubert and Proust by Marion Schmid, 1998; Searching for Emma: Gustave Flaubert and Madame Bovary by Dacia Maraini, 1998; Flaubert: Writing the Masculine by Mary Orr, 2000; Flaubert and the Pictorial Arts: From Image to Text by Adrienne Tooke, 2000; Flaubert: A Life by Geoffrey Wall, 2001; A Gustave Flaubert Encyclopedia, edited by Laurence M. Porter, 2001.

* * *

Gustave Flaubert's best and best-known novel, Madame Bovary, marked a turning point in the history of the European novel. For the first time, an ordinary, middle to lower-middle-class woman occupied the central place in a detailed study of how dull everyday life could be in a small town, and the romantic myth that true love could be found in successfully consummated adultery was convincingly presented as a total illusion. In the wider history of fiction, Emma Bovary resembles Cervantes's Don Quixote (1615) in that she is a person who tries to live her life in terms of ideas derived from books but fails, and she also, perhaps more significantly, represents the first version of the "miserable married woman" who recurs in Tolstoy's Anna Karenina (1875–77), in the Irene of John Galsworthy's Forsyte Saga (1906–29), in Mauriac's Thérèse Desqueyroux (1927), and even—though here the problem finds a satisfactory solution—in D.H. Lawrence's Lady Chatterley's Lover (1928). Like her fictional successors, Emma is married to a worthy but dull man, and the fact that she is, for all her self-centredness and folly, by far the most enterprising and interesting character in the novel does enable Madame Bovary to be interpreted nowadays as a not entirely unsympathetic account of the problems to which feminism seeks to find a solution.

As his other novels, especially L'Éducation sentimentale (Sentimental Education), show, and as his voluminous Correspondance confirms, Flaubert was an unremitting pessimist who did not believe that human beings either could achieve happiness or deserved to do so. For him, the only activity deserving any consideration was the construction of perfect works of art, and it was to this that he devoted the whole of his life. He rewrote incessantly, spending sometimes a week on one paragraph, and it took him five years to complete Madame Bovary. It is consequently slightly surprising that the heroine of what is otherwise rightly regarded as a masterpiece of realism should have eyes that are blue on one page but black on another, and the modern French critics who profess to admire Flaubert do so because of his mastery of form. His other novels, especially the exotic Salammô and La Tentation de Saint Antoine (The Temptation of Saint Anthony), have a less immediate appeal to the modern reader, though the various versions through which the latter book passed between 1848 and 1874 make it the work on which Flaubert spent most time. Flaubert's attitude of caustic superiority to the modern world joined with an obsession with stupidity to produce Bouvard et Pécuchet (Bouvard and Pécuchet), although he died before it was completed, as well as the shorter and more amusing Dictionnaire des idées reçues (The Dictionary of Accepted Ideas). Although he was himself of impeccably middle-class origins, and adopted a very middle-class lifestyle, he contributed greatly to the growth of the now universal custom in France whereby imaginative writers have only contempt for the members of the middle class who buy and read their books.

His literary influence showed itself in the 19th century principally in the development of the realist movement with Zola and Maupassant, and in the 20th in the self-styled "nouveaux romanciers" of the 1950s. Thus Robbe-Grillet saw in Flaubert a writer with a comparable interest to his own in the minute description of inanimate physical objects, and tended to pay less attention to the concern for pitiless psychological analysis which led to Flaubert being shown, in his lifetime, in a cartoon depicting him as a surgeon in a bloodstained apron holding up the dissected heart of the unhappy Emma Bovary.

There is general unanimity among critics of all tendencies to admire the long short stories in Trois Contes (Three Tales) as undisputed masterpieces. "Un coeur simple" ("A Simple Heart"), an account of how a servant woman devotes herself entirely to the welfare of others, is indeed a masterpiece. It is certainly the work in which Flaubert shows something of the sympathy for his own creations which traditionally characterizes the novelist, and in which the hatred of normal humanity which so often informs his work gives way to a more charitable vision of our limitations. Those who consider singleness of purpose in the pursuit of aesthetic perfection will admire the hermit-like existence which Flaubert imposed upon himself, and detach themselves from Jean-Paul Sartre's view that Flaubert, like the other 19th-century French writers who retired to their "ivory tower," is to be held responsible for the massacres which followed the Commune of 1871 because they did not write a single line to protest against them. Those who admire the vigour and even the vulgarity of a Dickens or a Balzac, or who share the sympathy with ordinary life which so often shows itself in Tolstoy, will speculate more on the paradox of how a man who disliked human beings so much managed to write novels at all. The subtitle of Madame Bovary is "Moeurs de Province" ("Customs of the Provinces"), and this draws attention to the character of the local pharmacist Homais, the embodiment of all that Flaubert most disliked in the optimism and enthusiasm for scientific progress which were so marked a feature of mid-19th-century France.

—Philip Thody

See the essays on Madame Bovary, Sentimental Education, and "A Simple Heart."

FONTAINE, Jean de la

See LA FONTAINE, Jean de

FONTANE, Theodor

Born: Henri Théodore Fontane in Neuruppin, Germany, 30 December 1819. Education: Educated at Gymnasium, Neuruppin, 1832–33; Gewerbeschule K.F. Klödens, Berlin, 1833–36. Military Service: 1844. Family: Married Emilie Rouanet-Kummer in 1850, three sons and one daughter. Career: Apprenticed to an apothecary, Berlin, 1836–40, and worked in Burg, Leipzig, Dresden, and Berlin, 1841–49; then freelance writer; worked for Prussian government press bureau, 1851–55; London correspondent for Berlin papers, 1855–59; editor for London affairs, Kreuzzeitung, 1860–70; theatre critic, Vossische Zeitung, 1870–89; secretary Berlin Academy of Arts, 1876 (resigned, 1876). Awards: Schiller prize (Prussia), 1891. Died: 20 September 1898.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Sämtliche Werke, edited by Edgar Gross and others. 30 vols., 1959–75.

Werke, Schriften, und Briefe, edited by Walter Keitel and Helmuth Nürnberger. 1962–.

Romane und Erzählungen, edited by Peter Goldammer and others. 8 vols., 1969.

Fiction

Vor dem Sturm. 1878; as Before the Storm, translated by R.J. Hollingdale, 1985.

Grete Minde. 1880.

Ellernklipp. 1881.

L'Adultera. 1882; as A Woman Taken in Adultery, translated by Gabriele Annan, with The Poggenpuhl Family, 1979.

Schach von Wuthenow. 1883; as A Man of Honor, translated by E.M. Valk, 1975.

Graf Petöfy. 1884.

Unterm Birnbaum. 1885.

Cecile. 1887; translated by Stanley Radcliffe, 1992.

Irrungen, Wirrungen. 1888; as Trials and Tribulations, 1917; as A Suitable Match, translated by Sandra Morris, 1968; as Entanglements: An Everyday Berlin Story, translated by Derek Bowman, 1986.

Quitt. 1890.

Stine. 1890; translated as Stine, 1977.

Unwiederbringlich. 1891; as Beyond Recall, translated by Douglas Parmée, 1964.

Frau Jenny Treibel. 1892; as Jenny Treibel, translated by Ulf Zimmermann, 1976.

Effi Briest. 1895; translated by Douglas Parmée, 1967; also translated by Hugh Rorrison and Helen Chambers, 1995.

Die Poggenpuhls. 1896; as The Poggenpuhl Family, translated by Gabriele Annan, with A Woman Taken in Adultery, 1979.

Der Stechlin. 1899; as The Stechlin, translated with introduction and notes by William L. Zwiebel, 1995.

Mathilde Möhring. 1906; revised version, 1969.

Short Novels and Other Writings (includes A Man of Honor; Jenny Treibel; The Eighteenth of March), edited by Peter Demetz. 1982.

Delusions, Confusions; and The Poggenpuhl Family, edited by Peter Demetz. 1989.

Verse

Von der schönen Rosamunde. 1850.

Männer und Helden. 1850.

Gedichte. 2 vols., 1851–75.

Balladen. 1861.

Die schönsten Gedichte und Balladen. 1982.

Bilder und Balladen, edited by Werner Feudell. 1984.

Other

Ein Sommer in London. 1854.

Bilderbuch Aus England. 1860; as Journeys to England in Victoria's Early Days 1844–1859, translated by Dorothy Harrison, 1939.

Jenseit des Tweed. 1860; as Across the Tweed, translated by Brian Battershaw, 1965; as Beyond the Tweed: A Tour of Scotland in 1858, translated by Brian Battershaw, 1998.

Wanderungen durtch die Mark Brandenburg. 4 vols., 1862–82.

Kriegsgefangen. 1871.

Aus den Tagen der Okkupation. 1872.

Der Krieg gegen Frankreich, 1870–1871. 2 vols., 1873–76.

Christian Friedrich Scherenberg und der literarische Berlin von 1840 bis 1860. 1885.

Fünf Schlösser. 1889.

Meine Kinderjahre (memoirs). 1894.

Von Zwanzig bis Dreissig (memoirs). 1898.

Aus dem Nachlass, edited by Joseph Ettlinger. 1908.

Briefwechsel, with Wilhelm Wolfsohn, edited by Wilhelm Walters. 1910.

Briefe, edited by Kurt Schreinert and Charlotte Jolles. 4 vols., 1968–71.

Briefwechsel, with Paul Heyse, edited by Gotthard Erler. 1972.

Briefe, edited by Gotthard Erler. 2 vols., 1980.

Briefwechsel, with Theodor Storm, edited by Jacob Steiner. 1981.

Ein Leben in Briefen, edited by Otto Drude, 1981.

Autobiographische Schriften, edited by Gotthard Erler, Peter Goldammer, and Joachim Krueger. 3 vols., 1982.

Briefe an den Verleger Rudolf von Decker. 1988.

Shakespeare in the London Theatre 1855–58, translated with introduction and notes by Russell Jackson, 1999.

*

Critical Studies: Formen des Realismus by Peter Demetz, 1964; The Gentle Critic: Theodor Fontane and German Politics 1848–98 by Joachim Remak, 1964; Theodor Fontane: An Introduction to the Novels and Novellen by H.C. Sasse, 1968; Theodor Fontane: An Introduction to the Man and His Work by A.R. Robinson, 1976; The Preparation of the Future: Techniques of Anticipation in the Novels of Theodor Fontane and Thomas Mann by Gertrude Michielsen, 1978; Some Aspects of Balladesque Art and Their Relevance for the Novels of Fontane by R. Geoffrey Lackey, 1979; Supernatural and Irrational Elements in the Works of Fontane by Helen Elizabeth Chambers, 1980; The Berlin Novels of Theodor Fontane by Henry Garland, 1980; Theodor Fontane: The Major Novels by Alan F. Bance, 1982; The German "Gesellschaftsroman" at the Turn of the Century: A Comparison of the Works of Theodor Fontane and Eduard von Keyserling by Richard A. Koc, 1982; Novel Associations: Theodor Fontane and George Eliot within the Context of Nineteenth-Century Realism by Gabriele A. Wittig Davis, 1983; Meyer or Fontane? German Literature after the Franco-Prussian War 1870–71 by John Osborne, 1983; Anekdoten aus allen fünf Weltteilen: The Anecdote in Fontane's Fiction and Autobiography by Andrea MhicFhionnbhairr, 1985; Social Integration and Narrative Structure: Patterns of Realism in Auerbach, Freytag, Fontane, and Raabe by Nancy A. Kaiser, 1986; Effi Briest by Stanley Radcliffe, 1986; The Changing Image of Theodor Fontane by Helen Chambers, 1997; New Approaches to Theodor Fontane: Cultural Codes in Flux, edited by Marion Doebeling, 2000.

* * *

It was as a writer of ballads that Theodor Fontane first made his way in the literary world, and it was on the ballad, and on his historical researches, Wanderungen durch die Mark Brandenburg, that Fontane's reputation rested for most of his own lifetime. He emerged as a novelist only in his late fifties, with the historical novel Vor dem

Sturm (Before the Storm), on the mood of Prussia on the eve of the Wars of Liberation against Napoleon.

Fontane is typically concerned here to present large-scale events through the details of everyday life, and this predilection for the actual conditions of life (albeit within a limited social range) is somewhat un-German. In fact, Fontane and Heinrich Heine were perhaps the only two 19th-century writers of rank to grapple closely with the political reality of their country. The author himself thought his wealth of topical references would render him unreadable in the next century (yet Ernst Jünger was sustained by the love story Irrungen, Wirrungen (A Suitable Match) in the trenches of World War I).

Everything Fontane writes is in a sense political, and yet everything is conveyed through the intimate medium of a private fate. Thus his novella on the decadent state of Prussian society in the era of its defeat at Napoleon's hands in 1806 reveals the nature of the times through the character of an individual, the Prussian officer Schach von Wuthenow (after whom the story is named), a vacillating conformist. Fontane's highly developed handling of conversation is the most praised quality of his art, and it especially offers him scope for revealing the link between private existence and the public totality of an epoch. His preference for reticence and discretion as a narrator has allowed him to be read as an apologist for the accommodations required of the individual in society. But he is at heart a romantic, who knows, however, that individuals only exist within the given of their society and cannot transcend it. Yet it is through these individuals that Fontane must convey his sense of an alternative world, and he does so often through female characters who possess a mysterious natural attraction, and whose potential the world stifles or leaves unrealized. The most poetic expression of this confrontation of nature and society is the figure of Effi Briest in Fontane's best-known novel; and yet this book more than any other makes clear that society is known and understood only through individuals who are products of their society and cannot stand outside it. His last novel, Der Stechlin, is a serene and yet politically astute analysis of the tension between reified "facts"—the facts of self-interest and power politics which became a dominant fetish in Wilhelm II's materialistic Second Reich—and the possibility of change. Fontane's life-long attraction to England, prominent in Der Stechlin, was precisely to do with the contrast between English political culture and Prussia's difficulty in evolving social structures commensurate with the dynamic forces of its modernization.

—Alan F. Bance

See the essays on Before the Storm and Effi Briest.

FONVIZIN, Denis (Ivanovich)

Born: Moscow, Russia, 3 April 1745. Education: Educated at Moscow University Gymnasium, 1755–60; Moscow University, 1760–62. Family: Married Ekaterina Khlopova in 1774. Career: After university, moved to St. Petersburg and entered the civil service: secretary to Ivan Elagin in the Foreign Ministry, 1763–69; secretary to the statesman Count Nikita Ivanovich Panin, from 1769; received an estate, 1773; travelled to France and Germany, 1777–78; achieved dramatic success with the St. Petersburg production of The Minor; retired from public life, 1783, following the death of Panin and after incurring the displeasure of Catherine the Great; a founding member of the Russian Academy, 1783; his works banned temporarily in the early 1780s; travelled to Germany and Italy, 1784–85; suffered stroke, 1785; planned to launch a periodical, Starodum [Old Thought], which never appeared because of censorship; travelled to Austria for health reasons, 1786–87. Died: 1 December 1792.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

- Polnoe sobranie sochinenii* [Complete Works]. 4 vols., 1830.
Pervoe polnoe sobranie sochinenii [First Complete Works]. 1888.
Izbrannye sochineniia i pis'ma [Selected Works and Letters]. 1946.
Izbrannoe [Selection], edited by B. Derkach. 1957.
Sobranie sochinenii [Collected Works], edited by G.P. Makogonenko. 2 vols., 1959.
Sochineniia [Works], edited by A.I. Vredinskii. 1983.
Izbrannoe: Stikhotvoreniia; Komedii; Satiricheskie proza publitsistika; Avtobiograficheskaia proza; Pis'ma [Selection: Poetry; Comedies; Satirical Prose and Publications; Autobiographical Prose; Letters], edited by Iu.V. Stennik. 1983.
Sochineniia [Works], edited by N.N. Akopova. 1987.
Izbrannye sochineniia [Selected Works], with A.S. Griboedov and A.N. Ostrovskii, edited by V.N. Turbin. 1989.

Plays

- Korion* [Korion], from a play by Jean-Baptiste Gresset (produced 1764).
Brigadir (produced 1780). In Polnoe sobranie sochinenii, 1830; single edition, 1950; as The Brigadier, translated by Harold B. Segel, in The Literature of Eighteenth-Century Russia, 2, edited by Segel, 1968; also translated by Marvin Kantor, in The Dramatic Works, 1974.
Nedorosl' (produced 1782). 1937; as The Young Hopeful, translated by George Z. Patrick and G.R. Noyes, in Masterpieces of the Russian Drama, edited by Noyes, 1933; as The Minor, translated by Frank D. Reeve, in Anthology of Russian Plays, 1, edited by Reeve, 1961; also translated by Marvin Kantor, in The Dramatic Works, 1974; as The Infant, in Four Russian Plays, translated by Joshua Cooper, 1972, reprinted as The Government Inspector and Other Plays, 1990.
Vybor gubernera (produced 1790). As The Choice of a Tutor, in Five Russian Plays with One from the Ukraine, edited and translated by C.E.B. Roberts, 1916; as The Selection of a Tutor, translated by Marvin Kantor, in The Dramatic Works, 1974.
Alzir; ili, Amerikantsii [Alzire; or, The Americans], from a play by Voltaire, in Pervoe polnoe sobranie sochinenii. 1888.
Komedii (includes Vseobshchaia pridvornaia grammatika). 1950.
The Dramatic Works (includes The Minor; The Brigadier; The Selection of a Tutor; and the fragment A Good Mentor), translated by Marvin Kantor. 1974.

Other

- Zhizn' grafa N.I. Panin* [The Life of Count N.I. Panin]. 1784 (in French); 1796 (in Russian).

Brigadir; Nedorosl'; Satiricheskaia proza; Pis'ma iz Peterburga [The Brigadier; The Minor; Satirical Prose; Letters from Petersburg], 1987.

Letres de France (1777–1778), translated into French with commentary by Henri Grosse, Jacques Proust, and Piotr Zaborov, 1995.

Translator, Basni nrovouchitel' ne siz'' iasneniami, from Holberg's fables. 1761; enlarged edition, 1765.

Translator, Geroiskaia dobrodetel'; ili, zhizn' Sife [Heroic Virtue], by Jean Terrasson. 4 vols., 1762–68.

Translator, Liubov' Karity i Polidora [The Love of Carita and Polidore], by Jean-Jacques Berthélemy. 1763.

Translator, Torguushchee dvorianstvo [The Commercial Nobility], by Gabriel-François Coyer. 1766.

Translator, Sidnii i Sillii [Sidney and Silly], by François-Thomas Baculard d'Arnaud, 1769.

Translator, Joseph, by Paul-Jérémie Bitaupe. 1769.

Translator, Rassuzhdenie o natsional'nom liubochestie [An Essay on National Patriotism], by Johann Zimmermann. 1785.

*

Critical Studies: Russian Comedy 1765–1823 by D. Walsh, 1966; Denis Fonvizine by Alexis Strychek, 1976; Denis Fonvizin by Charles A. Moser, 1979; Russian Drama from Its Beginnings to the Age of Pushkin by Simon Karlinsky, 1985.

* * *

The Russian theatre before Denis Fonvizin, after its official inception during the reign of Tsar Alexei in 1672, progressed by fits and starts. Very little of lasting value was produced and the period is of little more than historical interest. The mid-18th century, did, however, witness some notable developments and a few original plays were written, the best of them by Aleksandr Sumarokov. The style was highly imitative and followed the conventions of French neo-classicism. During the reign of Catherine the Great marked progress was made, not entirely unconnected with her own interest in writing plays, and the theatre was given encouragement, state support, and financial assistance. The two best plays of the period are undoubtedly Fonvizin's Brigadir (The Brigadier) and Nedorosl' (The Minor).

Fonvizin was a well-educated, cultured, and widely-travelled man but his work as a dramatist was not central to his career. His interest in drama derived from his leisure-time activity of translating from French and German—his version of Holberg's Fables (1761) led to a lasting interest in his plays, a few of which he attempted to translate. Fonvizin's first attempt at dramatic composition was a version in Russian of Gresset's Sidney (1764), to which he gave the un-Russian title of Korion. Although it is a good example of travesty that was extremely popular at the time and it was rendered in competent verse, it is best regarded only as an immature experiment. These early experiences did, however, stand Fonvizin in good stead, for the two plays for which he is remembered are unquestionably the best in Russian before Griboedov's Gore ot uma (Woe from Wit), composed in the early 1820s. They are both written in prose and follow the rules of neo-classical dramatic form. They are comedies of manners and social satires with a marked didactic element.

When The Brigadier first appeared it was an immediate success. Its plot revolves around a young couple who hope to marry and whose respective parents meet in order to become better acquainted and to decide whether their offspring are suitable for each other. The comedy springs from the efforts of each of the two fathers to form a liaison with the other's wife, while simultaneously the young man courts his prospective mother-in-law, thus becoming a rival to his own father. Ultimately such disgraceful behaviour gets its just reward: the parents are ridiculed, the young man is unsuccessful, and the daughter's eyes are opened to the ways of the world before she finds true love with someone else. Consequently the sanctity of the family is upheld and love based on sincere feelings and mutual respect encouraged. Fonvizin, however, keeps his most biting satire for the then pervasive Gallomania, endemic at court but imitated, although not understood, by society at large. Fonvizin was by no means opposed to the French or their ways, but wished his fellow-countrymen to be selective, balanced, and rational in what they accepted, thus developing some sense of their own worth. The play is amusing in both its action and its dialogue, the latter being the most natural-sounding yet heard on the Russian stage. For the first time in Russia a play had been written that was recognizably Russian in subject matter, characterization, and feel, even though many of the human foibles satirized are universal.

Although less well constructed and more obviously didactic and closer to the conventions of neo-classicism than The Brigadier, The Minor was the better-known in its day and the one for which he is now chiefly remembered. It features a pair of conventional lovers who have to suffer the machinations of the young girl's guardian to marry her off, first to her brother, and then when it transpires that her ward is the heiress to a considerable fortune, to her son, the minor of the title. Everything is sorted out finally, the lovers are free to marry and the guardian punished, although not so much for her dealings with her family as for maltreating her serfs. The plot is rather conventional and uninvolved. The central focus of the satire is squarely on the brutal, uneducated, unthinking, and selfish provincial landowners of the minor gentry and their equally uninspiring entourage of servants, relations, and ignorant tutors. The negative characters, with hardly a redeeming feature among them, are wonderfully comic creations and are in sharp contrast to the positive, moralizing, and tediously didactic representatives of the good and true, the wealthy, honest, and educated. The language of the former is lively, natural, and colloquial while that of the latter is formal and stilted. Fonvizin is proposing virtuous behaviour in human relations and the legitimate claims of social justice, both of which can be guaranteed by a proper education, while the state must do all it can to promote the necessary conditions. Even Catherine is reported to have approved of the play, although there were some suggestions that Fonvizin had drawn very near to the limits of the permissible.

Vybor guvernera (The Selection of a Tutor), although continuing the theme of the importance of education to the country's well-being, is rather more political than social. Politics, Fonvizin affirms, has to concern itself with questions of the freedom and the equality of citizens, the former being the more crucial. There will always be differences between various social classes and consequently inequality is inevitable, but civil liberties are to be ensured wherever possible. It is not Russia's institutions, including serfdom, which are at fault in themselves, rather the shortcomings of those who manage them. In all of his plays Fonvizin shows himself to be a man of his times, but a humane and considerate one who believed that Russia needed change but that she had enough intrinsic worth not simply to imitate others.

—A.V. Knowles

See the essay on The Minor.

FOUQUÉ, Caroline (Auguste) de la Motte

Born: Caroline von Briest, in Nennhausen, Germany, 7 October 1775(?). Family: Married 1) Friedrich Ehrenreich Adolph Ludwig von Rochow in 1789; two sons and one illegitimate daughter (marriage dissolved 1799; died [suicide] 1799); 2) the writer Friedrich de la Motte Fouqué, q.v., in 1803. Died: 21 July 1831.

PUBLICATIONS

Fiction

- Drei Märchen*. 1806.
Rodrich. 1806–07.
Die Frau des Falkensteins. 1810.
Kleine Erzählungen von der Verfasserin des Rodrich, der Frau des Falkensteins und der Briefe über weibliche Bildung. 1811.
Die Magie der Natur: Eine Revolutionsgeschichte. 1812; edited with introduction by Gerhart Hoffmeister, 1989.
Der Spanier und der Freiwillige in Paris. Eine Geschichte aus dem heiligen Kriege. 1814.
Feodora. 1814.
Edmunds Wege und Irrwege. Ein Roman aus der nächsten Vergangenheit. 1815.
Das Heldenmädchen aus der Vendée. 1816.
Neue Erzählungen. 1817. Includes “Die Verwünschung”; as “The Curse: A Tale”, translated by N. Stenhouse, 1825.
Die früheste Geschichte der Welt: Ein Geschenk für Kinder. 1818.
Frauenliebe. 1818.
Blumenstrauß gewunden aus den neusten Romanen und Erzählungen, with Friedrich de la Motte Fouqué. 1818.
Fragmente aus dem Leben der heutigen Welt. 1820.
Ida. 1820.
Lodoiska und ihre Tochter. 1820.
Kleine Romane und Erzählungen. 1820.
Heinrich und Marie. 1821.
Die blinde Führerin. 1821.
Vergangenheit und Gegenwart. 1822.
Die Herzogin von Montmorency. 1822.
Die Vertriebenen: Eine Novelle aus der Zeit der Königin Elisabeth von England. 1823; as The Outcasts: A Romance, translated by George Soane, 1824.
Neueste gesammelte Erzählungen. 1824.
Die beiden Freunde. 1824.
Bodo von Hohenried. 1825.
Aurelio. 1825.

- Valerie, Die Sinnesänderung, und Der Weihnachtsbaum* (stories). 1827.
Resignation. 1829.
Memoiren einer Ungenannten. 1831.
Der Schreibtisch; oder, Alte und neue Zeit. 1833.
The Physician of Marseilles, The Revolutionists: Four Tales from the German. 1845.

Other

- Briefe über Zweck und Richtung weiblicher Bildung*. 1811.
Briefe über die griechische Mythologie für Frauen. 1812.
Ruf an die deutschen Frauen. 1812.
Über deutsche Geselligkeit, in Antwort auf das Urtheil der Frau von Staël. 1814.
Briefe über Berlin im Winter 1821. 1822.
Reiseerinnerungen, with Friedrich de la Motte Fouqué. 1823.
Die Frauen in der grossen Welt: Bildungsbuch beim Eintritt in das gesellige Leben. 1826.
Geschichte der Moden, vom Jahre 1785 bis 1829, als Beitrag zur Geschichte der Zeit. 1830.
 Editor, with others, Für müssige Stunden: Vierteljahrsschrift. 7 vols., 1816–21; reprinted 1971.

*

Critical Studies: Märchen-Dichtung der Romantiker by Richard Benz, 1926; Caroline de la Motte Fouqué by Vera Prill, 1933; The Romantic Realist: Caroline de la Motte Fouqué by Jean T. Wilde, 1955.

* * *

Caroline de la Motte Fouqué was a writer of some significance in the literary, cultural, and social history of Germany. For a number of years she and her husband, Friedrich, were the country’s most successful literary couple, and her works were praised by major writers such as Goethe and Kleist. Yet she has been even more neglected than her husband, and the few references to her in critical literature tend to be derogatory.

Her career spans the quarter century from the defeat of Prussia by Napoleon in 1806 to her death eight months before that of Goethe. During this period of political and social upheaval she published more than 100 works, including 20 novels, over 60 stories, a number of poems and reviews, and some 20 non-fiction pieces of didactic, social, and cultural import aimed primarily at women. Besides pursuing her own career she collaborated in her husband’s editorial ventures and co-authored with him two volumes of Reiseerinnerungen [Travel Reminiscences].

The range and quantity of Fouqué’s output testify not only to the diversity of her interests and her facility in writing, but also to her need to earn money, which became acute when her husband’s popularity waned after 1815. Although acquainted with most of the important writers of the day and admitted to the highest court circles in Prussia, she was under financial pressures, as reflected in the concessions to popular taste, the prolixity, and the uneven quality of much of her work. Deeply conservative in outlook, with a strong belief in monarchy, aristocracy, religion, family honour, and the military ethos, she yet experienced, like many women of her time, marital breakdown and the birth of an illegitimate child. She was, too, an educated professional writer in a society which discouraged the serious pursuit of art or scholarship by women. These contradictions, characteristic of an age of transition, are mirrored in her writing through the strategies that she adopts in order to cope with them and to make her work acceptable to the reading public, and through the tension between Romantic and realistic features in her style.

Several of her earliest works, two anonymous poems and the collection Drei Märchen [Three Fairy Tales], show the influence of Romantic models, particularly Novalis and Tieck. However, her first novel, Rodrich, already displays the mixture of Romanticism and realism which characterizes her later work. It includes Romantic motifs such as verse interpolations, visions, dreams, symbolism, and a mystery concerning the hero's birth and ancestry, as well as realistic descriptions, social criticism, and discussions between characters on various topics. It probably influenced E.T.A. Hoffmann's novel Die Elixire des Teufels (The Devil's Elixirs, 1815–16).

Fouqué's second novel, Die Frau des Falkensteins [The Lady of Castle Falkenstein], is a tale of passion and renunciation with autobiographical overtones, and a number of the characters are based on Fouqué's acquaintances. It has many of the trappings of the Gothic novel—an old castle, a family curse, an ancestral ghost, a mysterious portrait, dreams, premonitions, and forebodings—which appear repeatedly in her work, but it also emphasizes the importance of self-restraint, convention, and useful, settled activity. These concerns suggest the influence of Goethe but also show Fouqué seeking fictional solutions to problems of her own. Several of her other novels and stories, such as Feodora, Frauenliebe [A Woman's Love], Ida, Lodoiska und ihre Tochter [Lodoiska and Her Daughter], and "Arnold und Marie" (1811), which, exceptionally for Fouqué, is set wholly in a non-aristocratic milieu, likewise deal with marriage and relationships between the sexes.

Fouqué's conviction that traditional forms must be preserved is expressed in "Das Fräulein vom Thurme" [The Girl in the Tower] (1811), a cautionary tale about the dangers of marrying below one's station, and Die Magie der Natur [The Magic of Nature], which is set against the background of the French Revolution and carries an anti-revolutionary message as well as a warning not to meddle in the mysteries of the universe. This novel may have been influenced by Goethe's Elective Affinities; he certainly read and approved of it. Its concern with the dangers of unfettered scientific enquiry is characteristic of its time (compare Mary Shelley's Frankenstein, 1818). Das Heldenmädchen aus der Vendée [The Heroic Girl of the Vendée Nobility], one of Fouqué's best historical novels, is again set in revolutionary France. Based on the memoirs of the Marquise de la Rochejaquelein (1814), it concerns the Vendean Wars of 1793–96, and interweaves fact and fiction, events in the Vendée and in Paris, to create a vivid picture of opposing forces during a controversial episode of French history. Fouqué's idealization of the Vendéans stands in striking contrast to their denigration in official French historiography.

English history of the Elizabethan era provides the background to Die Vertriebenen (The Outcasts), which was influenced by Sir Walter Scott. Here, as in Das Heldenmädchen and Die Herzogin von Montmorency [The Duchess of Montmorency], which recounts the Massacre of St. Bartholomew, Fouqué shows a particular flair for character drawing and vivid description, especially of crowd scenes. Other strengths of her writing are her depiction of nature and gift for detail, often of a domestic or everyday kind.

Her capacity for observation is also evident in her nonfiction works, in which she comments on and seeks to influence the society of her time. While conforming to contemporary prejudice in warning women against scholarly and artistic virtuosity, she pursues her own ambitions as writer and guide on women's education, etiquette, mythology, history, social events, and cultural phenomena. Whereas her earlier pieces are strongly patriotic, her later work is marked by increasing disillusionment. Yet her Geschichte der Moden, vom Jahre 1785 bis 1829, als Beitrag zur Geschichte der Zeit [History of Fashion, from 1785 to 1829, as a Contribution to the History of the Age] shows originality in its insight that changes in fashions reflect intellectual and social changes, and suggests unfulfilled potential that, in an age less restrictive of women, might have come to more complete fruition.

—Judith Purver

FOUQUÉ, Friedrich (Heinrich Karl, Baron) de la Motte

Born: Brandenburg, Germany, 12 February 1777. Education: Educated privately by A.L. Hülsen, 1788–94. Military Service: Served with the Weimar Dragoons, 1794, took part in the Rhine campaign, invalidated out, 1795; Prussian cavalry officer, 1812–13; Major. Family: Married 1) Marianne von Schubaert in 1798; 2) the writer Caroline von Briest, q.v., in 1803 (died 1831); 3) Albertine Tode in 1833, two sons. Career: Visited Weimar, 1802 and met Goethe and Schiller; encouraged to proceed with career as a writer by Friedrich and August Wilhelm Schlegel, q.v.; lived in Nennhausen after 1803. Editor, Taschenbuch, 1809; Die Jahreszeiten, 1811–14; Die Musen, 1812–14; Das Frauentaschenbuch, 1815–21; Für müßige Stunden, 1816–20; Berlinische Blätter für deutsche Frauen, 1829–30; gave private lectures in history and poetry, Halle, 1840; co-editor, Zeitung für den deutschen Adel, Berlin, 1840–42. Died: 23 January 1843.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Works. 6 vols., 1845–46.

Geistliche Gedichte, edited by Albertine de la Motte Fouqué. 1846.

Werke, edited by Walther Ziesemer. 3 vols., 1908.

Werke, edited by C.G. von Maassen. 2 vols., 1922.

Fiction

Alwin. 1807.

Das Galgenmännlein. 1810; as "The Bottle-Imp," in Popular Tales and Romances of the Northern Nations, 1, 1823; as "The Vial-Genie and Mad Farthing," translated by Thomas Tracy, in Miniature Romances from the German, 1841.

Der Todesbund. 1811.

Undine. 1811; as Undine, translated by George Soane, 1818; also translated by Thomas Tracy, 1839; C.L. Lyttleton, 1845; Fanny Elizabeth Bunnnett, 1867; Edmund Gosse, 1896; Abby L. Alger, 1897; George P. Upton, 1908; Paul Turner, 1960.

- Sintram und seine Gefährten*. 1811; as Sintram and His Companions, translated by Julius C. Hare, 1820; also translated by J. Burns, 1848; A.M. Richards, 1900; A.C. Farquharson, 1908.
- Der Zauberring*. 1812; as The Magic Ring; or, Ingratitude Punished, 1812; as The Magic Ring: A Knightly Romance, translated by Alexander Platt, 1846.
- Die beiden Hauptleute*. 1812; as The Two Captains, 1846; in Undine and Other Tales, translated by Fanny Elizabeth Bunnett, 1867.
- Erzählungen*. 1812.
- Aslaugas Ritter und Alpha und Jucunde*. 1813; "Aslaugas Ritter" translated as "Aslauga's Knight," in German Romance: Specimens of Its Chief Authors, by Thomas Carlyle, 1827.
- Neue Erzählungen*. 1814.
- Kleine Romane und Erzählungen*. 6 vols., 1814–19.
- Die Fahrten Thiodolfs des Isländers*. 1815; as Thiodolf, the Icelander, 1845.
- Sängerliebe: Eine provenzalische Sage in drei Büchern*. 1816; as Minstrel-Love, translated by George Soane, 1821.
- Reidmar und Diona*. 1816.
- Kindermärchen*, with Karl Wilhelm Contessa and E.T.A. Hoffmann. 1817.
- Die wunderbaren Begebenheiten des Grafen Alethes von Lindenstein*. 1817.
- Blumenstrauss: Gewunden aus den neusten Romanen und Erzählungen* (stories), with Caroline de la Motte Fouqué. 1818.
- Altsächsischer Bildersaal* (stories). 1818–20.
- Der Verfolgte*. 1821.
- Ritter Elidouc: Eine albtretannische Sage*. 1822; as Sir Elidoc: An Old Breton Legend, 1849.
- Wilde Liebe*. 1823; as Wild Love and Other Tales, 1844.
- Der Refugié; oder, Heimath und Fremde*. 1824.
- Sophie Ariele*. 1825.
- Die Saga von dem Gunlaugur, genannt Drachenzunge und Rafn dem Skalden: Eine Islandskunde des elften Jahrhunderts*. 1826.
- Erdmann und Fiammetta*. 1826.
- Mandragora*. 1827.
- Fata Morgana*. 1836.
- Der Geheimrath* (stories). 1838.
- Ausgewählte Werke. Ausgabe letzter Hand*. 12 vols., 1841.
- Abfall und Busse; oder, Die Seelenspiegel*. 1844.
- Joseph und seine Geige: Kaiser Karls V. Angriff auf Algier* (stories). 1845.
- Der Parcival*, edited by Tilman Spreckelsen. 1997.

Plays

- Dramatische Spiele*, edited by A.W. Schlegel. 1804.
- Zwei Schauspiele*. 1805.
- Die Zwerge*. 1805.
- Historie vom edlen Ritter Glamy und einer schönen Herzogin aus Bretagne*. 1806.
- Der Held des Nordens* (includes Sigurd der Schlangentödter; Sigurds Rache; Aslauga). 1810.
- Eginhard und Emma*. 1811.
- Vaterländische Schauspiele*. 1811.
- Alboin der Langobardenkönig*. 1813.
- Dramatische Dichtungen für Deutsche*. 1813.
- Die Pilgerfahrt*, edited by Franz Horn. 1816.

- Arien und Gesänge der Zauber-Oper genannt: Undine*, music by E.T.A. Hoffmann. 1816.
- Liebesrache*. 1817.
- Die zwei Brüder*. 1817.
- Heldenspiel*. 1818.
- Herrmann*. 1818.
- Hieronymus von Stauf*. 1819.
- Der Leibeigene*. 1820.
- Don Carlos, Infant von Spanien*. 1823.
- Der Sängerkrieg auf der Wartburg*. 1828.
- Mortiz Gottlieb Saphir und Berlin*, with Willibald Alexis. 1828.
- Der Jarl der Orkney-Inseln*. 1829.
- Der Pappenheimer Kürassier: Scenen aus der Zeit des dreissigjährigen Krieges*. 1842.
- Violante*. 1845.

Verse

- Romanzen vom Thale Ronceval*. 1805.
- Gedichte vor und während dem Kriege 1813*. 1813.
- Corona: Ein Rittergedicht in drei Büchern*. 1814.
- Jahrbüchlein Deutscher Gedichte auf 1815*, with others. 1815.
- Tassilo: Vorspiel*, music by E.T.A. Hoffmann. 1815.
- Karls des Grossen Geburt und Jugendjahre: Ein Ritterlied*, edited by Franz Horn. 1816.
- Gedichte*. 5 vols., 1816–27.
- Jäger und Jägerlieder*. 1818.
- Romantische Dichtungen*, with others. 1818.
- Bertrand du Guesclin*. 1821.
- Feierlieder eines Preussen im Herbste 1823*. 1823.
- Geistliche Lieder: Erstes Bändchen. Missions-Lieder*. 1823.
- Erhörung: Sechs Psalme*. 1827.
- Christlicher Leiderschatz zur Erbauung von Jung und Alt*, edited by Albertine de la Motte Fouqué. 1862.

Other

- Gespräch zweier Preussischen. Edelleute über dem Odel*. 1808.
- Über den sogenannten falschen Waldemar*. 1811.
- An Christian Grafen zu Stolberg* (letter). 1815.
- Auch ein Wort über die neueste Zeit: Nebst einigen Beilagen* (essay). 1815.
- Abendunterhaltungen zu gemüthlicher Erheiterung des Geistes*, with others. 1817.
- Der Mord Augusts von Kotzebue: Freundes Ruf an Deutschlands Jugend*. 1819.
- Etwas über den deutschen Adel, über Rittersinn und Militärehre in Briefen* (essays), with Friedrich Perthes. 1819.
- Gefühle, Bilder und Ansichten: Sammlung kleiner prosaischer Schriften*. 1819.
- Wahrheit und Lüge* (essays). 1820.
- Betrachtungen über Türken, Griechen und Türkenkrieg* (essays). 1822.
- Reise Erinnerungen*, with Caroline de la Motte Fouqué. 1823.
- Die Fahrt in die neue Welt with Das Grab der Mutter*, by Alexis dem Wanderer. 1824.
- Lebensbeschreibung des königlich preussischen Generals der Infanterie Heinrich August Baron de la Motte Fouqué: Verfasst von Seinem Enkel* (biography). 1824.

- Geschichte der Jungfrau von Orleans, nach authentischen Urkunden und dem französischen Werke des Herrn Le Brun de Charmettes.* 2 vols., 1826.
- Ernst Friedrich Wilhelm Philipp von Rüchel, Königlich Preussischer General Infanterie (biography). 1828.
- Der Mensch des Südens und der Mensch des Nordens: Sendschreiben in Bezug auf das gleichnamige Werk des Herrn von Bonstettin an den Freiherrn Alexander von Humboldt.* 1829.
- Jakob Böhme (biography). 1831.
- Sendschreiben an den Verfasser der Betrachtungen über die neuesten Begebenheiten in Deutschland* (essay). 1831.
- Von der Liebes-Lehre* (essay). 1837.
- Goethe und einer seiner Bewunderer: Ein Stück Lebensgeschichte* (essay). 1840.
- Lebensgeschichte* (autobiography). 1840.
- Preussische Trauersprüche und Huldigungsgrüsse für das Jahr 1840.* 1840.
- Ausgewählte Werke: Ausgabe letzter Hand.* 12 vols., 1841–73.
- Denkschrift über Friedrich Wilhelm III, König von Preussen: Eine biographische Mittheilung.* 1842.
- Novellen-Mappe*, with others. 1843.
- Briefe an Friedrich Baron de la Motte Fouqué von Chamisso, Cherzy, Collin, u.a.*, edited by Albertine de la Motte Fouqué. 1848.
- Stories by Musäus and Fouqué*, translated by Thomas Carlyle, 1991.
- Editor, with Wilhelm Neumann, Die Musen: Eine norddeutsche Zeitschrift. 3 vols., 1812–14.
- Editor, Peter Schlemihl's wundersame Geschichte, by Adelbert von Chamisso. 1814.
- Editor, Thomas Aniella, by August Fresenius. 3 vols., 1817.
- Editor, Hinterlassene Schriften: Erster Band, by August Fresenius. 1818.
- Editor, with Friedrich Laun, Aus der Geisterwelt: Geschichten, Sagen und Dichtungen. 2 vols., 1818.
- Editor, with L. von Alvensleben, Zeitung für den deutschen Adel. 3 vols., 1840–42.
- Translator, Numancia, by Cervantes. 1810.
- Translator, Lalla Rukh; oder, Die mongolische Prinzessin, by Thomas Moore. 1822.
- Translator, Pique-Dame: Berichte aus dem Irrenhause, in Briefen. Nach dem Schwedischen. 1825.
- Translator, with others, Der fünfte May: Ode auf Napoleons Tod, by Alessandro Manzoni. 1828.
- Translator, Drei Erzählungen: Aus dem Dänischen, by Bernhard Severin Ingemann. 1837.
- Translator, Bilderbuch ohne Bilder: Aus dem Dänischen. 1842.

*

Critical Studies: “Sich in die Poesie zu flüchten, wie in unantastbare Eilande der Seeligen”: Analysen zu ausgewählten Romanen von Friedrich Baron de La Motte Fouqué by Katja Diegmann-Hornig, 1999; Das dramatische Werk Friedrich de la Motte Fouqué: Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte des romantischen Dramas by Claudia Stockinger, 2000.

* * *

Friedrich Baron de la Motte Fouqué was one of the most prolific and widely-read writers of his time, as well as being one of the first members of the German Romantic movement to be translated into English. He experimented with a wide variety of literary forms, including verse dramas, novels, stories, fairytales, and lyric poetry, and he was also influential as an editor of literary periodicals, encouraging a number of younger writers. Today, however, with the exception of Undine, the tale of the water nymph who gains a human soul, his work has fallen into almost total popular and critical neglect and in most surveys of the period is either overlooked completely or else dismissed as trivial. Although such a fall from grace was to a large extent prefigured towards the end of his own life, conjecture as to the reasons for it have not always been well-informed, and a critical reevaluation of his work is long overdue.

One of the most striking features of Fouqué's dramatic and narrative oeuvre is his use of various mythological sources. These he manipulates to form a pseudo-medieval fairytale world, which serves as a physical and symbolic setting for the exploits of his heroic protagonists. This can be seen as early as 1810 in his dramatic trilogy Der Held des Nordens [The Hero of the North]. Fouqué draws not only on Germanic legend, but also, for example, on Norse mythology and the writings of the 16th-century physician and alchemist Paracelsus, as well as adding inventions of his own. The result is an apparently chaotic and deliberately artificial network of real and supernatural elements, covering a geographical area from Scandinavia in the north to Normandy in the west and Italy and Spain in the south. Central to this network are the motifs of the forest and the valley, which symbolize chaos and confusion and which typically provide the scene for the crucial testing of the hero in his physical and spiritual quest. The titular hero of the story Sintram und seine Gefährten (Sintram and His Companions), to take one example, must undertake a solitary horseback ride through the Valley of Death before he can achieve the ultimate status of the true Christian knight.

Fouqué's heroes in fact present something of a problem to the modern reader. They seem idealized, one-dimensional figures, most of them almost indistinguishable from each other, and Joseph von Eichendorff was not the only contemporary of Fouqué to claim that they represented a somewhat naive projection of the author's own self-image. What is interesting, however, about Fouqué's heroes is that nearly all of them are characterized by a dichotomy between the terrestrial and the spiritual, as represented in the figures of the knight and the poet. The novels in particular tend accordingly to follow a pattern of alternation between narrative sections, in which the protagonist's heroic deeds and supernatural encounters are described, and more lyrical passages, often featuring interpolated verse, in which the hero, in repose, discovers a wider, more spiritual perspective for his exploits. The ideal of Christian knighthood to which Fouqué's heroes aspire is presented as a conflict, which can only be resolved if the hero succeeds in overcoming the series of barriers which strew his path.

The charges most frequently levelled at Fouqué are that his reliance on mythological and supernatural elements represents a form of literary escapism, a retreat from social and political realities at a time when Europe was struggling to come to terms with the upheavals of the Napoleonic Wars, and that his persistence with allegedly trivial forms, such as the Ritterroman (the novel with the knight as hero) led to staleness and repetition. What such judgements largely ignore is the artificiality with which the mythological/supernatural network is constructed and the degree of manipulation with which Fouqué exploits popular forms, especially in his prose fiction. The narrative framework of much of Fouqué's best work is consciously stylized, and the reader is quite deliberately distanced from events by a fragmentary form of narration and an often quite dazzling array of perspectives: in the novel Alwin, for example, events from the hero's past are presented in the form of an overheard dream narrative; in Sintram the crucial links between the various episodes are withheld from the reader by means of a complicated framework of inner narratives and tableaux; and the narrators of most of the novels are not only omniscient but also highly visible figures, whose rare but crucial interjections exist on a temporal plane clearly separate from the plots.

The distance created between reader and text by such devices is the key to an understanding of Fouqué's work and its purpose. The chaos which reigns in the forest and the valley does not in fact reflect a retreat from reality: rather it acts as a mirror of the social and political unrest prevailing in early 19th-century Europe, and Fouqué's narrator steps back from such confusion not as a means of escape, but in an attempt to make sense of it from a clearer perspective. Fouqué is in fact revealed as a highly moral and didactic writer, and his appeal to a wide public deserves to be seen in this context. His basic response to the political upheaval of the Napoleonic Wars was an appeal to national pride and a firm conviction that Christianity alone could restore unity to Europe. Nowhere is this belief more clearly illustrated than in the final tableau of the novel Der Zauberring (The Magic Ring), where the heathen symbol of the ring itself is shattered and replaced by an idealized picture of family unity and Christian harmony. The ideal of Christian knighthood at the centre of Fouqué's philosophy may hark back to a bygone era, the goldene Zeit (golden age) beloved of so many German Romantics, but for Fouqué it had a definite contemporary relevance.

Friedrich Baron de la Motte Fouqué deserves to be remembered as more than merely a trivial figure in the German Romantic movement, who happened to achieve mass popularity through his vast output of work. Closer examination reveals not only a master of narrative, but also an author with a serious didactic purpose, much more responsive to the spirit of his times than is generally supposed.

—Howard Atkinson

FOURNIER, Henri Alban

See ALAIN-FOURNIER

FRANCE, Anatole

Born: Jacques-Anatole-François Thibault in Paris, France, 16 April 1844. Education: Educated at the Collège Stanislas. Family: Married 1) Marie-Valérie Guérin de Sauville in 1877 (divorced 1893), one daughter; 2) Emma Laprevotte in 1920. Career: Assistant at his father's bookshop, Librairie de France, Paris, 1860s; editorial assistant, Bachelin-Deflorenne, publishers, Paris, mid-1860s; schoolteacher, Ivry-sur-Seine, 1869; reader and editor, Lemerre, publishers, 1869–75; librarian, Senate library, Paris, 1876–90; regular contributor to Le Globe and L'Univers illustré; literary editor, Le Temps, 1888; associated with Mme. Armand de Caillavet. Awards: Académie française award, 1881; Nobel prize for literature, 1921. Chevalier, Légion d'honneur, 1884. Honorary degree: University of Athens, 1919. Member: Académie française, 1897. Died: 12 October 1924.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Complete Works, edited by Frederic Chapman. 21 vols., 1908–28.
Oeuvres complètes, edited by Léon Carias and Gérard Le Prat. 26 vols., 1925–37.
Oeuvres complètes. 1968–70.
Works. 40 vols., 1975.
Oeuvres, edited by Marie-Claire Bancquart. 2 vols., 1984–87.

Fiction

Jocaste et le chat maigre. 1879; as Jocasta and the Famished Cat, translated by Agnes Farley, 1912.
Le Stratagème. 1880.
Le Crime de Sylvestre Bonnard, membre de l'Institut. 1881; revised edition, 1902; edited by R.L. Graeme Ritchie, 1927; as The Crime of Sylvestre Bonnard, Member of the Institute, translated by Lafcadio Hearn, 1890; also translated by Arabella Ward, 1897.
Les Désirs de Jean Servien. 1882; as The Aspirations of Jean Servien, translated by Alfred Allinson, 1912.
Abeille: Contes (stories). 1883; as Honey-Bee, translated by Mrs John Lane, 1911; as Bee: The Princess of the Dwarves, translated by Peter Wright, 1912.
Le Livre de mon ami. 1885; edited by J. Heywood Thomas, 1942; as My Friend's Book, translated by J. Lewis May, 1913; also translated by Rosalie Feltenstein, 1950.
Nos Enfants: Scènes de la ville et des champs (stories). 1887; in 2 vols., 1900; as Child Life in Town and Country, translated by Alfred Allinson, with The Merrie Tales of Jacques Tournebroche, 1910; as Girls and Boys: Scenes from the Country and the Town, 2 vols., 1913, and as Our Children: Scenes from the Country and the Town, 2 vols., 1917, both translated by Allinson; as In All France: Children in Town and Country, translated by A.G. Wippert, 1930.
Balthasar (stories, includes Abeille). 1889; as Balthasar, translated by Mrs. John Lane, 1909.
Thaïs. 1890; revised edition, 1928; as Thaïs; or, The Vengeance of Venus, translated by Ernest DeLancey Pierson, 1892; as Thaïs, translated by A.D. Hall, 1891; also translated by Ernest Tristan, 1902; as Thaïs or The Monk's Temptation, translated by Robert B. Douglas, 1909; also translated by Basia Gulati, 1976.
L'Étui de nacre (stories). 1892; as Tales from a Mother-of-Pearl Casket, translated by Henri Pène du Bois, 1896; as Mother of Pearl, translated by Frederic Chapman, 1908.
La Rôtisserie de la Reine Pédauque. 1893; as The Queen Pédauque, translated by Joseph A.V. Stritzko, 1910; as At the Sign of the Reine Pédauque, translated by Mrs Wilfrid Jackson, 1912; as At the Sign of the Queen Pédauque, 1933; as The Romance of the Queen Pédauque, translated by Jackson, 1950.
Le Lys rouge. 1894; as The Red Lily, translated by Winifred Stevens, 1908.
Le Puits de sainte Claire. 1895, as The Well of Saint Claire, translated by Alfred Allinson, 1909.
Histoire contemporaine. 4 vols., 1897–1901.

L'Orme du mail. 1897; as The Elm-Tree on the Mall: A Chronicle of Our Own Times, translated by M.P. Willcocks, 1910.

Le Mannequin d'osier. 1897; as The Wicker-Work Woman: A Chronicle of Our Own Times, translated by M.P. Willcocks, 1910.

L'Anneau d'améthyste. 1899; as The Amethyst Ring, translated by B. Drillien, 1919.

Monsieur Bergeret à Paris. 1901; as Monsieur Bergeret in Paris, translated by B. Drillien, 1921.

La Leçon bien apprise. 1898.

Pierre Nozière. 1899; as Pierre Nozière, translated by J. Lewis May, 1916.

Clio. 1900; as Clio, translated by Winifred Stephens, 1922.

L'Affaire Crainquebille. 1901; revised edition as Crainquebille, Putois, Riquet, et plusieurs autres récits profitables, 1904; as Crainquebille, Putois, Riquet, and Other Profitable Tales, translated by Winifred Stephens, 1915; as Crainquebille, translated by Jacques Le Clerq, 1949.

Histoire de Dona Maria d'Avala et de Don Fabricio, duc d'Andria. 1902.

Mémoires d'un volontaire (selection). 1902.

Histoire Comique. 1903; as A Mummer's Tale, translated by Charles E. Roche, 1921.

Sur la pierre blanche. 1903; as The White Stone, translated by Charles E. Roche, 1910.

Les Contes de Jacques Tournebroche. 1908; as The Merry Tales of Jacques Tournebroche, translated by Alfred Allinson, 1910.

L'Île des pingouins. 1908; as Penguin Island, translated by A.W. Evans, 1909; also translated by Belle Notkin Burke, 1968.

Les Sept Femmes de la Barbe-Bleue et autres contes merveilleux. 1909; as The Seven Wives of Bluebeard and Other Marvellous Tales, translated by D.B. Stewart, 1920.

Les Dieux ont soif. 1912; as The Gods Are Thirsty, translated by Alfred Allinson, 1913; also translated by Mrs. Wilfrid Jackson, 1925; Alec Brown, 1951; Linda Frey, Marsh Frey, and Roman Zylawy, 1978; as The Gods Will Have Blood, translated by Frederick Davies, 1979.

Les Anges. 1913; revised edition as La Révolte des anges, 1914; as The Revolt of the Angels, translated by Mrs. Wilfrid Jackson, 1914.

Amycus et Célestin. 1916.

Le Petit Pierre. 1918; edited by Isabelle H. Clarke, 1925; as Little Pierre, translated by J. Lewis May, 1920.

Marguerite. 1920; as Marguerite, translated by J. Lewis May, 1921; with Alfred de Vigny and The Path of Glory, 1927.

Le Comte Morin, député. 1921; as Count Morin, Deputy, translated by J. Lewis May, 1921; with Alfred de Vigny and The Path of Glory, 1927.

La Vie en fleur. 1922; as The Bloom of Life, translated by J. Lewis May, 1923.

Contes, edited by C.J.M. Adie and P.C.H. de Satgé. 1923.

Little Sea Dogs (selection), translated by Alfred Allinson and J. Lewis May. 1925.

Les Autels de la peur. 1926.

Golden Tales, translated anonymously. 1926.

Le Jongleur de Notre-Dame and Other Stories, translated by Margaret Weale. 1948.

Verse

Les Poèmes dorés. 1873.

Les Noces corinthiennes. 1876; as The Bride of Corinth and Other Poems and Plays, translated by Wilfrid and Emilie Jackson, 1920.

Poésies. 1896.

Les Poèmes du souvenir. 1910.

Plays

Au Petit bonheur (produced 1898). 1898.

Le Lys rouge, with Gaston de Caillavet, from his own novel (produced 1899). In Oeuvres complètes, 1970.

Les Noces corinthiennes (produced 1902). 1876.

Crainquebille, from his own story (produced 1903). 1913; as Crainquebille, translated by Barrett H. Clark, 1915; also translated by Jacques Le Clerq, 1949.

Le Mannequin d'osier, from his own novel (produced 1904). 1928.

La Comédie de celui qui épousa une femme muette (produced 1912). 1913; as The Man Who Married a Dumb Wife, translated by Curtis Hidden Page, 1915.

Other

Alfred de Vigny. 1868; revised edition, 1923.

Le Livre du bibliophile. 1874.

Les Poèmes de Jules Breton. 1875.

La Vie littéraire. 4 vols., 1888–92; as On Life and Letters, translated by A.W. Evans, D.B. Stewart, and Bernard Miall, 4 vols., 1911–14.

L'Elvire de Lamartine: Notes sur M. et Mme. Charles. 1893.

Les Opinions de M. Jérôme Coignard. 1893; as The Opinions of Jérôme Coignard, translated by Mrs. Wilfrid Jackson, 1913.

La Société historique d'Auteuil et de Passy. 1894.

Le Jardin d'Épicure. 1895; as The Garden of Epicurus, translated by Alfred Allinson, 1908.

La Liberté par l'étude. 1902.

Madame de Luzy. 1902.

Opinions sociales. 2 vols., 1902.

L'Église et la république. 1904.

Vers les temps meilleurs. 3 vols., 1906; as Vers les temps meilleurs: Trente ans de vie sociale, edited by Claude Aveline and Henriette Psichar, 3 vols., 1949–67; as The Unrisen Dawn: Speeches and Addresses, 1928.

Vie de Jeanne d'Arc. 2 vols., 1908; as The Life of Joan of Arc, translated by Winifred Stephens, 1909.

Le Génie latin (criticism). 1909; revised edition, 1917; as The Latin Genius, translated by Wilfrid Jackson, 1924.

Aux étudiants (lecture). 1910.

La Comédie de celui qui épousa une femme muette. 1912.

Sur la voie glorieuse. 1916; as The Path of Glory, translated by Alfred Allinson, 1916.

Ce que disent nos morts. 1916.

La Vie en fleur. 1922.

Epigrams of Love, Life and Laughter, edited and translated by Sylvestre Dorian. 1924.

Dernières pages inédites. 1925.

Promenades félibréennes. 1925.

Under the Rose (essays), translated by J. Lewis May. 1926.

Prefaces, Introductions, and Other Uncollected Papers, translated by J. Lewis May. 1927.

Les Dieux asiatiques aux premiers siècles de l'ère chrétienne. 1928. Rabelais, translated by Ernest Boyd. 1929.

Le Secret du "Lys rouge": Anatole France et Madame de Caillavet: lettres intimes (1888–1889), edited by Jacques Suffel. 1984.

Editor, Oeuvres de Jean Racine. 5 vols., 1874–75.

Editor, Lucile de Chateaubriand. 1889.

Editor, Les Poèmes du souvenir. 1910.

*

Critical Studies: Anatole France: The Degeneration of a Great Artist by Barry Cerf, 1927; Anatole France Abroad by Jean J. Brousson, translated by John Pollock, 1928; Anatole France and His Time: The Ironic Temper by Haakon Chevalier, 1932; Anatole France: A Life Without Illusions 1844–1924 by Jacob Axelrad, 1944; Anatole France and the Greek World by Loring B. Walton, 1950; Seven Against the Night by Paul Eldridge, 1960; Anatole France polémiste, 1962, and Anatole France: Un sceptique passionné, 1984, both by Marie-Claire Bancquart; Anatole France: The Politics of Skepticism by Carter Jefferson, 1965; Anatole France by David Tylden-Wright, 1967; Anatole France by Reino Virtanen, 1968; The Art of Anatole France by Duskan Bresky, 1969; Anatole France: The Short Stories by Murray Sachs, 1974; The Saint and the Sceptics by William Searle, 1976; "Techniques of Irony in Anatole France: Essays on 'Les Sept femmes de la Barbe-Bleue'" by Diane Wolfe Levy in North Carolina Studies in the Romance Languages and Literatures, 201, 1978; Anatole France inconnu by Edith Tendron, 1995.

* * *

Urbane, erudite and eminently civilized, Anatole France was generally considered at the turn of this century to be the foremost contemporary French novelist and man of letters. To an extent seldom found in the career of any other writer, he also represented the literary and philosophical values of a previous age.

His first full-length novel, Le Crime de Sylvestre Bonnard (The Crime of Sylvestre Bonnard) is an early example of fiction in diary form. Its hero, an elderly and artless scholar, kind-hearted and sceptical in outlook, abducts the orphaned granddaughter of the woman he had once loved from the drudgery of a menial job at her old boarding-school; he sells his beloved books to provide her with a dowry. The same theme of self-sacrifice, more convincingly presented in exotic lands and remote historical times, is central to both the short story "Balthazar" and the novel Thaïs. The former tells how Balthazar, one of the Magi, overcomes lust in order to follow the star of Bethlehem, whilst one of the other kings overcomes cruelty and the third masters his pride. Thaïs, set in 4th-century Egypt, is perhaps the most skillful of all of France's narrations. Its eponymous heroine is an Alexandrian courtesan converted to Christianity by the hermit Paphnuce, her former lover. The theme of renunciation is twofold; Paphnuce's in the first instance, though Thaïs's self-abnegation is more complete. More importantly, however, France seems to suggest that the life to which Paphnuce tries to win Thaïs back is not the work of the devil: it is a life of love and vitality which, whether God-inspired or not, is the diametrical opposite of asceticism.

The collection L'Étui de nacre (Mother of Pearl) contains two important stories, "Le Procureur de Judée" and "Le Jongleur de Notre-Dame." In the first of these Pontius Pilate recalls his time as ruler of Judaea. His friend Lamia happens to mention one Jesus of Nazareth, "a young wonder-worker from Galilee" who was crucified for some crime or other, Pilate cannot remember him! In the second the juggler Barnabé is converted to the monastic life. He is about to be expelled from the monastery chapel where he has been secretly performing a juggling act as his particular tribute to Our Lady when she descends the altar steps, pronouncing the sixth beatitude: "Blessed are the pure in heart."

In "Balthazar," Thaïs, "Le Procureur de Judée," and "Le Jongleur de Notre-Dame" the influence of Flaubert's Tentation de saint Antoine (The Temptation of Saint Anthony) and Trois Contes (Three Tales) upon France is unmistakable, France chooses themes of the Nativity, Pontius Pilate and the monastic life, treating self-abnegation with that enigmatic detachment shown by Flaubert in "Un coeur simple" ("A Simple Heart"). But the historical relativism of "Le Procureur de Judée," stupendous as it is at the narrative level, smacks a little of artifice.

La Rôtisserie de la Reine Pédauque (The Queen Pedauque) reveals France's fascination with the 18th century. Jérôme Coignard, a priest with a philosophe's outlook, is deeply respectful of religion despite his voluptuousness and moral laxity. Tournebrouche, the narrative voice in this novel, is the landlord's son at the inn regularly visited by Coignard; he becomes the Abbé's loyal pupil, even to the extent of helping him and a raffish nobleman in an abduction which results in Coignard's murder. With his unusual sceptical irony France mocks belief in the occult. Through the medium of Les Opinions de M. Jérôme Coignard (The Opinions of Jérôme Coignard), a compilation of the Abbé's thoughts produced by Tournebrouche, France also expresses sharp criticism of contemporary society.

In the Histoire contemporaine series, the hero, Lucien Bergeret, is a further embodiment of the scholar, sceptic, epicurean humanist, and keen but detached observer of daily life which France himself was. At the heart of his four-volume cycle is the Dreyfus affair; also evident is the author's growing anti-clericalism. In the third volume, L'Anneau d'améthyste (The Amethyst Ring), ecclesiastical rivalries are prominent; also portrayed are the intrigues of a provincial town. Differing greatly from Balzac, France treats the latter theme with gentle good humour.

The eponymous hero of the short novel L'Affaire Crainquebille (Crainquebille) is an elderly street trader imprisoned after conviction on a false charge of shouting abuse at the police. Unable to make a living after his release from jail, he decides he would be better off behind bars again and so, on seeing another policeman, he actually does shout abuse. But he is simply moved on. Nothing illustrates better the even-handedness of France's outlook than Crainquebille, which recognizes that there is kindness, and hence durability, in existing institutions.

Nevertheless, in consequence of the Dreyfus affair, France became increasingly committed to social change from 1900 onwards. Further scope for incisive satire was afforded by L'Île des pingouins (Penguin Island, which again dealt with the Dreyfus affair), Les Dieux ont soif (The Gods Are Athirst), and Les Anges (The Revolt of the Angels). In the second of these France returns to the 18th century, providing a broad picture of varying Revolutionary attitudes. None of these novels, however, shows much belief in that cornerstone of 18th-century thinking, the inevitability—or even the likelihood—of social progress.

The many review notices which make up La Vie littéraire (On Life and Letters) reveal a subjective critic whose role models in this genre were Taine and Sainte-Beuve: he admired their immense erudition. But although Taine prized objectivity above all things, France's philosophical relativism would not allow him to believe in the absoluteness of any judgement. For the same reason he rejected Zola's view that Naturalism was the summation of literary art.

France has too often been denigrated for the episodic nature of his plots and for his lack of imaginative power. Though he was the author of one ill-researched work—Vie de Jeanne d'Arc (The Life of Joan of Arc), extreme in its anticlericalism—his writings are remarkable for their depth of understanding and for their linguistic and philosophical clarity reminiscent of Voltaire. His qualities of euphony, wit, well-balanced scepticism, and the whimsical fantasy and discursiveness seen at their best in The Queen Pedauque were sustained at a level of near-perfection throughout his literary life.

—Donald Adamson

See the essay on The Gods Are Athirst.

FREYRE, Gilberto (de Melo)

Born: Recife, Pernambuco, Brazil, 15 March 1900. Education: Educated at American Colégio Gilreath, Recife, to 1917; Baylor University, Waco, Texas, 1918–21, BA 1921; Columbia University, New York, 1921–22, MA in anthropology 1922. Family: Married Maria Magdalena Guedes Pereira in 1941; one daughter and one son. Career: Travelled in Europe, 1922–23, and returned to Brazil, 1923; co-organizer, Regionalist Artistic Movement's Congress, Recife, 1926; private secretary to the Governor of Pernambuco, Recife, 1927–30; editor, A Província, Recife, 1928–30; assistant professor of sociology, Escola Normal, Recife, 1928; went into exile to Portugal, 1930; travelled to Africa, 1930; visiting professor, Stanford University, California, 1931; professor of sociology, Faculty of Law, Recife, 1935, and appointed to the chair of sociology and social anthropology, Federal University, 1935; visiting professor, Columbia University, New York, 1938; representative for Pernambuco, National Assembly, 1946, and in the House of Deputies, 1947–50; Brazilian Ambassador to the United Nations General Assembly, 1949; visiting professor, Indiana University, Bloomington, United States, 1966. Founder, Joaquim Nabuco Institute, Recife, 1949. Awards: Felipe d'Oliveira award, 1934; Anisfield-Wolf award, 1957; Machado de Assis prize, 1963; Aspen award, 1967; La Madonnina International literary prize (Italy), 1969; José Vasconcelos gold medal (Mexico), 1974; Moinho Santista prize, 1974. Honorary doctorates: Columbia University, 1954; University of Coimbra, 1962; University of Paris, 1965; University of Sussex, Falmer, 1965; University of Münster, 1965. KBE (Knight Commander, Order of the British Empire), 1971;

Commander, Légion d'honneur, 1986. Member: American Philosophical Association (United States); Council for the Philosophy of Law and Sociology, Paris; São Paulo Academy of Letters, 1961; Brazilian Academy of Letters, 1962; Royal Anthropological Institute; American Academy of Arts and Sciences. Died: 18 July 1987.

PUBLICATIONS

Fiction

Dona Sinhá e o filho padre. 1964; as Mother and Son, translated by Barbara Shelby, 1967.

O outro amor do Dr. Paulo. 1977.

Verse

Bahia de todos os santos e todos os pecados. 1926.

Talvez poesia. 1962.

Gilberto poeta: algumas confissões. 1980.

Poesia reunida. 1980.

Other

Casa-grande & Senzala. 1933; revised edition, 2 vols., 1943; as The Masters and the Slaves: A Study in the Development of Brazilian Civilization, translated by Samuel Putnam, 1946; revised edition, 1964.

Guia prático, histórico, e sentimental de cidade do Recife. 1934; revised edition, 1968.

Artigos de jornal. 1935.

Sobrados e mucambos. 1936; revised edition, 1961; as The Mansions and the Shanties: The Making of Modern Brazil, translated by Harriet de Onís, 1963.

Mucambos de Nordeste. 1937.

Nordeste. 1937; revised edition, 1961.

Olinda: 2º guia prático, histórico, e sentimental de cidade Brasileira. 1939; revised edition, 1968.

Açúcar. 1939; enlarged edition, 1969.

Um engenheiro francês no Brasil. 1940; revised edition, 2 vols., 1960.

O mundo que o Português criou. 1940.

Região e tradição. 1941.

Uma cultura ameaçada. 1942.

Inglese. 1942.

Problemas brasileiros de antropologia. 1943; revised edition, 1954.

Na Bahia em 1943. 1944.

Perfil de Euclides e outros perfís. 1944.

Sociologia. 2 vols., 1945; revised edition, 1962.

Brazil: An Introduction (written in English). 1945; revised edition, as New World in the Tropics: The Culture of Modern Brazil, 1959.

Inglese no Brasil. 1948.

Quase política. 1950; revised edition, 1966.

Aventura e rotina. 1953.

Um brasileiro em terras portuguesas. 1953.

Assombrações do Recife velho. 1955.

Manifesto regionalista 1926. 1955.

Sugestões para uma nova política no Brasil: a Rurbana. 1956.

Integração portuguesa nos trópicos. 1958; as Portuguese Integration in the Tropics, translated anonymously, 1961.

A propósito de frades. 1959.

A propósito de Morão, Rosa, e Pimenta. 1959.

Ordem e progresso. 2 vols., 1959; as Order and Progress: Brazil from Monarchy to Republic, edited and translated by Rod W. Horton, 1970.

Obras reunidas. 12 vols, 1959–66.

Brasis, Brasil, e Brasília. 1960; revised edition, 1968.

O Luso e o trópico. 1961; as The Portuguese and the Tropics, translated by Helen M. d'O. Matthew and F. de Mello Moser, 1961.

Vida, forma, e côr. 1962.

Homen, cultura, e trópico. 1962.

O escravo nos anúncios de jornais brasileiros do século XIX. 1963; revised and enlarged edition, 1979.

Retalhos de jornais velhos. 1964.

The Racial Factor in Contemporary Politics. 1966.

O Recife, sim! Recife, não!. 1967.

Sociologia da medicina. 1967.

Como e porque sou e não sou sociólogo. 1968.

Contribuição para uma sociologia de biografia. 2 vols., 1968.

Oliveira Lima, Don Quixote gordo. 1968.

A casa brasileira. 1971.

Nós e a Europa germânica. 1971.

Seleção para jovens de Gilberto Freyre. 1971; as The Gilberto Freyre Reader, translated by Barbara Shelby, 1974.

A condição humana e outros temas, edited by Maria Elisa Dias Collier. 1972.

Além do apenas moderno. 1973.

A presença do açúcar na formação brasileira. 1975.

Tempo morto e outros tempos: trechos de um diário de adolescência e primeira mocidade 1915–1930. 1975.

O brasileiro entre os outros hispanos. 1975.

Alhos & bugalhos. 1978.

Cartas de próprio punho sobre pessoas e coisas do Brasil e do estrangeiro, edited by Sylvio Rabello. 1978.

Prefácios desgarrados, edited by Edson Nery da Fonseca. 2 vols., 1978.

Heróis e vilões no romance brasileiro, edited by Edson Nery da Fonseca. 1979.

Livro de Nordeste, with others. 1979.

Oh de casa!. 1979.

Tempo de aprendiz (articles 1918–26), edited by José Antônio Gonsalves de Mello. 1979.

Arte, ciência, e trópico. 1980.

Pessoas, coisas e animais: ensaios. 1981.

Insurgências e ressurgências atuais: cruzamentos de sins e não num mundo em transição. 1983.

Médicos, doentes e contextos sociais. 1983.

Editor, Coleção documentos brasileiros. 161 vols., 1936–73.

Editor, Desenvolvimento brasileiro & tropico. 1985.

Translator, Vida social no Brasil nos meados do século XIX, by Waldemar Valente. 1977.

*

Bibliography: Brazilian Literature: A Research Guide by David William Foster and Walter Rela, 1990.

Critical Studies: Gilberto Freyre by Diogo de Melo Menezes, 1944; Gilberto Freyre: sua ciência, sua filosofia, sua arte by various authors, 1962; “Gilberto Freyre and José Honório Rodrigues: Old and New Horizons for Brazil” by Richard A. Mazzara, in Hispania, May 1964; “Gilberto Freyre as a Literary Figure: An Introductory Study” by Dorothy S. Loos, in Revista Hispánica Moderna, 34, 1968; Gilberto Freyre: Uma biografia intelectual by Vamireh Chacon, 1993; Guerra e paz: Casa-Grande & Senzala e a obra de Gilberto Freyre nos anos 30 by Ricardo Benzaquen de Araújo, 1994; A obra em tempos vários: Livro comemorativo dos 95 anos de nascimento de Gilberto Freyre, organized and presented by Fátima Quintas, 1999; Gilberto Freyre: Entre tradição & ruptura by Gustavo Henrique Tuna, 2000; Gilberto Freyre e a invenção do Brasil by Roberto Cavalcanti de Albuquerque, 2000; Gilberto Freyre by Maria Inês de França Roland, 2000.

* * *

Gilberto Freyre is the single most influential Brazilian intellectual of the 20th century. His extraordinary reputation is based largely upon his social history of colonial Brazil, Casa-grande & Senzala (The Masters and the Slaves), which Freyre wrote to accomplish three separate and sometimes contradictory goals: to deny the validity of 19th-century “scientific” racism, still almost universally accepted among the Brazilian elite, by endeavouring “to discriminate between the effects of purely genetic relationships and those resulting from social influences, the cultural heritage and the milieu”; to insist that Brazil was a multiracial nation, and that no Brazilian could claim to have escaped the genetic and cultural influence of the nation’s Amerindian and African populations; and to assert that his own ancestors, the plantation aristocrats and slave owners of the Northeast, had created a remarkably humane social system which encouraged both cultural fusion and sexual miscegenation between blacks and whites.

A few Brazilian intellectuals had presented some of the same ideas earlier, but their works had been ignored. Freyre succeeded because his education abroad enabled him to buttress his claims with dozens of references to North American and European theorists almost unknown in Brazil; their prestige, as foreigners, finally put to rest the ghosts of Gobineau, Haeckel, and Le Bon. Secondly, Freyre exemplified his theories with masses of detailed information about every aspect of plantation life. Moreover, because he was convinced that sex was the primary vehicle of both physical and cultural change in Brazilian society, Freyre included a great deal of very racy anecdotal material, which helped to popularize his works and his ideas. All of these theories and details were presented superbly in complex and powerful prose.

The Masters and the Slaves and Freyre’s many subsequent works—including some rather mediocre verse and two semi-autobiographical novels—have sometimes been utilized in ways he did not envision: to defend the continued existence of Portuguese colonialism in Africa, for example, or to insist that contemporary Brazil is a harmonious racial paradise entirely free of any sort of prejudice. It is also clear that Freyre sometimes contradicted himself, and that some of his judgements are the products of privilege and naivety—as in his belief that Africans were perfectly adapted for hard labour in the tropics because they, unlike Europeans, were able to sweat all over their bodies. One of Freyre’s fundamental ideas, that slavery was generally far more humane in Brazil than elsewhere in the Americas, has been vigorously attacked by a number of Brazilian and foreign scholars.

None the less, there is no doubt that the popularization of Freyre’s works has transformed the ways in which educated Brazilians think about their nation and about themselves—freeing them from a self-destructive conviction of racial and cultural inferiority and bringing about a psychological and intellectual liberation which has profoundly influenced contemporary Brazil.

—David T. Haberly

FRISCH, Max (Rudolf)

Born: Zurich, Switzerland, 15 May 1911. Education: Educated at the Kantonale Realgymnasium, Zurich, 1924–30; University of Zurich, 1930–33; Zurich Technische Hochschule (Institute of Technology), 1936–41, diploma in architecture 1941. Military Service: Served in the Swiss army, 1939–45. Family: Married 1) Gertrud Anna Constance von Meyenburg in 1942 (divorced 1959), two daughters and one son; 2) Marianne Oellers in 1968. Career: Freelance journalist from 1933; architect in Zurich, 1942–54; then full-time writer; visited Germany, France, and Italy, in 1946, Poland and Czechoslovakia in 1948, Spain in 1950; spent a year in the United States and Mexico, 1951–52; based in Rome, 1960–65. Awards: Raabe prize, 1954; Schlessner Schüller prize, for radio play, 1955; Büchner prize, 1958; Zurich prize, 1958; Veillon prize, 1958; Nordrhein-Westfalen prize, 1962; Jerusalem prize, 1965; Schiller prize (Baden-Württemberg), 1965; Schiller prize (Switzerland), 1974; German Book Trade Freedom prize, 1976; Commonwealth award, 1985; Neustadt International prize, 1986; Heine prize (Düsseldorf), 1989. Honorary doctorate: University of Marburg, 1962; Bard College, Annandale-on-Hudson, New York, 1980; City University of New York, 1982; University of Birmingham, West Midlands, 1985; University of Berlin, 1987. Member: Honorary Member, American Academy, 1974. Died: 4 April 1991.

PUBLICATIONS

Plays

Nun singen sie wieder: Versuch eines Requiems (produced 1945). 1946; as Now They Sing Again, translated by David Lommen, in Contemporary German Theatre, edited by Michael Roloff, 1972. Santa Cruz (produced 1946). 1947. Die chinesische Mauer (produced 1946). 1947; revised version, 1955; as The Chinese Wall, translated by James L. Rosenberg, 1961; as The Great Wall of China, translated by Michael Bullock, in Four Plays, 1969. Als der Krieg zu Ende war (produced 1948). 1949; as When the War Was Over, translated by James L. Rosenberg, in Three Plays, 1967. Graf Öderland (produced 1951). 1951; as Count Oederland, translated by Michael Bullock, in Three Plays, 1962. Don Juan; oder, Die Liebe zur Geometrie (produced 1953). 1953; translated as Don Juan; or, the Love of Geometry, by James L. Rosenberg, in Three Plays, 1967; also translated by Michael Bullock, in Four Plays, 1969. Rip van Winkle, from the story by Washington Irving (broadcast 1953). 1969. Biedermann und die Brandstifter (broadcast 1953; produced 1958). 1958; as The Fire Raisers, translated by Michael Bullock, in Three Plays, 1962, revised edition, 1985; as The Firebugs, translated by Mordecai Gorelik, 1963.

Die grosse Wut des Philipp Hotz (produced 1958). 1958; as The Great Rage of Philipp Hotz, translated by James L. Rosenberg, in Three Plays, 1967; as Philipp Hotz's Fury, translated by Michael Bullock, in Four Plays, 1969.

Andorra (produced 1961). 1962; translated as Andorra, by Michael Bullock, in Three Plays, 1962; also translated by Geoffrey Skelton, 1964.

Stücke. 2 vols., 1962; enlarged edition, 1972.

Three Plays (includes The Fire Raisers; Count Oederland; Andorra), translated by Michael Bullock, 1962.

Zurich Transit (televised 1966). 1966.

Biografie (produced 1968). 1967; as Biography: A Game, translated by Michael Bullock, in Four Plays, 1969.

Three Plays (includes Don Juan; or, the Love of Geometry; The Great Rage of Philipp Hotz; When the War Was Over), translated by James L. Rosenberg. 1967.

Four Plays (includes The Great Wall of China; Don Juan; or, the Love of Geometry; Philipp Hotz's Fury; Biography: A Game), translated by Michael Bullock. 1969.

Triptychon: Drei szenische Bilder (produced 1979). 1978; revised edition, 1980; as Triptych: Three Scenic Panels, translated by Geoffrey Skelton, 1981.

Radio Plays: Rip van Winkle, 1953; Biedermann und die Brandstifter, 1953.

Television Plays: Zurich Transit, 1966.

Fiction

Jürg Reinhart: Eine sommerliche Schicksalsfahrt. 1934.

Antwort aus der Stille: Eine Erzählung aus den Bergen. 1937.

J'adore ce qui me brüte; oder, Die Schwierigen. 1943.

Bin; oder, Die Reise nach Peking. 1945.

Marion und die Marionotten: Ein Fragment. 1946.

Stiller. 1954; as I'm Not Stiller, translated by Michael Bullock, 1958.

Homo Faber. 1957; as Homo Faber, translated by Michael Bullock, 1959.

Mein Name sei Gantenbein. 1964; as A Wilderness of Mirrors, translated by Michael Bullock, 1965; as Gantenbein, 1982.

Wilhelm Tell für die Schule. 1971.

Montauk. 1975; as Montauk, translated by Geoffrey Skelton, 1976.

Der Mensch erscheint im Holozän. 1979; as Man in the Holocene, translated by Geoffrey Skelton, 1980.

Blaubart. 1982; as Bluebeard, translated by Geoffrey Skelton, 1983.

Other

Blätter aus dem Brotsack (diary). 1940.

Tagebuch mit Marion (diary). 1947; revised edition, as Tagebuch 1946–1949, 1950; as Sketchbook 1946–1949, translated by Geoffrey Skelton, 1977.

Achtung: Die Schweiz. 1955.

Die neue Stadt: Beiträge zur Diskussion. 1956.

Ausgewählte Prosa. 1961.

Öffentlichkeit als Partner. 1967.

Tagebuch 1966–1971. 1972; as Sketchbook 1966–1971, translated by Geoffrey Skelton, 1974.

Dienstbüchlein (memoir). 1974.

Stich-Worte (selection), edited by Uwe Johnson. 1975.

Gesammelte Werke, edited by Hans Mayer and Walter Schmitz. 12 vols., 1976; same texts also published in 6 vols., 1976, with supplementary volume, 1987.
Kritik, Thesen, Analysen. 1977.
Erzählende Prosa 1939–1979. 1980.
Forderungen des Tages: Porträts, Skizzen, Reden, 1943–82, edited by Walter Schmitz. 1983.
Gesammelte Werke [Jubiläums Edition]. 7 vols., 1986.
Schweiz ohne Armee? Ein Palaver. 1989.
Schweiz als Heimat? Versuche über 50 Jahre, edited by Walter Obschlager. 1990.
Jetzt ist Sehenszeit: Briefe, Notate, Dokumente, 1943–1963. 1998.
Der Briefwechsel: Max Frisch, Uwe Johnson, 1964–1983, edited by Eberhard Fahlke. 1999.
Correspondence: Selections, edited by Carl Zuckmayer. 2000.

*

Critical Studies: Max Frisch by Ulrich Weisstein, 1967; The Novels of Max Frisch, 1976, and The Plays of Max Frisch, 1985, both by Michael Butler; The Dramatic Works of Max Frisch by Gertrud Bauer Pickar, 1977; Max Frisch: His Work and Its Swiss Background by Malcolm Pender, 1979; Gombrowicz and Frisch: Aspects of the Literary Diary by Alex Kurczaba, 1980; Perspectives on Max Frisch edited by Gerhard F. Probst and Jay F. Bodine, 1982; Frisch: Andorra by Michael Butler, 1985; Understanding Max Frisch by Wulf Koepke, 1990; Life as a Man: Contemporary Male-Female Relationships in the Novels of Max Frisch by Claus Reschke, 1990; Frisch und Dürrenmatt by Hans Mayer, 1992; Max Frisch Rollen-Spiele by Ulrich Ramer, 1993; Mythos der Weiblichkeit im Werke Max Frischs by Liette Bohler, 1998; Dass der Mensch allein nicht das Ganze ist!: Versuche menschlicher Zweisamkeit im Werk Max Frischs by Iris Block, 1998; Typologie des modernen Menschen im Schaffen von Max Frisch by Antoni Hodak, 1999.

* * *

Max Frisch has attained wide popularity both as a novelist and dramatist. His central theme from his very earliest works is the individual's longing to discover and realize his "true" self, but the works themselves encompass a rich variety of emphases, moods, and styles. The early novels such as Jürg Reinhart derive from the German Bildungsroman tradition (novel of development), but in the immediate post-war years Frisch began to experiment much more with genre and form. Bin; oder, Die Reise nach Peking, for example, is a whimsical, dream-like reflection on unfulfilled longing, while a drama such as Nun singen sie wieder (Now They Sing Again) uses harsh, almost surrealistic pictures to capture the conflict of self-centredness and humanitarian feeling in war. Some dramas like Santa Cruz or Graf Öderland (Count Oederland) are quasi-mythical presentations of the problem of marrying personal dream to social reality, but though Brechtian in structure they ultimately lack Brecht's intellectual clarity. Nevertheless, it is in this period that Frisch's major leitmotif emerges, the concept of "image-making"—the imposition of arbitrary, labels, social, racial, psychological, upon our fellows.

In the late 1950s and 1960s Frisch began to produce the works upon which his international reputation is really founded: Biedermann und die Brandstifter (The Fire Raisers) and Andorra, for example, have become stage classics. The former is a satirical attack upon middle-class concern for the "right image," and not just in the usual sense of keeping up appearances. Frisch shows his central characters' exploitation of others on the one hand and attempts to retain a belief in their own "decency" on the other. With sharp comic insight the play illustrates the hypocritical bourgeois desire to exercise power and yet still bask in a shared sense of common humanity, ranging from the status-conscious superficiality of "hospitality" rituals and the emptiness of "polite" discourse to the profound and dangerous gullibility that results from inability to confront self-contradiction. At this level the play has multiple political associations—variously interpreted over the years as referring to the threat of fascism or communism—since it reveals how such social hypocrisy invites destruction without unmasking its own falsity. Despite such serious overtones, however, the text remains playful throughout, trapping the audience through laughter into self-recognition. In the more immediately serious Andorra Frisch probes the destructive effects of the image we create of others as well as of ourselves—through fear, self-interest, convenience. The mistaken assumption that the central figure is Jewish is used to reveal both the selfish origins and the insidious growth of prejudice, and its disastrous physical and spiritual effects on the victim. Though not intended as a comment on the Holocaust—it is as much about "otherness" as anti-semitism—this has often been the context in which the play has been read, and thus misjudged. Its true power derives from the very ordinariness of its figures and initial events, and from the recognition—as in The Fire Raisers—that unthinking "normality," the petty weakness of everyday life, can lead to terrible consequences. Both plays have a tellingly spare, episodic structure again reminiscent of Brechtian distancing devices, but especially in the case of Andorra there is also highly emotive visual symbolism demanding something closer to the emotional involvement of traditional tragedy, yet without cathartic release. Indeed, it is the—sometimes comic, sometimes tragic—inevitability of human weakness, rather than a Brechtian view of alterable social structures, that shape the pointed stage effects in both texts.

Inventive formal structure is also the hallmark of Stiller (I'm Not Stiller), perhaps Frisch's finest work. This novel combines sheer entertainment in the constant mystery surrounding the main figure's identity, with a probing investigation into Swiss national self-images and into the deeper, personal meaning of "identity." Frisch quite logically abandons omniscient narration and allows Stiller to reflect his own complex self, a battleground between the images others would impose, those implied by modern media or inherent in language itself, and those fashioned by the self even in moments of apparent existential insight. The novel's wonderful intricacy and "unfinished" narrative structure force the reader to confront his own desire for completion, to reassess his own modes of judgment. And the same is true of Frisch's subsequent novels. Homo Faber is an attack upon the complacent belief that technology "explains" the world. The engineer Walter Faber's neat image of a calculable, controllable reality is shattered—at first by random, chance events, but increasingly by previously excluded factors such as age, emotion, and the incursion of his own unacknowledged past. His tortuous account of tragic events, for which he cannot evade personal responsibility, embodies the breakdown of his simplistic reading of the world, though the textual complexity with its Oedipal fate motifs is more contrived than in I'm Not Stiller.

Frisch's last major novel Mein Name sei Gantenbein (A Wilderness of Mirrors) again explores the essential complexity of individual personality, but in a delightfully comic interplay of multiple "experimental" identities.

Frisch's concern with modern issues also extended to the political: in his diaries and various essays he confronts Swiss myths and attitudes directly. In his later works, however, he turned increasingly to the more individual concerns such as loneliness and ageing, though again with great variety, from sophisticated comedy in the drama Biografie (Biography), through painful confession in the diary-like Montauk to sombre reflection or scurrilous wit in the short tales Der Mensch erscheint im Holozän (Man in the Holocene) and Blaubart (Bluebeard). What is perhaps most characteristic of this late phase of his writing is a profounder scepticism than ever before about the possibility of escaping either from externally imposed images or from those created by age, gender, or selfish desire.

—Mary E. Stewart

See the essays on Andorra, The Fire Raisers, and I'm Not Stiller.

FROISSART, Jean

Born: Valenciennes, Hainault c. 1337. Education: Educated in Valenciennes. Career: Travelled to England in 1361; obtained protection of Queen Philippa. Accompanied the Black Prince to Bordeaux in 1366, and the Duke of Clarence to Milan, 1368. Returned to Valenciennes in 1369, following the death of Queen Philippa. Took religious orders and became priest of Lestines, c. 1370; secretary to Wenceslas of Luxembourg, 1381–83. Travelled in Flanders and France and revisited England 1394–95. Died: Date of death is unknown.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Oeuvres, edited by Kervyn de Lettenhove. 28 vols., 1867–1870.
Poésies, edited by A. Scheler. 3 vols., 1870–72.
The Chronicles of Jean Froissart in Lord Berners' Translation, edited by Gillian and William Anderson. 1963.
Ballades et rondeaux, edited by R.S. Baudouin. 1978.
Jean Froissart: An Anthology of Narrative and Lyric Poetry, edited and translated by Kristen M. Figg with R. Barton Palmer. 2001.

Verse

Chroniques. 1350s–c. 1400; edited by S. Luce, G. Raymond, A. Mirot and L. Mirot, 13 vols., 1869–1957; also edited and abridged by G.C. Macauley, 1895; W.P. Ker, 1901–03; C.E. Mills and H.B. Mills, 1929; Georges T. Diller, 1972 and 1991; M. de Medeiros, 1988; as The Chronicles of England, France and Spain, translated by Johan Bouchier, 2 vols., 1523–25; also translated by Thomas Johnes, 2 vols., 1848; John H. Joliffe, 1967; Geoffrey Brereton, 1968.
Trois récits de Froissart, edited by Marguerite Ninet. 1902.
Honour and Arms (selection), edited by Mary Macleod. 1910.
Histoires de Froissart, edited by H. Longnon. 1931.
Voyage en Béarn, edited by A.H. Diverres. 1953.
L'Éspinette amoureuse, edited by Anthime Fourrier. 1963.
La Prison amoureuse, edited by Anthime Fourrier. 1974; as The Prison of Love, translated and edited by Laurence De Looze, 1994.
Le Joli buisson de jonece, edited by Anthime Fourrier. 1975.

The Lyric Poems of Jean Froissart, edited by Rob Roy McGregor, Jr. 1975.

“Dits” et “Débats,” edited by Anthime Fourrier. 1979.

Dit du florin, edited by Anthime Fourrier. 1979.

Le Paradis d'amour, L'Orloge amoureux, edited by P.F. Dembowski. 1986.

Fiction

Méliador, edited by A. Longnon. 1895–99.

Other

Ci sensient un trettie de morelité à s'appelle le temple donneur. 1845.

*

Critical Studies: Froissart: Chronicler and Poet by F.S. Shears, 1930; “The Geography of Britain in Froissart’s Méliador” by A.H. Diverres in Medieval Miscellany Presented to E. Vinaver edited by F. Whitehead, A.H. Diverres, and F.E. Sutcliffe, 1965; “Historians Reconsidered: Froissart” by C.T. Allmand in History Today, 16, 1966; I, John Froissart by Grant Uden, 1968; “The Concept of Advancement in the Fourteenth Century in the Chroniques of Jean Froissart” by K. McRobbie in The Canadian Journal of History, 6, 1971; Le Vocabulaire psychologique dans les Chroniques de Froissart by Jacqueline Picoche, 2 vols., 1976–84; Froissart: Historian edited by J.J.N. Palmer, 1981; Jean Froissart and His “Méliador”: Context, Craft and Sense by Peter F. Dembowski, 1983; “Froissart, Chronicler of Chivalry” by K. Fowler in History Today, 36, 1986; “Froissart’s Chroniques: Knightly Adventures and Warrior Forays” by G.T. Diller in Fifteenth-Century Studies, 12, 1987; Jean Froissart and the Fabric of History: Truth, Myth and Fiction in the Chroniques by Peter F. Ainsworth, 1990; The Short Lyric Poems of Jean Froissart: Fixed Forms and the Expression of the Courtly Ideal by Kristen Mossler Figg, 1994; Pseudo-autobiography in the Fourteenth Century: Juan Ruiz, Guillaume de Machaut, Jean Froissart, and Geoffrey Chaucer by Laurence de Looze, 1997; Froissart Across the Genres, edited by Donald Maddox and Sara Sturm-Maddox, 1998; The Evolution of Arthurian Romance: The Verse Tradition from Chrétien to Froissart by Beate Schmolke-Hasselmann, translated by Margaret and Roger Middleton, 1998.

* * *

Jean Froissart is recognized as being one of the most important and prolific authors writing in late medieval French. His passionate interest in aristocratic chivalry lent his work a truly international dimension: indeed, he can be viewed as a proto-European whose French was at that time the language of chivalry par excellence. Appointed at an early stage of his career to the household of Queen Philippa of England, he moved in august circles (his patrons included Gui de Châtillon, Wenceslas of Brabant and Albrecht of Bavaria). Although his earliest sympathies were fired by all he had learned of the impressive military triumphs of Edward III and the Black Prince, Froissart also had connections with the French and Scottish courts, and travelled extensively through England, Wales, Scotland, the Low Countries, France, and Italy. Affection for his patrons did not preclude avoidance of partiality (as he understood it). Where his work betrays bias, this is essentially chivalrous rather than “national.” His avowed aim as a conscious artist was to write of arms and love, a task he fulfilled with panache, both in his verse and in his prose.

Froissart saw himself primarily as a poet: the two extant manuscripts contain his ballades, virelais, and rondeaux together with his pastourelles and longer narrative poems, show evidence of considerable versatility and wit, and of a constant preoccupation with the aesthetic arrangement of these works within their particular manuscripts. Heavily influenced by the diction and forms of Le Roman de la rose (The Romance of the Rose), Froissart also found inspiration for themes or situations in the works of his near-contemporary Guillaume de Machaut. A further important influence was the early 14th-century Ovide moralisé (from Ovid's Metamorphoses), though Froissart was not afraid to out-ovid Ovid: some of the "Ovidian" tales in his poems are pure inventions. The longer narrative dits owe much to the allegorical diction of Jean de Meung. Their occasional sententiousness is relieved by a lightness of touch encountered, for instance, in passages where Froissart writes obliquely about his craft as writer, via a first-person narrator whose complexities have been analysed recently (Bennett, 1991). These often engaging poems (L'Espinette amoureuse [Love's Hawthorn], Le Joli buisson de jonece [The Gallant Bush of Youth], or the L'Orloge amoureux [Love's Timepiece/The Clockwork of Gallantry]) display an appealingly wry irony directed towards the poet-narrator, through whose adventures Froissart explores the delights and vicissitudes of love and of literary creation. Jacqueline Cerquiglini has highlighted the metaphorical valency of the images Froissart uses to delineate the activities of poetic creation and "finishing": garlands, crowns, wreaths, and boxes. The Poésies also include shorter, semi-autobiographical pieces such as the "Débat du Cheval et du Levrier" in which the poet's horse and the greyhound, returning with their master from a Scottish journey, argue about who has the harsher lot in life; or the Dit du florin, which allows us to hear the irreverent observations of Froissart's last remaining florin concerning the fate of his erstwhile fellows in the hands of a spendthrift poet-chronicler possessed of an inordinate appetite for wine and parchment. The lighthearted prosopopeia of these works affords the author a further opportunity to be ironic about his own preoccupations and obsessions, and to do so without a trace of pomposity.

Less accessible to modern readers is Froissart's self-consciously archaic Arthurian romance Méliador. Thirty-thousand lines of verse (by this time unusual for romance) relate a quest—for the hand of Hermondine, daughter of the king of Scotland. Peter Dembowski's monograph (1983) has established interesting parallels between the chivalry celebrated in Méliador, where knightly achievement is graded on an "Olympic" model ("gold, silver and bronze medallist. . .") and that delineated by the French knight Geoffrey de Charny in his Demandes and Livre Charny. The romance is also graced by a somnambulist named Camel de Camois, as by some highly-coloured Irish episodes and a journey to the Other World undertaken by the enigmatic Sagremor, episodes which one can compare with analogues in Froissart's greatest work Chroniques (The Chronicles).

Still widely read, The Chronicles were written to preserve the memory of what their author viewed as the Golden Age of Chivalry—and therefore to offer exemplary and inspirational material for young men aspiring to knighthood, however modest their background. Comprising four books, they cover the years 1325–99 in a prose deservedly famous for its graceful rhythms and stylistic vividness. Book I (first prose redaction c. 1355–78; Amiens MS: 1377–80; both possibly revised in part post 1392; final redaction, Rome MS: 1399–c. 1405) probably began as a rhymed history, but Froissart was prompted by the prose Chronicle of Jean le Bel (composed 1352–61) to eschew verse for history-writing: Froissart's first prose redaction virtually reproduces le Bel's work (an affirmation of probity rather than "plagiarism"), but the later books testify to the chronicler's developing confidence. Book II (1379–85) offers a vivid, sometimes shrewd account of political and socio-economic affairs in the troubled Low Countries, together with what many British readers will quickly recognize as the chronicler's lively account of the Peasants' Revolt of 1381. Modern historians have rightly drawn attention to the pitfalls of this kind of narrative history, which rarely uses sources as we understand them. Yet The Chronicles are not devoid of critical perspective or judgement, despite their markedly aristocratic viewpoint. In any case, it is profitable to read them as commemorative, moral chronicles, while recognizing in them (particularly in Books III and IV) an increasing disparity between the writer's avowed aims and the result—reflected in a correspondingly greater tonal and formal variety. Book III (1390–91, revised post 1392) places the chronicler centerstage, as protagonist—offering us an enthralling narrative (travelogue, diary, memoir, chronicle. . .) which is essentially "about" being a writer, while Book IV (1392–c. 1400) contains episodes that stand on their own as virtual novellas. Of most interest to the modern reader, finally, are the different editorial recensions of Book I: for here we engage with the hesitations, doubts, and revisions of the author.

—Peter F. Ainsworth

FUENTES, Carlos

Born: Panama City, Panama, 11 November 1928. Lived in the United States (1934–40), Chile, and Argentina; moved to Mexico at age 16. Education: Educated at schools in New York, Mexico, and Chile; Colegio Frances Morelos, Mexico City, 1946–48, LL.B. 1948; graduate work in law at the National Autonomous University, Mexico City, 1950, and Institut des Hautes Études Internationales, Geneva, 1950–52. Family: Married 1) Rita Macedo in 1959 (divorced 1966), one daughter; 2) Sylvia Lemus in 1973, one son and one daughter. Career: Member, then secretary, Mexican delegation, International Labor Organization, Geneva, 1950–52; assistant chief of press section, Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Mexico City, 1954; press secretary, United Nations Information Center, Mexico City, 1954; co-founder and editor, Revista Mexicana de Literatura, 1954–58; secretary, then assistant director of Cultural Department, National Autonomous University, Mexico City, 1955–56; head of department of cultural relations, Ministry of Foreign Affairs, 1957–59; editor, El Espectador, 1959–61, Siempre and Política from 1960; lived in Europe during much of the 1960s; Mexican Ambassador to France, 1974–77. Fellow, Woodrow Wilson Center, Smithsonian Institute, Washington, DC, 1974; Virginia Gildersleeve visiting professor, Barnard College, New York, 1977; Norman Maccoll lecturer, 1977, and Simón Bolívar professor of Latin American studies, 1986–87, University of Cambridge; Henry L. Tinker lecturer, Columbia University, New York, 1978; professor of English, University of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia, 1978–83; fellow of humanities, Princeton University, New Jersey; professor of comparative literature, 1984–86, and Robert F. Kennedy professor of Latin American studies, since 1987, Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts. President, Modern Humanities Research Association, since 1989. Lives in Mexico City and London. Awards: Mexican Writers Center fellowship, 1956; Seix-Barral Biblioteca Breve prize, 1967; Xavier Villaurrutia prize, 1975; Rómulo Gallegos prize (Venezuela), 1977; Alfonso Reyes prize, 1979; Mexican National prize for literature, 1984; Cervantes prize, 1987; Rubén Darío prize, 1988; Instituto Italo-Latino Americano prize, 1988; New York City National Arts Club Medal of Honor, 1988; Order of Cultural Independence (Nicaragua), 1988; IUA prize, 1989; Prince of Asturias prize (Spain), 1994. D.Litt.: Wesleyan University, Middletown, Connecticut, 1982; University of Cambridge, 1987; D.Univ.: University of Essex, Colchester, England, 1987; LL.D.: Harvard University; other honorary doctorates: Columbia College, Chicago State University, Washington University (St. Louis). Member: El Colegio Nacional, since 1974; American Academy and Institute of Arts and Letters, 1986.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

The Writings of Carlos Fuentes, edited by Raymond L. Williams, 1996.

Fiction

Los días enmascarados (stories). 1954.
La región más transparente. 1958; as Where the Air Is Clear, translated by Sam Hileman, 1960.
Las buenas conciencias. 1959; as The Good Conscience, translated by Sam Hileman, 1961.
La muerte de Artemio Cruz. 1962; as The Death of Artemio Cruz, translated by Sam Hileman, 1964; also translated by Alfred MacAdam, 1991.
Aura. 1962; as Aura, translated by Lysander Kemp, 1965.
Cantar de ciegos (stories). 1964.
Zona sagrada. 1967; as Holy Places, translated by Suzanne Jill Levine, in Triple Cross, 1972.
Cambio de piel. 1967; as A Change of Skin, translated by Sam Hileman, 1968.
Cumpleaños. 1969.
Chac Mool y otros cuentos. 1973.
Terra Nostra. 1975; as Terra Nostra, translated by Margaret Sayers Peden, 1976.
La cabeza de la hidra. 1978; as The Hydra Head, translated by Margaret Sayers Peden, 1978.
Una familia lejana. 1980; as Distant Relations, translated by Margaret Sayers Peden, 1982.
Agua quemada. 1981; as Burnt Water, translated by Margaret Sayers Peden, 1981; as Agua quemada: Cuarteto narrativo, edited with introduction and notes by Steven Boldy, 1995.
El gringo viejo. 1985; as The Old Gringo, translated by Margaret Sayers Peden, 1985.
Cristóbal nonato. 1987; as Christopher Unborn, translated by Fuentes and Alfred MacAdam, 1989.
Constancia, y otras novelas para vírgenes. 1989; as Constancia and Other Stories for Virgins, translated by Thomas Christensen, 1990.
La campaña. 1990; as The Campaign, translated by Alfred MacAdam, 1991.
The Orange Tree (stories). 1994.

Diana, o, La cazadora solitaria. 1994; as Diana, the Goddess Who Hunts Alone, translated by Alfred Mac Adam, 1995.
La frontera de cristal: Una novela en nueve cuentos. 1995; as The Crystal Frontier: A Novel in Nine Stories, translated by Alfred Mac Adam, 1997.
Años con Laura Díaz. 1999; as The Years with Laura Díaz, translated by Alfred Mac Adam, 2000.
Instinto de Inez. 2001.

Plays

Todos los gatos son pardos. 1970; revised edition, as Ceremonias del alba, 1991.
El tuerto es rey (produced in French, 1970). 1970.
Las reinos originarios (includes Todos los gatos son pardos and El tuerto es rey). 1971.
Orquídeas a la luz de la luna (produced in English, 1982). 1982; as Orchids in the Moonlight, translated by Fuentes, in Drama Contemporary: Latin America, edited by George W. Woodyard and Marion Peter Holt, 1986.

Screenplays: Pedro Páramo, 1966; Tiempo de morir, 1966; Los caifanes, 1967.

Television series: The Buried Mirror (on Christopher Columbus), 1991.

Verse

Poemas de amor: cuentos del alma. 1971.

Other

The Argument of Latin America: Words for North Americans. 1963.
Paris: La revolución de Mayo. 1968.
La nueva novela hispanoamericana. 1969.
El mundo de José Luis Cuevas. 1969.
Casa con dos puertas. 1970.
Tiempo mexicano. 1971.
Cuerpos y ofrendas. 1972.
Cervantes; o, La crítica de la lectura (Hackett memorial lectures). 1976; as Don Quixote; or, The Critique of Reading, translated anonymously, 1976.
Latin American Literature Today: A Symposium, with others, edited by Rose S. Minc. 1980.
High Noon in Latin America. 1983.
Juan Soriano y su obra, with Teresa del Conde. 1984.
On Human Rights: A Speech. 1984.
Latin America: At War with the Past. 1985.
Palacio Nacional, with Guillermo Tovar y de Teresa. 1986.
Gabriel García Márquez and the Invention of America (lecture). 1987.
Myself with Others: Selected Essays. 1988.
Valiente mundo nuevo (essays). 1990.
The Buried Mirror: Reflections on Spain and the New World. 1992.
Return to Mexico: Journeys behind the Mask. 1992.
Henri Cartier-Bresson: Mexican Notebooks, 1934–1964, translated by Michelle Beaver. 1995.
The Diary of Frida Kahlo: An Intimate Self-portrait, with introduction by Carlos Fuentes. 1995.
A New Time for Mexico. 1996.
El Espejo Enterrado. 2001.
 Editor, Los signos en rotación y otros ensayos, by Octavio Paz. 1971.

*

Bibliography: “Carlos Fuentes: A Bibliography” by Sandra L. Dunn, in Review of Contemporary Fiction, 8, 1988; “Carlos Fuentes,” in Mexican Literature: A Bibliography of Secondary Sources by David William Foster, 1992.

Critical Studies: Carlos Fuentes y Las buenas conciencias by Agustín Velarde, 1962; Carlos Fuentes y la realidad de México by Fidel Ortega Martínez, 1969; The Mexican Novel Comes of Age by Walter M. Langford, 1971; Carlos Fuentes by Daniel de Guzman, 1972; Nostalgia del futuro en la obra de Carlos Fuentes by Liliana Befumo Boschi and Elisa Cabrera, 1973; Cambio de piel; or, The Myth of Literature by Michael González, 1974; La magia y las brujas en la obra de Carlos Fuentes by Gloria Durán, 1976, translated as The Archetypes of Carlos Fuentes: From Witch to Androgyne, 1980; Simposio Carlos Fuentes: Actas (University of South Carolina), 1978; Cinco novelas claves de la literatura hispanoamericana by Antonio Sacoto, 1979; Los disfraces: La obra mestiza de Carlos Fuentes by G. Garcé Gutiérrez, 1981; Carlos Fuentes: A Critical View edited by Robert Brody and Charles Rossman, 1982; Yáñez, Rulfo y Fuentes: El tema de la muerte en tres novelas mexicanas by K.M. Taggart, 1982; Carlos Fuentes by Wendy B. Faris, 1983; La narrativa de Carlos Fuentes by Aida Elsa Ramírez Mattei, 1983; El cuento mexicano contemporáneo: Rulfo, Arreola y Fuentes by Bertie Acker, 1984; Lo fantástico en los relatos de Carlos Fuentes by G. Feijoo, 1985; The Lost Rib: Female Characters in the Spanish-American Novel by Sharon Magnarelli, 1985; Carlos Fuentes: Life, Work, and Criticism by Alfonso González, 1987; El mito en la obra narrativa de Carlos Fuentes by Francisco J. Ordiz, 1987; La obra de Carlos Fuentes: Una visión múltiple by Ann Maria Hernández de López, 1988; Fabulación de la fe: Carlos Fuentes by Fernando García Núñez, 1989; Realidad y ficción en Terra nostra de Carlos Fuentes by Ingrid Simson, 1989; A Marxist Reading of Fuentes, Vargas Llosa and Puig by Victor Manuel Durán, 1993; Author, Text, and Reader in the Novels of Carlos Fuentes by Kristine Ibsen, 1993; The Postmodern Fuentes by Chalene Helmuth, 1997; Carlos Fuentes, Mexico and Modernity by Maarten van Delden, 1998.

* * *

Carlos Fuentes for some years now has been one of the most imposing figures in Latin America. His fame extends beyond literary achievements, and certainly beyond his mother country Mexico (actually he was born in Panama where his father, who was in the diplomatic service, was stationed at the time). He belongs to the Latin American generation of great writers who are known as the authors of “the Boom.” Along with Fuentes, other such luminaries as Gabriel García Márquez and Octavio Paz (both Nobel prize winners) have made the world aware of the great accomplishments of Latin American literature. In 1987 Fuentes was awarded Spain’s most prestigious literary prize, “el premio Cervantes.” He has received numerous other important prizes from many countries, including the Venezuelan Rómulo Gallegos national prize, equivalent to the Cervantes prize in Spain.

Fuentes has a rich and varied professional life. He is equally at home when speaking French, English, or Spanish, and in the subject areas of literature, history, politics, or journalism. He has been visiting professor in the United States at some of the most distinguished universities, and has received honorary degrees from many more. In matters of diplomatic positions, he has attained the highest cultural post available to any artist in a Latin American country, as his nation’s Ambassador to France. In England and France he has been involved with the intellectual pursuits of the intelligentsia. Moreover, he has been quite active in meetings and conferences in underdeveloped countries. His passion, of course, has been his dedication to understanding, and expressing in literary form the essence of Mexican civilization, and by extension the substance of Latin American life and thought. His quest is inexorably linked to capturing the spiritual structure of those countries, Spain and the United States in particular, whose values are interwoven by patrimony as in the case of Spain, or by propinquity and political dominance as in the case of the United States, with the destiny of Latin America.

Fuentes distinguished himself as a writer of note with La muerte de Artemio Cruz (The Death of Artemio Cruz), later becoming a truly international figure as a man of letters. The Death of Artemio Cruz, which depicts the dying days of a former general of the Mexican Revolution, re-creates the history of Mexico from 1910, when the Revolution broke out. As the old moribund patriot of the struggle for freedom chronicles the idealistic quest for liberty and for an equitable distribution of land, he wonders, as did Don Quixote towards the end of his life, what, if anything, was accomplished. At the same time that Artemio Cruz reflects on the uselessness of the past, he comments on his surviving heirs to whom the impending death of an old man is essentially nothing but an annoying event that interferes with their immediate pursuit of personal happiness. Unbeknownst to the young, the dying patriot is able to listen in on the conversations around him. Yet there is no bitterness; The Death of Artemio Cruz smiles ironically on humanity. Disillusionment is conceived as but an inexorable experience of living. Idealism is as necessary as disenchantment is inevitable.

The 1985 novel El gringo viejo (The Old Gringo), which was subsequently made into a film starring Jane Fonda and Gregory Peck, projected the continuity of personal tyranny in Mexico. Revolutions and more revolutions fail to quench the thirst for power among the brave Mexican machos. Idealism, fuelled by adulation, makes despots or political bosses (caciques) of them all. Here we have the microcosm of the apparent neverending growth of caciques throughout Latin America. Principles and ideals give way to personal hegemony, and all members of society in one way or another participate in creating a form of government that befits the abiding faith that one man can inspire. The old gringo is a naive, innocent observer who cannot fully grasp the prevailing form of life in a Latin American country. Even when the gringo means well, he is basically lost in another culture.

Fuentes’s writings are indeed varied and numerous. However, The Buried Mirror: Reflections on Spain and the New World stands out as a most ambitious project. It is a kind of celebration of what has become the polemical quincentenary observance of Christopher Columbus’s arrival in the New World. The Buried Mirror is akin to a self-examining quest for truth and reality. In the highest humanistic tradition, with a sense of compassion for human imperfection, Fuentes feelingly re-creates history for all participants, victors and vanquished alike. Perhaps they are all mere victims of their own passions. In the long run, the distinction between them is blurred. New World countries as well as Spain have experienced—and survived—all sorts of leaders and seemingly untenable situations. While not “history” in the traditional sense, Fuentes’s account affords us a living experience of the essence of the Hispanic and Hispanic American way of life.

—Robert Kirsner

G

GAO Xingjian

Born: Ganzhou, Jiangxi province, China, 4 January 1940; naturalized French citizen, 1997. Education: Early education at home due to poor health; attended Number Ten Middle School, Nanjing, 1951–57; majored in French at the Beijing Foreign Languages Institute, graduating in 1962. Career: Assigned to work as a translator of French, Foreign Languages Press, Beijing, 1962–79; during the Cultural Revolution worked for five years as a peasant, 1970–75; traveled to France as interpreter for a delegation of writers from the Chinese Writers' Association, 1979; re-assigned to work as a writer for the People's Arts Theatre, Beijing, and traveled to France and Italy as a member of the Chinese Writers' Association, 1980; came under attack for promoting the modernist literature of decadent Western capitalism with the publication of his Xiandai xiaoshuo jiqiao chu tan [Preliminary Discussion on the Art of Modern Fiction], 1982; his play Chezhan (The Bus Stop) was banned after a few performances, and publication of his writings were banned during the stamp out spiritual pollution campaign of that year, 1983; his play Yeren (Wild Man) was staged, 1985; in the same year traveled on a D.A.A.D fellowship to Germany and from there twice visited Paris; his play Bi'an (The Other Shore) was banned while being rehearsed, 1986; in 1987 invited to Germany by the Morat Institut für Kunst und Kunstwissenschaft, and from Germany relocated permanently to Paris where his prolific creative output successfully expanded in the three areas of drama, fiction and art. Awards: Chevalier d'Ordre des Arts et des Lettres, 1992; Nobel prize for literature, 2000; Premio Letterario Feronia, 2000; Chevalier de l'Ordre de la Légion d'honneur, 2000; American Academy of Achievement Golden Plate award, 2002.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Gao Xingjian xiju ji. 1985.
Gei wo laoye mai yugan. 1988.
Gao Xingjian xiju liuzhong. 7 vols., 1995.
Meiyou zhuyi. 1996.
The Other Shore: Plays by Gao Xingjian. 1999.
Gao Xingjian xiju ji. 10 vols., 2001.
Wenxue de liyou. 2001.
Gao Xingjian. 1999.

Plays

Juedui xin hao (produced 1982). 1982; as Alarm Signal, translated by Shiao-Ling S. Yu, in Chinese Drama after the Cultural Revolution, 1979–1989, edited by Shiao-Ling S. Yu, 1996.
Chezhan (produced 1983). 1983; as The Bus Stop, translated by Shiao-Ling S. Yu, in Chinese Drama after the Cultural Revolution, 1979–1989, edited by Shiao-Ling S. Yu, 1996; also as Bus Stop, translated by Kimberley Besio, in "Bus Stop: A Lyrical Comedy on Life in One Act," Theatre and Society: An Anthology of Contemporary Chinese Drama edited by Haiping Yan, 1998.

Duo yu (produced 1987). 1984.
Yeren (produced 1985). 1985; as Wild Man, translated by Bruno Roubicek, in "Wild Man: A Contemporary Chinese Spoken Drama" 1990.
Bi'an (produced 1990). 1986; as The Other Side, translated by Jo Riley, in "The Other Side: A Contemporary Drama Without Acts," in An Oxford Anthology of Contemporary Chinese Drama edited by Martha P. Y. Cheung and Jane C. C. Lai, 1997; also as The Other Shore translated by Gilbert C. F. Fong, in The Other Shore: Plays by Gao Xingjian, 1999.
Sheng sheng man bianzhou (produced 1989). 1990.
Taowang (produced 1992). 1990; as Fugitives, translated by Gregory B. Lee, in Chinese Writing and Exile, edited by Gregory B. Lee, 1993; as La Fuite [Fleeing], translated by Michele Guyot, Editions Lansman, 1992.
Sheng si jie (produced 1993). 1991, and also as Au bord de la vie in 1993; as Between Life and Death, translated by Gilbert C. F. Fong, in The Other Shore: Plays by Gao Xingjian, 1999.
Duihua yu fanjie (produced 1992). 1993; as Dialogue and Rebuttal, translated by Gilbert C. F. Fong, in The Other Shore: Plays by Gao Xingjian, 1999.
Shanhaijing zhuan. 1993.
Le Somnambule (produced 1999). As Yeyoushen in 1995; as Nocturnal Wanderer, translated by Gilbert C. F. Fong, in The Other Shore: Plays by Gao Xingjian, 1999.
Zhoumo sichongzou. 1996; also as Quatre quatuors pour un weekend, 1998; as Weekend Quartet, translated by Gilbert Fong, in The Other Shore: Plays by Gao Xingjian, 1999.
Mingcheng (produced 1988). 1995.
Bayue xue (produced 2002). 2001.

Novels

Lingshan. 1990; as Soul Mountain, translated by Mabel Lee, 2000.
Yige ren de shengjing. 1999; as One Man's Bible, translated by Mabel Lee, 2002.

Selected Essays

"Xiandai jiqiao yu minzu jingshen." 1981; as "Contemporary Technique and National Character in Fiction," translated by Mause Ng, Renditions, 19 & 20, 1983.
"Geren de shengyin." 1993; as "The Voice of the Individual," translated by Lena Aspfors and Torbjörn Lodén, The Stockholm Journal of East Asian Studies, 6, 1995.
"Meiyou zhuyi." 1993; as "Without Isms," translated by Winnie Lau, Deborah Sauviat, and Martin Williams, The Journal of the Oriental Society of Australia, 27 & 28, 1995–96.
"Wenxue de liyou," Nobel Lecture. 2000; as "The Case for Literature" translated by Mabel Lee, 2001.
"Wenxue de jianzheng: dui zhenshi de zuiqiu," Nobel Centenary Lecture. 2001; as "Literature as Testimony: the Search for Truth" translated by Mabel Lee, 2002.

Other

- Xiandai xiaoshuo jiqiao chutan* (non-fiction). 1981.
Dui yizhong xiandai xiju de zuiqiu (non-fiction). 1988.
Ink Paintings by Gao Xingjian. 1995.
Gout de l'encre (art). 1996.
Au plus près du réel: Dialogues sur l'écriture (1994–1997), co-authored with Denis Bourgeois. 1997.
L'Encre et la lumière (art). 1998.
Une Autre esthétique (art). 2000; also as Ling yizhong meixue, 2001; and Return to Painting, 2002.

*

Critical Studies: “Personal Freedom in Twentieth Century China: Reclaiming the Self in Yang Lian’s Yi and Gao Xingjian’s Lingshan,” in History, Literature and Society: Essays in Honour of S. N. Mukherjee, edited by Mabel Lee and Michael Wilding, 1997, “Walking Out of Other People’s Prisons: Liu Zaifu and Gao Xingjian on Chinese Literature in the 1990s,” in Asian & African Studies, vol. 5, no. 1, 1996, “Without Politics: Gao Xingjian on Literary Creation,” in The Stockholm Journal of East Asian Studies, vol. 6, 1995, all by Mabel Lee; “Searching for Alternative Aesthetics in the Chinese Theatre: The Odyssey of Huang Zuolin and Gao Xingjian” by Quah Sy Ren, in Asian Culture, vol. 24, 2000; Towards a Modern Zen Theatre: Gao Xingjian and Chinese Theatre Experimentalism by Henry Y. H. Zhao, 2000; Lun Gao Xingjian zhuangtai by Liu Zaifu, 2000; Soul of Chaos: Critical perspectives on Gao Xingjian edited by Kwok-Kan Tam, 2001; “Gao Xingjian: The Playwright As an Intellectual” by Quah Sy Ren, in Nantah Journal of Chinese Language and Culture, vol. 5.1, 2002; Gao Xingjian: An Alternative Transcultural Response to Chinese Theatre by Quah Sy Ren, 2003.

* * *

Proclaimed Nobel laureate for literature in 2000, Gao Xingjian was the first writer to be awarded the prize for a body of writings in the Chinese language. His win caused a controversy as experts who had read at most only one or two of his early works, if any, came forward to criticize the award. The controversy was fanned by political or personal motives and clearly had nothing to do with Gao’s achievements in literature. Gao had become a French citizen in 1997, his plays were being performed internationally, and a substantial part of his major works had also been published in French, Swedish, and English translation.

Gao Xingjian rose to prominence in the Chinese literary world immediately following the end of the Cultural Revolution (1966–76). At the height of the Cultural Revolution he had burnt twenty years of unpublished manuscripts (plays, essays, poems, short stories and a novella) rather than face the consequence of having them discovered. The first of his many short stories and essays on European writers began to appear in literary publications in 1980. When, in 1982, several veteran writers applauded his Xiandai xiaoshuo jiqiao chutan [Preliminary Discussion on the Art of Modern Fiction], the book was banned for promoting the “decadent modernism” of Western literature. In the same year, staged at the People’s Art Theatre to packed houses, his play Juedui xin hao (Alarm Signal) caused great excitement in the literary world, but, in the following year, when his play Chezhan (The Bus Stop) was staged, again to packed houses, it created a sensation. Bus Stop portrays a group of people waiting for a bus that never comes and of the passage of years in futile waiting; its ambiguity and Absurdist approach represented a clear departure from the official guidelines for literature, and it was closed by the authorities after a few performances. Gao was targeted for criticism during the campaign to stamp out “spiritual pollution” and a ban placed on the publication of his writings. The ban lasted for over a year, after which he continued to publish short stories, plays, as well as his translations of Jacques Prévert’s Paroles, in 1984, and Eugène Ionesco’s La Cantatrice chauve, in 1985. His play Yeren (Wild Man) was staged in 1985, but in the following year Bi’an (The Other Shore) was banned while it was being rehearsed.

In late 1987 he traveled to Germany as a guest of the Morat Institut für Kunst und Kunstwissenschaft and, while there, applied for a French visa. Gao was acutely aware of a physiological need to write, but, in China, even when he exercised self-censorship, his works were criticized. By the end of the 1987 he had relocated to Paris and began to support himself by selling his Chinese ink paintings. He soon found publishers in Taipei and Hong Kong for his prolific writings and, to begin with, though translations in French and Swedish, new stages for his play productions.

Following the brutal military crackdown on student protesters in Beijing on 4 June, 1989, Gao Xingjian was commissioned to write a play “about China” by an American theatre company. When his play Taowang [Fleeing] was submitted in English translation, he was asked to make revisions. He paid for the translation and withdrew the manuscript. Fleeing was published in early 1990 and premiered in Stockholm in Swedish. In “Guanyu Taowang” [About Fleeing], Gao states that the Chinese Communist Party could not get him to change what he had written, and an American theatre company certainly would not. He was aware that the play had displeased members of the Chinese democracy movement because it was critical of the naivete of the student movement, and did not portray the students as heroes. However, he had written the play not to denounce only this particular massacre and had stated in the stage instructions: “This is not a socialist-realist play.” While as an individual he had denounced the military crackdown in the French and Italian media, he was adamantly opposed to “tying literature to the war chariot of a particular camp.” As a writer he saw literary truth as his only criterion, truth as he perceived it and not truth as dictated by others, no matter how noble the cause. In his subsequent writings he coined the terms “cold literature” and “no -isms” to define the sort of literature to which he was committed.

—Mabel Lee

GARCÍA LORCA, Federico

Born: Fuente Vaqueros, near Granada, Spain, 5 June 1898. Education: Educated at Colegio del Sagrado Corazón de Jesús, Granada; also studied piano at Granada conservatory; University of Granada, 1914–19; travelled in Spain, 1915–17; Residencia de Estudiantes, Madrid, 1919–29; Columbia University, New York, 1929–30. Career: Editor of artistic review, El Gallo, 1928; travelled to Paris, London, New York, and Havana (Cuba), 1929–30; founder and director of itinerant government-sponsored student theatre group, La Barraca, in the 1930s (grant withdrawn 1935); visited Buenos Aires (Argentina) in 1933. Arrested and shot by Franco supporters immediately following the outbreak of the Spanish Civil War. Died: (executed) 18/19 August 1936.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

- Obras completas*, edited by Guillermo de Torre. 7 vols., 1938–42.
- Obras completas*, edited by Arturo del Hoyo. 1954; revised editions, 2 vols., 1973; 3 vols., 1986; edited and translated by J.L. Gili, 1960.
- Collected Plays* (includes the texts of Three Tragedies, 1947, and Five Plays, 1963), translated by James Graham-Luján and Richard L. O'Connell. 1976.
- Obras*, edited by Miguel García-Posada. 6 vols., 1980.
- Plays*, translated by Gwynne Edwards and Peter Luke. 3 vols., 1987–91.
- Collected Poems*, edited by Christopher Maurer. 1991.
- Four Major Plays*, translated by John Edmunds. 1997.
- A Season in Granada: Uncollected Poems & Prose*, edited and translated by Christopher Maurer. 1998.
- In Search of Duende*, translated by Christopher Maurer and Norman di Giovanni. 1998.
- Lorca/Blackburn: Poems of Federico García Lorca*, edited and translated by Paul Blackburn, 2000.

Plays

- El maleficio de la mariposa* (produced 1920). In Obras completas, 1954; as The Butterfly's Evil Spell, translated by James Graham-Luján and Richard L. O'Connell, in Five Plays, 1963.
- Mariana Pineda* (produced 1927). 1928; as Mariana Pineda, translated by James Graham-Luján, in Tulane Drama Review, 7(2), 1962; also translated by Robert G. Havard, 1987; Gwynne Edwards, with The Public and Play Without a Title, 1991.
- Quimera*. In El Gallo, May 1928; in book form, in Teatro breve, 1954.
- El paseo de Buster Keaton* (produced 1986). In El Gallo, May 1928; in book form, in Teatro breve, 1954; as Buster Keaton's Promenade, translated by Tim Reynolds, in Accent, 17(3), 1957.
- La doncella, el marinero y el estudiante* (produced 1986). In El Gallo, May 1928; in book form, in Teatro breve, 1954.
- La zapatera prodigiosa* (produced 1930; revised version produced 1933). In Obras completas, 1938; edited by J. and F. Street, 1962; as The Shoemaker's Prodigious Wife, translated by James Graham-Luján and Richard L. O'Connell, in From Lorca's Theatre, 1941, and in Five Plays, 1963; as The Shoemaker's Wonderful Wife, translated by Gwynne Edwards, in Plays 2, 1990.
- El amor de Don Perlimplín con Belisa en su jardín* (produced 1933). In Obras completas, 1938; as The Love of Don Perlimplín, translated by James Graham-Luján and Richard L. O'Connell, in From Lorca's Theatre, 1941, and in Five Plays, 1963; as The Love of Don Perlimplín for Belisa in the Garden, translated by David Johnston, 1990.
- Bodas de sangre* (produced 1933). 1935; edited by H. Ramsden, 1980; as Blood Wedding, translated by Gilbert Murray, 1939; also translated by James Graham-Luján and Richard L. O'Connell, in Three Tragedies, 1947; Sue Bradbury, in Three Tragedies, 1977;

- Michael Dewell and Carmen Zapata, in The Rural Trilogy, 1987; Gwynne Edwards, in Three Plays, 1988; David Johnston, 1989; Brendan Kennelly, 1996; Ted Hughes, 1996.
- La dama boba*, from a play by Lope de Vega (produced 1934).
- Yerma* (produced 1934). 1937; as Yerma, in From Lorca's Theatre, translated by James Graham-Luján and Richard L. O'Connell, 1941, and in Three Tragedies, 1947; also translated by Sue Bradbury, in Three Tragedies, 1977; Ian MacPherson and Jacqueline Minett, 1987; Michael Dewell and Carmen Zapata, in The Rural Trilogy, 1987; Peter Luke, in Three Plays, 1988; David Johnston, 1990; edited with introduction and notes by Robin Warner, 1995.
- Doña Rosita la soltera* (produced 1935). In Obras completas, 1938; as Doña Rosita the Spinster, translated by James Graham-Luján and Richard L. O'Connell, in From Lorca's Theatre, 1941, and in Five Plays, 1963; translated by Gwynne Edwards and Peter Luke, in Three Plays, 1988.
- El "retablillo" de Don Cristóbal* (produced 1935). In Obras completas, 1938; as The Tragicomedy of Don Cristóbal and Doña Rosita, translated by Will I. Oliver, in New World Writing, 8, 1955; as The Puppet Play of Don Cristóbal, translated by Gwynne Edwards, in Plays, 2, 1990.
- Los títeres de Cachiporra* (produced 1937). 1949; as The Billy-Club Puppets, translated by James Graham-Luján and Richard L. O'Connell, in Five Plays, 1963.
- Así que pasen cinco años* (produced in English 1945; produced in Spanish 1978). In Obras completas, 1938; as If Five Years Pass, translated by James Graham-Luján and Richard L. O'Connell, in From Lorca's Theatre, 1941; as When Five Years Pass, translated by Gwynne Edwards, in Plays, 2, 1990; as Once Five Years Pass, translated by W.B. Logan and A.G. Orrios, in Once Five Years Pass, and Other Dramatic Works, 1990.
- From Lorca's Theatre: Five Plays* (includes If Five Years Pass; Yerma; The Love of Don Perlimplín; Doña Rosita the Spinster; The Shoemaker's Prodigious Wife), translated by James Graham-Luján and Richard L. O'Connell. 1941.
- La casa de Bernarda Alba* (produced 1945). 1945; edited by H. Ramsden, 1984; as The House of Bernarda Alba, translated by James Graham-Luján and Richard L. O'Connell, in Three Tragedies, 1947; also translated by Sue Bradbury, in Three Tragedies, 1977; Michael Dewell and Carmen Zapata, in The Rural Trilogy, 1987.
- Three Tragedies* (includes Blood Wedding; The House of Bernarda Alba; Yerma), edited and translated by James Graham-Luján and Richard L. O'Connell. 1947.
- Playlets* (includes Buster Keaton's Promenade; Chimera; The Virgin, the Sailor and the Student), translated by Tim Reynolds, in Accent, 17(3), 1957.
- Five Plays: Comedies and Tragedies* (includes The Butterfly's Evil Spell; The Billy-Club Puppets; The Shoemaker's Prodigious Wife; The Love of Don Perlimplín; Doña Rosita the Spinster), translated by James Graham-Luján and Richard L. O'Connell. 1963.
- El público* (produced in English 1972; produced in Spanish 1986). With Comedia sin título, 1978; as The Public, translated by Carlos Bauer, 1983; also translated by Gwynne Edwards, 1991.
- Three Tragedies* (includes Blood Wedding; Yerma; Bernarda Alba), translated by Sue Bradbury. 1977.

El público y Comedia sin título: Dos obras teatrales póstumas, edited by Rafael Martínez Nadal. 1978; as The Public, and Play Without a Title: Two Posthumous Plays, translated by Carlos Bauer, 1983; as The Public and Play Without a Title, translated by Gwynne Edwards, with Mariana Pineda, 1991.

Comedia sin título (produced 1989). With El público, 1978; as Play Without a Title, translated by Carlos Bauer, 1983; also translated by Gwynne Edwards, 1991.

The Rural Trilogy (includes Blood Wedding; Yerma; The House of Bernarda Alba), translated by Michael Dewell and Carmen Zapata. 1987; as Three Plays, 1992.

Three Plays (includes Blood Wedding; Doña Rosita the Spinster; Yerma), translated by Gwynne Edwards and Peter Luke. 1988; as Plays I, 1991.

Once Five Years Pass, and Other Dramatic Works, translated by W.B. Logan and A.G. Orrios. 1990.

Screenplays: Trip to the Moon, translated by Bernice C. Duncan, in New Directions, 18, 1964.

Verse

Libro de poemas. 1921; reprinted 1974.

Canciones. 1927; as Canciones, edited by Daniel Eisenberg, translated by Philip Cummings, 1976.

Primer romancero gitano. 1928; edited by H. Ramsden, 1988, and by Derek Harris, 1991; as Gypsy Ballads, translated by Rolfe Humphries, 1953; also translated by Michael Hartnett, 1973; Carl W. Cobb, 1983; Robert G. Havard, 1990.

Poema del cante jondo. 1931; as Poem of the Deep Song, translated by Christopher Bauer, 1987.

Oda a Walt Whitman. 1933.

Llanto por la muerte de Ignacio Sánchez Mejías. 1935.

Primeras canciones. 1936.

Seis poemas galegos. 1936.

Lament for the Death of a Bullfighter and Other Poems, translated by A.L. Lloyd. 1937.

Poems, translated by Stephen Spender and J.L. Gili. 1939.

Diván del Tamarit. 1940; as Divan, translated by Edwin Honig, in Divan and Other Writings, 1974.

Poeta en Nueva York. 1940; edited by Christopher Maurer, translated by Greg Simon and Steven White, 1989; as Poet in New York, translated by Rolfe Humphries, 1940; also translated by Ben Belitt, 1955.

Selected Poems, translated by Lloyd Mallan. 1941.

Selected Poems, translated by J.L. Gili and Stephen Spender. 1947.

Poemas sueltos. 1954.

Cantares populares. 1954.

Selected Poems, translated by Francisco García Lorca and Donald M. Allen. 1955.

Selected Poems, translated by J.L. Gili (prose). 1960.

Lorca and Jiménez, translated by Robert Bly. 1973.

Divan and Other Writings, translated by Edwin Honig. 1974.

Canciones y poemas para niños. As The Cricket Sings: Poems and Songs for Children, translated by Will Kirkland, 1980.

Suites (selected poetry), edited by André Belamich. 1983; translated by Jerome Rothenberg, 2001.

Canciones y primeras canciones, edited by Piero Menarini. 1986.

Diván del Tamarit; Seis poemas galegos; Llanto por Ignacio Sánchez Mejías; Poemas sueltos, edited by Andrew A. Anderson. 1988.

Ode to Walt Whitman and Other Poems, translated by Carlos Bauer. 1988.

The Towers of Cordova: Selected Poems, translated by Merryn Williams. 1990.

Songs and Ballads, translated by R. Skelton. 1992.

Other

Impresiones y paisajes. 1918; as Impressions and Landscapes, translated by L.H. Klibbe, 1987.

Homenaje al Poeta Federico García Lorca (selection and commentary), edited by Antonio Machado and Emilio Prados. 1937.

Cartas a sus amigos, edited by S. Gasch. 1950.

Cartas; postales; poemas y dibujos, edited by A. Gallego Morell. 1968.

Granada, Paraíso Cerrado y otras páginas granadinas, edited by Enrique Martínez López. 1971.

Autógrafos, edited by Rafael Martínez Nadal. 1975–76.

Deep Song and Other Prose, edited by Christopher Maurer. 1980.

Selected Letters, edited and translated by David Gershator. 1983.

Oda y burla de Sesostris y Sardanápalo, edited by Miguel García-Posada. 1985.

Diván del Tamarit y otros textos, edited by Aída O'Ward and Carlos Arredondo. 1988.

Four Puppet Plays, Play Without a Title, the Divan Poems, and Other Prose Poems and Dramatic Pieces, translated by Edwin Honig. 1990.

Poeta en Nueva York y otras hojas y poemas: Manuscritos neoyorquinos, edited by Mario Fernández. 1990.

Barbarous Nights: Legends and Plays, translated by C.S. Laucanno. 1991.

The Unknown Lorca: Dialogues, Dramatic Projects, Unfinished Plays and a Filmscript, edited and translated by John London. 1996.

A Life of Lorca: Drawings, Photographs, Words, compiled and edited by Andrew Dempsey, 1997.

Editor, El Gallo: Revista de Granada, in 1928.

*

Bibliography: García Lorca: A Selectively Annotated Bibliography of Criticism, 1980, and García Lorca: An Annotated Primary Bibliography, 1982, both edited by Francesca Colecchia; Federico García Lorca: A Bibliography by Everett E. Larson, 1987.

Critical Studies: Federico García Lorca by Edwin Honig, 1944; Lorca: The Poet and His People by Arturo Barea, 1945; Federico García Lorca by John A. Crow, 1945; Lorca: An Appreciation of His Poetry by Roy Campbell, 1952; Lorca and the Spanish Poetic Tradition by J.B. Trend, 1955; Lorca: A Collection of Critical Essays edited by Manuel Durán, 1962 and Lorca's Legacy edited by Durán and Francesca Colecchia, 1991; The Theatre of García Lorca by Robert Lima, 1963; The Victorious Expression: A Study of Four Contemporary Spanish Poets: Miguel de Unamuno, Antonio Machado, Juan Ramón Jiménez, Federico García Lorca by Howard T. Young, 1964; García Lorca by Rafael Alberti, 1966; Federico García Lorca by Carl W. Cobb, 1967; Federico García Lorca by Rolf Michaelis, 1969; The Symbolic World of García Lorca, 1972, and Psyche and Symbol in the Theatre of Federico García Lorca, 1974, both by Rupert Allen; The Death of Lorca, 1973, revised edition, as The Assassination of Federico García Lorca, 1979, and Federico García Lorca: A Life, 1989, both by Ian Gibson; Lorca's The Public by Rafael Martínez Nadal, 1974; A Concordance to the Plays and Poems of Federico García Lorca, 1975; La Barraca and the Spanish National Theatre by Suzanne W. Byrd, 1975; The Comic Spirit of Federico García Lorca by Virginia Higginbotham, 1976; García Lorca, Playwright and Poet by Mildred Adams, 1977; Lorca's Poet in New York: The Fall Into Consciousness by Betty Jean Craige, 1977; Federico García Lorca and Sean O'Casey: Powerful Voices in the Wilderness by Katie Brittain Adams Davis, 1978; García Lorca: Poeta en Nueva York by Derek Harris, 1978; Federico García Lorca: The Poetry of Limits by David K. Loughran, 1978; García Lorca's Poema del Cante Jondo by Norman C. Miller, 1978; The Tragic Myth: Lorca and Cante Jondo by Edward F. Stanton, 1978; Lorca: The Theatre Beneath the Sands, 1980, and Dramatists in Perspective: Spanish Theatre in the Twentieth Century, 1985, both by Gwynne Edwards; Lorca's New York Poetry: Social Injustice, Dark Love, Lost Faith by Richard Predmore, 1980; García Lorca: Bodas de Sangre, 1981, and García Lorca: La Casa de Bernarda Alba, 1990, both by Cyril Brian Morris, and "Cuando yo me Muera...": Essays in Memory of Federico García Lorca, 1988 edited by Morris; Lorca's Impresiones y Paisajes: The Young Artist by Laurence Hadfield Klibbe, 1983; Federico García Lorca by Reed Anderson, 1984; Federico García Lorca by Felicia Hardison Londres, 1984; Lorca: The Gay Imagination by Paul Binding, 1985; Federico García Lorca: Life, Work and Criticism by C. Grant McCurdy, 1986; In the Green Morning: Memories of Federico by Francisco García Lorca, translated by Christopher Maurer, 1986; Lorca, the Drawings: Their Relation to the Poet's Life and Work by Helen Oppenheimer, 1986; Lorca's Romancero Gitano: Eighteen Commentaries by H. Ramsden, 1988; Leeds Papers on Lorca and on Civil War Verse edited by Margaret A. Rees, 1988; Lorca's Late Poetry: A Critical Study, 1990, and García Lorca: La Zapatera Prodigiosa, 1991, both by Andrew A. Anderson; Line of Light and Shadow: The Drawings of Federico García Lorca by Mario Hernandez, 1991; File on Lorca edited by Andy Piasecki, 1991; Lorca: Poet and Playwright—Essays in Honour of J.M. Aguirre edited by Robert G. Havard, 1992; Souls in Anguish: Religion and Spirituality in Lorca's Theatre by Ronald Cueto, 1994; Lorca's Drawings and Poems: Forming the Eye of the Beholder by Cecelia J. Cavanaugh, 1995; Understanding Federico García Lorca by Candelas Newton, 1995; Audience and Authority in the Modernist Theater of Federico García Lorca by C. Christopher Soufas, 1996; Son of Andalusia: The Lyrical Landscapes of Federico García Lorca by C. Brian Morris, 1997; Federico García Lorca by Jonathan Buckley, 1998; Lorca: A Dream of Life by Leslie Stainton, 1998; The Theatre of García Lorca: Text, Performance, Psychoanalysis by Paul Julian Smith, 1998; The Trickster-function in the Theatre of García Lorca by Sarah Wright, 2000; Lorca, Buñuel, Dalí: Art and Theory, edited by Manuel Delgado Morales and Alice J. Proust, 2001.

* * *

Federico García Lorca has come to be one of the most widely read and admired authors who have written in Spanish in the 20th century. His execution by fascists at the outbreak of the Spanish Civil War abruptly brought his name into world focus, but since then his work as a poet and playwright has endured the test of political notoriety and has continued to prosper on the strength of its intrinsic worth.

Leonardo, the protagonist of Bodas de sangre (Blood Wedding), one of Lorca's most famous plays, defends adulterous love in these terms: "The fault is not mine / The fault belongs to the earth." A case could readily be made to substantiate the point of view that all of Lorca's protagonists, including the poet-narrator himself, struggle in the grip of telluric passions. Smugglers, gypsies, suppressed women, and ultimately the poet have but one goal: to exult, by means of startling metaphors fashioned against the backdrop of Andalusia, their pain and grief at the indifference of society and the silence of death. In a celebrated lecture, Lorca pointed to the Andalusian duende (goblin) as the embodiment of dark and dangerous feelings. In Lorca's canon, the greatest crime is to stifle the expression of these emotions and the greatest fear is the total tranquillity of death.

By emphasizing the demonic inspiration of his verse, Lorca placed himself in the tradition of those who believe in the Platonic seizure, or in Housman's shivers down the spine. A master of details of form, he nevertheless insisted that the totality of the poem was something over which he had no control. "If it is true" he once said, "that I am a poet through the grace of God (or the devil), I have also got where I am by virtue of work and technical skill, without having the slightest notion of what a poem is."

Constantly requested to read his poetry aloud (which he did with great effect), Lorca had all the appearances of a latter-day bard. His strong sense of the oral tradition led him at times to display indifference toward the printed word. Many poems circulated among friends, or survived in the intimacy of small public readings before they became fixed between the covers of books.

Childhood memories of playing in meadows with crumpled purple mountains in the distance, such is Lorca's own characterization of his first book of verse Libro de poemas [Book of Poems]. Graceful combinations of humour, irony, and whimsy bestow a tone notably lacking in most of his subsequent poetry. A strong sense of mystery and magic pervade this Andalusian pastoral.

In Poema del cante jondo (Poem of the Deep Song), Lorca sought to capture in verse the impact of the heady, monotonous, and pathetic chant that had been introduced into Spain from oriental sources. He personifies the cante, turns it into a baleful, dark-haired woman, attributes cosmic powers to it (the shout of the singer causes olive groves to tremble and even silence quivers), and finally makes it an expression of elemental grief. By now, the characteristics of Lorca's modernism have become clear: using an acute sense of local culture (Andalusia), he will express in bold metaphorical terms the loneliness, grief, and frustration of the human predicament.

The Primer romancero gitano (Gypsy Ballads) raises the plight of the persecuted gypsies of Spain to the level of poetry by inventing a mythology for them. In doing so, Lorca went back beyond the Greek and Roman myths and intuited a primitive mythology in which there is a close relationship between man and cosmic reality. The moon opens the book by stealing away a gypsy boy, and under her influence, the fortunes of the gypsies wax and wane. The wind attempts to rape a gypsy girl, and all of nature reacts in sympathy to her plight. By skilfully employing the eight-syllable line and the strong dramatic dialogue form of the old Spanish romance (ballad), Lorca demonstrates once again his ability to meld traditional elements into his modern outlook. The bedazzling, sometimes disturbing metaphors of this popular book have still not worn thin.

Seeking to step aside from the success accorded him in Madrid, Lorca went to New York in the summer of 1929. His sensitivities, developed in an agrarian and conservative European region, were overwhelmed by the vast concreteness of New York, its technological power, and the festering racial prejudice. Poeta en Nueva York (Poet in New York), making use of a modified form of surrealism, is a description of the collapse of his personal world and the painful process of picking up the pieces again. In terms of its denunciation of modern civilization, it is often compared to T.S. Eliot's The Waste Land. Lorca's outraged feeling of social justice and his sympathy for the underdog come through loud and clear. The section on Harlem, with its forecast of violence between blacks and whites, has turned out to be remarkably prescient. The death of a bullfighter friend inspired Llanto por la muerte de Ignacio Sánchez Mejías (Lament for the Death of a Bullfighter), considered by many critics to be one of the most impressive of modern elegies.

Aside from the playfulness and sense of humour sporadically present in the early verse, the register of Lorca's poetic voice is intense, dark, and sombre. Passionate descriptions rather than philosophical reflections mark his work. Once again, his regional background plays a role, for the andaluz, he once remarked, is either asleep in the dust or shouting at the stars.

Lorca's plays have been performed around the world. Blood Wedding, Yerma, and La casa de Bernarda Alba (The House of Bernarda Alba), dealing with sexual frustration, are his best known works for the theatre, but there is a strong interest in an experimental play, El público (The Public) (finished in 1930 but not produced in Spain until 1987) that, well before Genet, deals with homosexuality on the stage. In the so-called rural trilogy, the violent punishment of adultery, the tortures of sterility imposed by environment as well as nature, and the oppressiveness of a matriarchal family are handled powerfully. The first two make extensive use of poetry and have earned Lorca a reputation among modern dramatists for his ability to incorporate lyrics in his plays.

—Howard T. Young

See the essays on Blood Wedding, The House of Bernarda Alba, and Yerma.

GARCÍA MÁRQUEZ, Gabriel

Born: Aracataca, Colombia, 6 March 1928. Education: Educated at the Jesuit Colegio San José, Barranquilla, 1940–42; Jesuit Colegio Nacional, Zipaquirá, to 1946; studied law and journalism at the National University of Colombia, Bogotá, 1947–48; studies interrupted by civil strife, and continued at University of Cartagena, 1948–49. Family: Married Mercedes Barcha in 1958; two sons. Career: Contributor of stories to El Espectador, 1947–52; journalist, El Universal, Cartagena, 1948–50; correspondent, El Heraldo, Barranquilla, 1950–54; journalist, 1954–55, and Paris correspondent, 1955, El Espectador: paper closed by government, 1955; lived in Europe, 1955–57; travelled through Eastern Europe, 1957; journalist in Caracas, 1958–59; joined Prensa Latina (Cuban press agency), 1959: opened its office in Bogotá, then worked in Havana, 1959, and New York until his resignation in 1961; lived in Mexico, 1961–67, working as journalist (editor, Sucesos and La Familia), advertising agent, and scriptwriter; lived in Spain, 1967–75; founder, left-wing Alternativa, Bogotá, 1974; returned to Mexico, 1975, and to Colombia in 1981; founder, El Otro, Bogotá, 1963; member, Panamanian delegation for the United States-Panama treaty, Washington, DC, 1978; member, UNESCO commission on Third World Communications Problems, 1979; founder, 1979, and president, from 1979, Fundación Habeas; director, Foundation for New Latin American Cinema, Havana, 1986–88. Lives in Colombia. Awards: Colombian Association of Writers and Artists award, 1954; National Short Story Competition prize, 1955; Esso literary prize, 1961; Chianciano prize (Italy), 1968; Foreign Book prize (France), 1970; Rómulo Gallegos prize (Venezuela), 1972; Neustadt international prize, 1972; Nobel prize for literature, 1982; Los Angeles Times prize, 1988. Honorary doctorate: Columbia University, New York, 1971. Légion d'honneur, 1981. Member: American Academy.

PUBLICATIONS

Fiction

La hojarasca. 1955; as Leaf Storm, in Leaf Storm and Other Stories, translated by Gregory Rabassa, 1972.

El coronel no tiene quien le escriba. 1957; as No One Writes to the Colonel, translated by J.S. Bernstein, in No One Writes to the Colonel and Other Stories, 1968.

La mala hora. 1962; as In Evil Hour, translated by Gregory Rabassa, 1979.

Los funerales de la Mamá Grande (stories). 1962; as Big Mama's Funeral, translated by J.S. Bernstein, in No One Writes to the Colonel and Other Stories, 1968.

Isabel viendo llover en Macondo. 1967.

Cien años de soledad. 1967; as One Hundred Years of Solitude, translated by Gregory Rabassa, 1970.

Relato de un naufragio. 1970; as The Story of a Shipwrecked Sailor, translated by Randolph Hogan, 1989.

Leaf Storm and Other Stories, translated by Gregory Rabassa. 1972.

La increíble y triste historia de la cándida Eréndira y de su abuela desalmada: Siete cuentos. 1972; as Innocent Eréndira and Other Stories, translated by Gregory Rabassa, 1978.

El negro que hizo esperar a los ángeles. 1972.

Ojos de perro azul: Nueve cuentos desconocidos. 1972.

Cuatro cuentos. 1974.

Todos los cuentos 1947–1972. 1975; as Collected Stories, translated by Gregory Rabassa, 1984, revised edition, 1991.

El otoño del patriarca. 1975; as The Autumn of the Patriarch, translated by Gregory Rabassa, 1976.

El último viaje del buque fantasma. 1976.

Crónica de una muerte anunciada. 1981; as Chronicle of a Death Foretold, translated by Gregory Rabassa, 1982.

El amor en los tiempos del cólera. 1985; as Love in the Time of Cholera, translated by Edith Grossman, 1988.

El general en su laberinto. 1989; as The General in His Labyrinth, translated by Edith Grossman, 1990.

Collected Novellas, translated by Gregory Rabassa and J.S. Bernstein. 1990.

Three Novellas (includes Leaf Storm; No One Writes to the Colonel; Chronicle of a Death Foretold), translated by Gregory Rabassa and J.S. Bernstein. 1991.

Doce cuentos peregrinos. 1992; as Strange Pilgrims: Twelve Stories, translated by Edith Grossman, 1993.

Del amor y otros demonios. 1994; as Of Love and Other Demons, translated by Edith Grossman, 1995.

Plays

Viva Sandino. 1982; as El asalto: u; operativo con que el FSLN se lanzó al mundo, 1983.

El rastro de tu sangre en la nieve; El verano de la Señora Forbes (screenplays). 1982.

Diatribes of Love Against a Seated Man (produced 1988).

Screenplays: El secuestro, 1982; María de mi corazón, with J.H. Hermosillo, 1983; Eréndira, from his own novella, 1983.

Other

La novela en América Latina: diálogo, with Mario Vargas Llosa. 1968.

Cuando era feliz e indocumentado. 1973.

De viaje por los países socialistas: 90 días en la Cortina de hierro. 1978.

Crónicas y reportajes. 1978.

Periodismo militante. 1978.

La batalla de Nicaragua, with Gregorio Selser and Daniel Waksman Schinca. 1979.

García Márquez habla de García Márquez. 1979.

Obra periodística, (includes vol. 1: Textos costños; vols. 2–3: Entre cachacos; vol. 4: De Europa y América (1955–1960)), edited by Jacques Gilard. 4 vols, 1981–83.

El olor de la guayaba, with Plinio Apuleyo Mendoza. 1982; as The Fragrance of Guava, translated by Ann Wright, 1983.

La soledad de América Latina; Brindis por la poesía. 1983.

Persecución y muerte de minorías, with Guillermo Nolasco-Juárez. 1984.

La aventura de Miguel Littín, clandestino en Chile: Un reportaje. 1986; as Clandestine in Chile: The Adventures of Miguel Littín, translated by Asa Zatz, 1987.

El cataclismo de Damocles/The Doom of Damocles (bilingual edition). 1986.

Dialogo sobre la novela latinoamericana, with Mario Vargas Llosa. 1988.

Noticia de un secuestro. 1996; as News of a Kidnapping, translated by Edith Grossman. 1997.

*

Bibliography: Gabriel García Márquez: An Annotated Bibliography 1947–1979 by Margaret Eustella Fau, 1980; A Bibliographical Guide to Gabriel García Márquez 1979–1985 by Margaret Eustella Fau and Nelly Sfeir de González, 1986.

Critical Studies: García Márquez; o, El olvidado arte de contar by R. Gullon, 1970; Sobre García Márquez edited by P.S. Martínez, 1971; García Márquez: Historia de un deicidio by Mario Vargas Llosa, 1971; Homenaje a Gabriel García Márquez edited by Helmy F. Giacomani, 1972; Cien años de soledad: Una interpretación by J. Ludmer, 1972; Gabriel García Márquez, 1977, and Gabriel García Márquez: Life, Work, and Criticism, 1987, both by George R. McMurray; Gabriel García Márquez: El escritor y la crítica by P.G. Earle, 1981; Melquiades, Alchemy and Narrative Theory: The Quest for Gold in Cien años de soledad by C.S. Halka, 1981; Gabriel García Márquez: Revolutions in Wonderland, 1981, and One Hundred Years of Solitude: Modes of Reading, 1991, both by Regina Janes; The Evolution of Myth in García Márquez from La hojarasca to Cien años de soledad by Robert Lewis Sims, 1981; La soledad de Gabriel García Márquez: Una conversación infinita by M. Braso Fernandez, 1982; García Márquez: La soledad y la gloria: Su vida y su obra by O. Collazos, 1983; Gabriel García Márquez: El coronel no tiene quien le escriba (in English) by J.B.H. Box, 1984; Essays on Gabriel García Márquez edited by K. Oyarzum and W.W. Megenny, 1984; Gabriel García Márquez by Raymond L. Williams, 1984; En el punto de mira: Gabriel García Márquez edited by A.M. López, 1985; Interpretaciones a la obra de García Márquez (anthology), 1986; Critical Perspectives on Gabriel García Márquez edited by B.A. Shaw and N. Vera-Godwin, 1986; Gabriel García Márquez and Latin America edited by Alok Bhalla, 1987; Gabriel García Márquez and the Invention of America by Carlos Fuentes, 1987; Gabriel García Márquez: New Readings edited by Bernard McGuirk and Richard Cardwell, 1987; Critical Essays on Gabriel García Márquez edited by George R. McMurray, 1987; Gabriel García Márquez, Writer of Colombia by Stephen Minta, 1987; Guía para la lectura de Cien años de soledad by M.E. Montaner Ferrer, 1987; García Márquez: Edificación de un arte nacional y popular by E. Rama, 1987; Gabriel García Márquez and the Powers of Fiction edited by Julio Ortega and C. Elliott, 1988; Gabriel García Márquez edited by Harold Bloom, 1989; Understanding Gabriel García Márquez by Kathleen McNerney, 1989; Como leer a García Márquez: Una interpretación sociológica by J.L. Mendez, 1989; Gabriel García Márquez: The Man and His Work by Gene H. Bell-Villada, 1990; Gabriel García Márquez: One Hundred Years of Solitude by Michael Wood, 1990; Gabriel García Márquez: A Study of the Short Fiction by Harley D. Oberhelman, 1991; Gabriel García Márquez: Solitude and Solidarity by Michael Bell, 1993; Home as Creation: The Influence of Early Childhood Experience in the Literary Creation of Gabriel García Márquez, Agustín Yáñez, and Juan Rulfo by Wilma E. Detjens, 1993; Painting Literature: Dostoevsky, Kafka, Pirandello, and Gabriel García Márquez, in Living Color by Constance A. Pedoto, 1993; Circularity and Visions of the New World in William Faulkner, Gabriel García Márquez and Osman Lins by Rosa Sims, 1993; García Márquez: Crónica de una muerte anunciada by Stephen M. Hart, 1994; Intertextuality in García Márquez by Arnold M. Penuel, 1994; Rescuing History: Faulkner, García Márquez, and Morrison as Post-colonial Writers of the Americas by Barbara J. Wilcots, 1995; García Márquez, edited and introduced by Robin Fiddian, 1995; Gabriel García Márquez: A Critical Companion by Ruben Pelayo, 2001.

* * *

Novelist, storyteller, polemical journalist, recipient of the Nobel prize for literature, the Colombian Gabriel García Márquez has been among the most influential of 20th-century Latin American writers. Appearing at the crest of “the Boom” in Latin American literature in the 1960s, his novel, Cien años de soledad (One Hundred Years of Solitude), made “magic realism” a common critical term, and the novel still generates imitators from Chile to London, Bombay to Massachusetts. Definitively postmodern in its self-referentiality, its foregrounding of the act of writing, and its temporal warps, the book is also firmly grounded in the Colombian-Venezuelan regionalist tradition, a wider Latin American tradition of fantastic literature, and in the typically American project of national self-definition in the face of an imperial past and present cultural diversity.

Simultaneously an account of a nation, a town, a family, a house, and a book, the novel tells an episodic and realistic story of development and decline, remarkable for the sheer quantity of storytelling it accommodates. Instead of a single plot line taking a few characters through hundreds of pages, a seemingly inexhaustible invention produces story after story through some six generations. Always precisely individuated, episodes and characters parallel and contrast with each other, creating constantly shifting, intricate patterns within a lucid, accessible narrative. If the novel’s fecundity violates expectations, so do its events.

Brought back are episodes conventionally excluded by the rationalist criteria which, developing in the 17th and 18th centuries along with the novel, had separated the novel from the romance. The effect is to interrogate the reader’s sense of possibility, to put into question what constitutes reality. Creating a town, Macondo, where it seems almost anything can happen, García Márquez’s new epic narrator re-integrates events for long ruled out as too bizarre because they do not happen at all (virgins rising into the heavens holding onto the family sheets, or men returning from the dead), because they are no longer believed to happen (priests who levitate or magicians who return from the dead), or because although they may happen, they fail to fit into dominant rationalist categories (Aristotle’s possible improbabilities, such as a rain of dead birds or a plague of butterflies).

Effecting a radical defamiliarization, García Márquez also makes appear wonderful events or objects that modernity takes for granted and that no longer seem strange (the original sense of “magic realism” in art criticism), such as the television or a block of ice. Nor are the inventions ever entirely arbitrary: the most immediately accessible ones create patterns of cultural history, economic development, or political conflict, which are usually satirical, but occasionally pathetic or sentimental. Many create powerful symbols, readily transferrable to other contexts, such as a plague of insomnia inducing forgetfulness of words and their referents. Creating an alternative to the conventions of social or psychological realism and modernist fragmentation, the novel represents a world on the cultural margin without condescending to it as primitive, mythologizing it as nobly mysterious, or pitying it as deprived. As fiction, it is clearly a much livelier, more stimulating, more historically and politically conscious work than most of the American and European fiction of its period.

From his earliest short stories, García Márquez has manifested his impatience with “meat-and-potatoes” realism. The earliest fictions evoke dreams, doubles, and ghosts, altered states of consciousness, “real” hallucinations, in stories that omit, or barely allude to, their most crucial concern. Under the helpfully foreign influence of Faulkner and Hemingway, he turned to more realistic representations and subjects, to social history and politics: the history of a family and town in the Faulknerian monologues of La hojarasca (Leaf Storm), or of a town and La violencia (the major Colombian political conflict of the mid-20th century) in the intercut episodic structure of La mala hora (In Evil Hour), and in the spare short stories of Los funerales de la Mamá Grande (Big Mama’s Funeral). In some of the stories of that volume, and in the short novel El coronel no tiene quien le escriba (No One Writes to the Colonel), García Márquez discovered the power of humour and ironic juxtaposition to both relieve and intensify the oppressive political atmosphere he communicates. Through One Hundred Years of Solitude, El otoño del patriarca (The Autumn of the Patriarch), La increíble y triste historia de la cándida Eréndira. . . (Innocent Eréndira), and some short stories, García Márquez deployed the fantastic or impossible element often taken to characterize his fiction, and then abandoned it.

This abandonment is characteristic of García Márquez. In addition to the inventiveness and originality of his fictional fabling, he is a master craftsman, intent on locating unique shapes or structures for each fiction. While certain stylistic features remain constant (and have become perhaps too habitual for the writer himself: the winds of disillusion waft too frequently), he works very hard not to give his readers what many of them may want: a hundred One Hundred Years of Solitudes. Each work develops a distinct structural principle. One Hundred Years of Solitude depends on the making of a book through the destruction of the town, family, and house that are the subjects of the book; The Autumn of the Patriarch on the swirl of voices and constant resurrections that constitute the power of dictators and their eternal, invasive presence; Crónica de una muerte anunciada (Chronicle of a Death Foretold) on the predictive shape of classical Greek tragedy; El amor en los tiempos del cólera (Love in the Time of Cholera) on an impossible openness established by the refusal to close off the fiction; El general en su laberinto (The General in His Labyrinth) on a journey to an ending that attempts to start again but cannot. As Phil West has observed, myths always provide a second chance; history never does. Suggesting an ambiguous relationship with history and fiction, García Márquez’s fictions characteristically provide second chances in the body of the fiction, but deny them at the end, as the fiction moves into the reader’s history.

Often humorous, at times bitterly ironic or grotesque, occasionally tinged with pathos, García Márquez’s work possesses a rare power of invention. Deficient in the psychological and linguistic density characteristic of some modern writers, García Márquez at his best achieves continuous surprise in the elaboration of a rococo, tessellated prose surface that makes the reader aware of the simultaneous insistence and insufficiency of interpretation.

—Regina Janes

See the essays on Love in the Time of Cholera and One Hundred Years of Solitude.

GAUTIER, (Pierre-Jules) Théophile

Born: Tarbes, France, 30 August 1811. Education: Educated at Lycée Louis-le-Grand and Lyée Charlemagne, both Paris; studied art in Paris. Family: One son, by Eugénie Fort, and two daughters, by Ernesta Grisi. Career: Member of the circle of French Romantic writers including Gérard de Nerval, q.v., and Pétrus Borel; journalist, 1831–36; contributed to Chronique de Paris, from 1835; art and drama critic, La Presse, 1836–55 and Le Moniteur universel, from 1845; also contributed to Revue de Paris, Le Figaro, Ariel, Le Cabinet de lecture, and La France littéraire; travelled to Spain to advise on art collecting, 1840. Died: 23 October 1872.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Poésies complètes. 1845; edited by René Jasinski. 3 vols., 1858; 2 vols., 1932; revised edition, 1970.
Oeuvres. 2 vols., 1890.
Oeuvres. 1893.
Oeuvres érotiques. 1953.
Nouvelles, edited by Claudine Lacoste. 1979.
Récits fantastiques, edited by Jean-Jacques Eideldinger. 1981.

Fiction

Les Jeunes-France: Romans goguenards. 1833.
Mademoiselle de Maupin. 2 vols., 1835; revised edition, 1845; edited by Adolphe Boschot, 1966; as Mademoiselle de Maupin, translated anonymously, 1836; as A Romance of the Impossible, translated by Paul Hookham, 1912; also translated by Burton Rascoe, 1922; R. and E. Powys Mathers, 1938; Paul Seiver, 1948; Joanna Richardson, 1981.
L'Eldorado. 1837.
Nouvelles. 1845; as Stories, translated by Lafcadio Hearn, 1908.
Militona. 1847.
Les Roués innocents. 1847.
Les Deux Étoiles. 2 vols., 1848.
La Peau de tigre. 3 vols., 1852.
Un trio de romans (includes Militona; Jean et Jeannette; Arria Marcella). 1852.
Avatar. 1856.
La Croix de Berny. 1857.
Jettatura. 1857; edited by V.J.T. Spiers, 1891.
Le Roman de la momie. 1858; as The Romance of a Mummy, translated by M. Young, 1886; as The Mummy's Romance, translated by G.F. Monkshood, 1908.
Le Capitaine Fracasse. 2 vols., 1863; edited by G.F. Monkshood, 1910; as Captain Fracasse, translated by E.M. Beam, 1898.
Romans et contes. 1863.
La Belle-Jenny. 1866; as Partie carrée, 1889.
Spirite. 1866; edited by Reginald and Douglas Menville, 1890, Adolphe Boschot, 1961, and by Marc Eigeldinger, 1970; translated by Patrick Jenkins, 1995.
Mademoiselle Daphné. 1881; revised edition, 1984.
One of Cleopatra's Nights and Other Fantastic Romances, translated by Lafcadio Hearn. 1886.
Une Nuit de Cléopâtre. 1894.
Le Pavillon sur l'eau, edited by W.G. Hartog. 1902.
The Romances. 10 vols., 1903.

The Beautiful Vampire—La Morte Amoureuse, translated by Paul Hookham. 1926.
Triple Mirror, translated by Mervyn Savill. 1951.
The Bridge of Asses, translated by Albert Meltzer. 1953.
Skin-Deep, translated by Mervyn Savill. 1955.
Short Stories, translated by George Burnham Ives. 1970.
My Fantoms, translated by David Farris. 1976.
Three Supernatural Tales, edited by Robert Navon, translated by George Burnham Ives. 1989.

Verse

Poésies. 1830; edited and translated by Harry Cockerham, 1985.
Albertus; ou, L'Âme et le péché. 1832.
La Comédie de la mort. 1838.
Poésies complètes. 1845.
España. 1845; edited by René Jasinski, 1929.
Émaux et Camées. 1852; 3rd edition (includes "L'Art"), 1858.
Premières poésies 1830–1845. 1870.
Obscenia: Lettre à la Présidente. Poésies érotiques. 1907.
Gentle Enchanter, translated by Brian Hill. 1960.

Plays

Une larme du diable. 1839.
Giselle (ballet scenario; produced 1841). 1841; as Giselle; or, The Wilis, translated by Violette Verdy, 1970.
La Péri (ballet scenario; produced 1843). 1843.
Un voyage en Espagne. 1843.
La Juive de Constantine. 1846.
Le Selam. 1850.
Pâquerette (ballet scenario; produced 1851). 1851.
Gemma (ballet scenario; produced 1854). 1854.
Théâtre de poche. 1855.
Sakountala (ballet scenario; produced 1858). 1858.
Théâtre (includes Une larme du diable; Le Tricorne enchanté; La Fausse Conversion; Le Pierrot posthume; L'Amour souffle où il veut; Giselle; La Péri; Gemma; Sakountala). 1872.

Other

Tra los montes. 2 vols., 1843; as Voyage en Espagne, 1843; as The Romantic in Spain, translated by Catherine A. Phillips, 1926.
Les Grottesques. 2 vols., 1844.
Les Beautés de l'opéra, with Jules Janin and Philarète Chasles. 1845.
Zigzags. 1845.
Les Fêtes de Madrid. 1847.
Salon de 1847. 1847.
Lettre à la Présidente. 1850.
Oeuvres humoristiques. 1851.
Caprices et zigzags. 1852.
Italia. 1852.
Celle-ci et celle-là. 1853.
Constantinople. 1853; as Constantinople of Today, translated by Robert Howe Gould, 1854.
Les Beaux-Arts en Europe. 2 vols., 1855–56.
L'Art moderne. 1856.
De la mode. 1858.

Histoire de l'art dramatique en France depuis vingt-cinq ans. 6 vols., 1858–59; translated in part as The Romantic Ballet, by Cyril W. Beaumont, 1932.

Honoré de Balzac. 1858; revised edition, 1859.

Les Peintres vivants. 1858.

Abécédaire du Salon de 1861. 1861.

Les Dieux et les demi-dieux de la peinture, with A. Houssaye and P. de Saint-Victor. 1864.

Loin de Paris. 1865.

Quand on voyage. 1865.

Voyage en Russie. 2 vols., 1865; as Russia, by Théophile Gautier and Other French Travellers of Note, translated by Florence MacIntyre, 1970.

Les Progrès de la poésie française depuis 1830. 1868.

Ménagerie intime. 1869; as A Domestic Menagerie, translated by Mrs. W. Chance, 1899.

La Nature chez elle. 1870.

Tableaux de siège, Paris, 1870–1871. 1871.

Henri Regnault. 1872.

Histoire du romantisme. 1872.

Portraits contemporains. 1874.

Portraits et souvenirs littéraires. 1875.

Voyage en Italie. 1876; as Journeys in Italy, translated by D.B. Vermilye, 1903.

L'Orient (essays). 2 vols., 1877.

Fusains et eaux-fortes. 1880.

Guide de l'amateur au musée du Louvre. 1882.

Souvenirs de théâtre, d'art et de critique. 1883.

Omphale: histoire rococo. 1896.

La Musique (reviews). 1911.

Les Plus Belles Lettres de Théophile Gautier, edited by Pierre Descaves. 1962.

Correspondance générale, edited by Claudine Lacoste-Vesseyre. 1985.

Gautier on Dance (reviews), edited and translated by Ivor Guest. 1986.

*

Critical Studies: Théophile Gautier, souvenirs intimes by Ernest Feydeau, 1874; Histoire des oeuvres de Théophile Gautier by Charles Spoelberch de Lovenjoul, 1887; The Dramatic Criticism of Théophile Gautier by Helen Patch, 1922; The Creative Imagination of Théophile Gautier by Louise Dillingham, 1927; Gautier and the Romantics by John Palache, 1927; Théophile Gautier: His Life and Times by Joanna Richardson, 1958; Les Ballets de Théophile Gautier by Edwin Binney, 1965; Ideal and Reality in the Fictional Narratives of Théophile Gautier by Albert B. Smith, 1969; The Art Criticism of Théophile Gautier by Michael Clifford Spencer, 1969; Théophile Gautier, auteur dramatique by C. Book-Seninger, 1972; Théophile Gautier by Serge Fauchereau, 1972; Théophile Gautier (in English) by Richard B. Grant, 1975; Théophile Gautier by Philip E. Tennant, 1975; Gautier issue of Europe, May 1979; Études et recherches sur Théophile Gautier, prosateur by Jean Richer, 1981; Théophile Gautier: A Romantic Critic of the Visual Arts by Robert Snell, 1982; Le Regard de Narcisse: Romans et nouvelles de Théophile Gautier by Marie-Claude Schapira, 1984; La Critique d'art de Théophile Gautier by Claudine Lacoste-Vesseyre, 1985; Rêve de Pierre: La Quête de la femme chez Théophile Gautier by Natalie David-Weill, 1989; Three Nineteenth-century French Writer/Artists and the Maghreb: The Literary and Artistic Depictions of North Africa by Théophile Gautier, Eugène Fromentin, and Pierre Loti by Elwood Hartman, 1994.

* * *

Poet, writer of novellas and short stories, novelist, critic, journalist, and author of inimitably vivid travel books, Théophile Gautier stands out among French writers of his generation.

Being, as he himself told the Goncourt brothers, a “man for whom the visible world exists,” he became an art student at the age of 19. He soon realized, however, that he was lacking in technical perfection and turned to literature, bringing to his new medium not only a painterly love of form and colour but also an imagination deeply imbued with impressions of the visual arts. His career as an art student had brought him into contact with the young Romantic fraternity of painters and writers and he was later to write a history of the Romantic movement, not published until after his death.

Seldom highly creative but always a flawless craftsman, Gautier supplied a much needed corrective to the Romantics’ diffuse style. In his preface to Premières poésies [First Poems] he displayed an indifference towards politics, society, and even nature, that was uncharacteristic of the French Romantic movement. A work closer to that movement, in theme if not in technique, is the lengthy narrative poem Albertus, jaunty in style and showing obvious traces of Byronic influence, which describes how a young painter falls into a sorceress’s hands. Gautier continued his flight from Romanticism in Les Jeunes-France, mocking both himself and his youthful fellow artists for their callow extravagances of thought, dress, and behaviour.

Turning aside from Romanticism, Gautier reverted to the theme already foreshadowed in his preface to Albertus, advocating the doctrine of “art for art’s sake” in the celebrated—indeed almost notorious—preface to Mademoiselle de Maupin (A Romance of the Impossible). Here he pours scorn upon the hypocrisies of contemporary society, rejects conventional notions of morality, and emphasizes the cult of beauty. In the novel itself the eponymous heroine, dressed as a man, engages in numerous exploits and is loved by a woman but also by d’Albert, whose mistress she finally becomes. A Romance of the Impossible implicitly condemns the formless sentimentalizing which, in Gautier’s judgment, was the unworthy ideal of so many of his contemporaries.

Giving further expression to his Romantic leanings, La Comédie de la mort [Comedy of Death] treats the theme of memento mori which had perhaps been suggested to Gautier by his growing interest in Spanish engraving and painting. His critical work Les Grottesques extolled the personal and literary merits of French poets of the earlier part of the 17th century such as Théophile de Viau, Saint-Amant, and Scarron, who, not only in their writings but also in their individualism, seemed to him to foreshadow the Romantic outlook.

Gautier’s travels in Greece confirmed his conviction that the literary artist should seek only Classical purity of form, without the need to impart any moral lesson. In Émaux et Camées [Enamels and Cameos] he emerged as the leading proponent, and practitioner, of “art for art’s sake” and thus as the inspiration of the Parnassian school. Composed (with the notable exception of “L’Art”) in octosyllabic quatrains and with many rimes riches, rhyming in the manner of the English or German ballad, these short poems avoid the 12-syllable alexandrine favoured by the (French) Romantics. They teem with images of plastic beauty, burning with a hard gem-like quality that perfectly conveys their underlying theme that life is short whereas art is eternal. But “Symphonie en blanc majeur,” “Affinités secrètes,” “Clair de lune sentimental,” and other poems in Émaux et Camées foreshadow symbolism in their tonal sensitivity, synaesthesia (or use of artistic transposition), and latent-fluidity of form.

Gautier was also the author of Le Roman de la momie (The Romance of a Mummy), in which he admirably juxtaposes ancient Egypt and the contemporary world, and of Le Capitaine Fracasse (Captain Fracasse), the last, in terms of year of publication, of the great French works in the Romantic tradition of the historical novel. Captain Fracasse is a lengthy and picaresque rehandling of Scarron's 17th-century Le Roman comique (The Comic Romance). A young nobleman, Sigognac, forsakes his ancestral home on falling in love with an actress. He accompanies her and the group of strolling players to which she belongs on their travels throughout France, experiencing many prodigious adventures along the way.

In La Presse, mainly during the years 1836–40, and in Le Moniteur universel, from 1845, Gautier published more than 2,000 feuilletons on painting, ballet, and literature. Of his feuilletons about the Salons and visits to art collections those recording his admiration of Rubens, Goya, and Delacroix are outstanding; several volumes of art criticism, largely based on these feuilletons, also came from his pen. In his day he was an unrivalled ballet critic. He was also the author of numerous comedies and ballets, and the joint author of Giselle. His literary criticism is notable for its studies of Lamartine, Baudelaire, and Balzac (whose short story “The Unknown Masterpiece” he may even have helped to write). In Tra los monies (The Romantic in Spain) he proved himself to be a fine writer of travel sketches; in the former book the visual inspiration is especially evident.

More clearly than any other French writer, Gautier represents the transition from Romanticism to Parnassianism. Balzac, Flaubert, Sainte-Beuve, Baudelaire, Banville, the Goncourt brothers, and other literary contemporaries held him in high esteem. His work is often derivative, however. His verse, in particular, lacks an emotional and intellectual content commensurate with its perfection of form. His output was enormous, Émaux et Camées, Spirite (a short novel of the supernatural), novellas such as Militona, Avatar, Arria Marcella, and Jettatura are among his finest achievements. Maupassant appears to have been influenced by the subject matter of these shorter fictions.

—Donald Adamson

See the essay on “Art.”

GENET, Jean

Born: Paris, France, 19 December 1910 (illegitimate); took his mother's surname. Abandoned by his parents, and reared by foster parents in Le Morvan. Career: Sent to reformatory, Mettray, 1926–29, for petty crimes; enlisted in the Foreign Legion, served in Morocco 1932–33, but deserted in 1936 and again in 1939; lived the life of a criminal in several countries until 1942; began writing during term in Fresnes Prison; met Jean Cocteau, q.v., in the early 1940s; began publishing his works in the mid-1940s; met Jean-Paul Sartre, q.v., and Simone de Beauvoir, q.v., in 1944; sentenced to life imprisonment for recurrent theft, 1948, until friends and supporters secured a presidential pardon in 1949; writing all but ceased after 1966; subsequently supporter of various radical causes, including the Black Panthers in the United States, Palestinian liberation groups, and the Baader-Meinhof group in Germany. Died: 15 April 1986.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

The Selected Writings of Jean Genet, edited with introduction by Edmund White, 1993.

Fiction

Notre Dame des Fleurs. 1944; revised version, in Oeuvres complètes, 2, 1951; as Our Lady of the Flowers, translated by Bernard Frechtman, 1949; as Gutter in the Sky, translated by Frechtman, 1955.

Miracle de la rose. 1946; revised version, in Oeuvres complètes, 2, 1951; as Miracle of the Rose, translated by Bernard Frechtman, 1965.

Pompes funèbres. 1947; revised version, in Oeuvres complètes, 3, 1953; as Funeral Rites, translated by Bernard Frechtman, 1969.

Querelle de Brest. 1947; revised version, in Oeuvres complètes, 3, 1953; as Querelle of Brest, translated by Gregory Streatham, 1966.

Plays

Les Bonnes (produced 1947; revised version, produced 1954). 1948; revised versions 1954, 1958; as The Maids, translated by Bernard Frechtman, with Deathwatch, 1954.

Adame Miroir (ballet scenario), music by Darius Milhaud. 1948.

Haute surveillance (produced 1949). 1949; revised versions, 1965, and in Oeuvres complètes, 4, 1968; as Deathwatch, with The Maids, translated by Bernard Frechtman, 1954.

Le Balcon (produced 1957). 1956; revised versions, 1960, 1962; edited by David Walker, 1982; as The Balcony, translated by Bernard Frechtman, 1958; revised translation, 1966; also translated by Barbara Wright and Terry Hands, 1991.

Les Nègres (produced 1959). 1958; as The Blacks, translated by Bernard Frechtman, 1960.

Les Paravents (produced 1961). 1961; revised version, 1976; as The Screens, translated by Bernard Frechtman, 1962.

Splendid's, translated by Neil Bartlett. 1995.

Screenplays: Un chant d'amour, 1950; Goubbiah, 1955; Mademoiselle, 1966.

Verse

Chants secrets. 1947.

La Galère. 1947.

Poèmes. 1948; revised edition, 1966.

Poems. 1980.

Treasures of the Night: Collected Poems, translated by Steven Finch. 1981.

Other

Journal du voleur. 1949; as The Thief's Journal, translated by Bernard Frechtman, 1954.

L'Enfant criminel, Adame Miroir. 1949.

Oeuvres complètes. 4 vols., 1951–68.

Lettres à Roger Blin. 1966; as Letters to Roger Blin: Reflections on the Theatre, translated by Richard Seaver, 1969.
May Day Speech. 1970.
Reflections on the Theatre and Other Writings. 1972.
Lettres à Olga et Marc Barbezat. 1988.
Fragments et autres textes. 1990.
L'Ennemi déclaré: Textes et entretiens, edited by Albert Dichy. 1991.
 Editor, with R. Gallet, Poètes anglais contemporains: Geoffrey Hill, Philip Larkin, Kathleen Raine, R.S. Thomas, K. White. 1982.

*

Bibliography: Jean Genet: A Checklist of His Works in French, English and German by Richard N. Coe, in Australian Journal of French Studies, VI, 1969; Jean Genet and His Critics: An Annotated Bibliography 1943–1980 by Richard C. and Suzanne A. Webb, 1982.

Critical Studies: Saint Genet, Comédien et martyr by Jean-Paul Sartre, 1952; The Imagination of Jean Genet by Joseph H. McMahon, 1963; Jean Genet by Tom F. Driver, 1966; The Vision of Jean Genet by Richard N. Coe, 1968, and The Theatre of Jean Genet: A Casebook edited by Coe, 1970; Jean Genet by Bettina L. Knapp, 1968, revised edition, 1989; Jean Genet: A Study of His Novels and Plays by Philip Thody, 1968; Profane Play, Ritual, and Jean Genet: A Study of His Drama by Lewis T. Cetta, 1974; Jean Genet in Tangier by Mohamed Choukri, 1974; A Genetic Approach to Structures in the Work of Jean Genet by Camille Naish, 1978; Genet: A Collection of Critical Essays edited by Peter Brooks and Joseph Halpern, 1979; Genet's Ritual Play [Les Bonnes] by Sylvie Debevec Henning, 1981; Jean Genet by Jeannette L. Savona, 1983; No Man's Stage: A Semiotic Study of Jean Genet's Major Plays by Una Chaudhuri, 1986; Jean Genet and the Semiotics of Performance by Laura Oswald, 1989; Jean Genet: A Biography of Deceit, 1910–1951 by Harry E. Stewart and Rob Roy McGregor, 1989; Genet, Les Nègres by J.P. Little, 1990; The Cinema of Jean Genet: Un chant d'amour by Jane Giles, 1991; The Rites of Passage of Jean Genet: The Art and Aesthetics of Risk Taking by Gene A. Plunka, 1992; File on Genet by Richard Webb, 1992; Genet by Edmund White, 1993; Artaud, Genet, Shange: The Absence of the Theatre of Cruelty by Sean Carney, 1994; Flowers for Jean Genet by Josef Winkler, translated by Michael Roloff, 1997; Flowers and Revolution: A Collection of Writings on Jean Genet, edited by Barbara Read with Ian Birchall, 1997; The Body Object: Self and Text in Jean Genet and Samuel Beckett by David Houston Jones, 2000.

* * *

When Jean-Paul Sartre published his long study, Saint Genet, Comédien et martyr (Saint Genet, Actor and Martyr) in 1952, many readers came to Jean Genet through Sartre's evaluation and sympathy. The book proposed that Genet be classified among the greatest French writers of the century. At every step of the way, Genet had known what he was doing. Hence Sartre's term to designate him comédien or actor. Genet never failed to acknowledge the condition imposed upon him by society when he was young; hence the second term in the title of martyr.

One day the parallels will be studied that exist between Rimbaud's revolt against his condition in the world, and Genet's submission to his fate. A world only half-seen by Rimbaud in episodes of Une saison en enfer (A Season in Hell) is raucously dramatized in Genet's first novel Notre Dame des Fleurs (Our Lady of the Flowers). Extravagant in every sense, this late adolescent world of Montmartre, engendered by the early adolescent world in the prisons of Mettray and Fontevrault, is the légende dorée of Genet, in which existence is a cult, a ceremony of evil where the male is female. Death in violence obsesses the minds of the tough heroes of Genet (les durs: Bulkaen, Pilorge, Harcamone), and martyrdom obsesses the minds of the effeminate (Divine and Notre-Dame). The guillotine is the symbol of the male and of his greatest glory.

The central drama in his books is always the struggle between the man in authority and the man to whom he is attracted. The psychological varieties of this struggle are many. Each of the novels and each of the plays is a different world in which the same drama unfolds. Querelle de Brest is the ship: naval officers and sailors. Pompes funèbres (Funeral Rites) is the Occupation: Nazi officers and young Frenchmen of the capital. Our Lady of the Flowers is Montmartre, with its world of male prostitutes and pimps. Miracle de la rose (Miracle of the Rose) is the prison, with the notorious convicts and slaves.

The play Haute surveillance (Deathwatch) is also the prison cell with the intricate hierarchy of criminals where those standing under the death sentence exert the greatest power and prestige over those with lesser sentences. Les Bonnes (The Maids) is the household, where in the absence of the mistress one of the maids plays her part. Les Nègres (The Blacks) is the world of colonialism: the conflict between whites and blacks. It is much more than a satire on colonialism. The oppression from which the blacks suffer is so hostile, so incomprehensible, as to be easily the oppression of mankind. The hostility which Genet persistently celebrates throughout all his work, in his opulent language, is the strangely distorted love joining the saint and the criminal, the guard and the prisoner, the policeman and the thief, the master and the slave, the white and the black.

—Wallace Fowlie

See the essays on The Balcony and The Maids.

GEZELLE, Guido

Born: Bruges, Austrian Netherlands (now Belgium), 1 May 1803. Education: Educated at a seminary in Roeselare, 1846–49. Career: Became priest in 1854; appointed to teaching post at his old school, where his unorthodox pedagogical methods caused his dismissal; co-director, English College, Bruges, 1860–61; teacher of philosophy, Seminarium Anglo-Belgicum, 1861–65; journalist for anti-liberal magazine 't Jaer 30, 1864–70, and 't Jaer 70, 1870–72; founder and journalist for the illustrated weekly Rond den Heerd [Round the Hearth], 1865–71; parish priest of St. Walburgis, 1865–72; moved to Kortrijk, where he worked as chaplain; continued ecclesiastical and journalistic work for De Vrijheid and Gazette van Kortrijk; recalled to Bruges in 1899, and granted position of rector of the English Convent. Died: 27 November 1899.

PUBLICATIONS

* * *

Collections

- Dichtwerken* [Poetical Works]. 10 vols., 1903–05, revised edition, 14 vols., 1913.
- Jubileumuitgave* [Jubilee Edition]. 18 vols., 1930–39.
- Werken* [Works], edited by Frank Baur. 4 vols., 1949–50.
- Briefwisseling* [Correspondence], edited by R.F. Lissens. 1970.
- Verzameld dichtwerk* [Collected Poetry], edited by K. de Busschere. 1980–92.
- Evening and the Rose: 30 Poems*, translated by Paul Claes and Christine D'Haen, 1989.

Verse

- Boodschap van de vogels en andere opgezette dieren* [Message from the Birds and Other Stuffed Animals]. 1856.
- Vlaemsche dichtoefeningen* [Flemish Poetry Exercises]. 1858.
- Kerkhofblommen* [Graveyard Flowers]. 1858.
- XXXIII Kleengedichtjes* [Thirty-Three Little Poems]. 1860.
- Gedichten, gezangen en gebeden* [Poems, Songs, and Prayers]. 1862, reprinted 1976.
- Liederen, eerdichten et reliqua* [Songs, Poems of Praise, and Relics]. 1880.
- Driemaal XXXIII Kleengedichtjes* [Thrice Thirty-Three Little Poems]. 1881.
- Tijdkrans* [Garland of Time]. 1893.
- Rijmsnoer* [Rhyme String]. 1897.
- Laatste verzen* [Last Poems]. 1901.
- [Selection], translated by M. Swepstone. 1937.
- [15 Poems], translated by C. and F. Stillman, in Lyrice Belgica I. 1960.
- Poems*, translated by Christine d'Haen. 1971.
- [12 Poems], translated by A. van Eyken, in Dutch Crossing, 35. 1988.

Other

- Uitstap in de Warande* [Excursion in the Warande]. 1882.
- De ring om 't kerkelijk jaar* [Ring Around the Church Year]. 1908.
- Brieven van, aan, over Gezelle* (letters; some in English). 2 vols., 1937–39.
- De Briefwisseling tussen G. Gezelle en Ernest Rembry 1872–1899*, edited by C. Verstraeten. 1987.
- Translator, Hiawatha, by Longfellow. 1886.

*

Critical Studies: Woordkunst van Guido Gezelle by J. Craynet, 1904; Het leven van Guido Gezelle by A. Walgrave, 1924; Guido Gezelle by Henriette Roland Hoist, 1931; Guido Gezelle by A. Visser, 1949; Guido Gezelle en de andere by H. Bruning, 1954; Guido Gezelle by A. van Duinkerken, 1958; Van het leven naar het boek by J.J.M. Westenbroek, 1967; Guido Gezelle katholiek vrijmetselaar by R. Reniers, 1973; De taalkunst van Guido Gezelle by Albert Westerlinck, 1980; Guido Gezelle: Flemish Priest and Poet by Hermine J. van Nuis, 1986; De wonde in 't hert by Christine d'Haen, 1988; Mijnheer Gezelle by Michel van der Plas, 1991; Gezelle, de dichter: Studies by Jan J.M. Westenbroek, 1995; Gezelle: Humorist by Johan van Iseghem, 1999.

Guido Gezelle is the Dutch poet who singlehandedly took the Dutch language to a summit of beauty and complexity hitherto undreamt of. There are at least five Gezelles. Perhaps the least interesting for literary purposes is Gezelle the journalist. Since he was a priest who could obviously write well, Gezelle was forced by his bishop to invest much time and energy in political journalism, both to expound the policies of the Catholic People's Party and to attack and chastise its opponents. In that capacity he made a number of enemies, and the stress connected with his journalistic work brought him to the brink of a nervous breakdown.

Gezelle the linguist or, as he would have preferred to think of himself, the philologist, was interested in the Dutch language in general, and in his own West Flemish dialect in particular. He cultivated the latter for two reasons. The use of this dialect enhanced his poetry, especially in the later phase, as it was more effortlessly melodious than standard Dutch. It was also, he felt (and many agreed), a "Catholic" Dutch, as opposed to the "Calvinist" variant that had come to dominate Holland.

The third Gezelle is the educator, whether as teacher in the classroom or as editor (who also often filled whole issues with the fruit of his labour) of weekly magazines designed to teach and to entertain the faithful, particularly those whose education had progressed little beyond acquiring the basic skill of reading itself.

The fourth Gezelle is the priest-poet, responsible for a sizeable part of the poetry that has come down to us. As a priest, Gezelle felt both close to and responsible for the people entrusted to his care and would often write small poems, kleengedichtjes, to commemorate important events in their lives.

The fifth Gezelle, the most interesting, wrote experimental poetry before the term was even conceived of, and poésie pure long before Brémond. For many it is he who represents the "real" Gezelle. His poetry is constructed around several main themes. Many poems reflect his highly-strung religious idealism. Some are marred by didacticism, while others achieve a level of mystical lyricism rarely equalled in world literature. Other poems represent the reverse of his idealism: a feeling of inadequacy, sinfulness, and despair that is also to be found in the so-called "terrible sonnets" of Gerard Manley Hopkins, the poet to whom Gezelle is most often compared. Gezelle, however, wrote few sonnets; he preferred experimenting with sound, rhythm, and metre.

Another principal theme is that of friendship. A number of close friends stayed loyal to Gezelle all his life, and he commemorated his affection for them in a number of poems, the best known of which is probably "Dien avond en die rooze" [That Evening and That Rose].

Throughout his life Gezelle fought for the recognition of Dutch as an official language by the Belgian state, and against the dominant position of French, which was used almost exclusively by the civil service and in the courts, even though the majority of people in Flanders, the northern half of the country, were hardly able to understand it, let alone communicate in it. Some of Gezelle's "Flemish" poems are evocations of the glorious past in a somewhat romantic vein. Others, the more interesting, range from parody to an almost incantatory celebration of the sheer range of the language itself.

The last, but certainly not least, main theme is that of nature, which to Gezelle represented the "visible words" of God, according to the old mystical belief that God spoke to man in words destined for his ears, and written down in the Bible, but also in words destined for his eyes, and present in nature all around him. On the basis of this attitude, any and every celebration of nature, even of the smallest insects, is also a celebration of God himself, and all poetic meditations on nature automatically become religious utterances of prayer. Since Gezelle was a keen observer of all that went on around him, not only (as a philologist) of the language his people spoke, but also (as a poet) of the nature they lived in, or sometimes had to struggle against, he produced many poems that are prayers, or prayers that are poems.

The final 15 years of Gezelle's life saw his consecration as the national poet of the Flemish people. He was awarded many honours, including a state funeral. The ultimate paradox of his life as a poet is, perhaps, that he will always remain the prisoner of his own excellence. The very virtuosity, inventiveness, and exuberant revelling in the power of the Dutch language that establishes so many of his greatest poems as truly of world stature also militates against their being translatable effectively. For this reason he has not been translated frequently or successfully into any of the more widely spoken languages.

—André Lefevere

GHĀLIB, (Mīrzā Muḥammad) Asadullāh Khān

Born: Agra, Uttar Pradesh, India, in 1797. Father killed when he was five; guardian uncle died when he was nine. Education: Self-educated: well-versed in classical subjects, Arabic, and developed interests in philosophy, Sufism, and astrology. Family: Married nobleman's daughter in 1810. Career: Began writing poetry in Urdu from the age of ten, but after 1847 wrote mostly in Persian. On uncle's death, his estate was confiscated: subsequently devoted much time attempting to regain control of his share; lived for most of his life in Delhi, apart from two years (1827–29) in Calcutta; attended the court of the Mughal rulers, from 1847; commissioned to write official history of the Mughal dynasty, in Persian, 1850; appointed official poetry teacher, 1854; witnessed the Indian Mutiny 1857–58, and recorded his experiences in letters and journals. Died: 1869.

PUBLICATIONS

Verse

Dī vā-i Ghālib [Ghālib's Works]. 1841; 5th edition, 1863; modern editions: (Nizami edition) 1915, 1958, 1965, 1969, 1989; selections translated in collections listed below, and in The Falcon and the Hunted Bird (anthology of different poets), 1950; The Golden Tradition: An Anthology of Urdu Love Poetry (80 poems, with critical study), translated by Ahmed Ali, 1973; An Anthology of Classical Urdu Love Lyrics, translated by David J. Mathews and Christopher Shackleton, 1972; Classical Urdu Poetry 2, translated by M.A.R. Barker and Shah Abdus Salam, 1977.

[MS Amroha Verses], edited by Nisar Ahmad Farooqi. 1857.

Nuskha-i-Hāmidīa, edited by Abdur Rahman Bijjori. 1921.

Intikhab-i Ghālib (selection), edited by Imtiyāz Ali 'Arshī. 1942.

Dīvān-i Ourdu (Urdu verses). 1954.

Shish jihat-i Ghālib (Persian verse), edited by Chaudhuri Nabi Ahmad Bajwa. 1962.

Selected Verses, translated by Sufia Sadullah. 1965.

Selected Poems, translated by Ahmed Ali. 1969.

Ghālib Urdu kalamka intikhab (selection), edited by Mukatabah Jam'ah. 1969.

Mata'-i Ghālib: Intikhab-i ghazaliyat-i farsi (Persian selection). 1969.

Twenty Five Verses, translated by C.M. Nain. 1970.

Ghazals of Ghālib, edited and translated by Aijaz Ahmad, adapted by various poets. 1971.

Ham Kalām, Fārsī rubā'iyāt-i Ghālib kā tarjamah, ṣ Akbārābādī. 1986.

Galib: The Man and His Couplets, translated by Umesh Joshi. 1998.

Other

Khatut-i-Ghālib (letters), edited by Ghulam Rasul Mehr. 3rd edition, 1969.

Ghālib aur fann-i tanqīd [murattib] Akhlāq Ḥsain Ārif (correspondence). 1977.

Urdu Letters, translated and annotated by Daub Rahbar. 1987.

Panj ahang men makatib-i Ghālib (Persian letters). 1989.

Dastanbuy: A Diary of the Indian Revolt of 1857. N.d.

Ghālib: 1797–1869, translated and edited by Ralph Russell and Khurshidul Islam. 1994.

Quest for New Horizons. 1996.

*

Critical Studies: The Aligarh Urdu Magazine: Ghālib Number edited by Mukhtar Uddin Ahmad Arzu, 1949; Studies in Urdu Literature by Fazl Mahmud Asiri, 1952; Interpretations of Ghālib by J.L. Kaul, 1957; Ghālib, The Man and His Verse by P.L. Lakhanpal, 1960; Ghālib: Two Essays by Ahmed Ali and Alessandro Bausani, 1969, and The Problem of Style and Technique in Ghālib, 1969, and The Golden Tradition, 1973, reprinted 1991, both by Ali; Ghālib by M. Mujeeb, 1969; Ghālib: Life and Letters by Ralph Russell and Khurshidul Islam, 1969; Mirza Ghālib: The Poet of Poets by S. Saran, 1976; A Dance of Sparks: Imagery of Fire in Ghālib's Poetry by Annemarie Schimmel, 1979; Ghālib: The Man, the Times by Pavan K. Varmer, 1989; Yadgar-e-Ghālib: A Biography of Ghālib by Maulana Altaf Hussain Hali, translated by K.H. Qadiri, 1990; Ghālib by Anis Nagore, 1990; Ghālib: The Poet and His Age, edited by Ralph Russell, 1997.

* * *

Asadullāh Khān Ghālib died having lost both his sense of hearing and all interest in a life which, in any case, had not treated him kindly. Unappreciated during his lifetime, he stands in great esteem today, and his reputation has spread far and wide during the last two decades through translations into English and appraisals in other languages. He is a highly individualistic, sophisticated, and difficult poet, whose mind was far in advance of his age, and whose poetry retains its sophisticated and difficult nature today.

The 19th century was an age in India of upheaval, uncertainty, religious controversy, revolt, decay, and disorder, but also one of hope as a new order was emerging, in Ghālib's own words, like "Dispersed light in the mirror, a speck of dust / Caught in the sunlight in the window." Psychologically it was a difficult period of warring loyalties, with instinct demanding attachment to national feeling, but with expediency suggesting alignment with an alien power that had almost complete control over India. Attitudes underwent a change. Some patriotic souls revolted against the dominance of the West, like Momin who reflected Ghālib's own sentiments "O Doomsday, come, rend up the world, / Shake it up and down, about . . ."

These currents produced sentiments and attitudes that are difficult to analyse. Ghālib's developed sensibility accepted a variety of thought as valid experience. His peculiar mind unified experiences so that the sifting of their elements becomes a hopeless task, the more so as Ghālib had a comprehension of his age similar to that of Baudelaire, while the changing pattern of the age was still incomplete and unrecognized by his contemporaries. As a result he was considered incomprehensible and obscure, so that one commentator said in exasperation, "What he writes he alone / Or God can understand." But Ghālib was a poet of passion with a philosophical conception of life and the universe, like the Metaphysical poets of England, and he carried his search for the truth to a more metaphysical plane. Endowed with a visionary imagination, his mind fused perception and thought so that he could see creation and the creator involved together in the situation:

Life's leisure is a mirror of the hundred hues
Of self-adoration;
And night and day the great dismay
Of the onlooker of the scene.

Here, conventional belief is upturned. Life is engrossed with its multifarious forms, and the Maker, bound by His own laws, then turns into a helpless beholder of the scene he has created:

Intelligence unconcerned
Is caught in the great despair
Of encirclement, and man's Image remains imprisoned
In the mirror of the world.

Ghālib's poetry reflects the movement of thought, and his passion creates an imagery that is both picturesque and startling in its suddenness. His poetic experience was more conscious than intuitive, presenting an object after the idea of it, as in "The heat engendered by thought is indescribable; / I had just thought of despair when the desert went up in flames."

This quality of his thought is so breathtaking that he remained beyond the reach of the average critic of his era. Yet his intensive mind needed a new diction and grammar to express itself: "Where is, O Lord, the other foot of Hope? / I found the desert of contingent existence a mere footprint." From this to the opening poem of his Divān, "Of whose gay tracery is the picture a complainant?" is only a continuation of the great leap forward, where the style is highly elliptical and the meaning seemingly incomprehensible, as words and images are strung together pell-mell, as in Gerard Manley Hopkins (a contemporary of Ghālib). Ghālib's elliptical style is indeed as startling in Urdu as Hopkins's is in English:

No, it was not these.
The jading and jar of the cart,
Time's tasking, it is fathers that asking for ease
Of the sodden-with-its-sorrowing heart,
Nor danger, electrical horror; then further it finds
The appealing of the passion is tender in prayer apart.
. . .

The elliptical fourth line is less complicated and breathtaking, however, than:

The joy-of-creation-of-image-producing-
Coquetry-of-expressing-
The-intense-desire-of-being-killed.
In the furnace-of-fire is the hoof
Of the prey from the beloved's scimitar.

The first three lines here are a series of ellipses, constituting a single emotive state. This is wit, conceit, hyperbole, all in one. Ghālib created metaphors out of the conditions of his mind and feeling. It is a complex, composite picture of overlapping and interlinked states in the devotional opening poem, where words and grammar, image and idea, fact and fiction, intellect and emotion, all play their part singly and collectively, transcending the realm of words to form an imagery of abstractions; if John Donne could find a parallel between a pair of lovers and a pair of compasses, Ghālib could find ecstasy in the way to the altar of sacrifice itself: "With what joy in front of the executioner I walk / That from my shadow the head is two steps ahead of the feet . . ."

This was an idiom his contemporaries and the generations that followed could not understand, so that between 1892 and 1972 at least 54 keys to his she'rs (unit of two lines) were published. It was not until the 1960s that Ghālib could find his rightful place in the ranks of the world's great poets.

—Ahmed Ali

GIDE, André (Paul-Guillaume)

Born: Paris, France, 22 November 1869. Education: Educated at École Alsacienne, Paris, 1878–80; Lycée in Montpellier, 1881; boarder at M. Henri Bauer, 1883–85; and at M. Jacob Keller, 1886–87; École Alsacienne, 1887; École Henri IV: baccalauréat, 1890. Family: Married Madeleine Rondeaux in 1895 (died 1938); had one daughter by Elisabeth van Bysselberghe. Career: Mayor of a Normandy commune, 1896; juror in Rouen, 1912; special envoy of Colonial Ministry on trip to Africa, 1925–26. Helped found Nouvelle Revue française, 1909. Awards: Nobel prize for literature, 1947. Ph.D.: Oxford University. Member: Honorary Member, American Academy, 1950. Died: 19 February 1951.

PUBLICATIONS

Collection

Romans, récits, et soties; Oeuvres lyriques, edited by Yvonne Davet and Jean-Jacques Thierry. 1958.

Fiction

Les Cahiers d'André Walter. 1891; translated in part as The White Notebook, by Wade Baskin, 1965; complete translation as The Notebooks of André Walter, 1968.

La Tentative amoureuse. 1893; as The Lovers' Attempt, translated by Dorothy Bussy, in The Return of the Prodigal, 1953.

Le Voyage d'Urien. 1893; as Urien's Voyage, translated by Wade Baskin, 1964.

Paludes. 1895; as Marshlands, translated by George D. Painter, with Prometheus Misbound, 1953.

Les Nourritures terrestres. 1897; as Fruits of the Earth, translated by Dorothy Bussy, 1949.

Le Prométhée mal enchaîné. 1899; as Prometheus Illbound, translated by Lilian Rothermere, 1919; as Prometheus Misbound, translated by George D. Painter, with Marshlands, 1953.

L'Immoraliste. 1902; as The Immoralist, translated by Dorothy Bussy, 1930; translated by Stanley Appelbaum, 1996; also translated by David Watson, 2001.

Le Retour de l'enfant prodigue. 1907; as The Return of the Prodigal, translated by Dorothy Bussy, 1953.

La Porte étroite. 1909; as Strait Is the Gate, translated by Dorothy Bussy, 1924.

Isabelle. 1911; as Isabelle, translated by Dorothy Bussy, in Two Symphonies, 1931.

Les Caves du Vatican. 1914; as The Vatican Cellars, translated by Dorothy Bussy, 1914; as The Vatican Swindle, translated by Bussy, 1925; as Lafcadio's Adventures, 1927.

La Symphonie pastorale. 1919; as The Pastoral Symphony, translated by Dorothy Bussy, in Two Symphonies, 1931.

Les Faux-monnayeurs. 1926; as The Counterfeiters, translated by Dorothy Bussy, 1927; as The Coiners, translated by Bussy, 1950.

L'École des femmes. 1929; as The School for Wives, translated by Dorothy Bussy, 1929.

Two Symphonies (includes Isabelle and The Pastoral Symphony), translated by Dorothy Bussy. 1931.

Deux récits. 1938.

Thésée. 1946, as Theseus, translated by John Russell, 1948.

Plays

Philoctète (produced 1919). 1899; as Philoctetes, translated by Jackson Mathews, in My Theater, 1952; also translated by Dorothy Bussy, in The Return of the Prodigal, 1953.

Le Roi Candaule (produced 1901). 1901; as King Candaules, translated by Jackson Mathews, in My Theater, 1952.

Saül (produced 1922). 1903; as Saul, translated by Jackson Mathews, in My Theater, 1952; also translated by Dorothy Bussy, in The Return of the Prodigal, 1953.

Le Retour de l'enfant prodigue (produced 1928), 1909.

Bethsabé. 1912; as Bathsheba, translated by Jackson Mathews, in My Theater, 1951; also translated by Dorothy Bussy, in The Return of the Prodigal, 1953.

Antoine et Cléopâtre, from the play by Shakespeare (produced 1920). In Théâtre complet, 1947.

Amal; ou, La Lettre du roi, from the play by Tagore (produced 1928). 1922.

Robert: Supplément à L'École des femmes (produced 1946). 1930; as Robert; ou, L'Intérêt général, 1949.

Oedipe (produced 1931). 1931; as Oedipus, translated by John Russell, in Two Legends, 1950.

Les Caves du Vatican, from his own novel (produced 1933). In Théâtre complet, 1948.

Perséphone (libretto), music by Igor Stravinsky (produced 1934). 1934; edited by Patrick Pollard, 1977; as Persephone, translated by Jackson Mathews, in My Theater, 1952.

Geneviève. 1936.

Le Treizième Arbre (produced 1939). In Théâtre, 1942; as The Thirteenth Tree, translated and adapted by Diane Moore, 1987.

Théâtre. 1942; as My Theater, translated by Jackson Mathews, 1952.

Hamlet, from the play by Shakespeare (produced 1946). In Théâtre complet, 1949.

Le Procès, with Jean-Louis Barrault, from the novel by Kafka (produced 1947). 1947; as The Trial, translated by Jacqueline and Frank Sundstrom, 1950.

Théâtre complet. 8 vols., 1947–49.

Verse

Les Poésies d'André Walter. 1892.

Other

Le Traité du Narcisse. 1892; as Narcissus, translated by Dorothy Bussy, in The Return of the Prodigal, 1953.

Réflexions sur quelques points de littérature et de morale. 1897.

Feuilles de route 1895–1896. 1899.

Philoctète, suivi de Le Traité du Narcisse, La Tentative amoureuse, El Hadj. 1899; all translated by Dorothy Bussy, in The Return of the Prodigal, 1953.

De l'influence en littérature. 1900.

Lettres à Angèle (1898–1899). 1900.

Les Limites de l'art. 1901.

De l'importance du public. 1903.

Prétextes. 1903; enlarged edition, 1913; translated in Pretexts: Reflections on Literature and Morality, edited by Justin O'Brien, 1959.

Amyntas. 1906; as Amyntas, translated by Villiers David, 1958; also translated by Richard Howard, 1988.

Dostoïevsky d'après sa correspondance. 1908.

Oscar Wilde. 1910; as Oscar Wilde, translated by Bernard Frechtman, 1951.

Charles-Louis Philippe. 1911.

C.R.D.N. 1911; enlarged edition as Corydon (privately printed), 1920; 2nd edition, 1925; as Corydon, translated by Hugh Gibb, 1950; also translated by Richard Howard, 1983.

Nouveaux prétextes. 1911; translated in Pretexts: Reflections on Literature and Morality, edited by Justin O'Brien, 1959.

- Souvenirs de la cour d'assises*. 1914; as Recollections of the Assize Court, translated by Philip A. Wilkins, 1941.
- Si le grain ne meurt*. 2 vols., 1920–21; as If It Die. . ., translated by Dorothy Bussy, 1935.
- Numquid et tu . . . ?* 1922; translated in Journal, 1952.
- Dostoïevsky*. 1923; as Dostoevsky, translated by Arnold Bennett, 1925.
- Incidences*. 1924.
- Caractères*. 1925.
- Le Journal des faux-monnayeurs*. 1926; as Journal of The Counterfeiters, translated by Justin O'Brien, 1951; as Logbook of The Coiners, 1952.
- Dindiki*. 1927.
- Émile Verhaeren*. 1927.
- Joseph Conrad*. 1927.
- Voyage au Congo*. 1927; translated by Dorothy Bussy, in Travels in the Congo. 1929.
- Le Retour du Tchad, suivi du Voyage au Congo, Carnets de route*. 1928; translated by Dorothy Bussy, in Travels in the Congo, 1929.
- Travels in the Congo*, translated by Dorothy Bussy. 1929.
- Essai sur Montaigne*. 1929; as Montaigne: An Essay in Two Parts, translated by Stephen H. Guest and Trevor E. Blewitt, 1929.
- Un esprit non prévenu*. 1929.
- Lettres*. 1930.
- L'Affaire Redureau, suivie de Faits divers*. 1930.
- Le Sequestré de Poitiers*. 1930.
- Jacques Rivière*. 1931.
- Divers*. 1931.
- Oeuvres complètes*, edited by Louis Martin-Chauffier. 15 vols., 1932–39; Index, 1954.
- Les Nouvelles Nourritures*. 1935; translated in Fruits of the Earth, 1949.
- Retour de l'URSS*. 1936; as Return from the USSR, translated by Dorothy Bussy, 1937; as Back from the USSR, 1937.
- Retouches à mon Retour de l'URSS*. 1937; as Afterthoughts: A Sequel to Back from the USSR, translated by Dorothy Bussy, 1938.
- Journal 1889–1939*. 1939; 1939–1942, 1946; 1942–1949, 1950; as Journals 1889–1949, edited and translated by Justin O'Brien, 4 vols., 1947–1951.
- Découvrons Henri Michaux*. 1941.
- Attendu que*. 1943.
- Interviews imaginaires*. 1943; as Imaginary Interviews, translated by Malcolm Cowley, 1944.
- Jeunesse*. 1945.
- Lettres à Christian Beck*. 1946.
- Souvenirs littéraires et problèmes actuels*. 1946.
- Et nunc manet in te*. 1947; as The Secret Drama of My Life, translated by Keen Wallis, 1951; as Madeleine, translated by Justin O'Brien, 1952.
- Paul Valéry*. 1947.
- Poétique*. 1947.
- Correspondance 1893–1938*, with Francis Jammes, edited by Robert Mallet. 1948.
- Notes sur Chopin*. 1948; as Notes on Chopin, translated by Bernard Frechtman, 1949.
- Préfaces*. 1948.
- Rencontres*. 1948.
- Correspondance 1899–1926*, with Paul Claudel, edited by Robert Mallet. 1949; as The Correspondence 1899–1926, translated by John Russell, 1952.
- Feuillets d'automne*. 1949; as Autumn Leaves, translated by Elsie Pell, 1950.
- Lettres*, with Charles du Bos. 1950.
- Littérature engagée*, edited by Yvonne Davet. 1950.
- Égypte 1939*. 1951.
- Ainsi soit-il; ou, Les Jeux sont faits*. 1952; as So Be It; or, The Chips Are Down, translated by Justin O'Brien, 1960.
- Correspondance 1909–1926*, with Rainer Maria Rilke, edited by Renée Lang. 1952.
- Lettres à un sculpteur* (Simone Marye). 1952.
- The Return of the Prodigal* (includes Narcissus; The Lovers' Attempt; El Hadj; Philoctetes; Bathsheba; Saul), translated by Dorothy Bussy, 1953.
- Correspondance 1890–1942*, with Paul Valéry, edited by Robert Mallet. 1955; as Self-Portraits: The Gide Valéry Letters 1890–1942 (abridged edition), edited by Robert Mallet, translated by June Guicharnaud. 1966.
- Lettres au Docteur Willy Schuermans (1920–1928)*. 1955.
- Correspondance inédite*, with Rilke and Verhaeren, edited by C. Bronne. 1955.
- Correspondance*, with Marcel Jouhandeau. 1958.
- Correspondance 1905–1912*, with Charles Péguy, edited by Alfred Saffrey. 1958.
- Correspondance 1904–1928*, with Edmund Gosse, edited by Linette F. Brugmans. 1960.
- Correspondance 1908–1920*, with André Suarès, edited by Sidney D. Braun. 1963.
- Correspondance 1911–1931*, with Arnold Bennett, edited by Linette F. Brugmans. 1964.
- Correspondance 1909–1951*, with André Rouveyre, edited by Claude Martin. 1967.
- Correspondance 1913–1951*, with Roger Martin du Gard, edited by Jean Delay. 2 vols., 1968.
- Lettres*, with Jean Cocteau, edited by Jean-Jacques Kihm. 1970.
- Correspondance 1912–1950*, with François Mauriac, edited by Jacqueline Morton. 1971.
- Le Récit de Michel*, edited by Claude Martin. 1972.
- Correspondance*, with Charles Brunard. 1974.
- Correspondance 1891–1938*, with Albert Mockel, edited by Gustave Vanwelkenhuyzen. 1975.
- Correspondance*, with Jules Romains, edited by Claude Martin. 1976; supplement, 1979.
- Correspondance 1897–1944*, with Henri Ghéon, edited by Jean Tipy. 2 vols., 1976.
- Correspondance 1892–1939*, with Jacques-Émile Blanche, edited by Georges-Paul Collet. 1979.
- Correspondance*, with Justin O'Brien, edited by Jacqueline Morton. 1979.
- Correspondance*, with Dorothy Bussy, edited by Jean Lambert. 3 vols., 1979–82; as Selected Letters, edited and translated by Richard Tedeschi, 1983.
- Correspondance 1907–1950*, with François-Paul Alibert, edited by Claude Martin. 1982.
- Correspondance 1929–1940*, with Jean Giono, edited by Roland Bourneuf and Jacques Cotnam. 1983.
- Correspondance 1934–1950*, with Jef Last, edited by C.J. Greshoff. 1985.

- La Correspondance générale de André Gide*, edited by Claude Martin. 1985.
- Correspondance*, with Harry Kessler, edited by Claude Foucart. 1985.
- Correspondance 1927–1950*, with Thea Sternheim, edited by Claude Foucart. 1986.
- Correspondance 1891–1931*, with Francis Viéél-Griffin, edited by Henri de Paysac. 1986.
- Correspondance 1902–1928*, with Anna de Noailles, edited by Claude Mignot-Ogliastri. 1986.
- Correspondance*, with Jacques Copeau, edited by Jean Claude. 2 vols., 1987–88.
- Correspondance avec sa mère 1880–1895*, edited by Claude Martin. 1988.
- Correspondance 1903–1938*, with Valéry Larbaud, edited by Françoise Lioure. 1989.
- Correspondance*, with André Ruyters, edited by Claude Martin and Victor Martin-Schmets. 2 vols., 1990.
- Correspondance 1901–1950*, with Jean Schlumberger, edited by Pascal Mercier and Peter Fawcett. 1994.
- Editor, The Living Thoughts of Montaigne. 1939.
- Editor, Anthologie de la poésie française. 1949.
- Translator, Typhon, by Joseph Conrad. 1918.
- Translator, with J. Schiffrin, Nouvelles; Récits, by Aleksandr Pushkin. 2 vols., 1929–35.
- Translator, Arden of Faversham, in Le Théâtre élizabéthain. 1933.
- Translator, Prométhée, by Goethe. 1951.

*

Bibliography: Bibliographie des écrits de Gide by Arnold Naville, 1949, supplement, 1953; An Annotated Bibliography of Criticism on André Gide 1973–1988 by Catharine Savage Brosman, 1990.

Critical Studies: Gide, 1951, and Gide: A Critical Biography, 1968, both by George D. Painter; Gide by Enid Starkie, 1953; The Theatre of André Gide by J.C. McLaren, 1953; Gide and the Hound of Heaven by H. March, 1953; Portrait of Gide by Justin O'Brien, 1953; Gide by Albert Guerard, 1963, revised edition, 1969; Gide: His Life and Work by Wallace Fowlie, 1965; Gide: The Evolution of an Aesthetic by Vinio Rossi, 1967; Gide and the Greek Myth by Helen Watson-Williams, 1967; André Gide by Thomas Cordle, 1969; André Gide: The Theism of an Atheist by H.J. Nersoyan, 1969; André Gide and the Roman d'aventure by Kevin O'Neill, 1969; Gide: A Study of His Creative Writings by G.W. Ireland, 1970; Gide: A Collection of Critical Essays edited by David Littlejohn, 1970; Gide's Art of the Fugue: A Thematic Study of Les Faux-monnayeurs by Karin Nordenhaug Gihdas, 1974; Gide and the Art of Autobiography: A Study of Si le grain ne meurt by C.D.E. Tolton, 1975; A Student's Guide to Gide by Christopher Bettinson, 1977; Gide: Les Faux-monnayeurs by Michael J. Tilby, 1981; André Gide and the Codes of Homotextuality by Emily S. Apter, 1987; Gide by David H. Walker, 1990; André Gide: Homosexual Moralism by Patrick Pollard, 1991; Gide: Les caves du Vatican by Peter Broome, 1995; Gide's Bent: Sexuality, Politics, Writing by Michael Lucey, 1995; Void and Voice: Questioning Narrative and Conventions in André Gide's Major First-person Narratives by Charles O'Keefe, 1996; Conrad and Gide:

Translation, Transference and Intertextuality by Russell West, 1996; André and Oscar: Gide, Wilde and the Gay Art of Living by Jonathan Fryer, 1997; André Gide: A Life in the Present by Alan Sheridan, 1998; André Gide: Pederasty and Pedagogy by Naomi Segal, 1998; André Gide's Politics: Rebellion and Ambivalence, edited by Tom Conner, 2000.

* * *

By the end of his life, André Gide had received the official sign of consecration, the recognition of his century, that he was one of its major writers. The Nobel prize for literature, awarded to him in 1947, indicated that his work had attained a degree of accepted universality. The miracle was that Gide had become a "classical" writer by the time of his death while remaining a "dangerous" writer. This man who invented for his age the term "restlessness" (inquiétude) ended his life in apparent calm and resignation. A tone of affirmation, a marked denial of God, and a belief in the void of death provided a different portrait of Gide that has been added to the long series of self-portraits his books had already fashioned.

Gide's vast literary output is, in a sense, a written confession, initiated by a need to communicate what he felt to be true about himself. He knew that he possessed nothing of the anguish of a Pascal. That trait he left to Mauriac, and accepted for himself the characteristics of a Montaigne—of a wavering and diverse mind, as Montaigne had described himself: esprit ondoyant et divers. He remained at all times the writer who profited from every kind of experience, important or trivial.

Marc Allégret's film Avec André Gide opens with a few solemn pictures of the funeral at Cuverville and Gide's own reading of the opening pages of his autobiography Si le grain ne meurt (If It Die. . .). There are pictures showing the two contrasting family origins of Gide: Normandy and Languedoc, the north and the south, the Catholic and the Protestant background. The landscape pictures of Algeria and Tunisia provide a documentation for many of his works, from the earliest, such as Les Nourritures terrestres (Fruits of the Earth) to his Journal in 1941–42. Among the most curious episodes are the trip to the Congo, the walk with Valéry, the home of his daughter Catherine in Brignoles, the speech made in Moscow in the presence of Stalin, the visit with Roger Martin du Gard in Bellême.

A genius is a person who considers passionately what other people do not see. In the tradition of French letters, Montaigne was pre-eminently this type of genius, seizing every occasion of pleasure, every meeting, for the subject matter of his writing. The art of both the 16th-century essayist and the 20th-century moralist is based upon an indefatigable curiosity and a relentless critical spirit. Gide's enthusiasm for whatever came within his vision was usually followed by an admirable detachment from it. Once the conquest was made, he refused to be subjugated by it, to be dominated by his conquest. The image of the Minotaur's labyrinth, elaborated in his last important book, Thésée (Theseus), represents any body of doctrine that might constrict or imprison the thinking powers of a man. The problem for Theseus, as it was for Gide, was that of surpassing his adventures. The one moral error to be avoided at all cost was immobility, fixation. The meaning of Gide's celebrated word disponibilité seems to be the power of remaining dissatisfied, capable of change and growth.

From his avid curiosity about everything, whether it was the coloration of a leaf or the first book of a new author, his ideas were engendered. In the manifold forms of attentiveness with which his life seems to have been spent, there were no traces of misanthropy, of pessimism, of class prejudice, or of fatuous satisfaction with self. From a nature that accepted all contradictions—a will to freedom as well as a sense of destiny, good as well as evil—Gide's mind grew into one of the most critical of our age, a mind of infinite subtlety and unexpected boldness.

Gide began writing about 1890, at a time of great peacefulness in Europe, and continued to write during the next 60 years. He remained a constant and fervent witness to every ominous development in Europe and the world, from the period in which a religion of science and a rational vision of the universe dominated Europe to the mid-century of deep unrest.

There is little doubt that Gide hoped to compose a new gospel. With his favourite themes of adolescence, revolt, escape, the gratuitous act, he was able to upset the convictions of his readers, particularly his youthful readers, without creating in them feelings of terror or dismay. He tried to write in all the genres because he was unwilling to restrict himself to any one form and because each book, once it was well under way, became irksome to him; he would finish it off quickly in order to move on to a newer work. He had planned, for example, several further chapters for Les Faux-monnayeurs (The Counterfeiters or The Coiners), but when he wrote the sentence, "Je suis bien curieux de connaître Caloub" ("I am very curious to know Caloub"), it appeared to him such an admirable final sentence that he felt freed from continuing farther.

Whenever Christianity appeared to him in the form of a system, of a body of principles, he refused to accept it. His was an attitude of detachment and adventure, which permitted him the practice of what has been so often called his "sincerity." Problems of ethics worried Gide far more than religion. He was more concerned with justice than salvation. His knowledge of the Bible and his love for the Gospels always gave hope to his Catholic friends (Claudel, Jammes, DuBos, Ghéon, Copeau) that he would finally submit.

What appears as conformity to the world's law was seriously castigated in Fruits of the Earth and in L'Immoraliste (The Immoralist). And yet the very difficulty involved in living within a new freedom provided the moral problem of most of his subsequent books, such as Les Caves du Vatican (The Vatican Swindle), The Counterfeiters, Theseus. For the expression of human freedom, for its power and its peril, Gide created massive formulas that have returned, only slightly modified, in the writings of Sartre, Camus, and René Char. His long life was one of self-examination, of courage in liberating himself in such experiences as his African visits, communism, Catholicism. Gide developed one need—that of doubting everything—and one obligation—that of never doubting himself.

—Wallace Fowlie

See the essays on The Counterfeiters and The Immoralist.

GINZBURG, Natalia

Born: Natalia Levi in Palermo, Sicily, 14 July 1916. Family moved to Turin, 1919. Education: Educated at home and at schools in Turin to 1935; entered University of Turin, 1935, left before graduating. Family: Married 1) Leone Ginzburg in 1938 (died in captivity, 1944), three children; 2) Gabriele Baldini in 1950 (died 1969). Career: Exiled to Pizzoli, in the Abruzzo region, 1940–43; returned to Rome after the fall of Mussolini's fascist government, 1943; went into hiding in Rome, then Florence, 1944, but returned to Rome after the Allied Liberation; worked for Einaudi publishers, Rome and Turin, 1944–49; settled in Rome, 1952; lived in London, where her second husband headed the Italian Cultural Institute, 1959–61; returned to Rome, 1961; elected to parliament as independent left-wing deputy, 1983. Awards: Tempo prize, 1947; Veillon prize, 1952; Viareggio prize, 1957; Chianciano prize, 1961; Strega prize, 1963; Marzotto prize, for play, 1965; Bargutta prize, 1983. Died: 8 October 1991.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Place to Live: Selected Essays of Natalia Ginzburg, translated and edited by Lynne Sharon Schwartz. 2002.

Fiction

I bambini (as Natalia Levi). 1934.

Giulietta (as Natalia Levi). 1934.

Un'assenza (as Natalia Levi). 1934.

Casa al mare (as Alessandra Tornimparte). 1937.

La strada che va in città (as Alessandra Tornimparte). 1942; revised edition, 1945; as The Road to the City, translated by Francis Frenaye, in The Road to the City: Two Novelettes, 1949.

Passaggio di tedeschi a Erra. 1945.

È stato così. 1947; as The Dry Heart, translated by Francis Frenaye, in The Road to the City: Two Novelettes, 1949.

The Road to the City: Two Novelettes, translated by Francis Frenaye. 1949.

Tutti i nostri ieri. 1952; as Dead Yesterdays, translated by Angus Davidson, 1956; as A Light for Fools, translated by Davidson, 1956; as All Our Yesterdays, translated by Davidson, 1985.

Valentino (includes La madre and Sagittario). 1957; La madre, as The Mother, translated by Isabel Quigly, 1965; two stories as Valentino and Sagittarius: Two Novellas, translated by Avril Bardoni, 1987.

Le voci della sera. 1961; edited by S. Pacifici, 1971, and by Alan Bullock, 1982; as Voices in the Evening, translated by D.M. Low, 1963.

Lessico familiare. 1963; as Family Sayings, translated by D.M. Low, 1967; revised translation, 1984; as Things We Used to Say, translated with introduction by Judith Woolf, 1997.

Mio marito. 1964.

Il maresciallo. 1965.

Caro Michele. 1973; as No Way, translated by Sheila Cudahy, 1974; as Dear Michael, translated by Cudahy, 1975.

Lessico familiare No. 2: La luna pallidassi. 1975.

Lessico familiare No. 2: Il cocchio d'oro. 1975.

Borghesia. 1977; as Borghesia, translated by Beryl Stockman, 1988.

Famiglia (includes Borghesia). 1977; as Family, translated by Beryl Stockman, 1988.

La famiglia Manzoni. 1983; as The Manzoni Family, translated by Marie Evans, 1987.

La città e la casa. 1984; as The City and the House, translated by Dick Davis, 1986.

Four Novellas (includes Valentino; Sagittarius; Family; Borghesia), translated by Avril Bardoni and Beryl Stockman. 1990.

Plays

Ti ho sposato per allegria (produced 1966). 1965.

L'inserzione (produced 1968). In Ti ho sposato per allegria e altre commedie, 1968; as The Advertisement, translated by Henry Reed, 1969.

Ti ho sposato per allegria e altre commedie (includes L'inserzione; Fragola e panna; La segretaria). 1968.

Paese di mare e altre commedie (includes Dialogo; La porta sbagliata; La parrucca). 1973.

La poltrona. In Opere raccolte e ordinate dall'autore, vol. 2, 1987.

L'intervista. 1989.

Teatro (includes L'intervista; La poltrona; Dialogo; Paese di mare; La porta sbagliata; La parrucca). 1990.

Il cormorano. 1991.

Other

Le piccole virtù (essays). 1962, as The Little Virtues, translated by Dick Davis, 1985.

Mai devi domandarmi (essays). 1970; as Never Must You Ask Me, translated by Isabel Quigly, 1973.

Vita immaginaria (essays). 1974.

Opere, edited by Cesare Garboli. 2 vols., 1986–87.

Serena Cruz; o, La vera giustizia. 1990.

Editor, La carta del cielo (stories), by Mario Soldati. 1980.

Editor, with Giovanna Delfini, Diari 1927–1961, by Antonio Delfini. 1982.

Translator, Alla ricerca del tempo perduto: La strada di Swann, by Marcel Proust. 1953.

Translator, La signora Bovary, by Gustave Flaubert. 1983.

*

Critical Studies: “Natalia Ginzburg: The Fabric of Voices” by Donald Heiney, in The Iowa Review, 1(4), 1970; Invito alla lettura di Natalia Ginzburg by Elena Clementelli, 1972, revised edition, 1986; “The Narrative Strategy of Natalia Ginzburg” by Clotilde S. Bowe, in Modern Language Review, 68(4), 1973; “Natalia Ginzburg” by Luciana Marchionne Picchione, in Il castoro, 137, 1978; “Forms and Figures in the Novels of Natalia Ginzburg” by R.D. Piclardi, in World Literature Today, 53(4), 1979; “Some Thoughts on Internal and External Monologue in the Writings of Natalia Ginzburg,” in Moving in Measure: Essays in Honour of Brian Moloney edited by Judith Bryce and Doug Thompson, 1989, and Natalia Ginzburg: Human Relationships in a Changing World, 1991, both by Alan Bullock; “A Lexicon for Both Sexes: Natalia Ginzburg and the Family Saga” by Corinna Del Greco Lobner, in Contemporary Women Writers in Italy, edited by Santo L. Aricò, 1990; Natalia Ginzburg: A Voice of the Twentieth Century, edited by Angela M. Jeannet and Giuliana Sanguinetti Katz, 2000; Material Desire: Natalia Ginzburg's Bonded and Separating Daughters by Teresa Piccarazzi, 2002.

* * *

Described by Ian Thomson in his review of her last novel as “the most interesting of Italian female writers” (Sunday Times, 10 October 1986) Natalia Ginzburg remained throughout her life a controversial author, evoking deeply contrasting reactions from both the critical establishment and the general public. Responsive and sympathetic to the problems of both sexes, and highly sensitive to the rhythms of family life, she has analysed problems inherent in emotional relationships which transcend their immediate context to become universally recognizable, exposing the ambiguous feelings that motivate actions, and which frequently ensure that individuals are at greatest risk from those closest to them emotionally. Conscious that the traditional concept of male superiority is a myth based on women’s continued acceptance of subordinate roles she was also aware that men are ultimately equally vulnerable human beings, and are thus deserving of sympathy—a view that has inevitably alienated both male chauvinists and militant feminists. Essentially a pessimistic writer, she also possesses a sharp sense of humour, pinpointing the absurdity of much human activity, in which comic and tragic elements are frequently intermingled, and has thereby offended those unable to accept that something as supposedly frivolous as humour can have a place in creative writing. In addition her straightforward and sparse narrative style, far removed from the ornate traditions of Italian literary composition, has led in some quarters to disapproval.

Ginzburg’s main theme is the isolation of the individual, usually female, in an environment in which, surrounded by well-intentioned friends or relatives, there is paradoxically no real communication, and thus no possibility of genuine fulfilment. Oblivious to the generation gap and its implications, parents are unaware that their adult children have become individuals whose needs may be radically different from their own, and are thus incapable of providing emotional support when it is most needed. Thus although female roles in postwar society are increasingly released from traditional domestic passivity and ignorance, the older generation continues to educate its offspring in the same way, ensuring that daughters who choose to work for their living are incapable of coping with the pressures of the urban rat race or the problems of sexual emancipation. Meanwhile marriage, traditionally seen by women as a goal rather than a new beginning, is frequently a source of deep disillusion as they discover that sexual intimacy cannot compensate for radical differences in temperament and is no substitute for the meeting of minds.

Though principally focusing in her early work on the plight of women Ginzburg was always concerned to expose victimization irrespective of gender, as is clear from her first work of fiction deemed worthy of publication, Un’assenza [An Absence], whose protagonist is a wealthy young man lacking any emotional drive, trapped in a loveless marriage of convenience, and with no interests to fill up his empty days—someone who has unthinkingly embraced appropriate stereotypes only to find them insufficient for his needs. If Ginzburg’s output over the next 30 years may appear uncompromisingly feminist, dealing largely with unhappy wives afflicted with uncomprehending husbands in Casa al mare [The House by the Seaside] and Mio marito [My Husband], or young women neglected or oppressed by their families, in La strada che va in città (The Road to the City) and Valentino, unable to develop successful relationships, as in Le voci della sera (Voices in the Evening), or to cope adequately with their maternal duties, as in La madre (The Mother) and É stato così (The Dry Heart), she also saw fit to continue extending her sympathy to males, as is clear from her portrait of Ippolito in Tutti i nostri ieri (All Our Yesterdays). In this work, a sensitive youth deprived of parental guidance who is unable to withstand the implications of the German advance in World War II and thus commits suicide is contrasted with the figure of Cenzo Rena, a hard-headed businessman and anti-fascist who resolves a family crisis by marrying Ippolito's sister, pregnant by her feckless teenage lover, and defends the impoverished peasants of his southern village against the terrors of German occupation—a rare example in Ginzburg's work of masculine strength and positive awareness. These themes are developed further in her autobiographical novel Lessico familiare (Family Sayings), a loose collage of events from her earliest childhood to her second marriage, in which her father, a benevolent despot, and her mother, totally immersed in domesticity, are revealed as lovable but supremely ineffectual parents, with no interest in Natalia's creative talent and unable to understand or communicate with their sons, who none the less achieve success in their chosen careers.

Ginzburg's plays, dating from the mid-1960s, continue to reflect awareness of the complexity of human relationships, and include both the familiar figure of the naive female, oppressed and exploited in an alien environment—Giuliana in Ti ho sposato per allegria [I Married You For Fun], Teresa in L'inserzione (The Advertisement)—and the difficulties experienced by men unable to discharge adequately traditional roles such as that of vengeful husband (Paolo in Fragola e panna [The Strawberry Ice]), publisher (Edoardo in La segretaria [The Secretary]), or academic (Stefano in La porta sbagliata [The Wrong Door]). Now older, and thus more susceptible to the many disturbing changes in moral attitudes in post-1968 Europe, she then turned her attention to the problems of an older generation, a theme already touched on in the character of the unnamed mother in Sagittario (Sagittarius) and now more fully developed in Caro Michele (Dear Michael), where she combines an intense realization of the grim implications of social breakdown with an awareness that blanket rejections of contemporary reality by the elderly amount to mere short-sightedness and a reassuring belief that parents who make an effort to come to terms with the new world can still perhaps establish a meaningful rapport with their adult children.

This theme, here only tentatively suggested, is fully realized in her last novel, La città e la casa (The City and the House), where Giuseppe, who has long been estranged from his son, gradually re-establishes contact through a protracted correspondence between Princeton, New Jersey, where he has retired, and Rome, where his son still lives. In both cases, however, the bond so carefully established between the disaffected generations is shattered by the unexpected assassination of the son, confirming Ginzburg's essential pessimism. This pessimism was already reiterated in her two previous novels Borghesia and Famiglia (Family), in which rootless members of the younger generation are unable to use their newfound freedom to achieve happiness, while their elders likewise suffer both directly and indirectly from their inability to cope with the relaxation of traditional norms.

Ginzburg's last two full-length creative works, the short plays La poltrona [The Armchair] and L'intervista [The Interview], both focus on inadequate males deserving of sympathy, while also showing how they can adversely affect the lives of their female partners—a return to her original interest in emotional relationships in which both sexes are now given equal attention. In the short fragment Il cormorano [The Cormorant] these feelings are extended to cover the threat to animal and plant life in the Gulf War, while her many essays on a wide variety of subjects provide a more direct expression of her views than in her fiction, reaching their climax in a lengthy polemic on the laws concerning adoption, Serena Cruz; o, La vera giustizia [Serena Cruz; or, True Justice], typical of her activity as a left-wing parliamentarian in her final years.

—Alan Bullock

See the essay on Voices in the Evening.

GIONO, Jean

Born: Manosque, Provence, France, 30 March 1895. Education: Educated at École Saint-Charles, 1900–02; Collège Municipal de Manosque, 1902–11. Military Service: Served in the Alpine Infantry, 1915–19. Family: Married Élise Maurin in 1920; two daughters. Career: Bank clerk, Comptoir National d'Escompte de Paris, Manosque, 1911–14 and 1918–28; full-time writer from 1928; founded his own film company, 1958. Founder member, the Contadour movement, to promote collectivism and pacifism, 1935; imprisoned briefly at Saint Nicolas, Marseille, for refusal to join in the war effort, 1939, and at Saint-Vincent-les-Forts, 1944, for collaboration. Awards: Brentano prize, 1929; Northcliffe prize, 1930; Corrad prize, 1931; Monaco prize for literature, 1953. Chevalier, Légion d'honneur. Elected to the Académie Goncourt, 1954. Died: 9 October 1970.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Oeuvres Romanesques complètes, edited by Robert Ricatte. 6 vols., 1971–83

Oeuvres cinématographiques, edited by Jacques Mény. 1980.

Récits et essais, edited by Pierre Citron. 1989.

Romans et essais 1928–1941, edited by Henri Godard. 1992.

Fiction

Présentation de Pan. 1930.

Colline. 1929; as Hill of Destiny, translated by Jacques Le Clercq, 1929.

Un de Baumugnes. 1929; as Lovers Are Never Losers, translated by Jacques Le Clercq, 1931.

Regain. 1930; revised edition, edited by Dominique Baudouin, 1967; as Harvest, translated by Henri Fluchère and Geoffrey Myers, 1939, 1999.

La Naissance de l'Odyssee. 1930.

Le Grand troupeau. 1931; as To the Slaughterhouse, translated by Norman Glass, 1969.

Eglogues. 1931.

Jean le bleu. 1932; edited by Marian Giles Jones, 1968; as Blue Boy, translated by Katherine Allen Clarke, 1946.
Solitude de la pitié (stories). 1932.
Le Serpent d'étoiles. 1933.
Le Chant du monde. 1934; as The Song of the World, translated by Henri Fluchère and Geoffrey Myers, 1937.
Que ma joie demeure. 1935; as Joy of Man's Desiring, translated by Katherine Allen Clarke, 1940.
Batailles dans la montagne. 1937.
L'Eau vive. 1943.
Noé. 1947.
Un roi sans divertissement. 1947.
Les Âmes fortes. 1949.
Mort d'un personnage. 1949.
Les Grands Chemins. 1951.
Le Hussard sur le toit. 1951; as The Hussar on the Roof, translated by Jonathan Griffin, 1953; as The Horseman on the Roof, translated by Griffin, 1954.
Le Moulin de Pologne. 1952; as The Malediction, translated by Peter de Mendelssohn, 1955.
L'Ecosais. 1955.
Le Bonheur fou. 1957; as The Straw Man, translated by Phyllis Johnson, 1959.
Angélo. 1958; as Angelo, translated by Alma E. Murch, 1960.
Chroniques romanesques (includes Un roi sans divertissement; Les Grands Chemins). 1962.
Deux Cavaliers de l'orage. 1965; as Two Riders of the Storm, translated by Alan Brown, 1967.
Ennemonde et autres caractères. 1968; as Ennemonde and Other Characters, translated by David Le Vay, 1970.
Une histoire d'amour. 1969.
L'Iris de Suse. 1970.
Les Récits de la demi-brigade (stories). 1972.
Le Déserteur et autres récits (stories). 1973.
Faust au village (stories). 1977.
L'Homme qui plantait des arbres. 1980; as The Man Who Planted Trees, translated by Frédéric Back, 1985; translated by Barbara Bray, 1995.
Dragoon; suivi de Olympe (unfinished, in two versions). 1982.

Verse

Accompagnés de la flûte. 1924.
Premières proses et premiers poèmes. 1938–39, Fragments d'un déluge, Fragments d'un paradis. 1948.

Plays

Le Lanceur de graines (produced 1932). In Théâtre, 1943.
Le Bout de la route (produced 1941). In Théâtre, 1943.
La Femme du boulanger (produced 1944). In Théâtre, 1943.
Théâtre (includes Le Bout de la route; Le Lanceur de graines; La Femme du boulanger; Esquisse d'une mort d'Hélène). 1943.
Le Voyage en calèche (produced 1947). 1946.
Hortense; ou, L'Eau vive, with Alain Allieux (screenplay). 1958.
Théâtre II: Domitien, suivi de Joseph à Dotham. 1959.
Crésus (screenplay). 1961.
Le Cheval fou. 1974.

Screenplays: L'Eau vive, with Alain Allieux, 1958; Crésus, 1960; Un roi sans divertissement, 1963.

Other

Manosque des plateaux. 1930.
Solitude de la pitié. 1932.
Le Serpent d'étoiles. 1933.
Les Vraies Richesses (essays). 1936.
Rondeur des jours. 1936.
Refus d'obéissance. 1937.
Le Poids du ciel. 1938.
Vivre Libre I: Lettre aux paysans sur la pauvreté et la paix. 1938.
Etrée du printemps. 1938.
Mort du blé. 1938.
Vivre Libre II: Précisions. 1939.
Provence (travel guide). 1939.
Pour saluer Melville, with Moby Dick. 1941.
Triomphe de la vie (essays). 1941.
Pages immortelles de Virgile. 1947.
La Chasse au bonheur. 1953.
Recherches de la pureté. 1953.
Voyage en Italie. 1953; as An Italian Journey, translated by John Cumming, 1998.
Arcadie, Arcadie!. 1953.
Notes sur l'affaire Dominici. 1955; as The Dominici Affair, translated by Peter de Mendelssohn, 1956.
Giono par lui-même, edited by Claudine Chonez. 1956.
Bernard Buffet. 1956.
Lundi. 1956.
Lucien Jacques. 1956.
Sur les oliviers morts. 1958.
Oppède le vieux. 1959.
Rome, with others. 1959.
Camargue. 1960.
Le Grand Théâtre. 1961.
Images de Provence. 1961.
Tableau de la littérature française. 1962.
Le Désastre de Pavie, 24 février 1525. 1963; as The Battle of Pavia 24 February 1525, translated by Alma E. Murch, 1965.
Animalités. 1965.
Selections, edited by Maxwell A. Smith. 1965.
Le Déserteur. 1966.
Le Génie du sud, edited by Claude Annick Jacquet. 1967.
Provence perdue. 1967.
Terre d'or. 1967.
La Mission. 1971.
Les Terrasses de l'île d'Elbe (articles). 1976.
Écrits pacifistes. 1978.
Voilà le pays magique, edited by Marcel Arlaud. 1980.
Correspondance, edited by Pierre Citron. 2 vols., 1981.
Coeurs, passions, caractères. 1982.
Correspondance, with André Gide, edited by Roland Bourneuf and Jacques Cotnam. 1983.
Les Territoires heureux. 1984.
Les Trois Arbres de Palzem (articles). 1984.
Giono à Manosque (selection). 1986.
Entretiens avec Jean Amrouche et Taos Amrouche, edited by Henri Godard. 1990.
Yves Brayer, with Yves Dentan. 1990.

Correspondance 1928–1969, with Jean Guéhenno, edited by Pierre Citron. 1991.

Translator, with Lucien Jacques and Joan Smith, Moby Dick, by Herman Melville. 1941.

Translator, with Catherine d'Ivernois, L'Expédition d'Humphry Clinker, by Tobias Smollett. 1955.

*

Critical Studies: Jean Giono et les religions de la terre by Christian Michelfelder, 1938; Jean Giono by Jacques Pignet, 1955; Jean Giono et les techniques du roman (includes bibliography) by Pierre Robert, 1961; Giono by Pierre de Boisdeffre, 1965; Jean Giono by Maxwell A. Smith, 1966; The Private World of Jean Giono by Walter D. Redfern, 1967; Giono, Master of Fictional Modes by Norma L. Goodrich, 1973; Jean Giono, 3 vols., 1974–81, Pour une poétique de la parole chez Giono, 1978, and Jean Giono, imaginaire et écriture, 1985, all edited by Alan J. Clayton; Les Critiques de notre temps et Giono edited by Roland Bourneuf, 1977; Giono et l'art du récit edited by Yves-Alain Favre, 1978; Jean Giono et le cinéma by Jacques Mény, 1978; La Provence de Giono by Jacques Chabot, 1980; Jean Giono by Jean Carrière, 1985; Giono et la mer by Michèle Belghmi, 1987; Dialectique de la fleur: Angélique matrice de l'oeuvre gionienne by Laurent Fourcaut, 1989; L'Imaginaire: Essay by Jacques Chabot, 1990; Giono (in English) by Pierre Citron, 1990; Jean Giono: Le hussard sur le toit by Walter Redfern, 1997.

* * *

Jean Giono was born in the small medieval town of Manosque in Upper Provence and lived there for the rest of his life, his birthplace providing the inspiration for much of his writing. He had already published several poems in a regional magazine, when, in 1929, his first novel Colline (Hill of Destiny) appeared. This was serialized in a review edited by Paul Valéry, and greeted with critical acclaim by André Gide. It was to be the first of a trilogy, dedicated to the spirit of Pan, and recounting peasant life in the isolated hills of Les Bastides, the unforgettable haunt of his childhood. His evocation of this landscape is filled with its own quasi-religious spirit, beneficent when the peasants live in harmony with it, but menacing when the harmony is broken by thoughtless or wanton action. The presence of Pan is felt in the water of the village spring, on whose flow the peasants are totally dependent, and it is this spirit which punishes with drought and fire their inability to live together in peace. In the second part of the trilogy, Un de Baumugnes (Lovers Are Never Losers), Pan appears as the inventor of the flute, through whose music happiness is restored to a young peasant woman after her betrayal by a smooth, cynical town dweller. Regain (Harvest) celebrates Pan as the renewing life force, bringing back civilization and fertility to a tiny community that had seemed doomed to wither away. Although the presence of the spirit of Pan only loosely joins the three novels, they have in common a lyrical celebration of the elemental forces of nature, and a deliberate simplicity of language that can both surprise and move the reader.

Giono's reputation was by now firmly established, and he continued to publish regularly until his death in 1970. More than anything, his versatility has ensured him a devoted readership, for although his output can be divided into a number of broad categories, it is never repetitive and his style evolved to suit his thematic material.

The Pan novels were followed by two semi-autobiographical novels. In Le Grand troupeau (To the Slaughterhouse) Giono explores the senseless waste of war through the demoralization of the old men left to tend the herds and land while the young men are dragged off to pointless suffering at the front. This bitter evocation of war is replaced by affectionate memories of childhood and family in Jean le bleu (Blue Boy).

In Le Chant du monde (The Song of the World), Que ma joie demeure (Joy of Man's Desiring), and Batailles dans la montagne [Battles on the Mountain], Pan is replaced by Dionysus, who personifies the seasonal renewal of life and gives supernatural powers to his followers. Although still belonging to the 'regionalist' tradition, these works represent a move away from the realistic presentation of the countryside towards a symbolic expression of the issues that were currently preoccupying the author. The power of love, the goodness of life, man's relationship with society and with nature are central themes, and although the poetry remains, it is often submerged by Giono's "message." It was only a small step from these three novels to the polemical writing of the late 1930s and early 1940s. With war imminent, he argues in Refus d'obéissance [Refusal to Obey] and Vivre Libre I: Lettre aux paysans sur la pauvreté et la paix [Letter to the Peasants on Poverty and Peace] that if the peasants were to stop providing the towns and battle zones with food, then war would grind to a halt. In Les Vraies Richesses [True Riches], Le Poids du ciel [The Weight of the Sky], and Triomphe de la vie [Triumph of Life] he sees contemporary society threatened by increasing mechanization and urban life, and urges a return to the natural order of the world together with a renunciation of materialistic values.

When war was declared in 1939, Giono remained faithful to his pacifist principles. Refusing to obey his mobilization orders, he was imprisoned from September to November of 1939. His release was secured through the indignant intervention of Gide, the Queen Mother of Belgium, and the student body of Yale University. On his return to Manosque, he wrote Pour saluer Melville [Regards to Melville] to complement his translation of Moby Dick. These were accompanied by Fragments d'un paradis [Fragments of a Paradise], Triomphe de la vie and Le Voyage en calèche [Journey by Barouche]. The latter work was banned by the German censor, an ironic event in view of Giono's second imprisonment when France was liberated in 1944. He was accused of collaboration with the enemy for not speaking out against the Germans, and for having one of his books serialized in a collaborationist paper.

Although these accusations were blatantly spurious, this second experience of prison hurt Giono deeply, and his post-World War II writings are marked by a shift away from the poetic celebration of peasant life to a series of novels with an historical background, drawing on the traditions of Stendhal and Balzac. Chroniques [Chronicles] consists of several novels published between 1947 and 1958, whose central hero, Angélo, is clearly based upon Giono's paternal grandfather, the Italian Carbonaro. The best known of the series is Le Hussard sur le toit (The Hussar on the Roof), which narrates Angélo's adventures as he crosses a plague-infested Provence to rejoin the Risorgimento in Italy.

Although Giono's work has always appealed to intellectuals, his books reached an even wider audience through his screen adaptations and original film scenarios. In all, some 16 films have been adapted from his works, the most celebrated of which is La Femme du boulanger [The Baker's Wife], made with Raimu in 1938. In addition he was the author of eight plays.

Giono's reputation has, if anything, increased in the years since his death. He was recognized initially as a great poet in prose and a regional novelist, but his main appeal lies in his handling of such themes as the struggle for survival against elemental forces, the strength of love and hatred, the destructive power of jealousy, and above all the creative power of friendship.

—Jane McAdoo

See the essay on The Hussar on the Roof.

GIRAUDOUX, Jean (Hippolyte)

Born: Bellac, France, 29 October 1882. Education: Educated at a school in Pellevoisin; lycée, Chateauroux, 1893–1900; Lycée Lakanal, Paris, 1900–02; École Normale Supérieure, Paris, 1903–05. Military Service: 1902–03; served in World War I; wounded twice; High Commissioner for Information, 1939–40. Family: Married Suzanne Boland in 1918; one son. Career: Travelled in Europe, 1905–07; secretary and editor of Le Matin; in French diplomatic service, 1910; worked in the Press Office, Ministry of Foreign Affairs, 1910–14; mission to Russia and the East, 1911; military instructor in Portugal, 1916; in United States, 1917, thereafter liaison officer with the United States army in Paris; head of “Service des oeuvres françaises à l'étranger” [Foreign Cultural Service], 1920–24; secretary to Embassy in Berlin, 1924; chief government press officer, 1924; in Turkey, 1926; with the inspectorate of consulates, 1934; director general of Information Services, 1939; retired to live with his brother in Cusset, 1940. Awards: Légion d'honneur. Died: 31 January 1944.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Théâtre complet. 16 vols., 1945–53.

Oeuvre romanesque; Oeuvres littéraires diverses. 3 vols., 1955–58.

Théâtre complet. 1971.

Théâtre complet, edited by Jacques Body and others. 1982.

Oeuvres romanesques complètes, edited by Jacques Body, Brett Dawson, and others. 1990.

Plays

Siegfried (produced 1928). 1928; edited by Gerald V. Banks, 1975; as Siegfried, translated by Philip Carr, 1930; also translated by Phyllis La Farge and Peter H. Judd, in Three Plays, 1964.

Amphytrion 38 (produced 1929). 1929; as Amphytrion 38, translated and adapted by S.N. Behrman, 1938; also translated by Phyllis La Farge and Peter H. Judd, in Three Plays, 1964; and Roger Gellert, in Plays 2, 1967.

Judith (produced 1931). 1931; as Judith, translated by J.K. Savacool, in From the Modern Theatre, vol. 3, edited by Eric Bentley, 1955; also translated by Christopher Fry, in Plays 1, 1963.

Intermezzo (produced 1933). 1933; edited by Colette Weil, 1975; as The Enchanted, translated by Maurice Valency, 1950, and in Four Plays, 1958; as Intermezzo, translated by Roger Gellert, in Plays 2, 1967.

Tessa, from the play The Constant Nymph by Margaret Kennedy and Basil Dean (produced 1934). 1934.

La Fin de Siegfried. 1934.

Supplément au voyage de Cook (produced 1935). 1937; as The Virtuous Island, adapted by Maurice Valency, 1956.

La Guerre de Troie n'aura pas lieu (produced 1935). 1935; as Tiger at the Gates, translated by Christopher Fry, 1955, and in Plays 1, 1963, also published as The Trojan War Will Not Take Place, 1983.

Électre (produced 1937). 1937; as Electra, translated by Winifred Smith, 1952; also translated by Winifred Smith, in From the Modern Repertoire, edited by Eric Bentley, 1952, and in The Modern Theatre 1, edited by Bentley, 1955; Phyllis La Farge and Peter H. Judd, in Three Plays, 1964.

L'Impromptu du Paris (produced 1937). 1937.

Cantique des cantiques (produced 1938). 1939.

Ondine (produced 1939). 1939; as Ondine, translated by Maurice Valency, 1954, and in Four Plays, 1958; translated by Roger Gellert, in Plays 2, 1967.

L'Apollon de Bellac (as L'Apollon de Marsac, produced 1942). 1946; as The Apollo of Bellac, adapted by Maurice Valency, 1954, and in Four Plays, 1958.

Sodome et Gomorrhe (produced 1943). 1943; as Sodom and Gomorrha, translated by Herma Briffault, in The Makers of the Modern Theatre, edited by Barry Ulanov, 1961.

La Folle de Chaillot (produced 1945). 1945; as The Madwoman of Chaillot, adapted by Maurice Valency, 1947, and in Four Plays, 1958.

Pour Lucrèce (produced 1953). 1953; as Duel of Angels, translated by Christopher Fry, 1958; also translated by Christopher Fry, in Plays 1, 1963.

Les Gracques, edited by R.M. Albérès and Jean-Pierre Giraudoux. 1958.

Four Plays (includes The Madwoman of Chaillot; The Apollo of Bellac; The Enchanted; Ondine), adapted by Maurice Valency. 1958.

Plays 1 (includes Judith; Tiger at the Gates; Duel of Angels), translated by Christopher Fry. 1963.

Three Plays (includes Siegfried; Amphytrion 38; Electra), translated by Phyllis La Farge and Peter H. Judd. 1964.

Plays 2 (includes Amphytrion 38; Intermezzo; Ondine), translated by Roger Gellert. 1967.

Screenplays: La Duchesse de Langeais, 1942; Les Anges du péché, with R.-L. Bruckberger and Robert Bresson, 1943 (published as Le Film de Béthanie: Texte du “Les Anges du péché”, 1944).

Fiction

Provinciales. 1909.

L'École des indifférents. 1911.

Simon le pathétique. 1918.

Elpénor. 1919; as Elpénor, translated by Richard Howard and Bernard Bruce, 1958.

Adorable Cléo. 1920.

Suzanne et le Pacifique. 1921; as Suzanne and the Pacific, translated by Ben Ray Redman, 1923.

Siegfried et le Limousin. 1922; as My Friend from Limousin, translated by Louis M. Wilcox, 1923.
Juliette au pays des hommes. 1924.
Le Cerf, with Premier rêve signé. 1926.
Bella. 1926; as Bella, translated by J.F. Scanlan, 1927.
Églantine. 1927.
Les Aventures de Jérôme Bardini. 1930.
La France sentimentale. 1932.
Combat avec l'ange. 1934.
Choix des élèves. 1939.
Les Contes d'un matin. 1952.
La Menteuse. 1958; as Lying Woman, translated by Richard Howard, 1969.

Other

Retour d'Alsace, août 1914. 1916.
Lectures pour une ombre. 1917.
Adieu à la guerre. 1919.
Amica America. 1919.
Visite chez le prince. 1924.
Le Sport. 1928.
Racine. 1930; as Racine, translated by P. Mansell Jones, 1938.
Fugues sur Siegfried. 1930.
Fontrages au Niagara. 1932.
De pleins pouvoirs à sans pouvoirs. 1935.
Les Cinq Tentations de La Fontaine. 1938.
Le Futur Armistice. 1939.
Pleins pouvoirs. 1939.
Apropos de la rentrée des classes. 1939.
Littérature. 1941.
Écrits dans l'ombre. 1944.
Armistice à Bordeaux. 1945.
Sans pouvoirs. 1946.
Pour une politique urbaine. 1947.
La Française et la France. 1951.
Visitations. 1952.
Portugal, suivi de Combat avec l'image. 1958.
Or dans la nuit: Chroniques et préfaces littéraires 1910–1943. 1969.
Cornets des Dardanelles, edited by Jacques Body. 1969.
Souvenir de deux existences. 1975.
Messages du continental: Allocutions radiodiffusées du Commissaire général à l'Information (1939–1940) (speeches). 1987.
Lettres à Lilita: 1910–1928, edited by Mauricette Berne. 1989.

*

Bibliography: Bibliographie de l'oeuvre de Giraudoux 1899–1982, by Brett Dawson, 1982.

Critical Studies: Jean Giraudoux: The Making of a Dramatist by Donald Inskip, 1958; Jean Giraudoux: His Life and Works by Laurence LeSage, 1959; Jean Giraudoux: The Theatre of Victory and Defeat by Agnes G. Raymond, 1966; Giraudoux: Three Faces of Destiny by Robert Cohen, 1968; Jean Giraudoux: The Writer and His Work by Georges Lemaître, 1971; Giraudoux: La Guerre de Troie n'aura pas lieu by Roy A. Lewis, 1971; Precious Irony: The Theatre of Giraudoux by Paul A. Mankin, 1971; Giraudoux by Chris Marker, 1978; Jean Giraudoux by John H. Reilly, 1978; Jean Giraudoux and Oriental Thought: A Study of Affinities by Arthur C. Buck, 1984; Jean Giraudoux: The Legend and the Secret by Jacques Body, translated by James Norwood, 1991; Heroine as Social Redeemer in the Plays of Jean Giraudoux by Victoria B. Korzeniowska, 2001.

* * *

Jean Giraudoux's theatre dominated the French stage in the period between the two World Wars. When he first began writing plays in the late 1920s, his stylistic inventiveness, his witty sense of the incongruity of life, and his search for purity made Giraudoux's work unique and individual. Since then, his fame has spread worldwide and there have been numerous translations and productions of his dramatic works in English and in other languages.

What makes this even more extraordinary is that the dramatist did not begin writing for the stage until he was 46 years old. Before that time, he had achieved some renown, although on a minor scale, as a novelist. Such works as Suzanne et le Pacifique (Suzanne and the Pacific) and Juliette au pays des hommes [Juliette in the Land of Men] gave him a reputation as a writer of complex and subtle novels that reached only a very small public. Indeed, it is only in recent years that his fiction has begun to receive greater recognition.

The presentation of his first play, Siegfried, catapulted Giraudoux from the ranks of the minor novelists to the forefront of the French theatre movement. This startling success with both audiences and critics was to last throughout his lifetime and beyond, as some of his later works were not performed until after his death, including one of his most popular, La Folle de Chaillot (The Madwoman of Chaillot). At first glance, the fanciful creativity and the unusual turn of mind of the writer would seem ill-suited to the more restrictive demands of the stage. Several factors, however, played a role in his achievement. Certainly, Louis Jouvet, the actor-director who formed a close collaboration with Giraudoux and who directed most of his plays, was one of the principal reasons that the dramatist established himself so easily. Another important element was evidently Giraudoux's major theme—man's search for a purity and an ideal beyond the imperfections of reality—a theme that touched a sensitive nerve with the theatre-going public of the 1930s. It found its expression in whimsical comedies like Amphitryon 38 and Intermezzo in which the central characters flirt with the attractiveness of the unknown, only to accept a compromise with the appeal of everyday reality. And the theme also appears in a more concrete form in La Guerre de Troie n'aura pas lieu (Tiger at the Gates) in which the characters debate the issue of peace and war. In the final analysis, however, it can be argued that the real reason for Giraudoux's appeal was his style—his elegant, civilized, witty account of life in its diverse aspects. The writer's special use of metaphors and symbols, his ironic view of reality, and his sense of the spontaneous and the unexpected were basically responsible for the singular universe that enchanted and delighted his public.

Giraudoux is no longer the major force in French drama that he once was. The contemporary theatre has taken a number of new directions in recent years, passing from the theatre of the absurd of Eugène Ionesco or Samuel Beckett to a theatre in which the director assumes the prominent role, the writer and his words becoming only one part of the whole. Giraudoux's plays, based upon dialogue and discussion, hold language in high esteem. As a result, he could seem less current today. Nevertheless, his imaginative views of man and man's role in the universe and his creative use of language are likely to endure and he should remain one of the major French playwrights of the 20th century.

—John H. Reilly

See the essays on The Madwoman of Chaillot and Tiger at the Gates.

GIRONELLA (POUS), José María

Born: Darnius, near Gerona, Spain, 31 December 1917. Education: Educated at a seminary, Gerona, 1928–30. Family: Married Magda Castañer in 1946. Career: Worked as labourer and factory hand, early 1930s; bank clerk, Gerona, 1935–36; on the outbreak of the Spanish Civil War, 1936, volunteered for the Nationalist forces, and served with mountain patrols in Huesca, Pyrenees; journalist in Gerona, 1940; correspondent for Italian Informazione, Rome, 1942; left Spain covertly, 1947, and lived in France, Italy, Austria, and Sweden, 1947–52; suffered nervous breakdown in Paris, 1951, and travelled between clinics in Vienna and Helsinki, 1951–53; travelled to New York, Cuba (during its revolution), and Mexico, 1959–60, the Far East (twice), 1962–64, Israel, 1975, and Egypt, Iran, and Kuwait, 1979. Awards: Nadal prize, 1946; Planeta prize, 1971. Died: 1991.

PUBLICATIONS

Fiction

Un hombre. 1947; as Where the Soil Was Shallow, translated by Anthony Kerrigan, 1957.
La marea. 1949.
Los cipreses creen en Dios. 1953; as The Cypresses Believe in God, translated by Harriet de Onís, 1956.
Muerte y juicio de Giovanni Papini: Cuento fantástico. 1959.
Un millón de muertos. 1961; as One Million Dead, translated by Joan Maclean, 1963; as The Million Dead, translated by Maclean, 1963.
Mujer, levántate y anda. 1962.
Ha estallado la paz. 1966; as Peace after War, translated by Joan Maclean, 1969.
Los hombres lloran solos. 1971.
Condenados a vivir. 2 vols., 1971.
Cita en el cementerio. 1983.
La duda inquietante (novella). 1986.
Se hace camino al andar. 1997.
El apocalipsis. 2001.

Verse

Ha llegado el invierno y tú no estás aquí. 1945.

Other

El novelista ante el mundo. 1954.
Los fantasmas de mi cerebro. 1959; as Phantoms and Fugitives: Journeys to the Improbable, translated by Terry Broch Fontseré, 1964.

Todos somos fugitivos (stories and essays). 1961, and in Phantoms and Fugitives; Journeys to the Improbable, 1964.
On China and Cuba, translated by John F. Byrne. 1963.
Personas, ideas, mares (travel writing). 1963.
El Japón y su duende (travel writing). 1964.
China, lágrima innumerable (history). 1965.
Gritos del mar (essays). 1967.
Conversaciones con Don Juan de Borbón. 1968.
La sociedad actual en el mundo asiático: Experiencia de un viaje. 1968.
100 españoles y Dios (essays). 1969.
Gritos de la tierra (essays). 1970.
En Asia se muere bajo las estrellas (travel writing). 1971.
El Mediterráneo es un hombre disfrazado de mar (travel writing). 1974.
El escándalo de Tierra Santa (travel writing). 1977.
Carta a mi padre muerto (autobiographical writings). 1978.
100 españoles y Franco (essays). 1979.
Mundo tierno, mundo cruel. 1981.
El escándalo del Islam (travel writing). 1982.
A la sombra de Chopin. 1990.
Yo, Mahoma. 1992.
Jerusalén de los evangelios. 1992.
Carta a mi madre muerta (autobiographical writings). 1992.
Nuevos 100 españoles y Dios. 1994.
El corazón alberga muchas sombras. 1995.

*

Critical Studies: “José María Gironella, Spanish Novelist” by William J. Grupp, in Kentucky Foreign Language Quarterly, 4(3), 1957; “Arturo Barea and J.M. Gironella: Two Interpreters of the Spanish Civil War” by J.J. Devlin, in Hispania, 41, 1958; “Revolutionary Novels of Gironella and Pasternak” by Edmund S. Urbanski, in Hispania, 43, 1960; Crítica y glosa de Un millón de muertos by L.E. Calvo Sotelo, 1961; “Gironella and Hemingway: Novelists of the Spanish Civil War” by R.L. Sheehan, in Studies in Honor of Samuel Montefiore Waxman, 1969; José María Gironella (in English) by Ronald Schwartz, 1972; Perspectivas humorísticas en la trilogía de Gironella by J. David Suárez-Torres, 1972; “Gironella’s Chronicles Revisited: A Panorama on Fratricide” by John E. Dial, in Papers on Language and Literature, 10(1), 1974; “Fictive History in Gironella” by Peter Ilie, in Journal of Spanish Studies, 2, 1974; José María Gironella by J.A. Salso, 1982; The Novel of the Spanish Civil War (1936–1939) by Gareth Thomas, 1990.

* * *

The outstanding literary creations of José María Gironella deal with the Spanish Civil War, 1936–39. The predominant theme of his best received novels, Los cipreses creen en Dios (The Cypresses Believe in God) and Un millón de muertos (One Million Dead), focuses on the suffering and disintegration of family life. Gironella, a traditionalist in all respects, intones the lament of a society which has forsaken its sense of order. Vengeful survival becomes a way of life. In his portrayal of war-torn Spain, the author attempts, really tries very hard, to be objective. However, he cannot divest himself of his strong commitment to his orthodox religious background, and consequently to the conservative political position. Unquestionably, his devotion to his personal principles has a marked influence on his characters; although seemingly they confront their tragic circumstances as individuals, in truth they carry with them symbolic identities. That is to say, in the last analysis, they are “types” rather than singular characters. Yet, even as generic projections of an agonizing existence, they achieve a significant measure of artistic reality. Through the description of their lives, the reader is able to identify with the day-to-day struggle for subsistence amid the ravages of a war which tears families asunder, as fanaticism grows in intensity on all sides of the political spectrum.

The warring hostilities depicted in The Cypresses Believe in God violently expand in One Million Dead which, as the title suggests, dwells on the terrible loss of life. (Even though “one million” is an exaggeration, the number of dead did run into the hundreds of thousands.) Historical events are interwoven with fictional accounts quite skilfully; on the surface, both novels would appear to be a reliable recording of dramatic incidents through the personal vicissitudes of the Alvear family, which microcosmically serves as the axis for the national catastrophe. Essentially, the tragedy of Spain is reflected in the misfortunes that befall one family. To be sure, it is a family that predominantly leans toward the cause of Franco.

The third volume of Gironella’s trilogy on the Civil War, Ha estallado la paz (Peace after War), hardly deserves the same recognition. The first two, voluminous indeed, will give Gironella a respectable place in the annals of Spanish literature. While not achieving, by any means, the stature of a weaver of fictionalized history like Pérez Galdós in the 19th century, Gironella has succeeded in establishing himself as the literary historian of the Spanish Civil War. Other novelists have centred their attention on the consequences of the consanguineous conflict, but Gironella has been the only outstanding writer who has addressed the question in the form of novels.

Gironella’s other writings comprise many themes: religion, death, politics, and a variety of subjects that refer to human problems as they affect daily existence. However, they are by and large essay-type expressions of the author’s concern for life and death. In themselves they would not constitute a testimony to a writer who is worthy of being considered as the novelistic chronicler of the three most harrowing years that Spaniards have ever known. Without a doubt, for those who would want to view the drama of a Spain embarked on self-destruction, The Cypresses Believe in God and One Million Dead are indispensable reading.

—Robert Kirsner

GLISSANT, Edouard

Born: Bezaudin (Sainte-Marie), Martinique, 21 September 1928.
Education: Attended primary school in Lamentin, Martinique; lycée Schoelcher (studied under Aimé Césaire, along with fellow student Frantz Fanon), Fort-de-France, Martinique 1939–1945; Studied at the Sorbonne (received a Licence in Philosophy), Paris, 1946–1953.
Career: Worked and studied in Paris where he was politically active in the Société Africaine de Culture [African Society for Culture] and the Front Antillo-Guynais pour l’Indépendance [Antillo-Guyanais Front for Independence] (which he co-founded), 1953–60; placed under surveillance and banned from leaving France as a result of his political activities, 1959–60; professor of philosophy at the Lycée des Jeunes Filles [High School for Young Girls], Fort-de-France, 1965; founded and taught at the Institut Martiniquais d’Études [Martinican

Institute of Studies], Fort-de-France, 1967–70; founder and editor of the Caribbean studies journal Acoma, 1971–74; returned to Paris to become editor of the UNESCO Courrier, 1980; moved to the United States to become Distinguished Professor at Louisiana State University, Baton Rouge, 1988; moved to New York to become distinguished Professor of French at the City University of New York, 1997. Awards: Prix Renaudot for La Lézarde, 1958; Prix Charles Veillon for Le quatrième siècle, 1964; Puterbaugh award for literature, 1989; honorary doctorate: York University of Toronto, 1989.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Poèmes. 1963.
Poèmes complets. 1994.

Fiction

La Lézarde. 1958; as The Ripening, translated by J. Michael Dash, 1985.
Le quatrième siècle. 1964.
Malemort. 1975.
La case du commandeur. 1981.
Mahagony. 1987.
Tout-monde. 1993.
Sartorius: le roman des Batoutos. 1999.

Poetry

Un champ d’îles. 1953.
La terre inquiète. 1954.
Les Indes: poème de l’une et l’autre terre. 1956; as The Indies, translated by Dominique O’Neill, 1992.
Le sel noir. 1960; as Black Salt, translated by Betsy Wing, 1999.
Le sang rivé. 1961.
L’Intention poétique. 1969.
Boises: histoire naturelle d’une aridité. 1979.
Pays rêvé, pays réel. 1985.
Fastes. 1992.

Other

Soleil de la conscience. 1956.
Monsieur Toussaint (play). 1978; as Monsieur Toussaint, translated by Joseph G. Foster and Barbara A. Franklin, 1981.
Le Discours antillais. 1981; as Caribbean Discourse: Selected Essays, translated by J. Michael Dash, 1989.
Poétique de la relation. 1990; as Poetics of Relation, translated by Betsy Wing, 1997.
Discours de Glendon. 1990.
Introduction à une poétique du divers. 1995.
Faulkner, Mississippi. 1996; as Faulkner, Mississippi, translated by Barbara Lewis and Thomas C. Spear, 1999.
Traité du tout-monde. 1997.

*

Bibliography: Bibliographie annotée d’Edouard Glissant by Alain Baudot, 1993.

Critical Studies: Edouard Glissant by Daniel Radford, 1982; Conquérants de la nuit nue: Edouard Glissant et l'Histoire antillaise by Bernadette Cailler, 1988; Myth and History in Caribbean Fiction: Aléjo Carpentier, Wilson Harris, and Edouard Glissant, 1992; Decolonizing the Text: Glissantian Readings in Caribbean and African Literatures by Debra L. Anderson, 1995; Edouard Glissant by J. Michael Dash, 1995; Edouard Glissant and Postcolonial Theory: Strategies of Language and Resistance by Celia Britton, 1999.

* * *

Although his creative works far outnumber his theoretical texts, Edouard Glissant has received the most critical attention for the latter, and in particular Le Discours antillais (Caribbean Discourse) and Poétique de la relation (Poetics of Relation). Glissant's most important theoretical contribution is his conception of Caribbean identity in general and Martinican identity in particular. Specifically, Glissant suggests in his theoretical works that Caribbean identity, which has typically been read in terms of an absence—an absence of traditional history, of clear origins, of a distinct language, for example—is in fact a new form of identity freed from the violence and domination of typically Western forms. Moreover, Glissant sees Caribbean identity, which he terms antillanité, as a model for a new world order. Precisely because Caribbean identity was born of rupture, of transplantation, of intermixing, it is, according to Glissant, ideally suited for a world in which migration, diversity, and multiculturalism have created a reality in which stable origins, nations, histories, languages are not possible.

Antillanité for Glissant refers to Caribbean (Martinican) identity as it exists. Whereas, he gives the name relation to the model for global identity and interaction based on antillanité. According to Glissant, a world characterized by relation is one in which interpersonal and political interaction results not in the domination or suppression of one group by another, but rather in the mutual interaction and transformation of peoples and cultures. Glissant sees relation as a direct contrast to traditional, Western conceptions of identity, which he reads as being rooted in fixed, stable categories such as race, nation, and religion. According to Glissant, the need for stability and rootedness leads to a fear of others that in turn leads to violent domination (such as colonization) and war. He presents relation as an alternative—one that accepts the reality of a constantly destabilized and unpredictable world, which he calls le chaos monde, or “the chaos world.” However, he sees chaos not as negative, but rather as the act of embracing the world in its true, ever-changing state.

In his creative works, Glissant both explores and illustrates the ideas of antillanité, relation, and chaos as they are later articulated in his theoretical texts. His poetry, which marks the beginning of his creative endeavor, demonstrates, even at his creative beginning, his preoccupation with capturing the hybridity and paradox of Caribbean experience. His poems are experiments in form and language, which attempt to bridge the gap between the Caribbean present and its past. These poems are filled with images of the sea, the land, and with historical references to slavery, to Departmentalization and even to Christopher Columbus. What they have in common is their attempt to capture Martinican experience through language.

Glissant's novels, like his poems, are also generically somewhat hybrid and are also preoccupied with capturing Caribbean and particularly Martinican reality. The two most widely studied of his novels, La Lézarde (The Ripening) and La case du commandeur, are in many ways narrative attempts to articulate and interpret the confused reality of contemporary Martinique. Both novels are characterized by Glissant's hybrid writing style, which merges elements of poetry and prose, and which reflects his conceptions of Martinican space and time through the rejection of linear narrative. In both novels, as in the majority of Glissant's oeuvre, the plot is secondary to the exploration of the nature of Martinique and of Martinican identity.

The Ripening centers on a political plot during the 1945 elections in Martinique. However, it may be argued that the Lézarde River, which winds throughout the narrative, connecting characters to one another, event to event, past to present, is actually the center of the text. In fact, the river, in the text, comes to function as Glissant's narrative embodiment of Martinican experience, precisely because of its ability to transcend time and space, and to connect diverse people, events, and realities.

La case du commandeur continues the exploration of the essence of Martinique, through the story of madwoman Marie Celat, or Mycéa, who escapes from a mental hospital and ends up in the cabin of an overseer. Mycéa, like the river in The Ripening, becomes the focal point of the text, although it can not be clearly said that her story is the novel's center. Rather, as in the earlier novel, Mycéa becomes a conduit or focal point through which the forces of time and nature, and the actions and events of others pass and become interconnected. Like the river of The Ripening, she becomes the representation of what Glissant is able to capture of Martinique, rather than a character in the traditional sense.

In its quest to simultaneously affirm and narrate a Caribbean/Martinican essence Glissant's work functions as the bridge between two generations of Martinican writers. Glissant is clearly influenced by Aimé Césaire and the négritude movement, which is often seen as the moment of awakening of Caribbean literary identity. However, Glissant differs from Césaire in that he does not seek to return to some fundamental African origin. Instead, he insists on the specificity of Caribbean experience, precisely in its rupture from all origins. In that respect, he can be seen as the intellectual predecessor of the contemporary generation of Martinican writers, the créolists, who embrace the hybridity of Martinican language and identity, and who claim the rupture and negotiation as a new origin of a new (world) identity.

—Dayna Oscherwitz

GOETHE, Johann Wolfgang von

Born: Frankfurt, Germany, 28 August 1749. Education: Studied law at Leipzig University, 1765–68, and drawing with Adam Oeser; after a period of illness, resumed his studies in Strasbourg, 1770–71, licentiate in law 1771. Family: Lived with Christiane Vulpius from 1788; married her in 1806 (died 1816); one son. Career: Practised law in Frankfurt, 1771–72, and Wetzlar, 1772; contributor, Frankfurter Gelehrte Anzeigen, 1772–73; at invitation of Duke Karl August, joined the small court of Weimar in 1775: member of the council, 1776, president, war commission, 1779, director of roads and services, 1779, ennobled 1782, took over much of the financial affairs of the court; after a visit to Italy, 1786–88, released from day-to-day government business: general supervisor for arts and sciences, 1788, and director of the court theatres, 1791–1817. Editor of a variety of yearbooks and magazines, including, with Schiller, Xenien, 1796–97; with J.H. Meyer, Die Propyläen, 1798–1800; Kunst und Altertum, 1816–32; and Zur Naturwissenschaft, 1817–24. Chancellor of the University of Jena. Died: 22 March 1832.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

- Schriften*. 8 vols., 1787–90; later editions, as Werke, 13 vols., 1806–10, etc.; 69 vols., 1826–42.
- Complete Works* [Bohn Standard Library]. 14 vols., 1848–90.
- Werke* [Sophie or Weimar Edition]. 134 vols., 1887–1919.
- Sämtliche Werke* [Jubiläum Edition], edited by Eduard von der Hellen. 40 vols., 1902–07.
- Werke* [Hamburg Edition], edited by Erich Trunz and others. 14 vols., 1948–69; subsequent revisions, last reprinted 1981.
- Gedenkausgabe der Werke, Briefe, und Gespräche*, edited by Ernst Beutler. 27 vols., 1948–71.
- Collected Works*, edited by Christopher Middleton and others, translated by Michael Hamburger and others. 12 vols., 1983–88.
- Sämtliche Werke* [Munich Edition], edited by Karl Richter and others. 1986–.
- Goethe: The Collected Works*, edited by Thomas P. Saine and Jeffrey L. Sammons. 1994.
- Fairy Tales, Short Stories, and Poems by Johann von Goethe*, edited and translated by J.W. Thomas. 1998.
- Selected Poems*, translated by John Whalley. 1998.
- Selected Poems*, edited with introduction by T.J. Reed. 1999.
- Selected Works: Including the Sorrows of Young Werther, Elective Affinities, Italian Journey, Faust*, introduced by Nicholas Boyle. 1999.

Fiction

- Die Leiden des jungen Werthers*. 1774; revised edition, 1787; as The Sorrows of Werter, translated by Richard Graves or Daniel Malthus, 1780; numerous subsequent translations including as The Sufferings of Young Werther, translated by Michael Hulse, 1989.
- Wilhelm Meisters Lehrjahre* [and Wanderjahre]. 1795–1821; as Wilhelm Meister's Apprenticeship [and Travels], translated by Thomas Carlyle, 1824–27, revised editions 1842, 1865; several subsequent translations including by H.M. Waidson, 1977–79.
- Die Wahlverwandtschaften*. 1809; as Elective Affinities, in Works; as Kindred by Choice, translated by H.M. Waidson, 1960; as Elective Affinities, translated by Elizabeth Mayer and Louise Brogan, 1963; also translated by R.J. Hollingdale, 1971; John Winkelman, 1987.
- Novelle*. 1826.

Plays

- Götz von Berlichingen mit der eisernen Hand* (produced 1774). 1773; as Goetz of Berlichingen with the Iron Hand, translated by Walter Scott, 1799; as Ironhand, translated by John Arden, 1965; as Götz von Berlichingen, translated by Charles E. Passage, in Plays, 1980.
- Clavigo* (produced 1774). 1774; as Clavidgo, translated by Charles Leftley, 1798.
- Götter, Helden, und Wieland*. 1774.
- Erwin und Elmire*, music by Jean André (produced 1775). 1775; revised version, in verse, in Schriften, 5, 1788.

- Stella*. 1776; revised version (produced 1806), in Werke, 6, 1816; translated as Stella, 1798.
- Claudine von Villa Bella* (produced 1777). 1776; revised version (produced 1789), in Schriften, 5, 1788.
- Die Geschwister* (produced 1776). In Schriften, 1, 1787.
- Die Mitschuldigen* (produced 1777). In Schriften, 2, 1787; as Fellow Culprits, translated by Charles E. Passage, in Plays, 1980.
- Lila*, music by Sigmund von Seckendorff (produced 1777). In Schriften, 1790.
- Das Jahrmarktsfest zu Plundersweilern* (produced 1778). In Schriften, 6, 1790.
- Der Triumph der Empfindsamkeit* (produced 1778). In Schriften, 4, 1787; revised version, as Proserpina, music by Karl Eberwein (produced 1915), in Werke, 1808.
- Die Laune des Verliebten* (produced 1779). In Werke, 4, 1806; as The Lover's Whim, translated by Charles E. Passage, in Plays, 1980.
- Iphigenie* (produced 1779; revised version, in verse, as Iphigenie auf Tauris, produced 1802). In Schriften, 3, 1787; as Iphigenia in Tauris, translated by William Taylor, 1793; several subsequent translations including by Charles E. Passage, in Plays, 1980.
- Die Vögel*, from the play by Aristophanes (produced 1780). 1787.
- Jery und Bätely*, music by Sigmund von Seckendorff (produced 1780). 1790.
- Die Fischerin*, music by Corona Schröter (produced 1782). 1782.
- Egmont* (produced 1784). 1788; translated as Egmont, 1848; also translated by Michael Hamburger, in The Classic Theatre, edited by Eric Bentley, 1959; F.J. Lamport, in Five German Tragedies, 1969; Charles E. Passage, in Plays, 1980.
- Torquato Tasso* (produced 1807). In Schriften, 6, 1790; as Torquato Tasso, translated by C. des Voeux, 1827; also translated by A. Swanwick, in Dramatic Works, 1846; John Prudhoe, 1979; Charles E. Passage, in Plays, 1980; Alan Brownjohn, 1985; as Tasso (Torquato Tasso), translated by Robert David MacDonald, 1994.
- Scherz, List und Rache* (opera libretto; produced 1790). In Schriften, 7, 1790.
- Der Gross-Cophta* (produced 1791). 1792.
- Der Bürgergeneral* (produced 1793). 1793.
- Mahomet*, from the play by Voltaire (produced 1799). 1802.
- Paläophron und Neoterpe* (produced 1800; revised version, produced 1803). In Werke, 1808.
- Tancred*, from the play by Voltaire (produced 1801). 1802.
- Die natürliche Tochter* (produced 1803). 1804.
- Faust*, Part One (produced 1819). In Werke, 8, 1808; translated as Faustus, 1821; numerous subsequent translations.
- Pandora*. 1810.
- Romeo und Juliet*, from the play by Shakespeare (produced 1812).
- Des Epimenides Erwachen* (produced 1815). 1815.
- Faust*, Part Two (produced 1854). In Werke: Ausgabe letzter Hand, 41, 1832 (first complete publication); numerous translations with Part One as Faust including by Philip Wayne, 2 vols., 1949–59.
- Plays* (includes Götz von Berlichingen; Fellow Culprits; The Lover's Whim; Iphigenia in Tauris; Egmont; Torquato Tasso; Faust), translated by Charles E. Passage. 1980.
- Plays: Egmont, Iphigenia in Tauris, Torquato Tasso*, edited by Frank Ryder. 1992.

Verse

- Neue Lieder mit Melodien*, music by Bernhard Breitkopf. 1770.
- Gedichte*, in Schriften, 8, 1789; and subsequent editions.

Römische Elegien. 1789; as Roman Elegies, translated by David Luke, 1977; as Roman Elegies and Other Poems, translated and edited by Michael Hamburger, 1996.

Reineke Fuchs. 1794; as Reynard the Fox, translated by Thomas Arnold, 1855; as Reineke Fox, translated by A. Rogers, 1888.

Hermann und Dorothea. 1798; as Herman and Dorothea, translated by Thomas Holcroft, 1801; several subsequent translations.

West-östlicher Divan. 1819; as West-Eastern Divan, translated by J. Weiss, 1876; as West-Eastern Divan, translated by Alexander Rogers, 1890; also translated by E. Dowden, 1914.

Selected Verse (bilingual edition), edited by David Luke. 1964.

Selected Poems (bilingual edition), edited by Christopher Middleton, translated by Michael Hamburger. 1983.

Erotic Poems, translated by David Luke. 1997.

Other

Beiträge zur Optik. 1790.

Versuch, die Metamorphose der Pflanzen zu erklären. 1790; as Goethe's Botany, translated by Agnes Arber, 1946.

Winckelmann und sein Jahrhundert. 1805.

Zur Farbenlehre. 1810; as Goethe's Theory of Colours, translated by C.L. Eastlake, 1840.

Aus meinem Leben: Dichtung und Wahrheit. 4 vols., 1811–33; as Memoirs of Goethe: Written by Himself, 1824; as The Autobiography of Goethe, translated by John Oxenford, 1848; as From My Life, translated by Robert Heitner, in Collected Works, 4, 1987.

Italienische Reise. 1816–17; as Travels in Italy, translated by Alexander James Morrison, 1849; as Italian Journey, translated by W.H. Auden and Elizabeth Mayer, 1962; edited by Thomas P. Saine and Jeffrey L. Sammons, translated by Robert R. Heitner, 1989; as The Flight to Italy: Diary and Selected Letters, edited and translated with introduction by T.J. Reed, 1999.

Tag- und Jahreshefte, in Werke 31–32. 1830; as Annals, translated by Charles Nisbet, 1901.

Gespräche mit Goethe, by Johann Peter Eckermann. 1836; edited by Fritz Bergemann, 1955; as Conversations with Goethe, translated by S.M. Fuller, 1839.

Correspondence with Goethe, by Carlyle. 1887.

Die Schriften zur Naturwissenschaft. 1947.

Amtliche Schriften, edited by Willy Flach and Helma Dahl. 3 vols., 1950–72.

Briefe, edited by K.R. Mandelkow and B. Morawe. 6 vols., 1962–69.

Gespräche, edited by W.F. and F. von Biedermann, revised by Wolfgang Herwig. 3 vols., 1965–72.

Goethe on Art, edited and translated by John Gage. 1980.

Schriften zur Biologie, edited by Konrad Dietzfelbinger. 1982.

Briefe aus Italien 1786 bis 1788 (selected letters), edited by Eugen Thurnher. 1985.

Early Letters of Goethe, with introduction by Christoph E. Schweitzer. 1993.

Published Essays: 1940–1952, edited with introduction by Ellis Sandoz. 2000.

*

Bibliography: Goethe-Bibliographie by Hans Pyritz, Heinz Nicolai, and Gerhard Burckhardt, 1954; supplement, 1968; Goethe-Bibliographie by Helmut G. Hermann, 1991.

Critical Studies: A Study of Goethe, 1947, and Goethe's Faust, Six Essays, 1953, both by Barker Fairley; Goethe: The Story of a Man by Ludwig Lewisohn, 1949; The Testament of Werther in Poetry and Drama, 1949, and Goethe's Faust: A Literary Analysis, 1958, both by Stuart P. Atkins; Goethe's Major Plays by Ronald Peacock, 1959; Goethe, Poet and Thinker by E. Wilkinson and L.A. Willoughby, 1962; Goethe: A Critical Introduction by Henry C. Hatfield, 1963; Goethe: His Life and Times by Richard Friedenthal, 1965; The Drama of Goethe, 1966, The Beautiful Soul: A Study of Eighteenth-Century Idealism as Exemplified by Rousseau's La Nouvelle Héloïse and Goethe's Die Leiden des jungen Werthers, 1981, and The Misinterpreting of Goethe's Gretchen Tragedy, 1992, all by R.D. Miller; Goethe's Faust: Its Genesis and Purport by Eudo C. Mason, 1967; A Student's Guide to Goethe by F.J. Lampport, 1971; Goethe's Faust: A Critical Reading, 1972, and Johann Wolfgang Goethe, 1974, both by Liselotte Dieckmann; “Wine That Maketh Glad”: The Interplay of Reality and Symbol in Goethe's Life and Work by L.A. Willoughby, 1975; Goethe and the Novel by Eric A. Blackall, 1976; Goethe's Faust: Seven Essays by Alan Cottrell, 1976; Faust and the Bible: A Study of Goethe's Use of Scriptural Allusions and Christian Religious Motifs in Faust I and II by Osman Durrani, 1977; Goethe: Portrait of the Artist by Ilse Graham, 1977; Goethe and the Weimar Theatre by Marvin Carlson, 1978; Invitation to Goethe's Faust by Harry G. Haile, 1978; The Form of Faust: The Work of Art and its Intrinsic Structures by Harold Jantz, 1978; Studies in Goethe's Lyric Cycles by Meredith Lee, 1978; Time Structure in Drama: Goethe's Sturm und Drang Plays by Walter K. Stewart, 1978; Goethe's Search for the Muse: Translation and Creativity by David B. Richards, 1979; The Classical Centre: Goethe and Weimar 1775–1832, 1980, Goethe, 1984, and Nobody's Master: Goethe and the Authority of the Writer, 1990, all by T.J. Reed; Goethe's Faust: The Making of Part I, 1981, and Goethe's Other Faust: The Drama, Part Two, 1993, both by John Gearey; Goethe's Narrative Fiction edited by William J. Lillyman, 1983; Spirited Women Heroes: Major Female Characters in the Dramas of Goethe, Schiller and Kleist by Julie D. Prandi, 1983; Figures of Identity: Goethe's Novels and the Enigmatic Self by Clark S. Muenzer, 1984; Goethe's Theory of Poetry: Faust and the Regeneration of Language by Benjamin Bennett, 1986; Goethe's Faust: The German Tragedy by Jane K. Brown, 1986 and Interpreting Goethe's Faust Today, edited by Brown and others, 1994; Goethe's Faust: Part One, 1987, and Goethe: The Poet of the Age—The Poetry of Desire, 1991, both by Nicholas Boyle; Our Faust? Roots and Ramifications of a German Myth edited by Reinhold Grimm and Jost Hermand, 1987; Images of Identity: Goethe and the Problem of Self-Conception in the Nineteenth Century by Benjamin C. Sax, 1987; Goethe: The Sorrows of Young Werther by Martin Swales, 1987; The Eternity of Being: On the Experience of Time in Goethe's Faust by Deirdre Vincent, 1987; Echoes of Lucian in Goethe's Faust by Ida H. Washington, 1987; Goethe's Faust by John R. Williams, 1987; Apollo in the Wilderness: An Analysis of Critical Reception of Goethe in America, 1806–1840 by Maxine Grefe, 1988; The Paradoxical Quest: A Study of Faustian Vicissitudes by Alfred Hoelzel, 1988; Goethe in Italy, 1786–1986: A Bicentennial Symposium edited by Gerhardt Hoffmeister, 1988; Faust through Four Centuries: Retrospect and Analysis edited by Sidney Johnson, 1989; Goethe's Römische Elegien: The Lover and the Poet by Eva Dessau Bernhardt, 1990; Goethe's Faust: Notes for a Jungian Commentary by Edward F.

Edinger, 1990; The Critical Idyll: Traditional Values and the French Revolution in Goethe's Hermann und Dorothea by Peter Morgan, 1990; Idioms of Uncertainty: Goethe and the Essay by Peter J. Burgard, 1993; The Life of Goethe: A Critical Biography by John R. Williams, 1998; Goethe by Irmgard Wagner, 1999; Goethe and Schubert: The Unseen Bond by Kenneth S. Whitton, 1999.

* * *

Johann Wolfgang von Goethe is the dominant figure in the history of modern German literature, whose works established, in all the principal genres, models or norms which have dominated succeeding generations (whether they have sought to follow or emulate, or to rebel against them). His creative life is customarily divided into three principal periods. The first embraces his youth and early manhood and coincides with (or, indeed, determines) the rise and fall of the Sturm und Drang movement in German literature. The second comprises his maturity and middle age, from the Italian journey of 1786 through the years of his collaboration with Schiller and their joint attempt to establish a "classical" German literature; the third, the last quarter-century of his life, after Schiller's death, in which he appears as an increasingly solitary figure. Goethe himself spoke of the Italian journey as a "rebirth," of the death of Schiller as "the loss of half of myself." In each of these phases Goethe made contributions of the highest rank and importance to German lyric and dramatic poetry and prose fiction.

Goethe's literary beginnings were more or less conventional, but in 1770 his own characteristic individuality was liberated by his meeting with the critic Herder. Herder introduced him to new ideas of spontaneous creation and inspiration and of national character in literature, to the beauties of folksong and of other "unsophisticated" forms free of the rules and precepts of continental neo-classicism, such as the plays of Shakespeare. Before he was 25, Goethe had effectively created models for the whole European Romantic movement: with the exuberant outpourings of his lyrical poetry on the themes of nature, love, individuality, genius, and creativity; with the sprawling, shapeless, but powerful pseudo-Shakespearian historical drama Götz von Berlichingen mit der eisernen Hand (Goetz of Berlichingen with the Iron Hand) and the as yet unfinished and unpublished Faust; not least with the tragic, "confessional" epistolary novel Die Leiden des jungen Werthers (The Sufferings of Young Werther), which established his European reputation at a stroke—somewhat to his subsequent chagrin. But it was to the reputation thus earned that he owed his appointment to the court of the young Duke Karl August of Weimar, with whom he soon established a close relationship.

Before long, court life began to impose its restraints on the hitherto unfettered genius, and the idealistic spiritual drama Iphigenie auf Tauris (Iphigenia in Tauris) exhibits a highly "classical" formal balance and discipline appropriate to its content and message, even in its original prose version (only after the journey to Italy was it recast in polished blank verse). In the lyric poetry written in the aftermath of the Italian journey Goethe carries this formal "classicism" to the extent of writing almost exclusively in the ancient Greek and Latin metres, hexameter and elegiac distich. This poetry is also concerned with balance and harmony, with a wholeness of all aspects of human life, of art and nature, of intellect, emotion, and sensuality. In respect of the last-named, however, it marks the overcoming of courtly restraint: the Römische Elegien (Roman Elegies) celebrate a ripe sense of sexual fulfilment quite different from the youthful "romantic" passion of the earlier poetry. But that the Romantic spirit was still alive in the classical Goethe is demonstrated above all by the poetic drama Torquato Tasso, which introduces into European literature that quintessentially Romantic figure, the lonely artist tragically at odds with society.

A fragment of Faust was published in 1790, but it was during the period of his collaboration with Schiller that Goethe was able to create an overall design for the work—now conceived not as the tragedy of a heaven-storming genius, but as a celebration of universal human striving. The first of its two parts was completed in 1805, the year of Schiller's death. The novel Wilhelm Meisters Lehrjahre (Wilhelm Meister's Apprenticeship) was another recasting of an earlier project. Originally concerned with Wilhelm's "theatrical mission," typical of the attempts of earlier generations of German writers to create a national dramatic literature, it is now extended to embrace the much wider theme of his "apprenticeship" to life, of his development and growth into a complete human being, into some sort of modern equivalent (with all the necessary limitation that that implies) of the kalokagathos of classical antiquity. The novel is the prototype of the Bildungsroman, which has represented the apogee of the novel form to many German writers, from the Romantics, Goethe's immediate successors, to Thomas Mann, Hesse, and even Grass in the 20th century.

Despite or indeed because of their self-consciously "classical" and exemplary character, many of the works of Goethe's middle period have often been felt to lack the vigour and immediacy of his earlier writing; many readers have found in their balance and restraint a certain blandness or evasiveness. In the works of his old age these very qualities are, paradoxically, intensified into a uniquely personal obliquity and ironical allusiveness, particularly in the second part of Faust and in the novels Wilhelm Meisters Wanderjahre (Wilhelm Meister's Travels)—the sequel to the Apprenticeship—and Die Wahlverwandtschaften (Elective Affinities). But much of his late lyrical poetry is of a mysterious, luminous simplicity, and there is direct expression of powerful emotion in the love-poems of the West-östlicher Divan (West-Eastern Divan) and in the "Marienbad Elegy."

The chief ever-present theme of all Goethe's work is nature, with its all-pervading harmonies, its universal laws of metamorphosis, of evolution, of permanence in change, of death and rebirth. Man, both as an individual and in his social and political life, is seen essentially as part of this natural order. Goethe devoted much effort to scientific work. His anti-Newtonian theory of light and colours has found little favour, but his work in geology and biology, in comparative anatomy, and in plant and animal morphology still commands respect. He was profoundly drawn to evolutionary theories of geological and of human development—which made him politically a conservative, an enemy of the French Revolution and of all arbitrary violence. Despite the many upheavals he witnessed in his long life, he remained essentially an optimist: despite the tragedy that has accompanied his strivings, his Faust is ultimately—untraditionally and un-Romantically—redeemed.

—F.J. Lamport

See the essays on Elective Affinities, Faust, Goetz of Berlichingen with the Iron Hand, The Sufferings of Young Werther, Torquato Tasso, and Wilhelm Meister's Apprenticeship.

GOGOL' (IANOVSKY), Nikolai (Vasilevich)

Born: Sorochintsy, Poltava, Ukraine, 19 March 1809. Education: Educated at Poltava boarding school 1819–21, and Nezhin high school, 1821–28. Career: Civil servant in St. Petersburg, 1829–31; history teacher, Patriotic Institute, St. Petersburg, and private tutor, 1831–34; assistant lecturer in history, University of St. Petersburg, 1834–35; visited Germany, Switzerland, and France, 1836; in Rome, 1837–39; travelled in western Europe and Russia, 1839–48; began association with the spiritual leader, Father Konstantinovskii, 1847; visited the Holy Land, 1848; resettled in Russia, 1849. Died: 21 February 1852.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Collected Works (includes Dead Souls; The Overcoat and Other Stories; Evenings on a Farm near Dikanka; The Government Inspector and Other Stories), translated by Constance Garnett. 6 vols., 1922–27.

Polnoe sobranie sochinenii [Complete Works]. 14 vols., 1937–52.

Sobranie sochinenii [Collected Works], edited by S.A. Mashinskii. 7 vols., 1966–67.

The Collected Tales and Plays (translations), edited by Leonard J. Kent. 1969.

The Theater of Nikolay Gogol: Plays and Selected Writings (includes Marriage; The Government Inspector; The Gamblers; extracts from Gogol's notes, letters, and essays), edited by Milton Ehre, translated by Ehre and Fruma Gottschalk. 1980.

Sobranie sochinenii [Collected Works], edited by V.R. Shcherbina. 8 vols., 1984.

The Complete Tales, edited by Leonard J. Kent. 2 vols., 1985.

Gogol: Plays and Selected Writings, edited with introduction and notes by Milton Ehre, translated by Milton Ehre and Fruma Gottschalk, 1994.

Fiction

Vechera na khutore bliz Dikan'ki (stories). 2 vols., 1831–32; as Evenings in Little Russia, translated by E.W. Underwood and W.H. Cline, 1903; as Evenings on a Farm near Dikanka, translated by Constance Garnett, in Collected Works, 1926; as Evenings near the Village of Dikanka, translated by Ovid Gorchakov, 1960; translated and edited by Christopher English, 1994.

Mirgorod (stories). 1835; as Mirgorod, Being a Continuation of Evenings in a Village near Dikanka, translated by Constance Garnett, 1928; as Mirgorod, translated by David Magarshack, 1962.

Arabeski (stories). 1835; as Arabesques, translated by Alexander Tulloch, 1982.

Mertvye dushi. 1842; as Home Life in Russia, 1854; as Tchitchikoff's Journeys or Dead Souls, translated by Isabel F. Hapgood, 2 vols., 1886; as Dead Souls, translated by S. Graham, 2nd edition, 1915; also translated by C.J. Hogarth, 1916; George Reavey, 1936; Andrew R. MacAndrew, 1961; David Magarshack, 1961; Helen Michailoff, 1964; as Chichikov's Journeys; or, Home-Life in Old Russia, translated by Bernard G. Guerny, 1942; translated by Bernard Guilbert Guerny, 1996; translated by Richard Pevear and Larissa Volokhonsky, 1996.

Cossack Tales (includes "The Night of Christmas Eve"; "Taras Bulba"), translated by G. Tolstoi. 1861.

St. John's Eve and Other Stories from Evenings at the Farm and St. Petersburg Stories (includes "St. John's Eve"; "Old-Fashioned Farmers"; "The Tale of How Ivan Ivanovich Quarrelled with Ivan Nikiforovich"; "The Portrait"; "The Cloak"), translated by Isabel F. Hapgood. 1886.

Taras Bulba, St. John's Eve and Other Stories (includes "Taras Bulba"; "St. John's Eve"; "The Cloak"; "The Quarrel of the Two Ivans"; "The Mysterious Portrait"; "The Calash"), translated anonymously. 1887.

Russian Romances (includes "Taras Bulba"; "St. John's Eve"; "Akakiy Akakievitch's New Cloak"; "How the Two Ivans Quarrelled"; "The Mysterious Portrait"; "The King of the Gnomes"; "The Calash"), translated anonymously. 1899.

The Mantle and Other Stories (includes "The Mantle"; "The Nose"; "Memoirs of a Madman"; "A May Night"; "The Viy"), translated by Claud Field. 1915.

Taras Bulba and Other Tales, translated by John Cournos. 1917.

Tales, translated by Constance Garnett. 1926.

Diary of a Madman, translated by D. Mirsky. 1929; also translated by Beatrice Scott, with Nevsky Prospekt, 1945; Andrew R. MacAndrew, in Diary of a Madman and Other Stories, 1962; Ronald Wilks, in Diary of a Madman and Other Stories, 1972; as A Madman's Diary, in The Humor of Russia, edited by Ethel Lilian Voynich, 1895; as Memoirs of a Madman, in Gems of the World's Best Classics, edited by Llewellyn Jones and C.C. Gaul, 1927; translated by Constance Garnett, 1998.

Tales from Gogol (includes "Sorochinsky Fair"; "The Coach"; "Christmas Eve"; "Nevsky Prospekt"; "How the Ivans Quarrelled"; "The Nose"), translated by Rosa Portnova. 1945.

Tales of Good and Evil (includes "The Terrible Vengeance"; "The Portrait"; "Nevsky Avenue"; "Taras Bulba"; "The Overcoat"), translated by David Magarshack. 1949; new edition, 1957 (includes additionally "Ivan Fyodorovich Shponka and His Aunt" and "The Nose," but omits "Taras Bulba").

Taras Bulba and Other Tales, translated by Nikolay Andreyev. 1962.

Taras Bulba; The Lost Letters; The Terrible Vengeance, translated by Andrew R. MacAndrew. 1962.

Diary of a Madman and Other Stories (includes "Diary of a Madman"; "The Nose"; "The Carriage"; "The Overcoat"; "Taras Bulba"), translated by Andrew R. MacAndrew. 1962.

Shinel', edited by J. Forsyth. 1965; as The Cloak, in Short Story Classics, vol. 1, edited by W. Patten, 1907; in Best Russian Short Stories, edited by Thomas Seltzer, 1917; in Russian Short Stories, edited by Harry Christian Schweikert, 1919; translated by Isabel F. Hapgood, in Great Russian Short Stories, edited by Stephen Graham, 1929; as The Overcoat, translated by Constance Garnett, in The Overcoat and Other Stories, 1923; also translated by David Magarshack, 1956; Andrew R. MacAndrew, in Diary of a Madman and Other Stories, 1962; Ronald Wilks, in Diary of a Madman and Other Stories, 1972; adapted by Tom Lanter and Frank S. Torok, 1975; as The Greatcoat, translated by Bernard G. Guerny, 1943; Z. Shoenberg and J. Domb, 1944.

Diary of a Madman and Other Stories (includes "Diary of a Madman"; "The Nose"; "The Overcoat"; "How Ivan Ivanovich Quarrelled with Ivan Nikiforovich"; "Ivan Fyodorovich and His Aunt Shponka"), translated by Ronald Wilks. 1972.

Plays

Utro delovogo cheloveka (produced 1871). 1836; as An Official's Morning, translated by Constance Garnett, in The Government Inspector and Other Plays, 1926.

Revizor (produced 1836). 1836; revised versions, 1841, and in Sochineniia, 1842; edited by D. Bondar, 1945; as The Inspector, translated by T. Hart-Davies, 1892; as Revizor: A Comedy, translated by M. Mandell, 1910; as The Inspector-General, translated by A.A. Sykes, 1892; T. Seltzer, 1916; J. Anderson, 1931; J. Dolman and B. Rothberg, 1937; Andrew R. MacAndrew, 1976; as The Government Inspector, translated by Constance Garnett, in The Government Inspector and Other Plays, 1926, and in Works, 1927; also translated by D.J. Campbell, 1947; W.L. Goodman and Henry S. Taylor, 1962; Edward O. Marsh and Jeremy Brooks, 1968; Milton Ehre and Fruma Gottschalk, in The Theater of Nikolay Gogol, 1980; adapted by Guy Williams, 1980; also adapted by Adrian Mitchell, 1985; translated by John Laurence Seymour and George Rapall Noyes, 1995; adapted by John Byrne, translated by Alex Wilbraham, 1997.

Zhenit'ba (produced 1842). 1841; translated as Zhenitba, in The Humor of Russia, edited by Ethel Lilian Voynich, 1895; as Marriage, translated by Alexander Bakshy and Elizabeth Pennell, 1923; also translated by A. Berkman, with The Gamblers, 1927; Bella Costello, 1969; Milton Ehre and Fruma Gottschalk, in The Theater of Nikolay Gogol, 1980; as The Marriage, translated by Constance Garnett, in The Government Inspector and Other Plays, 1926, and in Works, 1927.

Tiazhba (produced 1844). In Sochineniia, 1842; as A Lawsuit, translated by Constance Garnett, in The Government Inspector and Other Plays, 1926; also translated by B. Pares, 1926.

Teatralnyi razyezd posle predstavleniia novoi komedii, in Sochineniia. 1842; as After the Play, translated by David Magarshack, 1959; in part as Leaving the Theatre after a Performance of a New Comedy, translated by Milton Ehre and Fruma Gottschalk, in The Theater of Nikolay Gogol, 1980, and in Hanz Kuechelgarten, Leaving the Theatre and Other Works, edited and translated by Ronald Meyer, 1990.

Igroki (produced 1843). In Sochineniia, 1842; as The Gamblers, translated by Constance Garnett, in The Government Inspector and Other Plays, 1926; numerous subsequent translations including by G. Wallerstein and B. Pares, 1926, A. Berkman, with Marriage, 1927, and Eric Bentley, 1957.

Otryvok (produced 1860). In Sochineniia, 1842; as A Fragment, translated by Constance Garnett, in The Government Inspector and Other Plays, 1926.

Lakeiskaia (produced 1863). In Sochineniia, 1842; as The Servants' Hall, translated by Constance Garnett, in The Government Inspector and Other Plays, 1926.

The Government Inspector and Other Plays (includes Marriage; The Gamblers; Dramatic Sketches and Fragments: An Official's Morning, A Lawsuit, The Servants' Hall, A Fragment), translated by Constance Garnett. 1926.

Other

Sochineniia [Works]. 4 vols., 1842.

Vybrannye mesta iz perepiski s druz'iami. 1847; as Selected Passages from Correspondence with Friends, translated by Jesse Zeldin, 1969.

Razmyshleniia o bozhestvennoi liturgii; as Meditations on the Divine Liturgy, translated by L. Alexieff. 1913; as The Divine Liturgy of the Eastern Orthodox Church, translated by Rosemary Edmonds, 1960.

Letters of Nikolai Gogol (translations), edited by Carl R. Proffer, translated by Proffer and Vera Krivoshein. 1967.

Nikolai Gogol: A Selection, translated by Christopher English. 1980. Hanz Kuechelgarten, Leaving the Theater and Other Works, edited and translated by Ronald Meyer. 1990.

Avtorskaia ispoved' [An Author's Confession]. 1990.

V poiskakh zhivoi dushi [In the Raid of a Living Soul]. 1990.

*

Bibliography: Gogol: A Bibliography by Philip E. Frantz, 1989.

Critical Studies: Gogol by Janko Lavrin, 1926; The Mighty Three: Pushkin, Gogol, Dostoevsky by Boris Leo Brasol, 1934; Nikolai Gogol by Vladimir Nabokov, 1944; Gogol: A Life by David Magarshack, 1957; Gogol as a Short Story Writer: A Study of His Technique of Composition by F.C. Driessen, 1965; Gogol: His Life and Works by Vsevolod Setchkarev, 1965; The Simile and Gogol's Dead Souls by Carl R. Proffer, 1967; Gogol by Victor Ehrlich, 1969; Gogol: A Life by Hugh McLean, 1969; Reading the Russian Text of the Memoirs of a Madman of N.V. Gogol by D.R. Hitchcock, 1974; Gogol from the Twentieth Century: Eleven Essays edited by Robert A. Maguire, 1974, revised edition, 1976; Gogol: The Biography of a Divided Soul by Henri Troyat, 1974; The Sexual Labyrinth of Nikolai Gogol by Simon Karlinsky, 1976; Through Gogol's Looking Glass: Reverse Vision, False Focus, and Precarious Logic by William W. Rowe, 1976; Gogol's Dead Souls, 1978, and The Symbolic Art of Gogol: Essays on His Short Fiction, 1982, both by James B. Woodward; The Creation of Nikolai Gogol by Donald Fanger, 1979; Are There Any Digressions in Pushkin's Evgenij Onegin and Gogol's Dead Souls?: A Review of the Critical Literature with Commentary by László Dienes, 1981; Gogol by V.V. Gippius, 1981; The Enigma of Gogol: An Examination of the Writings of N.V. Gogol and Their Place in the Russian Literary Tradition by Richard Peace, 1981; Out from under Gogol's Overcoat: A Psychoanalytic Study by Daniel Rancour-Laferrière, 1982; Gogol's Overcoat: An Anthology of Critical Essays edited by Elizabeth Trahan, 1982; Nikolai Gogol and Ivan Turgenev by Nick Worrall, 1982; Gogol and the Natural School by Victor V. Vinogradov, 1987; "Such Things Happen in the World": Deixis in Three Short Stories by N.V. Gogol by P.M. Waszink, 1988; Nikolai Gogol: Text and Context edited by Jane Grayson and Faith Wigzell, 1989; Essays on Gogol: Logos and the Russian Word edited by Susanne Fusso and Priscilla Meyer, 1992, and Designing Dead Souls: An Anatomy of Disorder in Gogol by Fusso, 1993; Nikolai Gogol and the Baroque Heritage by Gavriel Shapiro, 1993; The Pragmatics of Insignificance: Chekhov, Zoshchenko, Gogol by Cathy Popkin, 1993; Exploring Gogol by Robert A. Maguire, 1994; Gogol's The Government Inspector by Michael Beresford, 1997; The Anguish of Mykola Hohol a.k.a. Nikolai Gogol by George Luckyj, 1998; Russian Devils and Diabolic Conditionality in Nikolai Gogol's Evening on a Farm Near Dikanka by Christopher Putney, 1999; Frames of the Imagination: Gogol's Arabesques and the Romantic Question of Genre by Melissa Frazier, 2000.

* * *

The contribution of Nikolai Gogol' to the remarkable renaissance of Russian literature in the 19th century is exceeded only by that of Pushkin. With his three volumes of stories and his novel Mertvye dushi (Dead Souls) he not only ensured that the prose genres would predominate until the advent of Symbolism; he also effected with his subject-matter, themes, and character-types and his highly complex style the enormous expansion of the range of Russian literature and the Russian literary language, without which the major works of his successors, particularly Dostoevskii, could hardly have been written. In addition, his fiction and plays laid the foundations of Russian satire, and his central concern with the themes of guilt and redemption and with the contradictions and fragmentation of society marked the transition from a disinterested art to a committed one, to the conception of art as service and a spur to action, which has given modern Russian literature its characteristic sense of engagement.

But although Gogol's influence on the development of the modern Russian literary tradition was far-reaching, his works represent a unique body of writing that differs from that tradition in numerous fundamental respects. Herein lies the first of the many paradoxes which confront the reader. Thus neither of the two most conspicuous elements of that tradition, realism and penetrating psychological analysis, can be readily ascribed to Gogol's own art, in which the boundaries between the real, the supernatural, and the grotesque are always likely to dissolve, and the inner man is usually seen only through the props of his portrait. Similarly his elaborate style, in which extremes converge and a sentence or simile can encompass a paragraph or page, remained an inimitable testimony to the uniqueness of his genius.

The transition from his first two volumes of stories, Vechera na khutore bliz Dikan'ki (Evenings on a Farm near Dikanka) and Mirgorod (Mirgorod, Being a Continuation of Evenings in a Village near Dikanka), to his uncompleted novel conveys the impression of a complex evolution. In seven of the eight tales of Evenings on a Farm near Dikanka he drew extensively on his intimate knowledge of the Ukrainian folklore tradition, responding both to the contemporary vogue for exotic regionalism and to the taste for Gothic horror stories whetted by such German Romantic writers as Hoffmann and Tieck. The result is a bizarre mixture of the mundane and the supernatural, the comic and the horrific, which immediately established contrast as the central feature of Gogol's art. But the most striking contrast of all is created by the volume's penultimate story "Ivan Fedorovich Shpon'ka and His Aunt" in which the scene is switched abruptly to the Russian provinces of the 1820s and detailed characterization replaces tortuous plots. The story presents the first intriguing foretaste of the manner and preoccupations of the later works.

In the four works which comprise the volume Mirgorod the Ukrainian setting is retained, and the particular forms of contrast here serve significantly to clarify the underlying theme of Gogol's Ukrainian tales. The four works are essentially parodies of four literary genres—the idyll ("Old-Fashioned Farmers"), the heroic epic ("Taras Bulba"), the folktale ("The Viy"), and the comic tale ("The Tale of How Ivan Ivanovich Quarrelled with Ivan Nikiforovich")—which in combination express a powerful lament on the social and moral decline of Gogol's native land. In each case the reader's expectations are abruptly confounded by the intrusion of unfamiliar elements that evoke a pervasive sense of degeneration, aberration, and debilitating betrayal. Love yields to habit, heroism to inertia, and the appetites and senses replace honour and duty as the ultimate arbiters of human conduct. Greeted with wide acclaim, the four works are the first major embodiments of the theme to which Gogol's art was thereafter to be devoted—the theme of moral decline, of the emasculation and perversion of the human spirit.

On moving to St. Petersburg Gogol' soon found congenial material for the further development of this theme in the dehumanizing world of the capital's bureaucracy in which he spent a few wretched months. The most celebrated of his so-called "Petersburg Tales"—"Shinel" ("The Overcoat") and "Zapiski Sumasshedshego" ("Diary of a Madman")—were the fruits of this experience. Here again a disconcerting effect is produced by the coexistence of contrasting elements—in this case compassion for the depersonalized "little man" and detached, ironic scorn both for his abject surrender of his human dignity and for his belated, grotesque attempts to restore it. At the same time these and other stories in Gogol's third volume—"Nevskii prospekt" ("The Nevsky Prospect"), "Portret" ("The Portrait"), and especially "Nos" ("The Nose")—make abundantly clear the umbilical connection between his deceptive, nightmarish St. Petersburg and the folktale world of his Ukrainian tales. Again comedy and horror, the real and the fantastic are inseparably fused, and the devil and the witch retain their prominent roles, now clothed anew in the elegant attire of dignitaries, generals, and imperious ladies.

It was in the play Revizor (The Government Inspector) and the novel Dead Souls, however, that the contrasting elements of Gogol's art combined to produce two of the masterpieces of world literature. Selecting the vacuous Khlestakov and the acquisitive Chichikov as his itinerant heroes and employing in both works the simple plot device of confronting them with the senior citizens of the provincial towns in which they briefly alight, he was able to bring his unique gifts as humorist and satirist and his mature art of portraiture to bear on the task which he had now come to believe he was called on to perform: to expose the limitless extent of human folly and corruption and to infect his readers with his personal craving for moral rebirth. But the appearance of Part One of the projected three-part novel in 1842 marked the death of Gogol' the artist. Only fragments of Part Two have survived, together with his collection of essays Vybrannye mesta iz perepiski s druž'iami (Selected Passages from Correspondence with Friends), to illuminate the agonies that he experienced in exchanging his role as a castigator of evil for that of a guilt-ridden instrument of divine revelation. The struggle continued for ten long years before his body succumbed to the fate of his art.

—James B. Woodward

See the essays on Dead Souls, "Diary of a Madman," and The Government Inspector.

GOLDONI, Carlo

Born: Venice, Italy, 25 February 1707, Education: Educated in Venice; at a Jesuit school in Perugia; with Dominicans in Rimini; studied law at Papal College in Pavia, 1723–25. Family: Married Nicoletta Conio in 1736. Career: Assistant to his physician father in Chioggia, 1721–23, and in other towns; clerk in criminal court, Chioggia, 1728–29, and Feltre, 1729–30; passed law examinations in Padua in 1731, and called to the Venetian bar, 1732; wrote plays for amateur companies as early as 1729–30, and for Giuseppe Imer's company, 1734–44, beginning with bare scenarios and gradually working towards completely written scripts; director of the opera house Teatro San Giovanni Crisostomo in Venice; lawyer in Pisa, 1744–47; house dramatist for Girolamo Medebach's acting company, 1748–53, and writer with the Teatro San Luca, 1753–62, both in Venice (in Rome, 1757–58); with the Comédie-Italienne, Paris, 1762–64; Italian tutor to the daughter of Louis XV, Princess Adelaide, 1764–65, and to royal children, 1768–80, in Versailles; in Paris after 1780. Wrote plays in both Italian and Venetian dialect, and some plays in French; also wrote libretti for cantatas and operas. Died: 6 February 1793.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Opere teatrali (first complete edition). 44 vols., 1788–95.
Raccolta completa di tutte le commedie in prosa ed in verso del signor Carlo Goldoni. 15 vols., 1794–98.
Opere complete, edited by Giuseppe Ortolani, E. Maddalena, and C. Musatti. 40 vols., 1907–60.
Tutte le opere (includes letters), edited by Giuseppe Ortolani. 14 vols., 1935–56.
Opere, edited by Fitippo Zampieri. 1954.
Teatro (selected plays), edited by Marzia Pieri. 3 vols., 1991.
The Comic Theatre of Carlo Goldoni, translated and introduced by L. Paris Saiko. 2000.

Plays

Belisario (produced 1734). 1798.
Rosmonda (produced 1734). 1793.
Don Giovanni Tenorio; o, Sia il dissoluto (produced 1736). 1754.
Rinaldo di Montalbano (produced 1736). 1774.
Enrico, Re di Sicilia (produced 1736). 1740.
Momolo cortesan, o, L'uomo di mondo (produced 1738). 1757.
Il prodigo (also known as Momolo sulla Brenta; produced 1739). 1757.
La bancarotta (produced 1740).
La donna di garbo (produced 1743). 1747; edited by Gastone Geron, 1984.
Il figlio d'Arlecchino perduto e ritrovato (produced c. 1745).
Il servitore di due padroni (produced 1745). 1753; edited by Eugenio Levi, 1957; as Arlecchino servitore di due padroni, edited by Luigi Lunari, Giorgio Strehler, and Carlo Pedretti, 1979; as The Servant of Two Masters, translated by Edward J. Dent, 1928; also translated by Tom Cone, 1980; Eric Bentley, in Servant of Two Masters and Other Italian Classics, 1986; translated and adapted by Shelley Berc and Andrei Belgrader, 1992; translated by Christina Sibul, adapted by Constance Congdon, 2000.
I due gemelli veneziani (produced 1748). 1750; edited by Guido Davico Bonino, 1975; as The Venetian Twins, translated by Frederick H. Davies, in Four Comedies, 1968; translated by Ranjit Bolt in The Venetian Twins; Mirandolina: Two Plays, 1993.
L'uomo prudente (produced 1748). 1750.

La vedova scaltra (produced 1748). 1750; edited by Avancinio Avancini, 1935, and by Gastone Geron, 1984; as The Artful Widow, translated by Frederick H. Davies, in Four Comedies, 1968.
Tonin Bella Grazie; o, Il frapportatore (produced 1748). 1757.
La buona moglie (produced 1749). 1751.
Il cavaliere e la dama; o, I cicisbei (produced 1749). 1751; edited by Nicola Mangini, 1964.
La putta onorata (produced 1749). 1751; edited by Gastone Geron, 1984.
Il poeta fanatico (produced 1750).
Il padre di famiglia (produced c. 1750). 1751; as The Father of a Family, 1757.
Il teatro comico (produced 1750). 1751; edited by Gerolamo Bottoni, 1926, and by Guido Davico Bonino, 1983; as The Comic Theatre, translated by John W. Miller, 1969.
La famiglia dell'Antiquario (produced 1750). 1752; edited by Pietro Azzarone, 1961, by Guido Davico Bonino, 1983, and by Nicola Mangini and Nella Pavese, 1988.
L'avvocato veneziano (produced 1750). 1752.
Le feminine puntigliose (produced 1750). 1753.
La bottega del caffè (produced 1750). 1753; edited by Gianni Di Stefano, 1967, and by Carlo Pedretti, 1984; as The Coffee House, translated by Henry B. Fuller, 1925; translated by Robert Cornthwaite, 1995; also translated by Jeremy Parzen, 1998.
Il bugiardo (produced 1750). 1753; edited by Pietro Azzarone, 1967; with La donna di garbo, 1980; as The Liar, translated by Grace Lovat Fraser, 1922; also translated and adapted by Frederick H. Davies, 1963.
L'adulatore (produced 1750). 1753.
La Pamela, from the novel by Richardson (produced 1750). 1753; edited by Carmine Montella, 1968; translated as Pamela, 1756.
Il cavalier di buon gusto (produced 1750). 1753.
Il giuocatore (produced 1750). 1754.
Il vero amico (produced 1750). 1753.
L'eredità fortunata (produced 1750). 1752.
Commedie. 1750–55, 1753–57, 1757–63, 1761–78.
La finta ammalata (produced 1751). 1753.
La dama prudente (produced 1751). 1753.
L'incognita perseguitata dal bravo impertinente (produced 1751). 1754.
L'avventuriero onorato (produced 1751). 1753.
La donna volubile (produced 1751). 1755.
I pettegozzi delle donne (produced 1751). 1753; edited by Antonio Marenduzzo, 1942.
Il Moliere (produced 1751).
L'amante militare (produced 1751). 1755.
La castalda (produced 1751). 1753.
Il tu tare (produced 1752). 1753.
La moglie saggia (produced 1752). 1753.
Il feudatario (produced 1752). 1753.
La figlia obbediente (produced 1752). 1754; as The Good Girl, translated by M. Tracy, in Four Comedies, 1922.
La serva amorosa (produced 1752). 1753.
Le donne gelose (produced 1752). 1753; edited by Gastone Geron, 1988; as The Good-Humoured Ladies, translated by Richard Aldington, 1922.
I puntigli domestici (produced 1752). 1754.
I mercatanti (produced 1752). 1754.

- Le donne curiose* (produced 1753). 1753; edited by Ettore Allodoli, 1960, and by Gastone Geron, 1988.
- La locandiera* (produced 1753). 1753; edited by Gian Piero Brunetta, 1967; as La locandiera (The Mistress of the Inn), translated by Merle Pierson, 1912; as Mistress of the Inn, translated by Helen Lohman, 1926, and by Anthony Intreglia, 1964; as Mine Hostess, in Four Comedies, 1922; also translated by Clifford Bax, in Three Comedies, 1961; as Mirandolina, translated by Frederick H. Davies, in Four Comedies, 1968; translated by Ranjit Bolt in The Venetian Twins; Mirandolina: Two Plays, 1993.
- Il contrattempo; o, Il chiaccherione imprudente* (produced 1753). 1754.
- La donna vendicativa* (produced 1753). 1754.
- Il geloso avaro* (produced 1753). 1757.
- La donna di testa debole* (produced 1753). 1757.
- La sposa persiana* (produced 1753). 1757.
- L'impostore* (produced 1754). 1754.
- La cameriera brillante* (produced 1754). 1757.
- Il filosofo inglese* (produced 1754). 1757.
- Il vecchio bizzarro* (produced 1754). 1757.
- Il festino* (produced 1754). 1757.
- La peruviana* (produced 1754). 1757.
- La madre amorosa* (produced 1754). 1757.
- Terenzio* (produced 1754). 1758.
- I malcontenti* (produced 1755). 1755.
- Torquato Tasso* (produced 1755). 1757.
- Le massere* (produced 1755). 1758.
- Il cavaliere giocondo* (produced 1755). 1758.
- Le donne di casa soa* (produced 1755). 1758; edited by Gastone Geron, 1988.
- Ircana in Julfa* (produced 1755). 1758.
- La buona famiglia* (produced 1755). 1758; edited by Polissenno Fegejo, 1942.
- La villeggiatura* (produced 1755). 1758; edited by Manlio Dazzi, 1954; as Carlo Goldoni's Villeggiatura: A Trilogy Condensed, translated by Robert Cornthwaite, 1994.
- Il campiello* (produced 1756). 1758; edited by Luigi Lunari, 1975, and by Guido Davico Bonino, 1986; as Il Campiello, translated by Susanna Graham-Jones and Bill Bryden, 1976.
- Il raggiratore* (produced 1756). 1758.
- Il medico olandese* (produced 1756). 1760.
- Ircana in Ispahan* (produced 1756). 1760.
- La dalmatina* (produced 1756). 1763.
- La donna stravagante* (produced 1756). 1760.
- L'avarò* (produced 1756). 1762; edited by Antonio Marenduzzo, 1946.
- Il buon compatriotto* (produced 1756). 1790.
- La donna sola* (produced 1757).
- L'amante di se medesimo* (produced 1757). 1760.
- La vedova spiritosa* (verse version produced 1757; prose version 1758). Prose version published 1759; verse version 1761.
- Il padre per amore* (produced 1757). 1763.
- Un curioso accidente* (produced 1757). 1768; as A Curious Mishap, translated by Helen Zimmern, in Comedies, 1892; also translated by Charles Lloyd, in Three Comedies, 1907; translated and adapted by Richard D.T. Hollister, 1924.
- Il cavaliere di spirito* (produced 1757). 1764.
- L'impresario delle Smirne* (produced 1757). 1774; as The Impresario from Smyrna, translated by Clifford Bax, in Four Comedies, 1922.
- La bella selvaggia* (produced 1758). 1761.
- Il ricco insidiato* (produced 1758). 1761.
- La donna di governo* (produced 1758). 1761.
- La sposa sagace* (produced 1758). 1761.
- Lo spirito di contraddizione* (produced 1758). 1761.
- Le morbinose* (produced 1758). 1761.
- La donna bizzarra* (produced 1758). 1760.
- L'apatista; o, Sia l'indifferente* (produced 1758). 1760.
- Pamela maritata* (produced 1759). 1761.
- Gl'innamorati* (produced 1759). 1761; edited by Andrea Sanguuolo, 1965, and by Guido Davico Bonino, 1986.
- La scuola di ballo* (produced 1759). 1792.
- Artemisia* (produced 1759). 1793.
- La buona madre* (produced 1759). 1764.
- Le donne di buonumore* (produced 1759). 1789.
- La donna capricciosa*. 1760.
- I rusteghi* (produced 1760). 1761; edited by Guido Davico Bonino, 1970; as The Boors, translated by I.M. Rawson, in Three Comedies, 1961.
- La guerra* (produced 1760). 1764; edited by Franco Fido, with Il quartiere fortunato, 1988.
- Eneo nel Lazi* (produced 1760). 1793.
- Zoroaster* (produced 1760), 1793.
- La donna forte*. 1761.
- Le smanie della villeggiatura* (produced 1761). 1768; edited by E. Maddalena, 1963, by Gastone Geron, 1984, and by Nicola Mangini and Nella Pavese, 1988.
- Le avventure della villeggiatura* (produced 1761). 1768; edited by Giorgio Strehler, Luigi Lunari, and Carlo Pedretti, 1982, by Gastone Geron, 1984, and by Nicola Mangini and Nella Pavese, 1988.
- Il ritorno dalla villeggiatura* (produced 1761). 1768; edited by Giorgio Strehler, Luigi Lunari, and Carlo Pedretti, 1982.
- La casa nova* (produced 1761). 1768; edited by Antonia Veronese Arslan, 1969; as The Superior Residence, translated by Frederick H. Davies, in Four Comedies, 1968.
- Sior Todero Brontolon* (produced 1761). 1774.
- La scozzese* (produced 1761). 1774.
- La bella Giorgiana* (produced 1761). 1792.
- Le baruffe chiozzote* (produced 1762). 1774; edited by Carlo Pedretti, 1978; as The Squabbles of Chioggia, translated by Charles W. Lemmi, in The Drama, 15, 1914; as It Happened in Venice, translated and adapted by Frederick H. Davies, 1965.
- Una della ultime sere di carnevale* (produced 1762). 1777.
- L'osteria della posta* (produced 1762). Edited by Antonio Marenduzzo, 1935; as The Post-Inn, translated by W.H.H. Chambers, in The Drama 5, edited by A. Bates, 1902.
- L'amor paterno; o, La serva riconoscente* (produced 1763).
- Il matrimonio per concorso* (produced 1763). 1778.
- Il ventaglio* (produced 1763). 1789; edited by Luigi Squarzina, 1979, and by Carlo Pedretti, 1980; as The Fan, translated by Helen Zimmern, in Comedies, 1892; also translated by Charles Lloyd, in Three Comedies, 1907; Kenneth McKenzie, 1911; E. and H. Farjeon, in Four Comedies, 1922, and in Three Comedies, 1961; Henry B. Fuller, 1925; translated and adapted by Frederick H. Davies, 1968.
- Il ritratto d'Arlecchino* (produced 1764). 1777.
- Chi la fa l'aspetta* (produced 1765). 1789.

Le Bourru bienfaisant (produced 1771). Edited by Gerolamo Bottoni; as The Times, 1780; as The Beneficent Bear, translated by Helen Zimmern, in Comedies, 1892; also translated by Charles Lloyd, in Three Comedies, 1907; Barrett H. Clark, 1915; as Il burboro benefico, translated 1964.

Il filosofo di campagna; as The Wedding Ring. 1773.

L'Avare fastueux (produced 1776). 1789; as The Spendthrift Miser, translated by Helen Zimmern, in Comedies, 1892.

L'amore artigiano, music by Florian Gassman, translated as L'amore artigiano. 1778.

I metempsicosi, 1793.

Gli amori di Alessandro Magno. 1793.

The Comedies (includes The Beneficent Bear; A Curious Mishap; The Fan; The Spendthrift Miser), edited and translated by Helen Zimmern. 1892.

Three Comedies (includes The Fan; An Odd Misunderstanding; The Beneficent Bear), translated by Charles Lloyd. 1907.

Four Comedies (includes Mine Hostess; The Impresario from Smyrna; The Good Girl; The Fan), translated by Clifford Bax, M. Tracy, and H. and E. Farjeon. 1922.

Three Comedies (includes Mine Hostess; The Boors; The Fan), translated by Clifford Bax, I.M. Rawson, and H. and E. Farjeon. 1961.

Four Comedies (includes The Venetian Twins; The Artful Widow; Mirandolina; The Superior Residence), translated by Frederick H. Davies. 1968.

Commedie, edited by Kurt Ringger. 1972.

Il quartiere fortunato, with La guerra, edited by Franco Fido. 1988.

Other

Mémoires, pour servir à l'histoire de sa vie, et à celle de son théâtre. 3 vols., 1787; as Memoirs, translated by John Black, 2 vols., 1814.

On Play-Writing, edited by F.C.L. van Steenderen. 1919.

Il teatro comico; Memorie italiane, edited by Guido Davico Bonino. 1983.

*

Bibliography: Saggio di una bibliografia delle opere intorno a Carlo Goldoni (1793–1907) by A. Della Torre, 1908; Bibliografia goldoniana 1908–1957, 1961, and Bibliografia goldoniana 1958–1967, 1961, both by Nicola Mangini, supplemented in the journal Studi goldoniani, 1968–79.

Critical Studies: Goldoni: A Biography by H.C. Chatfield-Taylor, 1913; Goldoni and the Venice of His Time by Joseph Spencer Kennard, 1920; Carlo Goldoni, Librettist: The Early Years by P.E. Weiss, 1970; Goldoni by Heinz Riedt, 1974; A Servant of Many Masters: The Life and Times of Carlo Goldoni by Timothy Holme, 1976; Language and Dialect in Ruzzante and Goldoni by Linda L. Carroll, 1981; Goldoni as Librettist: Theatrical Reform and the drammi giocosi per musica by Ted Emery, 1991; Goldoni and the Musical Theatre, edited by Domenico Pietropaolo, 1995; Carlo Goldoni and Eighteenth-century Theatre, edited by Joseph Farrell, 1997.

* * *

Carlo Goldoni's career as a dramatist can be plotted easily in terms of his relationship to the historical development of drama in Italy, and, in fact, he is usually presented in such terms. In the first half of the 18th century, Italian comedy was essentially that of the commedia dell'arte (as opposed to the erudite comedy based on classical models). The plays were not written out, but a scenario was prepared around which the players improvised. All the characters were conventional, and in Venice four of the players still wore the commedia dell'arte masks: a miserly old man (Pantalone); a pretentious old man called the Doctor, usually learned and absurd; and two "zany" servants, one lively and simple (Arlecchino), one clever and roguish (Brighella). The masks themselves instantly revealed to the audience the players' characters; other characters—various servants, banal lovers—might be the basis of the simple plot, but the masked characters were the leading players. The "creative" element of each play was centred on the ingenuity of the stage business and the verbal dexterity of the permanent company members. Many of these practices are shown in Goldoni's play Il teatro comico (The Comic Theatre).

Goldoni, a youthful enthusiast for the theatre, slid into this theatrical world almost by accident, if his Memoirs are to be believed. After an early involvement with a touring company, he became a lawyer, married, and set up a law practice in Pisa. A play he had earlier written out in complete form became a success in Venice, and he was approached by the "Pantalone" character of the Medebach company to write some more plays for them. Goldoni agreed, but insisted on a written text, gradually ensuring that natural speech replaced the exaggerated and obscene dialogue used formerly, and, most revolutionary of all, he insisted that the masks be abandoned. The success of one of his first plays, I due gemelli veneziani (The Venetian Twins), lay in having a leading actor play both twin brothers—one a clever romantic hero, the other a simple country boy—so that the mask would have become a liability rather than an aid.

His "new" plays proved so successful that he was gradually able to bring about these changes in the next 15 years of playwriting in Venice. His interest in these "reforms" is clear only from the prefaces he wrote for editions of his plays: he never formalized his ideas in theoretical works.

That his plays did not represent a complete break with the past is obvious from the way in which many of his leading characters are based on the conventional commedia dell'arte characters: Pantalone usually reappears in the guise of a hard-up nobleman, always on the look-out for a free meal or a present—for instance, the Count in both La locandiera (The Mistress of the Inn) and Il ventaglio (The Fan); the Doctor is also often placed among the aristocracy, as a pretentious or "literary" man; comic servants are still well-employed, since the plots spring from mistaken identity or trivial misunderstandings—but such a character as Fabrizio, the servant of Mirandolina in The Mistress of the Inn, is complex, with doubts concerning his position and a past that acts on his character; and other servants or working-class characters are often full of individuality as well as zest.

The most interesting transformation in his characterizations—those in his romantic heroines—leads to the other major point to be made about Goldoni: his amiability and good nature, based on a perception of the world that is missing from commedia dell'arte. The timid conventional heroine has become a sensible and intelligent young woman, if not well educated, at least aware of her own dignity and worth, and not averse to fighting for her right to choose her own mate. Many of the plays have such a woman: usually she is concerned in overturning the prejudices of the male relative who is in charge of arranging her marriage (often to a fool or fortune-hunter). The most advanced example of this character type is Mirandolina, who has no guardian to protect (or dictate) to her, and whose heart is set on marriage with her servant and childhood friend, Fabrizio. Before her hopes are realized, however, she has to fend off the advances of the men who have fallen for her obvious charm and prospects (she runs an inn), and even to prove to herself that she is in charge of her own fate by wilfully making a misogynist staying at the inn fall in love with her. This plot would sound tragic if it were not so funny—no one is harmed by the intrigue; in fact, all the male characters learn something about themselves from the experience.

This interest in the naturalness of love and marriage, and in the natural relations of people in a social group, also led Goldoni often to centre his plays on a milieu—a shop or an inn, a small village, or a square in a city—where no single character emerges as an obvious hero or heroine, and where the good will and acceptance of the outcome seem to be the end in view; there is usually a liberated spokesman for the group—often a woman. Examples of this sort of play are Il campiello, I rusteghi (The Boors), Le baruffe chiozzote (The Squabbles of Chioggia), and The Fan. La casa nova (The Superior Residence), though involving only two families in an apartment house in Venice, and with a smaller cast, also promotes good nature, lack of pretensions, and the value of simple love.

Goldoni's plays are not deep, and his Memoirs reflect this lack of theoretical or intellectual interest, but his characters, like those of Marivaux, are human and often complex, and his plots are arranged to bring out this complexity rather than to submerge it in a conventional framework.

—George Walsh

See the essays on The Comic Theatre and The Mistress of the Inn.

GOLL, Ivan

Born: Isaac Lang in Saint Dié, Alsace, Germany, 29 March 1891. Moved to Switzerland in 1915 after the outbreak of hostilities. Education: Educated at Metz; studied jurisprudence at the University of Strasbourg, 1912–14; University of Lausanne, 1915–18. Family: Married Claire Studer. Career: Founder, Rhein Verlag, publishers, Zurich; lived in Paris, 1919–39, associated with Picasso, Chagall, Breton and Éluard; moved to New York, 1939; founding editor, Hémisphères, New York, 1943–46; diagnosed as suffering from leukaemia, 1944; returned to Paris, 1947. Died: 27 February 1950.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Dichtung, Lyrik, Prosa, Dramen, edited by Claire Goll. 1960. Oeuvres, edited by Claire Goll and François Xavier Jaujard. 2 vols., 1968–70.

Selected Poems, edited by Paul Zweig, translated by Zweig, Robert Bly, George Hitchcock, and Galway Kinnell. 1968.
Gedichte 1924–1950, edited by Horst Bienek. 1976.

Verse

- Der Panamakanal*. 1912.
Films. 1914.
Élégies Internationales. 1915.
Dithyramben. 1918.
Der Torso. 1918.
Der neue Orpheus. 1918; as Le Nouvel Orphée, translated by Goll, 1923.
Die Unterwelt. 1919.
Astral. 1920.
Paris brennt. 1920.
Der Eiffelturm: Gesammelte Dichtung. 1924.
Poèmes d'amour, with Claire Goll. 1925; as Love Poems, 1947.
Poèmes de jalousie, with Claire Goll. 1926.
Poèmes de la vie et de la mort, with Claire Goll. 1927.
Die siebente Rose. 1928.
Deux Chansons de la Seine. N.d.
Chansons malaises. 1934; as Songs of a Malay Girl, translated by Clark Mills, 1942; as Malaiische Liebeslieder (bilingual edition), translated by Goll, 1967.
Métro de la mort. 1936.
La Chanson de Jean sans Terre. 1936; revised edition, 1957; edited by Francis J. Carmody, 1962; as John sans Terre: Landless John, translated by Lionel Abel, William Carlos Williams, and others, 1944.
Le mythe de la roche percée. 1945; as "The Myth of the Pierced Rock," translated by Louise Bogan, in Four Poems of the Occult, edited by Francis J. Carmody, 1962.
Atom Elegy. 1946.
Fruit from Saturn. 1946.
Élégie d'Ihpétonga suivie de Masques de cendre. 1949; as Elegy of Ihpétonga and Masks of Ashes, translated by Babette Deutsch, Louise Bogan, and Claire Goll, 1954.
Le Char triomphal de l'antimoine. 1949.
Les géorgiques parisiennes. 1951.
Dix Mille Aubes, with Claire Goll. 1951.
Les Cerdes magiques. 1951; as "The Magic Circles," translated by Claire Goll and Eric Sellin, in Four Poems of the Occult, edited by Francis J. Carmody, 1962.
Traumkraut, edited by Claire Goll. 1951.
Zehntausend Morgenröten, with Claire Goll. 1954.
Abendgesang (Neila); letzte Gedichte, edited by Claire Goll. 1954.
Multiple femme, edited by Claire Goll. 1956; as Multiple Woman, translated by Francis J. Carmody, in Four Poems of the Occult, edited by Carmody, 1962.
Der Mythos vom durchbrochenen Felsen. 1956.
Neue Blümlein des heiligen Franziskus, with Claire Goll. 1957.
Duo d'Amour: Poèmes d'amour 1920–1950, with Claire Goll. 1959.
Four Poems of the Occult, edited by Francis J. Carmody. 1962.
L'Antirose, with Claire Goll. 1965; as Die Antirose, 1967.
Gedichte, edited by René A. Strasser. 1968.
Élégie de Lackawanna. 1973; as Lackawanna Elegy (bilingual edition), translated by Galway Kinnell, 1970.

Fiction

- Le Microbe de l'or*. 1927.
Die Eurokokke. 1927.
Der Goldbazillus. 1927.
Der Mitropäer. 1928.
À bas l'Europe. 1928.
Agnus Dei. 1929.
Sodome et Berlin. 1929.
Lucifer vieillissant. 1934.
Nouvelles Petites Fleurs de Saint François d'Assise, with Claire Goll. 1958.

Plays

- Die Unsterblichen: zwei Possen* (includes Der Unsterbliche and Der Ungestorbene). 1920; as The Immortal One, translated by Walter H. and Jacqueline Sokel, in An Anthology of German Expressionist Drama, edited by Walter H. Sokel, 1963.
Die Chapliniade. 1920.
Melusine (produced 1956). 1922.
Mathusalem; oder, Der ewige Bürger (produced 1927). 1922; translated by Arthur S. Wensinger and Clinton J. Atkinson, in Plays for a New Theatre, 1966; also translated by J.M. Ritchie, in Seven Expressionist Plays, 1968.
Assurance contre le suicide (produced 1926). 1923.
Der neue Orpheus, music by Kurt Weill (produced 1928). 1923.
Der Stall des Agias. 1924.
Royal Palace (opera libretto), music by Kurt Weill. 1926.
Théâtre. Mathusalem. Les Immortels. 1963.

Other

- Requiem pour les morts de L'Europe*. 1916.
Requiem für die Gefallenen von Europa. 1917.
Die drei guten Geister Frankreichs (essays). 1919.
Oberrealismus, Vorwort zu Methusalem. 1922.
Germaine Berton. 1925.
Pascin (essays). 1929.
Iwan Goll, Claire Goll: Briefe. 1966.
Selected Correspondence, edited by Barbara Glauert. 1978.
 Editor, with Claire Goll, Dos Herz Frankreichs, eine Anthologie französischer Freiheitslyrik. 1920.
 Editor and translator, Das Lächeln. Voltaire: Ein Buch in Diese Zeit. 1921.
 Editor and translator, Les Cinq Continents: Anthologie de poésie contemporaine. 1922.
 Translator, with Gustav Laudauer, Der Wundarzt: Briefe Aufzeichnungen und Gedichte aus dem amerikanischen Sezessionskrieg, by Walt Whitman. 1919.
 Translator, Der Schimmer im abgrund: Ein Manifest an alle Denkenden, by Henri Barbusse. 1920.
 Translator, Die Goldsucher von Wien: Ein Bergebenheit unter Schriebern, by Pierre Hamp. 1922.
 Translator, Der Aussätzige und die Heilige, by François Mauriac. 1928.
 Translator, Schwarz und Weiss, die Wahrheit über Afrika, by Albert Londres. 1929.
 Translator, César, by Mirko Jelusich. 1937.
 Translator, Le Chant de Bernadette, by Franz Werfel, 1942.

*

Critical Studies:: The Poetry of Ivan Goll by F.J. Carmody, 1956; Ivan Goll: Quatre études par Jules Romains, Marcel Brion, Francis Carmody, Richard Exner, 1956; Yvan Goll: An Iconographical Study of His Poetry by Vivien Perkins, 1970; Interpretations of Ivan Goll's Late Poetry by Vera B. Profit, 1977; Ivan Goll: The Development of His Poetic Themes and Their Imagery by Margaret A. Parmée, 1981; Yvan Goll and Bilingual Poetry by James Phillips, 1984; Ivan Goll—Claire Goll: Texts and Contexts, edited by Eric Robertson and Robert Vilain, 1997.

* * *

Ivan Goll is remembered today chiefly for his cycles of poems, though he expresses himself in many different forms: essays, plays, novels, and the avant-garde film. His writing was in many ways an attempt to come to terms with his peculiarly uneasy position in Europe in the first half of the 20th century. He described himself as being “by fate a Jew, by chance a Frenchman, by virtue of a piece of paper a German.” It has been felt by some that his poetry belongs more firmly to German literary history than to that of France, yet he found it impossible to align himself wholeheartedly with any one aspect of this tripartite division and, like his Alsatian compatriot, Hans Arp, expressed himself with equal felicity in French and German. (Later, during his American exile, he also wrote poems in English.)

Goll's first published poem of note was Der Panamakanal [The Panama Canal] of 1912, a work that reveals clearly his affinities with the new movement of Expressionism. The poem, which seems at first to be a Romantic lament for a natural world destroyed by civilization, ends on a positive note, evoking universal love and the brotherhood of mankind. This is in keeping with the spirit of his requiem for the dead of Europe in World War I and indicates his commitment to the branch of Expressionism more dedicated to building the future than revelling in the decline of a passing world. However, a later version of “Der Panamakanal” in 1918 ends with the belief that man's lot does not, after all, improve, and points forward to the pessimistic tone of much of the later poetry.

In his essays, such as Die drei guten Geister Frankreichs [The Three Good Spirits of France], Goll attempted to foster a better understanding between the peoples of France and Germany, but he himself was attracted more to France by the greater liveliness of the artistic scene. Here his Expressionist style began to develop towards Surrealism, manifested first in drama and film scenarios, such as Die Chapliniade [The Chaplinade] and Mathusalem (Methusalem). These works blend fantasy, reality, and the absurd in a way that recalls the work of German Expressionist dramatists, continuing and extending their desire to arouse audience response by means of shock effects. They are evidence of the autobiographical nature of much of Goll's writing, but also of his tendency to appear in the guise of a persona rather than in the first person. By this means he endows his figures with more general validity; the problems he explores are in some senses peculiarly his own, yet the character of Charlot in Die Chapliniade is an evocative portrayal of a well-known clown image, whose melancholy is concealed by his fixed smile.

The cyclical poem that Goll regarded as his major work, La Chanson de Jean sans Terre (Landless John), is the most significant example of such autobiographical writing. If one imagines the character of John replaced by “I,” claims Jules Romains in Yvan Goll (1956), one will notice a surprising change of colour and persuasive force. The central figure, who wanders the earth through 69 poems, belongs everywhere and nowhere. He seeks love and identity and yet the absence of these things also bestows a form of freedom. His searching and his problems are not ended by the end of the cycle. The final verse of the poem gives Goll's own definition of John:

Landless John walks the roads leading nowhere
 He walks to escape his shadow which binds him to the soil
 He wants to possess nothing on this earth. Will he —By singing—get free of his shadow, his other I?

(translated by Galway Kinnell)

It would be a mistake to regard Landless John as simply a version of the Wandering Jew. The work follows on from the novels of the 1920s, such as À bas l'Europe [Down with Europe], which are concerned with the economic and moral decline of the age. John too inhabits the modern, materialistic world and Goll describes him as a contemporary individual, battling against internal and external forces.

The uncertainty of love is a theme of poems written both before and after Landless John. Goll composed the cycle Poèmes d'amour (Love Poems) together with his wife Claire, also a poet of note, who translated much of his work. They reflect in a pure and limpid style the poets' love, their need of each other, but also jealousy, fear of betrayal, and a clash of temperaments. Love also runs as a constant thread through the last work, Traumkraut [Grasses of Dreams]. On his deathbed the poet reverted to the language of his earliest writings and was able to say that only now had he truly learned to master his craft. It was for this reason that he asked Claire Goll, as she tells us in her preface, to destroy all his previous work. As the title implies, the poems are concerned with nature, but often nature seen in a surreal context: the images spring from spiritual rather than physical experience.

Because of the change of style (but more especially of language) that took place in Goll's writing when he settled in France, he is often regarded in Germany first and foremost as an Expressionist and in France as a Surrealist. Yet his plays and poems show clearly the way in which his Surrealism grew out of his Expressionism. He made a conscious break with the latter in 1921, aware that it was nearing its end, but the break was a gradual one and there are many echoes of the earlier movement in his later work. The many distinguished artists who have illustrated his work are also representative of both groups; they include Hans Arp, Salvador Dalí, George Grosz, Fernand Léger and above all Marc Chagall. Like them, Goll was in the mainstream of the artistic movements of his time.

—Margaret K. Register

GOMBROWICZ, Witold

Born: Maloszyce, Poland, 4 August 1904. Education: Educated privately; St. Stanislas Kostka (Catholic high school), 1916–22; Warsaw University, 1922–26, law degree 1926; Institut des Hautes Études Internationales, Paris, 1926–27. Family: Married Marie-Rita Labrosse in 1968. Career: Part-time law clerk, Warsaw, 1928–34; reviewer for several Warsaw newspapers, 1935; travelled to Argentina and cut off from Poland because of war, 1939; reviewer (under pseudonym) for newspapers in Buenos Aires from 1940; secretary for the Polish Bank, Buenos Aires, 1947–55; left Argentina, 1963; Ford Foundation fellow, Berlin, 1963–64; lived in Vence, France, 1964–69. Awards: Kultura prize (Paris), 1961; International literary prize, 1967. Died: 25 July 1969.

PUBLICATIONS

Collection

Dziela zebrane [Collected Works]. 11 vols., 1969–77.

Fiction

Pamiętnik z okresu dojrzewania [Memoirs from Adolescence]. 1933. Ferdydurke. 1937; as Ferdydurke, translated by Eric Mosbacher, 1961; also translated by Danuta Borchart, 2000.

Trans-Atlantyck, with Ślub. 1953; as Trans-Atlantyck, translated by Carolyn French and Nina Karsov, 1994.

Bakakaj (selections). 1957.

Pornografia. 1960; as Pornografia, translated by Alastair Hamilton, 1966.

Kosmos. 1965; as Cosmos, translated by Eric Mosbacher, 1966.

Opętani. 1973; as Possessed; or, The Secret of Myslotch, translated (from French) by J.A. Underwood, 1980.

Zdarzenia na brygu Banbury. 1982.

Plays

Iwona, Księżniczka Burgunda (produced 1957). In Skamander, 1935; as Princess Ivona, translated by Krystyna Griffith-Jones and Catherine Robins, 1969.

Ślub (produced 1964). With Trans-Atlantyck, 1953; as The Marriage, translated by Louis Iribarne, 1970.

Operetka (produced 1969). 1966; as Operetta, translated by Louis Iribarne, 1971.

Historia [History] (unfinished). 1975.

Other

Dziennik 1953–1956. 3 vols., 1957–66; as Diary, edited by Jan Kott, translated by Lillian Vallee, 3 vols., 1988–93.

Entretiens avec Gombrowicz, edited by Dominique de Roux. 1968; as A Kind of Testament, translated by Alastair Hamilton, 1973.

Wspomnienia polskie [Polish Reminiscences]. 1977.

Listy 1950–1969 [Letters], with Jerzy Giedroyc, edited by Andrzej Kowalczyk. 1993.

Correspondance, with Jean Dubuffet. 1995.

Philosophy in Six Lessons and a Quarter, edited with preface by Simona Draghici. 1999.

*

Critical Studies: Gombrowicz (in French) by Constantin Jeleński and Dominique de Roux, 1971; Gombrowicz: Bourreau-martyr by Jacques Volle, 1972; Gombrowicz (in French) by Rosine Georgin, 1977; Gombrowicz by Ewa M. Thompson, 1979; Gombrowicz and Frisch: Aspects of the Literary Diary by Alex Kurczaba, 1980; Gombrowicz, vingt ans après edited by Manuel Carcassone and others, 1989; Gombrowicz's Grimaces: Modernism, Gender, Nationality, edited by Ewa Plonowska Ziarek, 1998; Lines of Desire: Reading Gombrowicz's Fiction with Lacan by Hanjo Berressem, 1998.

* * *

Witold Gombrowicz is one of the most original Polish writers of the 20th century. His first book Pamiętnik z okresu dojrzewania [Memoirs from Adolescence], a collection of grotesque short stories, already established his obsessive themes which he was to pursue in later years. These can be described as a desire for sexual domination and/or submission, and the manipulation (sexual and intellectual) of others. In Ferdydurke, his most striking novel, all these themes are woven into the plot which follows the adventures of Joey, a 30-year-old man forced back into the immaturity of adolescence by a determined schoolteacher. Ferdydurke is a parody of traditional Polish and fashionable Western values which are displayed and then effectively discredited in three different domains of life: at school, in the “progressive” household of an engineer, and in the old-fashioned manor-house. The conclusion of this very entertaining novel is that however much we may try to break out of the prison of Form, there is no escape from play-acting.

In 1939 Gombrowicz visited Argentina and after the outbreak of World War II decided to stay there, so it was this country that became the backdrop to his next novel Trans-Atlantyk. It depicts a conflict between the old and new generation of Polish emigrés in Argentina, the author acting as a narrator/chronicler of a fairly trivial quarrel which he tells with the panache of Polish memoirs from the Baroque period. What Gombrowicz really questions in this novel is the relevance of the Polish national myth. He continues to investigate this and other controversial issues in the three volumes of his Dziennik (Diary) which has been called an “autobiographical novel” as well as a running commentary on the philosophical, cultural, and political problems of the day. Gombrowicz’s Diary exhibits the same sharp wit and far-reaching scepticism to traditional values as his novels, but it also lays bare the author’s obsessions, complexes, and narcissistic tendencies. These reappear in a less striking form in the novels Pornografia and Kosmos (Cosmos), which are both essays on the possibilities and limits of psychological manipulation—of the young by the old, and of the normal by the obsessed.

Gombrowicz was also a playwright; indeed, his first international successes were due to the production of his plays in Paris and in Germany in the 1960s. There are altogether four plays by Gombrowicz, one of which, the amusing but perhaps too ambitious Historia [History], was left unfinished. The earliest play, Iwona, Księżniczka Burgunda (Princess Ivona), is a “tragifarce.” It takes place in a mythical kingdom where the young heir to the throne plans but eventually fails to marry the singularly ugly and unpleasant girl whom he chose in a moment of malicious whim. Ivona acts as a catalyst of suppressed guilt for everyone, so in the end she has to be eliminated in the name of state interests. There are, pseudo-Shakespearean undertones in the excellent Ślub (The Marriage), which, on one level, is the story of human beings shaping each other through words, gestures, and acts of homage or defiance, while on another level it is the tragedy of overstrained human will. The sacralization of certain symbols can force society into their temporary acceptance, but not even the most charismatic figure can “give himself” a wedding which would restore the lost innocence of a fallen bride. Operetka (Operetta) is a bizarre tragi-comedy which through the parody of this “idiotic art form” manages to convey a philosophical message. Although its starting-point is the striving of an overformalized society towards “nakedness” (i.e. freedom), anarchy and totalitarianism are alternative “forms” also to be experienced. While Gombrowicz’s savage parody of the past hundred years of European history, brings the play very close to the theatre of the absurd, it nevertheless ends on an optimistic note, hailing “nudity eternally youthful” and “youth eternally nude,” that expresses faith in the mysterious self-regenerating forces of mankind.

—George Gömöri

See the essay on Ferdydurke.

GONCHAROV, Ivan (Aleksandrovich)

Born: Simbirsk, Russia, 18 June 1812. Education: Educated at local boarding school, 1820–22; Moscow Commercial School, 1822–31; University of Moscow, 1831–34. Military Service: Civil servant in St. Petersburg from 1834: secretary to Admiral Pitiatin on trip to Far East, 1852–55; Career: Official censor, St. Petersburg, 1856–60, and member of the committee of review of Russian censorship groups, 1863–67; retired from civil service as Actual Councillor of State, 1867. Died: 27 September 1891.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

- Povesti i ocherki* [Stories and Essays], edited by B.M. Engelgardt. 1937.
Sobranie sochinenii [Collected Works], edited by A.P. Rybasov. 8 vols., 1952–55.
Sobranie sochinenii [Collected Works], edited by S.I. Mashinskii. 8 vols., 1977–80.
Izbrannye sochineniia [Selected Works], edited by G.I. Belen’kii. 1990.

Fiction

- Obyknovennaia istoriia*. 1848; as A Common Story, translated by Constance Garnett, 1894; as The Same Old Story, translated by Ivy Litvinova, 1956; as An Ordinary Story, with Viktor Rozov, edited and translated by Marjorie L. Hoover, 1993.
Oblomov. 1859; as Oblomov, translated by C.J. Hogarth, 1915; also translated by Natalie Duddington, 1929; David Magarshack, 1954; Ann Dunnigan, 1963.
Obryv. 1870; as The Precipice, translated by M. Bryant, 1915; translated by Laury Magnus and Boris Jakim, 1993.

Other

- Russkie v Iaponii v kontse 1853 i v nachale 1854 godov* [Russians in Japan in the End of 1853 and the Beginning of 1854]. 1855; revised edition, as Fregat Pallada, 1858; edited by D.V. Oznobishin, 1986; as The Frigate Pallas: Notes on a Journey, translated by N.W. Wilson, 1965.
Literaturno-kriticheskie stat’i i pis’ma [Literary Critical Articles and Letters], edited by A.P. Rybasova. 1938.
I.A. Goncharov-kritik (selection), edited by V.I. Korobov. 1981.
Ocherki. Stat’i. Pis’ma. Vospominaniia sovremennikov [Essays. Articles. Letters. Reminiscences of Contemporaries]. 1986.

*

Bibliography: Bibliografia Goncharova 1832–1964 by A.D. Alekseev, 1968; Ivan Goncharov: A Bibliography edited by Garth M. Terry, 1986.

Critical Studies: Goncharov by Janko Lavrin, 1954; Goncharov by Alexandra and Sverre Lyngstad, 1971; Oblomov and His Creator: The Life and Art of Ivan Goncharov by Milton Ehre, 1973; Goncharov: His Life and His Works by V. Setchkarev, 1974; Oblomov: A Critical Examination of Goncharov's Novels by Richard Peace, 1991; The Autobiographical Novel of Co-consciousness: Goncharov, Woolf, and Joyce by Gayla Diment, 1994; Goncharov's Oblomov: A Critical Companion, edited by Gayla Diment, 1998.

* * *

Oblomov, Ivan Goncharov's best known novel, so dwarfs his other fiction that, in the West, at least, he tends to be known for this work alone. This is regrettable because, for all its uniqueness, it is still arguable that Oblomov achieves its fullest resonance against the background of its predecessor, Obyknovennaia istoriia (A Common Story), and its successor, Obryv (The Precipice).

All three novels are concerned with the confrontation between the rising pragmatism of the mid-19th century and the comparatively established norms of Romantic idealism. A Common Story explores the relationship between Aleksandr Aduiev, a young idealist dreaming of love and literary success and his uncle who has become reconciled to the uninspiring realities of the world. Somewhat too schematically, perhaps, Goncharov plots the course of Aduiev's disenchantment to its issue: assimilation to the uncle's viewpoint. In The Precipice the ineffective Raiskii, another idealist, vies with a nihilist for the heroine's hand. Although the nihilist manages to seduce her, both he and Raiskii are ultimately rejected in favour of Tushin, a solid, commonsensical neighbour of the heroine.

The triumph of the pragmatic outlook is also an essential feature of Oblomov. Stolz, the half-German friend of the eponymous hero, attempts to awaken the latter from his torpid inactivity, urging him to use his talents in the real world before it is too late. Encouraged by the practical Stolz and by the heroine, Olga, with whom he has an affair, Oblomov makes some progress in extricating himself from the mire before succumbing once more to the temptations of inertia. Oblomov dies of a stroke and Stolz marries the heroine. Oblomov's slothful attachment to his bed, his almost symbiotic relationship with his aged servant Zakhhar and his addiction to comfort are generally seen as satirized characteristics of the declining Russian landed gentry of the mid-19th century. Stolz embodies the entrepreneurial class that will oust the aristocracy unless it adapts.

However, the status of Oblomov as a world classic derives from the fact that Oblomov, like Hamlet (whose indecisiveness he shares) transcends his chronotopos to personify a universal human predicament. Oblomov is the passive romantic who instinctively resists every incursion from the real world of disturbing activity. This passivity is represented in the novel as something akin to sleep, and, like sleep, is solaced by dreaming.

"Oblomov's Dream," a pivotal section of the novel, was published separately in 1849. It offers an idyllic vision of the hero's rural childhood that has so fatefully shaped his later life. The dream is not just a representation of the past but an abiding subconscious reality that continues to exert a stultifying influence on Oblomov's will. Such is its fatally soothing power that, after his brief awakening by Olga and Stolz, Oblomov is unable to resist his landlady's adult reconstruction of the old childhood comforts.

The use of dream, both for subliminal analysis and as a means of representing contradictions inherent in the romantic outlook, makes Oblomov a profoundly psychological novel. It is Goncharov's achievement to have successfully grafted psychological portrayal on to the Gogolian stock of external characterization. To this extent Oblomov may be held to anticipate the great novels of Tolstoi and Dostoevskii and must be assigned a crucial role in the development of the Russian novel.

—Robert Reid

See the essay on Oblomov.

GONCOURT, Edmond (-Louis-Antoine Huot) de, and Jules (-Alfred) de

Edmond de Goncourt: Born: Nancy, France, 26 May 1822. Education: Educated at Pension Goubaux; Lycée Henri IV; Collège Bourbon; studied law, 1841. Career: Worked for the city finance department. Travelled through France and Algeria with his brother, sketching and noting impressions in their now famous diary, 1848–49; travelled to Switzerland, Belgium, and Normandy, 1850; contributed to the literary daily, Paris, and to Revue de Paris, 1852–53; travelled to Italy, 1855–56, and 1867; important collector and connoisseur of Japanese art. Bequeathed money to found the Académie Goncourt that awards the annual literary prize. Died: 16 July 1896. Jules de Goncourt: Born: Paris, France, 17 December 1830. Education: Educated at Lycée Condorcet and Collège Bourbon, Paris. Career: Travelled through France and Algeria with his brother, sketching and writing their now famous diary, 1848–49; travelled to Switzerland, Belgium and Normandy, 1850; contracted syphilis, 1850; contributed to the literary daily, Paris, and to Revue de Paris, 1852–53; co-founder, with his brother and their cousin, Pierre-Charles de Villedeuil, L'Éclair, 1850s; travelled to Italy, 1855–56, and 1867. Died: 20 June 1870.

PUBLICATIONS BY EDMOND AND JULES DE GONCOURT

Collections

Théâtre. 1879.

Bibliothèque des Goncourt. 1897.

Collection des Goncourt. 1897.

Fiction

En 18. . . 1851.

La Lorette. 1853.

Les Hommes de lettres. 1860; as Charles Demailly, 1896.

Soeur Philomène. 1861; as Sister Philomene, translated by Laura Ensor, 1890; also translated by Madeline Jay, 1989.

Germinie Lacerteux. 1865; as Germinie Lacerteux, translated anonymously, 1887; also translated by John Chestershire, 1897; Leonard Tancock, 1984; as Germinie, translated by Jonathan Griffith, 1955.

Renée Mauperin. 1864; as Renée Mauperin, translated by Alys Hallard, 1902; also translated by James Fitzmaurice-Kelly, 1904.
Manette Salomon. 1867.
Madame Gervaisais. 1869.
Quelques créatures de ce temps (stories). 1876.
Première amoureuse (stories). 1896.

Plays

La Nuit de la Saint-Sylvestre. 1852.
Henriette Maréchal (produced 1865). 1866.
La Patrie en danger. 1873.

Other

Salon de 1852 (criticism). 1852.
Mystères des théâtres, 1852. 1853.
Oeuvres complètes. 21 vols., 1854.
La Révolution dans les mœurs. 1854.
Histoire de la société française pendant la Révolution. 1854.
Histoire de la société française pendant le Directoire. 1855.
La Peinture à l'exposition de 1855. 1855.
Une voiture de masques. 1856; revised edition, 1990.
Les Actrices. 1856.
Sophie Arnould, d'après sa correspondance et ses mémoires inédits. 1857.
Portraits intimes du dix-huitième siècle. 2 vols., 1857–58.
Histoire de Marie-Antoinette. 1858; revised edition, 1859; revised, with letters, 1863; revised editions, 2 vols., 1873–74, 2 vols., 1880–82, 3 vols., 1881–82.
Les Saint-Aubin. 1859.
L'Art du dix-huitième siècle. 11 vols., 1859–75; complete edition, 1875; as French 18th-Century Painters, edited and translated by Robin Ironside, 1948.
Les Hommes de lettres. 1860.
Les Maîtresses de Louis XV. 2 vols., 1860; as The Confidantes of a King, translated by Ernest Dowson, 1907.
La Femme au dix-huitième siècle. 1862; as The Woman of the 18th-Century, translated by Jacques Le Clerq and Ralph Roeder, 1927.
Idées et sensations. 1866.
Les Vignettistes. 1868.
Deuxième mille. 1886.
Gavarni, l'homme et l'oeuvre. 1873.
La Du Barry. 1878; revised edition, 1880; as Madame du Barry, translated anonymously, 1914.
Madame de Pompadour. 1878; revised editions 1881, and 1888.
Journal des Goncourt: Mémoires de la vie littéraire. 9 vols., 1887–96; 9 vols., 1935–36; 22 vols., 1956–59; edited by Robert Ricatte, 4 vols., 1956; as The Journal of the Goncourts (selection), translated by Julius West, 1908; as Goncourt Journals 1851–70, edited and translated by Lewis Galantière, 1937; as Pages from the Goncourt Journal (selection), translated by Robert Baldick, 1962; as Paris Under Siege, 1870–71, edited and translated by George J. Becker, 1969.
Armande, illustrated by Marold, 1892; as Armande, translated by Alfred E. Haserick, 1894.
Pages retrouvées. 1886.
Edmond and Jules de Goncourt (correspondence and journal), edited and translated by M.A. Belloc and M. Shedlock. 2 vols., 1894.
L'Italie d'hier: Notes de voyages 1855–56. 1894.
Selections, edited by Arnold Cameron. 1898.

Paris and the Arts 1851–96, edited and translated by George J. Becker and Edith Philips. 1971
Lettres de jeunesse inédites, edited by Alain Nicolas. 1981.

PUBLICATIONS BY EDMOND GONCOURT

Fiction

La Fille Élisa. 1877; as Elisa: The Story of a Prostitute, translated by Margaret Crosland, 1959; as Woman of Paris, translated by Cedric Harrald, 1959.
Les Frères Zemganno. 1879; as The Zemganno Brothers, translated anonymously, 1886; also translated by Leonard Clark and Iris Allam, 1957.
La Faustin. 1882; as La Faustin: A Life Study, translated by John Stirling, 1882; as La Faustin, translated by G.F. Monkshood and Ernest Tristan, 1906.
Chérie. 1884.

Other

L'Amour au dix-huitième siècle. 1875; as Love in the 18th Century, 1905.
La Duchesse de Châteauroux et ses soeurs. 1879; revised edition, 1892.
La Maison d'un artiste. 2 vols., 1881; definitive edition, 2 vols., 1931.
Madame Saint-Huberty. 1882; definitive edition, 1925.
Lettres de Jules de Goncourt. 1885.
Préfaces et manifestes littéraires. 1888.
Mademoiselle Clairon. 1890.
L'Art japonais du XVIIIe siècle. 2 vols., 1891–96.
Outamaro, le peintre des maisons vertes. 1891.
A bas le progrès!. 1893.
Le Guimard. 1893.
L'Italie d'hier. 1894.
Hokousai. 1896.
Lettres. 1930.
Edmond de Goncourt et Henri Céard: correspondance inédite 1876–1896. 1965.
Gustave Flaubert-les Goncourt: Correspondance, edited and prefaced by Pierre-Jean Dufief. 1998.
Correspondance, with Alphonse Daudet, edited by Pierre Dufief with Anne-Simone Dufief. 1996.

*

Critical Studies:: Création romanesque chez les Goncourt by Robert Ricatte, 1953; The Goncourt Brothers by André Billy, translated by M. Shaw, 1960; The Goncourts by Robert Baldick, 1960; Réalisme et impressionnisme dans l'oeuvre des frères Goncourt by Enzo Caramaschi, 1971; The Goncourt Brothers by Richard B. Grant, 1972; Les frères Goncourt: Art et écriture, edited by Jean-Louis Cabanès, 1997.

* * *

Edmond and Jules de Goncourt form one of the most remarkable literary partnerships that has ever existed. Jules had the greater literary talent, but died in early middle age of syphilis. His brother continued to write after his death, but generally with less mastery and success than the joint works.

En 18. . ., the first of their novels, is a slight work, recounting its hero's disappointments in love. Les Hommes de lettres, later entitled Charles Demailly, is both a story of marital discord culminating in the husband's madness and also a roman à clef vehemently denouncing unprincipled literary journalism. Soeur Philomène (Sister Philomene), a far less episodic novel, is notable for its bleak evocation of a hospital environment. Renée Mauperin, describing the shallow conventional life of a wealthy middle-class family, is marred by legal and historical inaccuracies which deny it any claim to narrow "realism" in the sense in which that term is applied to Balzac's work. Renée, seeking to prevent her brother's marriage, involves him in a duel in which he is killed; grief-stricken, she falls into a lengthy decline (admirably described by the Goncourts) and dies. Germinie Lacerteux, modelled on the hidden life of the brothers' own maid, resembles Sister Philomene and Renée Mauperin in that it concerns degradation and death; it tells of the heroine's two secret love-affairs, the second more squalid than the first, and both unsuspected by her employer. Manette Salomon, a novel of artistic life, contrasts four types of artist and explores the (generally destructive) influence exerted by women upon artists' lives. Madame Gervaisais, a study in religious mania, shows the destructive influence of Catholicism upon the lives of the heroine and her young son. Each of these works, so different in their ambience and subject-matter, was considered by the Goncourt brothers to be a venture into a new field of human experience; each was a challenge. Each was carefully documented, as when the two brothers spent six weeks in Rome gathering material for Madame Gervaisais. Whether actively seeking out such researched material or else modelling Germinie on the secret life of their maid, they looked upon the subject matter of their novels as "history which might have taken place." But this documentary aspect of their work was as far as their "naturalism" went.

Their method of writing was unusual even by the standards of literary partnerships. So closely attuned were their ways of viewing and writing about the world that it is impossible to make precise attributions of particular passages; Edmond went so far as to write of their "twin mind." Jules, however, had a better ear for dialogue, where Edmond's gifts lay more in the direction of scene-setting and background detail. Nevertheless, each chapter of each novel was separately drafted out by both novelists, who (living under the same roof and working in adjacent rooms) would then meet to compare and conflate their two versions: thus, one novel was made out of the best elements of each. But both wrote to a storyline that had been mapped out initially in fine detail by the two brothers working in concert.

Like Musset, Edmond and Jules de Goncourt were men of essentially artistic temperament: artistic in their leanings towards the visual arts, in which they took a keen interest. They even evolved a literary style peculiarly adapted to their purposes. This was the écriture artiste, full of neologisms and the specialized vocabularies of medicine, art criticism, and other disciplines; its contorted syntax was meant to convey all the complexities and obscurities of contemporary life. Unjustly maligned by many critics, this écriture artiste was a sort of literary mannerism in which all too often the manner of saying a thing seemed to predominate over the thing said. The very tortuousness of the Goncourts' writing, febrile, hypersensitive, and so hard to translate, suggests inner torments: they claimed that the whole of their writing was based upon neurosis. Yet the sheer technical virtuosity of that writing must surely be deemed a literary quality in itself, and they strove to avoid preciosity at all times.

The brothers' interest in the visual arts also found expression in the sharp focus of individual scenes. While the prevalence of dialogue suggests their desire to emulate the theatre, they foreshadow cinematic techniques in the way in which they move into the very centre and heart of the action as each brief chapter opens. These chapters are sometimes so visually concentrated as to resemble tableaux. In their rapid juxtaposition of colourful details the Goncourt brothers achieve a sort of impressionism, though Gautier's influence upon them is also evident—not only in their literary practice but also (to a lesser extent) in their theory of the fine arts.

The Journal des Goncourt (Goncourt Journals), kept by the two brothers from 1851 until Jules's death and afterwards by Edmond alone, is a store of information about such writers as Flaubert, Gautier, Zola, Daudet, Hugo, and Turgenev and about marginal historical figures such as Princess Mathilde Bonaparte. The very reverse of a confessional diary, it is crammed with anecdotes and has the deft touch of the gossip column, of which it is a main forerunner. A vivid impression is given of Paris at the time of the Franco-Prussian War and the Commune. That part of the Journal for which Edmond was solely responsible (from March 1870 until July 1896) outshines even the joint diary; however, the four novels written by him alone—even La Fille Élisa (Woman of Paris) and Les Frères Zemganno (The Zemganno Brothers)—are but pale reflections of the brilliance of the joint novels.

Together with Zola, the Goncourt brothers are generally considered to be the founders of the French school of Naturalism. Earlier than Zola, they described sordid—sometimes pathological—subject matter, but always in brilliant painterly terms. They did much to pioneer novels of working-class life. They took great care to see, seek, verify, and investigate the facts, by which they generally meant the physical settings. The term "naturalist" was not, however, a distinction they ever claimed for themselves. In Zola's own words, "the analysis of things artistic, plastic, and neurotic" was the heart of their achievement.

—Donald Adamson

GÓNGORA (Y ARGOTE), Luis de

Born: Córdoba, Spain, 11 July 1561. Education: Educated at Jesuit school in Córdoba; University of Salamanca, 1576–80, no degree. Career: Took minor orders at university, and deacon's orders, 1586; prebendary of Córdoba Cathedral, 1586–1617; undertook various business trips for the Cathedral; ordained priest, 1617, and royal chaplain in Madrid, 1617–25. Died: 23 May 1627.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

- Obras en verso del Homero español*, edited by Juan López de Vicuña. 1627; also edited by Dàmaso Alonso, 1963.
Todas las obras, edited by Gonzalo de Hozes y Córdoba. 1633.
Obras completas, edited by Juan and Isabel Millé y Giménez. 1972.
Luis de Góngora: Selected Shorter Poems, translated by Michael Smith. 1995
Obras completas, edited with prologue by Antonio Carreira. 2000.

Verse

Soledades, edited by Dámaso Alonso. 1927, revised edition, 1956; also edited by Alfonso Gallejo and María Teresa Pajares, with Fábula de Polifemo y Galatea, 1985; as The Solitudes, translated by Edward M. Wilson, 1931; translated by Gilbert F. Cunningham, 1968; also translated by Philip Polack, 1997.

Fábula de Polifemo y Galatea, as Góngora y el "Potifemo," edited by Dámaso Alonso. 1960, revised edition, 2 vols., 1961; also edited by Alfonso Gallejo and María Teresa Pajares, with Las Soledades, 1985; as Polyphemus and Galatea, translated by Gilbert F. Cunningham, 1977; as The Fable of Polyphemus and Galatea, translated by Miroslav John Hanak, 1988.

Romance de "Angélica y Medoro," edited by Dámaso Alonso. 1962. Sonetos completos, edited by Biruté Ciplijauskaitė. 1969.

Romances (selection), edited by José María de Cossío. 1980.

Las firmezas de Isabela, edited by Robert Jammes. 1984.

Fábula de Píramo y Tisbe, edited by David Garrison. 1985.

Cuadernos de varias poesías, manuscrito patentino, edited by Lorenzo Rubio González. 1985.

*

Critical Studies: The Metaphors of Góngora by E.J. Gates, 1933; Góngora by D.W. and V.R. Foster, 1973; Góngora: Polyphemus and Galatea: A Study in the Interpretation of a Baroque Poem (includes text and translation by Gilbert F. Cunningham) by Alexander A. Parker, 1977; The Poet and the Natural World in the Age of Góngora by M.J. Woods, 1978; Aspects of Góngora's "Soledades" by John R. Beverley, 1980; The Sonnets of Luis de Góngora by R.P. Calcraft, 1980; Góngora's Poetic Textual Tradition: An Analysis of Selected Variants, Versions, and Imitations of His Shorter Poems by Diane Chaffee-Sorace, 1988; Poetry as Play: "Gongorismo" and the "Comedia" by Maria Cristina Quintero, 1991; Silva gongorina by Andrés Sánchez Robayna, 1993; Combinatorias hispánicas by José Lezama Lima, 1993; Gracián Meets Góngora by M.J. Woods, 1995; The Transforming Text: A Study of Luis de Góngora's Soledades by R. John McCaw, 2000.

* * *

Luis de Góngora was a remarkable poet who made a significant contribution in a variety of poetic fields, expanding the range of poetry by his conception of the ballad as a more sophisticated, artistically balanced form than was traditional, by his promotion of the burlesque as a valid artistic form, and, in the case of his most famous major poem, Soledades (The Solitudes), by creating a work that not only did not fit into any recognized genre, but also had a dazzling stylistic novelty.

Having already acquired a reputation as a writer of fine sonnets and ballads from the publication of a number of his poems in a general anthology in 1605, Góngora in his native Andalusia dreamed of making a career for himself at the court in Madrid. Hence in 1614 copies of his Solitudes and his Polifemo y Galatea (Polyphemus and Galatea), major poems he had recently completed, were being circulated at court and caused a major literary controversy which centred upon the original and exceptionally difficult style in which they were written. There was a spate of letters, pamphlets, and poems attacking and defending Góngora. Although he never achieved the patronage he sought, he attracted many imitators, and detailed explanatory commentaries of his works were published later in the century.

The features of Góngora's style attracting comment were his use of neologisms (so-called cultismos), his liberties with syntax, particularly word order, and frequency and complexity of his metaphors. But it is misleading to portray Góngora's novelty as merely stylistic, a question of mode of expression rather than of what was being said. Thematically, the major poems give a novel prominence to the world of nature. With his Polyphemus and Galatea, which retells the story found in Ovid's Metamorphoses of the giant Polyphemus' love for Galatea and his enraged killing of her lover, Acis, despite the importance that Góngora gives the rural Sicilian setting we still have basically a narrative poem. But in his Solitudes, of which there are two of an originally planned four, the second being unfinished, we have basically a descriptive poem, which is in itself a novelty. Góngora shows the hospitality offered by a rustic community to a shipwrecked young courtier, presenting their way of life and the environment in which they live in an enthusiastic way. When we consider Góngora's use of metaphor as a means of presenting this positive vision, again it is clear that we are dealing with a mode of thought, not merely one of speech. It is through metaphor that he draws attention to surprising patterns and relationships in the world, inviting us to wonder at them. Hence, when he calls the sea "a Lybia of waves," he invites us to consider the parallels between desert and sea, their common vastness and inhospitability, dunes mirroring waves, and at the same time surprises us by describing the extremely wet in terms of the extremely dry. Through such explorations of relationships Góngora reveals himself as a major exponent of wit.

—M.J. Woods

GORAN, Abdulla

Born: Abdulla Sulayman in Halabja, Ottoman Empire (now Iraq), September 1904; son of a minor official in the Ottoman administration. Education: Attended elementary school in Halabja, and medrese in Kirkuk, 1919–21; State Pedagogical Institute, Kirkuk, 1921. Career: School teacher, Sulaimniya, 1925–37; Iraqi Ministry of Communications, late 1930s; worked at a radio station in Jaffa, Palestine, 1942–45; editor of the weekly cultural journal Jin, early 1950s; founder, Committee for the Defense of Peace, Iraq, 1951. Died: Sulaimainya, Iraq, 18 November 1962.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Dîwanî Goran, edited by Muhammadi Mela Karim. 1980.

Verse

Behesht u yadgar. 1950.

Firmêsk u huner. 1950.

Sirûsht u derûn. 1968.

Lawuk u peyman. 1969.

Plays

Guli Hiwênawi. 1950.

Bûkêki nakam. 1950.

Other

Translator, Helbijarde. 1953.

*

Critical Studies: Shi'ir u edebieti kurdi, vol. 2, by Rafik Hilmi, 1956; Mûasir kûrd shairi: Abdulla Goranyn poezijasy by Hüseyin Alyshanov, 1969.

* * *

Abdulla Goran is generally recognized as the leading Kurdish poet of the twentieth century. He combined the heritage of indigenous classical and folk creativity with the intentions and techniques of modern lyricism to endow Kurdish poetry with new means of expression and a diverse subject matter. The form and content of his poetry evolved continuously as his acquaintance with Kurdish society broadened. His early poems were suffused with the romantic spirit and themes characteristic of traditional and much contemporary Kurdish verse, but as his sympathy for the hard life of the ordinary Kurd grew and his social conscience became fully awakened, he increasingly drew inspiration from the joys and sorrows of everyday life. In so doing, he became one of the founders of Kurdish realism.

The main task he set for himself was to reveal all the poetic capabilities of the Kurdish language. He thus brought new vigor and freshness to Kurdish poetry by introducing the prose poem and blank verse and by adopting a syllabic rhythm close to the rhythms of folk poetry. In "Awati duri" [Distant Longing], for example, he abandoned the traditional aruz in favor of a prosody that allowed him to vary the number of syllables in a line and to introduce new rhymes. He also experimented with form. He was particularly fond of verse dramas, which suited his lyrical temperament. Whether his mood was romantic or realist, he wrote in a remarkably pure, flowing language, and many of his poems, because of their simple, easy rhythms, were set to music. His early poetry of the 1920s and 1930s, was romantic, and his favorite themes were nature and love. Two longer poems, "Gesht Is Hewraman" [Journey to Hewraman] and "Gesht le Keredag" [Journey to Keredag], both of which appeared in the volume Behesht u yadgar [Paradise and Remembrance], attest to his skill at painting native landscapes and describing the customs and rituals of daily life. The focus of his love poetry is woman, portrayed as the source of all that is beautiful and good. But even his most idyllic poetry revealed traces of the later, dominant realism; he curbed the hyperbole of classical Kurdish verse and sought to move the reader by genuineness and depth of feeling. In his "romantic period" he was also animated by strong ethnic sentiments. In "Demi raperine" [The Voice Awakens] he expressed his ardent love of country (Kurdistan) and his yearning for its liberation, and in "Derwêsh Ebdulla" [Dervish Abdulla] he urged the famous Kurdish balladeer to assuage his melancholy by singing pure Kurdish melodies.

Goran's dramas in verse, a new genre in Kurdish literature, were decidedly realistic, despite their preoccupation with romantic love. They gave him freedom to express his growing civic sense by allowing him to confront contemporary social issues more directly than was possible in traditional genres. Perhaps the most popular of these dramas was "Guli hinênawi" [The Bloody Rose], the story of tragic love in an unjust world, which became a modern Kurdish classic. An equally powerful piece, "Bûkêki nakam" [An Unhappy Bride], emphasizes social themes as two lovers from different classes try to overcome deeply rooted family prejudices.

Goran pursued other literary interests alongside poetry. He was an accomplished prose writer and composed numerous short stories and sketches, especially on social themes. An avid student of languages, he translated into Kurdish poems from Persian, Arabic, Turkish, and English and a volume of short stories, Helbijarde [Selections], by French and English authors. He was also a skilled essayist and polemicist, as his commitment to social justice for the downtrodden suggests. But he could be passionate also about literary matters and was in the forefront of the effort to create a single Kurdish literary language, a tool he thought essential if writers were to express the true essence of the Kurdish genius and way of life. Convinced that the two main dialects—Kûrmanjî, used in Turkey, Syria, Iran, and northwest Iraq, and Sorânî, the literary language of the Kurds of Iraq, which he himself used—were gradually coming together, he railed against extremists who would interfere with the process by removing Arabic and Persian elements and replace them with "dead" words and "false" neologisms.

Through his innovative use of language and meter, his commitment to new themes, and his harmonious blending of form and subject, Goran created a watershed in the development of modern Kurdish poetry. The generation that followed him no longer composed in accordance with the classical canon, but eagerly assimilated the experiences of ordinary life and boldly experimented with new modes of expression.

—Keith Hitchins

GOR'KII, Maksim

Also known as Maxim Gorky. Born: Alexei Maksimovich Peshkov, in Nizhnyi Novgorod, Russia, 16 March 1868. Education: Educated in parish school, Nizhnyi Novgorod; Kumavino elementary school, 1877–78. Family: Married Ekaterina Pavlovna Volzhina in 1896 (separated); one son and one daughter. Career: Apprenticed to a shoemaker at age 11; then draughtsman's clerk and cook's boy on a Volga steamer; from 1888, associated with revolutionary politics: first arrest, 1889; travelled on foot through much of Russia; began publishing in prominent journals by the mid-1890s; member of publishing co-operative Knowledge, and literary editor, Zhizn' [Life], St. Petersburg, from 1899; worked for the publishing house Znanie, 1900, and was subsequently its leading editor; exiled to Arzamas, central Russia, for involvement with a covert printing press, 1901; joined the Bolshevik Party, 1905; travelled to the United States, 1906; lived in Capri, 1906–13; set up revolutionary propaganda school, 1909; returned to Russia after general amnesty, 1913; founding editor, Letopis' [Chronicles] magazine, 1915–17, and newspaper Novaia Zhizn' [New Life], 1917–18; established publishing house Vsemirnaia Literatura [World Literature]; involved in Petrograd Workers and Soldiers Soviet; left Russia in 1921; editor, Dialogue, Berlin, 1923–25, and in Sorrento during most of 1924–32; editor, Literary Apprenticeship magazine, 1930; returned to Russia permanently in 1933; helped set up the Biblioteka Poeta [Poet's Library] publishing project; travelled widely throughout USSR, took a leading role at the All-Union Congress of Soviet Writers, 1934, and was associated with the implementation of Socialist Realism as the artistic orthodoxy. Awards: Order of Lenin, 1932. Gor'kii Literary Institute established in his honour. Died: 18 June 1936.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

- Selected Works*, translated by Margaret Wettlin and others. 2 vols., 1948.
- Polnoe sobranie sochinenii: Khudozhestvennaia literatura* [Complete Collected Works]. 25 vols., 1968–76.
- Collected Works*. 10 vols., 1978–83.
- Sobranie sochinenii* [Collected Works], edited by N.N. Zhegalov. 16 vols., 1979.
- Sobranie sochinenii* [Collected Works], edited by S.A. Nebol'shim. 8 vols., 1987.
- Sobranie sochinenii* [Collected Works], edited by A.I. Ovcharenko, 12 vols., 1987.
- Collected Short Stories*, edited by Avrahm Yarmolinsky and Moura Budberg. 1988.

Plays

- Meshchane* (produced 1902). 1902; as The Smug Citizens, translated by Edwin Hopkins, 1906; as The Courageous One, translated by M. Goldina and H. Choat, 1958; as The Petty Bourgeois, in Collected Works 4, 1979.
- Na dne* (produced 1902). 1903; as A Night's Lodging, translated by Edwin Hopkins, in Poet Lore, 16, 1905; as The Lower Depths, translated by L. Irving, 1912; also translated by Alexander Bakshy with Paul S. Nathan, in Seven Plays, 1945, Moura Budberg, 1959, Margaret Wettlin, in Five Plays, 1959, David Magarshack, in The Storm and Other Russian Plays, 1960, Andrew R. MacAndrew, in Twentieth Century Russian Drama, 1963, and Kitty H. Blair and Jeremy Brooks, 1973; as Submerged, translated by Edwin Hopkins, 1914; as At the Bottom, translated by W. Laurence, 1930; as Down and Out, translated by G.R. Noyes and Alexander Kaun, in Masterpieces of the Russian Drama, edited by Noyes, 1933; as Lower Depths, edited with introduction, notes and vocabulary by Kurt Klein and Ira Goetz, 1993; translated by Jennie Covan, 1999.
- Dachniki* (produced 1904). 1904; as Summerfolk, translated by A. Delano, in Poet Lore, 16, 1905; translated by Kitty H. Blair and Jeremy Brooks, in Five Plays, 1988; also translated by Nicholas Saunders and Frank Dwyer, 1995.
- Varvary*. 1905; as Barbarians, translated by Alexander Bakshy with Paul S. Nathan, in Seven Plays, 1945; also translated by Kitty H. Blair and Jeremy Brooks, in Five Plays, 1988; as Philistines, translated by Dusty Hughes, 1986.
- Deti solntsa*. 1905; as Children of the Sun, translated by John Wolfe, 1906; also translated by Kitty H. Blair and Jeremy Brooks, in Five Plays, 1988.
- Vragi* (produced 1907). 1906; as Enemies, translated by Alexander Bakshy with Paul S. Nathan, in Seven Plays, 1945; also translated by Kitty H. Blair and Jeremy Brooks, 1972.
- Poslednie* [The Last Ones] (produced 1908). 1908.

- Vassa Zheleznova* (produced 1911). 1910; revised version, 1935; as Vassa Zheleznova, translated by Alexander Bakshy with Paul S. Nathan, in Seven Plays, 1945.
- Vstrecha* [The Meeting] (produced 1910). 1910.
- Chudaki*. 1910; as Queer People, translated by Alexander Bakshy with Paul S. Nathan, in Seven Plays, 1945.
- Zykovy*. 1913; as The Zykovs, translated by Alexander Bakshy with Paul S. Nathan, in Seven Plays, 1945.
- Starik* (produced 1919). 1918; as The Judge, translated by M. Zakhrevsky and B.H. Clark, 1924; as The Old Man, translated by Margaret Wettlin, 1956.
- Somov i drugie* [Somov and Others]. 1931.
- Egor Bulychov i drugie* (produced 1932). 1932; as Yegor Bulichoff and Others, translated by W.L. Gibson-Cowan, in The Last Plays, 1937; as Yegor Bulychov and the Others, translated by Alexander Bakshy with Paul S. Nathan, in Seven Plays, 1945.
- Dostigaev i drugie* (produced 1934). 1933; as Dostigaev and the Others, translated by W.L. Gibson-Cowan, in The Last Plays, 1937.
- The Last Plays* (includes Yegor Bulichoff and Others; Dostigaev and the Others), translated by W.L. Gibson-Cowan, 1937.
- Seven Plays* (includes Barbarians; Enemies; Vassa Zheleznova; The Lower Depths; Queer People; The Zykovs; Yegor Bulychov and Others), translated by Alexander Bakshy with Paul S. Nathan, 1945.
- Five Plays* (includes The Petty Bourgeois; Philistines; The Lower Depths; Summerfolk; Enemies), translated by Margaret Wettlin, 1956.
- The Lower Depths and Other Plays*, translated by Alexander Bakshy and Paul S. Nathan, 1959.
- Five Plays* (includes The Lower Depths; Summerfolk; Children of the Sun; Barbarians; Enemies), translated by Kitty H. Blair and Jeremy Brooks, 1988.

Fiction

- Ocherki i rasskazy* (stories). 3 vols., 1898–99; in part as Tales, translated by R. Bain, 1902.
- Foma Gordeev*. 1899; as Foma Gordeyev, translated by Herman Bernstein, 1901; also translated by Margaret Wettlin, 1956; as The Man Who Was Afraid, translated by Bernstein, 1905; as Foma, 1945.
- Troe*. 1900; as Three of Them, translated by Alexandra Linden, 1902; as Three Men, translated by Charles Horne, 1902; also translated by A. Frumkin, 1919; as The Three, translated by Margaret Wettlin, 1958.
- Orloff and His Wife: Tales of the Barefoot Brigade*, translated by Isabel F. Hapgood. 1901.
- The Orloff Couple, and Malva*, translated by Emily Jankowleff and Dora B. Montefiore. 1901.
- Tales*, translated by R. Bain. 1902.
- The Outcasts and Other Stories*, translated by Dora B. Montefiore, Emily Jankowleff, and V. Volkhovsky. 1902.
- Chelkash and Other Stories*, translated by Emily Jankowleff and Dora B. Montefiore. 1902.
- Twenty-Six Men and a Girl and Other Stories*, translated by Dora B. Montefiore and Emily Jankowleff. 1902.
- Twenty-Six and One and Other Stories*, translated by I. Strannik. 1902.
- Tales*, translated by C. Alexandroff. 1903.

Mat'. 1906; as Mother, 1907; revised translation, by Isidor Schneider, 1947; as Comrades, 1907.

Zhizn' nenuzhnogo cheloveka. 1907–08; as The Spy: The Story of a Superfluous Man, translated by Thomas Seltzer, 1908; as The Life of a Useless Man, translated by Moura Budberg, 1971.

Isproved'. 1908; as A Confession, translated by Frederick Harvey, 1910; as The Confession, translated by Rose Strunsky, n.d.

Gorodok Okurov [Okurov City]. 1909.

Leto [Summer]. 1909.

Zhizn' Matveia Kozhemiakina. 1910–11; as The Life of Matvei Kozhemyakin, translated by Margaret Wettlin, 1960.

Tales, translated by R. Nisbet Bain. 1912.

Tales of Two Countries. 1914.

Twenty-Six Men and a Girl and Other Stories, translated by S. Michel. 1915.

Stories of the Steppe, translated by H. Schnittkind and I. Goldberg. 1918.

Creatures That Once Were Men (stories), translated by J.M. Shirazi. 1918.

Delo Artamonovkh. 1925; as Decadence, translated by Veronica Dewey, 1927; as The Artamonov Business, translated by A. Brown, 1948; as The Artamonovs, translated by H. Altschuler, 1952.

The Story of a Novel and Other Stories, translated by M. Zakrevsky. 1925.

Zhizn' Klima Samgina [The Life of Klim Samgin] (unfinished). 1925–36; as The Bystander, The Magnet, Other Fires, and The Spectre, translated by Bernard Guilbert Bakshy, 4 vols., 1931–38.

Best Short Stories, edited and translated by Avraham Yarmolinsky and Moura Budberg. 1939; as A Book of Short Stories, 1939.

Song of the Stormy Petrel and Other Short Stories, translated by M. Trommer. 1942.

Unrequited Love and Other Stories, translated by Moura Budberg. 1949.

Selected Short Stories 1892–1901, translated by Margaret Wettlin. 1954.

A Sky-Blue Life and Other Stories, translated by George Reavey. 1964.

Verse

Pesnia o Sokole. 1895; as The Song of the Falcon, translated by "M.G.," 1896.

Chelovek. 1903; translated as Man, 1905.

Devushka i smert' [The Little Gift and Death]. 1917.

Other

A.P. Chekhov. 1905; as Anton Tchekhov: Fragments of Recollections, translated by S.S. Kotlianskii and Leonard Woolf, 1921.

Detstvo V liudiakh Moi university. 1913–22; as My Childhood in the World [My Apprenticeship] My University Days [My Universities], 1915–23; as Autobiography, translated by Isidor Schneider, 1949; as My Apprenticeship, My Childhood, My Universities, translated by Ronald Wilks, 3 vols., 1966–79; My Childhood also translated by Gertrude M. Foakes, 1915, and as Childhood, by Margaret Wettlin, 1950, revised by Jessie Coulson, 1961.

Vospominaniia o Tolstom. 1919; as Reminiscences of Tolstoi, translated by S.S. Kotlianskii and Leonard Woolf, 1920.

Revoliutsiia i kul'tura [Revolution and Culture]. 1920.

O russkom krestianstve. 1922; translated as On the Russian Peasantry, 1976.

Zametki iz dnevnika. 1924; translated as Fragments from My Diary, 1924; also translated by Moura Budberg, 1972, revised edition, 1975.

V.I. Lenin. 1924; as V.I. Lenin, translated by C.W. Parker-Arkhangelskaya, 1931; as Days with Lenin, 1932.

O literature. 1933; revised edition, 1935, 1955; as On Literature: Selected Articles, translated by Julius Katzer and Ivy Litvinova, 1960.

On Guard for the Soviet Union. 1933.

Reminiscences of Tolstoy, Chekhov and Andreyev, translated by Katherine Mansfield, S.S. Kotlianskii, Virginia Woolf, and Leonard Woolf. 1934.

Culture and the People. 1940.

Creative Labour and Culture. 1945.

Literature and Life: A Selection from the Writings, edited and translated by Edith Bone. 1946.

History of the Civil War, translated by J. Fineberg. 1946.

Articles and Pamphlets. 1950.

Letters of Maxim Gor'kij to V.F. Xodasevič, 1922–1925, edited and translated by Hugh McLean, in Harvard Slavonic Studies, I. 1953.

F.I. Chaliapin. 2 vols., 1957–58; as Chaliapin: An Autobiography, edited and translated by Nina Froud and James Hanley, 1967.

Letters of Gorky and Andreev 1899–1912, edited by Peter Yershov, translated by Lydia Weston. 1958.

Letters, translated by P. Cockerell. 1966.

Nesvoyevremennye mysli. 1971; as Untimely Thoughts, edited and translated by Herman Ermolaev, 1968; as Untimely Thoughts: Essays on Revolution, Culture and the Bolsheviks, 1917–1918, translated with notes by Herman Ermolaev, 1995.

The City of the Yellow Devil: Pamphlets, Articles and Letters about America. 1972.

Rasskazy i povesti 1892–1917 (selection). 1976.

Perepiska M Gor'kogo (selected correspondence). 2 vols., 1986.

Gorky and His Contemporaries (letters), edited by Galina Belaya, translated by Cynthia Carlile. 1989.

Selected Letters, edited by Andrew Barratt and Barry P. Scherr. 1997.

Editor, Belomor. An Account of the Construction of the New Canal Between the White Sea and the Baltic Sea. 1935.

*

Bibliography: Maxim Gorky in English: A Bibliography, 1868–1986 by Garth M. Terry, 1986; Maxim Gorky: A Reference Guide by Edith Clowes, 1987.

Critical Studies: Maxim Gorky and His Russia by Alexander Kaun, 1931; The Young Maxim Gorky 1868–1902 by Filia Holtzman, 1948; Maxim Gorky: Romantic Realist and Conservative Revolutionary by Richard Hare, 1962; Stormy Petrel: The Life and Work of Maxim Gorky by Dan Levin, 1965; Gorky: His Literary Development and Influence on Soviet Intellectual Life by I. Weil, 1966; Maxim Gorky, The Writer: An Interpretation by F.M. Borrás, 1967; The Bridge and the Abyss: The Troubled Friendship of Maxim Gorky and V.I. Lenin by Bertram D. Wolfe, 1967; Maxim Gorky by Gerhard E. Habermann, 1971; Three Russians Consider America: America in the Works of Maksim Gor'kij, Aleksandr Blok, and Vladimir Mayakovskij by Charles Rougle, 1976; Maxim Gorky and the Literary Quests of the Twentieth Century by A.I. Ovcharenko, 1985; Maxim Gorky Fifty Years On: Gorky and His Time edited by Nicholas Luker, 1987; Maxim Gorky by Barry P. Scherr, 1988; Gorky and His Contemporaries: Memoirs and Letters edited by Galina Belaya, 1989; Gorky by Henri Troyat, translated by Lowell Bair, 1989; File on Gorky, compiled by Cynthia Marsh, 1993; The Early Fiction of Maksim Gorky: Six Essays in Interpretation by Andrew Barratt, 1993; Vicissitudes of Genre in the Russian Novel by Russell Scott Valentino, 2001.

* * *

For many years Maksim Gor'kii was revered in the Soviet Union as the founder of Socialist Realism, the father of Soviet literature, and one of the greatest 20th-century writers. Critical opinion of him in the West was always more mixed, and since the collapse of the Soviet Union attitudes towards him in Russia have also evolved. The city of his birth and one of Moscow's largest streets, both once named in his honour, have reverted to their former designations. Even though his sometime differences with Bolshevik leaders rather than his statements on behalf of the Communist Party now receive more attention, he remains a writer for whom it is difficult to separate the literary and the non-literary achievements.

Before the revolution he was active both politically, as a supporter of revolutionary causes, and, among his fellow writers, as a leader of the so-called "critical realists" and the organizer of various publishing enterprises. After the revolution his political connections enabled him to protect, aid, and encourage an entire generation of writers, at the same time that he was again instrumental in establishing major publication projects, some of which continue to the present day.

As a writer Gor'kii introduced or at least popularized many topics that had largely been ignored by 19th-century Russian writers. He drew upon his own experiences to depict the vagrants and social outcasts who were the main characters in many of his early stories, while his upbringing provided the material for graphic descriptions of Russia's merchant class and its emergent capitalists, many of whom, especially in the provinces, retained the superstitions and habits instilled by peasant backgrounds. His particular talent lay in his descriptive skills. He created unforgettable portraits of his main characters and also brought out vividly the most mundane details of their everyday lives. That ability, along with the exotic quality of his subject matter, was sufficient to ensure the near-instant fame that he achieved. On the other hand, his fiction was occasionally marred by faults that he never completely overcame: a political tendentiousness that sometimes led to exaggeration and overly broad generalizations, the appearance of florid passages and lack of simplicity in his style, and difficulty in creating narratives with sufficient drama and cohesiveness to serve as vehicles for the characters he created.

This last feature of his writing perhaps explains why he achieved mixed success with his novels and plays but had more consistent results with his short stories and, particularly, his autobiographical writings and memoirs. In early stories such as "Chelkash" (1894) and "Kononov" (1896) the single vagrant figure predominates and is sufficient to hold the reader's interest throughout. Further, since Gor'kii's vagrants turn out to originate from widely divergent classes, they possess sufficient variety so that the stories as a group do not become repetitive. Also notable among his stories is "Dvadsta' shest' i odna" ("Twenty-Six Men and a Girl"), in which Gor'kii offers a concise and powerful treatment of a theme that was to be important for much of his subsequent work: the need for many people, especially those who have virtually nothing, to create illusions to sustain themselves, and the ease with which those illusions may be destroyed. The novels too are most notable for their central figures, as well as for the social milieu that Gor'kii depicts with his customary skill and knowledge. In this genre, though, Gor'kii's problems with narrative are particularly telling. Typical are Foma Gordeev, in which the title character rejects the merchant-class society into which he is born, and Mat' (Mother), which passionately describes the birth of a revolutionary consciousness in the mother of an imprisoned worker and which is regarded by Soviet critics as a model work for what became known as Socialist Realism. In both instances the introduction of fascinating characters dominates the first third or so of the work, but the action then becomes diffuse until the concluding pages.

Gor'kii's last novels could all be classified as chronicles, in which the recording of social and political events comes to take precedence over dramatic narrative. If the title character in Zhizn' Matveia Kozhemiakina (The Life of Matvei Kozhemyakin) at least remains in the centre of the action, then in Delo Artamonovykh (The Artamonov Business) the focus is more on how generational changes are reflected in the rise and fall of a family dynasty during the years leading up to the Bolshevik Revolution. Gor'kii's final novel, Zhizn' Klim Samgina [The Life of Klim Samgin], remained unfinished at his death; it consists of four large volumes, each of which has a separate title in the English translation. Here he again reverts to tracing the life of a single individual, but Gor'kii's real interest lies elsewhere: epic in scope and filled with historical figures and events, the novel represents an attempt to portray intellectual and political developments in Russian life during the 40 years that culminated in the overthrow of the old regime in 1917.

Remarkably, Gor'kii created his best play with only his second effort as a dramatist, Na dne (The Lower Depths). The play lacks any single predominant figure, but its collection of cast-offs, who seem to be refugees from several of his early stories, offers originality and dramatic interaction that more than compensate for the lack of a strong plot. In other plays of this type the static quality of Gor'kii's writing tends to undercut his efforts, though he still succeeds in those plays that are dominated by a strong figure, such as Egor Bulychov i drugie (Yegor Bulichoff and Others). In more recent years Gor'kii's plays have enjoyed renewed interest in both England and North America, with stagings of both these works as well as Dachniki (Summerfolk) and Vragi (Enemies). However, Gor'kii's best writing occurred when he was writing directly about himself or about those whom he knew intimately. At such moments he was able to give full vent to his descriptive abilities at the same time that the necessity to invent a plot was removed. The brilliant portrayal of his grandparents in his Detstvo (My Childhood) and the skilful capturing of the complexities and contradictions exhibited by a great writer in his memoir devoted to Tolstoi are typical of the qualities that make Gor'kii's autobiography and various reminiscences his major contributions to world literature.

—Barry P. Scherr

See the essays on The Lower Depths and "Twenty-Six Men and a Girl."

GORKY, Maxim

See GOR'KII, Maksim

GOTTFRIED VON STRASSBURG

Career: Active in Alsace, possibly at the episcopal court in Strasbourg, in the years around 1200.

PUBLICATIONS

Verse

Tristan, edited by Friedrich Ranke. 1930, also edited by Rüdiger Krohn, 1981; as Tristan und Isolde, edited by Reinhold Bechstein, revised by P.F. Ganz, 1978, also edited by Hermann Kurtz and Wolfgang Mohr, 1979; as Tristan and Isolde, translated by Edwin H. Zeydel, 1948; as Tristan, translated by A.T. Hatto, 1960; a shortened version, as The Story of Tristan and Iseult, translated by Jessie L. Weston, 1899.

*

Bibliography: Bibliographie zu Gottfried von Strassburg, 1971, and Bibliographie zu Gottfried von Strassburg, II, Berichtszeitraum 1971–1983, 1986, both by Hans H. Steinhoff.

Critical Studies: Gottfried von Strassburg by Michael S. Bates, 1971; The Anatomy of Love: The "Tristan" of Gottfried by W.T.H. Jackson, 1971; A History of Tristan Scholarship by Rosemary Picozzi, 1971; The Tristan of Gottfried von Strassburg: An Ironic Perspective by Ruth Goldsmith Kunzer, 1973; The Poetics of Conversion: Number Symbolism and Alchemy in Gottfried's "Tristan" by Susan L. Clark and Julian N. Wasserman, 1977; Medieval Humanism in Gottfried's Tristan und Isolde by C. Stephen Jaeger, 1977; Gottfried's Tristan: Journey Through the Realm of Eros by Hugo Bekker, 1987; Gottfried von Strassburg and the Medieval Tristan Legend: Papers from an Anglo-American Symposium edited by Adrian Stevens and Roy Wisbey, 1990; Tristan in the Underworld: A Study of Gottfried von Strassburg's "Tristan" Together with the "Tristran" of Thomas by Nell Thomas, 1991; Complete Concordance to Gottfried von Strassburg's Tristan by Clifton D. Hall, 1992; History, Fiction, Verisimilitude: Studies in the Poetics of Gottfried's Tristan by Mark Chinca, 1993; Gottfried von Strassburg: Tristan by Mark Chinca, 1997.

* * *

In the flourishing of courtly literature in Germany around 1200 Gottfried von Strassburg must be counted among the most profound narrative poets, and certainly the most enigmatic. Of his life nothing is known but his name and designation; he did work in Alsace, but his social position, whether aristocratic or bourgeois, cannot be determined, although the latter seems most likely; nor any patron identified. Manifestly he enjoyed a clerical education, but his attitude towards the chivalric culture of aristocracy and in manners of religion remains elusive. His courtly romance Tristan, the supreme poetic account of the ill-fated lovers Tristan and Isolde at the court of Marke, king of Cornwall, remains incomplete, and breaks off (probably because of Gottfried's death) at v. 19 548. Running through this romance are complex strands of reflection and commentary on matters literary, social, ethical, and religious which render difficult any unitary interpretation according to customary categories.

Tristan, a romance in rhymed couplets, shows Gottfried's sovereign command of Latin poetics and vernacular narrative techniques, within the traditions of clerical historical writing. The stylistic richness of the work's verbal figures matches the dialectic artistry with which the story unfolds its model of a love-force which transforms human existence, and the poem gives a masterful presentation of the social and aesthetic functions of courtly ceremony.

Contemporary literary references indicate that Gottfried's romance was composed between 1200 and 1220. It is recorded in a strong, early tradition from the 13th century, with 11 manuscripts complete (to the break-off point) and 16 fragments. Later poets, Ulrich von Tûrheim and Heinrich von Freiberg wrote continuations, praising Gottfried warmly.

The Tristan story has its origins in the Celtic realism of the heroic age in Britain in the fourth to sixth centuries, but the relation of Celtic myth to medieval romance is elusive. No extant insular text gives definite information about the early shaping of the legend, and its literary origins are to be found rather in the early continental texts of Brittany and France. Gottfried presents in general the adventure sequences familiar in diverse European Tristan texts since the late 12th century, including a German version by Eilhart von Oberge (usually dated 1170–75). He claims to follow specifically the account of Thomas of Brittany, whose extant text, dated between 1155 and 1190, while fragmentary, in essence complements the unfinished German work in a most valuable way: its significance in the interpretation of Gottfried's poem is debated. Gottfried himself insists on the authenticity of his source as guarantee of the moral truth and validity of his work in contrast to that of disreputable minstrels. Such professional polemic underlies, too, his important literary review of contemporary German courtly poets, including Hartmann von Aue and Heinrich von Veldeke, Wolfram von Eschenbach (whom he does not name) and Walther von der Vogelweide.

Tristan is born the orphan son of Riwalin and Blanche fleur, his story a variant of the widespread theme of the Fair Unknown; the tragic love of Tristan's parents anticipates the entanglements of his own love for Isolde, who is his queen and the wife of his uncle, when the two, joined by mischance through a love potion, feel driven to abuse the bonds of court, society, and religion in order to nurture their illicit love. After episodes of mounting hazard and bold deception Tristan finally succumbs to the contradictions of his plight and flees the court, vainly seeking solace for his psychological torment in the company of another Isolde.

In contrast to the protagonist of Arthurian romance, Tristan does not develop through experience towards maturity. From the outset he displays his consummate skill in every sphere of chivalric life and culture; frequently he assumes the role of spilman (entertainer), and deceptions play a major role in the narrative. Tristan's artistic accomplishments serve in a sense to indicate his status as outsider in the courtly world, for he avails himself constantly of a certain independence from norms that pertain to those who are fully integrated into society. Hand in hand with this aesthetic orientation is his indifference to martial values (despite, of course, his mastery of arms and strategy). Often the events reflect material familiar from medieval fabliaux, comic tales which reward cunning and delight in the bawdy and irreverent. The many episodes are linked in a tectonic pattern of analogies and contrasts which reflect the mystical, paradoxical power of the love that dominates the romance.

Indeed, high ideals are Gottfried's constant concern in this narrative which deals with the conflict between the individual and society. In numerous reflective passages the poet probes chivalric aristocratic society, its military ethos, its values, and its use of religion (in, for example, a blatant piece of trickery which serves as critique of trial by ordeal). In episodes which focus upon the vacillating insensitivity of Marke, the all-too-human centre of social authority in this fictional world, he explores the implications for feudal society of unregulated love. Through the use of allegory (in the introduction and the Cave of Lovers, where in a cathedral-like natural setting the couple finds a paradisaic bliss outside of society which is short-lived) he postulates a mystical community of edele herzen (noble hearts) who embody the power of this fateful love. Gottfried addresses himself to this elite audience of "noble hearts" who alone are culturally and ethically capable of apprehending the nature of the love which is depicted in the romance as an overwhelming, paradoxical force. This passionate love, absolute and compulsive, is in flagrant conflict with the normal standards of law, religion, and ethics. Through its dialectic of liebe unde leit (the joy and suffering of love), this love force raises the exceptional individual to an autonomy beyond the social constraints which encompass human beings in medieval courtly society, but it leads finally to self-loss and death. The poet's attitude to this love is imparted in subtle allusion and demands discerning critical analysis: the love of Tristan and Isolde may briefly defy society in their moments of aesthetic and erotic fulfilment, which give listeners to their tale great solace, but the lovers must in the end experience bitter deprivation. Gottfried's romance is perhaps the most radical exploration of the potential of the individual in medieval literature.

—Lewis Jillings

GOTTHELF, Jeremias

Born: Albert Bitzius in Murten, Switzerland, 4 October 1797. Education: Studied theology at Berne Academy, 1814–20; Göttingen University, for one year. Family: Married Henriette Elisabeth Zeender in 1833. Career: Ordained in 1820; curate, Utzenstorf, 1820, and 1822–24; Herzogenbuchsee, 1824–29, transferred to Berne, 1829–31; pastor, Lützelflüh, Emmental, 1832; school commissioner and founder of educational institute for poor boys, 1835–45. Suffered from heart disease, apoplexy, and dropsy in the 1850s. Died: 22 October 1854.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Gesammelte Schriften. 24 vols., 1856–58.
Ausgewählte Erzählungen, edited by Adolf Bartels. 4 vols., 1907.

Sämtliche Werke, edited by Rudolph Hunziker and Hans Bloesch. 24 vols., 1911–59.

Werke, edited by Walter Muschg. 20 vols., 1948–53.

Werke, edited by Henri Poschmann. 1971.

Schwänke und Witze, edited by Eduard Strübin. 1986.

Fiction

Der Bauernspiegel; oder, Lebensgeschichte des Jeremias Gotthelf. 1837; as The Mirror of Peasants, translated by Mary Augusta Ward, in Macmillans Magazine, 1883.

Wie fünf Mädchen im Brantwein jämmerlich umkamen. 1838.

Leiden und Freuden eines Schuhmeisters. 1839; as The Joys and Grievs of a National Schoolmaster, translated by Mary Augusta Ward, in Macmillans Magazine, 1883; as The Joys and Sorrows of a Schoolmaster, 1864.

Dursli, der Brantweinsäufer; oder, der Heilige Weihnachtsabend. 1839.

Wie Uli der Knecht glücklich wird. 1841; as Uli der Knecht, 1846; as Ulric the Farm-Servant, translated by Julia Firth, 1866.

Ein Sylvester-Traum (stories). 1842.

Bilder und Sagen aus der Schweiz (stories). 6 vols., 1842–46.

Anne Bäbi Jowäger. 1843–44.

Geld und Geist; oder, die Versöhnung. 1843; as Wealth and Welfare, 1866; as Soul and Money, translated by Julia Guarterick Vere, 1872.

Eines Schweizers Wort an den Schweizerischen Schützenverein. 1844.

Wie Christen eine Frau gewinnt. 1845.

Der Gelstag; oder, Die Wirtschaft nach tier neuen Mode. 1846.

Der Knabe des Tell. 1846.

Jakobs, des Handwerksesellen, Wanderungen durch die Schweiz. 2 vols., 1846–48.

Käthi die Grossmutter. 1847; as The Story of an Alpine Valley; or, Katie the Grandmother, translated by L.G. Smith, 1896.

Hans Joggeli der Erbvetter. 1848.

Uli der Pächter. 1849.

Doctor Dorbach, der Wühler und die Bürglenherren in der heiligen Weihnachtsnacht Anno 1847. 1849.

Die Käserei in der Vehfreude. 1850.

Erzählungen und Bilder aus dem Volksleben der Schweiz. 1850–55.

Hans Jakob und Heiri; oder, die beiden Seidenweber. 1851.

Die Erbbase; oder, Freunde in der Not gehen hundert auf en Lot. 1851.

Zeitgeist und Berner Geist. 1852.

Der Patrizierspiegel. 1853.

Erlebnisse eines Schuldenbauers. 1854.

Das Erdbeeri Mareili. 1858.

Elsi, die seltsame Magd. 1858.

Die Schwarze Spinne. 1917; as The Black Spider, translated by Mary Hottinger, in Nineteenth Century German Tales, 1958; also translated by H.M. Waidson, 1958.

Der Schwarze Spinne und andere Erzählungen (stories). 1970.

Other

Bericht über Gemeinde Utzenstorf. 1824.

Benz am Weihnachtssonntag. 1825.

Zum Bollodengeer Schulstreit. 1829.

Aufruf der Bürgerschaft von Bern an die Landschaft. 1830.

Bericht über die Schulen von Latzelflüh und das Erziehungsdepartement. 1832.

Bettagspredigt für die eidgenössischen Regenten, welche weder in den Kirchen noch in den Herzen den eidgenössischen Bettag mit den eidgenössischen Christen feiern. 1839.

Die Armennoth. 1840.

Verfasser ins Hoehdeutsche übertragne Ausgabe. 1846.

Durchgesehene über mit einem Schlusskapitel vermehrte Aufl. 1851.

Jeremias Gotthelf und Karl Rudolf Hegenbach; ihr Briefwechsel aus den Jahren 1841 bis 1853, edited by Ferdinand Vetter. 1910.

Uzwil. 1923.

Langensalza. 1923.

Familienbriefe Jeremias Gotthelf, edited by Hedwig Wäber. 1929.

Donauwörth. 1931.

*

Bibliography: Jeremias Gotthelf, 1797–1854 by Bee Juker and Giseal Martorelli, 1983.

Critical Studies: The Rural Novel: Jeremias Gotthelf, Thomas Hardy and C.R. Ramuz by Michael H. Parkinson, 1984; Narrative Strategies in the Novels of Jeremias Gotthelf by Robert Godwin-Jones, 1986; Three Swiss Realists: Gotthelf, Keller, and Meyer by Robert Godwin-Jones and Margaret T. Peischl, 1988.

* * *

Jeremias Gotthelf was considered by Gottfried Keller an epic genius, and has come to be recognized as a great epic writer not only in German-speaking countries but worldwide. Ernst Alker, the German literary critic, even goes so far as to classify Gotthelf with Cervantes, Tolstoi, Dickens, and Homer. Alker considers Gotthelf more than a great novelist, seeing him as a man who created a new world in his poetical works. In his realism, Gotthelf is furthermore the forerunner of German naturalism as found in the latter half of the 19th century.

Gotthelf, who is often referred to as the classical writer of Dorfgeschichten and Heimatkunst or regional literature, actually belongs to the school of German realism. A Swiss Protestant pastor, he portrayed a narrow segment of his native Switzerland: the peasants of the Bernese hinterland, among whom he spent his entire life. Like his more famous contemporaries, Gotthelf attempted to portray real human beings with all their shortcomings and deficiencies. Gotthelf took his figures, as Dickens did, from definite walks of life, and specifically from the region he knew best, the Swiss Bernbiet (Bern region) with its farming population. He often wrote the dialogue in his novels in local dialect. Like Dickens too, Gotthelf had a weakness for moralizing; this is not surprising, since Gotthelf was greatly influenced by the teachings of his countryman, Johann Heinrich Pestalozzi, the Swiss educationist.

Education is one of the main themes in Gotthelf's first novel, Der Bauernspiegel; oder, Lebensgeschichte des Jeremias Gotthelf (The Mirror of Peasants). This novel was written in the form of a fictional autobiography and shows the development of a young orphan from farmers' helper to freelance writer. In this work, Gotthelf attacks social prejudice, drawing on his own experience of paupers' establishments, and shows, through the character of the boy Jeremias, how poverty leads to crime. Jeremias is eventually saved from final degradation as a mercenary in a foreign army; yet on his return home, a changed man, he cannot find employment. It was Gotthelf's aim to open people's eyes to reality and to make the peasants in the canton of Berne aware of the social inequities within their parish. Gotthelf points the finger for these inequities and injustices not at a backward government but at man himself. Because of his indifference, his selfishness, his covetousness, and his lack of true Christian charity, man is his own enemy. The first part of the novel is vivid and forceful; the second part loses some of its élan and becomes somewhat theoretical.

The main impulse of Gotthelf's second work, Leiden und Freuden eines Schulmeisters (The Joys and Sorrows of a Schoolmaster) shows the resentment of Peter Kiser, a man who refused to be a mere puppet as a member of a local school board. Like The Mirror of Peasants, it is written in the first person; it describes, transcending time and place, the pandemonium of a provincial school system.

Following these two early works, Gotthelf depicted the sunny side of peasant life in his novel Uli der Knecht (Ulric the Farm-Servant). It is a narrative in which Gotthelf shifts from first to third person narration, and becomes more objective and less didactic in his writing. Indeed, in this Entwicklungsroman (novel of character development), Gotthelf avoids all pedagogic tendencies and departs from the form of his first two novels. Ulric the Farm-Servant remains one of his most popular works, with its vivid characters and realistic detail, and eulogy of life on the land, the blessings of work, the triumph of the will, and purification through suffering. Here as elsewhere, Gotthelf is particularly successful in probing the depths of his female characters. He depicts village attitudes to marriage and pregnancy, drunkenness and duel fighting.

Uli der Pächter [Uli the Tenant], not a sequel to Ulric the Farm-Servant, is one of those stories in which Gotthelf could not refrain from sermonizing. Here Gotthelf revived the good old farmers' customs, and poured venom on those of his countrymen who aped foreign fashions or gave up their ancient religion. Neither did he spare the intellectuals, whether teachers, physicians, or even parsons, and his criticism was blunt. Gotthelf always bore in mind that his village readers would never accept evasive words.

Christian humility and moderation appear as dominant concerns in the novel Hans Joggeli der Erbvetter [Hans Joggeli the Inheritor]. In this work, Gotthelf steers a middle course between asceticism and worldliness. Again, as in so many of his novels, he reveals his fascination with man and especially with man's striving spiritual potential.

The most discussed and perhaps the greatest of Gotthelf's works is the novella Die Schwarze Spinne (The Black Spider). It presents a colourful picture of rural life, a banquet reminiscent of a Homeric idyll. But this humorous description of the present is soon interrupted by an eruption from the solemn past, as an old farmer tells the story of his family, which has achieved prosperity by fighting the black spider. This spider was the progeny of a woman who called upon the devil for help, and defaulted on her promise to repay him by sending him a soul. The vengeful spider had thereupon killed everyone and everything in its way until the pious farmer caught it and imprisoned it in a hole in a beam. If any generation became too arrogant, the spider would, once again, find its way to freedom. Thus, in mythical manner and without direct sermonizing, Gotthelf points to piety as the basis of the village's present prosperity. Inevitably the author's own vocation as a pastor and his Christian world-view led to allegorical interpretations of the story based on Catholic doctrine denying the full beatific vision to the unbaptized. Rationalist interpreters saw in the black spider an unenlightened stage in the progressive development of man. The influence of psychoanalysis led later critics to see the black spider as a female mother-symbol. Probably none of these allegorical or one-sided interpretations does justice to Gotthelf's poetic achievement. In broader terms, one can claim that in this work, Gotthelf depicts the world in a perilous situation. Humanity is constantly threatened. It is by no means established that evil is punished and good rewarded. So-called earthly justice is the work of fallible human hands. The devil can seize power in this world and the innocent are victimized along with the guilty. It seems to be a mystery of divine justice that only the sacrifice of the innocent has expiatory power. Gotthelf gains depth and perspective for his picture of well-to-do farmers by bringing in past crises and temptations. The Black Spider is short, but substantial and full of meaning. An entire nation is presented in its dependence on the heavenly powers, in a masterly story that has few equals.

Das Erdbeeri Mareili [Strawberry Mary] and Elsi, die seltsame Magd [Elsie, the Strange Farm Servant], are other masterpieces from Gotthelf's pen. Both are rooted in history and present the Swiss environment realistically. Gotthelf's work as a whole is proof of his love for the tiller of the soil and of his understanding of Swiss national particularities. Although he was inclined, at times, to sentimentalize rural life, the immediacy with which he describes it stands out in an age of emerging realism.

Over a span of 18 years, Gotthelf wrote more than 12 long novels and over 50 separate works; in the last years of his life he was swamped with requests for novels, short stories, and anecdotes for all manner of publications. In later life he also became increasingly concerned with politics, often to the detriment of the broad, flowing style of his novels. Gotthelf restricted himself to narrative fiction: he produced no rhymed poems or ballads and he scarcely considered writing a drama, though he was acquainted with the works of Schiller and Shakespeare. The stories of his maturity, particularly the shorter ones, show great skill in construction; their language is lively and full of vivid images, a blend of dialect forms and standard constructions, reflecting his desire to fuse the elevated world of the Bible with the real world of the canton of Berne and to make the many Bernese dialects serve the purposes of art.

—Brigitte Edith Zapp Archibald

GRABBE, Christian Dietrich

Born: Detmold, Westphalia, 11 December 1801. Education: Educated at Gymnasium, Detmold; studied law at Leipzig University, 1820–22; and also in Berlin. Family: Married Luise Clostermeier (separated). Career: Attempted, unsuccessfully, to become an actor, 1823; established a legal practice in Detmold, 1824; military legal officer, 1826–34, resigning under pressure because of his dissolute lifestyle; quarrelled with Heinrich Heine, Ludwig Tieck, and Karl Immermann, losing their friendship and support; lived in Düsseldorf, 1835; contracted a spinal illness, and returned to Detmold. Died: 12 September 1836.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Werke und Briefe, edited by Alfred Bergmann. 6 vols., 1960–73.
Werke, edited by Roy C. Cowen. 3 vols., 1975–77.

Plays

- Herzog Theodor von Gothland* (produced 1892). In Dramatische Dichtungen, 1827.
Scherz, Satire, Ironie und tiefere Bedeutung (produced 1876). In Dramatische Dichtungen, 1827; translated as Comedy, Satire, Irony and Deeper Meaning, 1955.
Marius und Sulla (produced 1936). In Dramatische Dichtungen, 1827.
Nannette und Maria (produced 1914). In Dramatische Dichtungen, 1827.
Dramatische Dichtungen. 2 vols., 1827.
Don Juan und Faust (produced 1829). 1829; translated 1963.
Die Hohenstaufen I: Kaiser Friedrich Barbarossa (produced 1875). 1829
Die Hohenstaufen II: Kaiser Heinrich der Sechste (produced 1875). 1830.
Napoleon; oder, Die hundert Tage (produced in a shortened version, 1869; complete version produced 1895). 1831.
Aschenbrödel (produced 1937). 1835.
Kosciuszko (incomplete; produced 1940). 1835.
Hannibal (produced 1918). 1835.
Die Hermannsschlacht (produced 1934). 1838

*

Bibliography: Grabbe Bibliographie, by Alfred Bergmann, 1973.

Critical Studies: Grabbes Leben und Charakter by Karl Ziegler, 1885, reprinted 1981; Christian Dietrich Grabbe by R. von Gottschall, 1901; Christian Dietrich Grabbe: Sein Leben und seine Werke by O. Nieten, 1908, reprinted 1978; Die Glaubwürdigkeit der Zeugnisse für den Lebensgang und Charakter Christian Dietrich Grabbes, 1933, and Christian Dietrich Grabbe: Chronik seines Lebens, 1954, both by Alfred Bergmann; Grabbes Werke in der zeitgenössischen Kritik, 6 vols., 1958–66, and Grabbe in Berichten seiner Zeitgenossen, 1968, both edited by Alfred Bergmann; Grabbe: Glanz und Elend eines Dichters by F. Böttger, 1963; Idea and Reality in the Dramas of Christian Dietrich Grabbe by A.W. Hornsey, 1966; Christian Dietrich Grabbe by W. Steffens, 1966, revised edition, 1972; The Dramas of Christian Dietrich Grabbe by R.A. Nicholls, 1969; Grabbes Dramenformen by W. Hegele, 1970; Christian Dietrich Grabbe by R.C. Cowen, 1972; Deutung und Dokumentation: Studien zum Geschichtsdrama Christian Dietrich Grabbes, 1973, and Brecht und Grabbe: Rezeption eines dramatischen Erbes, 1979, both by Hans-Werner Nieschmidt; Destruktion und utopische Gemeinschaft. Zur Thematik und Dramaturgie des Heroischen im Werk Christian Dietrich Grabbes by Manfred Schneider, 1973; Grabbe-Studien by Alfred Bergmann, 1977; Byron und Grabbe: Ein geistesgeschichtlicher Vergleich by Ulrich Wesche, 1978; Grabbe und sein Verhältnis zur Tradition by David Horton, 1980; Geschichte und Gesellschaft in den Dramen Christian Dietrich Grabbes by Detlev Kopp, 1982; Christian Dietrich Grabbe: Leben, Werk, Wirkung by Lothar Ehrlich, 1983; Literaturrezeption und historische Krisenerfahrung: Die Rezeption der Dramen Christian Dietrich Grabbes 1827–1945 by M. Vogt, 1983; Grabbe im Dritten Reich. Zum nationalsozialistischen Grabbe-Kult, 1986, and Christian Dietrich Grabbe: Ein Symposium, 1987, both edited by W. Broer and W. Kopp; Die Logik von Zerstörung und Grössenphantasie in den Dramen Christian Dietrich Grabbes by Antonio Cortesi, 1986; Christian Dietrich Grabbe: Leben und Werk by Lothar Ehrlich, 1986;

Grabbes Gegenentwürfe: Neue Deutungen seiner Dramen edited by W. Freund, 1986; Christian Dietrich Grabbe by Ladislaus Löb, 1996; Christian Dietrich Grabbe: Dramatiker ungelöster Widersprüche by Ron C. Cowen, 1998; Lachen der Verzweigung: Grabbe, ein Leben by Jörg Aufenanger, 2001.

* * *

“What is to become of a person whose first memory is taking an old murderer for a walk in the open air?,” Christian Dietrich Grabbe asked Karl Immermann in a reminiscence about his childhood. While the question, as usual with Grabbe, contained an overstatement of the truth, the answer is that he became one of Germany’s major dramatists. He was described by Sigmund Freud as “an original and rather peculiar poet,” by Heine as “a drunken Shakespeare,” and by Immermann as both “a wild, ruined nature” and “an outstanding talent.” Although the image of a flawed genius, which dogged Grabbe in his lifetime, still persists, the irregularities of his plays are now more often regarded as an integral part of their originality.

The only child of the local jailer, Grabbe felt oppressed and alienated in his provincial home town of Detmold where, as he wrote to Ludwig Tieck, “an educated person is looked upon as an inferior kind of fattened ox” (letter of 29 August 1823). Physically sickly and emotionally unstable, swinging between sullen shyness and aggressive self-assertion, arrogantly demanding recognition but unwilling to please or to conform, uncouth in company, erratic in his post as army legal officer, entangled in a destructive marriage, and precipitating an early death by excessive drinking, he appeared as the archetype of the dissolute bohemian artist. While it is not clear how far his “bizarreness” was natural or assumed in order to shock, the “Grabbe legend” soon became confused with, and has often overshadowed, his work.

After his death Grabbe was forgotten owing to the classical orientation of literary fashion until later in the 19th century when both nationalists and naturalists rediscovered him as a kindred spirit. In the 20th century, expressionists welcomed him as a fellow-outcast from bourgeois society, dadaists and surrealists acclaimed him as another rebel against rationality, the Nazis celebrated him as a champion of “blood and soil,” and Brecht placed him alongside J.M.R. Lenz and Georg Büchner in the “non-Aristotelian” strain leading from the Elizabethans to his own Marxist epic theatre. On the German stage he was first adopted in the 1870s, revived in the early 1920s and late 1930s, and finally included in the standard repertory—chiefly with Scherz, Satire, Ironie und tiefere Bedeutung (Comedy, Satire, Irony and Deeper Meaning) and Napoleon; oder, Die hundert Tage [Napoleon, or, The Hundred Days]*—*in the 1950s, although he is still largely unknown in other countries.

In philosophical terms Grabbe is generally seen—together with Byron, Lamartine, Leopardi, and Heine—as the product of a period in which idealism was superseded by materialism, with young writers facing a spiritual void in a mood of post-romantic scepticism and melancholy. His early plays—particularly Herzog Theodor von Gothland and Comedy, Satire, Irony and Deeper Meaning, a gothic melodrama and a black comedy—reveal the despair of “intellect spent and emotion shattered” (letter to George Ferdinand Kettembeil, 4 May 1827). A similar disillusionment awakens superhuman desires in Don Juan und Faust (Don Juan and Faust)—his only play to be performed while he was alive—which “glorifies the tragic fall of the sensualist and the metaphysician” alike (letter to Christian von Meien, 6 January 1829). Nihilism also underlies his later plays—notably Napoleon and Hannibal—which blend the longing for powerful heroes with a sense of futility in view of the baseness of human nature and the impermanence of all things. Current affairs were of little interest to him. Thus he abandoned a trendily patriotic Hohenstaufen cycle after two instalments on the Emperors Barbarossa and Heinrich VI, while his last play, Die Hermannsschlacht [Arminius’s Battle], was inspired by his “best childhood memories” (letter to Louise Grabbe, 8 January 1835) of its setting in the Teutoburg Forest near Detmold, rather than by the chauvinism traditionally associated with the topic. Nevertheless, his pessimism and cynicism can be interpreted as an oblique response to the uncongenial socio-political conditions of the “Restauration” era.

By common consent Grabbe’s prime achievement consists in his innovations in historical drama. Unlike the historical plays of Schiller and his followers, which were classical in style and idealistic in message, his are prosaic in language, episodic in structure, and realistic in outlook. They portray history as determined not by ideas or individuals but by mass movements and the contingencies of time, place, and circumstance. Foreshadowed in Marius und Sulla, further developed in Die Hohenstaufen, and culminating in Napoleon and Hannibal, his re-creation of the broad flow of history itself has been much admired. He was hardly exaggerating when—referring to Napoleon but with his historical drama as a whole in mind—he claimed to have brought about “a dramatic-epic-revolution” (letter to Kettembeil, 25 February 1831).

Grabbe’s “revolution” in historical drama involved a revolutionary handling of drama as such. Dismissed in the past as signs of ineptitude, capriciousness, or a pathological psyche, his approaches now seem eminently modern. Teeming with incongruities and distortions, deliberately avoiding harmony or beauty, his disjointed actions, ambiguous characters, and dissonant dialogues not only express the conflicts he experienced in his own age but anticipate the “open” form and “absurd” content favoured by dramatists today.

Commenting on Napoleon, Grabbe once declared: “I haven’t taken any trouble over its shape as a drama. The present stage doesn’t deserve it” (letter to Kettembeil, 2 October 1830). On another occasion, however, he noted: “Drama is not bound to the stage . . . the proper theatre is—the imagination of the reader” (letter to Wolfgang Menzel, 15 January 1831). We cannot tell whether Grabbe’s refusal to compromise with the stage resulted from his anger over the theatrical conventions of his day or from more general doubts about theatrical production as a vehicle for poetic utterances. If the latter is true, then the paradox of a born dramatist who does not believe in theatre could be the key to both the successes and the failures of this maverick in the evolution of German drama.

—Ladislaus Löb

GRASS, Günter (Wilhelm)

Born: Danzig, Germany (now Gdansk, Poland), 16 October 1927. Education: Educated at Volksschule and Gymnasium, Danzig; trained as stone mason and sculptor; attended Academy of Art, Düsseldorf, 1948–52, and State Academy of Fine Arts, Berlin, 1953–55. Military Service: Served in World War II: prisoner of war, Marienbad, Czechoslovakia, 1945–46. Family: Married 1) Anna Margareta Schwarz in 1954, three sons and one daughter; 2) Ute Grunert in 1979. Career: Worked as farm labourer, miner, apprentice stonemason, jazz musician; speech writer for Willy Brandt when Mayor of West Berlin; writer-in-residence, Columbia University, New York, 1966; also artist and illustrator; co-editor, L, since 1976, and Verlages L'80, publishing house, since 1980. Member, Gruppe 47. Lives in Berlin, Germany. Awards: Süddeutscher Rundfunk Lyrikpreis, 1955; Gruppe 47 prize, 1958; Berlin Critics prize, 1960; City of Bremen prize, 1960 (withdrawn); Foreign Book prize (France), 1962; Büchner prize, 1965; Fontane prize, 1968; Theodor Heuss prize, 1969; Mondello prize (Palermo), 1977; Carl von Ossietzky medal, 1977; International literature prize, 1978; Alexander Majkowski medal, 1978; Vienna literature prize, 1980; Feltrinelli prize, 1982; Leonhard Frank ring, 1988. Honorary doctorate: Kenyon College, Gambier, Ohio, 1965; Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1976; Adam Mickiewicz University, Poznan; Nobel prize for literature, 1999. Member: Member, 1963, and president, 1983–86 (resigned), Academy of Art, Berlin; American Academy of Arts and Sciences.

PUBLICATIONS

Fiction

Danziger Trilogie. 1980; as The Danzig Trilogy, translated by Ralph Manheim, 1987.
Die Blechtrommel. 1959; as The Tin Drum, translated by Ralph Manheim, 1962.
Katz und Maus. 1961; as Cat and Mouse, translated by Ralph Manheim, 1963; as Cat and Mouse and Other Writings, edited by A. Leslie Willson, 1994.
Hundejahre. 1963; as Dog Years, translated by Ralph Manheim, 1965.
Geschichten (as Artur Knoff). 1968. Örtlich betäubt. 1969; as Local Anaesthetic, translated by Ralph Manheim, 1969.
Aus dem Tagebuch einer Schnecke. 1972; as From the Diary of a Snail, translated by Ralph Manheim, 1973.
Der Butt. 1977; as The Flounder, translated by Ralph Manheim, 1978.
Das Treffen in Telgte. 1979; as The Meeting at Telgte, translated by Ralph Manheim, 1981.
Kopfgeburten; oder, Die Deutschen sterben aus. 1980; as Headbirths; or, The Germans Are Dying Out, translated by Ralph Manheim, 1982.
Die Rättin. 1986; as The Rat, translated by Ralph Manheim, 1988.
Unkenrufe. 1992; as The Call of the Toad, translated by Ralph Manheim, 1992.
Ein weites Feld: Roman. 1995.
Auf einem anderen Blatt: Zeichnungen. 1999.

Plays

Hochwasser (produced 1957). 1963; as Flood, translated by Ralph Manheim, in Four Plays, 1967.
Onkel, Onkel (produced 1958). 1965; as Onkel, Onkel, translated by Ralph Manheim, in Four Plays, 1967. Noch zehn Minuten his Buffalo (produced 1959). In Theaterspiele, 1970; as Only Ten Minutes to Buffalo, translated by Ralph Manheim, in Four Plays, 1967.
Beritten hin und zurück (produced 1959).

Die bösen Köche (produced 1961). In Theaterspiele, 1970; as The Wicked Cooks, translated by A. Leslie Willson, in Four Plays, 1967.

Goldmäuschen (produced 1964).

Die Plebejer proben den Aufstand (produced 1966). 1966; as The Plebeians Rehearse the Uprising, translated by Ralph Manheim, 1966.

Four Plays (includes Flood; Onkel Onkel; Only Ten Minutes to Buffalo; The Wicked Cooks). 1967.

Davor (produced 1969). In Theaterspiele, 1970; as Max, translated by A. Leslie Willson and Ralph Manheim, 1972.

Theaterspiele (includes Noch zehn Minuten bis Buffalo; Hochwasser; Onkel, Onkel; Die Plebejer proben den Aufstand; Davor). 1970. Die Blechtrommel als Film (screenplay), with Volker Schlöndorff. 1979.

Screenplays: Katz und Maus, 1967; Die Blechtrommel, with Volker Schlöndorff, 1979.

Ballet Scenarios: Fünf Köche, 1957; Stoffreste, 1959; Die Vogelscheuchen, 1970.

Radio Plays: Zweiunddreissig Zähne, 1959; Noch zehn Minuten bis Buffalo, 1962; Eine öffentliche Diskussion, 1963; Die Plebejer proben den Aufstand, 1966; Hochwasser, 1977.

Verse

Die Vorzüge der Windhühner. 1956.

Gleisdreieck. 1960.

Selected Poems, translated by Michael Hamburger and Christopher Middleton. 1966; as Poems of Günter Grass, 1969.

März. 1966.

Ausgefragt. 1967; as New Poems, translated by Michael Hamburger, 1968.

Danach. 1968.

Die Schweinekopfsülze. 1969.

Gesammelte Gedichte. 1971.

Mariazuehren/Hommage à Marie/Inmarypraise. 1973; as Inmarypraise, translated by Christopher Middleton, 1974.

Liebe geprüft. 1974.

Mit Sophie in die Pilze gegangen. 1976; revised edition, 1987.

In the Egg and Other Poems (bilingual edition), translated by Michael Hamburger and Christopher Middleton. 1977.

Als vom Butt nur die Gräte geblieben war. 1977.

Kinderlied: Verse and Etchings. 1982.

Nachruf auf einen Handschuh: Sieben Radierungen und ein Gedicht. 1982.

Ach, Butt, dein Märchen geht böse aus. 1983.

Gedichte. 1985.

Die Rättin: 3 Radierungen und 1 Gedicht. 1985.

Die Gedichte 1955–1986. 1988.

Tiersechutz. 1990.

Novemberland: 13 Sonnette. 1993.

Other

O Susanna: Ein Jazzbilderbuch: Blues, Balladen, Spirituals, Jazz, with H. Geldmacher and H. Wilson. 1959.

Die Ballerina. 1963.

Dich singe ich Demokratie (pamphlets). 5 vols., 1965.

Der Fall Axel C. Springer am Beispiel Arnold Zweig. 1967.

Briefe über die Grenze; Versuch eines Ost-West-Dialogs, with Pavel Kohout. 1968.

Über meinen Lehrer Döblin und andere Vorträge. 1968.

Ausgewählte Texte, Abbildungen, Faksimiles, Bio-Bibliographie, edited by Theodor Wieser. 1968; as Porträt und Poesie, 1968.

Über das Selbstverständliche: Reden, Aufsätze, Offene Briefe, Kommentare. 1968; revised and enlarged edition as Über das Selbstverständliche: Politische Schriften, 1969; translated in part by Ralph Manheim, as Speak Out! Speeches, Open Letters, Commentaries, 1969.

Die Schweinekopfsülze. 1969.

Originalgraphik. 1970.

Dokumente zur politischen Wirkung, edited by Heinz Ludwig Arnold and Franz Josef Görtz. 1971.

Der Schriftsteller als Bürger—eine Siebenjahresbilanz. 1973.

Der Bürger und seine Stimme. 1974.

Denkzettel: Politische Reden und Aufsätze 1965–76. 1978.

Aufsätze zur Literatur. 1980.

Werkverzeichnis der Radierungen (exhibition catalogue). 1980.

Bin ich nun Schreiber; oder, Zeichner? (exhibition catalogue). 1982.

Vatertag (lithographs). 1982.

Zeichnen und Schreiben: das bildnerische Werk des Schriftstellers Günter Grass:
Zeichnungen und Texte 1954–1977. 1982; as Drawings and Words 1954–1977, translated by Michael Hamburger and Walter Arndt, 1983.

Radierungen und Texte 1972–1982. 1984; as Etchings and Words 1972–1982, translated by Michael Hamburger and others, 1985.

Günter Grass: Lithographien: 19. Juni bis 24. Juli 1983 (exhibition catalogue). 1983.

Die Vernichtung der Menschheit hat begonnen. 1983.

Widerstand lernen: Politische Gegenreden 1980–1983. 1984.

Geschenkte Freiheit: Rede zum 8. Mai 1945. 1985.

On Writing and Politics, 1967–1983 (selection), translated by Ralph Manheim. 1985.

Erfolgreiche Musterreden für den Bürgermeister. 1986.

In Kupfer, auf Stein. 1986.

Werkausgabe, edited by Volker Neuhaus. 10 vols., 1987.

Radierungen, Lithographien, Zeichnungen, Plastiken, Gedichte (exhibition catalogue). 1987.

Es war einmal ein Land: Lyrik und Prosa, Schlagzeug und Perkussion, with Günter "Baby" Sommer. 1987.

Zunge Zeigen (travel). 1988; as Show Your Tongue, translated by John E. Woods, 1989.

Skizzenbuch. 1989.

Meine grüne Wiese: Kurzprosa. 1989.

Wenn wir von Europa sprechen: ein Dialog, with Françoise Giroud. 1989.

Alptraum und Hoffnung: zwei Reden vor dem Club of Rome, with T. Aitmatow. 1989.

Deutscher Lastenausgleich: wider das dumpfe Einheitsgebot: Reden und Gespräche. 1990; as Two States—One Nation? The Case Against Reunification, translated by Krishna Winston and A.S. Wensinger, 1990.

Totes Holz: Ein Nachruf. 1990.

Ausstellung Günter Grass, Kahlschlag in unseren Köpfen (1990–1991 Berlin) (exhibition catalogue). 1990.

Deutschland, einig Vaterland? Ein Streitgespräch, with Rudolph Augstein. 1990.

Erfolgreiche Mustergrussworte und Musterbriefe für Bürgermeister und Kommunalpolitiker. 1990.

Droht der deutsche Einheitsstaat?. 1990.

Ein Schnäppchen namens DDR: Letzte Reden vorm Glockengeläut. 1990.

Schreiben nach Auschwitz: Frankfurter Poetik-Vorlesung. 1990.

Gegen die verstreichende Zeit: Reden, Aufsätze und Gespräche 1989–1991. 1991.

Vier Jahrzehnte: Ein Werkstattbericht, edited by G. Fritze Margull. 1991.

Editor, with Elisabeth Borchers and Klaus Roehler, Luchterhands Loseblatt Lyrik: eine Auswahl. 2 vols., 1983.

*

Bibliography: Günter Grass: A Bibliography 1955–1975 by Patrick O'Neill, 1976; Günter Grass in America: The Early Years edited by Ray Lewis White, 1981; in Erstausgaben deutscher Dichtung, 1992.

Critical Studies: Günter Grass: A Critical Essay by Norris W. Yates, 1967; Günter Grass by W. Gordon Cunliffe, 1969; Grass by Kurt Lothar Tank, 1969; A Grass Symposium edited by A. Leslie Willson, 1971; Günter Grass by Irène Leonard, 1974; A Mythic Journey: Günter Grass's Tin Drum by Edward Diller, 1974; Günter Grass by Keith Miles, 1975; The "Danzig Trilogy" of Günter Grass by John Reddick, 1975; The Writer and Society: Studies in the Fiction of Günter Grass and Heinrich Böll by Charlotte W. Ghurye, 1976; Günter Grass: The Writer in a Pluralist Society by Michael Hollington, 1980; Adventures of a Flounder: Critical Essays on Günter Grass' "Der Butt" edited by Gertrude Bauer Pickar, 1982; The Narrative Works of Günter Grass: A Critical Interpretation, 1982, and Grass: Die Blechtrommel, 1985, both by Noel L. Thomas; The Fisherman and His Wife: Günter Grass's "The Flounder" in Critical Perspective edited by Siegfried Mews, 1983; Günter Grass by Ronald Hayman, 1985; Günter Grass by Richard H. Lawson, 1985; Grass and Grimmelshausen: Günter Grass's "Das Treffen in Telgte" and Rezeptionstheorie by Susan C. Anderson, 1986; Critical Essays on Günter Grass edited by Patrick O'Neill, 1987; Understanding Günter Grass by Alan Frank Keele, 1988; Günter Grass's "Der Butt": Sexual Politics and the Male Myth of History edited by Philip Brady, Timothy McFarland, and John J. White, 1990; Günter Grass's Use of Baroque Literature by Alexander Weber, 1995; Distorted Reflections: The Public and Private Uses of the Author in the Work of Uwe Johnson, Günter Grass and Martin Walser, 1965–1975 by Stuart Taberner, 1998; Günter Grass Revisited by Patrick O'Neill, 1999; The Life and Work of Günter Grass: Literature, History, Politics by Julian Preece, 2001.

* * *

Günter Grass has shown in his novels that he is one of the most acute observers and critics of West Germany. After beginning in the 1950s with short prose pieces, poems, and plays in the then dominant "absurd" style, he made a dramatic impact on the literary scene with Die Blechtrommel (The Tin Drum), Katz und Maus (Cat and Mouse), and Hundejahre (Dog Years). These were later named the Danziger Trilogie (The Danzig Trilogy) after Grass's native city which, detached and distant like Joyce's Dublin, became the prism through which he conveyed his vision of the world about him. In Danzig, with its mixed German and Polish population, World War II began. The city was a paradigmatic setting for the gradual growth of Nazism amid the banality of the petty bourgeoisie, and symbolized the lost homelands from which millions of Germans would be forever exiled after 1945. In this picaresque trilogy Grass, with great zest and wide-ranging scope, imaginatively investigated both recent German history—the monstrous crimes of the Nazis, the acquiescence and cowardice of the ordinary citizen, and contemporary post-war reality—the suppression of guilt, economic reconstruction and the return to affluence and complacency, the loss of moral values. Inevitably Grass became identified with the new generation of critical realists, which included Heinrich Böll and Martin Walser, who implacably satirized the faults and errors of their fellow-countrymen and untiringly reminded them of the guilty involvement in Nazi Germany they were eager to forget.

Grass's sense of social justice and his contentious nature took him into the political arena where he threw his authority and weight behind the Social Democratic Party in the general elections of the 1960s. His personal friend Willy Brandt became Chancellor in 1969 and Grass's fiery, hard-hitting campaign speeches, open letters, and commentaries were variously published in Über das Selbstverständliche (Speak Out!) and Der Bürger und seine Stimme [The Citizen and His Voice]. The creative work accompanying this intense activity was also coloured by Grass's political commitment; the play Davor (Max) and the novel Örtlich betäubt (Local Anaesthetic) thematize the dominant preoccupations of intellectual and public life, namely the war in Vietnam and radical student protest in German universities. Though imbued with socialist ideas Grass stopped short of violence and destruction, advocating reform rather than revolution, practical measures for eradicating injustice rather than ideological posturings.

The anti-ideological scepticism of Grass's political stance is articulated in the novel Aus dem Tagebuch einer Schnecke (From the Diary of a Snail), which charts the author's reflections on his active participation in the election campaign of 1969 as well as telling the fictional story of the teacher Ott, "nicknamed Doubt," who resisted the Nazis and clandestinely helped the persecuted Jews to the best of his ability. During the mid-1970s Grass seemed to be out of tune with the more extreme progressive forces in Germany and his literary talents appeared to lie dormant and inactive. In fact this proved to be the period of gestation of another epic masterpiece. Der Butt (The Flounder) incorporates so many autobiographical details that the blurring of the distinction between author and narrator already initiated in From the Diary of a Snail is here completed. The Flounder is a complementary piece to The Danzig Trilogy; where the latter focuses on the enormities of contemporary events, The Flounder embraces in its narrative structure the whole sweep of German social and political history. The perennial human endeavour to ascribe progress and meaning to historical process as well as the more topical question of feminism and the secular domination of women by men are central themes given expression by Grass.

In the "fictional" work, Kopfgeburten; oder, Die Deutschen sterben aus (Headbirths; or, The Germans Are Dying Out), Grass displayed his political persona once more, thematizing the massive and urgent problems facing the industrialized nations: energy crisis, the threat of nuclear war, a declining birth-rate, the Third World. Yet, despite all his concern as a citizen with the struggles of the real world, Grass's faith in the significance of literature and the aesthetic dimension still shines through; he maintains that even in the most catastrophic destruction of civilization "a hand holding a pen would reach up out of the rubble."

Political concerns of national and global proportions have continued as fictional and polemical themes in Grass's subsequent work.

Die Rättin (The Rat) envisaged a dystopian world following a nuclear catastrophe where the human race, in its self-destructive hubris, has appropriately been superseded by pullulating rodents. His most recent novel, Unkenrufe (The Call of the Toad), also revels in near-cloacal and lugubriously funereal imagery, returning to Grass's beloved Danzig to re-enact the historically fraught and bitter relations between Germany and Poland. Grass encapsulated his nostalgia in the love-affair of an older couple (Alexander, the German, and his Polish mistress, Alexandra) who found a Cemetery Society to enable the German dead to at least rest in graves in the city from where they had been driven. But the story ends in tragedy.

Grass spent some time in Calcutta during 1986 and 1987, and expressed in Zunge Zeigen (Show Your Tongue) his deep horror and shame at the chaotic world of filth, violence, and death he encountered there. The inexorable process of merging the two Germanies that got under way in 1989 provoked violent opposition from Grass, who protested vehemently in Deutscher Lastenausgleich: wider das dumpfe Einheitsgebot (Two States—One Nation?) and Ein Schnäppchen namens DDR [The GDR, a Real Snip] at the juggernaut of reunification, its nationalistic repercussions and the cynically arrogant takeover of Eastern Länder by the Federal Republic. Going against the tide of public opinion Grass prophesied that nothing but ill would result from the euphoria and complacency of an inflated Germany situated at the heart of a Europe in flux.

—Arrigo V. Subiotto

See the essay on The Tin Drum.

GRIBOEDOV, Aleksandr (Sergeevich)

Also known as Alexander Griboyedov. Born: Moscow, Russia, 15 January 1795. Education: Educated at the University of Moscow, 1806–08, graduated in law; education interrupted by Napoleon's invasion of Russia, 1812. Military Service: Joined the Moscow hussars (General Kologryvov's reserve), 1812, but saw no military action; discharged, 1816. Family: Married daughter of the poet Prince Aleksandr Chavchavadze in 1828. Career: Joined Ministry of Foreign Affairs in St. Petersburg, 1816: diplomatic secretary to Russian legation in Persia, 1818, and to General A.P. Ermolov, 1821–23, both in Tiflis; diplomat in Tehran, 1819–21; returned to Georgia, 1825; arrested and imprisoned for four months on suspicion of involvement in the Decembrist uprising, 1825; returned to Caucasus after release, 1826; prepared the text of the Treaty of Turkmenchai, concluding the Russo-Persian war, 1826; Russian Minister to Persia, 1828. Died: Killed during the storming of the Russian embassy, Tehran, by a mob of insurgents, 11 February 1829.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Polnoe sobranie sochinenii [Collected Works]. 1911–17.
Sochineniia v stikhakh [Works], edited by I.N. Medvedeva. 1967.
Izbrannoe [Selections], edited by S.A. Fomicheva. 1978.

Plays

- Molodye suprugy* [The Young Married Couple], from a play by Creuzé de Lesser (produced 1815). 1815.
- Student* [Student], with Pavel A. Katenin (produced 1904). 1817.
- Svoia sem'ia; ili, Zamuzhniaia nevesta* [All in the Family; or, The Married Fiancée], with Aleksandr Shakovskoi and Nikolai Khmel'nitskii (produced 1818).
- Privornaia nevernost'* [False Infidelity], with A.A. Gendre, from a play by Nicolas Barthe (produced 1818). 1818.
- Proba intermedy* [Test of an Interlude] (produced 1819). In Polnoe sobranie sochinenii, 1911–17.
- Kto brat, kto sestra; ili, Obman za obmanom* [Who's the Brother, Who's the Sister; or, Deception for Deception], with Prince Peter Viazemskii and others (libretto; produced 1824).
- Gore ot uma* [Woes of Wit] (produced 1825; complete version produced 1831). 1825 (partial version); 1833 (censored version); 1861 (uncensored version); edited by D.P. Costello, 1951; translated as Intelligence Comes to Grief, in Anthology of Russian Literature, 2, edited by Leo Wiener, 1902; as The Misfortune of Being Clever, translated by S.W. Pring, 1914; as The Mischief of Being Clever, translated by Bernard Pares, 1925; as Wit Works Woe, in Masterpieces of Russian Drama, 1, edited by G.R. Noyes, 1933; as Chatsky, translated by Joshua Cooper, in Four Russian Plays, 1972, reprinted as The Government Inspector and Other Plays, 1990; as Woes of Wit: A Comedy in Four Acts, translated by Alan Shaw, 1992; as Distress from Cleverness: A Four-Act Comedy in Verse, translated by Beatrice Yusem, 1993.

*

Critical Studies: “The Murder of Griboedov” by D.P. Costello, in Oxford Slavonic Papers, 1958; Griboedov et la vie littéraire de son temps by Jean Bonamour, 1965; The Murder of Griboedov: New Materials by Evelyn J. Harden, 1979; Diplomacy and Murder in Tehran: Alexander Griboedov and Imperial Russia's Mission to the Shah of Persia by Laurence Kelly, 2002.

* * *

Aleksandr Griboedov's first dramatic production was a one-act comedy in alexandrines, Molodye suprugy [The Young Married Couple], adapted from Creuzé de Lesser's Le Secret du ménage, and produced in September 1815. A second play was Student, a three-act comedy in prose, written in 1817 in conjunction with Pavel A. Katenin, which satirized and parodied such older writers as Nikolai Karamzin (1766–1824), Vasilii Zhukovskii (1783–1852), and Konstantin Batiushkov (1787–1855). A third comedy, first produced in January 1818, Svoia sem'ia; ili, Zamuzhniaia nevesta [All in the Family; or, The Married Fiancée], was written in collaboration with the two most celebrated comic writers of his day, Aleksandr Shakovskoi and Nikolai Khmel'nitskii. It is, however, for his masterpiece Gore ot uma (Woes of Wit), a classically structured four-act comedy in free iambic verse, that Griboedov has won one of the most illustrious places in all Russian literature.

Woes of Wit is a tour de force of supple versification, brilliantly aphoristic repartee, and abundant topical allusion that also affords an unrivalled portrait of Moscow high society in about 1820. The verse form of the play, free iambs with arbitrary rhyme patterning, recalls strongly the form of the Russian fable, which in turn reflected the influence of Lafontaine. Adopted for a few plays in the early 19th century, free iambs were rarely used after Woes of Wit. In Griboedov's play they ranged from one to 13 syllables with nearly half the lines alexandrines.

Woes of Wit's repartee, in part reminiscent of Molière, depends both on sparkling colloquial language and virtuosic timing. After first hearing the play, Pushkin remarked that “half the lines are bound to become proverbs,” and it has indeed become the most quoted literary work in the Russian language. For contemporaries an additional quality was provided by the pithy topical references in which this comedy abounds, ranging from the Russian order of battle in 1813 to serf theatres, Carbonarism, freemasonry, and new educational ideas. In this respect Woes of Wit recalls the allusory and referential nature of Pushkin's almost contemporaneous novel in verse, Eugene Onegin. It was the topical allusions, with their generally liberal tenor, which meant the play could not be published in full until 1861, the year serfdom was abolished, although a censored version was first published in 1833. In the meantime some 40,000 manuscript copies are said to have circulated throughout Russia.

The Moscow aristocratic society in Woes of Wit is depicted as hospitable, relaxed, venial, superficially cultured, and, above all, politically conservative in the years preceding the Decembrist Uprising. Into it comes the alienated but undoubtedly heroic central protagonist Chatskii, “straight from the boat into a ball,” and it is the inevitable clash between on the one hand the clever, eloquent, tactless, and intolerant hero, who once loved the daughter of the house, and on the other the sleepily unprepared Muscovite society that lends the play its tension. Chatskii's qualities, positive and negative alike, have proved to be universal, and he has easily outlived contemporary literary heroes like Lermontov's Pechorin or, indeed, Onegin. His bewildered beloved Sofiia and her genial but nervous and cautious father Famusov (Mr. Rumours), her ambitious lickspittle suitor Molchalin (Mr. Silent), and arch-gossip and intriguer Repetilov (Mr. Reptilian Repeater), and the mindless soldier Skalozub (Mr. Teeth-barer) are all very convincingly characterized, while Sofiia's maid Liza is the only character to begin to match Chatskii's quick aphoristic wit.

Modern audiences, for whom the ubiquitous topical references are bound to be at least partially obscure, find the play's most enduring qualities to be the wittily portrayed clash of cultures between impetuous liberal youth and somnolent conservative society, but above all the use of richly colloquial syntax and vocabulary in conjunction with verse of the highest sophistication. Such qualities ensure that Griboedov's masterpiece will last as long as the Russian language itself.

—Arnold McMillin

See the essay on Woes of Wit.GRILLET, Alain Robbe

See ROBBE-GRILLET, Alain

GRILLPARZER, Franz

Born: Vienna, Austria, 15 January 1791. Education: Educated at Anna-Gymnasium, Vienna, 1800–07; studied law at University of Vienna, 1807–11. Family: Engaged for 50 years to Katharina Fröhlich. Career: Tutor in law studies to nephew of Graf von Seilern, 1812; unpaid assistant in court library, 1813; civil servant from 1814; appointed Theaterdichter, 1818; travelled to Italy, 1819, and to Germany, 1826, director of court archives, 1832; retired 1856, as Hofrat; created a member of the Herrenhaus (upper house of the Austrian parliament), 1861. Award: Honorary Doctorate: University of Leipzig, 1859. Member: Founder-member, Austrian Academy of Sciences, 1847. Died: 21 January 1872.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Sämtliche Werke, edited by August Sauer and Reinhold Backmann. 42 vols., 1909–48.

Sämtliche Werke, edited by Peter Frank and Karl Pörnbacher. 4 vols., 1960–65.

Werke, edited by Helmut Bachmaier. 1986–.

Plays

Die Ahnfrau (produced 1817). 1817; as The Ancestress, translated by Herman L. Spahr, 1938.

Sappho (produced 1818). 1819; as Sappho, translated by J. Bramsen, 1820; also translated by E.B. Lee, 1846; Lucy C. Cumming, 1855; E. Frothingham, 1876; Arthur Burkhard, 1953.

Das Goldene Vlies (trilogy; produced 1821). 1822; as Medea, translated by F.W. Thurstan and S.A. Wittmann, 1879, also translated by Arthur Burkhard, 1941; as The Golden Fleece, translated by Burkhard, 1942; as The Guest-Friend and The Argonauts, translated by Burkhard, 2 vols., 1942.

König Ottokars Glück und Ende (produced 1825). 1825; as Ottokar, translated by Thomas Carlyle, 1840; as King Ottokar, His Rise and Fall, translated by G. Pollack, 1907; also translated by Arthur Burkhard, 1932; Henry H. Stevens, 1938.

Ein treuer Diener seines Herrn (produced 1828). 1830; as A Faithful Servant of His Master, translated by Arthur Burkhard, 1941.

Des Meeres und der Liebe Wellen (produced 1831). 1839; edited by E.E. Pabst, 1967; edited by Mark Ward, 1981; as Hero and Leander, translated by Henry H. Stevens, 1938, also translated by Arthur Burkhard, 1962; as The Waves of Sea and Love, translated by Samuel Solomon, in Plays on Classic Themes, 1969.

Melusina, music by Konradin Kreutzer (produced 1833). 1833.

Der Traum ein Leben (produced 1834). 1840; edited by W.E. Yuill, 1955; as A Dream Is Life, translated by Henry H. Stevens, 1947.

Weh dem, der lügt (produced 1838). 1840; as Thou Shalt Not Lie, translated by Henry H. Stevens, 1939.

Esther (produced 1868). In Gesamtausgabe, 1872; as Esther, translated by Arthur Burkhard, with The Jewess of Toledo, 1953.

Ein Bruderzwist in Habsburg (produced 1872). In Gesamtausgabe, 1872; edited by Bruce Thompson, 1982; as Family Strife in Habsburg, translated by Arthur Burkhard, 1940.

Die Jüdin von Toledo (produced 1872). In Gesamtausgabe, 1872; as The Jewess of Toledo, translated by Arthur Burkhard, with Esther, 1953.

Libussa (produced 1874). In Gesamtausgabe, 1872; as Libussa, translated by Henry H. Stevens, 1941.

Fiction

Das Kloster bei Sandomir. In Aglaja, 1828; in Sämtliche Werke, 1930. Der arme Spielmann. In Iris, 1847; in Sämtliche Werke, 1930; as The Poor Musician, translated by A. Remy, 1914; as The Poor Fiddler, translated by Alexander and Elizabeth Henderson, 1969.

Verse

Tristia ex Ponto. In Vesta, 1827.

Gedichte, edited by P. von Matt. 1970.

Other

Selbstbiographie. 1872.

Gespräche und Charakteristiken seiner Persönlichkeit durch die Zeitgenossen, edited by August Sauer. 6 vols., 1904–16; supplementary volume, edited by Reinhold Backmann, 1941.

Tagebücher und Reiseberichte, edited by Klaus Geissler. 1981.

*

Critical Studies: Grillparzer, Lessing, and Goethe in the Perspective of European Literature by Fred. O. Nolte, 1938; Grillparzer: A Critical Biography (vol. 1 only) by Douglas Yates, 1946; The Inspiration Motif in the Works of Franz Grillparzer by Gisela Stein, 1955; The Plays of Grillparzer by George A. Wells, 1969; Grillparzer: A Critical Introduction by W.E. Yates, 1972; A Sense of Irony: An Examination of the Tragedies of Franz Grillparzer, 1976, and Franz Grillparzer, 1981, both by Bruce Thompson, and Essays on Grillparzer edited by Thompson and Mark Ward, 1978; Grillparzer's Aesthetic Theory by William Norman Boyd Mullan, 1979; The World as Theatre in the Works of Franz Grillparzer by Sybil Hitchman, 1979; Grillparzer's Der arme Spielmann: New Directions in Criticism edited by Clifford Albrecht Bernd, 1988; An Introduction to the Major Works of Franz Grillparzer by Ian F. Roe, 1991; Analysis of Franz Grillparzer's Dramas: Fate, Guilt, and Tragedy by Eva Wagner, 1992; The Federfuchser/Peppushers from Lessing to Grillparzer: A Study Focused on Grillparzer's Ein Bruderzwist in Habsburg by William C. Reeve, 1995; Franz Grillparzer: A Century of Criticism, 1995; Grillparzer's Libussa: The Tragedy of Separation by William C. Reeve, 1999.

* * *

Nothing ever went right for Franz Grillparzer, a fact he viewed with grim satisfaction. He was the archetypal Viennese grumbler, and a wealth of anecdote testifies to his melancholy and his crusty hypochondria. At 81, still beset by a conflict between literature and marriage, he died in the arms of his “eternal betrothed” Katharina Fröhlich, to whom he had been engaged for 50 years.

Grillparzer's writing is rooted in the rich cultural heritage of the multi-lingual Hapsburg Empire. As a child he marvelled at the musical fantasies and magical transformations of Viennese popular comedy in which the spectacular visual effects of the baroque survived in a naive form. His comedy Weh dem, der lügt (Thou Shalt Not Lie), in which a cook's boy rescues a Frankish bishop's nephew from the heathen Germans, barely, but humorously, managing not to perjure himself in the process, uses the fun and wealth of incident of popular comedy to make a moral point. Der Traum ein Leben (A Dream Is Life) translates the hero into a dream to live out his ambitions then brings him back to renounce the life of action because of the inevitable guilt it involves.

Grillparzer was, however, drawn to the more austere world of German classicism, and even visited Goethe in Weimar, with disastrous results for his always parlous self-confidence. He set three plays in the ancient world. Sappho, in which the heroine forsakes poetry for a young lover and commits suicide when he abandons her, and Des Meeres und der Liebe Wellen (The Waves of Sea and Love), in which a novice priestess forsakes religion, only to have her lover drown in the Hellespont when the high priest extinguishes the lamp she has lit to guide him, are lyrical, tragic verse dramas of the conflict between the spirit and the flesh. In Das Goldene Vlies (The Golden Fleece) there is a foretaste of Strindberg's sexual psychology in the clash of the exotic alien Medea with her husband Jason in his sophisticated Greek homeland, but the tame sagacity of Grillparzer's conclusion underlines the gap between Biedermeier Vienna and the tragic ferocity of Greece.

Grillparzer's finest achievements were his historical dramas in verse. He was a rationalist and a liberal whom the nationalism of the mid-century turned into a conservative. König Ottokars Glück und Ende (King Ottokar, His Rise and Fall) celebrates the first Hapsburg Holy Roman Emperor, Rudolf I. Ein treuer Diener seines Herrn (A Faithful Servant of His Master), on the theme of loyalty, is set in Hungary. Libussa dramatizes the legendary founding of Prague in Bohemia. The best of these Austrian dramas is Ein Bruderkrieg in Habsburg (Family Strife in Hapsburg) which unites Grillparzer's main themes in the drama of the self-abnegating, intellectual Emperor Rudolf II who struggles in vain to prevent the Reformation from splitting his empire. It was a plea for a supranational concept, and took on a new meaning when the empire was broken up in 1918. King Ottokar, with Ottokar von Horneck's hymn to Austria, is staged at the Burgtheater in Vienna on days of public celebration. But the Austrian national dramatist's complex language has defied translation and even in Germany his plays have never shown the power to move and entertain.

—Hugh Rorrison

See the essay on Family Strife in Hapsburg.

GRIMM, Jacob and Wilhelm

Jacob (Ludwig Karl) Grimm: Born: Hanau, Germany, 4 January 1785. Education: Educated at Kassel Lyceum, 1798–1802; University of Marburg, studied law, 1802–05. Career: Researcher for Friedrich Karl von Savigny in Paris, 1805; civil servant, secretariat of the War Office, Kassel, 1806; librarian for King Jérôme Bonaparte's private library, Wilhelmshöhe, 1808–14, co-editor with Wilhelm Grimm, Altdeutsche Wälder, 1813–16; legation secretary for the Hessian delegation at the Congress of Vienna, 1814–15; librarian, Kassel, 1816; chair, archaeology and librarianship, University of Göttingen, Hanover, 1830–37, dismissed from the university for political reasons by Ernst August in 1837; lived in Kassel, 1837–41; president, Conferences of Germanists, Frankfurt am Main, 1846, Lubeck, 1847; elected to the Frankfurt parliament, 1848. Awards: Order of Merit, 1842. Honorary doctorate: University of Marburg, 1819; Berlin University, 1828; Berslau University, 1829. Member: Academy of Science, Berlin, 1841. Died: 20 September 1863.

Wilhelm (Karl) Grimm: Born: Hanau, Germany, 24 February 1786. Education: Educated at Kassel Lyceum, 1798–1803; University of Marburg, 1803–06; law degree, 1806. Family: Married Henriette Dorothea Wild in 1825; one daughter and three sons. Career: Co-editor with Jacob Grimm, Altdeutsche Wälder, 1813–16; assistant librarian, electoral library, Kassel, 1814–29; professor, University of Göttingen, 1830, dismissed from the university for political reasons by Ernst August in 1837; lived in Kassel, 1837–41. Member: Academy of Science, Berlin, 1841. Awards: Honorary doctorate, Marburg University, 1819. Died: 16 December 1859.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Complete Works. 62 vols., 1974–.

Die älteste Märchensammlung der Brüder Grimm, edited by Heinz Rölleke. 1975.

Grimm's Tales for Young and Old: The Complete Stories, translated by Ralph Manheim. 1977.

The Complete Fairy Tales of the Brothers Grimm, edited and translated by Jack Zipes. 2 vols., 1987.

Fiction

Kinder- und Hausmärchen. 2 vols, 1812–15; revised editions, 3 vols., 1819–22 (includes Anmerkungen zu den einzelnen Märchen), 1837, 1840, 1843, 1850, 1857; edited by Friedrich Panzer, 1975, and by Heinz Rölleke, 1982; numerous subsequent translations including as German Popular Stories, translated by Edgar Taylor, 2 vols., 1823–26; revised edition as Gammer Grethel; or, German Fairy Tales and Popular Stories, 1839; as Home Stories, translated by Matilda Louisa Davis, 1855; Grimm's Popular Stories, 1868; as Grimm's Fairy Tales, translated by H.H.B. Paull, 1872; also translated by L.L. Weedon, 1898, Edgar Lucas, 1900, Beatrice Marshall, 1900, N.J. Davidson, 1906, Ernest Beeson, 1916, and Peter Carter, 1982; as Grimm's Goblins, 1876; as The Complete Grimm's Fairy Tales, translated by Margaret Hunt, 1944, reprinted 1975; as Grimm Tales by Tim Supple, 1996; as Grimm's Grimmest, edited by Marisa Bulzone and Stefan Matzig, 1997.

Deutsche Sagen. 1816–18; as The German Legends of the Brothers Grimm, edited and translated by Donald Ward, 1981.

Other

Deutsches Wörterbuch, with others. 32 vols., 1854–1961.

Freundesbriefe von Wilhelm und Jacob Grimm: Mit Anmerkungen, edited by Alexander Reifferscheid. 1878.

Briefwechsel des Freiherrn K.H.G. von Meusebach mit Jacob und Wilhelm Grimm. 1880.

Briefwechsel zwischen Jacob und Wilhelm Grimm aus der Jugendzeit, edited by Herman Grimm and Gustav Hinrichs. 1881; revised edition, edited by Wilhelm Schoof, 1963.

Briefwechsel der Gebrüder Grimm mit nordischen Gelehrten, edited by Ernst Schmidt. 1885.

Briefwechsel zwischen Jacob und Wilhelm Grimm, Dahmann und Gervinus, edited by Eduard Ippel. 2 vols., 1885–86.

Briefe der Brüder Jacob und Wilhelm Grimm an Georg Friedrich Benecke aus den Jahren 1808–1829, edited by Wilhelm Müller. 1889.

- Briefwechsel F. Lückes mit dell Brüdern Jacob und Wilhelm Grimm.* 1891.
- Briefe der Brüder Grimm an Paul Wigand,* edited by Edmund Stengel. 1910.
- Briefwechsel Johann Kaspar Bluntschli mit Jacob Grimm.* 1915.
- Briefe der Brüder Grimm,* edited by Albert Leitzmann and Hans Gürtler. 1923.
- Briefwechsel der Brüder Jacob und Wilhelm Grimm mit Karl Lachmann,* edited by Albert Leitzmann. 2 vols., 1927.
- Briefwechsel zwischen Jacob Grimm und Karl Goedeke,* edited by Johannes Bolte. 1927.
- Briefe der Brüder Grimm an Savigny,* edited by Wilhelm Schoof. 1953.
- Unbekannte Briefe der Brüder Grimm,* edited by Wilhelm Schoof. 1960.
- John Mitchell Kemble and Jacob Grimm: A Correspondence 1832–1852.* 1971.
- Briefwechsel der Bruder Grimm mit Hans Georg von Hammerstein,* edited by Carola Gottzmann. 1985.
- Editors, Die beiden ältesten deutschen Gedichte aus dem achten Jahrhundert: Das Lied von Hildebrand und Hadubrand und das Weissenbrunner Gebet. 1812.
- Editors, Lieder der alien Edda. 1815.
- Editors, Der arme Heinrich, by Hartmann von Aue. 1815.
- Editors and translators, Irische Elfenmärchen, by Thomas Crofton Croker. 1826.

PUBLICATIONS BY JACOB GRIMM

Collections

- Reden und Aufsätze,* edited by Wilhelm Schoof. 1966.
- Selbstbiographie: Ausgewählte Schriften, Reden und Abhandlungen.* 1984.

Fiction

- Irmenstrasse und Irmensäule: Eine mythologische Abhandlung.* 1815.
- Deutsche Mythologie.* 3 vols., 1835–37; as Teutonic Mythology, translated by James Stevens Stallybrass, 4 vols., 1883–88.
- Frau Aventure klopft an Beneckes Thür.* 1842.
- Der Fundevogel: Ein Märlein.* 1845.

Other

- Über den altdeutschen Meistersang.* 1811.
- Deutsche Grammatik.* 4 vols., 1819–37.
- Zur Recension der deutschen Grammatik.* 1826.
- Deutsche Rechtsalterthümer.* 1828.
- Hymnorum veteris ecclesiae XXVI interpretatio Theodisca nunc primum edita.* 1830.
- Bericht . . . an die Hannoversche Regierung.* 1833.
- Reinhart Fuchs.* 1834.
- Über meine Entlassung* (pamphlet). 1838.
- Sendschreiben an Karl Lachmann über Reinhart Fuchs.* 1840.
- Über zwei entdeckte Gedichte aus der Zeit des deutschen Heidenthums.* 1842.
- Grammatik der Hochdeutschen Sprache unserer Zeit.* 1843.
- Deutsche Grenzalterthümer.* 1844.
- Über Diphthonge nach weggefallnen Consonanten.* 1845.

- Über Iornandes und die Geten: Eine in der Akademie der Wissenschaften am 5. März 1846 von Jacob Grimm gehaltene Vorlesung* (lecture). 1846.
- Geschichte der deutschen Sprache.* 2 vols., 1848.
- Über Marcellus Burdingalensis.* 1849.
- Das Wort des Besitzes: Eine linguistische Abhandlung.* 1850.
- Rede auf Lachmann, gehalten in der öffentlichen Sitzung der Akademie der Wissenschaften am 3. Juli 1851* (lecture). 1851.
- Über den Liebesgott: Gelesen in der Akademie am 6. Januar 1851* (lecture). 1851.
- Über den Ursprung der Sprache.* 1851.
- Über Frauennamen aus Blumen.* 1852.
- Über die Namen des Donners.* 1855.
- Über die Marcellischen Formeln,* with Adolf Pictet. 1855.
- Über den Personenwechsel in der Rede.* 1856.
- Über einige Fälle der Attraction.* 1858.
- Von Vertretung männlicher durch weibliche Namensformen.* 1858.
- Über Schule, Universität, Academie.* 1859.
- Über das Verbrennen der Leichen: Eine in der Academie der Wissenschaften am 29 November 1849. . .* (lecture). 1859.
- Rede auf Schiller, gehalten in der feierlichen Sitzung der König.* 1859.
- Rede auf Wilhelm Grimm und Rede über das Alter,* edited by Herman Grimm. 1863.
- Kleinere Schriften,* edited by Karl Victor Müllenhoff and Eduard Ippel. 8 vols., 1864–90.
- Briefwechsel zwischen Jacob Grimm und Friedrich David Graeter aus den Jahren 1810–1813,* edited by Hermann Fischer. 1877.
- Briefe an Hendrik Willem Tydeman: Mit einem Anhang und Anmerkungen,* edited by Alexander Reifferscheid. 1883.
- Briefwechsel von Jacob Grimm und Hoffmann von Fallersleben mit Henrik van Wyn: Nebst anderen Briefen zur deutschen Literatur,* edited by Karl Theodor Gaedertz. 1888.
- Kopitars Briefwechsel mit Jakob Grimm,* edited by Max Vasmer. 1938.
- Editor, Silva de romances viejos. 1815.
- Editor, Zur Recension der deutschen Grammatik. 1826.
- Editor, Taciti Germania edidit et qua as res Germanorum pertinere videntur e reliquo Tacitino oere excerpit. 1835.
- Editor, with Andreas Schmeller, Lateinische Gedichte des X. und XI. Jahrhunderts. 1838.
- Editor, Andreas und Elene. 1840.
- Editor, Gedichte des Mittelalters aus König Freidrich I., dem Staufer, und aus seiner, sowie der nächstfolgenden Zeit. 1844.
- Translator, Kleine serbische Grammatik, by Vuk Stefanovic Karadzic. 1824.

PUBLICATIONS BY WILHELM GRIMM

Other

- Über deutsche Runen.* 1821.
- Gråve Ruodolf: Ein Altdeutsches Gedicht.* 1828.
- Zur Literatur der Runen.* 1828.
- Bruchstücke aus einem Gedichte von Assundin.* 1829.
- Die deutsche Heldensage.* 1829.
- De Hildebrando antiquissimi carminis teutonici fragmentum.* 1830.
- Die Sage vom Ursprung der Christusbilder.* 1843.

Exhortatio ad plebem christianam Glossae Cassellanae: Über die Bedeutung der deutschen Fingernamen. 1848.
Über Freidank: Zwei Nachträge. 1850.
Altdeutsche Gespräche: Nachtrag. 1851.
Zur Geschichte des Reims. 1852.
Nachtrag zu den Casseler glossen. 1855.
Thierfabeln bei den Meistersängern. 1855.
Die Sage von Polyphem. 1857.
Kleinere Schriften, edited by Gustav Hinrichs. 4 vols., 1881–87.
Unsere Sprachlaute als Stimmbildner. 1897.
 Editor, Vridankes Bescheidenheit. 1834.
 Editor, Der Rosengarten. 1836.
 Editor, Ruolandes Liet. 1838.
 Editor, Wernher vom Niederrhein. 1839.
 Editor, Goldene Schmiede, by Konrad von Würzburg. 1840.
 Editor, Silvester, by Konrad von Würzburg. 1841.
 Editor, Athis und Prophlias: Mit Nachtrag. 2 vols., 1846–52.
 Editor, Altdeutsche Gespräche: Mit Nachtrag. 2 vols., 1851.
 Editor, with Bettina von Arnim and Karl August Varnhagen von Ense, Sämmtliche Werke, by Ludwig Achim von Arnim. 22 vols., 1853–56; revised edition, 21 vols., 1857; reprinted 1982.
 Editor, Bruchstücke aus einem unbekanntem Gedicht vom Rosengarten. 1860.
 Editor and translator, Drei altschottische Lieder. 1813.
 Translator, Aldänische Heldenlieder, Balladen und Märchen. 1811.
 Translator, Irische Land- und Seemärchen, by Thomas Crofton Croker, edited by Werner Moritz and Charlotte Oberfeld. 1886.

*

Bibliography: “Bibliographie der Briefe von und an Wilhelm und Jacob Grimm: Mit einer Einführung”, by Ludwig Denecke, in Aurora (43), 1983.

Critical Studies: Jacob Grimm: Aus seinem Leben, 1961, and Die Brüder Grimm in Berlin, 1964, both by Wilhelm Schoof; Der junge Jacob Grimm 1805–1819 by Gunhild Ginschel, 1967; The Brothers Grimm by Ruth Michaelis-Jena, 1970; Jacob Grimm und sein Bruder Wilhelm by Ludwig Denecke, 1971, and Die Brüder Grimm in Bildern ihrer Zeit, 1980, by Ludwig Denecke and Karl Schulte Kemminhausen; Paths Through the Forest: A Biography of the Brothers Grimm by Murray B. Peppard, 1971; Jacob Grimm’s Conception of German Studies by Peter F. Ganz, 1973; Brüder Grimm by Hermann Gerstner, 1973; The Uses of Enchantment: The Meaning and Importance of Fairy Tales by Bruno Bettelheim, 1977; The German Legends of the Brothers Grimm edited and translated by Donald Ward, 1981; One Fairy Story Too Many: The Brothers Grimm and Their Tales by John M. Ellis, 1983; Die Brüder Grimm: Leben, Werke, Zeit by Gabriele Seitz, 1984; Wilhelm Grimms Nibelungenkolleg edited by Else Ebel, 1985; Die Brüder Grimm in ihrer amtlichen und politischen Tätigkeit edited by Hans-Bernd Harder and Eckehard Kaufmann, 1985; Die Brüder Grimm: Dokumente ihres Lebens und Wirkens edited by Dieter Hennig and Bernhard Lauer, 1985; Die Märchen der Brüder Grimm by Heinz Rölleke, 1985; Die Märchenbrüder: Jacob und Wilhelm Grimm—ihr Leben und Wirken by Jürgen Weishaupt, 1985; Grimms’ Bad Girls and Bold Boys: The Moral and Social Vision of the Tales by Ruth B. Bottigheimer, 1987; The Hard Facts of the Grimms’ Fairy Tales by Maria M. Tatar, 1987; The Brothers Grimm and the Folktale edited by James M. McGlathery, 1988; The Brothers Grimm: From Enchanted Forests to the Modern World by Jack Zipes, 1988; The Grimm Brothers and the Germanic Past: International Bicentenary Symposium on the Brothers Grimm, 1990; The Brothers Grimm and Their Critics: Folktales and the Quest for Meaning by Christa Kamenetsky, 1992; The Reception of Grimms’ Fairy Tales: Responses, Reactions, Revisions, edited by Donald Haase, 1993; Grimm’s Fairy Tales: A History of Criticism on a Popular Classic by James M. McGlathery, 1994; The Sin-complex: A Critical Study of English Versions of the Grimms’ Kinder- und Hausmärchen in the Nineteenth Century by Martin Sutton, 1996; The Owl, the Raven and the Dove: The Religious Meaning of the Grimms’ Magic Fairy Tales by G. Ronald Murphy, 2000.

* * *

The Brothers Grimm, Jacob and Wilhelm, are universally known for their Tales (or Fairy Tales), the single most often translated and republished book in German. Inseparable in life as in legend, the Grimm brothers also co-founded three 19th-century academic disciplines: European historical linguistics, or philology; folklore studies; and German Germanistik—the study of the history of German culture, language, and literature. Finally the German Dictionary became their gigantic epitaph. It was initially planned as a small book for household use; “snowed under” with words, as he put it, Jacob had reached the letter F and, it is always said, the word Frucht (fruit), when he died. The Berlin Academy of Sciences did not complete the dictionary, which contains some 400,000 entries, until 1960.

Kinder- und Hausmärchen (Fairy Tales) was their first book—the shortened edition of 1825, illustrated by their brother Ludwig Emil, established it as a popular classic—and it is the only one of their major works, published jointly or singly, which does not have the word Deutsch (normally meaning “Germanic”) in the title. This may be regarded as a concession to the fact that most of the tales, and the motifs, too, are by no means German or indeed Germanic, but are international. Many are certainly ancient; but a high proportion are equally certainly of medieval origin. The Grimms took as much from older written sources as from oral ones. And at least some of their key “oral” informants were women of their own acquaintance, well-to-do, well-educated, and in a number of cases bilingual and notably talented, rather than belonging to the illiterate, unindividuated peasantry invoked by their prefaces.

If the Grimms failed to make these facts clear (and some of them are still controversial, as is the assessment of Wilhelm’s role as editor and writer), it is because their wider project was specifically a revival of Germanic culture, animated by a Romantic faith in a myth of history. This myth posited both an original state of linguistic and cultural unity (eventually located in the speakers of an “Indo-Germanic” original tongue from which, they thought, all other languages derived); and also a manifest destiny, not only of Germans but of the whole world, to return to that monolingual condition. This theory appears to imply that the rest of the world will return to its origins under German tutelage. Be that as it may, their life’s work was no matter of neutral scholarship. The Tales and the less popularly successful Deutsche Sagen (German Legends), were compilations of those “threads” of folk tradition which “finally link it directly to ancient times” (Wilhelm Grimm, preface to the Tales). These ancient times were then revived in ever more detail in the monumental editions of Old German texts, the compilations and exhaustive collations of material on the history of Germanic tribal religion and law, and the historical studies in grammar, vocabulary, and phonetics. Dedicating his Geschichte der deutschen Sprache [History of the Germanic Language] (1848)—a collection of diverse studies in ancient culture and religion, grammar and philology—to the patriotic historian Gervinus, Jacob Grimm called his work “thoroughly political” in the context of “our fatherland [which is] divided contrary to nature (unser widernatürlich geteiltes Vaterland).”

This was the same year as the European revolutions and of the first, short-lived German National Assembly in Frankfurt-am-Main, at which Jacob served as a deputy. Eleven years earlier, both brothers had been among seven professors dismissed from Göttingen after protesting against the King of Hanover’s suspension of the constitution. The brothers’ work embodied the nationalist aspirations of the Romantic generation. It proved unfortunately exploitable by later generations of aggressive nationalists. But the Grimms had no party politics: they were patriots and liberal constitutionalists, in the era of the Napoleonic Wars followed by the restoration of territorial principalities in the space left vacant by the end of the Holy Roman Empire. Their generation speculated eagerly about past and future German unity, freedom, and greatness. The brothers’ inspiration came from several sources. Since the 1770s, J.G. Herder had called for collections of folk (oral) traditions to be made, and the Grimms adopted his postulate that Völker (peoples/nations) were unconsciously unified collectives linked by language, custom, and history, which were now on the way to becoming conscious of their unity. The Volk had once spontaneously, without individual effort, brought forth poetry on a grand scale, poetry which now survived in precious fragments in early writing and in oral tradition. It was the task of present writers to (re)create cultural unity. Thus the Romantics of the 1790s had called for a “new mythology” (A.W. Schlegel) and set about constructing it out of the traces of past mythologies. This programme determined the Grimms’ lifelong work. Their collection of tales also followed in the immediate wake of their friends Achim von Armin and Clemens Brentano’s collection of songtexts, Des Knaben Wunderhorn (The Boy’s Magic Horn, 3 vols., 1806–8). There too—notoriously today—the “discovery” and “invention” of “national tradition” are inseparable.

Romantic historians, as A.W. Schlegel had put it, are “prophets facing backwards.” The Grimms were far from wanting merely to document the past, though they did much to develop historical methodology; they hoped to spur present and future creativity and to teach Germans to seek unity. They were peculiarly fitted by their personal background to become spokesmen for their generation (and in the Tales, spokesmen for later generations of mainly middle-class readers, parents and children, too). They coped with the traumatic early loss of their father by assuming joint responsibility for the family, which entailed unremitting labour in order to maintain their respectability. The energy animating their researches is that of the desire to retrieve their lost father, as much as the “lost” or “denatured” fatherland. The ethic promoted by the Tales—resourceful individualism tempered by a very strong sense of amicable, fraternal generosity—is that of a family determined, against the odds, to maintain if not enhance its social standing, as much as it is that of a quite narrowly middle-class nationalist movement struggling to make good a history of cultural division and decadence.

In Deutsche Grammatik [Germanic Grammar], Jacob—a more assiduous philologist and historian, though a much less gifted storyteller than Wilhelm—built on the work of the Danish philologist, Rasmus Rank, in order to formulate what has become known as “Grimm’s Law” of sound shifts in the transition from Indo-European to Germanic (2000 to 1000 BC). The poet Heinrich Heine wrote that this book is “a Gothic cathedral in which all the Germanic peoples raise their voices, like giant choirs, each in their dialect.” The metaphor aptly described the Grimms’ utopian vision: their work orchestrated masses of disparate material in an edifice erected to the glory of the German language. Their achievements are monumental; they remain legendary, and their work’s complex, central significance for “German identity” continues to be highly controversial, as do the many and varied mythical, psychoanalytical, formalist, structuralist, functionalist, social historical, and pedagogical interpretations of their Tales.

—Tom Cheeseman

See the essay on “Hansel and Gretel.”

GRIMMELSHAUSEN, Hans Jakob Christoffel von

Published under pseudonym: authorship not established until the 19th century. Born: Gelnhausen, near Frankfurt am Main, Germany, in 1622. Education: Educated at Lutheran Latin School, Gelnhausen, 1627. Family: Married Katharina Henninger in 1649. Career: Family fled to Hanau, 1634, after Gelnhausen was plundered in the Thirty Years War; served in the Kaiser’s army after 1637: garrison soldier in Offenburg, 1639, clerk, 1645, then secretary, 1648, in regimental office; steward for the von Schauenburg family in Gaisbach bei Oberkirch, 1649; innkeeper in Gaisbach, 1658; steward for Dr. Küeller, 1662; innkeeper, 1665; mayor of Renchen, 1667; temporary soldier, 1675. Died: 17 August 1676.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

[Collected Works], edited by H. Kurz. 4 vols., 1863–64.
Gesammelte Werke, edited by Rolf Tarot. 1966–.

Works

Der Abenteuerliche Simplicissimus Teutsch und Continuatio, edited by Rolf Tarot. 1967; as The Adventurous Simplicissimus, translated by A.T.S. Goodrich, 1912; as Simplicissimus the Vagabond, 1924; as The Adventures of a Simpleton, translated by Walter Wallich, 1962; as Simplicius Simplicissimus, translated by Monte Adair, 1986; as The Adventures of Simplicius Simplicissimus, translated by George Schulz-Behrend, 1993; as Simplicissimus, translated by Mike Mitchell, 1999.

Dietwalts und Amelindens anmutige Lieb- und Leidsbeschreibung, edited by Rolf Tarot. 1967.

Trutz Simplex; oder, . . . Lebensbeschreibung der Erzbetrügerin und Landstörzerin Courasche, edited by Wolfgang Bender. 1967; as Mother Courage, translated by Walter Wallich, 1965; as The Life of Courage: The Notorious Thief, Whore, and Vagabond, translated by Mike Mitchell, 2001.

Des durchleuchtigen Prinzen Proximi . . . und Lympidae Liebs-Geschicht-Erzählung, edited by Franz Günter Sieveke. 1967.

Des vortrefflich keuschen Josephs in Ägypten Lebensbeschreibung samt des Musai Lebenslauf, edited by Wolfgang Bender. 1968.

Simplicianischer Zweiköpfiger Ratio Status, edited by Rolf Tarot. 1968.
Der seltsame Springinsfeld, edited by Franz Günter Sieveke. 1969; as The Singular Life Story of Heedless Hopalong, translated by Robert L. Hiller and John C. Osborne, 1981.
Satyrischer Pilgram, edited by Wolfgang Bender. 1970.
Das wunderbare Vogelneest, edited by Rolf Tarot. 1970.
Die verkehrte Welt, edited by Franz Günter Sieveke. 1973.
Kleinere Schriften (Beernhäuter, Gauckeltasche, Stolze Melcher, Bart-Krieg, Galgen-Männlin, etc.), edited by Rolf Tarot. 1973.
Ratstübel Plutonis, edited by Wolfgang Bender. 1975.
Teutscher Michel und Ewigwährender Kalender, edited by Rolf Tarot. 1976.

*

Bibliography: Grimmelshausen-Bibliographie 1666–1972 by Italo Michele Battafarano, 1975.

Critical Studies: Grimmelshausen by Kenneth C. Hayens, 1932; Grimmelshausen by Kenneth Negus, 1974; Grimmelshausen in Selbstzeugnissen und Bilddokumenten by Curt Hohoff, 1978; The Nature of Realism in Grimmelshausen's Simplicissimus Cycle of Novels by R.P.T. Aylett, 1982; Grimmelshausen the Storyteller: A Study of the "Simplician" Novels by Alan Menhennet, 1997.

* * *

Reading Hans Jakob Christoffel von Grimmelshausen we feel ourselves to be in the immediate company of a narrator; stories are told—to fictional listeners and to us—and much of the material rings like first-hand truth. But the narrative voices have to be listened to critically; they are continually ironized and relativized by other perspectives offered in the text. The text itself supplies its own commentary—from the perspective of the narrator's old age, for example—or we ourselves, among the listeners, are encouraged to comment.

Grimmelshausen is a great realist. He worked in a genre, the picaresque, marvellously suited to his times, his purposes, and his gifts. The picaresque novel, imported from Spain in the service of the Counter-Reformation by Aegidius Albertinus, is realistic and anti-heroic. In Spain it flourished during the Moorish Wars, and the Thirty Years War makes up all of Grimmelshausen's world. The picaro is a delinquent, and he lives in delinquent times. In times of licensed immorality he lives his immoral life.

War is depicted truthfully by Grimmelshausen, as pointless and horrible. He repeatedly mocks the lying heroic tradition. War is the licence, under arbitrary creeds and slogans, to commit atrocities. War is seen from the true, the lowest point of view: from among the dead, for example, as the scavengers come round. We learn most, to our greatest horror, quite incidentally. What happens to an officer's mistress when he tires of her? She is given to the stable boys: a detail, Grimmelshausen implies, too ordinary to dwell on. War is continually rendered strange; it has to be, or we should not see it for what it is, so accustomed have we become.

Grimmelshausen works to the important Baroque principle of "mögliche Realität" ("possible reality"). More happens to his heroes than really could; he accumulates around them an implausible number of truthful incidents. For realism is not an end in itself; it serves an urgent moral and religious purpose. Man must be shown as he is, as he really lives, in order that he may change. All human life is precarious and war only accentuates that fact; and in war man behaves according to his nature, which is greedy, cruel, and selfish. Much of Baroque literature rests on a simple antithesis: the World or God. To be in the world is to be apart from God. The ordinary state of the world, for Grimmelshausen, is war. What the child last sees of the world as he enters the forest is his family home pillaged and its inhabitants raped or tortured; and what he first sees when he leaves the forest is again torture. That is the world.

Simplicissimus passes, without plausible inner motivation, through the predetermined stages of a religious and ethical career. He begins life in brute ignorance; in the forest with the hermit (his true father) he acquires sancta simplicitas; leaving the forest he is for a time a holy fool (Christianity in such a world appearing necessarily foolish); then, as court fool, he becomes a knowing social critic. Next, for most of the book, he lives not as a critic of the world but as its exemplar, as a worldling. Finally, with only nominal motivation, he leaves the world to resume his innocent hermit's state. He undergoes an exemplary disillusioning, an Enttäuschung.

Grimmelshausen's books are still, as he intended them, amusing and instructive. They are enjoyable and affirmative in their exuberance of language and invention; and salutary in their truthful exposure of man living badly.

—David Constantine

GRYPHIUS, Andreas

Born: Glogau, Silesia, 22 October 1616. Education: Educated at schools in Glogau, 1631, Goerlitz and Fraustadt, 1632–34. Family: Married Rosina Deutschländer in 1647. Career: Private tutor to Georg von Schönborn's children, Danzig, 1634–36; travelled to Holland, studied and lectured at the University of Leyden, 1638–42; went on Grand Tour, 1644–47, lived in Paris and Strasbourg, visited Florence, Rome, Ferrara, and Venice. Secretary to the estates, Glogau, 1650. Died: 16 July 1664.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Dramatische Dichtung, edited by Julius Tittmann. 4 vols., 1870.
Lustspiele, Trauerspiele, Lyrische Gedichte, edited by Hermann Palm. 3 vols., 1878–84.
Gedichte, edited by Johannes Pfeiffer. 1948.
Werke, edited by Marian Szyrocki. 1963.
Gesamtausgabe der deutschsprachigen Werke, edited by Marian Szyrocki and Hugh Powell. 8 vols., 1963–72.
Ergänzungsband. 4 vols., 1983–87.
Werke. 1985.

Plays

Ermordete Majestät; oder, Carolus Stuardus, König von Gross Britannien (produced 1650). 1657; as Murdered Majesty; or, Charles Stuart, edited by Hugh Powell, 1955.
Leo Armenius (produced 1651). 1650.

Gibeoniter; oder, die sieben Bruder, from the play by Joost van den Vondel (produced 1652). 1698.
Majuma. 1653.
Catharina von Georgien (produced 1655). 1657.
Beständige Mutter; oder, Die Heilige Felicitas (produced 1657). 1657.
Cardenio und Celinde; oder, Unglücklich Verliebte (produced 1661). 1657; edited by Hugh Powell, 1961.
Absurda Comica; oder, Herr Peter Squentz. 1658; edited by Sydney H. Moore, 1908; also edited by Hugh Powell, 1957.
Freuden und Trauer-Spiele, auch oden und Sonnette sampt Herr Peter Squentz. 1658.
Der grossmüthige Rechtsgelehrte; oder, Der Sterbende Ämilius Paulus Papinianus (produced 1660). 1659.
Verliebtes Gespenst and Die geliebte Dornrose. 1661.
Horribilicribrifax; oder, Wählende Liebhaber (produced 1674). 1663.

Verse

Sonnete. 1637.
Sonn-und Feiertags Sonnete. 1639.
Sonnete. 1643.
Oden. 1643.
Epigrammatica. 1643.
Olivetum. 1646.
Teutsche Reim-Gedichte. 1650.
Kirchhofsgedanken, Oden. 1657.
Andreae Gryphii Deutscher Gedichte. 1657.
Epigrammata; oder, Bey Schrifften. 1663.

Other

Fewrige Freystadt. 1673.
Dissertationes funebres; oder, Leich-Abdankungen, bey unterschiedlichen hoch- und ansehnlichen Leich-Begängnissen gehalten. Auch nebenst seinem letzten Ehren-Gedächtnuss und Lebens-Lauft. 1683.
 Translator, Die Seugamme, oder Untreues Hausgesinde, by Girolamo Razzi. 1663.
 Translator, Der Schwärmende Schaffer, by Thomas Corneille. 1663.

*

Bibliography: Auswahlbibliographie zu Andreas Gryphius by K.H. Habersetzer in Text + Kritik, 1980.

Critical Studies: Die Lyrik des Andreas Gryphius by Victor Manheimer, 1904; Die Bildlichkeit in der Dichtung des Andreas Gryphius by Gerhard Fricke, 1933; Der junge Gryphius, 1959, and Andreas Gryphius: Leben und Werk, 1964, both by Marian Szyrocki; Andreas Gryphius: Leo Armenius by Herman J. Tisch, 1968; The Sonnets of Andreas Gryphius: Use of the Poetic Word in the Seventeenth Century by Marvin S. Schindler, 1971; Andreas Gryphius: Poet between Epochs by Hugo Becker, 1973; The Constructive Art of Andreas Gryphius's Historical Tragedies by Janifer Gerd, 1986; Andreas Gryphius by Eberhard Mannack, 1986; Andreas Gryphius: A Modern Perspective by Blake Lee Spahr, 1993; Reading Andreas Gryphius: Critical Trends 1664–1993 by Erika A. Metzger and Michael M. Metzger, 1994; Form und Funktion des Komischen in den Komödien von Andreas Gryphius by Daniela Toscan, 2000.

* * *

Andreas Gryphius exerted considerable influence as a dramatist, but his carefully crafted sonnets, odes, epigrams, and religious songs also helped to stabilize and invigorate the German literary language of the Baroque age. Underpinned by neo-classical scholarship and the religious and spiritual anguish of the Thirty Years War, his works eclectically refashioned a wide range of native and non-native forms with remarkable consistency. Six years at Leiden and travels in England, France, and Italy made him aware of the need to raise German drama to a higher level, although his primarily allegorical mode precluded the psychological depth of his European counterparts. His tragedies and poetry are suffused with an intense personal conviction, typical of the 17th century, that God is the sole source of constancy in a world of inconstancy and illusion. Stressing the vanity and transience of earthly endeavour, his antithetically structured plots and dialogues reflect the stark polarity and duality of existence: good struggles with evil, constancy with inconstancy, illusion with reality, and eternity with the fleeting moment, while life itself is a perpetual battle in which the individual, like a rudderless ship in a storm, is tossed helplessly toward the rocks of destruction.

Gryphius rarely blurred the prevailing socially based distinctions between comedy and tragedy. In accordance with Opitz's advocacy of the unities and stylistic decorum, the major tragedies, Leo Armenius, Catharina von Georgien [Catharine of Georgia], Ermordete Majestät; oder, Carolus Stuardus (Murdered Majesty; or, Charles Stuart), and Paulus Papinianus, dignify historical material and affairs of state with predominantly alexandrine verse and the more elevated poetic forms. Gryphius often lent linguistic dynamism to the declamatory, rhetorical, and circumscriptive "high style," but neo-classical concepts of form sat somewhat uneasily with his Baroque profusion and subordination of art to the Christian message. Catharina, the Christian Queen of Georgia, for example, is put to death by her enamoured captor, the Persian Sheikh Abas, for refusing to marry him. After her death the pagan Abas is metaphorically consumed by the flames of hell experienced in his guilt-ridden imagination. Despite a certain political topicality, these events of 1624 are "spiritualized," rather than dramatized. Moral edification toward Christian stoicism was more important than the psychological coherence of the basically allegorical plot and exemplary characters. In these "martyr tragedies" the protagonist is the divinely-ordained head of state who offers stability, yet whose crown is also an emblem of the Wheel of Fortune and the Crown of Thorns. Any attempt to remove them is portrayed as a villainous transgression of the divine order. The villain is the driving force of the plot, whereas the hero or heroine is trapped in a passive role of suffering victim, which allows ample opportunity for rhetorical, bombastic lament on the vicissitudes of human existence. Earthly attachments like human love may appear fleetingly, but only as past vices which the hero has firmly overcome: there is little to deflect the "martyr" from welcoming death as a desirable release. As Walter Benjamin (The Origin of German Tragic Drama) and others have suggested, Aristotle's fear and pity are separately allocated to villain and hero(ine), so that a bloody physical catastrophe, often recounted in gruesome detail, replaces a truly tragic denouement.

Gryphius gradually reduced the narrative element in his tragedies and increased the presentation of important events on stage, but he also relied on the visual spectacle of operatic tradition: impressive stage sets, pomp and ceremony, and lavish costumes counteracted the frequent stasis of a slow-moving plot. Linked to this is his use of visions, dreams, and ghosts, any of which may appear at crucial points as a means of warning reprobates about eternal retribution. The most spectacular such device occurs in Cardenio und Celinde, where the lustful Cardenio believes he sees his former lover, Olympia, but she reveals herself as a skeleton exhorting him to repent or be damned. This “conversion therapy” is reinforced shortly afterwards when he sees a corpse emerge from and re-enter its grave! Such supernatural elements are often dogmatically interpreted by a Chorus or “eyen” of allegorical figures who proclaim the vanitas mundi.

Cardenio und Celinde, however, breaks down some of the traditional barriers between tragedy and comedy. The characters, claims Gryphius in his preface, are “almost too lowly for a tragedy,” for they belong to the low aristocracy, not far from the bourgeoisie. The action concentrates not on affairs of state, but on purely personal problems in normal human relationships. The language is marginally closer to that of everyday speech, although it still remains elevated enough to lend dignity to the subject matter. A double, interlinked plot illustrates the two kinds of earthly love, one rational and sanctioned by God in marriage, the other sensual and irrational. A hint of almost Shakespearean comic relief occurs in IV.ii, when two servants are momentarily pushed to the centre stage. It is difficult, however, to see the action as tragic, because all the characters are reconciled, overcome their earthly lusts, and live piously ever after.

The comedies, which satirize the lower social orders and use prose to reflect the “mundanity” of the action, appear more realistic in their earthy language, naive characters, and freer plots, yet they too employ type characters and are directed towards edification. The comedy of Gryphius which has best stood the test of time is Absurda Comica; oder, Herr Peter Squentz [Absurd Comedy; or, Mr. Peter Squentz], which was probably written between 1647 and 1650, and first appeared in 1657 or 1658. The artisans’ comical performance of Ovid’s tale of Piramus and Thisbe is well-known to English audiences from Shakespeare’s A Midsummer Night’s Dream. Although Shakespeare’s version was performed by wandering English actors in Europe during the 17th century, Gryphius is more likely to have known Dutch and German versions. In his preface, Gryphius says that his Peter Squentz was to be performed alongside one of his tragedies. This was probably Cardenio und Celinde, with which it shares thematic affinities, especially with regard to human love and notions of illusion. In contrast to Shakespeare, who satirizes all social levels, Gryphius uses the artisans’ performance, which is the main body of his play, to attack the outdated notions of popular bourgeois culture from the viewpoint of courtly, high culture. The different social classes appear on stage, but the device of a play within a play, with the courtiers and educated court officials patronizingly mocking the artisans’ performance, reinforces social and cultural distinctions. The main butt of the literary (and implicitly social) satire is Hans Sachs, the great 16th-century popular dramatist, whose work is mercilessly condemned. Despite its harsh satirical tone, however, the play provides delightful linguistic and visual humour of some sophistication and vivacity.

Horribilicribrifax takes up the type of the braggart soldier returning from the war, but the hero is often submerged in rapid scene changes, a multiplicity of characters, and shifting dramatic focus. The main themes, the nature of human love and the necessity to distinguish between illusions and reality, are also explored in the double-play Verlirtes Gespenst/Die geliebte Dornrose [The Amorous Ghost/Beloved Domrose], where once again the different social classes are kept separate, but their love affairs are skilfully paralleled.

—E.A. McCobb

GUILLAUME DE MACHAUT

Born: Rheims (?) c. 1300. Education: May have been educated at Rheims, where he spent much of his later life. Career: Entered the service of John of Luxemburg, King of Bohemia around 1323, and remained his secretary until the king’s death in 1346, subsequently attached to the houses of Charles, King of Navarre, John, Duke of Berry, and the princes of France; held chaplaincy at Verdun, 1330, Arras, 1332, and Rheims, 1333. Prolific composer: the most important figure of the French Ars Nova. Spent much of his later years producing works in manuscript for his royal patrons. Died: 13 April 1377.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Les Oeuvres, edited by Prosper Tarbe. 1849.

Oeuvres, edited by Ernest Hoepffner. 3 vols., 1908–21.

Poésies lyriques, edited by Vladimir Chichmaref. 2 vols., 1909; 1 vol., 1973.

Verse

Le Confort d’ami, edited and translated by R. Barton Palmer. 1992.

Le Dit de la harpe, edited by K. Young. 1943.

15 poésies inédites, edited by Bernard Monod. 1903.

The Fountain of Love and Two Other Love Vision Poems, edited and translated by R. Burton Palmer. 1993.

Le Jugement du roy de Behaigne; and Remede de fortune, edited by James L. Wimsatt and William W. Kibler. 1988.

The Judgement of the King of Bavaria, edited and translated by R. Barton Palmer, 1984.

Le Jugement du roy de Navarre, as The Judgement of the King of Navarre, edited and translated by R. Barton Palmer. 1988.

Le Livre du Voir dit, edited by P. Paris. 1875, reprinted 1969, and by P. Imbs, 1988.

La Louange des dames, edited by Nigel Wilkins. 1972.

Prise d’Alexandrie, edited by L. de Mas Latrie. 1877; as Guillaume de Machaut: The Capture of Alexandria, translated by Janet Shirley, 2001.

Quelques poèmes de Guillaume de Machaut. In “Dits” et “débats” by Jean Froissart, edited by Anthime Fourrier, 1979.

Recueil de Galantries, edited by A. Vitale Brovarone. 1980.

The Tale of the Alerion, edited and translated by Minnette Gaudet and Constance B. Heatt. 1994.

Other

Guillaume de Machaut: Musikalische Werke, edited by Friedrich Ludwig. 4 vols., 1926–54.

*

Bibliography: Guillaume de Machaut: An Analytic Bibliography by Kevin Brownlee, 1990.

Critical Studies: Guillaume de Machaut: Musicien et poète rémois by André Douce, 1948; Guillaume de Machaut by Siegmund Levarie, 1954; Guillaume de Machaut, 1300–1377: La Vie et l'oeuvre musicale by Armand Machabey, 2 vols., 1955; Le Poète et le Prince: L'Évolution du lyrisme courtois de Guillaume de Machaut à Charles d'Orléans by Daniel Poirion, 1965; The Marguerite Poetry of Guillaume de Machaut edited by James Wimsatt, 1970; Guillaume de Machaut by Gilbert Reaney, 1971; A Poet at the Fountain: Essays on the Narrative Verse of Guillaume de Machaut by William Calin, 1974; Poetic Identity in Guillaume de Machaut by Kevin Brownlee, 1984; Guillaume de Machaut et l'écriture au XIV<sup>e</sup> siècle: "Un engin si subtil" by Jacqueline Cerquiglini, 1985; Machaut's Mass: An Introduction by Daniel Leech-Wilkinson, 1990; Le Voir-dit de Guillaume de Machaut, étude littéraire by Paul Imbs, 1991; The Grammar of 14th Century Melody: Tonal Organization and Compositional Process in the Chansons of Guillaume de Machaut and the ars subtilior by Yolanda Plumley, 1996; Pseudo-autobiography in the Fourteenth Century: Juan Ruiz, Guillaume de Machaut, Jean Froissart, and Geoffrey Chaucer by Laurence de Looze, 1997; Logos as Number and Proportion in Amiens Cathedral and in the Kyrie of the Messe de Nostre Dame by Guillaume de Machaut by Dominique Pascale Bardet, 1999.

* * *

After the death of Guillaume de Machaut in 1377, the poet Eustache Deschamps wrote a moving déploration (put to music by Andrieu) in which he lamented the death of the man who was universally considered to be the greatest poet and musician of his age. All those who care about music and poetry are invited to mourn the passing of a figure who, in the words of William Calin, "as a musician and as a poet, is one of the great international masters of the 14th century." And yet, after his death, Guillaume de Machaut's reputation went into something of a decline, and it is only in the last 30 years or so that he has come to be recognized as an outstanding author. For the genres that he perfected—and to a certain degree invented—such as the dit, the motet, the virelai, and the polyphonic ballade and rondeau, were soon to go out of fashion, to be replaced by genres borrowed from classical antiquity. Born in 1300, he was the dominant figure both in lyric poetry and in music in 14th-century France. His output was enormous and wide-ranging. Although a canon of the church (he spent his later years in Rheims, in his native Champagne), he wrote much verse that was profane and gently erotic in tone, as well as sacred music. He was also very much a court poet, depending on wealthy patrons for his livelihood and forced to write works to their taste as much as to his own. Nonetheless, a distinctive authorial voice comes through in his work, especially in his dits, a genre which he effectively made his own.

Guillaume de Machaut wrote ten long dits and four shorter ones. Among the long ones, the most famous are perhaps the Le Livre du Voir dit, the Remede de fortune, Le Jugement du roy de Behaigne [The Judgement of the King of Behaigne], and Le Jugement du roy de Navarre (The Judgement of the King of Navarre). Despite their apparent diversity, these narrative dits share a common pattern. The narrator, usually preoccupied with love, embarks on a quest that will be both a physical journey and an imaginative adventure of experience and learning. He will return a happier and wiser man. The trappings of the quest are recognizably courtly, with gardens of love, fine castles, and of course beautiful women. But these works are much more complex than this structure and subject-matter would appear to allow. As Calin has pointed out, all the dits (a very flexible genre) are "poems of consolation." Guillaume de Machaut uses these long narrative poems to provide the reader with a very clear idea of his world-view. The progression of the protagonist from being an inexperienced outsider to being welcomed in his maturity to the civilized play world of courtly society is typical. On the way, however, the author gives his views of a series of topics that range from etiquette to morality and even flights of philosophical fancy. The (inevitable) unwillingness of the courtly ladies in these poems to appear anything other than unattainable also allows the author to indulge in pseudoautobiographical musings on the vagaries of love. He invests these poetic fictions with a realistic veneer that lends them an air of authenticity, so much so that critics have sometimes seen his Le Livre du Voir dit as the real-life confessions of an old poet infatuated with a young woman. Whether or not Peronne did exist in the way she is described in Guillaume de Machaut's poem is perhaps immaterial; what matters more is the realistic depiction of the pangs of love.

Guillaume de Machaut is best known today for his music. Although he is associated in most people's minds with the Ars nova, he was not in fact especially radical in his musical and poetical tastes and ambitions. In a career lasting 40 years he naturally tried his hand at different styles and forms, and there is an impressive variety of theme, message, and tone in his work. He is remembered as the composer of the first complete polyphonic setting of the "Ordinary of the Mass." His output of sacred music is huge, but he is most accessible today as the composer of poems of profane love. The ballade (both monophonic and polyphonic) was his favourite form, but he also wrote memorable virelais such as the haunting "Quant je suis mis au retour" ["When I return"] and works of outstanding complexity. As David Munrow remarked, Guillaume de Machaut's genius "lies in the way he combined a mastery of all the musical techniques of his age with a gift of melody and expressiveness. He was as good at writing a simple tune as he was at writing an elaborate isorhythmic motet and he approached the business of composition with the freedom of genius." The same critic claimed that Guillaume de Machaut's motets were "one of the high points of medieval art." With such technical expertise, such a range of forms and expressions, it is little wonder that Guillaume de Machaut was admired by contemporaries and praised so memorably in words and music by those who survived him.

—Michael Freeman

GUILLÉN, Jorge

Born: Valladolid, Spain, 18 January 1893. Education: Educated at the Instituto de Valladolid, 1903–09; Maison Perreyve, Fribourg, Switzerland, 1909–11; University of Madrid, Faculty of Philosophy and Letters, 1911–13; University of Granada, 1913, degree 1913; University of Madrid, Ph.D. 1924. Family: Married 1) Germain Cahen in 1921 (died 1947), one daughter and one son; 2) Irene Mochi-Sismondini in 1961. Career: Contributor to El Norte de Castilla, from 1918; lecturer or professor of Spanish, the Sorbonne, Paris, 1917–23, University of Murcia, 1926–29, Oxford University, 1929–31, and University of Seville, 1931–38; jailed briefly in Pamplona by Nationalist forces, on suspicion of spying, 1936; went into exile, 1938; taught at Middlebury College, Vermont, 1938–39, and McGill University, Montreal, 1939–40; professor of Spanish, Wellesley College, Massachusetts, 1940–57: retired as emeritus professor; Charles Eliot Norton lecturer, Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1957, 1958. Also taught at Yale University, New Haven, Connecticut, 1947, Colegio de Mexico, 1950, University of California, Berkeley, 1951, Ohio State University, Columbus, 1952–53, University of the Andes, Bogotá, 1961, University of Puerto Rico, Rio Piedras, 1962, 1964, University of Pittsburgh, 1966, and University of California, San Diego, 1968. Returned to Spain, 1978, and settled in Malaga. Awards: Guggenheim fellowship, 1954; American Academy award of merit, 1955; City of Florence poetry prize, 1957; Etna-Taormina prize (Italy), 1959; International Grand prize for poetry (Belgium), 1961; San Luca prize (Florence), 1964; Bennett prize (Hudson Review), 1975; Cervantes prize, 1976; Feltrinelli prize (Italy), 1977; Alfonso Reyes prize (Mexico), 1977; Yoliztli prize (Mexico), 1982. Died: 6 February 1984.

PUBLICATIONS

Verse

Cántico. 1928; enlarged edition, 1936, edited by José Manuel Blecua, 1970; further enlarged edition, as Cántico, fe de vida, 1945; complete edition, as Cántico, fe de vida, 1950; as Cántico: A Selection, translated by Norman Thomas di Giovanni and others, 1965; also translated by Donald McCrory, 1998.

Tercer cántico. 1944.

El encanto de las sirenas. 1953.

Luzbel desconcertado. 1956.

Del amanecer y el despertar. 1956.

Clamor. 3 vols., 1957–63:
Maremágnum. 1957.
Que van a dar en la mar. 1960.
A la altura de las circunstancias. 1963.

Lugar de Lázaro. 1957.

Viviendo, y otros poemas. 1958.

Historia natural: Breve antología con versos inéditos. 1960.

Poemas de Castilla. 1960.

Poesias. 1960.

Versos, edited by Miguel Pizarro. 1961.

Anita. 1961.

Flores. 1961.

Las tentaciones de Antonio. 1962.

Según las horas. 1962.

Tréboles. 1964.

Suite italienne. 1964; enlarged edition, 1968.

Selección de poemas. 1965; enlarged edition, 1970.

El trasnochador. 1967.

Homenaje: Reunión de vidas. 1967.

Affirmation: A Bilingual Anthology, edited and translated by Julian Palley. 1968.

Aire nuestro (includes Cántico; Clamor; Homenaje). 1968; enlarged edition (includes Y otros poemas and Final), 5 vols., 1977–81.

Obra poética: Antología, edited by José Manuel Blecua. 1970.

Guirnalda civil. 1970.

Obra poética. 1970.

Al margen. 1972.

Y otros poemas. 1973.

Convivencia. 1975.

Plaza mayor: Antología civil. 1977.

Final. 1981.

Poemas malagueños (selection), edited by Antonio Gómez Yebra. 1983.

Jorge Guillén para niños, edited by Antonio Gómez Yebra. 1984.

Sonetos completos, edited by Antonio Gómez Yebra. 1988.

Horses in the Air and Other Poems, translated by Cola Franzen, 1999.

Plays

El huerto de Melibea (dramatic poem) (produced 1955). 1954.

Other

Federico en persona: Semblanza y epistolario (on García Lorca). 1959.

El argumento de la obra (Cántico) (essays), edited by V. Scheiwiller. 1961; also edited by José Manuel Blecua, 1970.

Language and Poetry: Some Poets of Spain (Charles Eliot Norton lectures). 1961; Spanish edition, as Lenguaje y poesía, 1962.

En torno a Gabriel Miró: Breve epistolario. 1970.

La poética de Bécquer. 1973.

Mientras el aire es nuestro, edited by Philip W. Silver. 1978.

Guillén on Guillén: The Poetry and the Poet (readings and commentary), translated by Reginald Gibbons and Anthony L. Geist. 1979.

Paseo marítimo. 1990.

Correspondencia (1923–1951), with Pedro Salinas, edited by Andrés Soria Olmedo. 1992.

Translator, El cementerio marino, by Paul Valéry. 1930.

*

Critical Studies: The Poetry of Jorge Guillén by Frances Avery Pleak, 1942; La poesía de Jorge Guillén edited by R. Gullón and José Manuel Blecua, 1949; Jorge Guillén by J.B. Trend, 1952; La realidad y Jorge Guillén by J. Muela González, 1962; A. Machado; P. Salinas; J. Guillén by P. Darmangeat, 1969; A Generation of Spanish Poets 1920–1936 by Cyril Brian Morris, 1969; Luminous Reality: The Poetry of Guillén edited by Ivar Ivask and Juan Marichal, 1969; Poesía de Guillén by Andrew P. Debicki, 1973; El cántico americano de Jorge Guillén by J. Ruiz de Conde, 1973; Cántico de Guillén y Aire nuestro by Joaquín Casaldueiro, 1974; Jorge Guillén by Joaquín Caro Romero, 1974; The Vibrant Silence of Jorge Guillén's Aire nuestro by Florence L. Yudin, 1974; Jorge Guillén edited by B. Ciplijauskaitė, 1975; La obra poética de Jorge Guillén (includes bibliography) by Oreste Macrí, 1976; Homenaje a Jorge Guillén by the Wellesley College Department of Spanish, 1978; Jorge Guillén by S. Carretero and C. Meneses, 1981; Jorge Guillén: Sus raíces: Recuerdos al paso by J. Guerrero Martín, 1982; Jorge Guillén (in English) by G. Grant MacCurdy, 1982; The Structured World of Jorge Guillén: A Study of Cántico and Clamor (includes translations) by Elizabeth Matthews, 1985; Jorge Guillén: Cántico by Robert Havard, 1986; Guillén at McGill: Essays for a Centenary Celebration, edited by K.M. Sibbald, 1996.

* * *

It is a cliché to say that a poet creates order out of chaos, but it is one supremely applicable to Jorge Guillén. Guillén always found a sense of order, whether it was among the proliferation of literary movements following World War I, from the experience of living most of his life in an exile both physical and linguistic, or in a recoil from the atrocities and horrors of war. This passion for order can be seen in the careful control of structure, in the reworking of many of his early poems, and in the unhurried perfection that finds its most peaceful expression in his recurrent opening and closing image of a dawn always followed by nightfall. This search for order has led his work to be compared to Baudelaire's Les Fleurs du mal (The Flowers of Evil) and Whitman's Leaves of Grass.

A poet who has won awards in the United States and in Europe, Guillén belongs to the Generation of 1927, so-called after their tricentenary celebration of the death of the eclectic Golden-Age poet, Luis de Góngora. Theirs was a short-lived generation: after the Civil War most went into exile, some were in prison, and García Lorca had been killed. However, in that short time the quality of their work led critics to proclaim a new golden age of Spanish poetry, and their work managed a successful fusion of influences, from the Spanish Golden Age to literary trends from France, in particular those of “pure poetry” and surrealism. Guillén himself was particularly impressed by Jorge Manrique and Paul Valéry.

As a university lecturer he published important critical essays and translations of poetry as well as his own work, of which the main parts were combined in the 1968 volume Aire nuestro [Our Air]. This edition is made up of the three collections, Cántico [Song], Clamor [Clamour], and Homenaje [Homage], each superficially quite different in range and theme. Cántico, with its focus on harmony, revels in life in a way the more sombre poems of Clamor would seem to deny. Clamor provides a shadowy mirror image of Cántico. It reflects the ferocity of life rather than its potential harmony, tracing the destruction and suffering caused by war and death, while Homenaje is a wide-ranging eulogy to the poetry of all ages, from Genesis to Guillén himself, offering an impressive mixture of translation and originality. This collection was supplemented by “Y otros poemas” [And Other Poems], the modest title at once a gesture of self-effacement and a hint to the more central significance of the earlier work, and Final.

Cántico evolved from its first publication in 1928 to a definitive version in 1950. It is the most widely known of his works and owes much to the influence of Paul Valéry whom Guillén grew to know well during his stay in France. Subtitled Fe de vida (the name of a document proving a person is still alive), it is an affirmation of the beauty and coherence of life, a search for a perfection of form involving precision, interaction, and fusion. The importance placed on the present tense in the search for purity of expression is equalled by that placed upon fusion and interaction, as humanity and nature work in a symbiotic relationship. This is a search for a paradise on this earth, the perfection of which is portrayed in images of solid geometric forms that have often led Guillén's work to be considered in relation to cubism. Faith and love are constants in this search for an illumination attainable only through the experience and creation of a solid harmony and the potential of poetic form to resolve contradiction.

Clamor complements Cántico with the same rigour and control; their main difference lies in the attention given to the themes of exile, grief, and war. Clamor is about transcending the oppositions of order versus chaos, life versus death, and love versus hate, which threaten to disrupt our faith in life. That Guillén saw Clamor as the dramatization of an age can be seen in its subtitle Tiempo de historia. Where Cántico was an ecstatic song to life, Clamor is a dialogue between a man and his time, but this does not detract from the poet's faith in life, and if Clamor contains tones of disgust at the world of human creation it does not lose the exclamatory tone of pleasure that punctuated Cántico, nor the intensely tactile and sensual evocation of the poet's immediate surroundings.

Homenaje continues to explore this affirmation of life and poetry. Guillén has always expressed a commitment to humanity; but here there is a progression that allows the voices of other poets to blend in with this own. His wish to overcome division and chaos has meant an attempt to bridge the gap between individual and collective perception, which is nowhere more clear than in this work. Homenaje is a gesture of thanks, an invitation to a gathering where we find Calderón, Bécquer, Machado, Pascal, Mallarmé, and Tolstoi, among others, joined in a postmodern celebration of the death of the author and the rebirth of intertextuality.

Guillén's work, then, traces a familiar journey from harmony to discord, and beyond. For Guillén, life is an adventure and poetry an attempt to resolve its confusion. His is a vital, optimistic, and illuminating poetry, a love poetry in its most universal sense of self-abandonment to life itself. His work is therefore, in this ecology-conscious and first decade of the 21st century, no less contemporary now than it was on its initial publication.

—Jo Evans

GUILLÉN (BATISTA), Nicolás (Cristóbal)

Born: Camagüey, Cuba, 10 July 1902. Education: Educated at the Instituto de Segunda Enseñanza, Camagüey, to 1920; studied law at the University of Havana, 1920 and 1921–22; abandoned studies. Career: Worked for El Nacional as printer and typesetter while taking evening classes, 1918–19; contributor, Camagüey Gráfico, 1919, Orto, 1920 and 1927, Las Dos Repúblicas, 1920, and Alma Mater, 1922; co-founder and editor, Lis, 1923; editor, El Camagüeyano, 1923; typist, Ministry of the Interior, Havana, 1926; contributor, Diario de la Marina, from 1928, editor, Información and El Loco, from 1934; worked in the Havana Ministry of Culture, 1935–36; editor, Mediodía, 1936–38; travelled to Spain and attended pro-Republican conferences, 1937; joined National Committee of the Cuban Communist Party, 1938, and worked on its journal Hoy, 1938–50 (closed by the authorities) and from its revival in 1959; unsuccessful mayoral candidate, Camagüey, 1940; travelled to Haiti, 1942, and throughout Latin America on lecture and recital tour, 1945–48; co-editor, Gaceta del Caribe, 1944; travelled widely throughout Europe, USSR, and China, attending conferences and cultural events, 1948–52; contributor, La Última Hora, 1952; detained twice for activities against the Batista regime, 1952; left Cuba for Chile, 1953, and, though based in Paris, 1955–58, continued travelling widely during the 1950s; lived in Buenos Aires, 1958–59; returned to Cuba after the Castro Revolution, 1959, and thereafter combined career as writer with attendances at numerous international conferences, lectures, and cultural events, often in other countries of the socialist bloc, and often in an official capacity as Cuban ambassador at large or president of the Cuban Union of Writers and Artists (UNEAC) (appointed 1961); member, Central Committee of the Communist Party of Cuba, from 1975; had leg amputated, June 1989. Professor of Merit, University of Camagüey, 1981. Awards: International Lenin Peace prize, 1954; Jesús Suárez Gayol prize, 1972;

Union of Journalists' Félix Elmuza prize, 1972; Viareggio prize (Italy), 1972; Jamaican Institute Musgrave medal, 1974; Ricardo Miró National Poetry prize (Panama), 1979; Julius Fucik medal for journalism, 1981; Maurice Bishop prize, 1989. Honorary doctorates: University of Havana, 1974; University of the West Indies, 1975; University of Bordeaux (France), 1978. Cirilo and Metodio medal (Bulgaria), 1972; Red Band of Achievement (USSR), 1972; Order of Merit (Poland), 1974; Distinguished Son of the Cuban Popular Assembly, 1981; Cuban Order of José Martí, 1981. Died: 16 July 1989.

PUBLICATIONS

Verse

Motivos de son. 1930.
Sóngoro cosongo: Poemas mulatos. 1931.
West Indies Limited: Poemas. 1934.
España: Poema en cuatro angustias y una esperanza. 1937.
Cantos para soldados y sones para turistas. 1937.
El son entero; Suma poética 1929–1946. 1947.
Elegía a Jacques Roumain en el cielo de Haití. 1948.
Cuba Libre: Poems, translated by Langston Hughes and Ben Frederic Carruthers. 1948.
Versos negros (selection), edited by José Luis Varela. 1950.
Elegía a Jesús Menéndez. 1951.
Elegía cubana. 1952.
La paloma de vuelo popular: Elegías. 1958.
Buenos días, Fidel. 1959.
Sus mejores poemas. 1959.
Los mejores versos. 1961.
Balada. 1962.
Poesías. 1962.
Poemas de amor. 1964.
Tengo. 1964; as Tengo, translated by Richard J. Carr, 1974.
Antología mayor: El son entero y otros poemas (selection). 1964; enlarged edition, 1969.
Che comandante. 1967.
El gran zoo. 1967; as "The Great Zoo," in ¡Patria o muerte!: The Great Zoo and Other Poems, 1973.
Cuatro canciones para el Che. 1969.
Antología clave. 1971.
El diario que a diario. 1972; corrected edition, 1979; as The Daily Daily, translated by Vera Kutzinski, 1989.
La rueda dentada. 1972.
Man-Making Words: Selected Poems, translated by Robert Márquez and David Arthur McMurray. 1972.
Obra poética, edited by Ángel Augier. 2 vols., 1972–73; enlarged and corrected edition, 1979; revised edition, 1985.
¡Patria o muerte!: The Great Zoo and Other Poems (bilingual edition), edited and translated by Robert Márquez. 1973.
El corazón con que vivo. 1975.
Poemas manuales. 1975.
Suma poética, edited by Luis Iñigo. 1976.
Por el mar de las Antillas anda un barco de papel. 1977.
Música de cámara. 1979.
Coplas de Juan Descalzo. 1979.
El libro de las décimas (selection), edited by Nancy Morejón. 1980.
Sol de domingo. 1982.
New Love Poetry; In Some Springtime Place; Elegy, translated and edited with commentary by Keith Ellis. 1994.

Plays

Poema con niños (produced 1943). In Sóngoro cosongo y otros poemas, 1942.
Soyán, music by Jorge Berroa (produced 1980).

Other

Prosa de prisa; Crónicas. 1962; revised and enlarged edition, as Prosa de prisa 1929–1972, edited by Ángel Augier, 3 vols., 1975–76.
Páginas vueltas; Memorias. 1982.

*

Bibliography: Bibliografía de Nicolás Guillén by Mará Luisa Antuña and Josefina García Carranza, 1975, supplemented in Revista de la Biblioteca Nacional José Martí, 3rd series, 19(3), 1977; "Nicolás Guillén" in Cuban Literature: A Research Guide by David William Foster, 1985; "Nicolás Guillén" in Dictionary of Twentieth Century Cuban Literature by Julio A. Martínez, 1990.

Critical Studies: Nicolás Guillén: Notas para un estudio biográfico-crítico, 2 vols., 1965, La revolución cubana en la poesía de Nicolás Guillén, 1979, and Nicolás Guillén: Estudio biográfico-crítico, 1984, all by Ángel Augier; La poesía afro-cubana de Nicolás Guillén by Ezequiel Martínez Estrada, 1966, revised edition, as La poesía de Nicolás Guillén, 1977; La poesía de Nicolás Guillén by Adriana Tous, 1971; Recopilación de textos sobre Nicolás Guillén edited by Nancy Morejón, 1974, and Nación y mestizaje en Nicolás Guillén by Morejón, 1982; La poesía de Nicolás Guillén by Jorge M. Ruscalleda Bercedóniz, 1975; El sentimiento de la negritud en la poesía de Nicolás Guillén by Armando González-Pérez, 1976; Hazaña y triunfo americanos de Nicolás Guillén by Juan Marinello, 1976; The Poetry of Nicolás Guillén: An Introduction by Dennis Sardinha, 1976; Harlem, Haiti, and Havana: A Comparative Critical Study of Langston Hughes, Jacques Roumain, and Nicolas Guillén by Martha K. Cobb, 1979; Black Writers in Latin America by Richard Jackson, 1979; Self and Society in the Poetry of Nicolás Guillén by Lorna V. Williams, 1982; Against the American Grain: Myth and History in William Carlos Williams, Jay Wright, and Nicolás Guillén, 1987, and Guillén issue of Callaloo 31, 10(2), 1987, both by Vera M. Kutzinski; Nicolás Guillén: Popular Poet of the Caribbean by Ian Isidore Smart, 1990; Nicolás Guillén: Growth of a Revolutionary Consciousness by J.A. George Irish, 1990; Decoding the Word: Nicolás Guillén as Maker and Debunker of Myth by Clement A. White, 1993.

* * *

Nicolás Guillén forsook his youthful imitation of Rubén Darío and the modernist aesthetic to focus a revolutionary's eye on social and political matters and on formal innovation. His message of protest, he once said, was sometimes "dissimulated by the rhythm, the picturesque elements," characteristic of his early poetry. Until recently, critics considered his works only in the light of these elements, his unveiling of Cuba's black heritage, or of his communist ideology. Critics classified his poetry, as "black" and related it to the "Afro-Caribbean" movement or the "negritude" of black francophone Caribbean poets. This classification was made on the basis of his evocative imagery of African nature, his musicality reminiscent of African ritual-dance rhythms, and his reproduction of Cuban black speech (recently acknowledged as the popular speech of Cubans of all races). Contrary to “Afro-Caribbean” and “negritude” poetry that tends to exacerbate divisions among the races, Guillén’s work aims to consolidate.

The subtitle of Sóngoro cosongo: Poemas mulatos [Songoro Cosongo: Mulatto Poems] expresses such an integrative intent. In the prologue to the first edition, Guillén indicated that he wanted his poetry to reflect the ethnic composition of Cuba. He also claimed that Cuban society, by excluding “blackness” from its writings, disavowing its African roots, and perceiving itself as “white,” had failed to create an authentic Cuban national literature. To rectify this lack, Guillén created a consciously “mestizo” (of racially mixed ancestry) poetry which used the Spanish language to express Cuba’s African essence. In Motivos de son [Son Motifs], Sóngoro consongo, West Indies Limited, and to some extent in later collections, Guillén used his revolutionary poetic form based on the son, a popular Cuban musical form with roots in Spanish, African, and Arawak traditional forms. Guillén’s son-poem uses the eight-syllable lines of the Spanish “romance” (ballad) and an “estribillo” (chorus), similar to the antiphonal chants of African and/or Arawak ritual traditions. In addition, Guillén revolutionized Cuban poetry by using expressions long perceived as “jitanjáforas” (onomatopoeic neologisms) that subsequently have been identified as words in various African languages. These sounds (such as “sóngoro consongo”) provide rhythmic auditory effects evocative of Africa and, through their encrypted meaning, of its culture.

Guillén also proposed to legitimize blacks and mulattos as images in Cuban literature and to assert their beauty and positive value. In “Negro bombón” (“Thick-Lipped Cullud Boy”), for example, the reader’s perception is refocused to recognize the beauty of those generally disdained thick lips. The black/white dichotomy (evil/good in white societies) is debunked in “¿Qué color?” (“What Color?”), a poem commemorating the assassination of Martin Luther King. The negative value judgement implicit in the image of the black-skinned pastor who, nevertheless, had “such a white soul” is repudiated and replaced with awe before his “powerful black soul.”

Guillén also rebelled against Cuban society’s hypocritical modesty—hypocritical because by the 1950s Cuba had become the brothel and playground of America’s affluent and gangster classes. Instead, Guillén’s poetry evokes voluptuous images of dark women that are unabashedly sensuous.

This period of Afro-Cuban synthesis in Guillén’s work was followed by one of revolutionary political preoccupation. His solidarity with the Republican cause during the Spanish Civil War is evident in España: Poema en cuatro angustias y una esperanza [Spain: Poem in Four Anguishes and One Hope]. The grievances of the oppressed classes in Cuba are depicted in the poems of Cantos para soldados y sonos para turistas [Songs for Soldiers and Sones for Tourists] and El son entero [The Whole Son]. His protest against the Spanish slayer’s lash disfiguring his black grandfather’s back in “Balada de los dos abuelos” (“Ballad of the Two Grandfathers”) is as intense as that in “Mau-maus” for the failure to indict the slain Englishman because he “pierced the lung of Africa / with an Empire-dagger of / alphabetizing steel . . . / of syphilis, gunpowder, / money, business, yes.” Published after the Cuban Revolution, the collection Tengo, extols the more egalitarian society that struggle created.

Guillén’s revolutionary poetic form reaches its zenith in El gran zoo (The Great Zoo) and El diario que a diario (The Daily Daily). The former, a neo-bestiary, portrays the denizens of the zoo not as animals, but as inanimate objects, character types, or institutions that caustically satirize capitalist society. Form in The Great Zoo ranges from haiku-like brevity to polymetric free verse. The Daily Daily is a collection of newspaper items recounting Cuba’s history since colonial times. Some are authentic journalistic items, others are creations of the author; some are in recognizably poetic forms, others are classified advertisements, display advertisements, social items, or municipal announcements. His early humour reappears in this volume with a demythologizing effect. The bullfight—the mythic paradigm of Spanish masculinity—collapses in “Bulls,” in which bullfighters do everything from taking “a great leap over a bull,” to “stick[ing] a new kind of banderilla into another from the top of a stool,” to making “fun of the animal’s ferocity by dancing ‘La Cucaracha’ on a table.” The sharp criticism of the capitalist establishment contained in this book crowns a career dedicated to exposing the flaws and abuses of the moneyed classes.

Guillén revolutionized Cuban literature by making it mirror Cuba’s mixed racial heritage, in his new form, the son-poem, and by using “jitanjáforas” and ritual-like rhythm. With renewed language and formal innovations, he denounced oppression, and, through satire, demythologized the “reality” imposed by the dominant classes.

—Oralia Preble-Niemi

GUIMARÃES ROSA, João

Born: Cordisburgo, Minas Gerais, Brazil, 27 June 1908. Education: Educated at the Colégio Arnaldo, Belo Horizonte; Medical School of Minas Gerais, Belo Horizonte, 1925–30, degree 1930. Family: Married 1) Lygia Cabral Pena in 1930, two daughters; 2) Aracy Moebius de Carvalho in 1938. Career: Public servant, Statistical Service, Minas Gerais, 1929–31; doctor in private practice, Itaguara, Minas Gerais, 1931–32; volunteered as military medical officer, Belo Horizonte, 1932; medical officer, Ninth Infantry Battalion, Barbacena, Minas Gerais, 1934; passed civil service examinations and joined Ministry of Foreign Affairs, 1934; vice-consul, Hamburg, Germany, 1938–42; briefly interned in Baden Baden, following Brazil’s entry into World War II, 1942; secretary, Brazilian Embassy in Bogotá, Colombia, 1942–44; director, Ministry of State’s Documentation Service, 1944–46; secretary, Brazilian Delegation to Paris Peace Conference, 1946; secretary-general, Brazilian Delegation to Ninth Pan-American Conference, Bogotá, 1948; principal secretary, Brazilian Embassy, Paris, 1949–51; cabinet head, Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Rio de Janeiro, 1951–53; budget director, Ministry of State, Rio de Janeiro, 1953–58; head of Frontier Demarcation Service, 1962–67. Vice-president, First Latin American Writers Conference, Mexico City, 1965. Awards: Brazilian Academy of Letters poetry prize, 1936; Carmen Dolores Barbosa prize, 1957; Paula Brito prize, 1957; Brazilian Academy Machado de Assis prize, 1961. Member: Brazilian Academy of Letters, 1963. Died: 19 November 1967.

PUBLICATIONS

Fiction

Sagarana (stories). 1946; revised edition, 1951; as Sagarana: A Cycle of Stories, translated by Harriet de Onís, 1966.

Corpo de baile: sete novelas (includes Manuelzão e Miguilim; No Urubùquaquá, no pinhém; Noites do Sertão). 2 vols., 1956; 3 vols., 1964–66.

Grande Sertão: Veredas. 1956; as The Devil to Pay in the Backlands, translated by James L. Taylor and Harriet de Onís, 1963.

Primeiras histórias. 1962; as The Third Bank of the River and Other Stories, translated by Barbara Shelby, 1968.

Os sete pecados capitais (novellas), with others. 1964.

Campo geral (stories). 1964.

Tutaméia: terceiras histórias. 1967.

Estas histórias. 1969.

Contos (stories), edited by Heitor Megale and Marilena Matsuola. 1978.

Other

Ave, palavra (prose and verse). 1970.

Correspondência com o tradutor italiano [Edorado Bizzarri]. 1972.

Seleção (anthology), edited by Paulo Rónai, 1973.

Sagarana emotiva: cartas de Guimarães Rosa a Paulo Dantas. 1975.

Rosiana: uma coletânea de conceitos, máximas e brocardos, edited by Paulo Rónai. 1983.

*

Bibliography: Bibliografia de e sobre Guimarães Rosa by Plínio Doyle, 1968; Brazilian Literature: A Research Guide by David William Foster and Walter Rela, 1990.

Critical Studies: Trilhas no Grande Sertão by M. Calvalcânti Proença, 1958; Guimarães Rosa edited by Heriqueta Lisboa and others, 1966; João Guimarães Rosa: travessia literária, 1968, and “João Guimarães Rosa,” in Studies in Short Fiction, 8(1), 1971, both by Mary L. Daniel; Em memória de João Guimarães Rosa by various authors, 1968; Guimarães Rosa by Adonias Filho and others, 1969; Guimarães Rosa by Francisco Assis Brasil, 1969; Guimarães Rosa by Guilhermino César and others, 1969; Guimarães Rosa em três dimensões by Pedro Xosto, Augusto de Campos, and Haroldo de Campos, 1970; O mundo movente de Guimarães Rosa by José Carlos Garbuglio, 1972; Structural Perspectivism in Guimarães Rosa by W. Martins, 1973; Guimarães Rosa: dois estudos by Nelly Novaes Coelho and Ivana Versiani, 1975; O insólito em Guimarães Rosa e Borges by Lenira Marques Covizzi, 1978; A Construção do Romance em Guimarães Rosa by Wendel Santos, 1978; O diálogo no Grande Sertão: Veredas by Paulo de Tarso Santos, 1978; João Guimarães Rosa (in English) by Jon S. Vincent, 1978; The Process of Revitalization of the Language and Narrative Structure in the Fiction of João Guimarães Rosa and Julio Cortázar, 1980, and The Synthesis Novel in Latin America: A Study of Grande Sertão: Veredas, 1991, both by Eduardo de Faria Coutinho; Guimarães Rosa: signo e sentimento by Suzi Frankl Sperber, 1982; Guimarães Rosa edited by Eduardo de Faria Coutinho, 1983; A cultura popular em Grande Sertão: Veredas by Leonardo Arroyo, 1984; O discurso oral em Grande Sertão: Veredas by Teresinha Souto Ward, 1984; Logos and the Word: The Novel of Language and Linguistic Motivation in Grande Sertão: Veredas and Três tristes tigres by Stephanie Merrim, 1988; Guimarães Rosa: O alquimista do coração by José Maria Martins, 1994; O roteiro de Deus: Dois estudos sobre Guimarães Rosa by Heloísa Vilhena de Araújo, 1996; Viagem ao sertão brasileiro: Leitura geo-socio-antropológica de Ariano Suassuna, Euclides da Cunha,

Guimarães Rosa by Vernaide Wanderley and Eugénia Menezes, 1997; O mito de Fausto em Grande sertão: Veredas by Fani Schiffer Durães, 1999; Guimarães Rosa by Walnice Nogueira Galvão, 2000; Guimarães Rosa: Magma e gênese da obra by Maria Célia Leonel, 2000; Palavra e tempo: Ensaaios sobre Dante, Carroll e Guimarães Rosa by Heloísa Vilhena de Araújo, 2001.

* * *

When João Guimarães Rosa died on 19 November 1967 at the age of 59, he had published only five works of prose fiction; however, these five volumes had earned him a seat in the Brazilian Academy of Letters and undisputed recognition as the greatest writer of prose fiction to emerge in Brazil since 1945.

He was born in Cordisburgo in the state of Minas Gerais in 1908. He studied medicine but practised it for only four years—first in the backlands of the Brazilian sertão and later in the army—before joining the Brazilian diplomatic service in which he would serve for the remainder of his life. His childhood and his time spent as a country doctor provided the raw material with which he fashioned an extraordinary fictional world—an amalgam of fantasy, folklore, and myth, yet invariably resting upon a bedrock of harsh reality in which the life of the inhabitants of the vast wilderness, or sertão, of northern Minas Gerais and southern Bahia comes vividly and exuberantly to life. The way of life of the farmers, traders, ranchers, cowboys, and bandits of the sertão is closely observed and painstakingly described. To call these fictions regionalist would be to misunderstand totally the scope and richness of a fictional world that attains a mythic grandeur and universal significance. This attainment of the universal through the particular is well illustrated by the title of Guimarães Rosa’s first book, a collection of novellas entitled Sagarana. Sagarana is a neologism combining the Germanic “saga” with a Tupi Indian word, “rana,” meaning “in the manner of.” Naturalistic and magical by turns, sometimes simultaneously, these novellas tell of a world in which animals talk and think like human beings, a young man insults a warlock and is punished with temporary blindness during which he learns much about himself, and a murderous bully wins redemption after a lifetime of tribulation and wandering. Sagarana was followed ten years later by a second volume of novellas entitled Corpo de baile [Corps de Ballet] and the vast novel, Grande Sertão: Veredas (The Devil to Pay in the Backlands) which appeared in the same year. A literal translation of the latter would be something like “Great Backlands: Paths.” The novel is as enigmatic and elusive as its title. It consists of an autobiography told by an ageing rancher to an unseen interlocutor. Riobaldo relates the story of his career as a jagunço, or bandit of the sertão, of his love for his mysterious, hermaphrodite comrade-in-arms, Diadorim, and of his existential anguish over the possibility that he may have sold his soul to the devil. Riobaldo tells his story in the hope that his listener may be able to pronounce on the mystery and thus release him from his torment. It is a story of love, hate, revenge, and betrayal, a tale of epic proportions in which bandit armies quarter the sertão in search of their enemy, and in Riobaldo’s case, so that his destiny may be charted and realized.

It also reveals Guimarães Rosa as a profound student of medieval and Renaissance European literature. Like the world of the medieval epic and romance, Guimarães Rosa’s fictional world tells of the constant struggle between good and evil, and contains large doses of tragedy and ecstasy as well as an underlying current of poetic justice. It is epic as well as mythic, because its protagonist’s trajectory is clearly, on one hand, a rite of passage, and on the other, a chivalric quest during which deeds are done in the name of an absent lady, Otacília, and in order to fulfil the chivalric enterprise: the defeat of the traitor in the midst, bandit leader Hermógenes, so as to avenge the death of the betrayed—supreme commander Juca Ramiro. The sertão becomes a vast natural theatre or cosmic space in which the jagunços act out this drama and become at one with their environment. Neither the individual nor the space in which they move has primacy. In its scope and ambition, The Devil to Pay in the Backlands has been compared to The Divine Comedy, Don Quixote, Hamlet, Faust, Moby Dick, and Ulysses. In its themes, the work is certainly Faustian, but linguistically-speaking, the comparison with Joyce's Ulysses is the most useful one; for the language in which the novel and the novellas that preceded it are expressed is baroque and intensely poetic. Guimarães Rosa employs alliteration, assonance, onomatopoeia, and verse rhythms. His vocabulary is enormous, and as in the case of Joyce, there is a constant recourse to neologisms of which there can be as many as a dozen on a single page. The language is poetic not only in its evocations of the Brazilian sertão, but also in the fundamental sense that it offers incessant renewal of a Portuguese enriched by a lexis borrowed from numerous languages. Guimarães Rosa also has a taste for metaphor. His fourth book, Primeiras histórias (The Third Book of the River and Other Stories), is a set of short stories in one of which a family man, for no apparent reason, says goodbye to his family, paddles in a canoe to the centre of a wide river, and remains there until his son, years later, offers to take his place. The English title of this story, chosen as the title story for the volume when it was translated and published in 1968, reads "The Third Bank of the River," a notion bespeaking mysticism and utter dislocation.

Guimarães Rosa's remaining books are Tutaméia [Trifle], another set of even briefer stories, the posthumous short stories of Estas histórias [These Tales], and the miscellany, Ave, palavra [Hail, Word]. His prose fiction is little known in Europe. This is due to the fact that translating him into any other language has proved a daunting task and because, in any case, he wrote in Portuguese. This last fact has meant that, unlike the great Spanish-American writers of the Latin American "Boom," he has yet to be "discovered" by the English-speaking world. The day this happens, the Old World will encounter, with astonishment, a rural, Brazilian post-modernist whose total achievement constitutes the great watershed of Brazilian literature, a literary phenomenon commensurate with that of Joyce in English letters.

—R.J. Oakley

H

HADEWIJCH

---

Career: Lived c. 1250, possibly near Antwerp, The Netherlands (now Belgium). Facts of her life uncertain; possibly from an aristocratic background; spiritual leanings show affinities with the Beguines as well as with the mysticism of Hugh of St. Victor, William of St. Thierry, and St. Bernard (of Clairvaux). Her fame spread as far as Germany (where she was known as Adelwîp).

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Werken [Works], edited by F.J. Heremans. 3 vols., 1875–1905.
The Complete Works, translated by Mother Colomba Hart. 1981.
Poetry of Hadewijch, translated and introduction by Marieke J.E.H.T. van Baest. 1998.

Verse

Strophische gedichten [Strophic Poems], edited by J. van Mierlo. 1942.
Mengeldichten [Poems], edited by J. van Mierlo. 1952.
Strofische gedichten [Strophic Poems], edited by E. Rombants and N. de Paepe. 1961.

Other

Visioenen [Visions], edited by J. van Mierlo. 2 vols., 1924–25.
Brieven [Letters], edited by J. van Mierlo. 2 vols., 1947.
Brieven [Letters], translated (into modern Dutch) by M. Ortmanns-Cornet. 1986.

*

Critical Studies: Hadewijch by M.H. van der Zeyde, 1934; Hadewijch d'Anvers by J.B. Porion, 1954; Hadewijch en Heer Hendrik van Breda by P.C. Boeren, 1962; Medieval Netherlands Religious Literature by T. Weevers, translated by E. Colledge, 1965; Some Aspects of Hadewijch's Poetic Form by T.M. Guest, 1975; The Measure of Mystic Thought: A Study of Hadewijch's Mengeldichten by S. Murk-Jansen, 1991; Geschichte der abendländischen Mystik: Frauenmystik und Franziskanische Mystik der Frühzeit by Kurt Ruh, 1993; Hadewijch and Her Sisters: Other Ways of Loving and Knowing by John Giles Milhaven, 1993; Meister Eckhart and the Beguine Mystics: Hadewijch of Brabant, Mechthild of Magdeburg, and Marguerite Porete, edited by Bernard McGinn, 1994; Begeerte in het werk van Hadewijch by Rob Faesen, 2000.

* * *

The 13th-century Christian mystic Hadewijch wrote in Middle Dutch and her work, some of the finest literature in the Dutch language, is preserved in five closely related manuscripts, the earliest of which dates from the late 14th century. Three of these contain the substantial part of the corpus and the other two only smaller selections. The works attributed to Hadewijch consist of 31 letters, 14 visions, the “List of the Perfect Ones,” 45 stanzaic poems, and 16 epistolary poems. The manuscripts also contain two other collections of poems, the smaller of which consists of four poems which may have been written later than Hadewijch. The other collection of lyric poems is almost certainly contemporary to her and should perhaps also be attributed to her.

The currently accepted date for Hadewijch’s literary activity is c. 1240–50. This deduction is based on scraps of evidence gleaned from one of her works, the “List of the Perfect Ones,” which occurs at the end of her visions. In it she refers to two facts that can be dated: the death at the hands of the Inquisitor “Meester Robbaert” of a Beguine, and the presence of hermits on the walls of Jerusalem. The Beguine has been tentatively identified as a certain Aelais whom Robert le Bougre had put to death in 1236, in which case the List would not have been drawn up before that date. Jerusalem finally fell to the Khorezmians on 23 August 1244 and there would not have been any Christian hermits on its walls after that time. Allowing for a certain time lapse before the news reached the author of the List, it seems unlikely that she would have drawn it up much after 1250. There is of course no way of knowing at what point in her career Hadewijch composed the List but, in view of some references in the Visions which precede it, it seems reasonable to assume that she did so in the second half of her career.

We know little about Hadewijch’s life, her circumstances, or her origins. A note on the flyleaf of one of the manuscripts refers to her as “de Antverpia,” but no independent evidence has been found linking her to Antwerp or any other city. Attempts have been made to guess at the possible course of her life from evidence within her works. However, such evidence is extremely sparse and ambiguous. Recently Kurt Ruh has re-opened the debate on Hadewijch’s social status by putting forward powerful circumstantial arguments in favour of her being a member of the aristocracy.

Arguably Hadewijch’s most remarkable literary achievement are the 45 stanzaic poems, written in the style and using the conventions of the courtly love poetry of the period. Many have the Natureingang and complicated rhyme-schemes so typical of much troubadour and trouvère love lyrics. However, Hadewijch uses the conventional themes not to lament the trials of the faithful knight in the service of a demanding and fickle lady, but to lament her own suffering in the service of God. The extended metaphor, combining themes of feudal service and secular love, works particularly well as Hadewijch uses the feminine noun minne (love) to refer to God, which naturally takes feminine adjectives and pronouns, while she refers to herself using the masculine noun sen, meaning reason or mental awareness.

Hadewijch appears to have written for a group of like-minded laywomen. She may have had at some point a position of leadership among them, but her letters certainly suggest that there were also times when she was distant from those whom she exhorted to good works and growth in love. In view of the growing antagonism to such activity in the second half of the 13th century, the fact that she was able to exhort and teach with no apparent expectation or consciousness of ecclesiastical criticism supports the date of her literary activity as being in the earlier part of the century. However personal some of the expressions in her work appear to be, it is likely that everything she wrote was intended to be read out loud, or in the case of the poetry sung, to an audience. Her teaching is rooted in her own experience, as is her theology, and she uses her sufferings and doubts as object lessons to her audience.

The texts attributed to Hadewijch are significant evidence for the development in the 13th century of what could be described as “vernacular theology,” namely a mode of theological writing that is neither that of the theology of the monasteries, with its source in experience and contemplation, nor that of the scholastics, which has its source in reason. Vernacular theology is rooted in the experience of living in the world rather than withdrawing from it, and tends to be expressed in a language rich in images that seek to connect the reality of that experience, including the problem of suffering, with the transcendent reality of the soul’s relationship to God. Themes similar to those found in Hadewijch’s work are to be found in numerous texts from this period as well as in the works of later mystics such as Eckhart and Marguerite Porete.

—S.M. Murk-Jansen

HAFIZ

Born: Shams al-Din Muhammad [or Shamsu’d-Din Muhammad] Hafiz in Shiraz, Persia (now Iran), in 1325/26. Education: Studied Islamic literature and mastered Arabic (the name Hafiz indicates one who has memorized the Koran). Career: Patronized by Shah Abu Ishaq-i Inju, 1341–53, by Shah Shuja, 1358–68/69, and Muzaffarid Shah Mansur in late 1380s; lectured on theology, and wrote commentaries on religious classics. Little is known of his private life. Died: 1389/90.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Fifty Poems of Hafiz, translated and annotated by Arthur J. Arberry, 1993.

The Poems of Hafez, translated by Reza Saberi, 1995.

The Hafez Poems of Gertrude Bell: With the Original Persian on the Facing Page, introduced by E. Denison Ross, 1995.

Verse

Divan, edited by J. von Hammer, 2 vols., 1812–13; also edited by Hermann Brockhaus, 3 vols., 1854–63, Vincenz von Rosenzweig-Schwannau, 3 vols., 1858–64, and Mohammed Qazvini and Qasem Ghani, 1941; as Diwan-i-Hafiz, translated by H. Wilberforce-Clarke (prose), 3 vols., 1891, reprinted 1974; as The Poems, translated by John Payne (verse), 3 vols., 1901; selections in translation include: [Selections], edited by Algernon S. Bicknell, translated by Hermann Bicknell, 1875; Versions from Hafiz by Walter Leaf, 1898; Poems from the Divan by G. Bell, 2nd edition, 1928; Hafiz in Quatrains by C.K. Street, 1946; Fifty Poems by A.J. Arberry, 1947; Thirty Poems by Peter Avery and John Heath-Stubbs, 1952; Poetical Horoscope or Odes by A. Aryanpur, 1965; Odes of Hafiz: Poetical Horoscope by Abbas Aryanpur Kashani, 1984; Tongue of the Hidden: Poems from the Divan by P. Smith, 1990; The Green Sea of Heaven: Fifty Ghazals from the Dīwān of Háfiz, translated by T. Gray, Jr., 1995; In Search of Hafiz: 109 Poems from the Divan of Hafiz, translated by A.J. Alston, 1996.

*

Bibliography: Towards a Hafiz Bibliography by Henri Broms, 1969.

Critical Studies: A Literary History of Persia by Edward G. Browne, 1928; Classical Persian Literature by A.J. Arberry, 1958; History of Iranian Literature by Jan Rypka, edited by Karl Jahn, 1968; Hafez by G.M. Wickens, in Encyclopedia of Islam, revised edition, 1971; Unity in the Ghazals of Hafez by Michael C. Hillmann, 1976; The Spiritual Wisdom of Haféz: Teachings of the Philosopher of Love by Haleh Pourafzal and Roger Montgomery, 1998.

* * *

Even in his lifetime, the fame of Hafiz had extended beyond his homeland—eastward to India and westward to other portions of the Islamic realm. In the first centuries after his death, it was still Islam’s taste for Persian poetry that nourished his reputation; but in the last two or three centuries, when the East and the West have impacted upon each other, Hafiz has become truly a world poet, read in many languages, both Eastern and Western.

Not all readers will agree with Ralph Waldo Emerson (who read him in German translation) that Hafiz ranks with Shakespeare as the type of the true poet; or with John Payne (who translated him into English verse) that he is, along with Shakespeare and Dante, one of the three greatest poets of the world; but there is a consensus that he is “the Prince of Persian poets” and the fullest flowering of the lyric gift in a nation famed for its poetry. Regarding the substance of his poetic thought, however, there is again considerable difference of opinion.

His compatriots and fellow Muslims have for the most part accepted his native reputation as Lisān-al-ghaib [The Tongue of the Hidden]: that is, as a mystical poet of the Sufi school, whose allusions to love, wine, roses, and revelry signify spiritual concepts. A few Westerners, too, have accepted this view—including the philosopher Hegel—but the majority of his European and American readers have had different opinions. Sir William Jones, who in the late 18th century introduced Hafiz to the West, regarded him as “the Persian Anacreon.” Goethe, whose West-östlicher Divan was composed in emulation of the Divan of Hafiz, was disposed to stress the poet’s joy in love and life, as suited the taste of the Romantic age. Emerson, who learned from Hafiz to take deeper poetic drafts than his Puritan heritage allowed, believed the poet’s wine stood for intellectual liberation rather than for the divine afflatus on the one hand or [Thomas] “Moore’s best Port” on the other. The English Victorians, reflecting their own anxieties over faith and doubt, heard in Hafiz the voice of weeping and loud lament; and the fin de siècle hedonists and sceptics saw in him a latter-day Omar Khayyam. In this century, A.J. Arberry, has described him as a philosophical nihilist propounding the gospel of Unreason.

Unfortunately, the ghazal form in which Hafiz wrote (and which, in the opinion of G.M. Wickens, he took “so far beyond the work of his predecessors that he practically cut off all succession”) does not lend itself to easy translation. It has variously been likened to the ode and the sonnet, and, by Arberry, to the late sonatas of Beethoven. The “wonderful inconsecutiveness” of the Persian ghazal (in Emerson’s phrase) has led Arberry, Wickens, and Michael Hillmann to seek in the form a kind of organic unity that is quite unlike the linear and dramatic continuity characteristic of Western poetry. Some hint of the suggestive ambiguity of Hafiz, and of his mellifluous music, might be gleaned from the following couplet:

Hameh kass tāleb-i-yārand, che hushyār che mast
Hameh jā khāneh-i-ishq ast, che masjid che kunasht.

(Everyone is desirous of the Friend, what is sober what is drunk?
Every place is the house of love, what is temple what is mosque?)

—John D. Yohannan

HAGIWARA Sakutarō

Born: Maebashi, Gunma Prefecture, Japan, 1 November 1886. Education: Prefectural Normal School elementary school, 1893–1897; higher level elementary school, 1897–1900; Prefectural Middle School, 1900–1906; failed entrance exam to Osaka Higher Medical School and entered Higher School as an English literature major in Kumamoto, Kyushu, 1907–1908; failed first year of study, entered High School in Okayama as a German literature and law major, 1908; failed his first year, 1909; entered and then dropped out of Keio College Preparatory School, 1910; contracted typhus and dropped out of Okayama high school, 1910; began studying the mandolin in Tokyo and entered then dropped out of the Keio College Preparatory School, 1911; studied guitar and Italian in Tokyo, 1912. Family: Married 1) Ueda Ineko in 1919 (divorced 1929), two daughters; 2) Otani Mitsuko in 1938 (separated 1940). Career: Editor of tanka column in the local newspaper, Jōshū Shinpō, 1913; mandolin concert performances around Maebashi, 1914; lecturer in modern poetry at Meiji University, 1933–1942; gave talks at Bunka Gakuin, 1933; appointed to editorial board of the literary journal Shiki, 1936; became member of the editorial board of Shin Nippon, 1938. Awards: Eighth prizes, Bungakkai journal [Literary World], awarded for essays of poetry criticism in the journal, 1936; Kitamura Tōkoku prize for Kikyōsha [Homecoming], 1940. Member: With Murō Saisei and Yamamura Bochō, established the Ningyo shisha [Mermaid Poetry Society], 1914; established the Gondola Western Music Club (later the Jōmō Mandolin club) in Maebashi, 1915; appointed to selection committee for Bungei Hanron poetry prize, 1936; joined Nihon Roman-ha [Japanese Romantic School], 1936; joined Shin Nihon Bunka no Kai [New Japan Cultural Society], 1937; joined Tokyo Amateur Magicians Club, 1937; member of Nakahara Chūya poetry prize committee, 1938. Died: 11 May 1942 of pneumonia; buried in family plot outside Maebashi.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Hagiwara Sakutarō zenshū. 1943.

Hagiwara Sakutarō zenshū, edited by Murō Saisei and others. 1959–1962.

Hagiwara Sakutarō zenshū. 1975–1978.

Face at the Bottom of the World and Other Poems, translated by Graeme Wilson. 1969.

Rats' Nests: The Collected Poetry of Hagiwara Sakutarō, translated by Robert Epp. 1993.

Verse

Tsuki ni hoeru. 1917; as Howling at the Moon, translated by Hiroaki Satō, 1978.

Atarashiki Yokujō. 1922.

Aoneko [Blue Cat]. 1923; revised as Teihon Aoneko, 1936; as Howling at the Moon and Blue Cat, translated by Hiroaki Satō, forthcoming.

Chō o Yumemu. 1923.

Junjō Shōkyokushū. 1925.

Hyōtō [The Iceland]. 1934.

Shukumei (prose poems). 1939.

Other

Shiron to Kansō. 1928.

Shi no Genri. 1928; as Principles of Poetry, translated by Chester Wang and Isamu P. Fukuchi, 1998.

Kyomō no Seigi. 1929.

Zetsubō no Tōsō. 1935.

“Nekomachi” (short story). 1935.

Kyōshū no Shijin Yosa Buson (critical study on poet Yosa Buson). 1936.

Rōka to Shitsubō. 1936.

Shijin no Shimei. 1937.

Mu kara no Kōsō. 1937.

Nihon e no Kaiki (essay). 1938.

Kikyōsha. 1940.

Minato ni te. 1940.

Adai. 1940.

Hagiwara Sakutarō Shashin Sakuhin: Nostalgia, photographs by Hagiwara Sakutarō, essays by Hagiwara Yoko and Hagiwara Sakumi. 1994.

Editor, Ren'ai Meikashū. 1931.

Editor, Gendai Shishū. 1940.

Editor, Shōwa Shishō. 1940.

*

Critical Studies: “Introduction” in An Anthology of Modern Japanese Poetry edited and translated by Ichiro Kōno and Rikutaro Fukuda, 1959; “Hagiwara Sakutarō” in Dawn to the West: Japanese Literature in the Modern Era: Poetry, Drama, Criticism by Donald Keene, 1984; “Introduction” in Face at the Bottom of the World and Other Poems by Graeme Wilson, 1969; “Introduction” in Howling at the Moon by Hiroaki Satō, 1978; The Language of Symbolism in Yeats and Hagiwara by Reiko Tsukimura, 1968; “Hagiwara Sakutarō” in Modern Japanese Poets and the Nature of Literature by Makoto Ueda, 1983; “Introduction” in Rats' Nests: The Collected Poetry of Hagiwara Sakutarō by Robert Epps, 1993.

* * *

Hagiwara Sakutarō is one of the key figures in modern Japanese poetry. He was among the first to abandon the traditional forms of Japanese poetry (waka) and to free his verse from the constraints of traditional metric rhythms (in particular the 5–7–5–7–7 syllabic pattern characteristic of tanka, the most popular form of Japanese poetry since ancient times). Much of his poetry was also marked by a pioneering use of colloquial language as a medium for lyrical poetic expression. Hagiwara's success with these new forms paved the way for a whole generation of Japanese poets and played a large part in establishing the foundations of modern Japanese verse. His three major collections Tsuki ni hoeru (Howling at the Moon), Aoneko (Blue Cat), and Hyōtō [The Iceland] had a huge impact on the development of poetry in Japan, and although Hagiwara was not alone in moving away from traditional forms of versification, he was perhaps the first to incorporate successfully many of the revolutionary new ideas entering Japan from the West at this time. He was hailed both for the innovative style and for the deeply personal imagery of his poems, many of which are marked by highly lyrical modes of expression.

Hagiwara's first published poems were a series of tanka that were submitted to major Tokyo magazines while he was still in school. Often ill as a child, and so absorbed in poetry that he often neglected his schoolwork and missed classes, he did not graduate from middle school until he was 20, and never graduated from high school at all. As the eldest son of a successful doctor, he could afford to explore his many artistic interests at leisure. In addition to his poetry, Hagiwara was also an accomplished musician and photographer.

In 1913, Hagiwara moved back home to Maebashi and had a Western-style study built in the garden, where he would relax by strumming on his mandolin or reading European literature while sipping on black tea. In addition to his interest in contemporary European movements, Hagiwara also had read a good deal of classical Japanese poetry in school and was familiar with the work of modern poets such as Yosano Akiko. His interest in European poetic movements (primarily Romanticism and French Symbolism) was no doubt encouraged by the publication of Ueda Bin's Kaichōon [The Sound of the Tide], a collection of European Symbolist poetry translated into somewhat free forms of traditional Japanese prosody. Hagiwara was clearly influenced by the poetry of Baudelaire and the French Symbolists but he also borrowed heavily from the conventional images of Japanese poetry. Together, elements from these two widely disparate traditions provided the landscape for a world of pessimism and despair.

His first collection, Howling at the Moon, was recognized as a major breakthrough in poetic technique. In it he turned away from the classical diction of his early poetry and made wide use of colloquial language for the first time, imbuing his verse with a rhythm and sensibility quite different from anything seen in Japan before. Classical motifs were still important elements of Hagiwara's poetics, but they were no longer a part of an abstract, idealized view of a benign and beautiful natural world. Reassuringly familiar tropes such as cherry blossoms, bamboo shoots, and the harvest moon were now incorporated into a world typified by striking new images of rotting shellfish, clanking steam trains, and the overwhelming stench of chrysanthemums. Two poems that dealt with love, "Airen" ("Love") and "Koi wo koi suru Hito" ("A Man Who Loves Love"), were banned by the censors, judged to be "injurious to public morals."

His second collection, Blue Cat (later revised and published as Teihon Aoneko), was quite different both in tone and atmosphere. The psychological background of alienation and decay that had marked Howling at the Moon remained prominent, but now Hagiwara seemed to place greater emphasis on lyrical expressions of sadness and loneliness. In Aoneko, meaning "Blue Cat," the "blue" of the title is suggestive of the melancholy and longing that Hagiwara associated with life in modern society. For Hagiwara, an important part of poetry's appeal was its ability to provide a world of escape. All around him, the world was changing at an unprecedented pace; artists and scientists were able to travel abroad in large numbers for the first time, and older traditions were being rejected in favor of new ideas from Europe. Much of Hagiwara's work is marked by the contradictory desire typical of the times; like many of his contemporaries, Hagiwara was torn between his enthusiasm for the new and a desire to hold on to the spirit of his past.

Hagiwara's dilemma finds perhaps its clearest expression in his last major collection, Hyōtō, in which Hagiwara returned to a more classical style. Many of the poems seem to deal more directly with Hagiwara's personal life than had generally been the case in earlier collections, and the autobiographical notes that Hagiwara added to several of them served to ground them firmly in the prosaic circumstances of the poet's life. Critics are divided in their view of Hyōtō. Some have criticized these later poems for a vision of life that can seem narrow and somewhat limited in comparison to the wild imagination and creativity of Howling at the Moon and Blue Cat. These critics have often seen Hagiwara's return to a classical style as an admission of his "failure" to break new ground. Others, however, have preferred this later poetry, in which Hagiwara finally "graduated" from the escapist fantasy world of his early work. Despite the classical language, the choppy rhythms, and the scattered neologisms, Hagiwara's last poems represent an honest attempt to look at reality and the world the poet inhabited.

Hagiwara continued to write essays, aphorisms, and prose poems after Hyōtō, but hardly any more poetry in verse. In later life, he admitted that this last collection had been a "shameful retreat." Hagiwara was pessimistic in his appraisal of his own writing and achievements. For the rest of his life, he regretted what he regarded as his failure to discover a truly new poetic language, and often expressed a hope that others would succeed where he had failed. Posterity has been kinder to Hagiwara than he was to himself, however, and today his position as the "father of modern Japanese poetry" seems unassailable.

—Emi Shimokawa

HAMSUN, Knut

Born: Knut Pedersen in Lom, Norway, 4 August 1859. Family: Married 1) Bergliot Goepfert in 1898 (divorced 1909), one daughter; 2) Marie Andersen in 1909, two sons and two daughters. Career: Apprenticed to a shoemaker in Bodö; then a road worker and wanderer for 10 years; lived in the United States, 1882–84, 1886–88: streetcar conductor in Chicago, farmhand in North Dakota, and secretary, and lecturer in Minneapolis; lived for several years in Paris, early 1890s; travelled in Finland, Russia, and Denmark during the 1890s and 1900s; writer after 1890, and after 1911 farmer in Hamarøy, later near Grimstad; openly supported Quisling's pro-German party during World War II: indicted, fined, and briefly confined to a mental institution after the war, Awards: Nobel prize for literature, 1920. Died: 19 February 1952.

PUBLICATIONS

Collection

Samlede Verker. 15 vols., 1954–56.

Fiction

Den gaadefulde [The Mysterious One]. 1877.

Bjørger. 1878.

Sult. 1890; as Hunger, translated by George Egerton, 1899; translated by Robert Bly, 1967; also translated by Sverre Lyngstad, 1998.

Mysterier. 1892; as Mysteries, translated by Arthur G. Chater, 1927; also translated by Gerry Bothmer, 1971.

Nyjord. 1893; as Shallow Soil, translated by Carl Christian Hyllested, 1914.

Redaktør Lyng [Editor Lyng]. 1893.

Pan. 1894; as Pan, translated by W.W. Worster, 1920; also translated by James W. McFarlane, 1955.

Siesta. 1897.

Victoria. 1898; as Victoria, translated by Arthur G. Chater, 1923; as Victoria: A Love Story translated by Oliver Stallybrass, 1969.

Kratskrog [Brushwood]. 1903.

Sværmere. 1904; as Mothwise, translated by W.W. Worster, 1921, as Dreamers, 1921; also translated by Tom Geddes, 1995.

Stridende liv [Struggling Life]. 1905.

Under Høststjernen. 1906; as Autumn, translated by W.W. Worster, in Wanderers, 1922; as Under the Autumn Star, translated by Oliver and Gunnvor Stallybrass, in The Wanderer, 1975.

Benoni. 1908; as Benoni, translated by Arthur G. Chater, 1925.

Rosa. 1908; as Rosa, translated by Arthur G. Chater, 1925.

En vandrer spiller med sordin. 1909; as With Muted Strings, translated by W.W. Worster, in Wanderers, 1922; as A Wanderer Plays on Mute Strings, translated by Worster, 1922; as On Muted Strings, translated by Oliver and Gunnvor Stallybrass, in The Wanderer, 1975.

Den siste glæde. 1912; as Look Back on Happiness, translated by Paula Wiking, 1940; as The Last Joy, translated by Sverre Lynstad, 2002.

Børn av tiden. 1913; as Children of the Age, translated by J.S. Scott, 1924.

Segelfoss by. 1915; as Segelfoss Town, translated by J.S. Scott, 1925.

Markens grøde. 1917; as The Growth of the Soil, translated by W.W. Worster, 1920.

Konerne ved Vandposten. 1920; as The Women at the Pump, translated by Arthur G. Chater, 1928; also translated by Oliver and Gunnvor Stallybrass, 1978.

Wanderers (includes Autumn; With Muted Strings), translated by W.W. Worster. 1922.

Siste kapitel. 1923; as Chapter the Last, translated by Arthur G. Chater, 1929.

Landstrykere. 1927; as Vagabonds, translated by Eugene Gay-Tiffit, 1930; as Wayfarers, translated by James W. McFarlane, 1980.

August. 1930; as August, translated by Eugene Gay-Tiffit, 1931.

Men livet lever. 1933; as The Road Leads On, translated by Eugene Gay-Tiffit, 1934.

Ringens sluttet. 1936; as The Ring Is Closed, translated by Eugene Gay-Tiffit, 1937.

Paa gjengrodd Stier. 1949; as On Overgrown Paths, translated by Carl L. Anderson, 1968; also translated by Sverre Lyngstad, 1999.

The Wanderer (includes Under the Autumn Stars; On Muted Strings), translated by Oliver and Gunnvor Stallybrass. 1975.

Night Roamers and Other Stories, translated by Tiina Nunnally. 1992.

Plays

Ved rigets port [At the Gates of the Kingdom] (produced 1896). 1895.

Livets Spil [The Game of Life] (produced 1896). 1896.

Aftenrøde [Evening Glow] (produced 1898). 1898.

Munken Vendt [Friar Vendt] (produced 1926). 1902.

Dronning Tamara [Queen Tamara] (produced 1903). 1903.

Livet i void (produced 1910). 1910; as In the Grip of Life, translated by Graham and Tristan Rawson, 1924.

Verse

Det vilde kor [The Wild Chorus]. 1904.

Dikte. 1921.

Other

Lars Oftedal (articles). 1889.

Fra det moderne Amerikas aandsliv. 1889; as The Cultural Life of Modern America, edited and translated by Barbara Gordon Morgridge, 1969.

I Æventyrland [In the Land of Fairy Tales]. 1903.

Sproget i fare [Language in Danger]. 1918.

Samlede Verker [Collected Works]. 12 vols., 1918; revised edition, 17 vols., 1936.

Artikler 1899–1928, edited by Francis Bull. 1939.

Knut Hamsun som hun var [Letters 1879–1949], edited by Tore Hamsun. 1956.

Paa Turné tre foredrag om Litteratur [On Tour]. 1960.

On the Prairie: A Sketch of the Red River Valley, translated by John Christianson. 1961.

Brev til Marie [Letters to Marie 1908–38], edited by Tore Hamsun. 1970.

Over havet: artikler, reisebrev, edited by Lars Frode Larsen. 1990.

Selected Letters [vol. 1] 1879–1898, edited by Harald Naess and James W. McFarlane. 1990.

*

Bibliography: Hamsun: En bibliografi by Arvid Østby, 1972.

Critical Studies: Hamsun by Hanna Astrup Larsen, 1922; Six Scandinavian Novelists: Lie, Jacobsen, Heidenstam, Selma Lagerlöf, Hamsun, Sigrid Undset by Alrik Gustafson, 1940; Hamsun (in Norwegian) by Tore Hamsun, 1959; Konflikt og visjon by Rolf Nyboe Nettum, 1970; “Critical Attitudes to Hamsun 1890–1969” by Ronald Popperwell, in Scandinavica, 9, 1970; “Knut Hamsun’s Pan: Myth and Symbol” by Henning Schmsdorf, in Edda, 1974; Knut Hamsun som modernist by Peter Kierkegaard, 1975; The Hero in Scandinavian Literature edited by John M. Weinstock and Robert T. Rovinsky, 1975; “Knut Hamsun’s Anti-Semitism” by Allen Simpson, in Edda, 1977; Knut Hamsun by Harald Naess, 1984; Enigma: The Life of Knut Hamsun by Robert Ferguson, 1987; The Roots of Modernist Narrative: Knut Hamsun's Novels Hunger, Mysteries, and Pan by Martin Humpal, 1999.

* * *

Knut Hamsun burst upon Norwegian literature in 1890 with a series of lectures attacking the realist writers, including Ibsen; he appealed instead for a new kind of writing, which he called “psychological literature.” His first novel, Sult (Hunger), published in the same year, embodies his theories. It is the story of a mind—a lively, fantastic, creative mind which ever and again rises irrepressibly above the vicissitudes of a mundane bodily existence. “The unconscious life of the soul” is the centre of focus; the starving artist pacing the streets of Christiania is not an occasion for an attack on social injustice but a creator of a vibrant inner world.

Inspired, often unstable visionaries are the heroes of Hamsun's other early novels Mysterier (Mysteries), Pan, and Victoria. With these novels Hamsun became the first Modernist writer in Scandinavia, reflecting the turbulent inner conflict of modern man; Nietzsche and Dostoevskii were among his antecedents. The interplay of instinct and impulse, the celebration of spontaneity over sober reflection and nature over civilization give his heroes a quixotic air of inconsistency which made his contemporaries dismiss them as “erratic.” His prose style is equally innovative, and has proved imitable—though many have since tried to imitate it. There is a lyrical intensity in his phrasing which makes whole chapters of Pan and Victoria read like prose poems; the rhythms are incantatory, the mood ecstatic. The novels are hymns to love—but it is a self-destructive, impossible love which bars the way to its own fulfilment and mocks at its own despair.

Hamsun's heroes grew older as he himself grew old; and the exuberance of youth gave way to a more disillusioned world-weariness. Social issues, which he had previously dismissed, also preoccupied him increasingly. In Børn av tiden (Children of the Age) and Segelfoss by (Segelfoss Town) he attacked the decadence of modern capitalist society and the emergent workers' movements. Markens grøde (The Growth of the Soil) celebrated instead his ideal, the noble peasant who rejects the softness of city ways and chooses the harsh, unremitting struggle of the pioneering farming life.

Nostalgia for a lost patriarchal era and dislike of modern industrial society were among the factors which led Hamsun towards the end of his long life to support Hitler, a fateful choice for which his countrymen have still not forgiven him. However, the best of his writing is not marred by his political blindness. In his final trilogy, Landstrykere (Wayfarers), August, and Men rivet lever (The Road Leads On), the vitality of his inventiveness and the suppleness of his style are undiminished. August, the central character, is Hamsun's last great adventurer and orchestrator of humanity's dreams—though his stock is running low, and the chill winds of old age and bankruptcy are felt with increasing keenness. But like his creator, he is dogged to the end, and the rich gallery of characters around him is depicted with discerning clarity and a fine sense of life's ironies.

—Janet Garton

See the essay on Hunger.

HARTMANN VON AUE

Born: Swabia, Germany, 1160. Education: Educated in a monastery. Career: Minister in the service of a lord. Took part in a crusade, 1189–90 or 1197. Died: Between 1210 and 1220.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Selections from Hartmann von Aue, translated by Margaret F. Richey. 1962.

Das Hartmann-Liederbuch, edited by Richard Kienast. 1963.

Werke, edited by E. Schwarz. 2 vols., 1967.

Die Lieder Hartmanns von Aue, edited by Ekkehard Blattmann. 1968.

The Narrative Works of Hartmann von Aue, translated by R.W. Fisher. 1983.

Arthurian Romances, Tales, and Lyric Poetry: The Complete Works of Hartmann von Aue, translated with commentary by Frank Tobin, Kim Vivian, Richard H. Lawson. 2001.

Verse

Der arme Heinrich, edited by Johann Gustav Büsching. 1810; also edited by Jacob and Wilhelm Grimm, 1815; Karl Simrok, 1830; W. Wackernagel, 1835; Franz Kocian, 1878; H. Raul, 1882; J.G. Robertson, 1895; E. Gierach, 1911; C.H. Bell, 1931; F. Maurer, 1958; Helmut de Boor, 1967, revised edition by H. Henne, 1987; translated by R.W. Fisher, in The Narrative Works of Hartmann von Aue, 1983.

Das Büchlein, edited by Petrus W. Tax. 1979.

Erec, edited by Moriz Haupt. 1839, revised edition, 1871; also edited by O. von Heinemann, 1898; Albert Litzmann, 1939, revised edition, 1972; as Erec, translated by J.W. Thomas, 1979; also translated by R.W. Fisher, in The Narrative Works of Hartmann von Aue, 1983; Michael Resler, 1987; Thomas L. Keller, 1987.

Gregorius, edited by Karl Lachmann. 1838; also edited by Hermann Paul, 1873; F. Neumann, 1958; as Gregorius: A Medieval Oedipus Legend, translated by Edwin H. Zeydel, 1955; as Gregorius: The Good Sinner, translated by Sheema Zeven Buehne, 1966; as Gregorius, translated by R.W. Fisher, in The Narrative Works of Hartmann von Aue, 1983.

Gedichte, edited by Fedor Bech. 1867.

Iwein, edited by G.F. Benecke and K. Lachmann. 1827; also edited by A. Pernhoffer, 1857; as Iwein, translated by J.W. Thomas, 1979; also translated by R.W. Fisher, in The Narrative Works of Hartmann von Aue, 1983; Patrick M. McConeghy, 1984.

Die Klage, edited by Herta Zutt. 1968.

Das Klagenbüchlein: Hartmann von Aue und das zweite Büchlein, edited by Ludwig Wolff. 1972; edited and translated by Thomas L. Keller, 1986.

*

Bibliography: Bibliographie zu Hartmann von Aue by Elfriede Neubuhr, 1977; revised edition, 1987.

Critical Studies: “An Interpretation of Hartmann's Iwein” by H. Sacker, in Germanic Review, (36), 1961; “Heinrich's Metanoia: Intention and Practice in Der Arme Heinrich” by T. Buck, in Modern Language Review, (60), 1965; Hartmann von Aue and His Lyric Poetry by Leslie Seiffert, 1968; “Christian Allegory in Hartmann’s Iwein” by J. Clifton-Everest, in Germanic Review, (48), 1973; Hartmann von Aue edited by Hugo Kuhn and Christoph Cormeau, 1973; Gregorius and Der arme Heinrich: Hartmann’s Dualistic and Gradualistic Views of Reality by Frank J. Tobin, 1973; Symbolism in Hartmann’s Iwein by R.E. Lewis, 1975; Hartmann von Aue by P. Wapnewski, 1976; “The Fortune in Hartmann’s Erec” by F. Pickering, in German Life and Letters, (30), 1976–77; “The ex lege Rite of Passage in Hartmann’s Iwein” by T.L. Markey, in Colloquia Germanica (II), 1978; “The Maiden in Hartmann’s Armen Heinrich: Enrite Redux?” by W.C. McDonald, in Deutsche Vierteljahresschrift, (53), 1979; “Hartmann’s Gregorius and the Paradox of Sin” by R. Fisher, in Seminar, (17), 1981; Hartmann von Aue: Changing Perspectives edited by Timothy McFarland and Silvia Ranawake, 1988; Hartmann von Aue: Landscapes of the Mind by Susan L. Clark, 1989; Chivalry in Twelfth-Century Germany: The Works of Hartmann von Aue by W.H. Jackson, 1994; The Pilgrimage Motif in the Works of the Medieval German Author Hartmann von Aue by Mary Vandegrift Mills, 1996; Adventures in Interpretation: The Works of Hartman von Aue and Their Critical Reception by Will Hasty, 1996; Bodies of Pain: Suffering in the Works of Hartmann von Aue by Scott E. Pincikowski, 2002.

* * *

According to contemporaries, Hartmann von Aue set the standard for the great generation of German poets flourishing around 1200. Hartmann identifies himself as a “dienstman” (ministerialis) “von Ouwe.” On linguistic grounds we know that he came from Swabia (south-western Germany), a member of the unfree class of ministeriales who, through service as functionaries of the high aristocracy, won noble status for themselves in the course of the 12th century; in his depiction of an ideal knighthood, noble status is legitimated by service to society. He emphasizes his Latin clerical education, unusual for a layman. It is not possible to identify Hartmann’s family—or even his patrons—with any reliability; he may have belonged to the sphere of the Dukes of Zähringen. His literary activity can with confidence be said to extend from about 1180 to around 1205, and he seems to have participated in the Crusade in either 1189–90 or 1197–98; testimony of other poets indicates that he died before 1220.

Hartmann’s oeuvre comprises a youthful disputation on love, Die Klage [The Lover’s Lament]; a substantial corpus of love lyrics whose chronology cannot reliably be determined; and four narrative works: two courtly romances, Erec and Iwein, and between them two religious legends, Gregorius and Der arme Heinrich [Poor Sir Henry]. This sequence for his compositions, posited early on stylistic grounds, has long been accepted.

Hartmann’s two Arthurian romances, Erec and Iwein, were based upon two romances by the French poet Chrétien de Troyes, who inaugurated the genre of Arthurian romance. These works present critically an ideal by which the problematical nature of knightly ways can be explored. Common to Arthurian texts on the model of Chrétien is a tectonic structure in which the hero, accepted into chivalric society, incurs guilt through some specific fault, is repudiated by the community, and must in a second sequence of exploits make good this fault in order to achieve a new, higher integration into aristocratic society. In a system of thematic harmonics which embody the statement of the narrative, the events and persons of these adventures reflect through repetition, parallel, and contrast the nature of the deficiency which is to be remedied.

In spite of its significance as the first German Arthurian romance, Erec, composed soon after 1180, is preserved whole in only a single, large manuscript (the Ambraser MS, a compendium of chivalric poetry) from the early 16th century, and even then its opening is lost; the text has 10,135 verses. Significant divergences from Chrétien show that Hartmann also knew other versions of the story. Erec treats marital sexuality, chivalric violence, and their proper regulation as socially beneficial functions. The compulsive Erec and his devoted wife Enite succumb to the erotic delights of marriage and accordingly neglect their public duty as king and queen; once apprised of his disgrace, Erec imposes absolute silence upon his wife during his quest for rehabilitation, but after repeatedly being saved only through her warnings is forced to acknowledge their marital interdependence. Similarly, he learns to exercise his martial prowess in works of rescue and liberation rather than as an end in itself, and finally through social responsibility merits his crown. Enite, growing in maturity and perception before her husband, can be deemed an equal protagonist. Hartmann points up more strongly than his French source the religious dimension of this idealized chivalry.

Iwein, completed by about 1205, is 8,165 verses in length and adhered much more closely to its French source. It is widely recorded, being preserved in 32 manuscripts (some fragmentary). The foreground theme reflects that of Erec, for the protagonist has here to curb his eagerness for chivalric exploits in order to regain the favour of his wife, whom he has neglected. The essential theme here too, however, is the social function which alone legitimates chivalric feats of arms, for after total breakdown and loss of self, Iwein overcomes his frivolous desire for aventure—the term means both “a chivalric encounter” and “a story about chivalric encounters”—and directs his knightly endeavours to deeds of rescue and the defence of what is just. The plot requires feats of diplomatic persuasion in order to motivate the reconciliations between Iwein and his lady. With its myth and fairytale elements the narrative has less inherent linear focus than Erec. Irony embedded in the work serves to convey the author’s critical play with the values of conventional knighthood and the assumptions of chivalric romance.

In narrative structure Hartmann’s religious legends resemble the romances: the protagonist in all his worldly glory is suddenly struck down because he has failed to live according to God’s ordinance, presuming his fortune to be his by right. Gregorius, 4,007 verses in length and composed either in 1188 or in the 1190s, is recorded in 11 manuscripts. Based on a version of the contemporary French Life of Pope Gregory, it portrays the son of a sibling relationship who, after renouncing a monastic life for the world of chivalry, unknowingly commits incest with his mother. After 17 years of harsh penance he is called to the papal throne, and mother and son devote themselves to God’s service in Rome. This work is probably related to a legend type recorded by the Persian Firdousi (10th century) rather than the Oedipus myth, and it focuses more on the need for penance than on the incurring of guilt. Der arme Heinrich, 1,520 verses long and composed probably around 1195, survives in six manuscripts; it depicts an ideal, courtly knight who, visited with leprosy, fails still to acknowledge God’s sovereignty and is prepared even to countenance the willing sacrifice of a pure young virgin for the sake of his cure. Relenting finally as the surgeon prepares the sacrifice, Henry recognizes God’s will and accepts his life as penance for the sin of worldliness. The peasant girl, his counterpart in delusion, denied immediate salvation by means of her sacrifice, must accept that life on earth is meant to be lived. God rewards their acceptance of his will by curing Henry, who marries the girl below his rank and lives in marriage and penance isolated from courtly society.

With their lucid expression and crafted composition, Hartmann's works illustrate vividly the interaction between clerical learning and the aspirations of the lay aristocracy in a period of dynamic social evolution. Their manuscript transmission suggests that they were perceived to be in distinct categories rather than the work of a single personality; none the less they ranked from the outset as classical models in their genres. Gregorius was translated into Latin as early as 1210, and Iwein served from the 13th century as the basis for cycles of frescoes in Rodeneck in the Tyrol and Schmalkalden in Thuringia. Hartmann's legends have been reworked in the past century by Thomas Mann and Gerhart Hauptmann.

—Lewis Jillings

HAŠEK, Jaroslav

Born: Prague, Bohemia (now Czech Republic), 30 April 1883. Education: Educated at St. Stephen's School, 1891–93; Imperial and Royal Junior Gymnasium, 1893–97, expelled; Czechoslovak Commercial Academy, 1899–1902. Family: Married Jarmila Mayerová in 1910 (separated 1912), one son; bigamous marriage with Shura Lvova in 1920. Career: Worked for a chemist in late 1890s; wrote stories and sketches for several humorous and political magazines from 1901; also wrote and performed cabaret sketches; clerk, Insurance Bank of Slavie, 1902–03; jailed for anarchist rioting, 1907; editor, Svět zvířat [Animal World], 1909–10; assistant editor, Czech Word, 1911; conscripted into the Austrian army, 1915; captured by the Russians: allowed to work for Czech forces in Russia, and staff member, Cechoslovan, Kiev, 1916–18; after a propaganda battle, 1917–18, left Czech group and entered political department of the Siberian Army: editor, Our Path (later Red Arrow), 1919, Red Europe, 1919, and other propaganda journals in Russia and Siberia; sent to Czechoslovakia to do propaganda work, 1920; lived in Lipnice from 1921. Died: 3 January 1923.

PUBLICATIONS

Collection

Spisy [Works]. 16 vols., 1955–68.

Fiction

Dobry vojak Švejk a jiné podivné historky [The Good Soldier Svejk and Other Strange Stories]. 1912.

Trampoty pana Tenkrátá [The Tribulations of Mr. That-Time]. 1912. Průvodčí cizinců a jiné satiry [The Tourists' Guide and Other Satires from Home]. 1913.

Můj obchod se psy a jiné humoresky [My Trade with Dogs and Other Humoresques]. 1915.

Dobry vojak Švejk v zajetí [The Good Soldier Svejk in Captivity]. 1917.

[Two Dozen Stories]. 1920.

Pepíček Nový a jiné povídky [Pepíček Nový and Other Stories]. 1921.

Osudy dobrého vojáka Švejka za světové války. 4 vols., 1921–23; as The Good Soldier Schweik, translated by Paul Selver, 1930; complete version, as The Good Soldier Švejk and His Fortunes in the World War, translated by Cecil Parrott, 1973; as The Fateful Adventures of the Good Soldier Svejk During the World War, translated by Zenny K. Sadlon, 2000.

Tři muži se žralokem a jiné poučné historky [Three Men and a Shark and Other Instructive Stories]. 1921.

Mírová konference a jiné humoresky [The Peace Conference and Other Humoresques]. 1922.

Idylky z pekla (stories), edited by Evžen Paloncý. 1974.

The Red Commissar, Including Further Adventures of the Good Soldier Svejk and Other Stories, translated by Cecil Parrott, 1981.

Povídky (stories). 2 vols., 1988.

The Bachura Scandal and Other Stories and Sketches, translated by Alan Menhennet. 1991.

Other

Lidský profil Jaroslava Haška: korespondence a dokumenty (selected letters 1920–22), edited by Radko Pytlík. 1979.

Tajemství mého pobytu v Rusku (selected essays), edited by Zdeněk Horění. 1985.

*

Bibliography: Bibliografie Jaroslava Haška by Boris Mědílek, 1983.

Critical Studies: Hašek, the Creator of Schweik by Emanuel Frynta, 1965; The Bad Bohemian: The Life of Jaroslav Hašek, 1978, and Jaroslav Hašek: A Study of Svejk and the Short Stories, 1982, both by Cecil Parrott; Jaroslav Hašek and the Good Soldier Schweik by Radko Pytlík, translated by David Short, 1983.

* * *

Jaroslav Hašek wrote his one and only novel, Osudy dobrého vojáka Švejka za světové války (The Good Soldier Švejk and His Fortunes in the World War), in 1921 and 1922, at the very end of his adventurous and chequered life, and left it unfinished at his death. It has been translated into countless languages and is now far better known in the world than any other Czech book—a development which he could never have foreseen. At first the Czech literary “establishment” dismissed the book as unliterary, and it was only when it was translated into German in 1926 and presented by Erwin Piscator in dramatized form at the famous Theater am Nollendorfpfplatz in Berlin in 1928 that it achieved European fame.

When it was published in final form in 1923, it anticipated by several years the wave of popular war books which appeared at the end of the decade, like All Quiet on the Western Front (Im Westen nichts Neues) by Erich Maria Remarque and others. But whereas the authors of such books mostly dwelt on the horror and suffering of war and their disillusionment with it, Hašek, to quote the perceptive judgement of a contemporary Czech writer, Ivan Olbracht, “stood above it” and “just laughed at it.” Olbracht went on to say that he had read several war novels and even written one himself, but none of them showed up World War I “in all its infamy, idiocy and inhumanity” so vividly as Hašek’s.

Hašek found the material for his novel during the one year he spent in the Austrian army on the way to the Eastern Front. Most of its leading characters are modelled on the officers, NCOs, and men of the regiment he served in. He had already invented the character of “The Good Soldier” in 1911, when he wrote five short stories about him, but in his final novel Švejk had become a much rounder and more enigmatic figure. Was he an idiot or only pretending to be one? In consequence of this ambiguity Švejk was caught up in the political struggles between Left and Right in the young republic. The Left wanted to see him as a revolutionary, while the Right condemned him as a dodger and a threat to national morale. While most other readers of the book would laugh aloud at Švejk’s misadventures, Czechoslovakia’s leading critic, F.X. Salda, saw their tragic side. For all its comedy, he wrote, it was a desperately sad book, because in it the individual was fighting against a giant power, against the war.

Hašek himself would have been greatly surprised to know that his book had given rise to such discussions, because he just dictated it as it came into his head—sometimes in the middle of a pub bar—with nothing but a map to go on. He filled the pages of his book with a vast array of fascinating types, whom he involved more often than not in ludicrous situations. He had a Dickensian gift for describing character, although unlike Dickens he did not dwell on their appearance but rather on their actions and manner of speech. He was particularly successful in reproducing the conversations of ordinary men and the anecdotes they tell. And he described in a masterly fashion the scrapes they got into and the idiotic ideas they had, saying under his breath, “Lord, what fools these mortals be.” The book is as much a condemnation of the Austrian Army as it is of the war. Its generals are shown either as inept fuddy-duddies or potential hangmen. (Hašek was of course free for the first time to say exactly what he thought of the monarchy, as it no longer existed.)

In writing his novel Hašek drew on his long experience in contributing short stories and feuilletons to the Czech press, which are said to have amounted to over 1,200. He wrote them for Prague dailies before the war, for the Czech Legion’s newspaper in Kiev during it, and Soviet journals in Siberia after it was over. He wrote easily, but carelessly. He once described a feuilleton as “something which can be read in the morning at breakfast, when a man is still yawning, and in the afternoon, when after lunch he lies agreeably stretched out on a soft sofa, a kind of writing in which one can skip half a column without missing it.” His short stories prove his inexhaustible ingenuity in inventing comic situations, but as the newspapers he contributed to seldom allowed him more than a little over a thousand words they almost all suffer from compression and sometimes end with the point only half made. His best stories are the Bugulma tales, which he published in Prague on his return from Russia after the war, and which recount his experiences as deputy-commandant of a little town beyond the Volga. Although in these he ridicules Soviet petty officials, he is more indulgent to them than he is to Austrians or indeed to his own people.

In the years before the war Hašek acquired something of a reputation as a popular entertainer, when he helped to create a mock political party and posed as its candidate in the national elections. People flocked to hear his improvised speeches, in which he mercilessly pilloried the activities of the Czech political parties. When the elections were over he sat down and wrote up the “annals” of his “party” and ascribed to its members various imaginary exploits, but much of what he wrote was too personal and defamatory to be published at the time and only found its way into print as late as 1963.

None of Hašek’s flamboyant posturings as electioneering agent, speaker at Anarchist rallies, or cabaret entertainer earned him much respect, and his lampoons and tomfoolery alienated many who might otherwise have helped him. By the time war broke out Prague had become rather too hot for him, and he no doubt joined up with a certain feeling of relief. But it can be said of him that he added another dimension to conventional humorous writing by acting and actually living his stories. All his experiences, whether lived or written, bore fruit later, when he drew on them for his one great novel.

—Cecil Parrott

See the essay on The Good Soldier Švejk and His Fortunes in the World War.

HAUPTMANN, Gerhart (Johann Robert)

Born: Ober-Salzbrunn, Silesia, 15 November 1862. Education: Educated at a school in Breslau, from 1874; studied sculpture at Royal College of Art, Breslau, 1880–82; also studied at University of Jena, 1882–83. Family: Married 1) Marie Thienemann in 1885 (divorced 1904; died 1915), three sons; 2) Margarete Marschalk in 1905, one son. Career: Sculptor in Rome, 1883–84; also worked as actor in Berlin, before becoming a full-time writer; co-founder of the literary group Durch. Awards: Grillparzer prize, 1896, 1899, 1905; Goethebünde Schiller prize, 1905; Nobel prize for literature, 1912; Goethe prize (Frankfurt), 1932. Honorary degrees: Oxford University, 1905; University of Leipzig, 1909; University of Prague, 1921; Columbia University, New York, 1932. Ordre pour le Mérite, 1922. Died: 8 June 1946.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Dramatic Works, edited by Ludwig Lewisohn, translated by Lewisohn and others. 9 vols., 1912–29.

Sämtliche Werke, edited by Hans-Egon Hass. 11 vols., 1962–74.

Plays, edited by Reinhold Grimm and Caroline Molina y Vedia, 1994.

Plays

Vor Sonnenaufgang (produced 1889). 1889; as Before Dawn, translated by Leonard Bloomfield, 1909; also translated by Richard Newnham, in Three German Plays, 1963; as Before Daybreak, translated by Peter Bauland, 1978; as Before Sunrise, translated by James Joyce, edited by Jill Perkins, 1978.

Das Friedenfest (produced 1890). 1890; as The Coming of Peace, translated by Janet Achurch and C.E. Wheeler, 1900; as The Reconciliation, in Dramatic Works, 1914.

Einsame Menschen (produced 1891). 1891; as Lonely Lives, translated by Mary Morrison, 1898.

Die Weber (produced 1893). 1892; as The Weavers, translated by Mary Morrison, 1899; also translated by T.H. Lustig, in Five Plays, 1961; Frank Marcus, 1980.

Kollege Crampton (produced 1892). 1892; as Colleague Crampton, translated by Roy Temple House and Ludwig Lewisohn, in Dramatic Works, 1914.

Der Biberpelz (produced 1893). 1893; as The Beaver Coat, translated by Ludwig Lewisohn, 1912; also translated by T.H. Lustig, in Five Plays, 1961.

Hanneles Himmelfahrt (produced 1893). 1893; as Hannele, translated by William Archer, 1894; also translated by Charles Henry Meltzer, 1908; T.H. Lustig, in Five Plays, 1961.

Florian Geyer (produced 1896). 1896; as Florian Geyer, translated by Bayard Quincy Morgan, in Dramatic Works, 1929.

Die versunkene Glocke (produced 1896). 1896; as The Sunken Bell, translated by Mary Harned, 1898; also translated by Charles Henry Meltzer, 1899.

Fuhrmann Henschel (produced 1898). 1898; as Drayman Henschel, translated by Marion A. Redlich, in Dramatic Works, 1913; also translated by T.H. Lustig, in Five Plays, 1961.

Schluck und Jau (produced 1900). 1900; as Schluck and Jau, translated by Ludwig Lewisohn, in Dramatic Works, 1919.

Michael Kramer (produced 1900). 1900; as Michael Kramer, translated by Ludwig Lewisohn, in Dramatic Works, 1914.

Der rote Hahn (produced 1901). 1901; as The Conflagration, translated by Ludwig Lewisohn, in Dramatic Works, 1913.

Der arme Heinrich (produced 1902). 1902; as Henry of Auë, translated by Ludwig Lewisohn, in Dramatic Works, 1914.

Rose Bernd (produced 1903). 1903; as Rose Bernd, translated by Ludwig Lewisohn, in Dramatic Works, 1913; also translated by T.H. Lustig, in Five Plays, 1961.

Elga (produced 1905). 1905; as Elga, translated by Mary Harned, in Dramatic Works, 1919.

Und Pippa tanzt! (produced 1906). 1906; translated as And Pippa Dances, 1907.

Die Jungfrau vom Bischofsberg (produced 1907). 1907; as Maidens of the Mount, translated by Ludwig Lewisohn, in Dramatic Works, 1919.

Kaiser Karls Geisel (produced 1908). 1908; as Charlemagne's Hostage, translated by Ludwig Lewisohn, in Dramatic Works, 1919.

Griselda (produced 1909). 1909; as Griselda, translated by Alice Kauser, in Dramatic Works, 1919.

Die Ratten (produced 1911). 1911; as The Rats, translated by Ludwig Lewisohn, in Dramatic Works, 1913.

Gabriel Schillings Flucht (produced 1912). 1912; as Gabriel Schilling's Flight, translated by Ludwig Lewisohn, in Dramatic Works, 1919.

Festspiel in deutschen Reimen (produced 1913). 1913; as Commemoration Masque, translated by Bayard Quincy Morgan, in Dramatic Works, 1919.

Der Bogen des Odysseus (produced 1914). 1914; as The Bow of Ulysses, translated by Bayard Quincy Morgan, in Dramatic Works, 1919.

Winterballade (produced 1917). 1917; as A Winter Ballad, translated by Edwin and Willa Muir, in Dramatic Works, 1925.

Der weisse Heiland (produced 1920). 1920; as The White Savior, translated by Edwin and Willa Muir, in Dramatic Works, 1925.

Indipohdi (produced 1920). 1920; as Indipohdi, translated by Edwin and Willa Muir, in Dramatic Works, 1925.

Peter Bauer (produced 1921). 1921.

Veland. 1925; as Veland, translated by Edwin Muir, in Dramatic Works, 1929.

Dorothea Angermann (produced 1926). 1926.

Spuk; oder, Die schwarze Maske und Hexenritt (produced 1929). 1929.

Vor Sonnenuntergang (produced 1932). 1932.

Die goldene Harfe (produced 1933). 1933.

Hamlet in Wittenberg (produced 1935). 1935.

Ulrich von Lichtenstein (produced 1939). 1939.

Die Tochter der Kathedrale (produced 1939). 1939.

Atridentralogie: Iphigenie in Aulis; Agamemnon's Tod; Elektra; Iphigenie in Delphi (produced 1940–44). 4 vols., 1941–48.

Magnus Garbe (produced 1942). 1942.

Die Finsternisse. 1947.

Herbert Engelmann, completed by Carl Zuckmayer (produced 1952). 1952.

Five Plays, translated by T.H. Lustig. 1961.

Fiction

Fasching. 1887.

Bahnwärter Thiel. 1888.

Der Apostel. 1890.

Der Narr in Christo, Emanuel Quint. 1910; as The Fool in Christ, Emanuel Quint, translated by Thomas Seltzer, 1911.

Atlantis. 1912; as Atlantis, translated by Adele and Thomas Seltzer, 1913.

Lohengrin. 1913.

Parsival. 1914; as Parsifal, translated by Oakley Williams, 1915.

Der Ketzer von Soana. 1918; as The Heretic of Soana, translated by Bayard Quincy Morgan, 1923.

Phantom. 1922; as Phantom, translated by Bayard Quincy Morgan, 1923.

Die Insel der grossen Mutter. 1924; as The Island of the Great Mother, translated by Edwin and Willa Muir, 1925.

Wanda. 1928.

Buch der Leidenschaft. 1930.

Die Hochzeit auf Buchenhorst. 1931.

Das Meerwunder. 1934.

Im Wirbel der Berufung. 1936.

Der Schuss im Park. 1939.

Das Märchen. 1941.

Mignon. 1944.

Lineman Thiel and Other Tales, translated by Stanley Radcliffe, 1989.

Verse

Promethidenlos. 1885.

Das bunte Buch. 1888.

Anna. 1921.

Die blaue Blume. 1924.

Till Eulenspiegel. 1928.

Ährenlese. 1939.

Der grosse Traum. 1942.

Neue Gedichte. 1946.

Other

- Griechischer Frühling*. 1908.
Ausblicke. 1922.
Gesammelte Werke. 12 vols., 1922.
Um Volk und Geist. 1932.
Gespräche, edited by Josef Chapiro. 1932.
Das Abenteuer meiner Jugend. 2 vols., 1937.
Italienische Reise 1897: Tagebuchaufzeichnungen, edited by Martin Machatzke. 1976.
Diarium 1917 bis 1933, edited by Martin Machatzke. 1980.
Notiz-Kalender 1889 bis 1891, edited by Martin Machatzke. 1982.
Gerhart Hauptmann—Ludwig von Hofmann: Briefwechsel 1894–1944, edited by Herta Hesse-Frielinghaus. 1983.
Otto Brahm, Gerhart Hauptmann: Briefwechsel 1889–1912, edited by Peter Sprengel. 1985.
Tagebuch 1892 bis 1894, edited by Martin Machatzke. 1985.
Tagebücher 1897 bis 1905, edited by Martin Machatzke. 1987.
Ein Leben für Gerhart Hauptmann: Aufsätze aus den Jahren 1929–1990, edited by Walter A. Reichart. 1991.
Gespräche und Interviews mit Gerhart Hauptmann (1894–1946), edited by H.D. Tschörtner, 1994.

*

Bibliography: Gerhart-Hauptmann-Bibliographie by Walter Requardt, 3 vols., 1931; Gerhart-Hauptmann-Bibliographie by Walter A. Reichart, 1969; Gerhart-Hauptmann-Bibliographie by Heinz D. Tschörtner, 1971; Internationale Bibliographie zum Werk Gerhart Hauptmanns by Sigfried Hoefert, 2 vols., 1986–89.

Critical Studies: The Death Problem in the Life and Works of Hauptmann by Frederick A. Klemm, 1939; Gerhart Hauptmann by Hugh F. Garten, 1954; Gerhart Hauptmann: His Life and Work by C.F.W. Behl, 1956; Gerhart Hauptmann: The Prose Plays by Margaret Sinden, 1957; Witness of Deceit: Gerhart Hauptmann as a Critic of Society by Leroy R. Shaw, 1958; Hauptmann: Centenary Lectures edited by K.G. Knight and F. Norman, 1964; Gerhart Hauptmann in Russia, 1889–1917: Reception and Impact by Albert A. Kipa, 1974; From Lessing to Hauptmann: Studies in German Drama by Ladislaus Löb, 1974; Gerhart Hauptmann and Utopia, 1976, and Gerhart Hauptmann: Religious Syncretism and Eastern Religions, 1984, both by Philip Mellen; The Image of the Primitive Giant in the Works of Gerhart Hauptmann by Carolyn Thomas Dussère, 1979; The German Naturalists and Gerhart Hauptmann: Reception and Influence by Alan Marshall, 1982; Hauptmann, Wedekind and Schnitzler by Peter Skrine, 1989; Understanding Gerhart Hauptmann by Warren R. Maurer, 1992.

* * *

Gerhart Hauptmann's reputation as the leading representative of German naturalism has tended to obscure the fact that he enjoyed a period of literary creativity which lasted for more than 60 years. Apart from Goethe, few German writers have succeeded in bequeathing a life's work of such astonishing variety, richness, and breadth. From naturalism to neo-romanticism to 20th-century mysticism and neo-classicism, there are few literary movements between 1880 and 1940 which failed to influence Hauptmann or indeed to be influenced by him.

Hauptmann's plays, ranging from the crude but powerful Vor Sonnenaufgang (Before Dawn), 1889, to the deeply pessimistic recasting of antique sources in the Atridentetralogie [Atriden tetralogy], 1940–44, are remarkable for the easy assurance with which the author displays his mastery of diverse registers, themes, styles, and genres. The raucous naturalism of his earliest work was tempered in 1891 by the performance in Berlin of Einsame Menschen (Lonely Lives), a poignant middle-class tragedy which, in its probing analysis of the roles ascribed by society to women, has lost none of its topicality. Realism re-emerged in Die Weber (The Weavers), a moving account of the ill-fated uprising of the Silesian weavers in 1844, in the comedies Der Biberpelz (The Beaver Coat) and Der rote Hahn (The Conflagration), and in the tightly knit dialect tragedy Fuhrmann Henschel (Drayman Henschel). Even in this early period Hauptmann was not willing to accept the dictates of naturalism in any doctrinaire sense, for in Hanneles Himmelfahrt (Hannele) the techniques of realism are employed as a means of making visual the delirious dreams and mental states of a dying child. Hannele's hallucinations, which express the reality of her wretched childhood and at once represent a flight from it, symbolize Hauptmann's own deepening interest in the workings of the imagination and its relationship to the human capacity to apprehend reality in mythical and poetic ways. This development is carried much further in the dramatic fairytale Die versunkene Glocke (The Sunken Bell), and in a more realistic framework it is evident in the father/son conflict portrayed in the artist tragedy Michael Kramer. The subtlest and most magical expression of this thematic material is the drama Und Pippa tanzt! (And Pippa Dances), a work which owes much to Hauptmann's intensive study of the myths and legends of his native Silesia.

Hauptmann's works of prose fiction reflect in both theme and style the main trends discernible in his development as a dramatist. And similarly, the earlier naturalistic stories such as Fasching and Bahnwärter Thiel have had a greater impact than the mythological and symbolic works of the later period: Der Narr in Christo, Emanuel Quint (The Fool in Christ, Emanuel Quint), Der Ketzer von Soana (The Heretic of Soana), and Die Insel der grossen Mutter (The Island of the Great Mother). Narratives such as Bahnwärter Thiel reveal even more clearly than the naturalistic plays, however, that Hauptmann was transcending naturalism in those very works which explored its themes and its expressive possibilities. The story certainly abounds in fashionable literary touches: the low social position of Thiel, the second-by-second description of trains appearing on the horizon and disappearing in the distance, the realistic "close-up" of a spade turning over the soil, and so on. At the same time, the narrative penetrates beyond realism to suggest the existence of realities and levels of perception which can be grasped only through symbol and myth. The train which kills Thiel's son and destroys Thiel is depicted on one level with all the photographic detail and meticulous accuracy which one expects to find in late 19th-century fiction; on a different level, the train's headlights transform the falling rain into droplets of blood and the train comes to symbolize the unpredictable and chaotic forces of destruction which, in Hauptmann's fictional world, are never very far from surface reality, however rational and well ordered it might appear.

—A.P. Foulkes

See the essay on The Weavers.

HAVEL, Václav

Born: Prague, Czechoslovakia (now Czech Republic), 5 October 1936. Education: Completed compulsory schooling, 1951; difficulty in obtaining higher education because of his “bourgeois” background; attended evening courses while working as apprentice at Prague’s Technical High School 1951–55; after several applications for admission to humanities departments at Charles University were refused he studied economics at Technical High School 1955–57; refused entry to the Academy of Arts in Prague 1959–60. Military Service: 1957–59. Family: Married Olga Šplíchalová in 1964. Career: During the political thaw in the 1960s, after working as stage hand, assistant to the director and dramaturge at various Prague theaters, became resident playwright at Prague’s Theater on the Balustrade where several of his plays were performed; on editorial staff of monthly Tvář; chairman of Czechoslovak Writers’ Association, April 1968; all was cut short by the Soviet-led invasion of Czechoslovakia in August 1968; numerous activities as a “dissident” include letters, reports, editorial works published in samizdat and abroad in numerous translations, involvement in the Charter 77 movement and its famous “Declaration” of 1 January 1977, and serving several prison sentences, one of which was four and a half years; since the demise of Communism in 1990 became President of Czechoslovakia, and in 1992, after the separation of Slovakia, President of the Czech Republic. He was reelected in 1996. Awards: Numerous honorary doctorates; most important awards: Obie prize (United States), 1968, 1970; Austrian prize for European Literature, 1968; Erasmus prize (Netherlands), 1986; German Booksellers’ prize, 1989; International prize of Charles the Great (Germany), 1991; Sonning prize for contribution to European Civilization (Denmark), 1991; Onassis prize for Man and Mankind (Greece), 1993; Indira Gandhi prize (India), 1994; Philadelphia Liberty medal (United States), 1994; Future of Hope medal (Hiroshima), 1995; Fulbright prize (United States), 1997; Honourary doctorate of Oxford University, 1998; Open Society prize (Hungary), 1999.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Spisy [Works]. 7 vols., 1999.

Open Letters: Selected Writings 1965–1990 (selected essays), translated by Paul Wilson et al.; selected and edited by Paul Wilson.

Plays

Rodinný večer. 1960.

Zahradní slavnost (produced in Prague 1963). 1963; as The Garden Party, translated by Vera Blackwell, 1969; also in Selected Plays 1963–1983, 1992; and in The Garden Party and Other Plays, 1993.

Vyrozumění (produced in Prague 1965). 1966; as The Memorandum, translated by Vera Blackwell, 1967, 1980; also in Selected Plays 1963–1983.

Anděl strážný (radio play). 1968.

Motýl na anténě. 1968.

Ztížena možnost soustředění (produced in Prague 1968). 1968; as The Increased Difficulty of Concentration, translated by Vera Blackwell, 1972, 1976; also in Selected Plays 1963–1983.

Spiklenci. 1971.

Audience (first appeared in samizdat 1975). 1975; as Audience, translated by Vera Blackwell, 1978; also translated by George Theiner as Conversation, 1976; by Jan Novak as Audience, 1985; in The Vaněk Plays: Four Authors One Character, 1987; also in Three Vaněk Plays, 1990; and in Selected Plays 1963–1983.

Unveiling (first appeared in samizdat 1975). 1975; as translated by Jan Novak, 1985; also as Private View in Sorry. . ., translated by Vera Blackwell, 1978; as Unveiling in The Vaněk Plays: Four Authors One Character, 1987; also in Three Vaněk Plays; and in Selected Plays 1963–1983.

Žebrácká opera (first appeared in samizdat 1974). 1972; as The Beggar’s Opera, translated by Paul Wilson, 2001.

Horský hotel (first appeared in samizdat 1978). 1976.

Protest (first appeared in samizdat 1978). 1978; as Protest, translated by Vera Blackwell, 1985; in DramaContemporary: Czechoslovakia, 1985; also in Three Vaněk Plays; and in Selected Plays 1963–1983.

Chyba (first appeared in samizdat 1983). As The Mistake, translated by George Theiner, 1984; in Index on Censorship, 1984.

Largo desolato (first appeared in samizdat 1984). 1984; as Largo desolato, English version by Tom Stoppard, 1987.

Pokoušení (first appeared in samizdat 1985). 1985; as Temptation, translated by George Theiner, 1986, in Index on Censorship 1986; also by Marie Winn, 1989.

Asanace (first appeared in samizdat 1987). 1987; as Redevelopment or Slum Clearance, adapted by James Saunders from a literal translation by Marie Winn, 1990.

Zítřa to spustíme!. 1988. As Tomorrow!, translated by Barbara Day, in Czech Plays, 1994.

SELECTED ESSAYS

“Na téma opozice.” 1968; as “On the Theme of Opposition.”

“Dopis Gustávu Husákovi.” 1975; as “Letter to Dr. Gustav Husák, General Secretary of the Czechoslovak Communist Party.”

“Moc bezmocných.” 1978; as “The Power of the Powerless.”

“Politika a svědomí.” 1984; as “Politics and Conscience.”

“Šest poznámek o kultuře.” 1984; as “Six Asides about Culture.”

“Anatomie jedné zdrženlivosti.” 1985; as “Anatomy of Reticence.”

“Slovo o slovu.” 1989; as “A Word About Words.”

Speeches

Projev na konferenci Svazy československých spisovatelů (speech at a conference of the Union of Czechoslovak writers). 1965; as “On Evasive Thinking.”

The Art of the Impossible: Politics as Morality in Practice, Speeches and Writings 1990–1996. 1997; translated by Paul Wilson and others.

Other Texts

Dopisy Olze (červen 1979–září 1982) (first appeared in samizdat). 1983; as Letters to Olga: June 1979–September 1982, translated by Paul Wilson, 1988.

Dálkový výslech 1985–1986 (a book-length interview conducted by Karel Hvížďala). As Disturbing the Peace, translated by Paul Wilson, 1990.
Letní přemítání. 1991; as Summer Meditations, translated by Paul Wilson, 1992

*

Critical Studies: Czech Drama Since World War II by Paul Trensky, 1978; The Silenced Theatre: Czech Playwrights Without a Stage by Marketa Goetz-Stankiewicz, 1979; The Reluctant President: a Political Life of Václav Havel by Michael Simmons, 1991; Václav Havel by Eda Kriseová, 1993; Questions of Identity: Czech and Slovak Ideas of Nationality and Personality by Robert Pynsent, 1994; Václav Havel: a Political Tragedy in Six Acts by John Keane, 1999; Critical Essays on Václav Havel ed. by Marketa Goetz-Stankiewicz and Phyllis Carey, 1999.

* * *

Václav Havel's work can be viewed under three aspects: there is the dramatist whose plays are known in many translations, the "dissident" writer of eloquent essays, and the author of numerous speeches delivered across the world as president of his country after 1990. It seems ironic that Havel's stature as playwright has been overshadowed by his prose for two reasons: between the Soviet-led occupation of Czechoslovakia in 1968 and the demise of Communism in 1989 Havel's powerful essays illuminating the machinery of the Communist system had a strong impact in the West; since 1990 his eloquent presidential speeches have captured the attention of people in all walks of life.

However, although at present receding into the background because of what could be called the sensational extremes of his life, Havel's plays are bound to reemerge in their full importance for our culture. They show the complex relationship of human beings and the system under which they live and are part of; they explore the progressive mechanization of people in our technology-oriented age; and, perhaps most importantly, they put language itself on display and let us watch how language conceals as much as it reveals, how the word can become a tool of enlightenment or obfuscation. Although this may not sound like the stuff that good theater is made of, Havel's plays are highly theatrical, consistently amusing, yet challenging in their many-layered exploration of what it means to be a human being in today's world.

In the background of Havel's plays there always hovers a moral issue but is never pressed explicitly. It concerns, for example, the way "politically correct" language can absurdly lead to success (Zahradní slavnost [The Garden Party]), the talent to rationalize one's decisions even if they are dubious (Protest), the temptation to play "dependable guy" to two opposing sides (Pokoušení [Temptation]), the possible collaboration between guardians and opponents of the law (Žebrárká opera [The Beggar's Opera]), the nature of bureaucratic constellations (Vyrozumění [The Memorandum], Asanace [Slum Clearance], and others). The importance of Havel's dramatic exploration of language—reified and encased in frozen concepts that manipulate the characters' consciousness—cannot be overstated. Although these plays were written under the pressure of a coercive regime, they illuminate issues of topical importance in today's world in a depth that is likely to become increasingly apparent.

Havel's prose writings during the 1970s and 1980 taken abroad via various channels while their author was denied a voice in his own country, made a strong impact on international readership. Their titles speak for themselves: they deal with questions of conscience, conformity, power, culture, and again language as a molder of thought. Refreshingly free of jargon, they are candid and, under the circumstances, bold reflections on human beings and their lives under political pressure.

Since 1990 President Havel has given numerous speeches (invariably written by himself) all over the world. Again, intellectual openness, a sharp eye for the pitfalls of politics, pervasive tolerance, a strong sense of ethical values, and constant stress on human responsibility distinguish these speeches from what we have come to regard as the essential stuff of politics. The horizon of the speeches widens with time, and Havel explores the philosophical, scientific and cultural roots of various civilizations, all merging into the vast question of human identity. His is a significant voice for our times.

—Marketa Goetz-Stankiewicz

HEBBEL, (Christian) Friedrich

Born: Wesselburen, Holstein, Denmark (now Germany), 18 March 1813. Education: Educated in a dame's school, 1817–19; primary school, Wesselburen, 1819–25; in Hamburg a group of benefactors supported him in his studies, and helped send him to the University of Heidelberg, 1836; studied in Munich, 1836; returned to Hamburg, 1839; doctorate, University of Erlangen, 1844. Family: Married Christine Enghaus in 1846, two children; also had two sons (both died in infancy) by Elise Lensing. Career: Servant and clerk for local official, 1827–35; freelance writer in Munich, 1836–39, Hamburg, 1839–43; travel allowance from Christian VIII, King of Denmark, allowed him to live in Paris, 1843–44, and Rome, 1844–45; lived in Vienna from 1845; honorary court librarian, Weimar, 1863. Awards: Schiller prize, 1863. Died: 13 December 1863.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Sämtliche Werke, edited by Richard Maria Werner. 27 vols., 1904–22.
Werke, edited by Gerhard Fricke, Werner Keller, and Karl Pömbacher. 5 vols., 1963–67.

Plays

Judith (produced 1840). 1840; as Judith, translated by Carl van Doren, 1914.
Genoveva (produced 1849). 1843.
Maria Magdalena (produced 1846). 1844; as Maria Magdalena, translated by Barker Fairley, in Three Plays, 1914; also translated by Carl Richard Mueller, 1962; Sarah Somekh, 1990.
Der Diamant (produced 1852). 1847.
Julia (produced 1903). 1848.

Herodes und Mariamne (produced 1849). 1850; as Herod and Mariamne, translated by L.H. Allen, in Three Plays, 1914.
Der Rubin (produced 1849). 1851.
Michel Angelo (produced 1861). 1851.
Ein Trauerspiel in Sizilien (produced 1907). 1851.
Agnes Bernauer (produced 1852). 1852; as Agnes Bernauer, translated by L. Pattee, in Poet Lore, 1909.
Gyges und sein Ring (produced 1889). 1856; as Gyges and His Ring, translated by L.H. Allen, in Three Plays, 1914.
Die Nibelungen (produced 1861). 2 vols., 1862; as The Nibelungs, translated by H. Goldberger, 1921.
Demetrius, from a play by Schiller (produced 1869). 1864.
Ein Steinwurf. 1883.
Three Plays (includes Maria Magdalena; Herod and Mariamne; Gyges and His Ring), translated by L.H. Allen and Barker Fairley, 1914.

Fiction

Schnock: Ein niederländisches Gemälde. 1850.
Erzählungen und Novellen. 1855.

Verse

Gedichte. 1842.
Neue Gedichte. 1848.
Gedichte. 1857.
Mutter und Kind. 1859.

Other

Mein Wort über das Drama! 1843; as “My View on the Drama,” translated by Moody Campbell, 1922.
Über den Stil des Dramas. 1857.
Tagebücher, edited by F. Bamberg. 2 vols., 1885–87.
Neue Hebbel-Briefe, edited by Anni Meetz. 1963.
Der einsame Weg (diaries), edited by Klaus Geissler. 1966.
Briefe, edited by U. Henry Gerlach. 2 vols., 1975–78.

*

Bibliography: Hebbel-Bibliographie 1910–1970 by Ulrich H. Gerlach, 1973; supplements: 1970–1980, in Hebbel-Jahrbuch, 1983; 1981–1984, in Hebbel-Jahrbuch, 1986.

Critical Studies: Friedrich Hebbel as a Dramatic Artist by G. Brychan Rees, 1930; Hebbel: A Study of His Life and Work by Edna Purdie, 1932; Motivation in the Drama of Hebbel by William F. Oechler, 1948; Friedrich Hebbel's Conception of Movement in the Absolute and History, 1952, and Friedrich Hebbel, 1968, both by Sten G. Flygt; Hebbel as a Critic of His Own Works by Ulrich H. Gerlach, 1972; Hebbel's Prose Tragedies by Mary Garland, 1973; From Lessing to Hauptmann: Studies in German Drama by Ladislav Löb, 1974; The Reception of Friedrich Hebbel in Germany in the Era of National Socialism by William John Niven, 1984; Studien zu Hebbels Tagebüchern by Günter Häntzschel, Hg., 1994; Hebbel, Mensch und Dichter im Werk: Sitllicher Revolutionär zur Zeitenwende, edited by Ida Koller-Andorf and Gerda Benesch-Tshanett, 2000.

* * *

Poised between the fading beliefs of philosophical idealism and the positivism that came to replace them in the mid-19th century, Friedrich Hebbel sought for compromises between the literary approaches of German classicism and the new realism in European literature. While he also wrote stories, poems, and comedies, he is chiefly remembered today for a number of tragedies, based mostly on history or legend and inclining towards the “closed” dramatic form.

As a “poetic realist” who held that art should be both a record of empirical observation and a symbol of timeless truth, he defined drama as “the art of mixing the general and the specific so that the law all living things obey never appears naked and is never completely missed” (“Schiller und Körner”). It has been argued that his chief weakness derives from the fact that, despite his acutely realistic awareness of psychological and social determination within a framework of historical change, he resorts to metaphysical notions and orthodox techniques in an attempt to regain idealistic certainties and to elicit meaning from an existence which he feels to be meaningless. As Brecht put it: “Wherever German playwrights started thinking, like Hebbel and before him Schiller, they started contriving.”

Suffering considerable poverty and humiliation before he achieved fame in his fifth and last decade, and inflicting pain on others—particularly on Elise Lensing, a seamstress who supported him for ten years and bore him two sons before he abandoned her to marry the celebrated actress Christine Enghaus—Hebbel was not an attractive personality. Dour and uncompromising, depressive and touchy, yet ruthless and domineering, bristling with the awkwardness of the self-taught and self-made, devoid of humour and beset by brooding pessimism, he maintained that “all life is a struggle of the individual against the universe” (Diaries, September 1840). Individuals, he explains in his treatise Mein Wort über das Drama! (“My View on the Drama”), are obliged by their very nature to incur the guilt—existential rather than moral—of self-assertion, for which they must be destroyed: the destruction occurs through strife with other individuals, although it serves the universal order which itself changes in the process. At times he finds solace in the assumption of the dialectical progress of the universe, but his main emphasis rests on human misery, and he suspects that even the divinity is subject to incongruity and impermanence. These views, which owe something to the unacknowledged influence of Hegel and Schelling, are at the centre of his world-picture and his theory of tragedy.

In all of Hebbel’s major plays the clash of overbearing heroes and victimized heroines reflects both his personal experiences and his Kantian maxim, “To use a human being as a means to an end: the worst sin” (Diaries, May? 1839). However, although his greatest artistic asset is his understanding of the sado-masochistic battle of the sexes, which anticipates Ibsen and Strindberg, he often weakens the impact of his acute insights into emotional quandaries by imposing his transcendental theories on them. In Judith, the idea that the heroine, by killing her adversary Holofernes, will help replace universal idol-worship with monotheism forms an uneasy union with the intriguing exploration of a woman’s confusion of her sense of divine mission and her personal revenge on a brutal lover. In Herodes und Mariamne (Herod and Mariamne) the advent of Christianity to supplant Judaeo-Roman despotism seems an inconsequential afterthought to the fascinating picture of possessiveness and resentment, devotion, hostility, and mutually incompatible desire in marriage, which destroy the heroine and leave the hero in lonely desolation. In Gyges und sein Ring (Gyges and His Ring) the king’s pathological urge to exhibit the beauty of the Queen and her equally pathological modesty merge uncomfortably with the figurative reconciliation of tradition and reformation under their successor to the throne.

There are, however, two instances where Hebbel avoids abstruse speculation. In Agnes Bernauer, a historical tragedy set in the 15th century—in which a barber's daughter marries the son of a ruler, who has her assassinated to prevent a war of succession—his conservative proposition that the citizen must always be sacrificed to the state represents one of his rare political statements and may raise liberal objections, but his handling of the confrontation of love and politics links concrete human reality with abstract thought in a dramatically convincing manner. In Maria Magdalena any abstract thought that may be present is even more effectively transformed into tangible drama. Set in Hebbel's own time, this play—as he argues in his renowned preface—represents a significant innovation in the development of German domestic tragedy since Lessing and Schiller, by deriving the decisive conflict no longer from the opposition of the bourgeoisie and the aristocracy but from the prejudices of the petty bourgeoisie itself. The tragedy of the provincial joiner's daughter—who, on becoming pregnant, is driven to suicide by the desertion of her mercenary seducer and the threats of her bitterly puritanical father—combines the claustrophobically compelling portrayal of characters and circumstances with merciless social criticism to produce not only Hebbel's masterpiece, which Ibsen for one greatly admired, but one of the outstanding works of European realism as a whole.

At the level of dramatic structure, Hebbel's preference for classical methods is liable to prove inconsistent with his modern intuitions. At the level of language, he is most successful when writing contemporary prose, whereas his blank verse is prone to clumsiness, bombast, and anti-climax. At their worst, his plays are hysterical in atmosphere, extravagant in characterization, artificial in situation, and tortuous in argument. At their best, however, they powerfully convey the perplexities of an uncommon mind in an age of transition. Just as his personal egotism was the reverse side of his commitment to his calling, his art with all its harsh idiosyncrasies represents a remarkable document of the struggle of creativity against physical, mental, and social odds.

—Ladislaus Löb

See the essay on Maria Magdalena.

HEINE, Heinrich

Born: Harry Heine in Düsseldorf, Germany, probably 13 December 1797; baptized as protestant, Christian Johann Heinrich Heine, 1825. Education: Educated in a dame's school for 2 years; Hebrew school; Catholic schools, 1804–14; business school, 1814–15; studied law at universities of Bonn, 1819–20, Göttingen, 1820–21, Berlin, 1821–24, Göttingen, 1824–25, doctor of law 1825. Family: Married Crescence Eugénie Mirat in 1841. Career: Apprenticed to a banking house and to a grocery dealer, Frankfurt, 1815; worked in his uncle Salomon's bank, Hamburg, 1816, and was set up in a cloth business, 1818–19; writer in Lüneberg and Hamburg, 1825–27; co-editor, Neue Allgemeine Politische Annalen, Munich, 1827–28; Italy, 1828; Hamburg and Berlin, 1829–31; in Paris from 1831: correspondent for Augsburg

Allgemeine Zeitung; ill after 1845, and bed-ridden after 1848. Died: 17 February 1856.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Sämtliche Werke, edited by Ernst Elster. 7 vols., 1887–90.

Works, translated by Charles Geoffrey Leland and others. 16 vols., 1905.

Sämtliche Schriften, edited by Klaus Briegleb and others. 7 vols., 1968–76.

Säkularausgabe: Werke, Briefwechsel, Lebenszeugnisse. 1970–.

Historisch-kritische Gesamtausgabe der Werke, edited by Manfred Windfuhr. 1973–.

Selected Works, translated by Helen M. Mustard and Max Knight. 1973.

Complete Poems, edited and translated by Hal Draper. 1982.

Selected Prose, edited and translated by Ritchie Robertson. 1993.

Songs of Love & Grief: A Bilingual Anthology in the Verse Forms of the Originals, translated by Walter W. Arndt, 1995.

Verse

Gedichte. 1822.

Tragödien nebst einem lyrischen Intermezzo (includes the plays Almansor and William Ratcliff). 1823.

Buch der Lieder. 1827; revised edition, 1844; as Book of Songs, translated by J.E. Wallis, 1856; also translated by Charles Godfrey Leland, 1864; Stratheir, 1882; Theodore Martin and E.A. Bowring, 1884; John Todhunter, 1907; R. Levy, 1909; Robert R. Garran, 1924.

Neue Gedichte. 1844; revised edition, 1851; as New Poems, 1910.

Deutschland: Ein Wintermärchen. 1844; as Germany: A Winter's Tale, translated by H. Salinger, 1944; as Deutschland: A Winter's Tale, translated by T.J. Reed, 1986; as Deutschland, Deutschland: An Unsentimental Journey, translated by Reed, 1987.

Atta Troll: Ein Sommernachtstraum. 1847; as Atta Troll: A Midsummer Night's Dream, translated by Thomas Selby Egan, in Atta Troll and Other Poems, 1876; also translated by Herman Scheffauer, 1913.

Romanzero. 1851; translated as Romancero, 1905.

Paradox and Poet: The Poems, translated by Louis Untermeyer. 1937.

The Lazarus Poems (bilingual edition), translated by Alistair Elliott. 1979.

Jewish Stories and Hebrew Melodies, translated by Charles Godfrey Leland, Frederic Ewen, and Hal Draper. 1987.

Other

Reisebilder (includes Die Harzreise; Die Heimkehr; Die Nordsee; Ideen: Das Buch Le Grand; Reise von München nach Genua; Die Bäden von Lucca; Die Stadt Lucca, Englische Fragmente). 4 vols., 1826–31; as Pictures of Travel, translated by Charles Godfrey Leland, 1855; also translated by Russell Davis Gilmann, 1907; as Travel Pictures, translated by F. Storr, 1887; as The Italian Travel Sketches, translated by Elizabeth A. Sharp, 1892; as The Harz Journey, translated by Charles G. Leland, 1995.

Französische Zustände. 1833; as French Affairs, 1889.

Zur Geschichte der neueren schönen Literatur in Deutschland. 1833; as Die Romantische Schule, 1836; as The Romantic School, translated by S.L. Fleishman, 1882.

Der Salon. 4 vols., 1834–40.

Shakespeares Mädchen und Frauen. 1839; as Heine on Shakespeare, translated by Ida Benecke, 1895.

Ludwig Börne: Eine Denkschrift. 1840; as Ludwig Börne: Portrait of a Revolutionist, translated by T.S. Egan, 1881.

Der Doktor Faust (ballet scenario). 1851; as Doctor Faust: A Dance Poem, translated by Basil Ashmore, 1952.

Vermischte Schriften (includes Geständnisse, Lutezia). 3 vols., 1854.

Memoiren und neugesammelte Gedichte, Prosa, und Briefe, edited by Eduard Engel. 1884; as Memoirs, translated by T.W. Evans, 1884; also translated by G. Cannon, 1910.

Works of Prose, edited by Hermann Kesten, translated by E.B. Ashton. 1943.

Poetry and Prose, edited by Frederic Ewen, translated by Ewen, Louis Untermeyer, and others. 1948.

Briefe, edited by Friedrich Hirth. 6 vols., 1950–51.

The Sword and the Flame (selected prose), edited by Alfred Werner. 1960.

Begegnungen mit Heine: Berichte der Zeitgenossen, edited by Michael Werner. 2 vols., 1973.

Poetry and Prose, edited by Jost Hermand and Robert C. Holub. 1982.

The Romantic School and Other Essays, edited by Jost Hermand and Robert C. Holub. 1985.

Heinrich Heine und die Musik: publizistische Arbeiten und poetische Reflexionen (selections), edited by Gerhard Müller. 1987.

*

Bibliography: Heine in England and America: A Bibliographical Check-List by Armin Arnold, 1959; Heine-Bibliographie by Gottfried Wilhelm and Eberhard Galley, 2 vols., 1960; supplement by Siegfried Seifert, 1968, and by Siegfried Seifert and Albina A. Volgina, 1986; Heinrich Heine: A Selected Critical Bibliography of the Secondary Literature, 1956–1980 by Jeffrey L. Sammons, 1982; Heine in der Musik: Bibliographie der Heine-Vertonungen by Günter Metzner, 1989–.

Critical Studies: Heinrich Heine: Paradox and the Poet, the Life by Louis Untermeyer, 1937; Judaic Lore in Heine by Israel Tabak, 1948; Heinrich Heine: An Interpretation by Barker Fairley, 1954; The English Legend of Heinrich Heine by Sol Liptzin, 1954; Heinrich Heine: A Biography by Elizabeth M. Butler, 1956; Heine: Two Studies of His Thought and Feeling, 1956, and The Early Love Poetry of Heinrich Heine: An Enquiry into Poetic Inspiration, 1962, both by William Rose; Heinrich Heine: The Artist in Revolt by Max Brod, 1957; Heine: Buch der Lieder, 1960, Heine, The Tragic Satirist: A Study of the Later Poetry 1827–1856, 1962, Heine's Shakespeare: A Study in Contexts, 1970, Heine's Jewish Comedy: A Study of His Portraits of Jews and Judaism, 1983, Coal-Smoke and Englishmen: A Study of Verbal Caricature in the Writings of Heinrich Heine, 1984, and Frankenstein's Island: England and the English in the Writings of Heinrich Heine, 1986, all by S.S. Prawer; Heine by Laura Hofrichter, 1963; The Exile of Gods: Interpretation of a Theme, a Theory and a Technique in the Work of Heinrich Heine by A.I. Sandor, 1967; Heinrich Heine, The Elusive Poet, 1969, and Heinrich Heine: A Modern Biography, 1979, both by Jeffrey L. Sammons; Heine: Poetry and Politics by Nigel Reeves, 1974; Heinrich Heine's Reisebilder: The Tendency of the Text and the Identity of the Age by Edward A. Zlotkowski, 1980; Heine's Reception of German Grecophilia by Robert C. Holub, 1981; Heinrich Heine by Hanna Spencer, 1982; Valiant Heart: A Biography of Heinrich Heine by Philip Kossoff, 1983; Exiles and Ironists: Essays on the Kinship of Heine and Laforgue by Ursula Franklin, 1988; Heine by Ritchie Robertson, 1988; Heine: Poetry in Context: A Study of Buch der Lieder by Michael Perraudin, 1989; Paintings on the Move: Heinrich Heine and the Visual Arts edited by Susanne Zantop, 1989; Heinrich Heine and the Occident: Multiple Identities, Multiple Receptions edited by Peter Uwe Hohendahl and Sander L. Gilman, 1992; The Jewish Reception of Heinrich Heine edited by Mark H. Gelber, 1992; The Poet Dying: Heinrich Heine's Last Years in Paris by Ernst Pawel, 1995; Virtuosity of the Nineteenth Century: Performing Music and Language in Heine, Liszt, and Baudelaire by Susan Bernstein, 1998; By the Rivers of Babylon: Heinrich Heine's Late Songs and Reflections by Roger F. Cook, 1998; Heinrich Heine's Contested Identities: Politics, Religion, and Nationalism in Nineteenth-Century Germany, edited by Jost Hermand and Robert C. Holub, 1999; The Poet as Provocateur: Heinrich Heine and His Critics by George F. Peters, 2000.

* * *

Heinrich Heine is the most widely read or, perhaps one should say, heard, poet to have written in the German language. His poetry has been carried around the world, in his own phrase, “on wings of song,” in more than eight thousand musical settings. It can be difficult to apprehend the poetry accurately through all that music, which in some cases re-romanticizes and resentimentalizes it. For Heine had an exceptionally tense relationship to poetry, including his own. Through much of his career he was a more reactive than strikingly original poet. While he had a great lyrical gift, genuinely fuelled by an experience of unrequited love that became virtually archetypal for him, he doubted the relevance of poetry and its traditional materials in his politically and socially stressed post-Romantic environment. Thus, from within, he undermined the tradition with his bitterly accusatory tone directed toward the beloved, with abrasive irony and jarring stylistic dissonances, with ingenious dexterity and a visible manipulation of poetic devices that exposes them as fictions, ultimately with studied salaciousness and fiercely aggressive political verse. Not until Romanzero in 1851 did he find a genuinely original, mid-19th-century style, a bleak, ironically serious verse composed in the suffering of his “mattress-grave.” With all his misgivings, however, he regarded the poetic vocation as one of high dignity and by mid-life he had doubtless achieved his ambition to succeed Goethe as the major living poet in the German language.

With his prose Reisebilder (Pictures of Travel) beginning in the mid-1820s he developed greater originality of form. With sparkling wit, they weld together essay and fiction, imaginative autobiographical reminiscence and acute contemporary observation, high and low comedy and sardonic social criticism. Though he pretends to easy-going free association, as though setting down the first thing that came into his head, they are, like all of his writing, meticulously formulated and ordered. The comedy and wit, as always with Heine, have a seriously committed purpose. For he lived in gloomily repressive times and was determined to take up arms against the reactionary political order of the neo-feudal Metternichian system, under whose heavy-handed censorship he suffered unremittingly. He came to subsume political and cultural phenomena under a dichotomy of “spiritualism” versus “sensualism” or, in his later vocabulary, “Nazarenism” versus “Hellenism.” What he perceived in the repressive order was a denial of gratification and plenitude, a reservation of aristocratic luxuries and erotic liberty to the privileged few, while the mass of people were kept in superstitious ignorance, compensated for their deprivation by promises of mythical joys in the other world. Since he regarded religion and especially Christianity as part of this conspiracy, he attacked religious institutions and Christian doctrine with an explicitness unparalleled in his generation.

Heine’s at first voluntary, then involuntary exile in France beginning in 1831 was initially motivated by his interest in the Saint-Simonian movement, which for a time he thought congruent with his own vision of emancipation and sensualism. He reported on France in two series of newspaper articles in 1830–32 and 1840–43, published in book form as Französische Zustände (French Affairs), 1833 and Lutezia, 1854. He covers not only political and public events but also music, theatre, art, and the common life of the people. It was a report on the painting exhibition of 1831 that gave the title to a four-volume collection of essays, fiction, and poetry, Der Salon. At the same time he endeavoured to explain Germany to France in terms of a secret revolutionary doctrine of sensualism, in a book directed against Madame de Staël and bearing her title De l’Allemagne, it appeared in two parts in German, as Zur Geschichte der Religion und Philosophie in Deutschland [On the History of Religion and Philosophy in Germany] in Salon II, 1834, and Die Romantische Schule (The Romantic School), 1836. Heine’s views, despite all their vigour and forthrightness, were complex and sometimes gave an impression of capriciousness because of his contradictory commitments. He insisted that he was a democrat, but the commanding figure of his heroic imagination was the conqueror Napoleon, and he sometimes claimed to be a monarchist; he championed the proletariat against the dominant order and yet feared a barbarian destruction of cultural and civilized values; and he turned against his liberal and radical contemporaries because he suspected them of nationalism, which he always strongly opposed, and of puritanical spiritualism. Thus in 1840 he greatly damaged his reputation with an ill-considered book directed against the deceased spokesman of the German dissidents, Ludwig Börne, and then exhibited the opposing vectors of his outlook in two contrasting mock-epic poems, Atta Troll: Ein Sommernachtstraum (Atta Troll: A Midsummer Night’s Dream), which spoofs the radical poets of his time, and Deutschland: Ein Wintermärchen (Germany: A Winter’s Tale), a tough satire on German conditions. The latter, considered the greatest of German political poems, was written during his months of friendship with the young Karl Marx and is the chief product of his most radical phase. With the collapse of his health into painful paralysis, he became more thoughtful and discouraged, and also underwent a religious reversal, though not abandoning his habits of irony, independence, and impudence. He occupied himself with his memoirs, a segment of which appeared as Geständnisse (Confessions) in 1854; the remainder was suppressed by his relatives, with whom he had had a violent public feud over his uncle’s inheritance, and was not published until 28 years after his death.

Few writers of literature have had such an embattled reputation as Heine; he has been scorned by nationalists, conservatives, and anti-semites, and for a long time his reputation was stronger outside Germany. During the current era of his rehabilitation it is sometimes forgotten how much he was himself responsible for the hostility of his public and posterity; he scoffed at their cherished values and his career was often marked by ethical carelessness. But he lucidly drew into himself and exposed with ultimate sincerity the critical dilemmas of his time, and he stands as not only one of the wittiest but also one of the most penetrating writers in European letters.

—Jeffrey L. Sammons

See the essay on “The Homecoming.”

HEINESEN, William

Born: Tórshavn, Faroe Islands (Danish Territory), 15 January 1900. Education: Educated at Copenhagen School of Commerce, 1916–19. Family: Married Elisa Johansen in 1932; three sons. Career: Journalist in Ringsted and Copenhagen, 1919–32, then settled in Tórshavn. Also musician and artist: chair, Faroese Museum of Fine Art, 1969. Awards: Nathansen prize, 1956; Holberg medal, 1960; Danish-Faroese Cultural Fund prize, 1962; Nordic Council prize, 1965; Scandinavian literary prize, 1965; Aarestrup medal, 1968. Member: Danish Academy, 1961. Died: 12 March 1991.

PUBLICATIONS

Fiction

- Stjernerne vaagner* [The Stars Awaken]. 1930.
Blæsende gry [Windswept Dawn]. 1934; revised edition, 1962.
Noatun. 1938; as Niels Peter, translated by Jan Noble, 1939.
Den sorte gryde. 1949; as The Black Cauldron, translated by W. Glyn Jones, 1992.
De fortapte spillemænd. 1950; as The Lost Musicians, translated by Erik J. Friis, 1971.
Moder syvstjerne. 1952; as The Kingdom of the Earth, translated by Hedin Brønner, 1974.
Det fortryllede lys [The Enchanted Light]. 1957.
Gamaliels besættelse [Gamaliel’s Bewitchment]. 1960.
Det gode Håb. 1964; as The Good Hope, translated by John F. West, 1981.
Kur mod onde ånder [Cure Against Evil Spirits]. 1967.
Don Juan fra Tranhuset [Don Juan from the Blubber Works]. 1970.
Fortællinger fra Thorshavn [Stories from Tórshavn], edited by Erik Vagn Jensen. 1973.
Tårnet ved verdens ende. 1976; as The Tower at the Edge of the World, translated by Maja Jackson, 1981; also translated by Anne Born, 1982.
Her skal danses: Seks fortællinger [Let the Dance Go On: Six Stories]. 1980.
The Winged Darkness and Other Stories, translated by Hedin Brønner. 1983.
Laterna magica, nye erindringsnoveller. 1985; as Laterna Magica, translated by Tiina Nunnally, 1987.
Godaften måne, godaften min ven [Good Evening Moon, Good Evening My Friend]. 1989.

Verse

- Arktiske elegier* [Arctic Elegies]. 1921.
Høbjergning ved havet [Haymaking by the Sea]. 1924.
Sange mod vaardybet [Songs at the Spring Deep]. 1927.
Den dunkle sol [The Dark Sun]. 1936.
Digte i udvalg [Selected Poems], edited by Regin Dahl and Ole Wivel. 1955.
Hymne og harmsang [Hymn and Song of Indignation]. 1961.
Panorama med regnbue [Panorama with Rainbow]. 1972.
Arctis: Selected Poems, 1921–1972, translated by Anne Born. 1980.
Vinter-drøm: Digte i udvalg 1920–30 [Winter Dream: Selected Poems 1920–30]. 1983.
Samlede digte [Collected Poems]. 1985.

Plays

- Ranafelli*, in Varthin. 1929.

Other

- Tann deilige Havn* [Fair Tórshavn], with John Davidsen. 1953.
Det dyrebare liv [Precious Life] (biography of J.F. Jacobsen). 1958.
Færøerne, de magiske øer/Førayar, Gandaoyggjarnar/The Faroe Islands, The Magic Islands, photographs by Gérard Franceschi. 1971.
 Editor, Nýfðroyskur skaldskapur. 1930.
 Editor, with H.A. Djurhuus, Livet på Færøerne i billeder og tekst. 1950.

*

Bibliography: William Heinesen—en bibliografi by Mia Thorkenholdt and Lars Øhlenschläger, 1984.

Critical Studies: “Noatum and the Collective Novel,” in Scandinavian Studies, 42(3), 1969, “William Heinesen and the Myth of Conflict,” in Scandinavica, 9, 1970, William Heinesen, 1974, “Tårnet ved verdens ende: A Restatement and an Extension,” in Scandinavian Studies, 50(1), 1978, “Towards Totality: The Poetry of William Heinesen,” in World Literature Today, 62(1), 1988, and “Cultural Perspectives in the Late Work of William Heinesen,” in Grenzerfahrung—Grenzüberschreitung: Studien zu den Literaturen Skandinaviens und Deutschlands, edited by Leonie Marx and Herbert Knust, 1989, all by W. Glyn Jones; Three Faroese Novelists: An Appreciation of Jorgen-Frantz Jacobsen, William Heinesen and Hein Brú, 1973, and “William Heinesen: Faroese Voice—Danish Pen,” in American-Scandinavian Review, 61(2), 1973, both by Hedin Brønner; Godheds ubændige vælde: En lille bog om William Heinesen, Færøernes store danske digter by Ejgil Søholm, 2000.

* * *

William Heinesen was one of the outstanding poets and novelists of Scandinavia in the 20th century, distinguished for the breadth of his imagination and for his linguistic and stylistic brilliance. After moving from his native Tórshavn to Copenhagen, he published exclusively lyric poetry in the 1920s, echoing the neo-Romantic and Symbolist poetry of the turn of the century, but clearly influenced by Johannes V. Jensen, a writer who remained a major source of inspiration to him throughout his life. Originally elegiac and expressive of an awareness of the passage of time and the constant presence of death, the poems gradually develop a more optimistic and dynamic approach, though still bearing the traces of religious speculation caused by the death of the poet’s brother in 1927. The 1930s saw a change, and Heinesen progressed to poems expressing political awareness, often painting satirical portraits of a society dominated by materialism and money. The later poems are often strikingly modernist in idiom, a mixture of the satirical and the more reflective youthful poetry.

Heinesen is, however, chiefly famed for his prose. His novel Blæsende gry [Windswept Dawn] was influenced by the Danish collective novel, but showed a greater interest in the individual personality than was usual in this genre. It was formless but powerful, and was completely recast for a second edition in 1962, in which the emphasis is moved from religious considerations to social questions. Noatum (Niels Peter) continued the collective genre, but towards the end of the 1940s Heinesen started on his major works, Den sorte gryde (The Black Cauldron), De fortabte spillemænd (The Lost Musicians), Moder syvstjerne (The Kingdom of the Earth), and Det gode Håb (The Good Hope). Here he moves from a more or less sober account into the realm of fantasy and imagination, reflecting on man’s place in the universe, the confrontation of life and death forces, the role of woman as the vehicle of life, the mystery of the human psyche. The Good Hope, Heinesen’s only historical novel, is an allegory of a fascist dictatorship as well as a penetrating study of human personality; full of conscious anachronisms and written in a language that smacks of the 17th century without any attempt to be authentic, it is considered by many to be Heinesen’s masterpiece.

After this novel, which took 40 years to complete, Heinesen concentrated on the short story, in which he further explored the themes of his earlier years, though with increasing concentration on the mystery of human nature. His portraits of children are warm and sensitive, often humorous; in particular, he is fond of portraying puberty, revealing the incipient erotic instincts in children unaware of what is happening to them. In the volume of short stories Her skal danses [Let the Dance Go On], he adds to these themes a moving story centred on the cultic significance of the Faroese chain dance, a profound homage to life, with violent death as its background.

It is a matter of regret to many Faroese that Heinesen chose to write in Danish, thereby becoming as much identified with Danish literature as with Faroese. His works are nevertheless intensely Faroese, and uniquely he presents the Faroe Islands as a microcosm in such a way that they are immediately intelligible to the outsider with no previous knowledge of them whatever.

—W. Glyn Jones

HERLIANY, Dorothea Rosa

Born: Magelang, Central Java, 20 October 1963. Education: Elementary school and junior high school in Magelang; senior high school at the Stella Duce High School, Yogyakarta; graduated from the Faculty of Indonesian Language and Literature, Sanata Dharma Teachers College (now University), Yogyakarta, Central Java, 1987.

Family: Married, 1991, two daughters. Career: After graduation, worked for several years as a teacher and part-time journalist before becoming a freelance writer; currently resides in a small village near Magelang, Central Java, where she is a Director of IndonesiaTera, a publishing firm, which she established in 1998. IndonesiaTera also works in the areas of social and cultural research, and the development of information networks relating to culture, education and social awareness.

PUBLICATIONS

Verse

Nyanyian Gaduh. 1987.
Matahari yang Mengalir. 1990.
Kepompong Sunyi. 1993.
Nikah Ilalang. 1995.
Mimpi Gugur Daun Zaitun. 1999.
Kill the Radio: Sebuah Radio, Kumatikan. 2001; bilingual, with English translations and introduction by Harry Aveling.
Para Pembunuh Waktu, Sajak-sajak 1985–2000. 2002.

Fiction

Blencong. 1995.
Karikatur dan Sepotong Cinta. 1996.
Perempuan yang Menunggu. 2000.

* * *

In 1974, the Indonesian government launched a program for women which was designed to promote “community well being.” The Family Welfare Guidance scheme proposed five principles for women’s lives. Each woman was encouraged to (1) support her husband’s career and duties; (2) bear children; (3) care for and raise the children; (4) be a good housekeeper; and (5) be a guardian of the community.

These conventional female roles of wife, mother, and moral exemplar, are the staple of most poetry written by Indonesian men about Indonesian women. At times, the woman on whom the poem focuses is simply described as “you,” without a name, a distinct personality or any clear purpose. At other times, she is the subject of the male gaze; his words describe, direct, and—in a sense—even serve to create her. Sometimes masculine power is clearly expressed in this poetry without reservation. The extremely popular poem “Isteri” (“Wife,” 1980), by Darmanto Yatman (1942–), using the persona of a simple farmer, describes a wife as necessary “to look after us / To sweep the yard / Cook in the kitchen / Wash at the well”; as well as to care for our children “the way we care for our hens, our ducks, the goat and the corn.” The poem concludes: “Honor your wife / as you honor Dewi Sri, / goddess of the rice, / the source of your life. / Eat her, / for so it is written, / and you will be changed / forever.”

The amount of contemporary poetry written in the Indonesian language by women is far less than that written by men. But on the whole, their work also supports these assumptions about the nature of women. Poets such as Selasih (1909–), Hamidah (1915–53), Walujati (1924–), S. Rukiah (1927–), Siti Nuraini (1931–), Isma Sawitri (1940–) and Poppy Hutagalung (1941–), deal with the joys and pains of love and marriage, the delights of motherhood, and the problems of diminishing physical beauty. Until the 1979 anthology Seserpih Pinang Sepucuk Sirih (A Taste of Betel and Lime), edited by Toeti Heraty, poetry by women has also tended to be under-represented in collections of Indonesian literature.

There are, however, a few women writers who have refused to accept these narrow prescriptions. One such is Toeti Heraty (1933–) herself. An academic and scholar, with graduate degrees from the Netherlands and Indonesia, a dominant image in her heavily ironic work is that of the mask, behind which people hide their true personality and feelings. In her work, Heraty seeks a man who will treat her as an equal, face her honestly and openly, instead of pretending to be “manusia jantan, semacam dewa,” a male, almost a god, who demands absolute control over his partner (“Pria,” “Man,” 1970). She has also regrets the almost deliberately self-destructive lack of intimacy between women. The poem “Wanita” (“Woman,” 1967), laments: “how much affection throughout your life / is never expressed, is never enough, / because you don’t care, can’t be bothered / you bear your unhealed sorrow, / without ever realising it, without ever realising it.” The cost of writing without dissimulation or ornamentation is, she admits in “Post scriptum” (“Postscript,” 1995), almost impossible. “To do so,” she confesses, “I would have to reveal myself / and hide / tell lies / and the truth.”

Another non-conventional woman poet is the much younger Dorothea Rosa Herliany, a teacher who now manages a small press in Magelang, Central Java. Herliany began writing in 1985 and has now established herself one of the most important poets writing in Indonesia.

Her poetry shares little of Toeti Heraty’s concern for self-concealment or hesitant reticence. “When I married you,” the poem “Buku Hari Perkawinan” [“Wedding Diary,” 2000] begins, “I never promised to be faithful.” In fact, she continues, “you agreed to be my slave.” The poem sees the marriage as a field of battle, on which the female narrator must surely triumph, conquering him and satisfying both their sexual hungers, hers first, then his through her active intervention. The sense that sexual intercourse is a field of struggle, of both pain and satisfaction, occurs in many of her other poems, sometimes even with a final gesture of castration towards the man who causes woman such suffering. “Nikah Pisau” (“Married to a Knife,” 1992) ends with the graphic assertion: “I stab you in the heart and / tear off your prick / in my pain.”

What makes Herliany’s poetry so threatening is her simple inversion of the usual conventions of Indonesian society. It is the women who are aggressive and sexually predatory, it is the men who are passive victims and unable to protect themselves. These strategies are further reinforced by her use of dark images that she relates to the human body in various ways. Valleys and ravines, maggots, illness and decay, death and corruption, all feature strongly in much of her mature work.

Herliany also explores the realm of love outside marriage. Within the repressive attitudes of Indonesian society, however, the result of such adventures is guilt rather than personal liberation. “Surat Cinta” (“Love Letter”) sets out confidently: “I decided on a pretty act of betrayal / when I left to satisfy a simple desire.” It ends in frustration and anger: “awareness showed me too / how fierce disappointment can be.” Significantly, in a number of poems addressed to various women, Herliany does find a comfort to which Heraty can only gesture in the poem “Woman.”

Dorothea Rosa Herliany’s willingness to explore all dimensions of human experience, through her emotions rather than through her intellect, gives her writing a graphic, often shocking quality, with which few other Indonesian writers can compare. As a still comparatively young writer, with an enormous potential yet to be developed, this poetry demands our ongoing attention.

—Harry Aveling

HERNÁNDEZ, José

Born: Pueyrredón (now part of San Martín), Argentina, 10 November 1834. Education: Educated to elementary level at the school of Don Pedro Sánchez, Barracas, 1841–45. Family: Married Carolina González del Solar in 1863; four daughters and one son. Career: Worked with his father, in Camarones and Laguna de los Padres, 1846–52; supported the Federalists against the Unitarians (joined the Federal Reform Party, 1855), and fought at the battles of Rincón de San Gregorio (1853) and El Tala (1854), then travelled to Paraña, capital of the Confederation of Argentina, to escape persecution in Buenos Aires; store assistant and judicial scribe, Paraná, 1856–58; stenographer for the Confederation Senate, 1859; appointed Second Official to the Confederation's government, 1859; fought at the battle of Cepeda, 1859; private secretary to President Juan Esteban Pedernera, 1860; received promotion to Captain, and fought at the battle of Pavón, 1861; secretary, Convention of Nogoyá, 1864; state attorney and secretary of the legislature, Corrientes, 1867–68; editor, El Eco de Corrientes, 1867–68; joined the resistance movement of Evaristo López Jordán, 1868; ministerial secretary under López, La Paz, 1868; co-founder, Club de los Libres, 1869; fought under Ricardo López Jordán against President Sarmiento at the battle of Ñaembé, 1871; lived in Buenos Aires, 1872–73; followed Jordán into exile into Montevideo, Uruguay (then part of Brazil), 1873–75; settled in Belgrano, following amnesty from the new President Avellaneda, 1875; deputy for the provincial legislature, 1879–80; vice-president, Chamber of Deputies, 1880; provincial senator, 1881–86; co-founder, national insurance company "La Previsora," 1884; board-member, Banco Hipotecario, from 1884. Also political journalist, including: contributor, La Reforma Pacífica, from 1856, and El Argentino, from 1863; editor, El Nacional Argentino, 1860, and El Argentino, 1863; founding editor, Río de la Plata, 1869–70, and La Patria, Montevideo, 1873–75. Died: 21 October 1886.

PUBLICATIONS

Verse

El gaucho Martín Fierro; La vuelta de Martín Fierro. 2 vols., 1872–79; edited by Eleuterio F. Tiscornia, 1925 (corrected by Santiago M. Lugones, 1926), Ramón Estrella Gutiérrez, 1953, José Edmundo Clemente, 1953, Augusto Raúl Cortázar, 1961, Jorge Becco, 1962, Walter Rela, 1963, Pilo Mayo, 1970, Luis Sáinz de Medrono, 1979, and Gisela Frechou and Mónica García, 1984; as The Gaucho Martín Fierro, translated and adapted by Walter Owen, 1935; also translated by Catherine E. Ward (bilingual edition), annotated by Frank G. Carrino and Alberto J. Carlos, 1967; as Martín Fierro: The Argentine Gaucho Epic, translated by Henry Alfred Holmes, 1948.

Los otros poemas. 1968.

Other

Rasgos biográficos del general Ángel V. Peñaloza. 1863.

Vida del Chacho: rasgos biográficos del general Angel Vicente Peñaloza. 1863 (in magazine); 1947 (as book).

Instrucción del estanciero (cattle rancher's guide). 1882.

Las Malvinas (writings about Falkland Islands). 1982.

*

Bibliography: Itinerario bibliográfico y hemerográfico del Martín Fierro by José Carlos Maubé 1943; José Hernández: Martín Fierro y su crítica by Augusto Raúl Cortázar, 1960.

Critical Studies: Martín Fierro: An Epic of the Argentine by Henry Alfred Holmes, 1923; La lengua de Martín Fierro by Eluterio Tiscornia, 1930; El poeta creador: Cómo hizo Hernández La vuelta de Martín Fierro by Carlos Alberto Leumann, 1945; Los motivos del Martín Fierro en la vida de José Hernández by Pedro de Paoli, 1947; El mito gaucho: Martín Fierro y el hombre argentino by Carlos Astrada, 1948; Muerte y transfiguración de Martín Fierro by Ezequiel Martínez Estrada, 1948, revised edition, 2 vols., 1958; Martín Fierro by Enrique Bianchi, 1952; Prosas del Martín Fierro by Antonio Pagés Larraya, 1952; El Martín Fierro by Jorge Luis Borges and Margarita Guerrero, 1953; José Hernández: Periodista, político y poeta, 1959, and La vuelta de José Hernández, 1973, both by Fermín Chávez; La elaboración literaria del Martín Fierro, 1960, and Con el Martín Fierro, 1968, both by Ángel Héctor Azeves; Martín Fierro y La justicia social by Eduardo B. Astesano, 1963; El nombre, el pago y la frontera de Martín Fierro by R. Darío Capdevila, 1967; Arte y sentido del Martín Fierro by John B. Hughes, 1970; Valoración de Martín Fierro by Héctor Adolfo Cordero, 1971; José Hernández by Noé Jitrik, 1971; Genio y figura de José Hernández by Roque Raúl Aragón, 1972; Ida y vuelta de José Hernández by Andrés Carretero, 1972; Contenido histórico-social del Martín Fierro by Néstor A. Fayó, 1972; José Hernández by Hjalmar E. Gammalsson, 1972; Tiempo y vida de José Hernández by Horacio Zorraquín Becú, 1972; Hernández: Poesía y política by Rodolfo Borello, 1973; De las aguas profundas en el Martín Fierro by Bernardo Cana-Feijóo, 1973; La creación del Martín Fierro by Emilio Carilla, 1973; Hernandismo y martin-fierro by Elías Giménez Vega and Julio González, 1975; Prehistoria del Martín Fierro by Olga Fernández Latour de Botas, 1977; José Hernández y sus mundos by Tulio Halperín Donghi, 1985; José Hernández: Sus ideas políticas by Enrique de Gandía, 1985; Martín Fierro: Cien años de crítica edited by José Isaacson, 1986; Cuatro Versiones del Martín Fierro by Alba Omil, 1994; Las Vidas de José Hernández by Beatriz Celina Doallo, 1995; Concordancias del poema Martín Fierro by Angela B. Dellepiane, 1995; Tres arquetipos argentinos: Sarmiento, Hernández, Lugones by César Rosales, 1999; Las voces secretas del Martín Fierro by Víctor Zenobi, 2000.

* * *

José Hernández was the last of a series of 19th-century Argentinian writers of gauchesque poetry: they were educated men who imitated in their works the idiom and naive style of the songs of the pampas cowboys. (The best known of the others are Bartolomé Hidalgo, Hilario de Ascasubi and Estanislao del Campo.) This genre tended to treat the gaucho as a figure of fun; Hernández, however, exalted the gaucho's virtues of courage, endurance, and honour, while also denouncing the abuses to which contemporary society subjected such men.

In travel literature, and in anthropological and sociological writing, the gauchos had frequently been described as ill-educated, workshy, violent, nomadic, and antisocial, and in the quarrel between Unitarians (Centralists) and Federalists which divided Argentinians for most of the 19th century, they were depicted by Unitarian writers as an obstacle to democracy and progress because of their support for the caudillos, men who had led their own armies in the Independence wars and became de facto political leaders in the power-vacuum left by the departure of the Spanish. In Domingo Sarmiento's Life in the Argentine Republic in the Days of the Tyrants not merely the cowboy, but cattle-ranching itself, is seen as barbaric.

Hernández's book, Vida del Chacho [The Life of El Chacho] is a polemical and uplifting portrait of the Federalist General Peñaloza, who had been killed by the Unitarians. Much of Hernández's writing took the form of political journalism. In 1869 he founded a newspaper, in which he published fierce attacks on several aspects of Sarmiento's government's policy, particularly the use of vagrancy laws to conscript gauchos forcibly into service in the wars against the natives.

Hernández's best-known work is his long narrative poem published in two parts, El gaucho Martín Fierro [The Gaucho Martín Fierro], 1872, entitled in some later editions La ida de Martín Fierro [Martín Fierro's Departure] and La vuelta de Martín Fierro [The Return of Martín Fierro], 1879. There are many humorous moments, but the prevailing tone of the first part of the poem is one of bitter moral indignation, and the contemporary audience would have recognized it immediately as a polemical work directed against the government of the day, although there are aspects of the poem that contradict or modify this political intention: for example, Martín Fierro often uses concepts such as "fate" or "luck" in commenting on his predicament.

In contrast to the humanitarian sentiments experienced in relation to the gaucho, the 20th-century reader may be struck by the expression of racist feelings in the poem. Martín Fierro, at one point, addresses racial insults to a black man. Fierro admits that he is drunk and feels like picking a fight, but in the course of the duel the black man offends against the gaucho fighting code by being the first to take out a knife, thereby restoring Martín Fierro's position as the man of honour. Italian and English immigrants are also portrayed unfavourably in the poem: Hernández thus expresses his opposition to Sarmiento's policy of encouraging European immigration as a means of reducing Argentina's dependence on the cattle industry and the cowboys. The portrayal of the native pampas Indians is more complex: Hernández's main aim, in the first part of the poem, is to criticize the conduct of the Indian wars. To this end, he depicts the natives as fierce warriors and excellent horsemen, that is, as formidable opponents who should have been countered with well-fed and well-equipped troops. He has no particular interest in depicting the natives negatively in any other respect, and in fact Fierro and his friend Cruz state confidently, at the end of this part of the poem, that the life they propose with the natives will be preferable to life under Sarmiento.

The first part of the poem proved immensely popular with both the educated audience and the gauchos it depicted. Two years after its publication, political circumstances changed in Argentina. President Avellaneda ushered in an era of national reconciliation and Hernández was elected to the Senate. The Gaucho Martín Fierro strikes a mellower note than the first part of the poem. Many critics, such as Noé Jitrik, consider the second part inferior to the first: it is more consciously literary, seeking to tie up the loose ends of the story, yet the structure is more diffuse, for the sequel narrates not only the subsequent adventures of Fierro and Cruz (until the latter's death), but also those of Fierro's two sons, whom he re-encounters, and that of Cruz's son, Picardía. All are shown to have suffered misfortune, but the powerful moral anger of the first part seems to have been dissipated. The mood of national reconciliation is expressed in the final episode, in which Martín Fierro is confronted by the brother of the black man he had killed in part one. Instead of the expected duel with knives, they are persuaded to settle their differences by means of a payada or improvised singing contest. Martín Fierro wins, and the black man leaves, though still threatening that he may one day return and exact vengeance.

The mood of reconciliation does not extend to the natives. Hernández seems eager in this second part of the poem to establish the native peoples as the ethnic and religious enemy, depicting them as barbarous, cruel, and unfeeling, a vision that is at odds with the majority of the anthropological evidence. Ángel Héctor Azeves suggests in La elaboración literaria del Martín Fierro that Hernández drew on information supplied by an uncle who had published a study of the native peoples written from a military rather than an anthropological viewpoint.

The poem has been described by Santiago Lugones and others as the national epic of Argentina. While the term is perhaps not appropriate in its strict rhetorical sense, it may be considered apt in that the poem exalts the gauchos, who were instrumental in winning independence from Spain, and who made a vital contribution to the main economic activity of the nation—cattle-raising. Today the poem is familiar to all Argentinians.

—A. McDermott

See the essay on The Gaucho Martín Fierro.

HERODOTUS

Born: c. 490–84 BC. Possibly related to the ruling family of Halicarnassus, Asia Minor. Career: Moved to Samos during civil strife, c. 460 BC; travelled and lectured in Greece, including Athens, and settled in the Athenian colony of Thurii in south Italy (founded 444–43 BC); also travelled in south Italy, Egypt, the Near East and Babylon, Scythia and the Black Sea, and the north Aegean. Died: Probably before 420 BC.

PUBLICATIONS

Works

[History], edited by Carl Hude. 2 vols., 1927; also edited by P.E. Legrand, 11 vols., 1932–54; as The History, translated by George Rawlinson, 4 vols., 1858–60, this translation edited by A.W. Lawrence, 1935, and abridged by W.G. Forrest, 1966; also translated by A.D. Godley [Loeb Edition], 4 vols., 1920–24; Enoch Powell, 1949; Aubrey de Selincourt, 1954; H. Carter, 1962; David Greene, 1987; translated in part by Walter Blanco and Jennifer Tolbert Roberts, 1992; as The Histories, translated by Robin Waterfield, 1998.

Selections, edited by Amy L. Barbour. 1985.

*

Critical Studies: Commentary on Herodotus by W.W. How and Joseph Wells, 2 vols., 1912, revised edition, 1928; The World of Herodotus by Aubrey de Selincourt, 1962; Form and Thought in Herodotus by H.R. Immerwahr, 1966; Herodotus: An Interpretative Essay by C.W. Fornara, 1971; Herodotus, Father of History by J.L. Myres, 1971; The Histories of Herodotus: An Analysis of the Formal Structure by H. Wood, 1972; The Interrelation of Speech and Action in the Histories of Herodotus by Paavo Hohti, 1976; Herodotus and Greek History by John Hart, 1982; Past and Process in Herodotus and Thucydides by Virginia J. Hunter, 1982; Aspectual Usage of the Dynamic Infinitives in Herodotus by Peter Stork, 1982; Herodotean Narrative and Discourse by Mabel Lang, 1984; Herodotus: Persian Wars—A Companion to the Penguin Translation of Histories V–IX edited by Stephen Usher, 1988; Herodotus and His “Sources”: Citation, Invention and Narrative Art by Detlev Fehling, 1989; Herodotus, 1989, and Give and Take in Herodotus, 1991, both by John Gould; Herodotus, Explorer of the Past by J.A.S. Evans, 1991; Heroes in Herodotus: The Interaction of Myth and History by Elizabeth Vandiver, 1991; Herodotus, The Histories: New Translation, Selection, Backgrounds, Commentaries edited by Walter Blanco and Jennifer Tolbert Roberts, 1992; The Malice of Herodotus by Plutarch, translated by A.J. Bowen, 1992; The Historical Method of Herodotus by Donald Lateiner, 1992; The Liar School of Herodotus by W. Kendrick Pritchett, 1993; The Relationship Between Herodotus’ History and Primary History by Sara Mandell and David Noel Freedman, 1993; Word Order in Ancient Greek: A Pragmatic Account of Word Order Variation in Herodotus by Helma Dik, 1995; Discourses on the First Book of Herodotus by James A. Arieti, 1995; The Significant and the Insignificant: Five Studies in Herodotus’ View of History by J.E. van der Veen, 1996; Herodotus and the Origins of the Political Community: Arion’s Leap by Norma Thompson, 1996; The Tragedy in History: Herodotus and Deuteronomistic History by Flemming A.J. Nielsen, 1997; Herodotus by James Romm, 1998; Slaves, Warfare, and Ideology in the Greek Historians by Peter Hunt, 1998; Herodotean Inquiries by Seth Benardete, 1999; Herodotus in Context: Ethnography, Science and the Art of Persuasion by Rosalind Thomas, 2000; Divinity and History: The Religion of Herodotus by Thomas Harrison, 2000; The Historian’s Craft in the Age of Herodotus, edited by Nino Luraghi, 2001; Telling Wonders: Ethnographic and Political Discourse in the Work of Herodotus by Rosaria Vignolo Munson, 2001.

* * *

Herodotus is traditionally styled “Father of History,” and rightly so—he invented it. There were before him a few local chronicles and geographical studies, which have entirely perished; no one had essayed a great and significant theme, nor assembled masses of material from diverse sources and organized them into a coherent whole. As there is no reason to think that those lost works were of any great literary merit, Herodotus is also entitled to be regarded as a pioneer of artistic prose composition.

Yet there is nothing primitive or unsophisticated about Herodotus. He aims to record for posterity the great deeds of men, and his chosen vehicle is the conflict between the Greeks and the Persians that reached its climax with Xerxes’ defeat by the Greeks in 480–79 bc. His handling of that tremendous theme shows a remarkable sense of planning and design: the first half of the work is devoted to the rise of Persia to her greatest extent; the second, by a smoothly negotiated transition, to her wars against the Greeks. The story unfolds in no crude annalistic way: instead it proceeds by a mixture of narrative and digression. The digressions are sometimes little more than footnotes; equally often they are substantial chapters, carefully designed to explain the background to the main narrative, while spacing out its climactic points. Some of these are miniature narratives themselves; others are extended essays in ethnology or sociology, such as the full-length study of Egypt (Book II).

Herodotus understands the broad tides of history, making it clear that Persia’s aggression was motivated by imperialist expansion; he is equally good on the grand strategy of the combatants in 480–79 bc—such non-narrative issues being conveyed through direct speech put into the mouths of his characters. He is noticeably weaker on detailed military tactics, however, and tends to personalize the causes of lesser events. He does not gloss over the failings of the Greeks at war—their occasional loss of nerve, the inter-allied bickerings; war itself he hates, despite the glorious exploits associated with it.

Accepting the Homeric picture of man’s relationship with the gods, he emphasizes the role of oracles in Greek life, and often quotes oracular texts, many authentic, some spurious. His “theological” passages, such as the story of Xerxes’ cabinet meeting (VII), teach the lesson that man cannot escape his destiny, and that the gods are envious of excessive prosperity in mortals. This pessimistic view informs his whole work, which is tinged with sadness and pity for human suffering; yet this is lightened by passages of irresistible sparkle and humour—Aristagoras’ appeal to Sparta (V), “Hippocleides doesn’t care” (VI), and dozens of others. His Greek is unmannered and effortless, resembling an educated man’s friendly conversation.

Herodotus was a man of broad sympathies. His travels furnished him with a wide variety of oral sources, and enabled him to appreciate the “barbarian” point of view; but he was equally at home with the Athenian nobility, some of whose family history he records. His interests include poetry (he quotes from Pindar, Simonides, and many others), the visual arts, and medicine. But above all, he is concerned with humanity, and, like Homer, describes man’s behaviour as he finds it: heroism, generosity, foresight, loyalty, vindictiveness, xenophobia, cowardice, treachery, corruption, paranoia, sacrilege—all these, and more, are exemplified many times over in his pages. But what sets Herodotus apart from most other ancient historians is his conviction that history is more than war, politics, and diplomacy. Today, students of social and cultural history can regard Herodotus as their truest ancestor.

—John Hart

HESIOD

Career: Lived c. 700 bc. According to the poet himself, he lived in Ascra in Boeotia (central Greece), and tended sheep on Mount Helicon; won a tripod at the funeral games of Amphidamas in Chalcis; the story of his meeting and contest with Homer was probably a fictional account. Died: Said to have died in Locri or Orchomenus.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

[Works], edited by Friedrich Solmsen, R. Merkelbach, and M.L. West. 1970; revised edition, 1983; translated by J. Mair, 1908; also translated by Hugh G. Evelyn-White [Loeb Edition; prose], 1936; also translated by Richmond Lattimore, 1959; Dorothea Wender, 1973; Apostolos N. Athanassakis, 1983; R.M. Frazer, 1983; selection as The Essential Hesiod, translated by C.J. Rowe, 1978; as Works and Days; and Theogony, translated by Stanley Lombardo, 1993; as Hesiod's Works and Days, translation with commentary by David W. Tandy and Walter C. Neale, 1996; also translated by David Grene, 1998.

Verse

Theogonia, edited by M.L. West (with commentary). 1966; edited and translated by Richard Caldwell, 1988; as Theogony, translated by Norman O. Brown (prose), 1953; also translated by M.L. West, with Works and Days, 1988.

Opera et dies, edited by M.L. West (with commentary). 1978; as Works and Days, translated by M.L. West, with Theogony, 1988.

*

Critical Studies: Hesiod and Aeschylus by Friedrich Solmsen, 1949; The World of Hesiod: A Study of the Greek Middle Ages c. 900–700 BC by A.R. Burn, 1966; Hesiod and the Near East by Peter Walcot, 1966; The Language of Hesiod in Its Traditional Context by G.P. Edwards, 1971; The Winged Word: A Study in the Technique of Ancient Greek Oral Composition as Seen Principally Through Hesiod's "Works and Days" by B. Peabody, 1975; Hesiod and the Language of Poetry by Pietro Pucci, 1976; Hesiod and Parmenides by M.E. Pelikaan-Engel, 1977; The Hesiodic Catalogue of Women: Its Nature, Structure, and Origins by M.L. West, 1985; The Architecture of Hesiodic Poetry by Richard Hamilton, 1988; Hesiod by Robert Lamberton, 1988; Heat and Lust: Hesiod's Midsummer Festival Scene Revisited by J.C.B. Petropoulos, 1994; Greek Myths and Mesopotamia: Parallels and Influence in the Homeric Hymns and Hesiod by Charles Penglase, 1994; Hesiod and Aeschylus by Friedrich Solmsen, 1995; God and the Land: The Metaphysics of Farming in Hesiod and Vergil by Stephanie A. Nelson, 1998; Homer and Hesiod: Myth and Philosophy by Richard Gotshalk, 2000.

* * *

Antiquity attributed a number of poems to Hesiod: besides Theogonia (Theogony) and Opera et dies (Works and Days), the only ones which are both nearly intact and probably genuine, there is a fragmentary Catalogue of Women (or Eoiai), a spurious Shield of Herakles, and some others of which we know little more than the titles.

The Theogony begins with a prayer-song celebrating the Muses, recounting their encounter with the poet on the foothills of Helicon, and invoking their power to fill him with true song. They start with a cosmogony. Chaos, the primal chasm, came first into being, then Earth, the Underworld, and Eros, sexual desire, the primal energy from which further creation flowed. Once he has established that primordial being is a unity, and material if also divine, the poet interests himself mainly in the emergence of the various gods, and the generations of their rulers. First in power were nature gods, Earth and Heaven; then came Cronus and the Titans, who ruled by force and violence; these were replaced by Zeus and the Olympians, the present regime, characterized by intelligence as well as power, and a deathless being which transcends nature. The shift in power from Earth and Sky is accomplished by a savage fulfilment of the Freudian Oedipal wish: the boy Cronus, at the instigation of his mother Earth, castrates his father Heaven and takes his throne. The triumph of Zeus over Cronus is different, a triumph of practical intelligence. Cronus is deceived by his mother Earth into swallowing a stone when he intended to devour his son Zeus. Zeus had the sense to free the spirits of lightning and thunder, who armed him with weapons to crush Cronus and the Titans, weapons he still uses. Mental agility will keep Zeus in power: warned that his first wife Metis (Intelligence) is to give birth to Athena, her father's equal in strength and wisdom, and a son destined to rule, Zeus swallows Metis and procures her power for himself: Athena is born from his head, and the son is never conceived.

A myth is needed to illustrate the quality of intelligence that rules the world, and Hesiod adapts Prometheus. The hero first tricks Zeus into granting humans the better share of sacrifices. Zeus does not undo, but rather compensates, by withholding fire from mortals. Prometheus steals the fire; again Zeus compensates, fashioning the first woman, regarded by Hesiod as a mixed blessing at best. Divine retribution is creative rather than destructive, a balancing which achieves a kind of justice.

If the cosmos began as a unity, it is a unity no longer: the transcendent has seemingly emerged from primal matter and become Olympian. But Olympus is not born, any more than it was present at the beginning: its becoming is as mysterious as its supernatural being. Though beyond nature, it is somehow above us; occasionally called Heaven, it is in fact a place beyond the sky. At the other pole lies Tartarus, the Underworld, where the defeated Titans dwell, along with Night, Sleep, and Death. Above Tartarus is a chasm, perhaps identical with primordial Chaos; then comes the natural world and the monsters "beyond the sea," such as the Gorgons, Echidna, and the defunct Medusa.

The Theogony's suggestion of a close connection among Zeus, Earth, and Justice is developed into an elaborate theodicy in the Works and Days. The premises are, not unexpectedly, questionable; but the argument is highly rational. Zeus is a just god, who rewards the good and punishes the wicked. The good, in this Iron age of ours, are those who honour the goddess good Strife, competition; the wicked are worshippers of bad Strife—battle, disputation, and theft legal and illegal. Strife (Eris) is thus the energy of human purposes, just as Sexual Desire (Eros) is the energy of the Theogony. We all desire wealth, but it must be acquired justly, through good strife, or else the gods will destroy us, our offspring, our cities. And this means that we must work. It was not always thus: as the myths of Prometheus-Pandora and of the Decadence from the Golden Age reveal, Zeus has punished human arrogance by hiding our livelihood. But the life of hard work is not a mere avoidance of evil, rather a fulfilment of justice, an honourable response to the act of a just Zeus. Hesiod's paradigm for work is the life of the farmer, who struggles to be in harmony with Zeus, Heaven and Earth, divinities of Olympus and of Nature. This life is depicted in the imperative mood: "Now plough, now sow, now reap," a device which combines description with prudential—and moral—imperative. The poem ends with a superstitious Catalogue of Good and Bad Days for doing things, which many scholars have adjudged spurious. But the bulk of the poem is a well thought-out and logical vindication of a life of honourable competition in harmony with nature and a just God.

The style of Hesiod is the oral-epic style of Homer. Whether Hesiod utilized writing is not known, but he probably shaped and reshaped his poems for many years. Their final form is somewhat, but probably not radically, different from what we read. Catalogue poetry such as the Theogony, didactic verse such as the Works and Days, will have its wearisome moments for modern readers. But—to name only a sample—the opening portions of both poems, and the description of Zeus' battle with the Titans and of the Underworld in the Theogony, are exceedingly powerful reflections of apocalyptic inspiration.

—William Merritt Sale

HESSE, Hermann

Born: Calw, Württemberg, Germany, 2 July 1877. Education: Educated at Basle Mission; Rector Otto Bauer's latin school, Göppingen, 1890–91; Protestant Seminary, Maulbronn, 1891–92; Cannstatt Gymnasium, 1892–93. Military Service: Volunteer, as editor of books and magazines for prisoners of war in Switzerland during World War I. Family: Married 1) Marie Bernoulli in 1904 (divorced 1923), three sons; 2) Ruth Wenger in 1924 (divorced 1927); 3) Ninon Auslander Boldin in 1931. Career: Clock factory apprentice, Calw, 1894–95; apprentice, 1895–98, then assistant, 1898–99, Heckenhauer bookshop, Tübingen; worked for bookdealers in Basle, 1899–1903; freelance writer from 1903; editor, März, 1907–15; co-editor, Vivos Voco, 1919–20; also editor of publishers' book series in 1910s and 1920s; regular contributor to Carona and Bonniers Litterära Magasin in 1930s. Lived in Gaienhofen, Germany, 1904–12, near Berne, Switzerland, 1912–19, and Montagnola, Switzerland, 1919–62. Awards: Bauernfeldpreis (Vienna), 1904; Fontane prize (refused), 1919; Keller prize, 1936; Nobel prize for literature, 1946; Goethe prize, 1946; Raabe prize, 1950; German Book Trade Peace prize, 1955. Honorary doctorate: University of Berne, 1947. Died: 9 August 1962.

PUBLICATIONS

Collection

Werkausgabe, edited by Volker Michels. 12 vols., 1970; supplement, 2 vols., 1972.

Fiction

Peter Camenzind. 1904; as Peter Camenzind, translated by W.J. Strachan, 1961; also translated by Michael Roloff, 1969.

Unterm Rad. 1906; as The Prodigy, translated by W.J. Strachan, 1957; as Beneath the Wheel, translated by Michael Roloff, 1968.

Diesseits: Erzählungen. 1907; revised edition, 1930.

Nachbarn: Erzählungen. 1908.

Gertrud. 1910; as Gertrude and I, translated by Adèle Lewisohn, 1915; as Gertrude, translated by Hilda Rosner, 1955.

Umwege: Erzählungen. 1912.

Anton Schievelbeyns ohn-freywillige Reise nacher Ost-Indien. 1914.

Der Hausierer. 1914.

Rosshalde. 1914; as Rosshalde, translated by Ralph Manheim, 1970.

Knulp: Drei Geschichten aus dem Leben Knulps. 1915; as Knulp: Three Tales from the Life of Knulp, translated by Ralph Manheim, 1971.

Am Weg. 1915.

Schön ist die Jugend: Zwei Erzählungen. 1916.

Hans Dierlamms Lehrzeit. 1916.

Alte Geschichten: Zwei Erzählungen. 1918.

Zwei Märchen. 1919; revised edition, 1946, 1955; as Strange News from Another Star and Other Tales, translated by Denver Lindley, 1972.

Demian: Geschichte einer Jugend. 1919; as Demian, translated by N.H. Priday, 1923; translated by W.J. Strachan, 1958; also translated by Stanley Appelbaum, 2002.

Im Pressel'schen Gartenhaus. 1920.

Klingsors letzter Sommer: Erzählungen. 1920; as Klingsor's Last Summer, translated by Richard and Clara Winston, 1970.

Siddhartha: Eine indische Dichtung. 1922; as Siddhartha, translated by Hilda Rosner, 1951; as Siddhartha: An Indian Tale, translated by Joachim Neugroschel, 1999; translated by Stanley Appelbaum, 1999; also translated by Sherab Chödzin Kohn, 2000.

Psychologia balnearia; oder, Glossen eines Badener Kurgastes. 1924; as Kurgast, 1925.

Die Verlogung: Erzählungen. 1924.

Der Steppenwolf. 1927; as Steppenwolf, translated by Basil Creighton, 1929; revised edition by Joseph Mileck, 1963.

Narziss und Goldmund. 1930; as Death and the Lover, translated by Geoffrey Dunlop, 1932; as Goldmund, 1959; as Narcissus and Goldmund, translated by Ursule Molinaro, 1968, also translated by Leila Vennewitz, 1993.

Die Morgenlandfahrt. 1932; as The Journey to the East, translated by Hilda Rosner, 1956.

Kleine Welt: Erzählungen. 1933.

Fabulierbuch: Erzählungen. 1935.

Das Glasperlenspiel. 1943; as Magister Ludi, translated by Mervyn Savill, 1949; as The Glass Bead Game, translated by Richard and Clara Winston, 1969.

Der Pfirsichbaum und andere Erzählungen. 1945.

Traumfährte: Neue Erzählungen und Märchen. 1945.

Berthold: Ein Romanfragment. 1945.

Glück (collection). 1952.

Zwei jugendliche Erzählungen. 1957.

Freunde: Erzählungen. 1957.

Geheimnisse: Letzte Erzählungen. 1964.

Erwin. 1965.

Aus Kinderzeiten und andere Erzählungen. 1968.

Stories of Five Decades, edited by Theodore Ziolkowski, translated by Ralph Manheim. 1972.

Die Erzählungen. 2 vols., 1973.

Six Novels, with Other Stories and Essays. 1980.

Pictor's Metamorphoses and Other Fantasies, edited by Theodor Ziolkowski, translated by Rika Lesser, 1982.
The Fairy Tales of Hermann Hesse, translated with introduction by Jack Zipes, 1995.

Verse

Romantische Lieder. 1899.
Hinterlassene Schriften und Gedichte von Hermann Lauscher. 1901; revised edition as Hermann Lauscher, 1907.
Gedichte. 1902.
Unterwegs. 1911.
Musik des Einsamen: Neue Gedichte. 1915.
Gedichte des Malers. 1920.
Ausgewählte Gedichte. 1921.
Trost der Nacht: Neue Gedichte. 1929.
Vom Baum des Lebens: Ausgewählte Gedichte. 1934.
Das Haus der Träume. 1936.
Stunden im Garten: Eine Idylle. 1936.
Neue Gedichte. 1937.
Die Gedichte. 1942.
Der Blütenzweig: Eine Auswahl aus den Gedichten. 1945.
Bericht an die Freunde: Letzte Gedichte. 1961.
Die späten Gedichte. 1963.
Poems, translated by James Wright. 1970.
Hours in the Garden and Other Poems, translated by Rika Lesser. 1979.

Other

Eine Stunde hinter Mitternacht. 1899.
Boccaccio. 1904.
Franz von Assisi. 1904.
Aus Indien: Aufzeichnungen von einer indische Reise. 1913.
Zum Sieg. 1915.
Brief ins Feld. 1916.
Zarathustras Wiederkehr: Ein Wort an die deutsche Jugend. 1919.
Kleiner Garten: Erlebnisse und Dichtungen. 1919.
Wanderung: Aufzeichnungen. 1920; as Wandering: Notes and Sketches, translated by James Wright, 1972.
Blick ins Chaos: Drei Aufsätze. 1920; as In Sight of Chaos, translated by Stephen Hudson, 1923.
Elf Aquarelle aus dem Tessin. 1921.
Sinclair's Notizbuch. 1923.
Erinnerung an Lektüre. 1925.
Bilderbuch: Schilderungen. 1926.
Die schwere Weg. 1927.
Die Nürnberger Reise. 1927.
Betrachtungen. 1928.
Krisis: Ein Stück Tagebuch. 1928; as Crisis: Pages from a Diary, translated by Ralph Manheim, 1975.
Eine Bibliothek der Weltliteratur. 1929; revised edition, 1957.
Zum Gedächtnis unseres Vaters, with Adele Hesse. 1930.
Gedenklblätter. 1937.
Aus der Kindheit der heiligen Franz von Assisi. 1938.
Der Novalis: Aus den Papieren eines Altmodischen. 1940.
Kleine Betrachtungen: Sechs Aufsätze. 1941.
Dank an Goethe. 1946.
Der Europäer. 1946.

Krieg und Frieden: Betrachtungen zu Krieg und Politik seit dem Jahr 1914. 1946; revised edition, 1949; as If the War Goes On . . . : Reflections on War and Politics, translated by Ralph Manheim, 1971.
Stufen der Menschwerdung. 1947.
Frühe Prosa. 1948.
Berg und See: Zwei Landschaftsstudien. 1948.
Gerbersau. 2 vols., 1949.
Aus vielen Jahren. 1949.
Späte Prosa. 1951.
Briefe. 1951; revised edition, 1959, 1964.
Eine Handvoll Briefe. 1951.
Gesammelte Dichtungen. 6 vols., 1952; enlarged edition as Gesammelte Schriften, 7 vols., 1957.
Über das Alter. 1954.
Briefe, with Romain Rolland. 1954.
Aquarelle aus dem Tessin. 1955.
Beschwörungen: Späte Prosa, neue Folge. 1955.
Abendwolken: Zwei Aufsätze. 1956.
Aus einem Tagebuch des Jahres 1920. 1960.
Aerzte: Ein paar Erinnerungen. 1963.
Prosa aus dem Nachlass, edited by Ninon Hesse. 1965.
Neue deutscher Bücher. 1965.
Kindheit und Jugend vor Neunzehnhundert, edited by Ninon Hesse. 1966.
Briefwechsel, with Thomas Mann, edited by Anni Carlsson. 1968; revised edition, 1975; also edited by Hans Wysling, 1984; as The Hesse/Mann Letters: The Correspondence of Hermann Hesse and Thomas Mann, 1910–1955, translated by Ralph Manheim, 1975.
Briefwechsel 1945–1959, with Peter Suhrkamp, edited by Siegfried Unseld. 1969.
Politische Betrachtungen. 1970.
Eine Literaturgeschichte in Rezensionen und Aufsätzen, edited by Volker Michels. 1970.
Beschreibung einer Landschaft. 1971.
Lektüre für Minuten, edited by Volker Michels. 1971; as Reflections, translated by Ralph Manheim, 1974.
Meine Glaube, edited by Siegfried Unseld. 1971; as My Belief: Essays on Life and Art, edited by Theodore Ziolkowski, translated by Denver Lindley and Ralph Manheim, 1974.
Zwei Autorenporträts in Briefen 1897 bis 1900: Hesse—Helene Voigt-Diederichs. 1971.
Eigensinn: Autobiographische Schriften, edited by Siegfried Unseld. 1972; as Autobiographical Writings, edited by Theodore Ziolkowski, translated by Denver Lindley, 1972.
Briefwechsel aus der Nähe, with Karl Kerényi, edited by Magda Kerényi. 1972.
Gesammelte Briefe, edited by Ursula and Volker Michels. 4 vols., 1972–86.
Die Kunst des Müsiggangs: Kurze Prosa aus dem Nachlass, edited by Volker Michels. 1973.
Hermann Hesse, R.J. Humm: Briefwechsel, edited by Ursula and Volker Michels. 1977.
Politik des Gewissens: die politische Schriften 1914–1932, edited by Volker Michels. 2 vols., 1977.
Die Welt im Buch, edited by Volker Michels. 1977.
Briefwechsel mit Heinrich Wiegand, 1924–1934, edited by Klaus Pezold. 1978.
Hermann Hesse/Hans Sturzenegger: Briefwechsel, edited by Kurt Bächtold. 1984.

- Bodensee: Betrachtungen, Erzählungen, Gedichte*, edited by Volker Michels. 1986.
- Soul of the Age: The Selected Letters, 1891–1962*, edited by Theodore Ziolkowski. 1991.
- Editor, with others, Der Lindenbaum, deutsche Volkslieder. 1910.
- Editor, Der Zauberbrunnen. 1913.
- Editor, Der Wandsbecker Bote, by Matthias Claudias. 1916.
- Editor, Alemannenbuch. 1919.
- Editor, with Walter Stich, Ein Schwabenbuch für die deutschen Kriegsgefangenen. 1919.
- Editor, Ein Luzerner Junker vor hundert Jahren, by Xaver Schnyder von Wartensee. 1920.
- Editor, Dichtungen, by Solomon Gessner. 1922.
- Editor, Mordprozesse. 1922.
- Editor, Novellino. 1922.
- Editor, with Karl Isenberg, Novalis: Dokumente seines Lebens und Sterbens. 1925.
- Editor, with Karl Isenburg, Hölderlin: Dokumente seines Lebens. 1925.
- Editor, Geschichten aus dem Mittelalter. 1925.
- Editor, Sesam: Orientalische Erzählungen. 1925.

*

Bibliography:: Hermann-Hesse-Bibliographie by M. Pfeifer, 1973; Hermann Hesse: Biography and Bibliography by Joseph Mileck, 2 vols., 1977.

Critical Studies:: Faith from the Abyss: Hermann Hesse's Way from Romanticism to Modernity by Ernst Rose, 1965; The Novels of Hermann Hesse, 1965, and Hesse, 1966, both by Theodore Ziolkowski, and Hesse: A Collection of Critical Essays edited by Ziolkowski, 1973; Hermann Hesse: His Mind and Art by Mark Boulby, 1967; Hermann Hesse by G.W. Field, 1970; Hesse: An Illustrated Biography by Bernhard Zeller, 1971; Hermann Hesse by Edwin F. Casebeer, 1972; Hesse's Futuristic Idealism by Roger C. Norton, 1973; Hermann Hesse, The Man Who Sought and Found Himself by Walter Sorrell, 1974; Hesse: A Pictorial Biography by Volker Michels, translated by Theodore and Yetta Ziolkowski, 1975; Hermann Hesse: A Collection of Criticism edited by Judith Lieberman, 1977; Hermann Hesse: Life and Art by Joseph Mileck, 1978; Hermann Hesse's Fictions of the Self: Autobiography and the Confessional Imagination by Eugene L. Stelzig, 1978; Hermann Hesse's Quest: The Evolution of the Dichter Figure in His Work by Kurt J. Fickert, 1978; Hermann Hesse: Pilgrim of Crisis: A Biography by Ralph Freedman, 1979; Hermann Hesse's Das Glasperlenspiel: A Concealed Defense of the Mother World by Edmund Ray, 1983; Hermann Hesse: Politische und wirkungsgechichtliche Aspekte edited by Sigrid Bauschinger and Albert Reh, 1986; The Hero's Quest for the Self: An Archetypal Approach to Hesse's Demian and Other Novels by David G. Richards, 1987; The Ideal of Heimat in the Works of Hermann Hesse by Andreas Kiryakakis, 1988; A Poet or Nothing At All: The Tübingen and Basel Years of Hermann Hesse by Richard C. Helt, 1996; Exploring the Divided Self: Hermann Hesse's Steppenwolf and Its Critics by David G. Richards, 1996; Understanding Hermann Hesse: The Man, His Myth, His Metaphor by Lewis W. Tusken, 1998.

* * *

Hermann Hesse's work has its roots in many areas of culture, especially German romanticism, Eastern religious thought, Nietzschean philosophy, and Jungian psychoanalytic theory. It has always appealed particularly to the young because of its recurrent stress—already perhaps implied in these sources—on breaking barriers, on the individual's need to emancipate itself from all ties and follow its own star. His first major work was the novel Demian, which attained widespread popularity as one of the earliest texts to deal sympathetically with adolescence. Here Hesse strikingly—if perhaps over-eclectically—combines new interpretations of Old Testament and gnostic symbolism with Jungian motifs to trace the moral and spiritual emancipation of his typical hero: the man who learns how to put comforting bourgeois security behind him, to accept fully the unconventional, even amoral, complexity of his soul and thus gain control of his own destiny. A heady optimism attaches to his “re-birth,” expressed through images redolent both of a Jungian journey into the Collective Unconscious and a Nietzschean Will to Power. However, this elated confidence becomes tempered over the years in Hesse's subsequent works.

This is already the case in Siddhartha, another stylized but gentler picture of the search for self. The text has the simplified form of an Eastern myth, and the new idiom indicates a new depth of understanding: the goal of self-overcoming may be attainable but the search is lifelong, and culminates not in redirected activity but rather in changed vision, in the hard-won capacity to embrace all oppositions intellectually and emotionally, to cease thinking “exclusively.” The most remarkable aspect of this novel is its beautifully sustained imagery and simplicity of style. It is here that Hesse first shows himself a master of the German language: it flows with wonderful euphony, and elsewhere—as in Klingsors letzter Sommer (Klingsor's Last Summer)—can attain a splendidly rich sensuousness.

Hesse's next major work, Der Steppenwolf (Steppenwolf), is perhaps his best-known novel and one that bears clear autobiographical reference to its author's at times tortured middle years. Far removed from the archetypal serenity of Siddhartha, it is a remarkable, graphic portrayal of unresolved personal problems. Hesse captures the agonizing simultaneity of violent oppositions in one and the same personality, for whom life becomes a battle between the longing for simple security and the painful awareness of inner division and self-hatred. Where in earlier works the less “acceptable” aspects of personality are portrayed fairly conventionally as sensuality or Nietzschean will-power, here the depths of degradation are plumbed with ruthless honesty, from aggressive sexuality to bestial destructiveness. The same honesty extends to the social setting; through Harry Haller's alienation we see something of the disturbing mix of jingoism, complacency, and self-gratification of the inter-war years. Yet despite Haller's agony, there are intimations of how this deep sense of dislocation, both internal and external, might be overcome by sublime acceptance, for which the “Immortals”—great artists such as Goethe and Mozart—stand as models. Haller must learn like them to turn life itself into art; if he can abandon not only conventional moral disapprobation but all rational categorization and embrace discreteness, he might rewrite the whole concept of identity, learning to see personality no longer as circumscribed unity but as infinite, capable of embracing all experience as part of the potential self. This theme has interesting aesthetic consequences in the text, which no longer seeks to tell a sequentially developing, finite story, but rather to create a sense of simultaneity and openness via a structure reminiscent of a musical theme and variations, or of a series of interrelated mirrors—an explicit leitmotif in the text. Above all Hesse succeeds in blurring the distinction between internal and external action, dream and actuality. The whole text is both multivalent and “unfinished”; it has echoes—more subtly handled than in Demian—of romanticism, Freudian and Jungian analysis, Zen Buddhism, which undercut but never destroy the level of social realism and thus create a fluid view of personality as multidimensional. So too does the fact that no one part of the text has an objective narrative source, and thus the reader also is detached from inherited models of character definition and textual interpretation. The linguistic problems involved in attempting to present simultaneity in epic form are returned to explicitly in Kurgast.

Surprisingly, Hesse’s next novel Narziss und Goldmund (Narcissus and Goldmund) lacks all such complexity and manifests a return to much more basic narrative skills. Set in medieval times, it tells a broadly allegorical tale about the inescapable responsibility of individual self-discovery. Two friends, one a sensuous artist and the other an ascetic intellectual, gradually both learn that the road to defining one’s own personal truth is long; as in earlier texts, Hesse shows that friends may act as valuable mentors but can never release the individual from the journey towards selfhood that encompasses both pain and joy. While charming in its narrative simplicity, it lacks conviction at a deeper level, especially when compared with Hesse’s great work Das Glasperlenspiel (The Glass Bead Game). Set in a post-20th-century future, this summation of all his inspiration from Goethe to the Orient projects the theme of personal multiplicity onto a cultural plane, and explores the grandiose possibility of harmonizing all knowledge, as an antidote to what Hesse sees as the dangerous cultural and spiritual narrowness of our century. Yet the text offers no final answers and raises many profound questions about the relationship between intellect and practical activity, harmony and extremism, culture and barbarism, stasis and progress. Like his central figure Josef Knecht, Hesse remained self-questioning until the end.

In addition to these major works Hesse produced many short stories, autobiographical sketches, and essays of great delicacy and perceptive insight both into himself and his age. His poetry, while lacking the originality of his prose, still has the power to charm by its romantic sensitivity to nature and inwardness of imagery. Some of it has indeed been set to music, notably by Richard Strauss (Four Last Songs).

—Mary E. Stewart

See the essays on The Glass Bead Game, Siddhartha, and Steppenwolf.

HOCHWÄLDER, Fritz

Born: Vienna, Austria, 28 May 1911. Education: Educated at Reform-Realgymnasium, Vienna, and in evening classes at the Volkshochschule. Family: Married 1) Ursula Büchi in 1951 (divorced 1957); 2) Susanne Schreiner in 1960, one daughter. Career: Apprentice upholsterer in Vienna; moved to Switzerland in 1938 to escape the Nazi regime; lived in refugee camps in Switzerland, 1938–42; freelance writer in Zurich, from 1945. Awards: Vienna prize, 1955, and Ehrenring, 1972; Grillparzer prize, 1956; Wildgans prize, 1963; Austrian State prize, 1966; Austrian Ehrenkreuz für Kunst und Wissenschaft, 1971. Named Professor by Austrian government, 1963. Died: 20 October 1986.

PUBLICATIONS

Plays

- Jehr* (produced 1933).
Liebe in Florenz; oder, Die unziemliche Neugier (produced 1936).
Das heilige Experiment (produced 1943). 1947; as The Strong Are Lonely, translated by Eva Le Galienien, 1954; as The Holy Experiment (televised 1985); also translated by Todd C. Hanlin and Heidi Hutchinson in Holy Experiment and Other Plays, 1998.
Der Flüchtling, from a work by Georg Kaiser (produced 1945). 1954.
Hotel du commerce (produced 1946). 1954.
Meier Helmbrecht (produced 1947). 1956.
Der öffentliche Ankläger (produced 1948). 1954; as The Public Prosecutor, translated by Kitty Black, 1958; and in The Public Prosecutor and Other Plays, 1980.
Der Unschuldige (produced 1958). Privately printed, 1949; 1958.
Virginia (produced 1951).
Donadieu (produced 1953). 1953.
Die Herberge (produced 1957). 1956; as The Inn (produced 1962).
Donnerstag (produced 1959). In Dramen, 1, 1959.
Dramen. 2 vols., 1959–64.
Esther. 1960.
1003 (produced 1964). In Dramen, 2, 1964.
Der Himbeerpflücker (televised 1965; produced 1965). 1965; as The Raspberry Picker, translated by Michael Bullock, in The Public Prosecutor and Other Plays, 1980.
Der Befehl (televised 1967; produced 1968). 1967; as The Order, in Modern International Drama, 3(2), 1970.
Dramen. 1968.
Dramen. 4 vols., 1975–85.
Lazaretti; oder, Der Säbeltiger (produced 1975). 1975; as Lazaretti; or, the Saber-Toothed Tiger, translated by James Schmittin, in The Public Prosecutor and Other Plays, 1980.
The Public Prosecutor and Other Plays (includes The Raspberry Picker; The Public Prosecutor; The Strong Are Lonely; Lazaretti; or, the Saber-Toothed Tiger), edited by Martin Esslin. 1980.
Die Prinzessin von Chimay. 1982.
Der verschwundene Mond. 1985.
Die Burgschaft. 1985.

Radio Plays: Der Reigen, from the play by Arthur Schnitzler; Weinsberger Ostern 1525, 1939.

Television Plays: Der Himbeerpflücker, 1965; Der Befehl, 1967.

Other

Im Wechsel der Zeit: Autobiographische Skizzen und Essays. 1980.

*

Bibliography: Fritz Hochwälder Bibliography’ by James Schmitt, in Modern Austrian Literature, 11(1), 1978.

Critical Studies: The Theater of Protest and Paradox: Developments in the Avant-Garde Drama edited by George E. Wellwarth, 1964; “Tradition and Experiment in the Work of Fritz Hochwälder” by Anthony J. Harper, in New German Studies, 5, 1977; “The Theatre of Fritz Hochwälder: Its Background and Development” by James Schmitt, in Modern Austrian Literature, 11(1), 1978; Der Dramatiker

Hochwälder by Wilhelm Bortenschlager, 1979; ‘‘Fritz Hochwälder’s Range of Theme and Form’’ by Donald G. Daviau, in Austrian Literature, 18(2), 1985; ‘‘The Classical Theater-of-Illusion Modernized: The Conflicting Messages of the Moral Imperative in Fritz Hochwälder’s Drama Das heilige Experiment’’ by Edward R. McDonald, in Maske und Kothurn, 31, 1985.

* * *

In the years following World War II Fritz Hochwälder’s plays were at the forefront of German-speaking and indeed European drama, challenging the audience to come to terms with the recent past.

Hochwälder saw himself as part of the vigorous tradition of Viennese folk theatre, revitalized in the 1930s by Ödön von Horváth. When the angry young men of the Austrian theatre announced in the 1960s that ‘‘Grandpa’s theatre is dead,’’ Hochwälder’s reply was characteristically tart: no one had ever fallen asleep in any of his plays! Throughout his career his works relied on the characteristic devices of the Volksstück, stock characters, unexpected twists to the story line, cases of mistaken identity, and a nice turn to the dialogue with moments of unexpected comedy to lighten the mood.

Above all, however, Hochwälder was a moralist and the light touch of his pen never disguised the fact that he was dealing with serious issues. It would be surprising were this not so. A Jew forced into exile and living through the Europe of the Third Reich could not but be affected. Behind the costume drama lies a grim political and moral reality. The fact that his plays move, over the years, from historical pieces (Das heilige Experiment [The Strong Are Lonely], Der öffentliche Ankläger [The Public Prosecutor]), to allegory (Donnerstag, 1003, Die Herberge [The Inn]), to works dealing with the second half of the 20th century (Der Himbeerpflücker [The Raspberry Picker], Der Befehl [The Order]), reflects the innate Austrianism in his soul. The Austrian tradition shies away from immediacy, preferring to depict the present from the safer, apparently objective context of history and costume drama; the first National Socialist to appear explicitly as such in Hochwälder’s work does not walk on stage until the mid 1960s, by when, of course, Nazi uniforms have begun to become historical pieces in their own right.

Behind the surface Hochwälder probes deep into the psyche of his protagonists and emerges with a picture of hell. Hochwälder’s hell is knowledge of the inner self, gained at the cost of considerable personal pain. There is much of Oedipus Rex in Hochwälder’s work. A characteristic example is the mild-mannered Dutch police inspector in The Order, given the task of hunting down the perpetrator of a brutal war crime and child murder by a military policeman in occupied Holland. As he penetrates the past, the inspector unravels his own repressed subconscious until he is forced to realize that he is the brutal war monster he is seeking.

Power versus justice, the demands of the ideal set against the limitations of reality: these are the axes of Hochwälder’s plays. Jesuit black in Latin America, although an apparent world away from the Gestapo black of Europe, is used by Hochwälder to show the danger of unquestioning acceptance of a cause (however noble). Read as a study of the evil of individual reliance on external support and the seductive appeal of ‘‘Order,’’ The Strong Are Lonely regains much of the relevance many would today deny the work. The shadow of the Gestapo is equally apparent behind the Terror of revolutionary France in The Public Prosecutor. The public prosecutor’s relentless commitment to the Thermidor government is used by his opponents to engineer his self-destruction.

Hochwälder does not make his public prosecutor a monster; he shows him as a man with feelings who would like to be humane but who has fallen victim to the machine he serves. The true tragedy in both plays is that of the individual lost in the morass of a system where individualism has no place. Hochwälder’s virtual disappearance from the theatrical scene in recent years does him scant justice. It is difficult to believe that the European stage can afford to ignore The Strong Are Lonely and The Public Prosecutor. He himself felt he would be remembered for these two and, and surprisingly, The Inn, an allegory on the theme of justice which offers this profoundly pessimistic thought: ‘‘Only one thing protects us from our neighbours—and that is order. There is no such thing as justice, we have to make do with order.’’

Towards the end of his career Hochwälder ran out of creative steam. Both Lazaretti and Die Prinzessin von Chimay [The Princess of Chimay] lack the bite of his earlier works. The Prinzessin is a tired attempt to take forward the threads of The Public Prosecutor, and Lazaretti has been described as an old man’s play for old men.

Hochwälder’s more allegorical plays continue the theme of security and individual responsibility. In Donnerstag, a modern mystery play, an architect, Niklaus Pomfrit, sells his soul to Belial Incorporated in order to gain understanding of the meaning of the world; in 1003 (with clear echoes from Don Giovanni) he has become invincible and invulnerable: ‘‘He’s like the man in the fairytale: his heart has frozen solid.’’

What is attainable in allegory is impossible in reality, and the plays in a contemporary setting explore the legacy of the National Socialist security that has been so cruelly dashed from its adherents’ grasp. The Raspberry Picker, a mischievously malicious farce, neatly pillories the capacity for self-deception and collective amnesia of a group of former Nazis in post-war Austria. Hochwälder milks the device of mistaken identity to good effect as his characters erroneously identify a petty criminal as a former SS official come back to claim his share of war-loot. The discrepancy between the pathetic figure the criminal cuts on stage and the grandiose past he is supposed to embody is not lost on the audience who are in possession of both sides of the story and can draw their own conclusions.

Much of what Hochwälder wrote has a particularly Austrian timbre and loses much in translation. Best approached with an awareness of the social and political context in which he wrote, his dramatic work, like that of Friedrich Schiller before him, uses the theatre as a moral institution to expose and challenge the great and petty tyrannies of life that could otherwise not be brought to book.

—Alan Best

HØEG, Peter

Also known as Peter Hoeg. Born: Copenhagen, Denmark, 17 May 1957. Education: Graduated from Frederiksberg Gymnasium, 1976; studied literary theory, University of Copenhagen, M.A. 1984. Family: Married Kenyan dancer Akinyi, late 1980s; two daughters. Career: Full-time writer, since the late 1980s; in the late 1970s and early 1980s he alternately worked as a crewman on yachts, danced with the Royal Danish Ballet, fenced professionally, and acted in the theater in Paris and Sweden; taught acting in a high school in Odense and at the University of Odense in Denmark, 1984; started the Lolwe Foundation to aid poor mothers and children in developing nations, 1996. Lives in Denmark. Awards: De Gyldne Laurbar (Golden Laurel) award for Danish literature, 1994.

PUBLICATIONS

Fiction

Forestilling om det tyvende århundrede. 1988; as The History of Danish Dreams, translated by Barbara Haveland, 1995.

Fortallinger om natten. 1990; as Tales of the Night, translated by Barbara Haveland, 1997.

Frøken Smillas fornemmelse for sne. 1992; as Smilla's Sense of Snow, translated by Tiina Nunnally, 1993; as Miss Smilla's Feeling for Snow, translated by F. David, 1993.

De måske egnede. 1993; as Borderliners, translated by Barbara Haveland, 1994.

Kvinden og aben. 1996; as The Woman and the Ape, translated by Barbara Haveland, 1996.

Other

Preface, Point of View, photographs by Henrik Saxgren. 1998.

*

Bibliography: Entry in Danske digtere i det 20. århundrede by Per Stounbjerg, 3 vols., 2000–2002.

Critical Studies: “Strangers in Paradise” by Nader Mousavizadeh, in New Republic, no. 212, 1993; “Fleeing Literary Limelight for Calm Obscurity” (interview) by Sarah Lyall, in New York Times, 6 October 1993; “Peter Høeg and the Critical Apes” by Lars Henrik Aagaard, translated by W. Glyn Jones, in Danish Literary Magazine, no. 10, 1996; “Smilla’s Sense of Success: Peter Hoeg Believes that The Woman And The Ape Represents a Breakthrough, Yet He Tempers His Enthusiasm” (interview) by Dan Cryer, in Newsday, 3 December 1996; “A House of Mourning: Frøken Smillas fornemmelse for sne” by Mary Kay Norseng and “Peter Høeg and the Sense of Writing” by Hans Henrik Møller, in Scandinavian Studies, no. 69, 1997; “Film Must Speak to the Heart: A Conversation Between Peter Høeg and Bille August” by Jes Stein Pedersen, in Smilla’s Sense of Snow: The Making of a Film by Bille August, Adapted from the Novel by Peter Høeg by Karin Trolle, 1997; “Smilla’s Sense of Gender Identity” by Rachel Schaffer, in Clues: A Journal of Detection, no. 19, 1998.

* * *

A writer with an unmistakable disdain for literary celebrity, Peter Høeg is an enigmatic figure whose life and works, with one major exception, have remained somewhat obscure. The aura surrounding his international best-seller Smilla’s Sense of Snow has largely overshadowed his other four books, none of which enjoyed the same degree of near-unanimous critical praise or commercial success. Although he was hailed as a rising literary star when he published Smilla’s Sense of Snow at the age of 34—at which point he had already published the novel Forestilling om det tyvende århundrede (The History of Danish Dreams) and the collection of stories

Fortallinger om natten (Tales of the Night)—Høeg has not published a novel since 1996, when his Kvinden og aben (The Woman and the Ape) was released to mixed reviews. As a result, his status within world literature is still rather ambiguous, although he remains very popular in his native Denmark.

Smilla’s Sense of Snow established Høeg’s reputation, but in doing so also set expectations about his style and subject matter that have perhaps unjustly skewed the response to his other works, all of which have since been translated into English. Smilla’s Sense of Snow was billed by many reviewers as a mystery novel, and the plot that revolves around its heroine, an Inuit/Danish woman named Smilla Qaavigaaq Jaspersen who studies glaciers for a living, certainly contains many of the conventions of this genre. However, in examining the seemingly accidental death of a young neighbor who has fallen from a snowy roof, Smilla finds herself entangled in a far-reaching conspiracy that allows Høeg to do much more than simply spin out a thrilling detective tale. Smilla’s mixed heritage provides Høeg with the opportunity to comment critically on the historical maltreatment of the Inuit natives of Greenland by the Danes. Furthermore, the novel contains a subplot about a wondrous meteorite that may be alive, through which Høeg engages in an examination of the ethics of contemporary science and scientists.

The theme of a marginalized group’s struggles and elements of fantasy literature or “magical realism” that are found in Smilla’s Sense of Snow are more representative of Høeg’s overall body of work than the conventions of the mystery genre, which he adapted for this particular novel and has not returned to since, albeit to the chagrin of many readers. Høeg’s novels, like his personal life, demonstrate sympathy for those whose relation to the dominant forces of “civilization” is either grudging, unwilling, or doomed. His characters wrestle with the consequences of cultural oppression in a wide variety of forms—from the implications of Smilla’s mixed ethnicity to the abuses heaped upon students at an ostensibly progressive boarding school for troubled youths in Høeg’s third novel, De måske egnede (Borderliners).

This concept is perhaps most fully developed in Kvinden og aben, for which Høeg drew extensively upon his experiences in visiting his wife’s native country of Kenya, which the couple has repeatedly done for months at a time. Although the novel itself only addresses African culture obliquely, the inclusive worldview that Høeg came into contact with during his travels there is expressed in the bond he depicts between Madelene, an upper-class Danish woman living in London, and Erasmus, an ape who is the subject of study—and potential exploitation—by Madelene’s husband Adam, a blindly ambitious animal behaviorist. Høeg initially presents their relationship in a relatively realistic manner, showing how Madelene’s sympathy for Erasmus in light of her husband’s unethical treatment of the extraordinarily intelligent ape leads her to reevaluate her life, which is filled with trifles and alcoholic numbness. The tone and style changes dramatically in the middle of the novel, however, when Erasmus and Madelene escape together from the stifling environment of the house/laboratory where they both have been confined. While on the run, they become lovers and Madelene develops Erasmus’s language skills, teaching him to speak fluently in both Danish and English.

Many critics objected to what they claimed was a heavy-handed animal rights message in the book (an intention Høeg denied repeatedly in the few interviews he gave to promote the book), and others accused Høeg of essentially restating the message of past works of science fiction such as the Planet of the Apes series—that humans and apes are more similar than humans might wish to accept. However, neither of these criticisms places the novel within the scope of the author's other books. The dual heroes of Kvinden og aben closely resemble Høeg's collection of sympathetically depicted "misfits," from Mads, the narrator of complex and often disturbing stories that span the 20th century in The History of Danish Dreams, through Smilla and Peter, the troubled yet unmistakably admirable adolescent who narrates Borderliners.

Høeg's seeming inability to please his most outspoken critics seems to stem from his unwillingness to accommodate the expectations of those who want him to write either conventional genre fictions or highbrow philosophical novels. Høeg is equally comfortable (and interested in) writing about the complexities of theories concerning the nature of time—a subject that shows up in most of his books—as he is making allusions to popular culture, from thrillers in the vein of John LeCarre to B-movie science fiction like King Kong. Although this combination won him millions of readers in Smilla's Sense of Snow, it has not resulted in similarly broad acclaim for his subsequent efforts.

Opinions regarding Høeg's intensely private personal life demonstrate a similar misunderstanding. The fact that he and his family live willingly without such modern amenities as a television, a telephone, or a car has been interpreted by many of his commentators as evidence of his withdrawal from contemporary life. Høeg's practice of personally delivering his manuscripts—which he writes out in longhand—to his publisher on bicycle has become an almost inseparable part of this legend of supposed reclusion. He has frequently denied this interpretation, though, countering that his simple lifestyle is an indispensable part of his writing process because it frees him from distraction and allows him to focus his broad-ranging imagination. His willingness to engage with the world for the purpose of improving it is shown clearly by his establishment of the Lolwe Foundation, to which he donated all his profits from worldwide sales of The Woman and the Ape. This organization is dedicated to improving conditions in least developed nations through such projects as funding refugee camps for exiled Tibetans in Nepal or supporting independent businesswomen in Tanzania.

Høeg still has ample time to cement his place in world literature, but the combination of his deliberate pace of publication and his social and literary non-conformity complicates assessment of his contributions at the present time.

—Derek Maus

HOFFMANN, E(rnst) T(heodor) A(madeus)

Born: Ernst Theodor Wilhelm Hoffmann in Königsberg, Germany, 24 January 1776. Education: Educated at Burgschule, Königsberg, 1782–92; studied law at University of Königsberg, 1792–95. Family: Married Maria Thekla Michalina Rorer-Trzynska in 1802; one daughter. Career: In legal civil service: posts in Glogau, 1796–98, Berlin, 1798–1800, Posen, 1800–02, Plozk, 1802–04, Warsaw, 1804–08, and, after Napoleon's defeat, Berlin, 1814–22. Also a composer: Kappellmeister, 1808–09, house composer and designer, 1810–12, Bamberg Theatre, and conductor for Sekonda Company, Leipzig and Dresden, 1813–14; composer of operas, and editor of musical works by Beethoven, Mozart, Gluck, and others, 1809–21. Died: 25 June 1822.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Werke, edited by Georg Ellinger. 15 vols., 1912; 2nd edition, 1927. Sämtliche Werke, edited by Walter Müller-Seidel and others. 5 vols., 1960–65.

Gesammelte Werke, edited by Rudolf Mingau and Hans-Joachim Kruse. 1976–.

Sämtliche Werke, edited by Wulf Segebrecht, Hartmut Steinecke, and others. 1985–.

Fiction

Fantasiestücke in Callots Manier. 4 vols., 1814–15; as Fantasy Pieces in Callot's Manner: Pages From the Diary of a Traveling Romantic, translated by Joseph M. Hayse, 1996.

Die Elixiere des Teufels. 1815–16; as The Devil's Elixir, translated by R. Gillies, 1824; as The Devil's Elixirs, translated by Ronald Taylor, 1963.

Nachtstücke. 2 vols., 1817.

Seltsame Leiden eines Theater-Direktors. 1819.

Klein Zaches genannt Zinnober. 1819.

Die Serapions-Brüder: Gesammelte Erzählungen und Märchen. 4 vols., 1819–21; as The Serapion Brethren, translated by Alexander Ewing, 1886–92.

Lebens-Ansichten des Katers Murr. 1820–22.

Prinzessin Brambilla. 1821.

Meister Floh. 1822; as Master Flea, translated by G. Sloane, in Specimens of German Romance, vol. 2, 1826.

Die letzten Erzählungen. 2 vols., 1825.

Tales, edited by Christopher Lazare. 1959.

The Tales of Hoffmann, translated by Michael Bullock. 1963.

Tales, translated by James Kirkup. 1966.

The Best Tales of Hoffmann, edited by E.F. Bleiler. 1967.

Tales, edited by Victor Lange. 1982.

Tales of Hoffmann, edited and translated by R.J. Hollingdale. 1982.

Golden Pot, and Other Tales, translated and edited by Ritchie Robertson. 1992.

Life and Opinions of the Tomcat Murr: Together With a Fragmentary Biography of Kapellmeister Johannes Kreisler on Random Sheets of Waste Paper, translated by Anthea Bell. 1999.

Plays

Die Maske, edited by Friedrich Schnapp. 1923.

Verse

Poetische Werke, edited by Gerhard Seidel. 6 vols., 1958.

Other

Die Vision auf dem Schlachtfelde bei Dresden. 1814.

Briefwechsel, edited by Hans von Müller and Friedrich Schnapp. 3 vols., 1967–69.

Selected Writings, edited and translated by Leonard J. Kent and Elizabeth C. Knight. 2 vols., 1969.

Tagebücher, edited by Friedrich Schnapp. 1971.

Juristische Arbeiten, edited by Friedrich Schnapp. 1973.

Selected Letters of E.T.A. Hoffmann, edited and translated by Johanna C. Sahlin. 1977.

*

Bibliography: E.T.A. Hoffmann: Bibliographic by Gerhard Salomon, 1963; E.T.A. Hoffmann Bibliographic by Curt Grützmaier, 1981.

Critical Studies: Hoffmann, Author of the Tales by Harvey Hewett-Thayer, 1948; Hoffmann by Ronald Taylor, 1963; E.T.A. Hoffmann's Other World: The Romantic Author and His "New Mythology" by Kenneth Negus, 1965; Music: The Medium of the Metaphysical in Hoffmann by Pauline Watts, 1972; The Shattered Self: E.T.A. Hoffmann's Tragic Vision by Horst S. Daemrich, 1973; E.T.A. Hoffmann and Music by R. Murray Schafer, 1975; Hoffmann and the Rhetoric of Terror by Elizabeth Wright, 1978; Spellbound: Studies on Mesmerism and Literature by Maria M. Tatar, 1978; Baudelaire et Hoffmann by Rosemary Lloyd, 1979; Mysticism and Sexuality: E.T.A. Hoffmann by James M. McGlathery, 2 vols., 1981–85; Hoffmann's Musical Writings: Kreisleriana, The Poet and Composer, Musical Criticism by David Charlton, 1989; Authorship as Alchemy: Subversive Writing in Pushkin, Scott, Hoffmann by David Glenn Kropf, 1994; E.T.A. Hoffmann by James M. McGlathery, 1997.

* * *

E.T.A. Hoffmann is one of the few authors belonging to German romanticism who has attained international status. As an exponent of "black romanticism," as it is called in Europe, he was hailed by Baudelaire and scorned by Sir Walter Scott for his preoccupation with the grotesque and the bizarre. He managed to combine this trait with, on the one hand, the most astringent satire, criticizing the injustices of his day in Meister Floh (Master Flea), and on the other hand, with a modern concern regarding a writer's identity in Lebens-Ansichten des Katers Murr [The Life and Opinions of Tomcat Murr].

He made the best possible use of the literary conventions of his day, such as the popular Gothic novel, the epistolary novel, and the short story or novella. He was a diarist and a keen letter writer; like most of his fellow-romanticists he constantly reflected on what he did and on how and why he did it. Interspersed with his fictional writings he developed a theory of representation which accounts for the artist's fascination and concern with subjective phenomena, what he called his "inner world," and he argued that the persuasiveness of the artist's vision depended on his ability to project this world accurately into the external. But it also depended on a reader, playfully addressed by the narrator as "dear reader," and placed within the fictional world of the novel, an example of Romantic irony whereby the artist asserted his supremacy. This reader was expected to suspend disbelief and to open himself up to the experience offered by the novels and stories.

Hoffmann's modernity rests in the powerful description of this inner world, later systematically examined by Freud's new science of the mind, a science not like the physical sciences but like the human ones, depending on interpretation of subjective phenomena. One of Freud's key essays, "The Uncanny," uses one of Hoffmann's stories, "Der Sandmann" ("The Sand-Man"), in order to capture a certain kind of aesthetic experience. Hoffmann was himself interested in parapsychological phenomena of all kinds, being well acquainted with the work of Anton Mesmer, who played a key role in the history of medicine and psychoanalysis. Hoffmann wrote a number of stories about strange characters, hypnotized and possessed by powerful and threatening figures.

A major theme in Hoffmann's work is that of the divided self, now almost a cliché of Hoffmann scholarship. Whereas in Goethe's Faust this can be seen as a benign split, in Hoffmann's work it is usually catastrophic, a prime instance being Die Elixiere des Teufels (The Devil's Elixirs), though it sometimes resolves itself ironically, as in "Der goldene Topf" ("The Golden Pot"), or satirically, as in Prinzessin Brambilla [Princess Brambilla]. The split is between the hero's desire to belong to the world of art and music, and his desire to partake of the pleasures and security of the life of an average citizen. These dual desires manifest themselves in a simultaneous love for two different women, an idealized figure, usually connected with the world of art and music, and a domestic figure who promises the joys of marriage. This precarious stance also parallels the situation in Hoffmann's life, where he simultaneously maintained a satisfactory marriage and an unconsummated but passionate love for an erstwhile music pupil, from the days when he earned his living by giving music lessons. He was similarly divided in his profession, earning his living in one sphere and following his bent in another, the career of civil servant later replacing that of music teacher.

Those who do not recognize him as an author may be acquainted with him as the inspiration behind Offenbach's opera The Tales of Hoffmann and Delibes's ballet Coppélia.

—Elizabeth Wright

See the essay on The Devil's Elixirs.

HOFMANNSTHAL, Hugo (Laurenz August Hofmann, Edler) von

Born: Vienna, Austria, 1 February 1874. Education: Educated at Akademisches Gymnasium, Vienna, 1884–92; studied law, 1892–94; and romantic philology: dissertation on Pléiade poets, 1897, and habilitation work on Victor Hugo, 1900–01, University of Vienna. Military Service: Served with 6th Dragoon Regiment in Göding, 1894–95. Family: Married Gertrud Schlesinger in 1901; one daughter and two sons. Career: Full-time writer, from 1901; collaborated with Richard Strauss on operas, from 1909; editor, Österreichische Bibliothek, 1915–17; co-founder, with Max Reinhardt, Salzburg Festival, 1919. Died: 15 July 1929.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Gesammelte Werke in Einzelausgaben, edited by Herbert Steiner. 15 vols., 1945–59.

Selected Writings: Prose, Poems and Verse Plays, Plays and Libretti, edited by Mary Hottinger, Tania and James Stern, and Michael Hamburger. 3 vols., 1952–64.

Sämtliche Werke, edited by Heinz Otto Burger and others. 1975–.

Plays

Gestern (produced 1928). 1896.

- Der Tor und der Tod* (produced 1898). 1900; as Death and the Fool, translated by Elisabeth Walker, 1914; also translated by Michael Hamburger, in Selected Writings, 2, 1961; Alfred Schwarz, in Three Plays, 1966.
- Die Frau im Fenster* (as Madonna Dianora, produced 1898). In Theater in Versen, 1899; as Madonna Dionara, translated by Harriet Betty Boas, 1916.
- Theater in Versen*. 1899.
- Der Abenteurer und die Sangerin* (produced 1899). In Theater in Versen, 1899; revised version, 1909.
- Die Hochzeit der Sobeide* (as Sobeide, Abenteurer, produced 1899). In Theater in Versen, 1899; as The Marriage of Sobeide, translated by Bayard Quincy Morgan, in German Classics of the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries, edited by Kuno Francke and William G. Howard, 20, 1916; as The Marriage of Zobeide, translated by Christopher Middleton, in Selected Writings, 2, 1961.
- Das Bergwerk zu Falun*, from a story by E.T.A. Hoffmann (produced 1899). 1933; as The Mine at Falun, translated by Michael Hamburger, in Selected Writings, 2, 1961.
- Der Kaiser und die Hexe* (produced 1926). In Die Insel, 1900; as The Emperor and the Witch, translated by Christopher Middleton, in Selected Writings, 2, 1961.
- Der Tod der Tizian*. 1901; as The Death of Titian, translated by John Heard, 1920.
- Elektra* (produced 1903). 1904; revised version, music by Strauss (produced 1909), 1908; as Electra, translated by Arthur Symons, 1908; also translated by Alfred Schwarz, in Selected Writings, 3, 1964, and in Three Plays, 1966.
- Das kleine Welttheater; oder, Die Glucklichen* (produced 1929). 1903; as The Little Theatre of the World, translated by Walter R. Eberlein, 1945; also translated by Michael Hamburger, in Selected Writings, 2, 1961.
- Das gerettete Venedig*, from the play Venice Preserved by Otway (produced 1905). 1905.
- odipus und die Sphinx* (produced 1905). 1906.
- Kleine Dramen*. 2 vols., 1906–07.
- Der weisse Facher* (produced 1927). 1907.
- Vorspiele*. 1908.
- Die Begegnung mit Carlo*. 1909.
- Alkestis*, from the play by Euripides, music by Egon Wellesz (produced 1916). 1909.
- Lucidor*. 1910.
- Christinas Heimreise* (produced 1910). 1910; as Christina's Journey Home, translated by Roy Temple House, 1916.
- Konig odipus*, from the play by Sophocles (produced 1910). 1910.
- Die Heirat wider Willen*, from a play by Molière. 1910.
- Amor und Psyche*. 1911.
- Das fremde Madchen*. 1911.
- Der Rosenkavalier*, music by Strauss (produced 1911). 1911; edited by Willi Schuh, 1971; as The Rose-Bearer, translated by Alfred Kalisch, 1912; as The Cavalier of the Rose, translated by Christopher Holme, in Selected Writings, 3, 1964.
- Jedermann: Das Spiel vom Sterben des reichen Mannes* (produced 1911). 1911; as The Play of Everyman, translated by G. Sterling, 1917; as The Salzburg Everyman, translated by M.E. Tafler, 1930.
- Ariadne auf Naxos*, music by Strauss (produced 1912). 1912; revised version (produced 1916), 1916; as Ariadne on Naxos, translated by Alfred Kalisch, 1912.
- Josephs Legende* (ballet scenario), with Harry Graf Kessler, music by Strauss (produced 1914). 1914.
- Die Frau ohne Schatten*, music by Strauss (produced 1919). 1916; as The Woman without a Shadow, 1927; translated by Jean Hollander, 1993.
- Die gruine Flote* (ballet scenario), music by Mozart (produced 1916). 1925.
- Die Lastigen*, from a play by Molière (produced 1916). In Marsyas, 1917.
- Der Burger als Edelmann*, from a play by Molière, music by Strauss (produced 1918). 1918.
- Dame Kobold*, from a play by Calderón (produced 1920). 1920.
- Der Schwierige* (produced 1921). 1921; as The Difficult Man, translated by Willa Muir, in Selected Writings, 3, 1964.
- Florindo und die Unbekannte* (produced 1921). 1923.
- Das Salzburger grosse Welttheater*, from a play by Calderón (produced 1922). 1922; as The Salzburg Great Theatre of the World, translated by Vernon Watkins, in Selected Writings, 3, 1964.
- Prima Ballerina* (ballet scenario). 1923(?).
- Der Unbestechliche* (produced 1923). With Der Schwierige, 1958.
- Die Ruinen von Athen* (produced 1924). 1925.
- Der Turm*, from a play by Calderón. 1925; revised version (produced 1928), 1927; as The Tower, translated by Michael Hamburger, in Selected Writings, 3, 1964; also translated by Alfred Schwarz, in Three Plays, 1966.
- Die gyptische Helena*, music by Strauss (produced 1928). 1928; as Helen in Egypt, translated by Alfred Kalisch, 1928.
- Semiramis: Die beiden Gotter*. 1933.
- Arabella*, music by Strauss (produced 1933). 1933; as Arabella, translated by John Gutman, 1955; also translated by Nora Wydenbruck and Christopher Middleton, in Selected Writings, 3, 1964.
- Dramatische Entwurfe aus dem Nachlass*, edited by Heinrich Zimmer. 1936.
- Danae; oder, Die Vernunftheirat*. 1952.
- Three Plays* (includes Death and the Fool; Elektra; The Tower), translated by Alfred Schwarz. 1966.

Fiction

- Prinz Eugen der edle Ritter*. 1905.
- Das Marchen der 672. Nacht und andere Erzahlungen* (includes ‘‘Ein Brief’’ [The Chandos Letter]). 1905.
- Die Frau ohne Schatten*. 1919.
- Andreas; oder, Die Vereinigten*. 1932; as Andreas; or, The United, translated by Marie D. Hottinger, 1936.
- Four Stories*, edited by Margaret Jacobs. 1968.

Verse

- Ausgewahlte Gedichte*. 1903.
- Die gesammelten Gedichte*. 1907.
- Die Gedichte und kleinen Dramen*. 1911.
- Lyrical Poems*, translated by Charles Wharton Stork. 1918.
- Gedichte*. 1922.
- Nachlese der Gedichte*. 1934.

Other

- Studie uber die Entwicklung des Dichters Victor Hugo*. 1901; as Victor Hugo, 1904; as Versuch uber Victor Hugo, 1925.
- Unterhaltungen uber literarische Gegenstande*. 1904.
- Die prosaischen Schriften gesammelt*. 2 vols., 1907; vol. 3, 1917.

Hesperus: Ein Jahrbuch, with Rudolf Borchardt and Rudolf Alexander Schröder. 1909.

Grete Wiesenthal in Amor und Psyche und das fremde Mädchen. 1911.

Die Wege und die Begegnungen. 1913.

Rodauner Nachträge. 3 vols., 1918.

Reden und Aufsätze. 1921.

Buch der Freunde. 1922; edited by Ernst Zinn, 1965.

Gesammelte Werke. 6 vols., 1924; revised edition, 3 vols., 1934.

Augenblicke in Griechenland. 1924.

Frühste Prosastücke. 1926.

Grillparzers politisches Vermächtnis. 1926.

Loris: Die Prosa des jungen Hoffmannsthal's. 1930.

Die Berührung der Sphären. 1931.

Briefe. 2 vols., 1935–37.

Briefwechsel, with Anton Wildgans, edited by Joseph A. von Bradish. 1935.

Briefwechsel, with Stefan George, edited by Robert Boehringer. 1938; revised edition, 1953.

Briefwechsel, with Richard Strauss, edited by Franz and Alice Strauss. 1952; revised edition, edited by Willi Schuh, 1954; as Correspondence, translated by Hans Hammelmann and Ewald Osers, 1961.

Briefe der Freundschaft, with Eberhard von Bodenhausen, edited by Dora von Bodenhausen. 1953.

Briefwechsel, with Rudolf Borchardt, edited by Marie Luise Borchardt and Herbert Steiner. 1954.

Briefwechsel, with Carl J. Burckhardt, edited by Burckhardt. 1956.

Sylvia in "Stern", edited by Martin Stern. 1959.

Briefwechsel, with Arthur Schnitzler, edited by Theresa Nickl and Heinrich Schnitzler. 1964.

Briefwechsel, with Helene von Nostitz, edited by Oswald von Nostitz. 1965.

Briefwechsel, with Edgar Karl von Bebenburg, edited by Mary E. Gilbert. 1966.

Briefwechsel, with Leopold von Andrian. 1968.

Briefwechsel, with Willy Haas. 1968.

Briefwechsel, with Harry Graf Kessler. 1968.

Briefwechsel, with Josef Redlich. 1971.

Briefwechsel, with Richard Beer-Hofmann. 1972.

Briefwechsel, with Max Rychner, Samuel and Hedwig Fischer, Oscar Bie, and Moritz Heimann, edited by Claudia Mertz-Rychner and others. 1973.

Briefwechsel, with Ottonie Gräfin Degenfeld, edited by Marie Therese Miller-Degenfeld. 1974.

Briefwechsel 1899–1925, with Rainer Maria Rilke, edited by Rudolf Hirsch and Ingeborg Schnack. 1978.

Briefwechsel, with Max Mell, edited by Margret Dietrich and Heinz Kindermann. 1982.

Briefwechsel, with Ria Schmuylow-Claasen. 1982.

Briefwechsel, with Paul Zifferer, edited by Hilde Burger. 1983.

The Poet and the Countess: Hugo von Hofmannsthal's Correspondence with Countess Ottonie Degenfeld, edited by Marie-Therese Miller-Degenfeld, translated by W. Eric Barcel. 2000.

Editor, Deutsche Erzähler. 4 vols., 1912.

*

Bibliography: Hofmannsthal: Bibliographie des Schrifttums 1892–1963, 1966, and Hugo von Hofmannsthal: Bibliographie:

Werke, Briefe, Gespräche, Übersetzungen, Vertonungen, 1972, both by Horst Weber; Hugo von Hofmannsthal Bibliographie 1964–1976 by H.A. and U. Koch, 1976; "Hofmannsthal Bibliographie" by C. Köttelwesch, in Hofmannsthal Blätter from 1979.

Critical Studies: Hugo von Hofmannsthal by Hans Hammelmann, 1957; Hofmannsthal's Festival Dramas by B. Coughlin, 1964; Hofmannsthal's Novel "Andreas" by David Miles, 1972; Hugo von Hofmannsthal: Three Essays by Michael Hamburger, 1972; Hofmannsthal and the French Symbolist Tradition by Steven P. Sondrup, 1976; Hugo von Hofmannsthal by Lowell A. Bangerter, 1977; The Banal Object: Theme and Thematics in Proust, Rilke, Hofmannsthal, and Sartre by Naomi Segal, 1981; Hugo von Hofmannsthal: Commemorative Essays edited by W.E. Yuill and Patricia Howe, 1981; Hugo von Hofmannsthal and His Time: The European Imagination, 1860–1920 by Hermann Broch, 1984; Hofmannsthal and Symbolism: Art and Life in the Work of a Modern Poet by Thomas A. Kovach, 1985; Animal Symbolism in Hofmannsthal's Works by Helen Frink, 1987; Hugo von Hofmannsthal: The Theatres of Consciousness by Benjamin Bennett, 1988; Narrative Transgression and the Foregrounding of Language in Selected Prose Works of Poe, Valéry and Hofmannsthal by Leroy T. Day, 1988; Selten Augenblicke: Interpretations of Poems by Hugo von Hofmannsthal by Margit Resch, 1989; The Challenge of Belatedness: Goethe, Kleist, Hofmannsthal by Jean Wilson, 1991; Schnitzler, Hofmannsthal and the Austrian Theatre by W.E. Yates, 1992; Hugo Von Hofmannsthal by Mathias Mayer, 1993; Hugo Von Hofmannsthal: Poets and The Language of Life by Adrian Del Caro, 1993; The Poetry of Hugo Von Hofmannsthal and French Symbolism by Robert Vilain, 2000.

* * *

Hugo von Hofmannsthal is chiefly remembered as the successful librettist who partnered with Richard Strauss. Their operas, including the famous Der Rosenkavalier (The Cavalier of the Rose), are lively and powerful, rich in register and motif.

Hofmannsthal's fame, however, neither begins nor ends with Strauss. He had enjoyed some 15 years of precocious celebrity before their collaboration began. His schoolboy lyrics established his reputation as one of the foremost young poets in Vienna. Even his earliest works, among them Gestern [Yesterday], Der Tor und der Tod (Death and the Fool), and Die Hochzeit der Sobeide (The Marriage of Zobeide), reveal his remarkable insight into some of the questions most crucial to man: the passing of time, the problem of death, the dangers of excessive aestheticism, the role of women in society. His range, even in the 1890s, is vast.

The turn of the century brought a change of style. There were several reasons for this change. One, metaphysical reason prompting him to abandon his lyrical mode, is expressed in the fictitious Chandos Letter. A more immediate reason can be found in his desire to stage his dramas more successfully. They made good reading, but as theatre they were indicted by critics as "lukewarm" and "boring." Hofmannsthal began to write with a specific theatre in mind, that of Max Reinhardt in Berlin. He made increasing use of stage technology in order to enhance the sensuous impact of his works. Lighting, music, the rhythms of movement are all incorporated into the text, as the stage directions of the powerfully visual Elektra (Electra) demonstrate.

Further factors influencing Hofmannsthal's change of style include the literary trend of "anti-erotic" writers such as Wilde, Strindberg, and Wedekind, and also the writings of Freud. Their influence shows most overtly in the so-called "Greek" plays, Electra and Ödipus und die Sphinx [Oedipus and the Sphinx], where Hofmannsthal probes the depths of sexual antagonism, repression, and perversion—a radical departure from his Sophoclean model. Greek myth is here used to underline the most primitive aspects of human behaviour. Hofmannsthal was to return to the symbolic world of myth in his operas Ariadne auf Naxos (Ariadne on Naxos) and Die ägyptische Helena (Helen in Egypt), explaining in his late essay on the latter work that mythological opera was the only form in which the "atmosphere of the present" could be expressed adequately.

Hofmannsthal had already explored other possible modes of expression. Moving away from the "armchair playlets" of the 1890s, and the Greek plays of 1903 and 1905, he wrote his Jedermann (The Play of Everyman), and Das Salzburger grosse Welttheater (The Salzburg Great Theatre of the World), expressing fundamental human truths in the universalizing form of the medieval mystery play. Social satires, such as Der Schwierige (The Difficult Man), again treat universal themes, but this time in the context of modern Austria. Yet another mode is the magical setting of Die Frau ohne Schatten (The Woman without a Shadow), and of Der Turm (The Tower) which, with its oblique references to politics and its background of language scepticism, constitutes one of Hofmannsthal's most difficult plays.

The range and density of Hofmannsthal's poems and plays, essays and correspondence, account for the continuing interest in these works today.

—Sally McMullen (Croft)

See the essays on Andreas, The Difficult Man, and The Tower.

HOLBERG, Ludvig

Born: Bergen, Norway (then part of the Kingdom of Norway and Denmark), 3 December 1684. Education: Studied at school and university in Bergen; University of Copenhagen, 1702–04; travelled in the Netherlands and Germany, 1704–06; travelled in England, and studied in Oxford and London, 1706–08. Career: Tutor in Germany, 1708–09; at Borch's College, Copenhagen, 1709–14; appointed unpaid associate professor at University of Copenhagen, 1714, but spent the time of the appointment travelling in the Low Countries, Paris, and Rome, 1714–16; professor of metaphysics, 1717, professor of Latin, 1720, member of the University Council, 1720, professor of history and geography, 1730, and University bursar (quaestor), 1737–51, University of Copenhagen; wrote for Montaignu's troupe at the newly organized Danish Theatre, the Lille Grønnegade Theatre, Copenhagen, from 1722 until its closure in 1728; ceased writing plays during the reign of Christian VI, 1730–46, who banned all theatrical activity in Denmark and Norway; unofficial adviser and writer for the Kongelige Teater [Theatre Royal], Copenhagen, established shortly after the succession of Frederik V, in 1748. Made a baron, 1747. Died: 28 January 1754.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

- Udvalgte skrifter*, edited by Knud Lyne Rahbek. 21 vols., 1804–14.
Samlede skrifter, edited by Carl S. Petersen. 18 vols., 1913–63.
Samtlige komedier i tre bind, edited by F.J. Billeskov Jansen. 3 vols., 1984.
No; Jeppe of the Hill; The Scatterbrain, translated by Michael Meyer. 1999.

Plays (selection)

- Den politiske kandestøber* (produced 1722). 1723; as The Blue-Apron Statesman, translated by T. Weber, 1885; as The Political Tinker, translated by Oscar James Campbell, Jr. and Frederick Schenck, in Comedies, 1914.
Den vægelsindede (produced 1722). 1724; as The Weathercock, translated by Henry Alexander, in Four Plays, 1946.
Jeppe på bjerget; eller, Den forvandlede bonde (produced 1722). 1723; as Jepp on the Hill, translated by Waldemar C. Westergaard and Martin B. Ruud, 1906; as Jeppe of the Hill, translated by Oscar James Campbell, Jr. and Frederick Schenck, in Comedies, 1914; also translated by M. Jagendorf, 1953; as Barney Brae: A Comedy Set in Northern Ireland, translated and adapted by G.V.C. Young, 1980.
Mester Gert Westphaler; eller, Den meget talende barbeer (produced 1722). 1723; as The Loquacious Barber, translated by W.H.H. Chambers, 1903; translated as Mester Gert Westphaler; or, The Very Loquacious Barber, in The Drama 17, edited by A. Bates, 1903–04; as The Talkative Barber, translated by Henry Alexander, in Seven One-Act Plays, 1950.
Jean de France; eller, Hans Fritz (produced 1722). 1731; translated (from the German) as Jean de France; or, Hans Fritz, 1922.
Nye-Aars prologos [New Year's Prologue] (produced 1723).
Erasmus Montanus (produced 1748). 1723; as Erasmus Montanus, translated by T. Weber, 1885; also translated by Oscar James Campbell, Jr. and Frederick Schenck in Comedies, 1914; also translated in The Chief Modern Dramatists, edited by B. Mathews, 1916.
Den ellefte Juni [The Eleventh of June] (produced 1723). 1724.
Barselstuen [Room of the Child's Birth] (produced 1723). 1731.
Komedier. 3 vols., 1723–25.
Det arabiske pulver (produced 1724). 1724; as The Arabian Powder, translated by Henry Alexander, in Seven One-Act Plays, 1950; also translated by Reginald Spink, in Three Comedies, 1957.
Julestuen (produced 1724). 1724; as The Christmas Party, translated by Henry Alexander, in Seven One-Act Plays, 1950.
Mascarade (produced 1724). 1724; as Masquerade, translated by Henry Alexander, in Four Plays, 1946.
Ulysses von Ithacia; eller, En tysk comoedie [Ulysses of Ithaca; or, A German Comedy] (produced 1724). 1725.
Diderich Menschenschreck (produced 1724). 1731; as Captain Bombastes Thunderton, translated by H.W.L. Hime, in Three Comedies, 1912; as Diderich the Terrible, translated by Henry Alexander, in Seven One-Act Plays, 1950.
Henrik og Pernille (produced 1724). 1731; as Henry and Pernilla, translated by H.W.L. Hime, in Three Comedies, 1912.
Melampe [Melampe] (produced 1724). 1725.

Kilderejsen (produced 1724). 1725; as The Healing Spring, translated by Reginald Spink, in Three Comedies, 1957.

Jacob von Tyboe; eller, Den stortalende soldat [Jacob von Tyboe; or, The Braggart Soldier]. 1725.

Uden hoved og hale [Without Head or Tail]. 1725.

Den stundeløse (produced 1726). 1731; as Scatterbrains, translated by H.W.L. Hime, in Three Comedies, 1912; as The Fussy Man, translated by Henry Alexander, in Four Plays, 1946.

Den pantsatte bondedreng (produced 1726). 1731; as The Peasant in Pawn, translated by Henry Alexander, in Seven One-Act Plays, 1950; as The Transformed Peasant, translated by Reginald Spink, in Three Comedies, 1957.

Den danske comoedies liigbegiængelse [The Danish Drama's Funeral] (produced 1727). 1746.

Hexerie; eller, Blind allarm [Witchcraft; or, False Alarm] (produced 1750). 1731.

Det lykkelige skibbrud [The Fortuitous Shipwreck] (produced 1754). 1731.

De usynlige (produced 1747). 1731; as The Masked Ladies, translated by Henry Alexander, in Four Plays, 1946.

Pernilles korte frøkenstand [Pernille's Short Ladyship] (produced 1747). 1731.

Den honnete Ambition [Social Aspiration] (produced 1747). 1731.

Don Ranudo de Colibrados; eller, Fattigdom og hoffærdighed [Don Ranudo de Colibrados; or, Poverty and Pride]. 1745.

Sganarels reyse til det Philosophiske Land (produced c. 1751–53). 1751; as Sganarel's Journey to the Land of the Philosophers, translated by Henry Alexander, in Seven One-Act Plays, 1950.

Plutus (produced 1751). 1753.

Abracadabra; eller, Huus-spøgelse [Abracadabra; or, The House-Ghost] (produced 1752).

Den forvandlede brudgom (produced 1882). 1753; as The Changed Bridegroom, translated by Henry Alexander, in Seven One-Act Plays, 1950.

Republigven; eller, Det gemene Bedste [The Republic; or, The General Good] (produced 1754). 1754.

Philosophus udi egen Inbildung (produced 1754). 1754.

Three Comedies (includes Henry and Pernilla; Captain Bombastes Thunderton; Scatterbrains), translated by H.W.L. Hime. 1912.

Comedies (includes Erasmus Montanus; Jeppe of the Hill; The Political Tinker), translated by Oscar James Campbell, Jr. and Frederick Schenck. 1914.

Four Plays (includes The Fussy Man; The Masked Ladies; The Weathercock; Masquerade), translated by Henry Alexander. 1946.

Seven One-Act Plays (includes The Talkative Barber; The Arabian Powder; The Christmas Party; Diderich the Terrible; The Peasant in Pawn; Sganarel's Journey to the Land of the Philosophers; The Changed Bridegroom), translated by Henry Alexander. 1950.

Three Comedies (includes The Transformed Peasant; The Arabian Powder; The Healing Spring), translated by Reginald Spink. 1957.

Fiction

Nicolai Klimii iter subterraneum (in Latin). 1741; as A Journey to the World Under-Ground, translated 1742, as The Journey of Niels Klim to the World Underground, edited by James McNelis, Jr., 1960; as Niels Klim's Journey under the Ground, translated by John Gierlow, 1845.

Verse

Peder Paars. 2 vols., 1719–20; in part as Peter Paars, translated and adapted by Bergliot Stromsoe, 1862, complete version, translated by Stromsoe, 1962.

Opuscula latina. 2 vols., 1737–43.

Mindre poetiske skrifter. 1746.

Other

Introduction til de formemste Europæiske Rigers Historier. 1711; revised edition, 1728.

Introduction til natur og folke-retten [Introduction to Natural Law]. 1715; revised edition, 1734.

Epistola ad virum perillustrem [Letter to a Person of Renown]. 1728; in part as Virtues and Faults of Some European Nations, translated by J. Christian Bay, 1958.

Dannemarks og Norges beskrivelse. 1729; in part as The History of Norway, translated by A.A. Feldborg, 1817.

Den danske Skue-Plads. 5 vols., 1731–54.

Dannemarks riges historie [History of the Kingdom of Denmark]. 1732–35.

Synopsis historiae universalis. 1733; as An Introduction to Universal History, translated by Gregory Sharpe, 1755.

Bergens beskrivelse [Description of Bergen]. 1737.

Almindelig kirkehistorie [General Church History]. 1738.

Heltehistorier [Achievements of Great Men]. 1739.

Jødisk historie [History of the Jews]. 2 vols., 1742.

Moral tanker. 1744; edited by F.J. Billeskov Jansen, 1943; as Moral Reflections and Epistles, edited and translated by P.M. Mitchell, 1991.

Heltindehistorier [Comparative History of Famous Women]. 1745.

Epistler. 2 vols., 1748–54; edited by F.J. Billeskov Jansen, 8 vols., 1944–54; in part as Selected Essays, edited and translated by P.M. Mitchell, 1955, and with Moral Reflections, 1991.

Moralske fabler [Moral Fables]. 1751.

Remarques sur quelques positions qui se trouvent dans l'esprit des lois (written in French). 1753.

Memoirs: An Eighteenth-Century Danish Contribution to International Understanding (translation based on various sections of works). 1827; edited by Stewart E. Fraser, 1970.

Memoirer, edited by F.J. Billeskov Jansen. 1943.

Essays, edited by Kjell Heggelund. 1977.

Den radikale Holberg, edited by Thomas Bredsdorff. 1984.

Holberg og Juristerne: en antologi, edited by Klaus Neiiendam and Ditlev Tamm. 1984.

Moral Reflections and Epistles, edited and translated by P.M. Mitchell. 1991.

Translator, Herodiani historie. 1746.

*

Bibliography: Bibliografi over Holbergs skrifter, 3 vols., 1933–35; Holberg-Ordbog, 1981–.

Critical Studies: The Comedies of Holberg by Oscar James Campbell, Jr., 1914; Holberg by F.J. Billeskov Jansen, 1974; A Guide to the Writings of Ludwig Holberg and to His Manor-House Tersløsegaard by F.J. Billeskov Jansen, 1979; Ludwig Holberg's Comedies: A Biographical Essay by Gerald S. Argetsinger, 1983; Ludvig Holberg: The Playwright and His Age Up to 1730, translated by Jean and Tom Lundskaer-Nielsen, 1993; Ludvig Holberg—a European Writer: A Study in Influence and Reception, edited by Sven Hakon Rossel, 1994.

* * *

When Holberg wrote his first comedies in 1722, there was effectively no tradition of playwriting in Scandinavia to which he could turn for inspiration. He was at the time a much-travelled scholar, recently appointed to the Chair of Metaphysics at the University of Copenhagen. He felt a deep sympathy with the rationalist, conservative ethos of French neo-classicism, and it was accordingly to the work of Molière that he looked for dramatic inspiration. Between 1722 and 1723, he wrote some 15 comedies, all of which, in the best neo-classical tradition, brilliantly satirize socially deviant behaviour in a way that is both entertaining and yet unmistakably didactic. Holberg uses the weapons of ridicule and irony to highlight the folly of characters such as the feckless peasant in Jeppe på bjerget (Jeppe of the Hill), the know-all amateur politician in Den politiske kandestøber (The Political Tinker), and the pretentious undergraduate from peasant stock in Erasmus Montanus. Like Molière, Holberg felt an obvious sympathy for his unfortunate victims, never losing sight of the transparently human qualities of even his most outrageous fools. This gives his plays, underneath the satiric thrust, a feeling of warmth, at times almost endearment.

Holberg was a precise observer of human behaviour, and his plays faithfully reflect the unsophisticated earthiness of peasant and middle-class culture in 18th-century Denmark. Despite the classical framework, his plays are manifestly Danish in spirit and texture (which may explain why so few have been performed in English). This is as true of the boasting warrior plays modelled on Plautus, such as Diderich Menschenschreck (Diderich the Terrible) or Jacob von Tyboe, as it is of plays like Den stundeløse (The Fussy Man) or Den vægelsindede (The Weathercock), modelled on Le Malade imaginaire by Molière.

Holberg had begun his literary career with a mock epic poem in 1720 called Peder Paars (Peter Paars). Based on the Aeneid, it follows the mock heroic journey of Peder Paars between two Danish provincial towns, Kalundborg and Aarhus. His comedies were written in 1722 at the invitation of a French actor called Montaigu who was given a licence to set up the first public theatre in Copenhagen with Danish actors. After the theatre went bankrupt in 1727, Holberg concentrated on his academic duties, publishing a number of important historical works. In 1741, he published a long satirical novel in the style of Swift called Nicolai Klimii iter subterraneum (Niels Klim's Journey under the Ground) and, in 1744, published a collection of essays called Moralske tanker (Moral Reflections and Epistles), similar in tone to those of Addison in The Spectator.

When a new theatre was established in Copenhagen in 1748, with the official title of the Theatre Royal, Holberg wrote a set of six new comedies to celebrate the occasion. However, these late plays lack the charm and appeal of his early work. His satiric, neo-classical approach to comedy was out of tune with an age that was increasingly embracing the liberal, sentimental values of English and French writers. By now a baron and a conservative pillar of the establishment, Holberg, in 1748, found himself writing for a culture that no longer existed. However, his fame as the founding father of Danish comedy was beyond question. Today, his plays still occupy an important and much-loved place in the repertoire of the Theatre Royal in Copenhagen.

—David Thomas

HÖLDERLIN, (Johann Christian) Friedrich

Born: Lauffen, Germany, 20 March 1770. Education: Educated at Latin school, Nürtingen, 1776–84; theological seminary, Denkendorff, 1784–86, and Maulbronn, 1786–88; Tübingen Seminary, 1788–93, master of philosophy, 1790. Career: Tutor to son of Charlotte von Kalb, in Waltershausen, 1793–94, and in Weimar, 1794–95; lived in Jena, 1795; tutor to son of Herr Gontard, Frankfurt, 1795–98; tutor in house of Herr Gonzenbach, Hauptweil, Switzerland, 1801, and of a German official in Bordeaux, 1801–02; librarian, Homburg, 1804–06. Mentally ill after 1805: confined first in clinic in Tübingen, 1806–07, and privately after 1807. Died: 7 June 1843.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Sämtliche Werke, edited by Friedrich Beissner and Adolf Beck. 8 vols., 1943–85.

Sämtliche Werke und Briefe, edited by Günter Mieth. 4 vols., 1970.

Sämtliche Werke, edited by Dietrich E. Sattler. 1975–.

Verse

Gedichte, edited by Gustav Schwab and Ludwig Uhland. 1826.

Selected Poems, translated by J.B. Leishman. 1944.

[Selection], translated by Michael Hamburger. 1943; revised edition, 1952; revised edition as Selected Verse, 1961.

Alcaic Poems (bilingual edition), translated by Elizabeth Henderson. 1962.

Poems and Fragments (bilingual edition), edited and translated by Michael Hamburger. 1966; revised edition, 1980.

Selected Poems (with Selected Poems by Mörike), translated by Christopher Middleton. 1972.

Hymns and Fragments (bilingual edition), translated by Richard Sieburth. 1984.

Selected Verse, edited and translated by Michael Hamburger. 1986.

Selected Poems, translated by David Constantine. 1990.

Fiction

Hyperion; oder, Der Eremit in Griechenland. 2 vols., 1797–99; as Hyperion; or, the Hermit in Greece, translated by Willard R. Trask, 1965.

Hyperion and Selected Poems, edited by Eric L. Santer. 1990.

Other

- Ausgewählte Briefe*, edited by Wilhelm Böhm. 1910.
Briefe, edited by Erich Lichtenstein. 1922.
Gesammelte Briefe, edited by Ernst Bertram. 1935.
Briefe, edited by Friedrich Seeba. 1944.
Briefe zur Erziehung, edited by K. Lothar Wolf. 1950.
Einundzwanzig Briefe, edited by Bertold Hack. 1966.
Essays and Letters of Theory, edited and translated by Thomas Pfau. 1988.
Hölderlin's Sophocles: Oedipus and Antigone, translated by David Constantine, 2001.
 Translator, Die Trauerspiele des Sophokles. 2 vols., 1804–06.

*

Bibliography: Internationale Hölderlin-Bibliographie edited by Maria Kohler, 1985.

Critical Studies: Hölderlin by Ronald Peacock, 1938; Hölderlin by Agnes Stansfield, 1944; Hölderlin by L.S. Salzberger, 1952; A Study of Hölderlin by R.D. Miller, 1958; Hölderlins Elegie "Brot und Wein": Die Entwicklung des hymnischen Stils in der elegischen Dichtung by Jochen Schmidt, 1968; Hölderlin's Hyperion: A Critical Reading by Walter Silz, 1969; The Young Hölderlin by Roy C. Shelton, 1973; Hölderlin and Greek Literature by Robin Burnett Harrison, 1975; Hölderlin and Goethe by Eudo C. Mason, 1975; Hölderlin's Major Poetry: The Dialectics of Unity, 1975, and Friedrich Hölderlin, 1984, both by Richard Unger; Hölderlin and the Left: The Search for a Dialectic of Art and Life by Helen Fehervary, 1977; The Significance of Locality in the Poetry of Hölderlin, 1979, and Hölderlin, 1988, both by David Constantine; Hölderlin's Hyperion by Howard Gaskill, 1984; Text, Geschichte und Subjektivität in Hölderlins Dichtung—"Unessbarer Schrift gleich" by Rainer Nägele, 1985; Narrative Vigilance and the Poetic Imagination by Eric L. Santer, 1986; Hölderlin's Silence by Thomas Eldon Ryan, 1988; Friedrich Hölderlin: The Theory and Practice of Religious Poetry: Studies in the Elegies by Martin F.A. Simon, 1988; The Problem of Christ in the Work of Friedrich Hölderlin by Mark Ogden, 1991; Hölderlin: The Poetics of Being by Adrian Del Caro, 1991; A Foretaste of Heaven: Friedrich Hölderlin in the Context of Württemberg Pietism by Priscilla A. Hayden-Roy, 1994; The Poet as Thinker: Hölderlin in France by Geert Lernout, 1994; Hölderlin's Hymn "The Ister" by Martin Heidegger, translated by William McNeill and Julia Davis, 1996; Leaves of Mourning: Hölderlin's Late Work, With an Essay on Keats and Melancholy by Anselm Haverkamp, translated by Vernon Chadwick, 1996; The Course of Remembrance and Other Essays on Hölderlin by Dieter Henrich, edited by Eckart Förster, 1997; Hölderlin and the Dynamics of Translation by Charlie Louth, 1998; The Solid Letter: Readings of Friedrich Hölderlin, edited by Aris Fioretos, 1999; The Recalcitrant Art: Diotima's Letters of Hölderlin and Related Missives, edited and translated by Douglas F. Kenney and Sabine Menner-Bettscheid, 2000; Narrating Community After Kant: Schiller, Goethe, and Hölderlin by Karin Schutjer, 2001.

* * *

Poetry—"this most innocent of occupations"—was Friedrich Hölderlin's vocation, and he had from the start the highest ambitions in it. His models as a young man were Pindar, Klopstock, and, closer to home, Schiller—whom he adulated, to his own detriment. He shared with his companions at school and in the seminary (several of them highly gifted) a passion for liberty excited by events in France, and a belief that poetry might, in its manner, serve the revolutionary cause. The regime in Württemberg, especially as it touched the students in Tübingen, was oppressive, and poetry served as a medium of revolt. The language of Hölderlin's early poems is often very violent; they depict the beleaguering of the Good, in whatever definition, by the forces of Wrong—of injustice, tyranny, philistinism, etc. In the Tübingen Hymns these oppositions are expressed in abstract terms, and the poetry suffers accordingly.

Hölderlin was educated for the Church but avoided entry into it by taking the customary house-tutor jobs. In the second of these, in Frankfurt, he met and fell in love with Susette Gontard. Through her he found his own true poetic voice; Frankfurt, in a late fragment, he called "the navel of the earth." His first poems for her, whom he addressed as Diotima, are marvellously expressive of love and joy; thereafter, as social circumstances oppressed the lovers, he turned to lament and the determined celebration of the Good he was losing. The loss of Susette confirmed him in his elegiac character.

Hölderlin had been working on the novel Hyperion before he met Susette (she had read fragments of it in Schiller's Thalia), but meeting her he continued it as their book. "Forgive me that Diotima dies," he wrote. Hyperion, the modern Greek fighting for the recovery of the Hellenic Ideal in the abortive rising of 1770, sees his ideals founder in the bitterest fashion; his attempt to realize them costs him Diotima too. There is almost a will to failure in the book; as though the hero pushes the foreboding that he will fail to its ultimate proof, and salvages his ideals out of a wretched reality into the spirit.

Forced to leave the Gontard household Hölderlin held out in nearby Homburg for as long as he could. There he schooled himself for his greatest poetry. He translated Pindar literally, to learn what his own German language might do; he reflected on the nature and practice of poetry, especially the crucial question of how form might express the spirit without imprisoning or travestying it. Further, he worked at the drama Empedokles; but having written extensive notes and attempted three versions, he abandoned the work. Attractive though the idea was and although much of the poetry, especially that of the second version, has an exciting vitality, in essence the conception itself was undramatic and could not have been executed satisfactorily.

The world of Hölderlin's mature poetry, of the great hymns and elegies, is conceived in very concrete terms: it can be mapped, it has two poles—Greece and Hesperia—and numerous renowned features—rivers, mountains, islands, and cities. It incorporates a simple idea (deriving from Herder but also from contemporary Pietist beliefs): that the Spirit of Civilization, having flourished in the East and most splendidly in Periclean Athens, will alight and flourish now north of the Alps, in Germany. The Revolutionary Wars, and the momentousness attaching to the turn of the century, inclined the determinedly optimistic Hölderlin to believe in such a renaissance. In his cosmology we inhabit an Age of Night—initiated by Christ, the last of the Greek gods. We are benighted and await the new daylight; the poet's task is to encourage us not to despair. This benighted age is characterized by restlessness and wandering; an ideal homeland (Hölderlin's childhood Swabia) is a focus of longing. These are not so much ideas or beliefs as poetic images of immense persuasive power; they express certain readily identifiable conditions: alienation, loss, nostalgia. The theme of Hölderlin's poetry is, in nuce: love in absence—how to survive and continue to hold to ideals in times of their manifest absence.

It will not do, when reading Hölderlin, simply to abstract the above adumbrated scheme. That is paraphrase. Instead we have to attend to the rhythms of his poetry, which are very subtle. Contradictions (inclination to despair, insistence on hope, longing for the past, assertion of a better future) are expressed less in statement than in rhythm, in the running of the verse itself against the exact constraints of form. His handling of hexameters and the elegiac couplet is infinitely finer than Goethe's or Schiller's. There is a movement of tones in Hölderlin's verse, there are oscillations of feeling, shifts, transitions through discord and harmony. In a sense, the poems do not end; their constituent emotions have been so finely rendered that we feel them to be still in play. There is no neat conclusion, as of a logical argument. There could not be. The spirit resists such finality. In this manner, in what he himself called a "loving conflict," Hölderlin's poetry serves the cause of perpetual renewal, of revolt against oppression, deadness, and despair of whatever kind.

After the time in Bordeaux, after the death of Susette Gontard, Hölderlin's poetic world expanded and disintegrated. It is much to be regretted that his mind, because of illness, could not compose the terrific richness of his last creative years. There are moments of vision unlike any others in his poetry, of an intense sensuousness and particularity.

During his years in the tower, half his life, Hölderlin wrote, very often to order, rhyming stanzas on the view through his window of the Neckar and the fields and hills beyond; or, less successfully, on abstract topics. These last poems are very moving, sometimes in their own flat simplicity (tension being a hallmark of the mature poetry) but often, alas, only as documents.

Nobody nowadays would be likely, as earlier generations did, to disregard anything Hölderlin wrote on the grounds of his presumed insanity. In his life and in all his work he is a poet for our times. He confronts us with benightedness, and demonstrates the spirit's will to survive.

—David Constantine

See the essay on "Bread and Wine."

HOLUB, Miroslav

Born: Plzeň, Czechoslovakia (now the Czech Republic), 13 September 1923. Education: Completed secondary school, 1942; while Czech universities remained closed under Nazi occupation, worked as a labourer at a warehouse and at a railway station, 1942–45; studied at Charles University, 1945–53, received an M.D., 1953. Family: Married 1) Věra Koktová, 1948 (divorced, 1952); 2) Marta Svírhová, 1963 (divorced, 1971); 3) Jitka Langrová, 1971, three children. Career: Worked as a pathologist in a Prague hospital, 1953, was employed at the Institute of Biology (later Microbiology) at the Czechoslovak Academy of Sciences 1954–70; fired in 1970 for political reasons; executive editor of Vesmír (The Universe) 1951–65, after making a degrading public statement of self-criticism he was given employment at the Institute for Clinical and Experimental Medicine in Prague, 1970; he was re-admitted to the Institute of Microbiology, 1995. From 1970–82 he was a banned author in Czechoslovakia, until mid 1980s he could only publish his literary and journalistic work with difficulty. Awards: Honorary Doctorate, Oberlin University, 1985. Died: 14 July 1998.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

- Selected Poems*, translated by Ian Milner and George Theiner. 1967.
Notes of a Clay Pigeon, translated by Ian and Jarmila Milner. 1977.
Poems Before and After, translated by Ian and Jarmila Milner, Ewald Osers and George Theiner. 1990.
Intensive Care: New and Selected Poems. 1997.
The Rampage, translated by Miroslav Holub, David Young, Dana Hábová and Rebekah Bloyd. 1997.

Verse

- Denní služba* [Day Duty]. 1958.
Achilles a želva [Achilles and the Tortoise]. 1960.
Slabikář [School Reader]. 1961.
Jdi a otevři dveře [Go and Open the Door]. 1962.
Kam teče krev [Where Blood Flows]. 1963.
Tak zvané srdce [The So-Called Heart]. 1963.
Ačkoli. 1969; as Although, translated by Ian and Jarmila Milner, 1971.
Beton [Concrete]. 1970.
Události [Events]. 1971.
Sagitální řez. 1988; as Sagittal Section: Poems, New and Selected, translated by Stuart Friebert and Dana Hábová, 1980.
Naopak. 1982; as On the Contrary and Other Poems, translated by Ewald Osers, 1984.
Interferon čili O divadle. 1986; as Interferon or On Theater, translated by David Young and Dana Hábová, 1982.
Syndrom mizející plíce. 1990, as Vanishing Lung Syndrome, translated by David Young and Dana Hábová, 1990.
Ono se letělo: Suita z rodného města. 1994; as Supposed to Fly. A Sequence from Pilsen, Czechoslovakia, translated by Ewald Osers, 1996.
Narození Sisyfovo. Básně 1989–1997 [The Birth of Sisyphos. Poems 1989–1997]. 1998.

Other

- Zcela nesoustavná zoologie* [Quite Unsystematic Zoology], with Květoslav Příbyl. 1963.
Anděl na kolečkách: Poloreportáž z USA [An Angel on Wheels: Half a Report from the USA]. 1963, extended 1964.
Tři kroky po zemi: Příběhy a myšlenky kolem vědy [Three Steps on the Ground: Stories and Ideas about Science]. 1965.
Žít v New Yorku [To Live in New York]. 1969.
Struktura imunitního systému [The Structure of the Immunity System]. 1979.
K principu rolničky. 1987; as The Jingle Bell Principle, translated by James Naughton, 1992.
Immunology of Nude Mice. 1989.
Maxwellův démon čili O tvořivosti [Maxwell's Demon or On Creativity]. 1988.
Nepatrně ne [Imperceptibly, No]. 1989.
The Dimension of the Present Moment and Other Essays, edited by David Young. 1990.
Skrutá zášť věků [The Hidden Hatred of the Ages]. 1990.
O příčinách porušení a zkázy těl lidských. 1992; as Shedding Life: Disease, Politics and Other Human Conditions, translated by David Young, Rebekah Bloyd and others, 1997.
Aladinova lampa [Alladiñs Lamp]. 1996.

*

Bibliography: MUDr. Miroslav Holub, CSc. Publikované práce 1956–1983 (MUDr. Miroslav Holub, CSc. Published Work 1956–1983), edited by A. Nováková, 1983.

Critical Studies: “Syntagmatic Structure in the Free Verse of Miroslav Holub” by Herbert Eagle, in Rackham Literary Studies, vol. 3, 1972; “The Fully Exposed Poem” by Seamus Heaney, in Parnassus, vol. 11, Spring-Summer, 1983; “Miroslav Holub” by Dennis ÓDriscoll, in Poetry Review, vol. 75, October, 1985; “Three Contemporary Slavic Poets: A View from the Other Side” by Rueul Wilson, in New Quarterly Cave, vol. 1, no. 4, 1976; “Miroslav Holub” by Jan Čulík and Jiří Holý, in Dictionary of Literary Biography, vol. 232, 2001.

* * *

Miroslav Holub was a poet and a scientist, a medical doctor and an internationally respected immunologist. His poetry is unique because it combines a literary tradition with the analytical incisiveness of a scientific mind. Holub began writing poetry at the end of World War II under the influence of the Czech interwar poetic avant garde. Surrealist motives—used within the strictly cerebral structures of his poems—remained a characteristic feature of his poetry throughout his literary career. He was also influenced by the civilist poetry of Jacques Prévert.

After the communist takeover in 1948, when all published literature in Czechoslovakia was forced to conform to strict propagandist norms, Holub did not publish any of his work. It was not until the second half of the 1950s that he became a member of a literary circle centered around the journal Květen [May], which rejected the rhetoric of official pro-communist literature and in response to its bathos chose to be deliberately anti-ideological. The writers centered around Květen used a casual writing style, and were interested in the life of ordinary people, in what they called the “poetry of the everyday.” Holub avoided lyricism and wrote irregular, free verse. His poetry used themes from his work as a scientist: researchers were for Holub unassuming individuals who by solving problems and making discoveries brought about progress. Holub’s poems are effective because they are extremely logical and semantically precise: sometimes they feel like riddles, often they are based on paradoxes. They contain humor. They translate well into other languages because their structure is based on the confrontation of ideas, not on linguistic experimentation.

Even Holub’s early poetry could be construed as implicit comment on the frustrations of life under the communism—as well as on the bleakness of the human condition in general. But in the early 1960s, Holub was still quite optimistic. He felt one must always ask questions, try to “go and open the door”: “even if there’s only / the darkness ticking / even if there’s only the hollow wind / even if nothing is there. / At least there’ll be / a draft.” Poems like these had a subversive, political charge within the besieged society of communist Czechoslovakia, and Holub’s writing became a significant part of the movement of Czech intellectuals to liberalise the communist system through questioning, outspoken, liberal and democratic art. In the 1960s, like many of his colleagues, Holub still seemed to believe in human progress.

The 1968 Warsaw Pact invasion of Czechoslovakia ended the liberalising reforms and threw the country into a harsh neo-Stalinist mode for twenty years. The mood of Holub’s poetry darkened. Life was difficult for Holub in the 1970s and 1980s: like many of his colleagues, he was banned as a writer and could not publish his work until 1982, in spite of the fact that he made a degrading public statement in order to win favor with the communist authorities as early as 1973. The publication of this statement alienated Holub from many of his former literary friends who had by this time become persecuted political dissidents. Holub tried to remain out of trouble with the communist authorities, but the secret police harassed him nevertheless. While he was ostracised in his own country, internationally, his literary and scientific work fame grew. His poetry came to be translated into more than thirty languages and in the last years of his life Holub was frequently invited to attend public readings of his poetry in many countries.

In the 1980s and 1990s, Holub mostly commented in essays on the current technological civilisation and on the place of poetry in today’s world. His poetry continued in the line of development, started in the late 1960s: in spite of all effort, life now seemed absurd, ambiguous, unintelligible, and undecipherable.

After the fall of communism in Czechoslovakia in 1989, Holub never regained the standing that he had enjoyed along with his liberal colleagues in the 1960s in his native country. Czechoslovakia had quickly succumbed to low-brow commercial entertainment and the arts no longer played such a significant role as they did in the 1960s. Many Prague intellectuals could not forgive Holub that he never came out openly against communism in the 1970s and 1980s. Holub’s rational and matter-of-fact literary style felt alien and “non-poetic” to many Czech critics.

—Jan Čulík

HOMER

Career: Nothing is known of his life: possibly lived 8th century BC; generally thought to have come from Ionia in Asia Minor, specifically Chios or Smyrna; ancient tradition that he was blind may be true.

PUBLICATIONS

Collection

Opera, edited by D.B. Munro and Thomas W. Allen. 5 vols., 1912–20.

Verse

Iliad, edited by Walter Leaf. 2 vols., 1900–02, reprinted 1960; also edited by D.B. Munro and Thomas W. Allen, 1920, A.J. Church, 1965, and M.M. Willcock, Books I–XII, 1978, Books XIII–XXIV, 1983; Book XXIV edited by C.W. MacLeod, 1982; as The Iliad, translated by George Chapman, 1611; also translated by Thomas Hobbes, 1676; John Ozell, W. Broome, and W. Oldisworth (from the French), 5 vols., 1712; Alexander Pope, 6 vols., 1715–20; William Cowper, 2 vols., 1802, reprinted 1992; P. Williams, 1806; James Mortice, 1809; William Sotheby, 2 vols., 1831; William Munford, 2 vols., 1846; T.S. Brandreth, 2 vols., 1846; F.W. Newman, 1856; I.C. Wright, 2 vols., 1861–65; Lord Derby, 2 vols., 1864; T.S. Norgate, 1864; J. Henry Dart, 1865; Edwin M. Simcox, 1865; P.S. Worsley and John Conington, 2 vols., 1865–68;

John F.W. Herschel, 1866; J.I. Cochrane, 1867; Charles Merivale, 2 vols., 1869; W.C. Bryant, 2 vols., 1870; W.G. Caldecleugh, 2 vols., 1870; J.G. Cordery, 2 vols., 1871; John Benson Rose, 1874; W. Lucas Collins, 1876; C.B. Cayley, 1877; A.S. Way, 1885; John Purves, 1891; Samuel Butler, 1898; E.A. Tibbetts, 1907; E.H. Blakeney, 1909; A.G. Lewis, 1911; A.F. Murison, 1933; William Marris, 1934; W.B. Smith and W. Miller, 1944; A.H. Chase and W.G. Perry, Jr., 1950; Richmond Lattimore, 1951; Robert Fitzgerald, 1974; J.P. Kurton, 1977; E. Rees, 1977; D.B. Hull, 1983; Martin Hammond, 1987; Robert Fagles, 1990; Michael Reck, 1990; as The Anger of Achilles, translated by Robert Graves, 1959; translations into prose: by James MacPherson, 2 vols., 1773; Theodore Alois Buckley, 1851; Andrew Lang, Walter Leaf, and Ernest Myers, 1882; A.T. Murray [Loeb Edition], 2 vols., 1924–25; Robinson Smith, 1937; W.H.D. Rouse, 1938; E.V. Rieu, 1950; commentaries: Books I–VI by M.M. Willcock, 1970, Books I–IV and Books V–VIII by G.S. Kirk, 1985 and 1990, Books IX–XII by J.B. Hainsworth, 1993, Books XIII–XVI by Richard Janko, 1991, Books XVII–XX by Mark W. Edwards, 1991, Books XXI–XXIV by Nicholas Richardson, 1993; Book Nine, edited by Jasper Griffin, 1995; Books VIII and IX, edited with translation by Christopher H. Wilson, 1996; translated by Stanley Lombardo, 1997; as Illiad Book One, translated by Simon Pulleyn, 2000.

Odyssey, edited by J.J. Owen. 1845; also edited by Thomas W. Allen, 1906, and W.B. Stanford, 2 vols., 1947–48, revised edition, 1965; as The Odyssey, translated by George Chapman, 1615; also translated by Thomas Hobbes, 1675; Alexander Pope, 1725; William Cowper, 1792; Theodore Alois Buckley, 1851; P.S. Worsley, 2 vols., 1861–62; T.S. Norgate, 1863; George Musgrave, 2 vols., 1865; L. Bigge-Wither, 1869; G.W. Edginton, 1869; W.C. Bryant, 1871; Mordaunt Barnard, 2 vols., 1876; W. Walter Merry, and James Riddell, 2 vols., 1878; G.A. Schomberg, 2 vols., 1879–82; A.S. Way, 1880; William Morris, 2 vols., 1887; J.G. Cordery, 1897; Samuel Butler, 1900; J.W. Mackail, 3 vols., 1903–10; H.B. Cotterill, 1911; Francis Caulfeild, 1921; William Marris, 1925; S.O. Andrew, 1948; Robert Fitzgerald, 1961; Richmond Lattimore, 1965; Albert Cook, 1973; E. Rees, 1977; Walter Shewring, 1980; P.V. Jones, 1991; translated into prose by S.H. Bryant and A. Lang, 1879; translations into prose: by G.H. Palmer (Books I–XII), 1884; A.T. Murray [Loeb Edition], 2 vols., 1919; Robert H. Hiller, 1927; T.E. Lawrence, 1932; W.H.D. Rouse, 1937; E.V. Rieu, 1945; commentaries: on vol. 1 by A. Heubeck, Stephanie West, and J.B. Hainsworth, 1985, col. 2 by A. Heubeck and Arie Hoekstra, 1988; Books VI–VIII, edited by A.F. Garvie, 1994; translated by Martin Hammond, 2000; translated by R.L. Eickhoff, 2001.

The Homeric Hymns, translated by Thomas W. Allen, W.R. Holliday, and E.E. Sikes. 1904; also translated by C. Boer, 1972; Apostolos N. Athanassakis, 1976.

*

Bibliography: A Bibliography of Homeric Scholarship 1930–1970 by D.W. Packard, 1973; “Homer and Oral Tradition” by Mark W. Edwards, in Oral Tradition, 1/2, 1986; “Homeric Studies 1978–83” by J.P. Holoka, in Classical World, 1990.

Critical Studies: Homer and the Epic, 1893, and The World of Homer, 1910, both by Andrew Lang; External Evidence for Interpolation in Homer by G.M. Bolling, 1925; The Unity of Homer by J.A. Scott, 1925; The Composition of Homer’s Odyssey by W.J. Woodhouse,

1930; The Idea of God in Homer by E. Ehnmark, 1935; The Poetry of Homer by S.E. Bassett, 1938; The Iliad; or, The Poem of Force by S. Weil, translated by M. McCarthy, 1945; Homer in English Criticism: The Historical Approach in the Eighteenth Century edited by D.M. Foerster, 1947; Homer and the Monuments by H.L. Lorimer, 1950; The Poet of the Iliad by H.T. Wade-Gery, 1952; The World of Odysseus by M.I. Finley, 1954; The Homeric Gods by W.F. Otto, translated by M. Hadas, 1954; The Homeric Odyssey, 1955, History and the Homeric Iliad, 1959, and Folktales in the Odyssey, 1972, all by Denys L. Page; Homer and His Critics by J.L. Myres, 1958; From Mycenae to Homer by T.B.L. Webster, 1958; Homer and the Homeric Tradition by Cedric H. Whitman, 1958; The Singer of Tales by A.B. Lord, 1960; A Complete Concordance to the Odyssey of Homer by H. Dunbar, edited by B. Marzullo, 2nd edition, 1962; The Songs of Homer, 1962 (as Homer and the Epic, 1965), The Language and Background of Homer, 1965, and Homer and the Oral Tradition, 1976, all by G.S. Kirk; A Complete Concordance to the Iliad of Homer by G.L. Prendergast, edited by B. Marzullo, 2nd edition, 1962; A Companion to Homer edited by A.J.B. Wace and Frank H. Stubbings, 1962; Homer: A Collection of Critical Essays edited by George Steiner and Robert Fagles, 1963; Essays on the Odyssey: Selected Modern Criticism edited by Charles H. Taylor, 1963; Prolegomena to Homer by F.A. Wolf, edited by R. Peppmüller, 1963; Typical Battle Scenes in the Iliad by Bernard Fenik, 1965, Homer: Tradition and Invention, edited by Fenik, 1978, and Homer and the Nibelungenlied, by Fenik, 1986; Homeric Modifications of Formulaic Prototypes by A. Hoekstra, 1965; Notes on Homer’s Odyssey by Robert J. Milch, 1966; The Art of the Odyssey by Howard W. Clark, 1967; The Iliad, the Odyssey and the Epic Tradition by C.R. Beye, 1968; The Flexibility of the Homeric Formula, 1968, and Homer, 1969, both by J.B. Hainsworth; Homer’s Odyssey: A Critical Handbook edited by C.E. Nelson, 1969; People and Themes in Homer’s Odyssey, 1970, and Homer’s Iliad: Its Composition and the Motif of Supplication, 1984, both by Agathe Thornton; The Making of Homeric Verse: The Collected Papers of Milman Parry edited by Adam Parry, 1971; The Theme of the Mutilation of the Corpse in the Iliad by Charles Segal, 1971; Homer by C.M. Bowra, 1972; The Conference Sequence: Patterned Narrative and Narrative Inconsistency in the Odyssey by William F. Hansen, 1972; Studies in the Language of Homer by G.P. Shipp, 2nd edition, 1972; Spontaneity and Tradition: A Study of the Oral Art of Homer by M.N. Nagler, 1974; The Homeric Hymn to Demeter by N.J. Richardson, 1974; Archery at the Dark of the Moon: Poetic Problems in Homer’s Odyssey by Norman Austin, 1975; Nature and Culture in the Iliad: The Tragedy of Hector by James Michael Redfield, 1975; The Meaning of Homeric EYCHOMAI Through Its Formulas by Leonard Charles Muellner, 1976; The Disguised Guest: Rank, Role and Identity in the Odyssey by Douglas J. Stewart, 1976; An Essay on the Original Genius of Homer by R. Wood, 1976; Similes in the Homeric Poems by Carroll Moulton, 1977; Composition by Theme in the Odyssey, 1977, and Homer and the Origin of the Greek Alphabet, 1991, both by Barry Powell; The Homeric Epics by C.A. Trypanis, 1977; Nature and Background of Major Concepts of Divine Power in Homer, 1977, and Form and Content in Homer, 1982, both by Odysseus Tsagarakis; Homer’s Iliad: The Shield of Memory by Kenneth John Atchity, 1978; Studies in Characterization in the Iliad by Leslie Collins, 1978; Homer’s Odyssey by John H. Finley, Jr., 1978; The Greek Concept of Justice: From Its Shadow in Homer to Its Substance in Plato by Eric A. Havelock, 1978; The Last Scenes of the Odyssey by Dorothea Wender, 1978; Essays on the Iliad: Selected Modern Criticism edited

- by J. Wright, 1978; The Best of the Achaeans by G. Nagy, 1979; An Introduction to Homer by W.A. Camps, 1980; Homer on Life and Death, 1980, and Homer: Odyssey, 1987, both by Jasper Griffin; The Homeric Question and the Oral-Formulaic Theory by Minna Skafta Jensen, 1980; Achilles, Patroklos and the Meaning of Philos by Dale S. Sinos, 1980; Homer's Readers: A Historical Introduction to the Iliad and the Odyssey by Howard W. Clarke, 1981; Homer, Hesiod and the Hymns: Diachronic Development in Epic Diction by Richard Janko, 1982; Childlike Achilles: Ontogeny and Phylogeny in the Iliad by W.T. MacCary, 1982; Improvisation, Typology, Culture, and "the New Orthodoxy": How Oral Is Homer? by D.G. Miller, 1982; The Epithets in Homer: A Study in Poetic Values, 1982, and Homer, 1985, both by Paolo Vivante; The Wrath of Athena: Gods and Men in the Odyssey by Jenny Strauss Clay, 1983; Approaches to Homer edited by Carl A. Rubeno and Cynthia W. Shelmerdine, 1983; Twentieth-Century Interpretations of the Odyssey: A Collection of Critical Essays, 1983; The Mortal Hero by S. Schein, 1984; Traditional Themes and the Homeric Hymns by Cora Angier Sowra, 1984; Achilles in the Odyssey by Anthony T. Edwards, 1985; Prolegomena to Homer translated by A. Grafton, G.W. Most, and J.E.G. Zetzel, 1985; Notes on Homer's Iliad edited by Robin Sowerby, 1985, and Homer, the Odyssey: Notes by Sowerby, 1986; Homer the Theologian by Robert Lamberton, 1986, and Homer's Ancient Readers: The Hermeneutics of Greek's Earliest Epic Exegeses edited by Lamberton and John Jo Keaney, 1992; Notes on Homer's Iliad by Elaine Strongskill, 1986; Homer by Martin Thorpe, 1986; Homer: Beyond Oral Poetry: Recent Trends in Homeric Interpretation by J.M. Bremner, I.J.F. De Jong, and J. Kalf, 1987; Homer: Poet of the Iliad by Mark W. Edwards, 1987; Disguise and Recognition in the Odyssey by Sheila Murnaghan, 1987; Odysseus Polutropos: Intertextual Readings in the Odyssey and the Iliad by Pietro Pucci, 1987; Naming Achilles by David Shire, 1987; Homer: Iliad by M.S. Silk, 1987; Linguistics and Formulas in Homer: Scalarity and the Description of the Particle Per by E.J. Bakker, 1988; Notes on Homer's Odyssey edited by A. Norman Jeffares and Suheil Badi Bushrui, 1988; The Ironies of War: An Introduction to Homer's Iliad by Ian C. Johnston, 1988; Homer's Odyssey: A Companion to the English Translation of Richmond Lattimore by Peter Jones, 1988; War Music: An Account of Books 16–19 of Homer's Iliad by Christopher Logue, 1988; Epos: Word, Narrative and the Iliad by Michael Lynn-George, 1988; Homer, 1987: Colloquium Proceedings edited by John Pinsent and H.V. Hurt, 1988; The Unity of the Odyssey by George E. Dimock, 1989; Pindar and Homer by Frank Nisetich, 1989; Psychological Activity in Homer: A Study of Phren by Shirley D. Sullivan, 1989; Traditional Oral Epic by John Foley, 1990; Measure and Music by Caroline Higbie, 1990; The Language of Heroes: Speech and Performance in the Iliad by Richard P. Martin, 1990; Man in the Middle Voice: Name and Narration in the Odyssey by John Peradotto, 1990; Homer and the Sacred City by S. Scully, 1990; Homer edited by Harold Bloom, 1991; The Gods in Epic by D.C. Feeney, 1991; Penelope's Renown by M. A. Katz, 1991; Homer: Readings and Images by Chris Emlyn-Jones, Loina Hardwick, and John Purkis, 1992; Regarding Penelope by N. Felson-Rubin, 1992; Homer: The Poetry of the Past by Andrew Ford, 1992; Classical Epic: Homer and Virgil by Richard Jenkyns, 1992; Homeric Misdirection: False Predictions in the Iliad by James V. Morrison, 1992; Homeric Soundings: The Shaping of the Iliad by Oliver Taplin, 1992; The Stranger's Welcome: Oral Theory and the Aesthetics of the Homeric Hospitality Scene by Steve Reece, 1992; "Homer and the Roland" by William M. Sale, in Oral Tradition, 8.1 and 8.2, 1993; The Shield of Homer: Narrative Structure in the Iliad by Keith Stanley, 1993; The Poetics of Supplication: Homer's Iliad and Odyssey by Kevin Crotty, 1994; Singers, Heroes, and Gods in the Odyssey by Charles Segal, 1994; Reciprocity and Ritual: Homer and Tragedy in the Developing City-State by Richard Seaford, 1994; Homer, edited by Katherine Callen King, 1994; Greek Myths and Mesopotamia: Parallels and Influence in the Homeric Hymns and Hesiod and Charles Penglase, 1994; The Heart of Achilles: Characterizations of Personal Ethics in the Iliad by Graham Zanker, 1994; The Interpretation of Order: A Study in the Poetics of Homeric Repetition by Ahuvia Kahane, 1994; The Distaff Side: Representing the Female in Homer's Odyssey, edited by Beth Cohen, 1995; Siren Songs: Gender, Audiences, and Narrators in the Odyssey by Lillian Eileen Doherty, 1995; The Odyssey in Athens: Myths of Cultural Origins by Erwin F. Cook, 1995; Turning: From Persuasion to Philosophy: A Reading of Homer's Iliad by Michael Naas, 1995; Homer, His Art and His World by Joachim Latacz, translated by James P. Holoka, 1996; Homer by R.B. Rutherford, 1996; Essay on the Life and Poetry of Homer by Plutarch, edited by J.J. Keaney and Robert Lamberton, 1996; Talking Trojan: Speech and Community in the Iliad by Hilary Mackie, 1996; Homeric Questions by Gregory Nagy, 1996; The Odyssey Re-formed by Frederick Ahl and Hanna M. Roisman, 1996; Reading the Odyssey: Selective Interpretive Essays, edited with an introduction by Seth L. Schein, 1996; Out of Line: Homeric Composition Beyond the Hexameter by Matthew Clark, 1997; Plot and Point of View in the Iliad by Robert J. Rabel, 1997; Poetry in Speech: Orality and Homeric Discourse by Egbert J. Bakker, 1997; Readings on Homer, edited by Don Nardo, 1998; Homer, edited by Ian McAuslan and Peter Walcot, 1998; The Swineherd and the Bow: Representations of Class in the Odyssey by William G. Thalmann, 1998; The Song of the Sirens: Essays on Homer by Pietro Pucci, 1998; Homer: Critical Assessments, edited by Irene J.F. de Jong, 1999; Flesh and Spirit in the Songs of Homer: A Study of Words and Myths by Michael Clarke, 1999; Homer's Secret Iliad: The Epic of the Night Skies Decoded by Florence Wood and Kenneth Wood, 1999; Homer's Traditional Art by John Miles Foley, 1999; Nine Essays on Homer, edited by Miriam Carlisle and Olga Levaniouk, 1999; The Odyssey: Structure, Narration, and Meaning by Bruce Louden, 1999; Homer's Iliad: A Commentary on the Translation of Richmond Lattimore by Norman Postlethwaite, 2000; Homer Beside Himself: Para-narratives in the Iliad by Maureen Alden, 2000; Sense and Nonsense in Homer: A Consideration of the Inconsistencies and Incoherencies in the Texts of the Iliad and Odyssey by John Wilson, 2000; The Pity of Achilles: Oral Style and the Unity of the Iliad by Jinyo Kim, 2000; Homer by Jasper Griffin, 2001; The Tradition of the Trojan War in Homer and the Epic Cycle by Jonathan S. Burgess, 2001; Studies in the Text and Transmission of the Iliad by Martin L. West, 2001; The Raft of Odysseus: The Ethnographic Imagination of Homer's Odyssey by Carol Dougherty, 2001.

* * *

The Iliad and The Odyssey come at the end of a 500-year-long tradition of oral epic, and parts of them—phrases, lines, perhaps even passages—must have been composed at the beginning of this tradition, when the city of Troy fell to the Achaean armies commanded by King Agamemnon of Mycenae. The oral epic style is a formulaic style, and most of the verses contain formulae: half-lines consisting of a noun plus an adjective, adverb, verb, or another noun, repeated exactly throughout the poem; whole lines stating a recurring fact, such as the coming of dawn; and a few passages of several lines describing, e.g. the preparation and eating of a meal. The formulae exist in order to ensure that the improvising oral poet can keep his metre from breaking down.

Such poetry and its audiences are not offended by repetitions that serve metrical needs, nor by epithets that are otiose or even slightly inappropriate: Achilles is “swift-footed,” whether running, standing, or seated. Repetition weakens the adjective, not so as to render it meaningless, but to make it seem part of the name. Repeated adjectives never, or very rarely, mean the wrong thing, but they need hardly be the mot juste.

The oral-formulaic style did not evolve in order that poems of the length of The Iliad be composed, and the Homeric compositions are extraordinary achievements even as craftworks. It is quite possible, even probable, that they were composed with the aid of writing: perhaps they were dictated, perhaps the poet learned how to write. That they were preserved orally is of course possible, but in that case what we read undoubtedly suffered distortion during oral transmission. Since most Homeric critics prefer to talk about a text assumed to go back to the 7th or 8th centuries BC, criticism cannot safely rest its analyses on one or two passages; or if it does, it must recognize that it is analysing a text that may well not be Homer’s. Granted this caveat, it is safe to look on each poem as a unity, not an editorial amalgamation of previously existing long passages. Whether one poet composed both poems cannot be decided.

The theme of The Iliad is the Wrath of Achilles, directed first at Agamemnon, who robbed Achilles of his battleprize Briseis, and then at Hector, who killed Achilles’ beloved companion Patroclus. The young Achilles had dedicated himself to the heroic code, the most attractive concept of values in his Achaean society. To be a hero is to be publicly recognized for one’s valour on the battlefield, in combat fought no further from the enemy than a spear’s throw. Such recognition is symbolized by the battleprize, awarded by the troops or by Agamemnon after a city is sacked. To take away one’s prize is to shatter one’s honour, and Achilles is quite justified in withdrawing from battle. Agamemnon, his cause seriously threatened by Achilles’ absence, sends an embassy offering vast recompense. Achilles, still in the grip of his wrath, has by now come to question the value of heroism: life and love seem more important, and the pleas of Odysseus—representing Agamemnon—and of Achilles’ old teacher Phoenix, are turned aside. Ajax’s brilliant appeal to Achilles’ love for his comrades has better luck. Achilles agrees with him intellectually, though he is still too angry to rejoin the battle. But he does allow his companion Patroclus to lead his troops back to fight; when Hector kills Patroclus, Achilles conceives a blind hatred for Hector which is not satisfied even by Hector’s death. Priam comes seeking his son’s body, offering the ransom appropriate to the heroic code, and more importantly basing his appeal on the love between father and son. To this common human value Achilles responds, and the Wrath comes to an end.

Achilles’ movement from heroism to love is interlaced with the poet’s exploration of other perceptions of value and of the conflicts such differing perceptions create. Agamemnon, at least initially, believes himself justified by his superior power: his ability to field the most troops. Odysseus is the professional soldier who most honours success: never to return from war empty-handed. The Achaeans and their codes are essentially military; the Trojans are more diverse. We never forget that their city was once at peace, and prosperous. One of the king’s sons, Paris, is a skilled bowman in battle, but has no interest in war; he values beauty, and is not only the consort of Helen, but was the architect of his own palace. The shipbuilder Phereclus, no great warrior, is none the less eminent enough to merit a pedigree. The individual Achaean nations are under the absolute command of their kings, while Troy is loosely governed by a council of elders dominated, but hardly dictated to, by Priam’s family. Corresponding to such institutional looseness is a moral pluralism: unlike his brother Paris, Hector values heroism, while their father Priam is broadly tolerant, kindly, and sympathetic. Troy’s acceptance of diversity is the reason for its destruction: it does not force Paris to return the stolen Helen, nor Hector to re-enter his city and shun the duel with Achilles. Achaean society will always put the military goal first, while the Trojans will sacrifice national security to preserve individual freedom of choice. This is Troy’s tragedy, played against Achilles’ finding value in love, at the price of losing his friend and becoming forever alienated spiritually from his own society. Homer’s vision is pessimistic, but affirmative: human life has more ill than good, but it has value, in heroism and in love.

The Odyssey moves in very different worlds. Odysseus, returning from the Trojan War, is thrust into a fairyland world inhabited by the one-eyed giant Cyclops, the witch Circe, the seductive Sirens, the inexorable Scylla and Charybdis. Reluctant, fascinated, curious, self-indulgent, Odysseus pits himself against the temptations and dangers of this world with considerable personal success, but with the loss of his entire army. His various adventures usually have a ready symbolic interpretation: the Sirens represent the danger of losing one’s soul to the power of great art; Scylla and Charybdis, the need to choose to surrender a part to save the whole; Calypso, the surrender of one’s humanity to a world without death or domestic responsibility. Odysseus visits the underworld and hears from Achilles how any kind of life is preferable to non-existence. Despite this gloomy prospect, and despite the lure of the beauty of Calypso and her island, Odysseus chooses to be a mortal, a human being, and to go home.

Before this picture of the temptations of sensuality, adventure, and escape from the human lot, Homer places a “Telemachy” revealing how desperately Odysseus is needed at home in Ithaca. His wife Penelope, not knowing if her husband is alive, is besieged by suitors: though anxious to remain faithful, she cannot afford to reject a second marriage out of hand. Her son Telemachus is beginning to grow up in this hostile world: he acts creditably enough, but clearly requires a father’s help. Odysseus’ household—in Greek, his oikos, the fundamental unit of Ithacan society—is being consumed by the suitors, and pleas to fellow citizens receive no effective response. The last half of the poem describes Odysseus’ return to Ithaca, where he reclaims his household and restores order. Husband and wife reunite in their wedding bed; and it appears at this moment that the destiny of humanity, male and female, is essentially domestic, and that ultimate fulfilment lies in establishing and maintaining the oikos.

Yet the poem’s vision is larger than this. Odysseus must one day journey to an inland place and there dedicate his oar to Poseidon, thus placating the hostile god of the sea. The life of Odysseus, as of Penelope, is defined by two movements: one is a struggle to attain domestic stability; the other is the fascination offered by the adventures and challenges along the way.

—William Merritt Sale

See the essays on The Iliad and The Odyssey.

HOOFT, Pieter Corneliszoon

Born: Amsterdam, Dutch Republic (now The Netherlands), 15 March 1581. Education: Educated at the Amsterdam Latin School; studied law at Leiden, 1605–07. Family: Married 1) Christina van Erp in 1610 (died 1624); 2) Leonora Hellemans in 1627. Career: Travelled in Europe, then settled in the Netherlands; Justice of Muiden, from 1609; after 1627 his official residence became the leading literary circle of his time, the Muiderkring. Awards: Granted title “Knight of St. Michael” for his biography of Henry IV, 1639. Member: d’Eglantier; joined Samuel Coster’s Nederduytsche Academie. Died: 21 May 1647.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Alle de werken [Complete Works]. 4 vols., 1703–04.
Historieën [Histories], edited by W. Hecker. 5 vols., 1843–46.
Brieven [Letters], edited by J. van Vloten. 4 vols., 1855–57.
Volledige uitgave der gedichten [Complete Edition of the Poems], edited by P. Leendertz. 2 vols., 1871–75; revised by F.A. Stoet, 2 vols., 1899–1900.
Lyriek [Lyrics], edited by C.A. Zaalberg. 1963.
Alle de gedrukte werken [All the Printed Works], edited by W. Hellinga and P. Tuijnman. 9 vols., 1971.

Plays

Geeraerd van Velsen. 1613; as The Tragedy of Gerard van Velsen, translated by Theo Hermans and Paul Vincent, in Dutch Crossing, 45, 1991.
Achilles en Polyxena. 1614.
Theseus en Ariadne. 1614, reprinted 1988.
Granida, from Pastor fido by Guarini. 1615, reprinted 1958.
Warenar [A True Fool], from Aulularia by Plautus. 1617.
Schijnheyligh [Hypocrite], from L'ipocrito by Aretino. 1617.
Baeto oft oorsprong der Hollanderen [Baeto or the Origins of the Dutch]. 1626.

Verse

Emblemata amatoria. 1611.
Brief van Menelaus aan Helena [Letter from Menelaus to Helena]. 1615.
Bruiloftzang [Wedding Song]. 1623.
Klaghte der Princesse van Oranjen over 't oorloogh voor s'Hartogenbosch [Lament of the Princess of Orange Concerning the War in Den Bosch]. 1629.
Gedichten [Poems], edited by J. van der Burgh. 1636.
Erotische gedichten [Erotic Poems], edited by C.C. van Sloten. 1956.
Sonnetten, edited by P. Tuijnman. 1971.

Other

Henrick de Grote [Henry the Great]. 1626.
Waernemingen op de Hollandsche tael [Observations on Dutch Language]. 1638.
Nederlandsche historien [History of the Netherlands]. 20 vols., 1642; 7 vols. completed by his son, 1654.

Rampzaeligheden der verheffing van den Huize Medicis [Disasters of the Rise of the House of Medici]. 1638, revised 1649.

Reden van de waerdicheit der poesie, edited by J. van Krimpen and A.A.M. Stols. 1925, reprinted 1971; as An Oration Concerning the Excellence of Poetry, translated by Lesley Gilbert, in Dutch Crossing, 47, 1992.

*

Critical Studies: Het vers van Hooft by G. Kazemier, 1932; Hooft en Tacitus by J.D.M. Cornelissen, 1938; Bijdrage tot de kennis van de invloeden op Hooft, 1946, and Ethiek en moral bij P.C. Hooft, 1967, both by F. Veenstra; P.C. Hooft by H.W. van Tricht, 1951; Hooft en dia by W.A.P. Smit, 1968; Dramatische structuur in tweevoud by E.K. Grootes, 1973; Bijdragen tot de P.C. Hooft filologie by P. Tuijnman, 1973; Uyt liefde geschreven: Studies over Hooft, 1981; Hooft als historien-schrijver by S. Groeneveld, 1981.

* * *

Pieter Corneliszoon Hooft was born into a rich merchant’s family and took full advantage of the privileges of such a background: he received a good classical education, and he helped administer his country. He devoted himself to writing early in life, and the poetics he espoused were those of the Renaissance rather than of the Rhetoricians of “d’Eglantier,” the Amsterdam chapter of Rhetoricians where he first learned his trade. He was later to break with them altogether, and to become instrumental in the founding of the first Amsterdam theatre dedicated to the new Aristotelian drama.

Like many Dutch painters of his time, Hooft discovered the Renaissance in Italy and helped introduce it to the Netherlands on his return to his native country and city. The influence of Italian models on his poetry and his pastoral play Granida is as obvious as is the influence of Tacitus on his historiographical writings. In the first half of his literary career Hooft concentrated on writing for the stage, although he also wrote poetry, but rather as an expression of his amorous pursuits than of his main intellectual and philosophical interests. Hooft wrote the first Renaissance play in Dutch, Achilles en Polyxena, based on the Homer continuations by Dictus Cretensis and Dares Phrygius. He came into his own as a playwright with Granida, inspired by Italian examples. Hooft used the play, written in a genre that was extremely popular in his time, to test his views on the conflict between liefde, by which he understood what his medieval predecessors would have referred to as “high love,” and min, which he used to mean eroticism. A happy ending is achieved, wholly in keeping with the conventions of the genre, when love and eroticism are combined in the harmony of lasting relationships. The same tension between love and eroticism pervades much of Hooft’s more personal poetry, mainly the earlier work, although it is never quite absent from later productions. This private Hooft coexisted with the public Hooft, not just in discharging administrative duties, but also in poetry. Like many of his contemporaries, Hooft produced many “public” poems to celebrate victories, dedicate buildings, or praise public figures or the city of Amsterdam itself.

The poetry also reveals another side to Hooft: the conscientious craftsman who tried to emulate Petrarch and his school. The many sonnets he wrote are probably not meant to be read at a personal level, but as “masterpieces” in the original sense of the word, a piece to show that the apprentice had “mastered” his trade and could therefore set up as a master himself. Hooft was a master who used a diction more refined and a metre more subtle than any of his predecessors. He was, however, a slightly different kind of master in his official residence, the Muiderslot, where he lived during the summer. After his second marriage in 1627, he played host there to many writers and creative spirits who gathered at the castle for evenings of discussion, not just of literature, but also of matters of more philosophical and political import.

Hooft ventured into comedy with Warenar [A True Fool], an adaptation of Plautus' Aulularia (The Pot of Gold), in which he also displayed his knowledge and mastery of the Amsterdam dialect. He had always been interested in the different variants of Dutch spoken around him and in the evolution of the language, and even tried to standardize its spelling, to little avail. Warenar also illustrated that Hooft knew how to write successfully for a less educated audience, thereby beating at their own game the Rhetoricians, who claimed to be writing for a general rather than an elite audience. Hooft could and did write for a general audience not only as a playwright, but also as a poet. His Emblemata amatoria, which represents his contribution to the then thriving genre of "emblem literature," became very popular during his lifetime and remained so for at least a century after his death.

In both his later tragedies and his prose, Hooft explored the problem of power, probably the central problem of his life, not primarily because he exercised some kind of limited power himself, but because his life coincided almost exactly with the lengthy but unexpectedly victorious war of independence waged by the emerging Dutch Republic against Spain, then the most important power in Europe.

Geeraerdt van Velsen (The Tragedy of Gerard van Velsen) provides a rationale for revolt against an unjust ruler. Once the Count of Holland, Floris V, no longer behaves as he should, his subjects are entitled to rise against him and depose him, just as the Netherlands rose against Philip II of Spain and deposed him as its ruler. Baeto of oorsprong der Hollanderen [Baeto or the Origins of the Dutch], based not so much on Dutch history as on the emerging national mythology all new states create to legitimize their existence, is Hooft's portrayal of the just ruler who would rather forsake his throne than plunge his country into civil war. Hooft also depicted the just ruler in prose in his biography of the French king Henry IV (Henrick de Grote), considered an example to all kings by many intellectuals in Europe of the time. Hooft wrote his biography of Henry IV to sharpen his skills for the major task ahead: the history of the Dutch war of independence against Spain. This project, undertaken in the spirit of Tacitus for whom, as for Hooft, history was a literary genre that could be used to inform and instruct, was to occupy Hooft for the last part of his life. The published version, Neederlandsche hystorien [History of the Netherlands] runs to 20 books of stately prose, interspersed with pithy sayings on the Tacitian model. It contains Hooft's final and most incisive analyses of power, loyalty, tyranny, and revolt.

—André Lefevere

HORACE

Born: Quintus Horatius Flaccus in Venusia (now Venosa), Apulia, Italy, 8 December 65 BC. Education: Educated in Rome and Athens, c. 46 BC. Career: Joined Brutus' army in Athens, 44 BC, and probably accompanied him to Asia Minor, then fought at the battle of Philippi, 42 BC; returned to Italy, 41 BC, to find his father's land had been confiscated; became treasury clerk, c. 39 BC; friend of Virgil, q.v., who introduced him to Maecenas; became part of his circle of writers; given a farm in the Sabine country by Augustus. Died: 27 November 8 BC.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

[Works], edited by Otto Keller and Alfred Holder. 2 vols., 1899; also edited by Edward C. Wickham, revised by Heathcote William Garrod, 1912, Adolph Kiessling, revised by Richard Heinze, 3 vols., 1930, Friedrich Klinger, 1959, S. Borszák, 1984, and D.R. Shackleton Bailey, 1985; translated by John Conington, 2 vols., 1863–69; also translated by Theodore Martin, 1881; C.E. Bennett, 1914; H.R. Fairclough, 1926; Lord Dunsay and Michael Oakley, 1961; Charles E. Passage, 1983.

The Essential Horace, translated by Burton Raffel. 1983.

"Ecce Homo Amore!": The Love Poems of Horace, edited and translated by Louis Francis. 1993.

Horace in English, edited by D.S. Carne-Ross and Kenneth Haynes. 1996.

The Complete Odes and Epodes, translated with introduction and notes by David West. 1997.

The Complete Odes and Satires of Horace, translated with introduction and notes by Sidney Alexander. 1999.

Verse

Ad Pyrrham (Ode I.5), several hundred translations, mostly into English, edited by R. Storrs. 1959.

Ars poetica, edited and translated by A.F. Watt. 1905; also edited by C.O. Brink, 1971; as Ars poetica, translated by H.R. Fairclough [Loeb Edition], 1926; also translated by R.C. Trevelyan, 1940; Burton Raffel, 1974; Niall Rudd, 1989; as The Poetic Art, translated and adapted by C.H. Sisson, 1975.

Epistles, edited by A.S. Wilkins (with commentary). 1892; also edited by O.A.W. Dilke, 1954, revised edition, 1961; Book II edited by Niall Rudd, 1989; edited and translated by Francis Platstowe and Frank P. Shipham, 1893; edited and translated by Howard H. Erskine-Hill, 1964; translated by Philip Francis, 1906; also translated by H.R. Fairclough [Loeb Edition], 1926; R.C. Trevelyan, 1940; Smith P. Bovie, 1959; Colin MacLeod, 1986; Book I translated by O.A.W. Dilke, 1966; Book II translated by C.O. Brink, 1982; commentary by E.P. Morris, 1909–11; Book I, edited by Roland Mayer, 1994.

Epodes, edited by Henry Darnley Naylor. 1978; also edited by D.H. Garrison, 1991; translated by Joseph P. Clancy, 1960; translated by John Penman, 1980; W.G. Shepherd, 1983; translated with introduction by David Mulroy, 1994; edited by David Mankin, 1995.

Odes, edited by F. Plessis. 1924; also edited by Henry Darnley Naylor, 1978, Arthur Sherbo, 1979, Kenneth Quinn, 1980, and D.H. Garrison, 1991; Books I–II edited by R.G.M. Nisbet and M. Hubbard, 2 vols., 1970–78; Book III edited and translated by Gordon Williams, 1969; translated by Christopher Smart, 1767; also translated by J.B. Leishman, in Translating Horace, 1956; Joseph P. Clancy, 1960; Helen Rowe Henze, 1961; James Michie, 1964; W.G. Shepherd, 1983; commentaries by P. Shorey and G.J.

Laing, 2nd edition, 1910; as Horace Odes II: Vatis amici, translated by David West, 1998; as Odes and Carmen Saeculare, translated by Guy Lee, 1998.

Satires, edited by A. Palmer (with commentary). 1883; edited and translated by Howard H. Erskine-Hill, 1964; translated by H.R. Fairclough [Loeb Edition], 1926; also translated by Smith P. Bovie, 1959; Niall Rudd, 1973, revised edition, 1979; commentaries by E.P. Morris, 1909–11; as Satires I, translated by P. Michael Brown, 1993.

*

Critical Studies: Studies in Horace by A.W. Verrall, 1884; Horace and the Elegiac Poets by W.Y. Sellar, 1892; Horace and His Age by J.F. D'Alton, 1917; Horace and His Influence by G. Showerman, 1922; Horace: A New Interpretation by Archibald Young Campbell, 1924; Horace and His Lyric Poetry by L.P. Wilkinson, 1945, revised edition, 1968; Horace by E. Fraenkel, 1957; The Structure of Horace's Odes by Neville E. Collinge, 1961; The Odes of Horace: A Critical Study by Steele Commager, 1962; Horace on Poetry by C.O. Brink, 1963; Horace by J. Perret, 1964; The Satires of Horace by Niall Rudd, 1966; Reading Horace by David A. West, 1967; The Epodes of Horace by R.W. Carrubba, 1969; Word, Sound, and Image in the Odes of Horace by M.O. Lee, 1969; Studies in Horace's First Book of Epistles by M.J. McGann, 1969; Horace by Kenneth J. Reckford, 1969; A Commentary on Horace, Odes Book 1 by R.G.M. Nisbet, 1970; Horace by Gordon Williams, 1972; Horace edited by C.D.N. Costa, 1973; Horace and Callimachean Aesthetics by J.V. Cody, 1976; Horace in His Odes by James A. Harrison, 1981; Profile of Horace by D.R. Shackleton Bailey, 1982; The Golden Plectrum: Sexual Symbolism in Horace's Odes by Richard Minadeo, 1982; Horace: A Study in Structure by Helena Dettmer, 1983; Horace's Roman Odes: A Critical Examination by Charles Witke, 1983; The Poetry of Friendship: Horace, Epistles I, 1986, and The Poetry of Criticism, 1990, both by Ross S. Kilpatrick; Artifices of Eternity: Horace's Fourth Book of Odes by Michael C.J. Putnam, 1986; Unity and Design in Horace's Odes by Matthew S. Santirocco, 1986; Horace's Lyric Poetry by Peter Connor, 1987; Horace by David Armstrong, 1989; Horace by Marjorie Newman, 1990; Polyhymnia: The Rhetoric of Horatian Lyric Discourse by G. Davis, 1991; Horace by Holly Keller, 1991; The Walking Muse: Horace and the Theory of Satire by Kirk Freudenburg, 1993; Horace Made New: Horatian Influences on British Writing from the Renaissance to the Twentieth Century edited by Charles Martindale and David Hopkins, 1993; Horace 2000: A Celebration: Essays for the Bimillennium, edited by Niall Rudd, 1993; Horace and the Dialectic of Freedom: Readings in 'Epistles I' by W.R. Johnson, 1994; Time and the Erotic in Horace's Odes by Ronnie Ancona, 1994; Horace's Epistles, Wieland and the Reader: A Three-way Relationship by Jane Veronica Curran, 1995; Homage to Horace: A Bimillenary Celebration, edited by S.J. Harrison, 1995; Philodemus and Poetry: Poetic Theory and Practice in Lucretius, Philodemus, and Horace, edited by Dirk Obbink, 1995; Horace: Behind the Public Poetry by R.O.A.M. Lyne, 1995; Horace's Narrative Odes by Michèle Lowrie, 1997; Horace: A Life by Peter Levi, 1997; Horace and the Rhetoric of Authority by Ellen Oliensis, 1998; Horace: Poetics and Politics by V.G. Kiernan, 1999; Horace's Carmen saeculare: Ritual Magic and the Poet's Art by Michael C.J. Putnam, 2000; Horace: Image, Identity, and Audience by Randall L.B. McNeill, 2001; Horace and the Gift Economy of Patronage by Phebe Lowell Bowditch, 2001.

* * *

Horace's achievement is to have mastered two completely different types of poetry, each of which is remarkable for its originality and each of which has endeared itself to generations of readers.

The first type is his hexameter poetry. In 36/35 BC Horace produced Satires I, a collection of ten poems written in the manner of Lucilius (a Roman landowner and litterateur of the late 2nd century BC) and described by Horace himself as sermones (conversation pieces). Lucilius had been famous for his invective and biting wit; but though Horace subjects certain individuals to intermittent mockery throughout his collection, and though the first three satires deal with such moral questions as discontent and adultery, the book as a whole is hardly satirical at all in our sense of the word. Among the matters described or discussed are literary criticism (4, 10), a journey from Rome to Brundisium (5), and the poet's own life and his relationship with his patron Maecenas (6). Several representative features are combined brilliantly in satire 9, in which Horace describes how, on a walk through Rome, he was pursued by a stranger claiming to be a poet and hoping for an introduction to Maecenas. The satire, which begins with an allusion to Lucilius, is almost wholly taken up with dialogue, in which the pest's impertinence is matched by Horace's politeness, the latter's irony by the former's insensitivity. Since both protagonists are poets, the satire resembles the traditional form of the literary agon (contest); yet the pest unwittingly presents his own work in terms which, as the reader well knows, Horace (and Maecenas) can only regard with contempt. Further wit is displayed by means of epic motifs and military imagery, which are used throughout to suggest that the combatants are a pair of Homeric heroes; yet this language is entirely belied by the appalling behaviour of the pest, by whom Horace is nevertheless characteristically worsted until the very last moment, when he is rescued by the surprise intervention of a third party. The rescue itself is expressed in language which is again borrowed from Lucilius. The whole poem exhibits a confident combination of humour and humanity, and in the dialogue form the resources of metre and language are exploited to the full. Yet underneath the wit Horace has a serious message for his readers about admission to Maecenas' circle and hence, by implication, to the entourage of Octavian (the future emperor Augustus) himself.

A second book of Satires, containing eight poems, followed in 30 BC, and ten years later, 20 more hexameter poems which are known as Epistles I. Finally, there are three very long letters, the first two of which are collectively known as Epistles 2: to Augustus, to Florus, and to the Pisones (the Ars poetica, or The Poetic Art). Although the Satires and Epistles are conventionally distinguished by their titles, and though the latter display some epistolographical features which are naturally absent from the former, there is little otherwise to distinguish the two sets of poems. Since the verse letter had no significant analogue in Greek, and satire no analogue at all, Horace in these works produced a body of poetry which for its principal inspiration owes virtually nothing to the world of Greece. In this his poetry differs fundamentally both from that of other Roman poets, almost all of whom wrote in rivalry of Greek genres, and from the rest of the poetry which he wrote himself.

At the same time as he was engaged with Satires I, Horace was also writing iambic poetry in the manner of the early Greek iambist Archilochus. Iambics were traditionally associated with invective and disillusionment, and Horace's Epodes (as the 17 poems, which appeared around 30 BC, are known) include examples of this type (e.g. 2, 4, 8, 10, 12); but there is a wider range of subjects too, e.g. civil war

(7, 16), the battle of Actium (1, 9), life (13), and love (11, 14, 15). Thus the Epodes have affinities not only with the satires but also with Horace's second major achievement, the three books of Odes which appeared in 23 bc. These 88 poems, all written in lyric metres, cover an enormous variety of subject matter: famous examples are, in Book I: 4 (spring), 5 (the flirtatious Pyrrha, this being one of the most translated poems in Latin), 9 (Mt. Soracte), and 37 (Cleopatra); in Book II: 3 and 14 (death); and in Book III: 1 (ambition), 29 (life), and 30 (the immortality of the Odes). These three books represent Horace's attempt at producing a substantial collection of Latin lyric poetry, which would be a cultural adornment of Augustan Rome and which would rival the lyrics written by the Greek monodists Sappho and Alcaeus. Characteristic in many ways is II.7, in which Horace welcomes back to Italy a friend with whom he served on the republican side at the battle of Philippi many years before. Metaphor is used with striking originality to contrast the old soldiers' periods of enforced idleness with their bursts of frenzied activity, their comradely carousing with their defeat on the field of battle. Whereas his friend was sucked away by the tides of war, Horace had a fortunate escape. Ever conscious of the imminence of death, Horace presents his escape in epic terms; but there is no hint of self-congratulation, for he has already described his own part in the battle ignominiously, symbolized by his abandoned shield. This last is a motif found in several archaic Greek poets, including Alcaeus; Horace thus aligns his experience with theirs and underscores his poetic relationship with them. Now that his friend has returned to Italy, tellingly evoked by its sky and native gods, Horace conveys his delight by the detailed preparations he is making for their renewed carousing; and though the poet seems proud to have fought alongside Brutus, the reader is subtly reminded that his friend's return, and Horace's own prosperity, are due to the clemency and beneficence of the victor. This ode, in its linguistic brilliance, its feeling for friends and home, its blending of pride and understatement and of literature and life, illustrates much that is outstanding in Horace's lyric work.

There can be no question that Horace's achievement in the Odes was triumphantly successful. Official recognition of that success came when he was commissioned by the emperor to write the Carmen saeculare [Secular Hymn] for the important Secular Games of 17 bc. The emperor also requested poems celebrating the military exploits of his stepsons; these poems duly appear (4, 14) in Book IV of the Odes, which came out separately around 13 bc.

In metre and form the Odes could hardly be more different from the Satires and Epistles; yet all are recognizably written by the same poet, all have certain features in common, and all evince a concern for the same subjects. Horace is one of the few great classical writers whom readers easily convince themselves that they know intimately; yet his remarkable habit of partly revealing and partly concealing his personality means that, while throughout his different types of poetry the common link is provided by the poet himself, one person's Horace is never the next person's, and the "real Horace" is a source of endless fascination. Horace similarly tantalizes us in his manner of expression. Common features of his hexameter and lyric works are the wit and subtlety of their argumentation; yet his unrivalled facility with words means that apparently key sentences can look both forwards and backwards in such a way that his effortless transitions provide constant delight to the reader who, after much labour, thinks he has worked them out. Similarly ambivalent are Horace's favourite topics. He can combine support for the emperor's efforts at moral rearmament with hedonistic recommendations to drink and make love before the summons of death. He can profess to prefer light poetry to grand and at the same time produce the noblest of political poems. Horace's work has that capacity for constantly surprising the reader which we associate with great art; yet nothing could be more familiar than the many famous lines which he wrote and which are among the most memorable statements ever uttered about the human condition.

—A.J. Woodman

See the essays on The Poetic Art, "Odes Book I, Poem 5," and "Odes Book IV, Poem 7."

HORVÁTH, Ödön (Josef) von

Born: Fiume (now Rijeka), Austro-Hungarian Empire, 9 December 1901. Education: Educated at Episcopal School, Budapest, 1909–13; Wilhelmsgymnasium and Realschule, Munich, 1913–16; school in Pressburg, 1916; Realgymnasium, Vienna, 1916–19; University of Munich, 1919–22. Family: Married Maria Elsner in 1933 (divorced 1934). Career: Involved in politics from an early age; writer from 1922; contributor to various newspapers and journals; settled in Berlin, 1926; freelance writer, from 1929; increasingly attacked by the Nazis, from 1931; dialogue writer for the German film industry, 1934; left Germany to retain Hungarian citizenship, 1933; returned briefly to Berlin in early 1933; moved to Austria until the German annexation, then emigrated to Zurich, 1934. Awards: Kleist prize, 1931. Died: 7 June 1938.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Stücke, edited by Traugott Krischke. 1961.

Gesammelte Werke, edited by Traugott Krischke, Walter Huder, and Dieter Hildebrandt. 4 vols., 1970; also edition in 8 vols., 1972.

Gesammelte Werke, edited by Traugott Krischke. 4 vols., 1988.

Plays One: "Sladek," A Sexual Congress, translated by Penny Black. 2000.

Plays Two. 2000.

Plays

Das Buch der Tänze (libretto; produced 1922). 1922.

Revolte auf Côte 3018 (produced 1927). 1927; as Die Bergbahn (produced 1929), 1928.

Zur schönen Aussicht (produced 1969). 1927.

Sladek; oder, die schwarze Armee (produced 1972). 1928; revised version, as Sladek, der schwarze Reichswehrmann (produced 1929), 1929.

Rund um den Kongress (produced 1959). 1929.

Italienische Nacht (produced 1931). 1930; edited by Ian Huish, 1986.

Geschichten aus dem Wienerwald (produced 1931). 1931; edited by Hugh Rank, 1980; as Tales from the Vienna Woods, translated by Christopher Hampton, 1977.

Kasimir und Karoline (produced 1932). 1932; edited by Traugott Krischke, 1973; as Kasimir and Karoline, translated by Violet B. Ketes, in Four Plays, 1986.

Glaube, Liebe, Hoffnung (as Liebe, Pflicht und Hoffnung, produced 1936). 1932; edited by Traugott Krischke, 1973; also edited by Ian Huish, 1986; as Faith, Hope and Charity, translated by Paul Foster and Richard Dixon, in Four Plays, 1986; also translated by Christopher Hampton, 1989.

Die Unbekannte aus der Seine (produced 1949). 1933.

Hin und Her (produced 1934). In Gesammelte Werke, 1970.

Mit dem Kopf durch die Wand (produced 1935). 1935.

Figaro lässt sich scheiden (produced 1937). 1959; as Figaro Gets a Divorce, translated by Roger Downey, in Four Plays, 1986; as Figaro Gets Divorced, translated by Ian Huish, in Two Plays, 1991.

Der jüngste Tag (produced 1937). 1955; edited by Ian Huish, 1985; as Judgement Day, translated by Martin and Renate Esslin, in Four Plays, 1986.

Ein Dorf ohne Männer, from a novel by Koloman van Mikszáth (produced 1937). In Gesammelte Werke, 1970.

Himmelwärts (produced 1950). In Gesammelte Werke, 1970.

Don Juan kommt aus dem Krieg (produced 1952). In Stücke, 1961; as Don Juan Comes Back from the War, translated by Christopher Hampton, 1978.

Pompeji (produced 1959). In Stücke, 1961.

Four Plays (includes Kasimir and Karoline; Faith, Hope and Charity; Figaro Gets a Divorce; Judgement Day). 1986.

Two Plays (includes Don Juan Comes Back from the War and Figaro Gets Divorced), translated by Ian Huish and Christopher Hampton. 1991.

Fiction

Der ewige Spiesser. 1930.

Ein Kind unserer Zeit; Jugend ohne Gott. 2 vols., 1938; as Zeitalter der Fische, 1953; as A Child of Our Time, translated by R. Wills Thomas, 1938; as The Age of the Fish, 1939.

*

Critical Studies: Materialien zu Horváth edited by Traugott Krischke, 1970, and Horváth: Ein Lesebuch by Krischke, 1978; Über Horváth (includes bibliography) edited by Dieter Hildebrandt and Traugott Krischke, 1972; Symposium on Horváth published by Austrian Institute, London, 1977; Horváth Studies: Close Readings of Six Plays by Krishna Winston, 1977; A Student's Guide to Horváth by Ian Huish, 1980, and Ödön von Horváth Fifty Years On edited by Huish and Alan Bance, 1988; Prostitution in the Works of Ödön von Horváth by Belinda Horton Carstens, 1982; The Reformation of Comedy: Genre Critique in the Comedies of Ödön von Horváth by Christopher B. Balme, 1985; Ödön von Horváth by Kurt Bartsch, 2000.

* * *

Ödön von Horváth, the most representative dramatist of the Weimar Republic, saw himself as “a faithful chronicler” of his times. His uncompromising veracity and oppositional stance to the politics of nascent Nazism (who burnt his books) compelled him to emigrate in 1933 and left him without a stage to write for. His plays portray, as he once laconically observed, the “gigantic struggle between the individual and society, that eternal slaughter in which there is to be no peace” (Randbemerkung, marginal comment). While he saw contemporary political and social life in dramatic terms, he had a sharp eye for the tell-tale or typical detail. His dramatic technique tended not towards the drastic, but to subtler stage effects: moments of critical illumination and finely moderated accents. His characters are conceived as representative “creatures of an ailing age,” smug mediocracies in the main, trapped in the confines of a petty-bourgeois prejudice and conformity. His vision of humanity remained soberly critical and unheroic.

His plays are divided between the genres of comedy, dialect theatre, and period drama yet they anticipate the theatre of the absurd in their mixture of the comic, the tragic, and the gruesome. Though he adopted the naive, established conventions of Austrian popular theatre in a conscious attempt to revitalize that tradition, his plays are ironic-realistic portrayals of the contemporary historical scene, set in the years 1925–37 against a background of inflation, unemployment, political extremism, and the rise of fascism. The chosen social milieu is almost exclusively that of the lower-middle class in Vienna and Munich whose typical lifestyle, ideology, and speech habits are sharply set in focus.

The critical irony which pervades Horváth’s plays stems largely from his subtle handling of dialogue. Horváth’s language exploits the latent contradictions between overt and covert meanings, the intentional and unintentional in speech. Language betrays and exposes its inept user. The frequent points of conflict which arise within his dialogues are usually marked by the stage direction: “silence.” These momentary pauses which punctuate speech have the effect of a searching concentration on language and consciousness, yet always with reference to the unspoken. The use of unreflective speech, the pretentious jargon and clichés of the semi-educated, as the principal key both to individual psychology and to the consciousness of a class, is a dramatic device which Horváth developed and perfected. His attempted “synthesis between irony and realism,” in his own words, produces a form of theatre which combines life-like representation with critical distancing. Though a kind of “alienation,” in theatrical terms, is achieved by subversive and ironic use of dialect and stereotyped language, what distinguishes Horváth from Brecht is the avoidance of dialectical debate and of didacticism.

In Horváth not action but the word is the principal carrier of drama, and he insisted on a stylized manner of performance. Dialogue is used with a fine sense of its force, ambiguities, and psychological implications. “Demaskierung des Bewusstseins” (the unmasking of consciousness) is Horváth’s phrase for his technique of allowing characters involuntarily to reveal their inner natures, intentions, and thoughts, through the words they use. The conflict between appearance and reality, pretence and truth is thus dramatically enacted. The social dimension is at the same time manifested, since the conventions of language used by the classes portrayed are equally subject to critical scrutiny. The menacing political reality behind an apparently harmless facade is best exemplified in Geschichten aus dem Wienerwald (Tales from the Vienna Woods), which presents a suspect image of “the old honest true golden Viennese heart” compounded of sentimentalism, kitsch, and brutality. This richly diverse mirror of the times shows the playwright at the pinnacle of his achievement. A number of other plays (Glaube, Liebe, Hoffnung [Faith, Hope, and Charity]; Kasimir und Karoline; Die Unbekannte aus der Seine [The Unknown Girl from the Seine]; Hin und Her [Back and Forth]) portray the cold indifference of a bureaucratized society which exploits and ultimately destroys the individual. Yet tragic intensity is always held in check by a dramatist who chooses to explore the darker side of existence within the sordidness, pettiness, and banalities of life. His influence on the leading playwrights of the post-war years (Handke, Kroetz, Bauer, Turrini) has been fundamental.

Deprived of a stage for his plays, the exiled Horváth latterly turned to prose and wrote three short novels (Der ewige Spiesser, Ein Kind unserer Zeit [A Child of Our Time], Jugend ohne Gott). These depict the stark realities of the day in a sparse, economic style derivative of “Neue Sachlichkeit” (the New Objectivity). Thomas Mann judged Jugend ohne Gott, a compelling study of the cold amorality of the Hitler Youth movement, to be one of the most important novels of that generation.

—Alexander Stillmark

See the essay on Tales from the Vienna Woods.

HUANG Chunming

Also known as Hwang Chun-ming, Hwang Ch'un-ming, Huang Ch'un-ming. Pseudonym: Qiu Wenqi. Born: Luodong township, Yilan county, 13 February 1935; oldest of five children; mother died when he was eight years old; had a strained relationship with his stepmother; ran away from home. Education: Had a reputation as a rambunctious student; after studying at Taipei Normal and Tainan Normal Colleges, eventually graduated from Pingdong Normal College, the southernmost in Taiwan, in 1958. Military Service: Served in R.O.C. military from 1961 to 1963. Family: Married Lin Meizhu, 1 June 1966, two sons. Career: Employed in a wide variety of occupations, including grammar school teacher, 1958–61, broadcaster for China Broadcasting Radio Network, 1963–65, in sales at Adidas, 1978–84, and several advertising firms, among other sundry positions; produced several documentary films; wrote television and film scripts, and children's literature and plays, many of which he directed to the stage. Produced many collage and multi-media art works. Lives in Taipei, Taiwan. Awards: Taiwan Literature prize (for The Man and the Dagger), 1967; Wu Sanlian prize for Literature, 1980; National Endowment for Culture and Art (Taiwan) Literary prize, 1998; China Times Literary prize (for Set Free), 2000.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Erzide Da Wan'ou. 1969.
Shayuenala, Zaijian. 1974.
Luo. 1974.
Xiao Guafu. 1975.
Collected Fiction of Huang Chunming. 3 vols. 1985.
Dengdai Yiduo huade mingzi. 1989.
Huang Chunming's Children's Stories. 5 vols. 1993.
Fangsheng. 1999.

Fiction

“Qingdaofude haizi.” 1956.
 “Chengzai luoche.” 1962.
 “Kanhaide rizi.” 1967; as “A Flower in the Rainy Night,” translated by Earl Weiman, 1967.
 “Nisi yizhi laomao.” 1967; as “The Drowning of an Old Cat,” translated by Howard Goldblatt, 1980 and 2001.

“Qingfangongde gushi.” 1967; as “The Story of Grandfather Ch'ing Fan,” translated by Stephen Field, 1981.
 “Ahban yu jingcha.” 1968; as “Ah-Ban and the Cop,” translated by Howard Goldblatt, 1981.
 “Erzide da wan'ou.” 1968; as “His Son's Big Doll,” translated by Howard Goldblatt, 1980 and 2001.
 “Xian.” 1968; as “Ringworms,” translated by Howard Goldblatt, 1980 and 2001.
 “Yu.” 1968; as “The Fish,” translated by Howard Goldblatt, 1980 and 2001.
 “Luo.” 1969; as “The Gong,” translated by Howard Goldblatt, 1980 and 2001.
 “Liangge youqijiang.” 1971; as “The Two Signpainters,” translated by Howard Goldblatt, 1980 and 2001.
 “Pingguode ziwei.” 1972; as “The Taste of Apples,” translated by Howard Goldblatt, 2001.
 “Shayuenala, zaijian.” 1973; as “Sayonara, Goodbye,” translated by Howard Goldblatt, 1980 and 2001.
 “Xiaoqide na yi ding maozi.” 1974; as “Xiaoqi's Hat,” translated by Howard Goldblatt, 2001.
 “Xiao guafu.” 1975; as “Young Widow,” translated by Rosemary Haddon, 1996.
 “Wo ai mali.” 1977; as “I Love Mary,” translated by Howard Goldblatt, 1983.
 “Da bing.” 1983; as “A Big Cake,” translated by Shu-fang Lai, 1998.
 “Fangsheng.” 1987; as “Set Free,” translated by Howard Goldblatt, 2001.
 “Shoupiao kou.” 1999; as “The Ticket Booth,” translated by Carlos Tee, 2000.

Essays

“Wangshi zhineng huiwei.” 1974; as “We Can't Bring Back the Past,” translated by David Pollard, 2000.
 “Dengdai yiduo huade mingzi.” 1987; as “Waiting for the Name of a Flower,” translated by David Pollard, 2000.
 “Yongjiao du dili.” 1999; as “Using One's Own Two Feet to Study Geography,” translated by Jonathan Barnard, 2000.

*

Critical Studies: “The Rural Stories of Hwang Chun-ming” by Howard Goldblatt, 1980; “Images of Suffering in Taiwan Fiction” by Cyril Birch, 1980; “Echoes of the May Fourth movement in Taiwan Hsiang-t'u Fiction” by Joseph S. M. Lau, 1983; Huang Chunming qianzhuan, by Liu Chuncheng, 1987; Modern Chinese Literature and the Nativist Resistance, by Yvonne Chang, 1991; “Taiwanese Nativism and the Colonial/Post-Colonial Discourse” by Rosemary Haddon, 1996.

* * *

The 1960s in Taiwan was a period of great flourishing in the realm of literature, and the young Huang Chunming was a central figure in it. Though largely understood as an era involving first a Modernist movement that stressed literary technique over anti-Communist ideology followed by a “Nativist resistance” comprised mainly of “native” Taiwanese who reacted against the less politically-engaged and more urban-focused Modernists, in fact Huang and most of his fellow Nativists actually began writing and publishing only slightly later than the Modernists. Moreover, though more locally concerned and rurally focused, his stories exhibit considerable polish and attention to the craft of fiction. Huang, still an active and prolific writer, will be remembered as a teller of the simple person's tale, offering endearing portraits that seek insight into the consciousness of those whom mainstream society tends to view as silent objects of our perception rather than as perceiving subjects themselves. These characters include, for example, prostitutes, menial office assistants, gong drummers (the equivalent of the town crier), men saddling sandwich board advertisements, sign painters fresh from the countryside, pre-adolescent apprentices, elderly rural folk, and others of the impoverished, downtrodden class. In spite of this fascination with the marginal, his depictions are never bathetic. He brings these characters to life with an "insider's" touch, balancing humor and empathy, adding Taiwanese local language and folk mannerisms to the dialogue, establishing himself as one of the genuine working class writers of modern Chinese literature.

After writing some juvenilia in the late 1950s, Huang gained the attention of Lin Haiyin, literary editor of the influential United Daily News, who began publishing his works in 1962. A few years later, he began submitting to a new coterie journal known as Literary Quarterly, edited by Yao Yiwei and Yu Tiancong, that promoted several native Taiwanese writers such as Chen Yingzhen, Wang Zhenhe, Wang Tuo, and Yang Qingchu. One of Huang's early "classics," "Kanhaide rizi" [Sea Gazing Days] (translated as "A Flower in the Rainy Night"), was first published in Literary Quarterly. The story features a prostitute named Baimei who is seeking a new path for her life. The avenue through which deliverance from prostitution is afforded to her is pregnancy and the birth of a son, thereby indicating an ambivalent attitude toward patriarchal society. The richly woven plot of this work established Huang's reputation as a gifted storyteller, one who could lead the reader deeply into the lives of his characters with little strain, employing an innate talent seldom matched in contemporary literature. Though the story can legitimately be read as an exposé on the social abuse of women trapped in the underclass, its artistry is never overshadowed by critique.

Baimei returns to her native village to give birth to her child and becomes a sort of auspicious omen, improving the lot of her family and neighbors as they struggle with physical challenges, land rights, and the price their crops will garner at the market. Other stories written near the same time that underscore the special relationship of the people with the land include "Yu" ("The Fish"), which depicts a young boy pedaling home on furlough as a carpenter's apprentice to present a fresh fish to his grandfather, only to have it lost in an accident along the way. The grandfather eventually beats the boy, not for failing to deliver but for the scene all the stress has caused, and the reader is left to ponder how the exploitation of innocents in the countryside has led to the perversion of their once natural and positive relationships. A story that probes the psyche of the marginal, telling it from their perspective, is "Erzide da wan'ou" ("His Son's Big Doll"). The drama of this work hinges on the extent to which one becomes an inseparable part of the labor that enslaves yet ensures one's continued existence. For his job, the protagonist Kunshu must shoulder a sandwich board advertisement and walk in the heat all day, his face caked with grease paint. The mask becomes the man by the end of the story, as his anticipated "liberation" from the makeup used in his job is removed to reveal his own face; however, his son does not recognize the "true" him and begins to cry in fear and rejection. This story and others were made into films that began the careers of illustrious Taiwan directors such as Hou Xiaoxian and Yang Dechang.

While there always has been some degree of social commentary in Huang's fiction, this quality becomes more pronounced in his works of the 1970s after a series of diplomatic humiliations for Taiwan at the hands of the United States and Japan. Stories such as "Shayuenala, zaijian" ("Sayonara, Goodbye"), in which the protagonist is forced into being a pimp for a Japanese sex tour, "Wo ai mali" ("I Love Mary"), in which a Taiwanese office executive inherits the dog of his former American boss, which then proceeds to dominate his life and ruin his marriage, and, in particular, "Xiao guafu" ("Young Widow"), in which a prostitute bar is established for U.S. soldiers on leave from the Vietnam conflict, all exemplify this turn toward political satire. Yet even in "Young Widow," Huang cannot resist etching each character with a sympathetic brush stroke, as the G.I.'s lives are shown in loneliness and despair, mere emissaries of destruction in the geopolitical chess game of the Cold War.

Besides Huang's political acerbity during this stage and his affectionately wrought characterization of subsistence level country folk in the earlier period, there also exists an impish aspect to his style. Huang is given to embellishing otherwise grave situations with a degree of levity. "Luo" ("The Gong"), for example, is a richly textured narrative of a laid off gong drummer called Kam Kim-ah, a buffoonish fellow who has lost his calling and now must eke out a living with fellow ne'er-do-wells. His antics include "summoning" a corpse to help a casket maker's business and being falsely implicated in the pregnancy of a woman of limited mental faculties. In the end, however, Kam is rendered with comedic tenderness as he squanders his one last chance to regain his former job. A vestige of a bygone era, Kam Kim-ah embodies the common peoples' dilemma in the face of modernity.

The impish dimension is even more discernible in his essays. While best known for his fiction, Huang has authored several beloved works of prose that relate humorous anecdotes of idyllic life. Many of them, like "Waiting for the Name of a Flower," are lighthearted yet somewhat crude occasional pieces with a disarming earthiness that abjures high culture and effete sensibility. Also well known as a writer of children's literature, Huang has invested much time in the nurturing of the younger generation.

More recently, Huang has returned to some of the gentler tones of his youthful stories and to the bucolic setting as well. These stories nevertheless retain an element of critique. "Fangsheng" ("Set Free"), for example, tells a parallel story: first, of how the elderly Zhang Awei saves an egret from the contamination of a nearby factory conjuring in turn the memory of an egret his son Wentong once raised as a boy; second, of Wentong's imprisonment for striking someone presumably on the payroll of the polluting factories. In an adroit interlacing, Huang unites the two strands when the healing egret is set free while Wentong clandestinely observes from a distance, himself just released from prison. The story is one of effortless beauty and poignancy, the work of a master storyteller whose underlying message never disrupts the flow of the narrative nor undermines the reader's ability to gain an affection for the characters. It is precisely this ability to forge together the various tendencies—formal skill with an engaged spirit, sympathetic portrayal with an impish humor—that has assured Huang a place in the annals of fine literature.

—Christopher Lupke

HUGO, Victor (Marie)

Born: Besançon, France, 26 February 1802. Education: Educated at Cordier and Decotte's school, Paris, 1814–18. Family: Married Adèle Foucher in 1822 (died 1868); three sons and two daughters; lived with Juliette Drouet from 1868 (she had been his mistress from 1833; died 1883). Career: Editor, with his two brothers, Le Conservateur littéraire, 1819–21; involved in politics: founded newspaper L'Événement (later L'Événement du Peuple), 1848; elected to assembly, 1849, but exiled in 1851, first in Brussels, then in Jersey and Guernsey to 1870, and intermittently after that; visited France, 1870–71; deputy at Bordeaux Assembly, 1871; defeated in 1872 election because of his tolerance of Communards; elected to Senate, 1876. Awards: Chevalier, Légion d'honneur, 1825; ennobled as Vicomte Hugo, 1845. Member: Académie française, 1841. Died: 22 May 1885.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Works, translated by Frederick L. Slous and Camilla Crosland. 5 vols., 1887.

Dramas, translated by Frederick L. Slous and Camilla Crosland. 1887.

Works, translated by Alfred Barbou. 30 vols., 1892.

Dramas, translated by I.G. Burnham. 10 vols., 1895–96.

Works, edited by Henry Llewellyn Williams. 20 vols., 1907.

Romans, edited by Henri Guillemin. 3 vols., 1963.

Théâtre complet, edited by Roland Purnal. 2 vols., 1963–64.

Oeuvres poétiques, edited by Pierre Albouy. 3 vols., 1964–74.

Oeuvres complètes, edited by Jean Massin. 18 vols., 1967–70.

Poésies, edited by Bernard Leuilliot. 3 vols., 1972.

Fiction

Han d'Islande. 1823; as Hans of Iceland, translated anonymously, 1825; also translated by A. Langdon Alger, 1891; John Chesterfield, 1894; Huntington Smith, 1896; as Hans of Iceland; or, The Demon of the North, translated by J.T. Hudson, 1843; as The Demon Dwarf, 1847; as The Outlaw of Iceland, translated by Gilbert Campbell, 1885.

Bug-Jargal. 1826; as The Slave King, translated anonymously, 1833; as Bug-Jargal, translated anonymously, 1844; also translated by "Eugenia de B," 1894; Arabella Ward, 1896; as The Noble Rival, 1845; as Jargal, translated by Charles E. Wilbour, 1866; as Told Under Canvas, translated by Gilbert Campbell, 1886.

Le Dernier Jour d'un condamné. 1829; as The Last Day of a Condemned Man, translated by P. Hesketh Fleetwood, 1840; also translated by Arabella Ward, 1896; and Metcalfe Wood, 1931; as Under Sentence of Death; or, A Criminal's Last Hours, translated by Gilbert Campbell, 1886; as The Last Day of a Condemned, translated by G.W.M. Reynolds, 1840; also translated by "Eugenia de B," 1894; and Lascelles Wraxall, 1909; as The Last Day of a Condemned Man, edited and translated by Geoff Woollen, in The Last Day of a Condemned Man and Other Prison Writings, 1992. Notre-Dame de Paris. 1831; edited by Jacques Seebacher and Yves Gohin, 1975; as Notre Dame de Paris, translated by A. Langdon

Alger, 1832(?); also translated by Isabel F. Hapgood, 1888; Jessie Haynes, 1902; M. Dupres, 1949; as The Hunchback of Notre-Dame, translated by Frederic Shoberl, 1833; also translated by Henry Llewellyn Williams, 1862; Lowell Bair, 1982; as La Esmeralda, 1844; as Notre Dame of Paris, translated by J. Carroll Beckwith, 1892; also translated by John Sturrock, 1978; translated by Walter J. Cobb, 2001; translated by Catherine Liu, 2002.

Claude Gueux. 1834; as Claude Gueux, translated by Gilbert Campbell, 1886; also translated by "Eugenia de B," 1894; Arabella Ward, 1896; edited and translated by Geoff Woollen, in The Last Day of a Condemned Man and Other Prison Writings, 1992.

Les Misérables. 1862; edited by Marcus Clapham and Clive Reynard, 1992; as Les Misérables, translated by Charles E. Wilbour, 1862; also translated by Lascelles Wraxall, 1862; Isabel F. Hapgood, 1887; William Walton and others, 1892–93; Norman Denny, 1976.

Les Travailleurs de la mer. 1866; edited by Jacques Seebacher and Yves Gohin, 1975; as The Toilers of the Sea, translated by W. Moy Thomas, 1860; also translated by Isabel F. Hapgood, 1888; Mary W. Artois, 1892; as The Workers of the Sea, translated by Gilbert Campbell, 1887.

L'Homme qui rit. 1869; as The Man Who Laughs, translated by William Young, 1869; also translated by Isabel F. Hapgood, 1888; as By Order of the King, translated by Mrs. A.C. Steele, 3 vols., 1870; also translated by Hapgood, 1888; as The Laughing Man, 1887; also translated by Bellina Phillips, 1894.

Quatre-Vingt-Treize. 1874; as Ninety-Three, translated by Frank Lee Benedict and J. Hain Friswell, 1874; Gilbert Campbell, 1886; Aline Delano, 1888; Helen B. Dole, 1888; Jules Gray, 1894; Lowell Bair, 1962; as '93, translated by E.B. d'Espinville Picot, 1874.

The Last Day of a Condemned Man and Other Prison Writings (includes Claude Gueux; My Visit to the Concierge; The Condemned Cells at La Roquette), edited and translated by Geoff Woollen. 1992.

Conversations with Eternity: The Forgotten Masterpiece of Victor Hugo, translated by John Chambers. 1998.

Plays

Amy Robsart, from Kenilworth by Scott (produced 1827); as Amy Robsart, translated by I.G. Burnham, 1896; also translated with Angelo and The Twin Brothers, 1901; and by Ethel T. and Evelyn Blair, 1933.

Cromwell (produced 1956). 1827; edited by Annie Ubersfeld, 1968; as Oliver Cromwell (vols. 1–2), translated by I.G. Burnham, 1896.

Marion Delorme (produced 1831). 1829; as The King's Edict, translated and adapted by B. Fairclough, 1872; as Marion de Lorme, translated by I.G. Burnham, 1895; as Red Robe and Grey Robe; or, Richelieu Defied, translated by Henry Llewellyn Williams, 1901.

Hernani (produced 1830). 1830; as Hernani, translated by Lord Gower, 1830; also translated by Camilla Crosland, 1887; I.G. Burnham, 1895; R. Farquharson Sharp, 1898.

Le Roi s'amuse (produced 1832). 1832; as The King's Fool, translated by H.T. Haley, 1842; as Le Roi s'amuse, translated by Frederick L. Slous, 1843; also translated by I.G. Burnham, 1895; as The King's Diversion, translated by Frederick L. Slous and Camilla Crosland,

- 1887; as His Kingly Pleasure, translated by Edward John Harding, 1902; as The King Enjoys Himself, translated by T.M.R. von Keler, 1925; as The Prince's Play by Tony Harrison, 1996.
- Lucrèce Borgia* (produced 1833). 1833; as Lucretia Borgia, translated by W.T. Haley, 1842; as Lucrezia Borgia, translated and adapted by W. Young, 1847; also translated by I.G. Burnham, 1896.
- Marie Tudor* (produced 1833). 1833; as Mary Tudor, translated by I.G. Burnham, 1896.
- Angelo, Tyran de Padoue* (produced 1835). 1835; as Angelo, translated and adapted by Charles Reade, 1851; also translated by Ernest O. Coe, 1880; translated with Amy Robsart and The Twin Brothers, 1901; as Angelo; or, The Tyrant of Padua, 1855; as Angelo and the Actress of Padua, translated by G.H. Davidson, 1855; as Angelo; or, The Actress of Padua, translated by G. A'Beckett, 1857; as Angelo, Tyrant of Padua, translated by I.G. Burnham, 1896; also translated by Charles Alfred Byrne (bilingual edition), 1905.
- La Esmeralda*, music by Louise Bertin, from Notre-Dame de Paris by Hugo (produced 1836). 1836; as Esmeralda, translated by I.G. Burnham, 1895.
- Ruy Blas* (produced 1838). 1838; edited by Annie Ubersfeld, 2 vols., 1971–72; as Ruy Blas, translated and adapted by Charles Webb, 1860; also translated by Camilla Crosland, 1887; I.G. Burnham, 1895; Brian Hooker, 1931; adapted by Charles Fechter, 1870.
- Les Burgraves* (produced 1843). 1843; as The Burgraves, translated by I.G. Burnham, 1896.
- Torquemada*. 1882; edited by John J. Jance, 1989; as Torquemada, translated by I.G. Burnham, 1896.
- Théâtre en liberté* (short plays). 1886.
- La Grand'mère* (produced 1898). In Théâtre en liberté, 1886.
- Mangeront-ils?* (produced 1907). In Théâtre en liberté, 1886.
- Théâtre de jeunesse*. 1934.
- Mille francs de récompense* (produced 1961). In Théâtre de jeunesse, 1934.
- Les Jumeaux*. In Théâtre complet, 1964; as The Twins, translated by I.G. Burnham, 1896; as The Twin Brothers, with Angelo and Amy Robsart, 1901.
- Verse
- Odes et poésies diverses*. 1822.
- Nouvelles odes*. 1824.
- Odes et ballades*. 1826; edited by Pierre Albouy, 1980.
- Les Orientales*. 1829; edited by Pierre Albouy, 1981.
- Les Feuilles d'automne*. 1831; edited by Pierre Albouy, 1981.
- Les Chants du crépuscule*. 1835; as Songs of Twilight, translated by George W.M. Reynolds, 1836.
- Les Voix intérieures*. 1837.
- Les Rayons et les ombres*. 1840.
- Le Rhin*. 1842; as The Rhine, translated by D.M. Aird, 1843; as Excursions Along the Banks of the Rhine, 1843; as Sketches and Legends of the Rhine, 1845; as The Story of the Bold Pécopin, translated by Eleanor and Augustine Birrell, 1902.
- Les Châtiments*. 1853; edited by P.J. Yarrow, 1975; and René Journet, 1977.
- Les Contemplations*. 1856; edited by Pierre Albouy, 1973.
- La Légende des siècles*. 3 vols., 1859–83; edited by André Dumas, 1974; as The Legend of the Centuries, translated by George S. Burleigh, 1867.
- Les Chansons des rues et des bois*. 1865.
- L'Année terrible*. 1872.
- L'Art d'être grand-père*. 1877.
- Le Pape*. 1878.
- La Pitié suprême*. 1879.
- Religions et religion*. 1880.
- L'Âne*. 1880; edited by Pierre Albouy, 1966.
- Les Quatre vents de l'esprit*. 1881.
- The Literary Life and Poetical Works*, edited by Henry Llewellyn Williams. 1883.
- Translations from the Poems*, translated by Henry Carrington. 1885.
- La Fin de Satan*. 1886.
- Poems*. 1888.
- Toute la lyre*. 2 vols., 1888–93.
- Dieu*. 1891; edited by René Journet and Guy Robert, 3 vols., 1969.
- Poems*, translated by George Young. 1901.
- Selected Poems*, edited by Alfred T. Baker. 1929.
- The Distance, The Shadows: Selected Poems*, translated by Harry Guest. 1981.
- Selected Poems of Victor Hugo: A Bilingual Edition*, translated by E. H. and A. M. Blackmore. 2001.
- Other
- Littérature et philosophie mêlées*. 1834; edited by Anthony R.W. James, 1976.
- Lettres sur le Rhin*. 1846.
- Congrès de la paix* (International Peace Congress address). 1849; as The United States of Europe, 1914.
- Napoléon le Petit*. 1852; as Napoleon the Little, 1852; also translated by George Burnham Ives, 1909; as The Destroyer of the Second Republic, translated by "A Clergyman," 1870.
- John Brown*, translated as Letter on John Brown, in Echoes of Harper's Ferry, edited by James Redpath. 1860; also translated by Lionel Strachey, 1902.
- Dessins de Hugo* (art criticism). 1862; edited by J. Sergent, 1955.
- L'Archipel de la Manche*. 1863; as The Channel Islands, translated by Isabel Hapgood, in The Toilers of the Sea, 1961; also translated by John W. Watson (bilingual edition), 1985.
- Hugo raconté par un témoin de sa vie*. 1863.
- William Shakespeare*. 1864; as William Shakespeare, translated by A. Baillot, 1864; also translated by Meville B. Anderson, 1886.
- Actes et paroles*. 3 vols., 1875–76.
- Histoire d'un crime; Déposition d'un témoin*. 2 vols., 1877–78; as History of a Crime; Testimony of an Eyewitness, translated by T.H. Joyce and Arthur Locker, 4 vols., 1877–78; Gilbert Campbell, 1888; Huntington Smith, 1888.
- Le Discours pour Voltaire*. 1878; as Oration on Voltaire, translated by James Parton, 1883.
- Works*. 8 vols., 1883, revised as 12 vols., 1887.
- Selections, Chiefly Lyrical*, edited by Henry Llewellyn Williams. 1883.
- Choses vues*. 2 vols., 1887–1900; edited by Hubert Juin, 4 vols., 1972; translated in part as Things Seen, 2 vols., 1887; revised edition, edited by David Kimber, 1964.
- Alpes et Pyrénées*. 1890; as The Alps and Pyrenees, translated by John Manson, 1898.

Selected Poems and Tragedies, translated by Gilbert Campbell and others. 1890.
France et Belgique. 1892; edited by Claude Gély, 1974.
Letters to His Wife and Others, translated by Nathan H. Dole. 1895.
Les Années funestes. 1896.
Letters, translated by F. Clarke. 1896.
Letters to His Family, to Sainte-Beuve and Others, edited by Paul Meurice. 1896.
Correspondance [1815–82]. 2 vols., 1896–98.
Letters from Exile and After the Fall of the Empire, edited by Paul Meurice. 1898.
Mémoires. 1899; as Memoirs, translated by John W. Harding, 1899.
Post-scriptum de ma vie. 1901; edited by Henri Guillemin, 1961; as Hugo's Intellectual Autobiography, translated by Lorenzo O'ourke, 1907.
Love Letters 1820–22, translated by Elizabeth W. Latimer. 1901.
Dernière gerbe. 1902.
Correspondance, with Paul Meurice. 1909.
Correspondance, with Michelet. 1924.
Océan, tas de Pierres. 1942.
Correspondance [1814–85]. 4 vols., 1947–52.
Pierres: Vers et prose, edited by Henri Guillemin. 1951.
Carnets intimes, edited by Henri Guillemin. 1953.
Journal 1830–1848, edited by Henri Guillemin. 1954.
Hugo dessinateur, edited by Roger Cornaille and Georges Herscher. 1963.
Lettres à Juliette Drouet 1833–1883, edited by Jean Gaudon. 1964.
Correspondance, with Pierre-Jules Hetzel, edited by Sheila Gaudon. 1979–.

*

Bibliography: Victor Hugo's Drama: An Annotated Bibliography 1900–1980 by Ruth Lestha Doyle, 1981.

Critical Studies: The Career of Hugo, 1945, and The Perilous Quest: Image, Myth, and Prophecy in the Narratives of Hugo, 1968, both by Elliott M. Grant; Hugo, 1956, and Hugo and His World, 1966, both by André Maurois; Notes on Hugo's "Les Misérables" by George Klin and Amy Marsland, 1968; A Stage for Poets: Studies in the Theatre of Hugo and Musset by Charles Affron, 1971; Hugo by John Porter Houston, 1974, revised edition, 1989; Victor Hugo: A Biography by Samuel Edwards, 1975; The Medievalism of Victor Hugo by Patricia A. Ward, 1975; Victor Hugo by Joanna Richardson, 1976; "Les Contemplations" of Hugo: An Allegory of the Creative Process by Suzanne Nash, 1977; Victor Hugo: Philosophy and Poetry by Henri Peyre, 1980; Hugo, Hernani and Ruy Blas by Keith Wren, 1982; Victor Hugo and the Visionary Novel by Victor Brombert, 1984; Hugo: "Les Contemplations" by Peter Cogman, 1984; Victor Hugo by Gregory Stevens Cox, 1985; The Power of Rhetoric: Hugo's Metaphor and poetics by Wendy Nicholas Greenberg, 1985; Victor Hugo in Jersey by Phil Stevens, 1985; The Early Novels of Victor Hugo by Kathryn M. Grossman, 1986; "Les Contemplations" of Victor Hugo: The Ash Wednesday Liturgy by John A. Frey, 1988; Figuring Transcendence in "Les Misérables": Hugo's Romantic Sublime by Kathryn M. Grossman, 1994; Victor Hugo: "Notre-Dame de Paris" by Rachel Killick, 1994; To Kill a Text: The Dialogic Fiction of Hugo, Dickens, and Zola by Ilinca Zarifopol-Johnston, 1995; Les Misérables: Conversion, Revolution, Redemption by Kathryn M. Grossman, 1996; Victor Hugo: A Companion to His Poetry by J.C. Ireson, 1997; Victor Hugo by Graham Robb, 1997; Victor Hugo and the Romantic Drama by Albert W. Halsall, 1998; A Victor Hugo Encyclopedia by John Andrew Frey, 1999; Victor Hugo by Laurence M. Porter, 1999.

* * *

When Gide was asked to name France's greatest poet, his reply was "Victor Hugo, hélas!," a response expressing Hugo's undeniable stature and a concomitant embarrassment on the part of a mature Frenchman in acknowledging such a fact. Hugo spanned the 19th century, and dealt in his works with all the major issues central to individuals, society, literature, politics and religion through this period of violent and frequent change. Along with the published novels, plays, poems, and essays go more volumes of fragments, ideas, images, word-associations, rhymes, all scribbled on whatever piece of paper was at hand. His output is monumental, indeed he himself referred to it as a single edifice in which individual works were merely stones. Given such a proliferation it is perhaps natural that among the marks of genius there should also be much that is trite, oversimplified, and self-indulgent.

The main explanation for this apparent paradox is that Hugo was a great primitive, who approached his subjects with intensity, simplicity, and an unshakeable confidence in the validity of his own vision. All his writings were informed by the belief that creation was a composite of forces of good and evil and this dualism provides both the structural security of his works, which deal invariably with conflicting opposites, and the richness of an imagery whose prism translates everything into a battle between light and darkness. His attempts thus to categorize and render accessible the mysterious absolutes that are the dynamics of existence take account also of another omnipresent sensation, that of vertigo. It is the feeling, absorbed during childhood and adolescence from the traumas of Imperial and Restoration society and shared by an entire generation, that the fragile hold on faith, reason, or any human construct may dissolve and leave only "le gouffre." It is not a distortion to describe the fundamental Hugolian experience as a play of day and night on the edge of an abyss.

His philosophy, intuited early and evolved and refined through the middle years, placed man at the centre of an axis stretching between God and earth. Once again the condition is that of antithesis which seeks synthesis. Matter is evil, its very weight and substance separating it from spirit, and therefore God. Original sin is literally a fall and only by a progressively greater awareness of and recourse to things of the spirit may the prison of matter be breached and the soul released up to its source. More than any other writer Hugo was aware of his Messianic role in such a context. With sometimes disarming and sometimes infuriating conceit he places himself above his fellow-mortals to act as a visionary, a gifted intermediary between God and his creatures. Writing was the manipulation of material things to reveal spiritual truths, an interface between concrete and abstract, and Hugo recognized the importance of the fact that "In the beginning was the word . . ." Words to him were simultaneously "things" and "mysterious wanderers of the soul," the black and literal object on the page was the envelope of a spreading transcendent truth, and thus the ingredients and processes of artistic creativity mirrored those of Creation itself.

He began writing his poetry in a climate of dissatisfaction. Although his earliest works expressed conventional attitudes to Church and King and execrated Napoleon, the recognition that the ancien régime was stifling progress quickly began to break the moulds of poetry as well as those of belief. A collection of poems like Les Orientales demonstrates the true Romantic revolution of lyric poetry. The forms are new, the rhythms daring and mysterious, the subject-matter exotic, and Hugo's contemporaries acknowledged the fact that their literary generation had found its leader. He himself claimed later in life to have "dislocated" the alexandrine, liberated French versification, and revolutionized poetic vocabulary, a boast entirely validated by the collections of the 1820s and 1830s. The works are those of a man totally involved in the moods and movements of his times. Enforced exile, however, removed him from the literary barricades and allowed time for reflection, or more properly contemplation. In the Channel Islands, his own exile, the death of his daughter, his "crimes" and his sexuality are examined and, through the alchemy of the poetic process, transformed into a strong, single affirmation of divine purpose. Les Contemplations is a masterpiece, containing poems brilliant in themselves and yet also important as components within the deliberate architecture of an overall poetic narrative. The conviction at which he arrives in the making of this work provides the basis for the great epic collections of his middle and later years, the gigantic stories of myth, creation, history which continue his exploration of verse, image, and language through poetic registers more varied than those of any of the poets who had preceded him.

His pre-eminence extended to the world of the theatre. The preface to his play Cromwell became the manifesto of the French Romantics, not because its ideas were particularly new, but because the power of Hugo's rhetoric gave it coherence and force. Its main original contribution to the debate between Classical and Romantic adherents was the theory of the grotesque. This proposed not, as is sometimes mistakenly suggested, that emphasis should fall only on the ugly and misshapen, but that art should mix extremes of the beautiful and the grotesque in order to convey a more complete picture of the world than that which had been proposed by the Classical imitators with their ideals of beauty. His own plays adopted the morality of popular melodrama, and criticism of them has always been directed at their "unreality" and the fact that he created only stereotypes. Hugo himself, however, never claimed verisimilitude, and if the plays are experienced as dramatic poems, then character, like symbol and image, is seen to be a constituent part of an artistic whole which conveys its meanings through the totality of its impact rather than from the activities of some of its parts; when Hernani confronts Don Salluste it is not merely a young man facing an old one, it is the whole tangle of Ancien Régime, the Restoration's desire to perpetuate it and the frustrating and inexpressible need of the new generation to be liberated from both.

It is easy also to offer facile criticisms of his novels. Indeed the earliest are in themselves Gothic parodies, the hero of one making meals of human flesh washed down with seawater drunk from his son's skull. His linguistic facility, however, and the vast imagination of the visionary produced the great evocation of medieval Paris clutched around the cathedral in Notre-Dame de Paris (The Hunchback of Notre-Dame), the socio-political tapestry of Les Misérables which contains enough themes and sub-plots to fill several novels, and the mysticism of Les Travailleurs de la mer (The Toilers of the Sea) in which the central character defeats wind and waves, and Hugo reminds the reader that reality consists of more than just conscious imaginings. The prose is as sonorous as the poetry and in all the works the great unifying tendency of the visionary is the controlling factor.

Hugo's work is monolithic. In it the Romantics, the Symbolists, and even the Surrealists found examples of their own desired effects.

It is inhabited by monsters, Gods, and men, sprawling, digressing, and yet simultaneously rendering accessible the moods and movements of the human spirit in its own time and beyond.

—W.J.S. Kirton

See the essays on The Hunchback of Notre-Dame and Les Misérables.

HÜLSHOFF, Annette von Droste

See DROSTE-HÜLSHOFF, Annette von

HUYGENS, Constantijn

Born: The Hague, Dutch Republic (now The Netherlands), 4 September 1596. Education: Studied law at Leiden. Family: Married his niece Susanna van Baerle in 1627 (died 1637); five children, including the scientist Christiaan Huygens. Career: Travelled to Venice in 1619, and several times to England, once as secretary to a diplomatic mission, 1618, and again as secretary at the embassy, 1620; knighted by James I, 1622; secretary to successive Stadtholders, Frederik Henry, William II and III, from 1625. Associated with Descartes, Daniel Heinsius, Francis Bacon, Ben Jonson, and Pierre Corneille, q.v.. Designed his own country house at Hofwijk. Died: 28 March 1687.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

- De gedichten* [The Poems], edited by J.A. Worp. 9 vols., 1892–99.
De briefwisseling [Correspondence], edited by J.A. Worp. 6 vols., 1911–17.
A Selection of the Poems of Sir Constantijn Huygens (1596–1687): A Parallel Text, translated with introduction and appendices by Peter Davidson and Adriaan van der Weel, 1996.

Verse

- Misogamos*. 1620.
Batave Tempe dat is 't voorhout van 's Gravenhage [Batavian Temple, That Is the Voorhout in The Hague]. 1621, reprinted 1973.
Costetick mal [Costly Folly]. 1622, reprinted 1973.
De uytlandighe herder [The Exiled Shepherd]. 1622.
Zedeprinten [Characters]. 1623–24.
Dorpen en stedestemmen [Voices of Villages and Towns]. 1624; edited by C.W. de Kruyter, 1981.
Otia of ledighe uren [Idleness or Empty Hours]. 1625.
Momenta desultoria. 1644.
Eufrasia. Ooghentroost [Solace for the Sightless]. 1647, reprinted 1984.
Vitaalium. Hofwijck. Hofstede vanden Heere van Zuylichem onder Voorburgh [Hofwijck, Seat of Lord of Zuylichem]. 1653.
Korenbloemen [Cornflowers]. 1658.
Dagh-werck [Daily Work]. 1658; edited by F.L. Zwaan, 1973.

Triomfdichten ter eeren de doorluchte Huizen van Nassauw, Oranje en Anhalt [Triumphal Poem in Honour of the Illustrious Houses of Nassau, Orange, and Anhalt]. 1660.

De nieuwe zee-straat van 's Gravenhage op Scheveningen [The New Sea Promenade from The Hague to Scheveningen]. 1667.

Cluyswerck [Work in Seclusion]. 1681.

Dichten op de knie, 500 sneldichten [Rhyming on the Knee, 500 Quick Rhymes], edited by G.W. and W.G. Hellinga. 1956.

Dromen met open ogen [Dreaming with Eyes Open] (selection), edited by M.A. Schenkeveld van der Dussen, L. Strengholt, and P.E.L. Verkuy. 1984.

Sneldichten [Quick Rhymes], edited by H. Blijlevens, M. van Drunen, and P. Lavrijssen. 1988.

Plays

Trijntje Cornelis. 1653; edited by H.M. Hermkens, 1987.

Other

Ghebruyck of onghebruyck van 't orgel [Use and Misuse of the Organ]. 1641, reprinted 1974.

Heilighe daghen [Holy Days]. 1645, reprinted 1974; translated by Koos Daley, 2001.

De vita propria (autobiography, in Latin). 1678; as Mijn Jeugd [My Youth], translated (into Dutch) by C.L. Heesakkers, 1987.

Dagboek van Constantijn Huygens [Diary]. 1885.

Lettres du Seigneur de Zuylichem à Pierre Corneille. 1890.

Journal van zijne reis naar Venetië in 1620 (Travel Journal). 1894.

Correspondence of Descartes and Huygens, 1635–47 (in French), edited by Leon Roth. 1926.

*

Critical Studies: “Some Thankfulness to Constantine”: A Study of English Influence upon the Early Work of Constantine Huygens by Rosalie Littel Colie, 1956; Constantine Huygens and Britain by A.G.H. Bachrach, 1962; Driemaal Huygens, 1966 and De grootmeester van woord- en snaarspel. Het leven van Constantijn Huygens, 1980, both by J. Smit; Constantijn Huygens' Oogentroost: Een interpretatieve studie by C.W. de Kruyter, 1971; Dromen is denken: Constantijn Huygens over dromen en denken en dichten by L. Strengholt, 1977; Constantijn Huygens, mengeling by A. van Strien, 1990.

* * *

Cast in the Renaissance mould of the uomo universale, Constantijn Huygens, like his contemporary, Jacob Cats, was a Calvinist moralist. Unlike Cats, however, his bearing was aristocratic and his literary work erudite, even obscure. In his autobiographical poem Dagwerck [Daily Work], written between 1627 and 1638, he even added a note that true poetry should require elucidation, and he made his point by giving prose summaries of each stanza, concerning his daily life and his views on religion and poetry. It is significant that he described his poems as “cornflowers” along the path of his life, suggesting that they are all autobiographical and provide a welcome creative redress from his onerous business career.

His first long poem is an ode of 105 eight-line stanzas in the humanist tradition, Batave Tempe dat is 't voorhout van 's Gravenhage [Batavian Temple, That Is the Voorhout in The Hague]. The Voorhout was (and still is) a fine tree-lined avenue in the centre of a town greatly loved by the poet, and he expatiates on its virtues by applying the theories of rhetoric appropriate to his theme. So we find a variety of styles and genres: lyrical, georgic, satirical, farcical, and emblematic. Yet there is a highly personal feeling in his sometimes humorous, sometimes bitter irony or parody, and an entirely individual use of circumlocution, condensation, and metaphor.

His moral indignation comes fully to light, however, in the mordant sarcasm of his next poem, Costelick mal [Costly Folly]. In some 500 lines of alexandrines, Huygens ridicules what, according to his strict biblical morality, is absurd and culpable in the fashionable society of his day. As such it provides a valuable historical record of society at that time, and because it conforms to the Horatian ideal of utile dulci, it was a work (dedicated to Cats) for which Huygens retained an affection.

In both poems there are mannerisms that recall the style of Marino in Italy and the metaphysical poets in England, yet there is no evidence of a direct influence of the Marinists on Huygens. Though in his love poetry, as we shall see, there is a Petrarchan influence, in Costelick mal there is evidence, in his attitudes to women, of anti-Petrarchanism. So, steeped in the learning and theories of his age as he was, Huygens brings an individualism to his work that remains its hallmark.

If Costelick mal was an outward-looking commentary, however personal, on social behaviour, De uytlandighe herder [The Exiled Shepherd] is entirely introspective, and seems to have been written in a fit of depression. It is a pastoral with a difference; the first-person narrator, the shepherd, conducts an interior monologue between his emotional and rational selves.

Huygens's familiarity with English poetry, and not just John Donne's, is evident from his Zedeprinten [Characters]. Character sketches were a literary genre known in the Netherlands through Daniel Heinsius's translations of Theophrastus of Eresus, but Zedeprinten reproduces some of the characters of the English poets who were popular at that time, as well as a number of original moralistic satires on Dutch “types,” with the sophisticated wit that is Huygens's alone.

Dorpen en stedestemmen [Voices of Villages and Towns] devotes ten-line verses to each of 18 towns and six villages, and these, along with the character sketches and Costelick mal, add a further contemporary, if subjective, picture of 17th-century Dutch life. The personal and local sketches were reprinted in a collection published in 1625 with the title Otia of ledighe uren [Idleness or Empty Hours]. It is true that Huygens wrote rapidly, and often filled the time spent on his many journeys by writing. But the disdainful tone of this title merely echoes a Renaissance convention of false modesty, and does not belie his earlier insistence that poetry is a serious, cultivated art.

Dagwerck [Daily Work] covers the years of Huygens's marriage to his beautiful and wealthy niece, Susanna van Baerle. There is every reason to assume utter sincerity in his Petrarchan protestations of love for his sterre (star), the shining light in his firmament, whose premature death in 1637 evoked his finest sonnet “On the Death of Sterre.”

Oogentroost [Solace for the Sightless] was written for a friend who had lost the sight of one eye. Typically, its moral tone extols the virtue of those who though physically blind are spiritually whole, while attacking those who are spiritually blind: the arrogant, the prodigal, the malicious, and the ostentatious. The conclusion sums up the underlying faith throughout Huygens's poetry, that sighted or blind, only the virtuous will see God.

There are two autobiographical sequels to Ooghentroost: Hofwijck and Cluyswerck [Work in Seclusion]. Hofwijck was the country house that Huygens had built on the river Vliet as a refuge from his busy court life and as an antidote to his bereavement. This long, georgic poem represents an important contribution to the popular Stoical, bucolic literature of the Renaissance. The planning of country estates was considered consistent with the divine intention that man should restore the order of the garden of paradise from the wilderness, in which a Stoical balance should be observed, for “too orderly would be too formal, too wild would be all too coarse.” To Huygens, creation is God’s revelation:

From all things trivial, even things that miss our gaze
To distil creation’s purpose, sing the Maker’s praise.

Where he speaks of God’s two books, he is referring to the Bible and nature.

This book, this Book of Books
Has as much to teach us, as many instructive nooks,
As there are leaves on Hofwijck’s trees and plants.

In 1653 Huygens wrote his only play, Trijntje Cornelis, named after the protagonist, a young Dutch skipper’s wife who is seduced by two Flemish street lads and ends up in men’s clothes on a manure heap. She has her revenge when the following day she, unrecognized, lures them onto her ship where they are roundly thrashed and put ashore. An accomplished linguist with a good ear, Huygens clearly relished writing in the two dialects of the Netherlands and Antwerp, and spicing the humour with bawdy obscenities, which were by no means only the prerogative of fairground dramatists in the 17th century.

In his mid-eighties, Huygens wrote the last of his autobiographical trilogy, Cluyswerck [Work in Seclusion]. Though still William III’s secretary, Huygens’s retirement from full employment, with his freedom to enjoy his library, his music, and visits from friends, is celebrated here in some 600 alexandrines of scarcely diminished vitality and perception. Up to the last he also continued jotting down his Sneldichten [Quick Rhymes], which are simply frivolous nonsense rhymes, succeeding best where Huygens’s wit comes out in contemporary-seeming wordplay.

—Peter King

HUYSMANS, Joris-Karl

Born: Charles-Marie-Georges in Paris, France, 5 February 1848. Education: Educated at Lycée Saint-Louis, Paris, 1862–65; baccalauréat, after private tuition, 1866; law student, Paris, 1866. Military Service: 1870. Career: Civil servant, French Ministry of the Interior, 1866–76; internal security and crime prevention officer, Sûreté Générale, 1876–98; throughout career contributed reviews and stories to various French and Belgian publications, including Revue Mensuelle, La République de lettres, and L’Art universel. Associated with Zola and the Naturalist movement, became interested in Black Magic, retreated to Trappist monastery at Igny in 1892, returned to the Catholic faith; retired to a monastery at Ligugé. Awards: Chevalier, Légion d’honneur, 1893. Died: 12 May 1907.

PUBLICATIONS

Collection

Oeuvres complètes, edited by Lucien Descaves. 18 vols., 1928–40.

Fiction

Marthe, histoire d’une fille. 1876; as Marthe, translated by Samuel Putnam, in Down Stream and Other Works, 1927; as Martha, the Story of a Woman, translated by Robert Baldick, 1948; as Marthe, translated by Baldick, 1958.

Sac-au-dos. 1877; in Les Soirées de Médan, 1880; as Sac-au-dos, translated by L.G. Meyer, 1907.

Les Soeurs Vatar. 1879; as The Vatar Sisters, translated by James Babcock, 1983.

En ménage. 1881; as Living Together, translated by J. Sandisford-Pelle, 1969.

À vau-l’eau. 1882; in Croquis parisiens, 1905; as Downstream, translated by Robert Baldick, 1952.

À Rebours. 1884; as Against the Grain, translated by John Howard, 1922; as Against Nature, translated by Robert Baldick, 1959; translated by Margaret Mauldon, 1998.

En Rade. 1887; as Becalmed, translated by Terry Hale, 1992.

Un dilemme. 1887.

Là-bas. 1891; as Down There, translated by Keene Wallis, 1928.

En route. 1895; as En Route, translated by C. Kegan Paul, 1896.

La Cathédrale. 1898; as La Cathédrale-Chartres, edited by Helen Trudgian, 1936; as The Cathedral, translated by Clara Bell, 1898.

L’Oblat. 1903; as The Oblate, translated by Eduard Perceval, 1924.

Other

Le Drageoir à épices (prose poems). 1874; as Le Drageoir aux épices, 1874; as A Dish of Spices, translated by Samuel Putnam, in Down Stream and Other Works, 1927.

Pierrot sceptique, with Léon Hennique. 1881.

L’Art moderne. 1883; selections translated by Samuel Putnam, in Down Stream and Other Works, 1927.

Croquis parisiens. 1885; as Parisien Sketches, translated by Richard Griffiths, 1962.

Certains (articles). 1889; selections translated by Samuel Putnam in Down Stream and Other Works, 1927.

La Bièvre. 1890; with Les Gobelins and Saint-Séverin, 1901; as The Bièvre River, translated by Darius Halpern and Ellen Moerman, 1986.

Les Vieux Quartiers de Paris. 1890.

L’Oeuvre érotique de Félicien Rops. 1897.

Pages catholiques. 1899.

La Magie en Poitou: Gilles Rais. 1899.

Sainte Lydwine de Schiedam. 1901; as Saint Lydwine of Schiedam, translated by Agnes Hastings, 1923.

De tout. 1902.

Esquisse biographique sur Don Bosco. 1902.

Trois primitifs. 1904; as Grunewald, translated by Robert Baldick, 1958.

Le Quartier Notre-Dame. 1905.

- Les Foules de Lourdes*. 1906; as The Crowds of Lourdes, translated by W.H. Mitchell, 1925.
- Trois églises et trois primitifs*. 1908.
- Prières et pensées chrétiennes de J.K. Huysmans*. 1910.
- Pages choisies*, edited by Lucien Descaves. 1916.
- Down Stream and Other Works*, translated by Samuel Putnam. 1927.
- En marge* (essays), edited by Lucien Descaves. 1927.
- Correspondance*, with Madame Cécile Bruyère, edited by R. Rancoeur. 1950.
- Lettres inédites à Emile Zola*, edited by Pierre Lambert. 1953.
- Lettres inédites à Edmond de Goncourt*, edited by Pierre Lambert and Pierre Cogny. 1956.
- Lettres inédites à Camille Lemonnier*, edited by G. Vanwelkenhuyzen. 1957.
- Le Retraite de M. Bougran*. 1964.
- Là-haut; ou, Notre-Dame de la Salette*, edited by Pierre Cogny, Artine Artinian, and Pierre Lambert. 1965.
- Lettres inédites à Jules Destrée*, edited by G. Vanwelkenhuyzen. 1967.
- Une étape de la vie de J.-K. Huysmans: Lettres inédites de J.-K. Huysmans à l'abbé Ferret*, edited by Elisabeth Bourget-Besnier. 1973.
- Lettres inédites à Arij Prins*, edited by L. Gillet. 1977.
- Bloy, Villiers, Huysmans: lettres*, edited by D. Habrekorn. 1980.
- Lettres à Théodore Hannon (1876–1886)*, edited by Pierre Cogny and Christian Berg. 1985.
- The Road from Decadence: From Brothel to Cloister: The Selected Letters of J.-K. Huysmans*, edited and translated by Barbara Beaumont. 1988.

*

Bibliography: J.-K. Huysmans in England and America: A Bibliographical Study by George A. Cevasco, 1960.

Critical Studies: The First Decadent by James Laver, 1954; The Life of J.-K. Huysmans by Robert Baldick, 1955; Huysmans by Henry R.T. Brandreth, 1963; The Reactionary Revolution: The Catholic Revival in French Literature 1870–1914 by Richard Griffiths, 1966; Joris Karl Huysmans by George R. Ridge, 1968; The Genius of the Future by Anita Brookner, 1971; The Violent Mystique: Thematics of Retribution and Expiation in Balzac, Barbey d'Aurevilly, Bloy and Huysmans by Joyce O. Lowrie, 1974; "A vau-l'eau—A Naturalist Sotie" by C.G. Shenton, in Modern Language Review, 72, 1977; Reality and Illusion in the Novels of J.-K. Huysmans by Ruth B. Antosh, 1986; "J.-K. Huysmans: Novelist, Poet, and Art Critic" by Annette Kahn, in Studies in the Fine Arts, 19, 1987; J.-K. Huysmans and the Fin de Siècle Novel by Christopher Lloyd, 1990; The Image of Huysmans by Brian R. Banks, 1992; Huysmans by Jean Borie, 1992; Beyond the Paradox of the Nostalgic Modernist Temporality in the Works of J. K. Huysmans by Elisabeth M. Donato, 2001.

* * *

Joris-Karl Huysmans was among those writers marked by a series of startling events in France beginning in 1848 and lasting into the early 20th century. Born in February 1848, reputedly at the very moment when the Parliament declared the inception of the Second Republic, he witnessed the subsequent changes in government—from a republic to the reinstatement of the Empire under Napoleon III in 1852—as well as the establishment of the Third Republic after the Commune of Paris was defeated, and ultimately the political and economic preparations for World War I. In addition to this intense political activity, social, economic, and intellectual developments were also little short of revolutionary: the urbanization of France, accompanying its evolving democratization, resulted in a literal and figurative change of landscape and the new ideas of socialism had their impact on politics as Positivism, Realism, and Naturalism had theirs on literature. Writers like Huysmans could either participate in this ferment by supporting or criticizing these new concepts and their social or literary results, or they could in various ways withdraw from the life of these innovations.

Huysmans in his career did both. At first, a partisan of Naturalism and admirer of Zola, Huysmans abandoned Zola's form of Naturalism in À Rebours (Against Nature) and turned towards a spiritual Naturalism. Des Esseintes, the hero of the novel, is the prototype of the decadent hero whose only solution for an unacceptable environment is to isolate himself completely from it and seek an alternative in artifice and ultimately religion. Published in May 1884, Against Nature is a novel of fin-de-siècle aestheticism, considered to be the masterpiece of this genre in French literature of the late 19th century.

Des Esseintes recalls the Baudelairian character who suffers from the disease of the century: boredom. Huysmans's hero cannot tolerate contemporary society and decides to escape it, adopting Baudelaire's motto, "Anywhere out of the world." Plot and action are practically nonexistent in the novel. Curiously, however, one of the principal motifs is travel; travel, though, that takes place in the mind of Des Esseintes, who frees himself from his surroundings by means of imaginary journeys. For example, he decides to travel to England, a country in vogue at the time and the centre of dandyism. It is also the home of Charles Dickens, whose works had stimulated Des Esseintes's conception of London's grey skies and the general mood of England. To prepare for his trip, Des Esseintes consults a guidebook in a bookshop. Inspired by his reading, his imagination takes him to London and its museums, but his wandering is interrupted by the presence of the bookseller. To continue his imaginary trip, he escapes to the "Bodega" to recreate in his mind the land of clergymen and of Dickens by drinking glasses of port. Des Esseintes's imaginary voyage in place of the real one does not disappoint him: it allows him to get away from reality. His reading of the guidebook enables him to make his trip to England in accordance with his wishes; a real trip would have eventually brought disillusion in the form of a train ride home. He has succeeded in escaping from the daily routine and killing his boredom at least for a few hours.

At the beginning of the novel Des Esseintes had sold his family's manor house and had left Paris and his tumultuous life there to seek refuge in his ideal house at Fontenay-aux-Roses, where he is waited on by his two faithful servants. Having left no forwarding address, he is completely isolated from the world. His only company consists of religious objects, posters, aquariums, and books. He has created an entirely artificial milieu, imitating theatre sets decorated in flamboyant colours. On occasion he drapes his dining room in black and has a funeral meal served accompanied by dirges. On other occasions the atmosphere of a cloister dominates the whole house, imposing an air of sanctity and silence. For Des Esseintes, artifice is the distinctive sign of man's genius. Consequently he is uninterested in, and repulsed by, the human condition. His indifference extends as well to all that is associated with progress and the modern. Instead he shuts himself up in his study to cultivate his admiration for the painter Gustave Moreau, whose two paintings of Salome Des Esseintes owns. Depicted in the novel as a double to Des Esseintes, Moreau had been able to escape reality even though he lived in Paris.

Finally, Des Esseintes realizes that his artificial refuge at Fontenay-aux-Roses will not help him escape from the nihilism into which he has sunk. He becomes physically and mentally lethargic. The country doctor warns him of the danger of a life lead in such strange and luxurious conditions and advises him to return to Paris if he wishes to recover his health and mental stability. "In two days I shall be in Paris," Des Esseintes replies. "All is finished." He gives himself up to God in the hope of finding a solution to his dilemma, and prays: "Lord, take pity on a Christian who is in doubt, on the unbeliever who would like to believe." Thus finishes Against Nature.

The autobiographical aspect of the book (Des Esseintes is the alter ego of Huysmans) is evident. Like his hero's life, Huysmans's was notable for its gradual progress towards a state of spirituality. Like Des Esseintes, Huysmans withdrew from the world, but he actually retired to a Trappist monastery at Notre-Dame d'Igny, causing something of a scandal in late 19th-century anti-clerical France. Ironically, although Huysmans, like Des Esseintes, detested modern civilization, he wrote in Against Nature a novel that exhibits many of the features of French Modernism, particularly its surrealist tone and its impressionistic style.

—Nicole Mosher

HYDER, Qurratulain

Also known as Aini Apa. Born: Aligarh, India, 1927. Education: Primary school in Aligarh, 1937; attended high school in Aligarh, 1938–1943; Master's degree in English language and literature, University of Lucknow, Uttar Pradesh. Career: Became involved in journalism as a teenager through her mother, an editor of a children's magazine; began to write for several Urdu magazines at age 20; worked as a broadcaster; served as a visiting lecturer at the universities of California, Chicago, Wisconsin, and Arizona. Lives in Uttar Pradesh, India. Awards: Sahitya Academy award for literature, 1969; Soviet Land Nehru award, 1969; Ghalib award for literature, 1985; Governmental Padma Shri for Urdu literature, 1989; Jnanpith award for the novel Aakhir-i shab ki hamsafar (Fireflies in the Mist), 1989.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

A Woman's Life or Tea Gardens of Sylhet. 1979.
Muntakhab Kahaniyan. 1991.
The Street Singers of Lucknow and Other Stories. 1996.
Sheeshay kay ghar. 1998.
A Season of Betrayals. 1999.

Novels and Novelettes

Aag ka darya. 1959; as The River of Fire, translated by the author, 1999.
Chaa'i ki baagh. 1965.

Patjar ki awaz. 1965; as The Sound of Falling Leaves, translated by the author, 1997.
Shitaa haran. 1968.
Pat jhar ki avaz. 1970.
Dilrubaa. 1976.
Aakhir-i shab ki hamsafar. 1979; as Fireflies in the Mist, translated by the author, 1994.
Pikchar gailri. 1983.
Gardish-i rang-i chaman. 1991.
Chaandn-i Begam. 1990.
Jugnu'o ki duniya. 1990.
Eka larak ki zindagi. 1996.
A Season of Betrayals. 1999.

Other

Kar-i jahan daraaz hay. 1990.
Koh-i Damavand. 2000.
 Translator, The Nautch Girl: A Novel, by Hasan Shah. 1790; as The Dancing Girl, 1993.

*

Critical Studies: Feminine Sense and Sensibility: A Comparative Study of Six Modern Women Short Story Fiction Writers in Hindi and Urdu: Rashid Jahan, Ismet Chughtai, Qurratul-ain-Hyder, Mannu Bhandari, Usha Priyamavada, Vijay Chauhan by S. M. Poulos, 1975; Muslim Self-Identity in Qurratulain Hyder's "Aag ka darya" by L. A. Fleming, in Studies in Urdu Ghazal and Prose Fiction edited by M. U. Memon, 1979; Qurratul'ain Haidar kaafan by M. Abd al-Mughanni, 1985; Qurratul'ain Haidar by A. Tufail, 1991; Qurratul'ain Haidar, ek mutala'a edited by K. Irtiza', 1992; First Urdu Novel, in Annual Urdu Studies by M. Asaduddin, 2001; Reclaiming the Past, in Annual Urdu Studies by C. Byer, 2001. Qurratulain Hyder's Art of Fiction by M. Asaduddin, in Manushi, 2002.

* * *

Qurratulain Hyder, widely recognized as the most important writer of Urdu fiction, is one of the most celebrated Indian contemporary writers. She began writing in Urdu, the language of the Muslim people of the Subcontinent, as an act of self-consciousness, and began writing novels at a time when fiction was not yet widely used as a form of expression in the poetry-oriented world of Urdu literature. She brought new life to the genre and purged it of its conventions with energy, romance, and realism, instilling a new sense of thought and imagination henceforth unknown in the field.

Aag ka darya (The River of Fire), the most celebrated of Hyder's novels was published in 1959 and "transcreated" in English by the author in 1988. It is a landmark work that explores the wide sweep of historical time. Its narration, conceptually divided into four distinct plots, passes through a period that encompasses 2400 years of Indian history, moving from the 4th century BC to the post-Independence period both of India and Pakistan, lingering to look at the many crucial turning points of the subcontinental history. Hyder, in her voluminous masterpiece, shows an unusual ability to encompass, even in brief passages, the great historical narratives of the most important cultural phenomena of her land: Bhuddism, Hinduism, the coming of Islam, the age of the Mughal empire, the British occupation, the 1857 War of Independence, the two World Wars, and the consequences of the Partition in the Hindu as well as in the Muslim milieu. It was years after the novel was first published before its magical realism and other formal devices reshaped the novel genre in the regional literatures of India. The common human experiences of art and love are the means by which the author, in the mirror of the characters' souls, enables the reader to participate in 24 centuries of imagined history.

At a time when Urdu literature was dominated by the Progressive writers movement and used to voice leftist opinion, Hyder—scandalously for some—wrote not about the paradigmatic peasant and plough, but about her own privileged literate surroundings and the destruction of its composite culture. However, Hyder's work could also be used for political expression; her personal background and education, together with creative experimentation, led her to express in fictional form her own commitment to social change. With A Season of Betrayals, originally published in 1960, Hyder began the trend of feminist literature in India, which sought to rewrite the patriarchal Weltanschauung and challenged the set order. Her energetic characters—though caught in a parochial society—have the strength to face their struggles. The themes of identity and self play a central role almost in all Hyder's work: the necessity of recovering one's primary or youthful self is usually present as a clashing paradigm, illustrating the difficulties a person will have in realizing and accepting his past, especially after life has fashioned him into what seems like a completely different person.

On the same hand, Aakhir-i shab ki hamsafar (Fireflies in the Mist) constitutes an attempt to link the subcontinental experience to that of the international, postcolonial cultural renewal. Despite the fact that it also explores the themes of time and history, Hyder uses a relativistic approach toward the more modern themes of the social and cultural uprooting by the powerful Western influence, analyzing in detail the impact of British rule over the Hindu, Muslim, and Christian traditional identities and how it deeply unsettled the lives of so many people. In Hyder's view, one's early, primary self is not entrapping, disgraceful, or something to be shunned as a source of contradiction, but an entity which every person must come to terms with and accept.

Although the period of intellectual revolution that characterized much of her career is now past, Qurratulain Hyder remains a fascinating alchemy of scholarship and sudden compassion, and—although in comparison with some other Indian literatures as Bangla, Malayalam, or Marathi, Urdu has not produced enough writers of promise who could have contributed to the development of a novel tradition—one may assert that she is to be considered the real founder of modern Urdu prose.

—Alessandro Cancian

I

IBN AL-ARABI, Muhyi al-Din

Also known as Ibn Arabi. Pseudonym: al-Shaykh al-Akbar (Greatest Teacher). Born: Murcia, Spain, 17th of Ramadan, 560 Hijri/27 July AD 1165. Education: Educated at home in Qur'an and religious sciences; studied Qur'an and hadith in Seville, c. AD 1182. Family: From a wealthy family; two or three wives, two surviving sons. Career: About age twenty took up the mystical path; trained in Sufism under a number of Andalusian and Maghrebi teachers; moved to the central Islamic lands, AD 1201; taught and wrote in Cairo, Mecca, Medina, Jerusalem, Mosul, Konya, Baghdad, Malatya, Aleppo, and Damascus. Died: Damascus, 22 Rab' II, 638 Hijri/8 November AD 1240.

PUBLICATIONS

Mystic Writings

- Al-Futuhat al-Makkiyya*. 4 vols. 1911; incomplete critical edition, 14 vols., 1972–; sections published in Les Illuminations de la Mecque: Textes Choisis [The Meccan Illuminations: Selected Texts], translated by M. Chodkiewicz, W. Chittick, Ch. Chodkiewicz, D. Gril, and J. Morris, 1989.
- Fusus al-Hikam*. 1946; as Ibn al-Arabi: The Bezels of Wisdom, translated by R.W.J. Austin, 1981.
- Rasa'il Ibn al-Arabi* (which contains Istilahat al-Sufiyya, Hilyat al-Abdal, Al-Tajalliyat, Al-Alif, Risalat al-Shaykh ila al-Imam al-Razi, Al-Wasaya, Masa'il, Al-Anwar, Ayyam al-Sha'n, Al-Azal). 1948; Al-Anwar as Journey to the Lord of Power, translated by R. Harris, 1981.
- Tarjuman al-Ashwaq*. 1911; translated and edited by R.A. Nicholson; also sections in Stations of Desire, translated by M. Sells, 2000.
- Insha al-Dawa'ir*, in Kleinere Schriften des Ibn al-Arabi. 1919; as La Production des Cercles, translated by P. Fenton and M. Gloton, 1996.
- Kitab Anqa Maghrib fi khatm al-awliya wa shams al-Maghrib*. 1954.

*

Bibliography: Histoire et classification de l'oeuvre d'Ibn Arabi by Osman Yahia, 1964; Fihrist al-Mu'allafat in "The Works of Ibn Arabi" by A. Affifi, in Revue de la faculté de lettres de l'Université d'Alexandrie, no. 8, 1954.

Critical Studies: The Mystical Philosophy of Muhy al-Din Ibn al-Arabi by A. Affifi, 1964; Creative Imagination in the Sufism of Ibn Arabi by H. Corbin, 1969; Sufism and Taoism by T. Izutsu, 1983; The Sufi Path of Knowledge: Ibn Arabi's Metaphysics of Imagination by W. Chittick, 1989; Ibn Arabi wa Mawlid Lughah Jadida (Ibn Arabi and the Birth of New Language) by S. Hakim, 1991; Seal of the Saints: Prophethood and Sainthood in the Doctrine of Ibn Arabi by M. Chodkiewicz, 1993; An Ocean Without Shore; Ibn Arabi, the Book and the Law by M. Chodkiewicz, 1993; Quest for the Red Sulphur: The Life of Ibn Arabi by Claude Addas, 1993; The Self-disclosure of God: Principles of Ibn Arabi's Cosmology by W. Chittick, 1998; Ibn Arabi and the Later Islamic Tradition by A. Knysh, 1999.

* * *

The thirteenth century mystical philosopher Muhyi al-Din Ibn al-Arabi was a truly prolific writer. Osman Yahia has listed up to 700 separate works attributed to him, 400 of which have survived. It is not an exaggeration to say that the works of Ibn al-Arabi marked the high point in Islamic mystical writing. Any survey of the history of Sufi writing must distinguish between a pre and a post-Ibn al-Arabi landscape. His works have been studied throughout the Islamic world, from Morocco to Indonesia.

Ibn al-Arabi's writings range from short devotional and didactic pieces for aspirants on the Sufi path, to the imposing Al-Futuhat al-Makkiyya [Mekkan Openings], containing 560 chapters, which has been printed without notes or references in an edition of over 2500 pages in small type. A critical edition of this work begun by O. Yahia will take up more than twenty volumes. Ibn al-Arabi also composed a significant work of mystical poetry, the Tarjuman al-Ashwaq [Interpreter of Desires]. Most of his writings however, remain in manuscript form awaiting proper editing and publication.

Central to his approach is a sophisticated hermeneutical style based on the Qur'anic revelation. This revelation is logo-centric; that is, God's message to humanity takes the form of the divine (Arabic) Word. Ibn al-Arabi's approach holds to this understanding, yet it opens up vast new insights into this Word by avoiding dogmatic and hence stifling interpretation. The issue here is not simply a distinction between a literalist and an interpretive reading. Ibn al-Arabi makes it clear that all readings bring with them preconceptions, and that they are all presumptuous when they claim to represent any "true" meaning with regard to revelation. After all, humanity's efforts can only ever be incomplete and imperfect in relation to God and his Word. With this insight in mind, Ibn al-Arabi takes up his own approach. He does put the various Islamic "sciences" to work in his writings. He uses grammar, law, hadith and often neo-Platonism as tools, but his touchstone is mystical inspiration. For him this is neither infallible nor can it fully encompass God's Word, but it is less of a human construct than the other approaches and for him (and other mystics) it is certainly more direct and convincing. In the end of course he is also interpreting the Word, but in basing his hermeneutic on spiritual principles, religious experience, and divine inspiration, he is uncovering realities as valid and as sound as those reached by any other method. Significantly, his hermeneutic starting point is open to change, since divine inspiration cannot be predicted, codified, or systematized. Mystical insight as an interpretive basis can thus never be a "school" or a set philosophy laying claim to a totalizing truth. This makes for a dynamic infinite hermeneutic, one that responds (in its own fallible and incomplete human way) to the incomprehensible infinite that is God. At one point he succinctly states, "I only speak of what I taste."

Ibn al-Arabi is best known for his development of a concept that became known in short as the "oneness of being." Although he himself did not coin the phrase, it came to represent his position on the nature of existence. In a number of works, he argued that the only real existence is that properly of God; and all of creation simply shares temporarily in that existence. This is not to say that Ibn al-Arabi was a pantheist (holding that creation is simply part of God). He insisted on a qualified but significant independence of creation from its creator. Ibn al-Arabi also made an impact through his developments on the idea of “walaya” or sainthood. The concept had been discussed from at least the tenth century, but Ibn al-Arabi took it to new heights. In particular he wrote in detail on the final or “seal” of saints, his function, and his identity. At stake here were ideas such as the continuation of divine guidance, the relation of sainthood to prophethood, and certain apocalyptic elements. Ibn al-Arabi was also known for his cosmological ideas. Probably the most innovative were his elaborations on the “imaginal world.” Although not without simpler precedents in Islamic thought, for Ibn al-Arabi it is the realm in which imagined entities (including intentions, words, spiritual insights) take form. This imagination may be human or it may be God’s.

The writings of Ibn al-Arabi from the 13th century to the present day have not been without their critics. Fusus al-Hikam (The Bezels of Wisdom), for example, with its rehabilitation of Pharaoh and its apparent criticism of the prophet Noah, has been a convenient target. Conservative figures, in particular Ibn Taymiyya (d. 1328) and al-Sakhawi (d. 1496), objected to ideas such as the “oneness of being” (smacking of pantheism), Ibn al-Arabi’s priority of God’s mercy over his wrath (the non-eternity of God’s punishment), and his doctrine of sainthood (which might compromise the function of the prophet Muhammad). These criticisms have never halted the circulation of Ibn al-Arabi’s writings, but they have certainly kept them out of the hands of the general public. Even in the modern period Ibn al-Arabi must be handled with care: the publication of his Al-Futuh al-Makkiyya was temporarily halted in the 1970s by the Egyptian government. Nevertheless, generations of Muslims (in particular intellectuals open to the mystical side of their religion, and many students of Islamic philosophy more generally) have read his works. The impact of these books (among both Sunnis and Shi’is) has been felt in the Arabic, Persianate, Turkic, and Asian regions of the Islamic world. The Western world has also recently begun to explore the Greatest Teacher.

—Richard J.A. McGregor

IBN AL-FÂRID, ‘Umar

Born: Cairo, Egypt, 4 Dhû al-Qa’dah, 576 AH/March, 1181 AD
Education: Raised to be a scholar of literature and religion by his father; studied the traditions of the prophet Muhammad (hadith) with al-Qâsim ibn ‘Alî Ibn ‘Asâkir (d. 600 AH/1203 AD); studied Islamic mysticism, and Arabic literature; member of the Shâfi‘î law school.
Family: Married; at least two sons and a daughter. Career: As a young man, traveled and stayed in Mecca for about 15 years; returned to Cairo and taught poetry and the traditions of the prophet Muhammad at the al-Azhar mosque. Died: Cairo, Egypt, 2 Jumâdâ I, 632 AH/January, 1235 AD

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Dîwân Ibn al-Fârid, multiple editions including that edited by ‘Abd al-Khâliq Mahmûd. 1984.

*

Critical Studies: Studies in Islamic Mysticism by R.A. Nicholson, 1921; Ibn al-Fârid wa-al-hubb al-ilâhî by Muhammad Mustafâ Hilmî, 1945; The Mystical Poems of Ibn al-Fârid by A.J. Arberry, 2 vols., 1952–56; The Poem of the Way by A.J. Arberry, 1952; From Arab Poet to Muslim Saint: Ibn al-Fârid, His Verse, and His Shrine by Th. Emil Homerin, 1994; ‘Umar Ibn al-Fârid: Sufi Verse, Sainly Life by Th. Emil Homerin, 2001.

* * *

‘Umar Ibn al-Fârid is the most renowned mystical poet in Arabic. Born in Cairo, he grew up in the scholarly home of his father, a noted fârid in the religious courts, hence his title Ibn al-Fârid or “son of the women’s advocate.” As a youth, he memorized traditions of the prophet Muhammad (hadith) and pursued studies in Islamic mysticism and Arabic literature. Ibn al-Fârid lived for a time in Mecca, but spent most of his life in Cairo where he taught the traditions of the prophet Muhammad and Arabic poetry until his death in 632 AH/1235 CE

A master of the Arabic poetic tradition, Ibn al-Fârid composed verse in a number of genres including the quatrain, love poetry (ghazal), and the formal ode (qasîdah). Ibn al-Fârid’s verse is very polished and highly lyrical, though mannered and occasionally didactic. Generally, he addresses themes involving love, longing, and union:

Ancient is my tale of love for her;
 it has, she knows, no beginning, no end.
 There is none like me in passion for her,
 while her enchanting beauty has no equal.

Here, Ibn al-Fârid praises the beloved’s unique beauty with words that echo the Qur’ân’s frequent declarations that God “has no equal.” This phrasing suggests the spiritual nature of the relationship, and Ibn al-Fârid’s verse is filled with allusions to God, Muhammad, the Qur’ân, and, especially, to Islamic mystical doctrines and practice. Often, Ibn al-Fârid describes the lover’s pain that is necessary to purify his heart of selfishness:

So it happened that passion’s fire filled him;
 he sees its burning but no relief.
 Thirsty, his ribs embrace a sorrow
 beyond the doctors’ power,
 So he clinched his teeth as pain bit deep.

Yet, by suffering patiently, the lover learns true humility, which may then result in rapture and a state of union, as the lover passes away to reside with the beloved:

I rubbed my face in the dust for her to step on,
 so she said: "Glad tidings for you; kiss my veil!"
 But my soul would not have it, guarding me, jealous to keep my longing pure.
 So we passed the night together
 as I controlled desire:
 I saw kingship my kingdom and time my slave.

A distinguishing feature of Ibn al-Fârid's poems is the many places he cites within them. Significantly, most of the names refer to actual sites in Arabia found on the Cairo to Mecca pilgrimage route, a route Ibn al-Fârid probably knew from personal experience. With these detailed itineraries, Ibn al-Fârid links his physical residence in Cairo with his spiritual home in Mecca, Islam's sacred center. Moreover, the poet often refers to the beloved as the object of his prayers and pilgrimage, and he may recall hallowed memories of an earlier pilgrimage to Mecca. This, again, suggests the holy nature of both the poet's love and his beloved, and thus Ibn al-Fârid's poems may be read as love songs to God and His prophet Muhammad.

Furthermore, throughout his verse, Ibn al-Fârid expresses a mystical view of life in which creation mirrors its divine creator such that, when seen aright, all things shine with primordial light. This is perhaps best seen in two of his poems that have been especially cherished as classics of Islamic mystical literature, the al-Khamrîyah ("Wine Ode"), and the Nazm al-Sulûk ("Poem of the Sufi Way"). Beginning his al-Khamrîyah, the poet declares:

In memory of the beloved, we drank a wine.
 We were drunk with it, before creation of the vine!

Clearly this timeless vintage is not that of the grape, and Ibn al-Fârid goes on to describe the miraculous healing properties of this heavenly ambrosia. Both in this verse and elsewhere in the al-Khamrîyah, he links this wine with dhikr ("memory") and the name of the Muslim mystical practice of recollection. Ibn al-Fârid elaborates on this and other aspects of Islamic mysticism in the 760 verses of his Nazm al-Sulûk, one of the longest poems ever composed in Arabic. This poem, in particular, revolves around the transformation of a mystic from a self-absorbed individual into an embodiment of the all-embracing Light of Muhammad, God's instrument of creation and revelation. Though at times complex and abstruse, this progressive mystical illumination must still rely on the simple power of love between God and His worshipper, an eternal love that underlies all of existence:

This is not some feeble guess:
 beloveds and lovers appear to us from us
 As we reveal ourselves in love and splendor.
 So every hero in love am I,
 And she the beloved of every hero,
 all names of a disguise.

Ibn al-Fârid's poems were popular in his own day, and they have been read, studied, and imitated by Arab and Muslim poets for centuries. On occasion, he has been criticized by more conservative Muslims for his unitive vision of existence, using a female beloved to symbolize God, and for likening God's love to an intoxicating wine, a drink prohibited by the Qur'ân. For the vast majority of Muslims, however, Ibn al-Fârid's devotion to love and the beautiful and moving qualities of his verse have earned him the lasting title of "the sultan of lovers." In fact, Ibn al-Fârid's verse and later accounts of his life and work have inspired many Muslims to venerate him as a saint and make pilgrimage to his grave, which is still a revered shrine in Egypt today.

—Th. Emil Homerin

IBN KHAFAJAH, Ibrahim ibn Abi al-Fath Abu Ishaq

Born: 450 AH/1058 AD on Shuqr Island on a river near Valencia in Andalusia (Spain). Career: Independently wealthy; primarily composed nature poetry; left off writing poetry in midlife, perhaps in the wake of the Spanish conquest of Valencia; brief travel to Morocco; praised the Almoravids, especially the ruler Yusuf ibn Tashfin, in Valencia, Granada, and Murcia. Died: 533 AH/1117 AD on Shuqr Island.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Diwan Ibn Khafajah (poetry). c. 533 AH/1117 CE; as The Diwan of Abu Ishaq ibn Ibrahim ibn Abu al Fath ibn Khafaja, translated by Arthur Wormhoudt, 1987.

*

Critical Studies: Ibn Khafajah by Muhammad Radwan, 1972; Hayat wa-athar al-sha'ir al-Andalusi Ibn Khafajah by Hamdan Hajaji, 1974; Ibn Khafajah al-Andalusi by Abd al-Rahman Jubayr, 1980; Ibn Khafajah: Sha'ir sharq al-Andalus: 450–533 H by Hasan Muhammad Nur al-Din, 1990; The Poetry of Ibn Khafajah: A Literary Analysis by Magda al-Nowaihi, 1993.

* * *

Ibrahim ibn Abi al-Fath Abu Ishaq Ibn Khafajah's privileged background enabled him to devote most of his creative energy to nature poetry, rather than the panegyric poetry that was the main source of income for many poets of his time. Although his nature poetry encompasses both the "Arabian" style, or depiction of bleak desert scenes in the tradition of the eastern Arab poets, and the "Andalusian" style, or depiction of pleasant garden scenes, it is the latter style that predominates in his work and for which he is best known. Ibn Khafajah's importance as a nature poet is emphasized in the classical anthologies and biographies. In addition, the references to him as "the gardener" and as "al-Sanawbari of the west"—linking him to the eastern Arab poet best known for his descriptive poetry—display the central role of nature poetry in his work. Ibn Khafajah's talent in portraying nature also appears in other genres such as his panegyrics and his elegies.

His Andalusian nature poetry can be viewed in the broader context of Andalusian Arabic poetry, in which the description of pleasant garden scenes was proportionally more important than in eastern Arabic poetry. This may be due in part to the lush gardens throughout the region, including the island of Shuqr where Ibn Khafajah was born and raised. His nephew Ibn Zuqqaq is considered his imitator, while his style in nature poetry is said to be emulated by subsequent generations of Andalusian Arab poets.

Ibn Khafajah refers to the major eastern poets al-Mutanabbi, Mihyar al-Daylami, and al-Sharif al-Radi as his inspiration, although this inspiration has more to do with rhetorical style and “Arabian” themes than the garden poetry for which Ibn Khafajah is best known. Ibn Khafajah’s style is noteworthy for his seamless interweaving of different spheres of experience, such as the animate and the inanimate, the human and the non-human, and the cosmos and the natural environment on earth. The depiction of human beauty is made vivid through the use of natural imagery, while the depiction of nature comes alive through the use of human imagery with physical, intellectual, and emotive dimensions. Within the depiction of nature, the cosmos and the natural environment on earth reflect one another and interact with one another. These rhetorical features give Ibn Khafajah’s poetry a magical quality. While mannerist elaboration of poetic expression was a common feature of Andalusian Arabic poetry, Ibn Khafajah’s manipulation of this potential stands out for both classical and modern critics.

As a privileged owner of plantations, Ibn Khafajah was able to enjoy a playful and adventurous youth, referred to by classical biographers as mujun, which refers to sexual promiscuity, especially homosexual, drinking and partying, and carefree living in general. This lifestyle may be related to his focus on pleasant garden scenes, where much of this type of socializing took place. However, he apparently repented for these youthful adventures later in life, and this repentance is assumed to be the source of much of his wisdom poetry. The best known example of this wisdom poetry is his fatalistic description of himself as a traveler who hears a mountain lamenting the loss of all who pass by. As in his garden poetry, the rhetorical integration of the animate and the inanimate in this poem contributes to its emotive force.

Ibn Khafajah is also noted for his ode on the Spanish conquest of Valencia. Like many Andalusian poets, he composed poetry on yearning for Andalusia during his travels in North Africa. As the compiler of his own poetry later in life, Ibn Khafajah included an introduction to his compilation that has been valuable for his classical and modern critics.

—Jocelyn Sharlet

IBSEN, Henrik (Johan)

Born: Skien, Norway (then united with Sweden), 20 March 1828. Education: Educated at local schools, and a private school in Skien; attended the University of Christiania (now Oslo), 1850–51. Family: Married Suzannah Thoresen in 1858; one son; also had one son by Else Jonsdatter. Career: Pharmacist’s assistant in Grimstad, 1844–50; drama critic, Manden, later Andhrimmer, 1851; contributor to the radical newspaper Arbejderforeningernes blad, until it was shut down by the police, 1851; house dramatist, Det Norske Theater [Norwegian Theatre], Bergen, 1851–57; visited Copenhagen and Dresden, 1852; artistic director, Det Norske Theater, Christiania, 1857–62; theatre declared bankrupt, 1862; travelled in northern Norway on grant to collect folktales, 1862; consultant, Christiania Theater, 1863; awarded a small travelling scholarship by the state in 1864, and left for Italy, where he lived until 1868; visited Egypt, 1869; lived in Dresden, 1868–75, Munich, 1875–78, Rome, 1878–85, Munich, 1885–91; returned to Norway and settled in Christiania, 1891–1906. Government pension, 1866. Doctor of Letters, Uppsala University, 1877. Died: 23 May 1906.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Samlede verker [Collected Works] (includes letters), edited by Francis Bull, Halvdan Koht, and Didrik Arup Seip. 21 vols., 1928–58.

Samlede verker [Collected Works]. 7 vols., 1978.

Prose Dramas (includes The League of Youth; The Pillars of Society; A Doll’s House; Ghosts; An Enemy of the People; The Wild Duck; Lady Inger of Östråt; The Vikings at Helgeland; The Pretenders; The Emperor and Galilean; Rosmersholm; The Lady from the Sea; Hedda Gabler), edited by William Archer, translated by Archer, Frances E. Archer, Eleanor Marx-Aveling, Charles Archer, Catharine Ray. 5 vols., 1890.

Collected Works, edited by William Archer, translated by Archer, Edmund Gosse, Charles Archer, Frances E. Archer, Eleanor Marx-Aveling, Mary Morison, C.H. Herford, and A.G. Chater. 12 vols., 1906–12.

The Oxford Ibsen, edited by James W. McFarlane, translated by McFarlane and others. 8 vols., 1960–77.

The Complete Major Prose Plays, translated by Roll Fjelde. 1978.

Plays, translated by Michael Meyer. 6 vols., 1980–87.

Plays

Catalina (produced 1882). 1850; as Cataline, translated by Anders Orbeck, in Early Plays, 1921; as Catiline, translated by Graham Orton, in The Oxford Ibsen, 1, 1960.

Kjæmpehøjen (produced 1850). 1902; as The Warrior’s Barrow, translated by Anders Orbeck, in Early Plays, 1921; as The Burial Mound, translated by James McFarlane, in The Oxford Ibsen 1, 1960.

Norma; eller, En politikers kjærlighed, in Andhrimmer. 1 and 8 June, 1851; as Norma; or, A Politician’s Love, translated by James McFarlane, in The Oxford Ibsen 1, 1960.

Sankthansnatten (produced 1853). 1909; as St. John’s Night, translated by James and Kathleen McFarlane, in The Oxford Ibsen 1, 1960.

Fru Inger til Østråt (produced 1855). 1857; revised edition, 1874; as Lady Inger of Östråt, translated by Charles Archer, in Prose Dramas, 1890; also translated by R. Farquharson-Sharp, with Love’s Comedy and The League of Youth, 1915; as Lady Inger, translated by Graham Orton, in The Oxford Ibsen 1, 1960.

Gildet på Solhaug (produced 1856). 1856; as The Feast at Solhaug, translated by William Archer and Mary Morison, in Collected Works, 1906–12.

Olaf Liljekrans (produced 1857). 1898; as Olaf Liljekrans, translated by Anders Orbeck, in Early Plays, 1921.

Hærmændene på Helgeland (produced 1858). 1857; as The Vikings at Helgeland, translated by William Archer, in Prose Dramas, 1890; also translated by Sam Oakland, 1978; as The Warriors at Helgeland, translated by R. Farquharson-Sharp, with Ghosts and An Enemy of the People, 1911; translated by James McFarlane, in The Oxford Ibsen 2, 1962.

- Kjærlighedens komedie* (produced 1873). 1862; as Love's Comedy, translated by C.H. Herford, 1900; also translated by R. Farquharson-Sharp, with Lady Inger of Ostraat and The League of Youth, 1915; Jens Arup, 1962.
- Kongs-Emnerne* (produced 1864). 1863; as The Pretenders, translated by William Archer, in Prose Dramas, 1890; also translated by R. Farquharson-Sharp, with The Pillars of Society and Rosmersholm, 1913; William Archer, 1913.
- Brand* (produced in part, 1866; complete version, 1885). 1866; as Brand, translated by W. Wilson, 1891; also translated by C.H. Herford, 1894; F.E. Garrett, 1894; J.M. Olberman, 1912; Miles M. Dawson, 1916; Theodore Jorgenson, 1962; G.M. Gathorne-Hardy, 1966; Michael Meyer, 1967; Geoffrey Hill, 1978; R.D. MacDonald, 1991.
- Peer Gynt* (produced 1876). 1867; as Peer Gynt, translated by William and Charles Archer, 1892; also translated by R. Ellis-Roberts, 1912; R. Farquharson-Sharp, 1921; Gottfried Hult, 1933; Norman Ginsbury, 1945; Paul Green, 1951; Horace Maynard Finney, 1955; Rolf Fjelde, 1964; Christopher Fry and Johan Fillingier, 1970; Peter Watts, 1970; David Rudkin, 1983; James W. McFarlane, 1989; Anne Bamborough, adapted by Frank McGuinness, 1990; Kenneth McLeish, 1990.
- De unges forbund* (produced 1869). 1869; as The League of Youth, translated by William Archer, in Prose Dramas, 1890; R. Farquharson-Sharp, with Love's Comedy and Lady Inger of Ostraat, 1915; Peter Watts, with A Doll's House and The Lady From the Sea, 1965.
- Kejser og Galilæer* (produced in part 1896). 1873; as The Emperor and the Galilean, translated by Catherine Ray, 1876; also translated by Graham Orton, 1963.
- Samfundets støtter* (produced 1877). 1877; as The Pillars of Society, translated by William Archer, in The Pillars of Society and Other Plays, 1888; also translated by R. Farquharson-Sharp, with The Pretenders and Rosmersholm, 1913; Garrett H. Leverton, 1937; Norman Ginsbury, 1962; as The Pillars of the Community, translated by Una Ellis-Fermor, in Three Plays, 1950.
- Et dukkehjem* (produced 1879). 1879; as Nora, translated by T. Weber, 1880; also translated by Henrietta Frances Lord, 1882; as A Doll's House, translated by William Archer, 1889; also translated by Norman Ginsbury, 1904; R. Farquharson-Sharp, with The Wild Duck and The Lady From the Sea, 1910; Norman Ginsbury, 1950; Peter Watts, with The League of Youth and The Lady From the Sea, 1965; Rolf Fjelde, in Four Major Plays, 1965; James W. McFarlane, in Four Major Plays, 1981; Frank McGuinness, from a literal translation by Charlotte Barslund, 1996; translated by Nicholas Rudall, 1999.
- Gengangere* (produced 1881). 1881; as Ghosts, translated by William Archer, in The Pillars of Society and Other Plays, 1888; also translated by Henrietta Frances Lord, 1890; R. Farquharson-Sharp, with The Warriors at Helgeland and An Enemy of the People, 1911; Norman Ginsbury, 1938; Bjorn Koefoed, 1950; Peter Watts, with A Public Enemy and When We Dead Wake, 1964; Michael Meyer, 1970; James W. McFarlane, in Four Major Plays, 1981; Christopher Hampton, 1983; Nicholas Rudall, 1990.
- En folkefiende* (produced 1883). 1882; as An Enemy of Society, translated by Eleanor Marx-Aveling, in The Pillars of Society and Other Plays, 1888; as An Enemy of the People, translated by R. Farquharson-Sharp, with Ghosts and The Warriors at Helgeland, 1911; Norman Ginsbury, 1939; Lars Nordenson, adapted by Arthur Miller, 1951; James W. McFarlane, with The Wild Duck and Rosmersholm, 1960; Inger Lignell, adapted by Henry S. Taylor, 1960; Michael Meyer, 1970; as A Public Enemy, translated by Peter Watts, with Ghosts and When We Dead Wake, 1964; as An Enemy of the People, adapted by Max Faber, 1967; adapted by Christopher Hampton, 1997.
- Vildanden* (produced 1885). 1884; as The Wild Duck, translated by Frances E. Archer, in Prose Dramas, 1890; also translated by R. Farquharson-Sharp, with A Doll's House and The Lady From the Sea, 1910; William Archer, in Four Plays, 1941; Una Ellis-Fermor, in Three Plays, 1950; James W. McFarlane, with Enemy of the People and Rosmersholm, 1960; Rolf Fjelde, in Four Major Plays, 1965; Michael Meyer, 1970; Inga-Stina Ewbank and Peter Hall, with John Gabriel Borkman, 1975; Dounia Christiani, 1980; Christopher Hampton, 1980; adapted by Max Faber, 1958; adapted by Robert Brustein, 1997.
- Rosmersholm* (produced 1887). 1886; as Rosmersholm, translated by L.N. Parker, 1889; also translated by M. Carmichael, in Prose Dramas, 1890; R. Farquharson-Sharp, with The Pretenders and The Pillars of Society, 1913; Una Ellis-Fermor, in The Master Builder and Other Plays, 1958; James W. McFarlane, with Enemy of the People and The Wild Duck, 1960; Norman Ginsbury, 1961; Ann Jellicoe, 1961; Arvid Paulson, in Last Plays, 1962; D. Rudkin, with When We Dead Awaken, 1990; as The House of Rosmer, adapted by Brian J. Burton, 1959.
- The Pillars of Society and Other Plays* (includes The Pillars of Society; Ghosts; An Enemy of Society), edited by Havelock Ellis, translated by William Archer and Eleanor Marx-Aveling. 1888.
- Fruen fra havet* (produced 1889). 1888; as The Lady from the Sea, translated by Eleanor Marx-Aveling, 1890; also translated by Frances E. Archer, in Prose Dramas, 1890; Peter Watts, with The League of Youth and A Doll's House, 1965; James W. McFarlane, 1977.
- Prose Dramas*, edited by Edmund Gosse. 5 vols., 1890.
- Hedda Gabler* (produced 1891). 1890; as Hedda Gabler, translated by William Archer, in Prose Dramas, 1890; also translated by Edmund Gosse, 1891; Una Ellis-Fermor, in Three Plays, 1950; Eva Le Gallienne, 1953; Arvid Paulson, in Last Plays, 1962; Rolf Fjelde, in Four Major Plays, 1965; Michael Meyer, 1970; Christopher Hampton, 1972; Jens Arup, in Four Major Plays, 1981; Nicholas Rudall, 1992; adapted by John Osborne, 1972, and with Strindberg's The Father, 1989; adapted by Jon Robin Baitz, from a translation by Anne-Charlotte Hanes Harvey, 2000.
- Bygmester Solness* (produced 1893). 1892; as The Master Builder, translated by J.W. Arctander, 1893; also translated by Edmund Gosse and William Archer, 1893; Eva Le Gallienne, 1955; Una Ellis-Fermor, in The Master Builder and Other Plays, 1958; Arvid Paulson, in Last Plays, 1962; Rolf Fjelde, in Four Major Plays, 1965; Michael Meyer, 1968; James W. McFarlane, in Four Major Plays, 1981; also translated by Nicholas Rudall, 1994.
- Lille Eyolf* (produced 1895). 1894; as Little Eyolf, translated by William Archer, 1895; also translated by Henry L. Mencken, 1909; Una Ellis-Fermor, in The Master Builder and Other Plays, 1958; James W. McFarlane, 1977.
- John Gabriel Borkman* (produced 1897). 1896; as John Gabriel Borkman, translated by William Archer, 1897; also translated by Una Ellis-Fermor, in The Master Builder and Other Plays, 1958; Norman Ginsbury, 1960; Arvid Paulson, in Last Plays, 1962; Inga-Stina Ewbank and Peter Hall, with The Wild Duck, 1975; Nicholas Wright, from a translation by Charlotte Barslund, 1996.

Når vi døde vågner (produced 1900). 1899; edited by Robert Brustein, 1992; as When We Dead Awaken, translated by William Archer, 1900; also translated by Arvid Paulson, in Last Plays, 1962; James W. McFarlane, 1977; D. Rudkin, with Rosmersholm, 1990; as When We Dead Wake, translated by Peter Watts, with Ghosts and A Public Enemy, 1964.

Prose Dramas (includes The League of Youth; The Pillars of Society; A Doll's House; Ghosts; An Enemy of the People), revised edition, edited by William Archer, translated by Archer and Eleanor Marx-Aveling (reprinted from The Pillars of Society and Other Plays, 1888, and Prose Dramas, 5 vols., 1890). 5 vols., 1900–01.

A Doll's House; The Wild Duck; The Lady from the Sea, translated by R. Farquharson-Sharp and Eleanor Marx-Aveling. 1910.

The Warriors at Helgeland; Ghosts; An Enemy of the People, translated by R. Farquharson-Sharp. 1911.

The Pretenders; The Pillars of Society; Rosmersholm, translated by R. Farquharson-Sharp. 1913.

Prose Dramas (includes Rosmersholm; A Doll's House; The Lady from the Sea). 1913.

Lady Inger of Ostraat; Love's Comedy; The League of Youth, translated by R. Farquharson-Sharp. 1915.

Early Plays (includes Cataline; The Warrior's Barrow; Olaf Liljekrans), translated by Anders Orbeck. 1921.

Four Plays (includes A Doll's House; Ghosts; The Wild Duck; The Master Builder), translated by William Archer. 1941.

Three Plays (includes Hedda Gabler; The Wild Duck; The Pillars of the Community), translated by Una Ellis-Fermor. 1950; as Hedda Gabler and Other Plays, 1963.

Seven Famous Plays, edited by William Archer and others. 1950.

The Master Builder and Other Plays (includes The Master Builder; Rosmersholm; Little Eyolf; John Gabriel Borkman), translated by Una Ellis-Fermor. 1958.

An Enemy of the People; Rosmersholm; The Wild Duck, translated by James W. McFarlane. 1960.

Last Plays (includes Rosmersholm; Hedda Gabler; The Master Builder; John Gabriel Borkman; When We Dead Awaken), translated by Arvid Paulson. 1962.

Ghosts; A Public Enemy; When We Dead Wake, translated by Peter Watts. 1964.

The League of Youth; A Doll's House; The Lady from the Sea, translated by Peter Watts. 1965.

Four Major Plays (includes A Doll's House; The Wild Duck; Hedda Gabler; The Master Builder), translated by Rolf Fjelde. 1965.

Ghosts; An Enemy of the People; Wild Duck; Hedda Gabler, translated by Michael Meyer. 1970.

Four Major Plays (includes A Doll's House; Ghosts; The Master Builder; Hedda Gabler), translated by James W. McFarlane and Jens Arup. 1981.

Verse

Digte [Verse]. 1871; enlarged edition, 1875.

Lyrical Poems, translated by R.A. Streatfeild. 1902.

På vidderne, as On the Heights, translated by William Norman Guthrie. 1910.

Lyrics and Poems, translated by F.E. Garrett. 1912.

Terje Viken, translated by M. Michelet and G.R. Vowles. 1918.

Poems, translated by John Northam. 1986.

Poems, translated by Brian Sourbut. 1993.

Other

Samlede verker [Collected Works]. 10 vols., 1898–1902.

Correspondence, edited and translated by Mary Morison. 1905.

Episke Brand (fragment), edited by Karl Larsen. 1907.

Speeches and New Letters, edited by Lee M. Hollander, translated by Arne Kildal. 1911, reprinted 1982.

Letters and Speeches, edited by Evert Sprinchorn, translated by Sprinchorn and others. 1965.

Brevveksling med Christiania Theater 1878–1899 (letters), edited by Øyvind Anker. 1965.

Brev 1845–1905 (letters), edited by Øyvind Anker. 1979.

*

Bibliography: Henrik Ibsen: A Bibliography of Criticism and Biography, with an Index to Characters by Ina Ten Eyck Firkins, 1921; Ibsen 1828–1928 by H. Pettersen, 1928; Ibsen Årbok [Ibsen Yearbook] (later Contemporary Approaches to Ibsen), 195–; Ibsen Bibliography 1928–1957 by I. Telford, 1961.

Critical Studies: Henrik Ibsen: A Critical Biography by Henrik B. Jaeger, translated by W.M. Payne 1901; Henrik Ibsen: Plays and Problems by Otto Heller, 1912; Henrik Ibsen: Poet, Mystic and Moralizer by Henry Rose, 1913; The Quintessence of Ibsenism by G.B. Shaw, revised edition, 1913; Ibsen and His Creation by Janko Lavrin, 1921; Henrik Ibsen: A Critical Study by Richard E. Roberts, 1922; The Modern Ibsen by H.J. Weigand, 1925; Henrik Ibsen: An Introduction to His Life and Works by Paul H. Grummann, 1928; Ibsen and the Actress by Elizabeth Robins, 1928; Henrik Ibsen: A Study in Art and Personality by Theodore Jorgenson, 1945; Ibsen the Norwegian by M.C. Bradbrook, 1946, revised edition, 1966; Ibsen: The Intellectual Background, 1946, and A Study of Six Plays by Ibsen, 1950, both by Brian W. Downs; Ibsen's Dramatic Technique by P.F.D. Tennant, 1948; Ibsen's Dramatic Method, 1952, and Ibsen: A Critical Study, 1973, both by John Northam; Ibsen: The Man and the Dramatist by F. Bull, 1954; Ibsen and the Temper of Norwegian Literature, 1960, and Ibsen and Meaning: Studies, Essays and Prefaces 1953–87, 1987, both by James McFarlane, and Ibsen: A Critical Anthology, 1970, and The Cambridge Companion to Ibsen, 1994, both edited by McFarlane; Henrik Ibsen by G. Wilson Knight, 1962; The Drama of Ibsen and Strindberg by F.L. Lucas, 1962; Henrik Ibsen: A Collection of Critical Essays edited by Rolf Fjelde, 1965; Notes on Ibsen's "Doll's House" and "Hedda Gabler," 1965, and Notes on Ibsen's "Ghosts," "Enemy of the People" and "The Wild Duck," 1965, both by Marianne Sturman; Henrik Ibsen (biography), 3 vols., 1967–71, condensed single vol., 1974, Ibsen on File, 1985, and Ibsen, 1990, all by Michael Meyer; Mythic Patterns in Ibsen's Last Plays by O.I. Holtan, 1970; The Life of Ibsen by H. Koht, 1971; Ibsen: The Critical Heritage edited by Michael Egan, 1972; Cataline's Dream: An Essay on Ibsen's Plays by J. Hurt, 1972; Henrik Ibsen: The Divided Consciousness by Charles R. Lyons, 1972, and Critical Essays on Henrik Ibsen edited by Lyons, 1987; Women in the Plays of Henrik Ibsen by Clela Allphin, 1975; Ibsen's Feminine Mystique by Vincent J. Balice, 1975; The Ibsen Cycle: The Design of the Plays from "Pillars of Society" to "When We Dead Awaken," 1975, revised 1992, To the Third Empire: Ibsen's Early Drama, 1980, and Text and Supertext in Ibsen's Drama, 1989, all by Brian Johnston; Ibsen by Harold Clurman, 1977; The Real Drama of Henrik Ibsen? by Arne Duve, 1977; Ibsen: A Dissenting View by Ronald Gray, 1977; Ibsen: The Man and His Work, 1978, and Henrik Ibsen, 1980, both by Edvard Beyer; Ibsen the Romantic: Analogues of Paradise in the Later Plays by Errol Durbach, 1978, and Ibsen and the Theatre: Essays in Celebration of the 150th Anniversary of Henrik Ibsen's Birth edited by Durbach, 1980; Ibsen's Drama: Author to Audience by E. Haugen, 1979; A Doll's House: Notes by Bruce King, 1980; Henrik Ibsen's Aesthetic and Dramatic Art by J.E. Tammany, 1980; Patterns in Ibsen's Middle Plays by Richard Hornby, 1981; Notes on Ibsen's "Doll's House" edited by A. Norman Jeffares and Suheil Badi Bushrui, 1981; Ghosts: Notes by Adele King, 1981; Ibsen: The Open Vision by John Chamberlain, 1982; Ibsen Studies by Peter J. Eikeland, 1982; Ibsen: Four Essays edited by Angel Flores, 1982; Hedda Gabler: Notes by Helena Forsås-Scott, 1983; Henrik Ibsen by David Thomas, 1983; William Archer on Ibsen: The Major Essays 1889–19 by William Archer, edited by Thomas Postlethwait, 1984; An Ibsen Companion: A Dictionary Guide to the Life, Works and Critical Reception of Henrik Ibsen by G.B. Bryan, 1984; Ibsen and Shaw by Keith M. May, 1985; Henrik Ibsen: Life, Work and Criticism by Yvonne Shafer, 1985; Ibsen and the English Stage by Gretchen P. Ackerman, 1987; China's Ibsen: From Ibsenism by Elisabeth Eide, 1987; Ibsen in America: A Century of Change by Robert A. Schanke, 1988; Peer Gynt and Ghosts by Asbjørn Aarseth, 1989; Ibsen's Lively Art: A Performance Study of the Major Plays by Frederick J. and Lise-Lone Marker, 1989; Time's Disinherited Children: Childhood, Regression and Sacrifice in the Plays of Henrik Ibsen by Robin Young, 1989; Ibsen's Heroines by Lou Andreas-Salome, translated by S. Mandel, 1990; Ibsen and the Great World by Naomi Lebowitz, 1990; Divine Madness and the Absurd Paradox: Ibsen's "Peer Gynt" and the Philosophy of Kierkegaard by Bruce G. Shapiro, 1990; Ibsen's Forsaken Merman: Folklore in the Late Plays by Per Schelde Jacobsen and Barbara Fass Leavy, 1991; Ibsen: A Doll's House by Egil Törnqvist, 1995; Ibsen and the Greeks: The Classical Greek Dimension in Selected Works of Henrik Ibsen as Mediated by German and Scandinavian Culture by Norman Rhodes, 1995; Henrik Ibsen: A New Biography by Robert Ferguson, 1996; Ibsen's Drama: Right Action and Tragic Joy by Theoharis Constantine Theoharis, 1996; Ibsen's Women by Joan Templeton, 1997; Ibsen and Early Modernist Theatre, 1890–1900 by Kirsten Shepherd-Barr, 1997; Theatrical and Narrative Space: Studies in Ibsen, Strindberg and J.P. Jacobsen by Erik Østerud, 1998; On Ibsen by James Joyce, edited by Dennis Phillips, 1999; Stella Adler on Ibsen, Strindberg, and Chekhov by Stella Adler, edited by Barry Paris, 1999; Ibsen: The Dramaturgy of Fear by Michael Goldman, 1999.

* * *

“Anyone who wants to understand me must know Norway,” Henrik Ibsen once remarked. This most European of Norwegian dramatists, still played regularly to packed houses the world over, often to theater-goers ignorant of his nationality, insisted upon the importance of his national heritage. There was much about Norway which irritated and depressed him—to such an extent that he spent 27 of his most creative years (1864–91) abroad, in Italy and Germany—yet his plays, almost without exception, are set in the land he had rejected. Trolls and hobgoblins, Viking legends, brooding fjord landscapes and deep sunless valleys, snow and ice and extreme cold and light, hectic summer nights—these permeate the lives and form the personalities of the characters in his plays.

Yet even before he left Norway, Ibsen was well versed in the European theatrical tradition. After an inauspicious and poverty-stricken beginning, he was appointed theatre director in Bergen (1851–57), then Christiania (now Oslo, 1857–62). The European stage at this period was dominated by French salon comedies, the “well-made play” written by dramatists such as Eugène Scribe; and it was largely these which Ibsen directed.

Most of Ibsen's early works are historical dramas, often in verse, which combine tales of Norway's heroic, half-legendary past with the techniques of Scribean drama: a complicated intrigue, involving convoluted misunderstanding and mistaken identity, and a neat tying-off of ends in conclusion—as in, for example, Fru Inger til Østråt (Lady Inger of Östråt) and Gildet på Solhaug (The Feast at Solhaug). They are lofty in style, with a tendency to melodrama; it was not until Ibsen turned to depiction of contemporary society in colloquial modern prose that he found his natural medium.

Before that, however, he had written the two vast and sprawling verse dramas Brand and Peer Gynt. They were “reading dramas,” not intended for the stage, and could not be staged realistically; they required not only an enormous cast but (for Brand) whole mountain ranges, storms, and avalanches, and (for Peer Gynt) a removal across several continents, a shipwreck, and a multitude of supernatural and monstrous creatures. It was not until Ibsen had achieved success with his prose dramas that they were accepted into theatre repertoires. Nowadays, however, they are among the most frequently performed of the plays.

At the centre of each play is a loner, a man ostracized by his fellow men. Brand is a fanatical priest who demands unquestioning submission to his stern Jehovah, and destroys his family and finally himself in his obsessive devotion to his call. Peer Gynt is his antithesis, a man who stands for nothing, taking the line of least resistance throughout his life; yet both die equally unsure that they have achieved anything.

This pattern of antitheses—exposing the deficiencies of one extreme standpoint in one play and then those of its polar opposite in another—was to repeat itself in many of Ibsen's later plays. Ibsen's protagonists feel driven to take a stand: the lofty claims of the ideal clash with the more sordid compromise of the real, the egotistical drive for success and fame with the gentler values of love and friendship.

It was with the “social” dramas of his next period, from Samfundets støtter (The Pillars of Society) to Vildanden (The Wild Duck), that Ibsen won an international reputation and established himself as a European dramatist. Initially the success was often one of scandal rather than acclaim; for Ibsen wrote about such subjects, and in such a way, that polite society was outraged. The slamming of the door at the end of Et dukkehjem (A Doll's House), which announces Nora's abandonment of husband and children, and her determination to find self-fulfilment on her own terms, aroused furious condemnation. Gengangere (Ghosts), with its frank treatment of debauchery, illegitimacy, and syphilis, was banned and reviled. “An open drain,” the Daily Telegraph called it. Posterity, however, has discovered that it was neither lubricity nor frankness which was the truly revolutionary aspect of these plays; it was rather Ibsen's determination to challenge social convention and hypocrisy, which barred the way to individual self-realization.

Ibsen read few books, but he did read newspapers, and his reading is reflected not only in his involvement in contemporary debates but in the language and style of his plays. His actors were not required to strike heroic poses and indulge in elevated conceits, but to talk to each other in the contemporary language of everyday life. Acting traditions had to change before Ibsen's ideas could be realized.

From 1877 Ibsen's plays are entirely in prose, and the centre of interest narrows to a small group of people, frequently a family within the four walls of their home, a refuge which grows more and more like a prison as the conflict intensifies. The mainspring of the action is often the revelation of a guilty secret, a past misdeed which returns to haunt the present and disrupt the fragile security which has been erected over its concealment. The end is often death or despair (Ghosts, The Wild Duck, Rosmersholm); with the relentlessness of Greek tragedy, the characters are doomed by their own acts even as they struggle to escape. It is but rarely that they find the strength to take charge of their own fates, as in Fruen fra havet (The Lady from the Sea), where understanding and tolerance break the vicious spiral of mutual destructiveness.

Ibsen's late plays puzzled critics and audiences; they found them obscure and disturbing. In the 1890s he began to depart from the familiar realistic form and to move towards a more experimental, modernistic drama. Complex images or symbols dominate the play, like the tower in Bygmester Solness (The Master Builder) or the iron mountains in John Gabriel Borkman; strange, surreal characters appear; the protagonists are groping uncertainly for the meaning of life. In Ibsen's last play, Når vi døde vågner (When We Dead Awaken), the artist and his muse disappear into the apocalypse hand in hand.

Ibsen wrote not just in one dramatic form but in many. There are few European dramatists since his day who do not owe something to his tightly controlled form and his sense of theatre.

—Janet Garton

See the essays on Brand, A Doll's House, Ghosts, Hedda Gabler, The Master Builder, Peer Gynt, and The Wild Duck.

IBUSE Masuji

Born: Kamo, Hiroshima Prefecture, Japan, 15 February 1898. Education: Tutored and intellectually mentored by his maternal grandfather from early childhood through adolescence; attended a prestigious and strongly traditional high school in Fukuyama; studied French literature at Waseda University in Tokyo, 1917–22; briefly studied painting at the Japanese School of Arts in Tokyo, 1921–22. Military Service: Drafted into Imperial Army, 22 November 1941; served as war correspondent in Malaya until November 1942. Family: Married Setsuyo Akimoto, 1927. Career: Grew up as a member of a moderately wealthy land-owning family; associated himself during and immediately after his time at Waseda with literary figures such as Hōmei Iwano, Seiji Tanizaki, and Kōtarō Tanaka; later became a close literary mentor to the writer Osamu Dazai; worked professionally as a writer throughout his life, often through associations with “group journals” (dōjin zasshi) such as Seiki, Bungei toshi, and Sakuhin. Awards: Naoki prize for popular literature by a rising author, 1938; Yomiuri prize for fiction, 1949; Art Academy prize, 1955; Noma prize for literature, 1966; Order of Cultural Merit, 1966. Died: 10 July 1993.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Ibuse Masuji zenshū [Collected Works]. 14 vols., 1965–74.

Ibuse Masuji jisen zenshū [Author-Selected Collected Works]. 13 vols., 1985–86.

Short Stories

- “Yūhei.” 1923.
 “Yofuke to ume no hana.” 1925; as “Plum Blossom by Night,” translated by John Bester, in Lieutenant Lookeast and Other Stories, 1971; and in Salamander and Other Stories, 1981.
 “Koi.” 1926; as “Carp,” translated by John Bester, in Lieutenant Lookeast and Other Stories, 1971; and in Salamander and Other Stories, 1981.
 “Sanshōuo.” 1929; as “The Salamander,” translated by Tadao Katayama, 1956; and also translated by Leon Zolbrod, 1964; as “Salamander,” translated by Sadamichi Yokoo and Sanford Goldstein, 1966; and also translated by John Bester, in Lieutenant Lookeast and Other Stories, 1971; and in Salamander and Other Stories, 1981.
 “Yane no ue no Sawan.” 1929; as “Sawan on the Roof,” translated by Yokuchi Miyamoto with Frederick Will, 1966; and also translated by John Bester, in Lieutenant Lookeast and Other Stories, 1971; and in Salamander and Other Stories, 1981; as “Sawan on the Rooftop,” translated by Tadao Katayama, 1967.
 “Kuchisuke no iru tanima.” 1929; as “Kuchisuke’s Valley,” translated by John Whittier Treat, in The Showa Anthology, edited by Van C. Gessel and Tomone Matsumoto, 1985.
 “Tange-shi-tei.” 1931; as “At Mr. Tange’s,” translated by Sadamichi Yokoo and Sanford Goldstein, 1969; as “Life at Mr. Tange’s,” translated by John Bester, in Lieutenant Lookeast and Other Stories, 1971; and in Salamander and Other Stories, 1981.
 “Shoga kottō no sainan.” 1933.
 “Aogashima taigaiki.” 1934.
 “Mujintō Chōhei.” 1936.
 “Chōhei no haka.” 1936.
 “Yama o mite rōjin no kataru.” 1939.
 “Tajinko-mura hoi.” 1940.
 “Okī Beppu-mura no Morikichi.” 1941.
 “Gojinka.” 1943.
 “Kane kuyō no hi.” 1943.
 “Aru shōjo no senji nikki.” 1943.
 “Honjitsu kyūshin.” 1949; as “No Consulation Today,” translated by Edward Seidenstecker, 1964.
 “Kakitsubata.” 1951; as “The Crazy Iris,” translated by Ivan Morris, 1956, and reprinted in The Crazy Iris and Other Stories of the Atomic Aftermath, edited by Oe Kenzaburo, 1985.

Fiction

- Sazanami gunki* (novella). 1930–38; as Waves: A War Diary, translated by David Aylward and Anthony Liman, in Waves: Two Short Novels, 1986.
Kawa. 1932.
Shūkin ryokō. 1935–37.
Jon Manjirō hyōryūki (novella). 1937; as “John Manjiro, the Castaway: His Life and Adventures,” translated by Hisakazu Kaneko, 1940; as “John Manjiro: A Castaway’s Chronicle,” translated by David Aylward and Anthony Liman in Castaways: Two Short Novels, 1987.

Tajinko mura (novella). 1937; as “Tajinko Village,” translated by John Bester, in Lieutenant Lookeast and Other Stories, 1971; and in Salamander and Other Stories, 1981.

Hana no machi. 1943.

Wabisuke (novella). 1946; as Isle-on-the-Billows, translated by David Aylward and Anthony Liman, in Waves: Two Short Novels, 1986.

Hikkoshi-yatsure. 1947.

Kashima ari. 1948.

Yōhai taichō (novella). 1950; as “A Far-worshipping Commander,” translated by Glenn Shaw, 1954, and as “The Far-worshipping Commander,” in The Shadow of Sunrise, edited by Shoichi Sakei, 1966; as “Lieutenant Lookeast,” translated by John Bester, in Lieutenant Lookeast and Other Stories, 1971, and in Salamander and Other Stories, 1981.

Karusan yashiki. 1953.

Hyōmīn Usaburō. 1954–55.

Ekimae ryokan. 1956–57.

Chimpindō shujin. 1959.

Bushū Hachigata-jō. 1961–62.

Kuroi ame. 1966; as Black Rain, translated by John Bester, 1966, 1969.

Tomonotsu chakaiki. 1983–1985.

Other

Zuihitsu (essays). 1933.

Keirokushū (memoir). 1936.

Jōkyō chokugo (memoir). 1936.

Kame (memoir). 1939.

Yama ya nodo (essays and sketches). 1941.

Shonan nikki (war diary). 1942.

Nankō Taigaiki (war diary). 1943.

Kawatsuri (stories and essays on fishing). 1952.

Nanatsu no kaidō (travel essays). 1952–57.

Tsurishi; Tsuriba (essays on fishing). 1960.

Hanseiki (memoir). 1970.

Tsuribito (essays on fishing). 1970.

Waseda no mori (memoir). 1971.

Chōyōchū no koto (memoir). 1977–80.

Umi-agari (essays). 1980–81.

Ogikubo fudoki (memoir). 1981–82.

Dazai Osamu (biography), 1989.

Translator, Robinson hyoryuki, by Daniel Defoe. 1961.

Translator, Doritoru-sensei monogatari zenshu by Hugh Lofting. 12 vols., 1961–62.

*

Bibliography: “Ibuse Masuji sankō bunken nempyō” by Terayoko Takeo, in Ibuse Masuji kenkyū, edited by Isogai Hideo, 1984; “Ibuse Masuji sankō bunken mokuroku” by Okoshi Kishichi, 1985; “Ibuse Masuji” by Anthony V. Liman, in Dictionary of Literary Biography (vol. 180), 1997.

Critical Studies: “Black Rain” by Robert J. Lifton, in Death in Life: Survivors of Hiroshima, 1967; “After the Bomb” by Arthur G. Kimball, in Crisis in Identity and Contemporary Japanese Novels, 1973; “Tradition and Contemporary Consciousness: Ibuse, Endo, Kaiko, Abe” by J. Thomas Rimer, in Modern Japanese Fictions and Its Traditions, 1978; Pools of Water, Pillars of Fire: The Literature of Ibuse Masuji by John Whittier Treat, 1988; A Critical Study of the Literary Style of Ibuse Masuji by Anthony V. Liman, 1992; “Ibuse Masuji: Nature, Nostalgia, Memory” by John Whittier Treat, in Writing Ground Zero: Japanese Literature and the Atomic Bomb, 1995.

* * *

Although his reputation outside Japan is still based chiefly on Kuroi ame (Black Rain), his novel about the atomic bombing of Hiroshima in 1945, Ibuse Masuji is without a doubt one of the most prolific and important Japanese writers of the 20th century. Ibuse’s career spanned more than six decades and his literary output included dozens of volumes of fiction, essays, memoirs, and poems written in a direct, evocative style that obscured many of the distinctions among these genres. Largely because he refused to ally himself too closely with any particular political or aesthetic movement, Ibuse’s voice was prominent not only during the post-Hiroshima era of reconstruction and recovery, but also during the tumultuous 1920s and 30s, when Japanese society alternated between the conservatism of traditional values and the radicalism of foreign ideas such as Marxism. In retrospect, Ibuse stands next among Akutagawa, Kawabata, Mishima, Murakami, Oe, and Tanizaki as one of the luminaries of contemporary Japanese literary culture.

Having studied literature—especially French, English, and Russian literature—in the midst of many of Japan’s most noteworthy scholars and writers during his years at Waseda University, Ibuse rapidly burst onto the literary scene in the 1920s with a series of short stories including “Koi” (“Carp”) and “Sanshōuo” (“The Salamander”). These tales not only reflect elements of traditional Japanese culture with which Ibuse was intimately familiar from his youth, but also show the early development of Ibuse’s uniquely perceptive narrative voice. Encouraged in his literary pursuits by his mentor and patron Kotaro Tanaka, Ibuse rapidly established himself by the early 1930s as a successful author. More than any other writer of his generation, Ibuse intermingled conventional Japanese literary themes and styles such as the sentimental watakushi shosetsu (“I-novel”) or naturalistic shaseibun (“nature-sketching” forms) with a distinctly modern perspective in creating works that maintain a clear link to cultural tradition and heritage without descending into chauvinism (as was often the case with writers such as Yukio Mishima).

Throughout his career as a writer, Ibuse took an interest in history. Influences on his work ranged from medieval Japanese epics, whose style he imitated in his first longer work of fiction Sazanami gunki (Waves: A War Diary), to his own experiences of being drafted during World War II as a correspondent for the Imperial Army. In essays like Nankō Taigaiki [“An Account of My Voyage South”] or in fiction like his novellas Wabisuke (Isle-on-the-Billows) and Yōhai taichō (“Lieutenant Lookeast”), Ibuse refuses to moralize openly about events he witnessed while observing the Malayan campaign that were often shocking and dismaying to him. Instead, he allows his keen eye for detail and his sensitivity to human suffering to convey his intentions. Some critics have accused Ibuse of being overly uncritical in refusing to criticize the Japanese tactics in Singapore, but Ibuse extended a similar lack of judgment to most of his subject matter.

Coupled with his abiding interest in literal or figurative hyōryūki (“castaways”), this objectivity toward historical reality laid the foundation for his masterpiece, Black Rain.

As the only one of Ibuse’s novels to have been translated into English, Black Rain stands out regardless of its subject matter. However, given that the atomic bombing of Hiroshima and Nagasaki had such a radical effect on the psyche of Japan as a whole—as well as that of individual hibakusha (survivors; literally “the burned”)—Ibuse’s 1966 novel represented an important new perspective on the reality of atomic weapons at a time when the nuclear tensions of the Cuban Missile Crisis were still a relatively recent memory for the entire world.

As was the case with many of his prior works, Ibuse thoroughly researched the details of the novel. Ibuse himself had been thirty miles away in the village of Kamo during the bombing, but not near enough to have experienced it first-hand. Black Rain is based on a number of documentary sources, including eyewitness accounts of the bombing. Most important, though, was the journal of Shizuma Shigematsu, a survivor with whom Ibuse had regularly gone fishing in the immediate post-war years and whose story he would transform into that of his protagonist Shigematsu Shizuma. Ibuse indirectly depicts the events of 6 August 1945, setting his novel nearly five years after the bombing. Shigematsu, his wife Shigeko, and their niece Yasuko are still dealing with the lingering physical, psychological, and societal after-effects of the bombing, especially the “black rain” contaminated with radioactive dust-particles that fell in and around Hiroshima in the hours after the explosion.

Shigematsu has been excused from normal work because of his mild radiation sickness. However, since he is not visibly ill, he is embarrassed at being perceived to be shirking his rightful share of labor. He decides to begin raising carp to restock a local lake that has been devoid of fish since the bombing. Shigematsu is also trying to arrange a marriage for Yasuko, but a false rumor that she was in Hiroshima at the time of the bombing (and thus would likely both to become ill and be infertile) has frustrated his attempts. In responding to an inquiry from a potential suitor, Shigematsu copies out excerpts from his niece’s diary to dispel this rumor, but quickly realizes that her reminiscences of being soaked by the “black rain” will make her unmarriageable. He omits this passage and includes excerpts from his own journal instead. The remainder of the novel is made up of these excerpts, as well as pieces from other documents—e.g., an essay describing what survivors ate in Hiroshima, and a doctor’s memoirs of treating radiation sickness in the days after the bombing—that Ibuse adapted for his fictional purposes. The novel ends on an ambiguously hopeful note as Yasuko admits she has been suffering symptoms of radiation-induced illness and rapidly declines at the same time that Shigematsu’s carp pond begins to thrive.

Despite some mild protests that Ibuse’s somewhat distanced depiction of the bombing of Hiroshima lessened the horror of the event, critics almost immediately hailed Black Rain, and it garnered several of the most prestigious literary awards in Japan. Its reputation has hardly diminished with the passage of time—it has never been out of print in either Japanese or English and it was voted in 1987 as the most significant post-war Japanese novel in a poll of Japanese scholars. Although Ibuse’s output after the publication of Black Rain was mainly confined to collections of essays and memoirs, his status within Japanese literature has continued to grow, as demonstrated by the popularity of a thirteen-volume set of his works released in the mid-1980s. Ibuse was nominated for the Nobel prize several times in the late 1980s and 1990s and continues to be the subject of scholarship both in Japan and the West.

—Derek Maus

IDRIS, Yusuf

Born: al-Bayrum village, Sharqiyya province, Egypt, 19 May 1927. Education: Attended school in Faqus in Sharqiyya; Dameitta; al-Mansura in Daqahliyya; Zaqaziq in Sharqiyya; Qasr al-‘Ayni medical school, Cairo, 1945–51. Military Service: Secretary of the University Executive committee for armed combat, 1951. Family: Married; three children. Career: Physician, 1952; medical inspector in the poor section of Darb al-Ahmar district, Cairo; head of the literary department at Rosa al-Yusuf, al-Sha‘b, al-Masry, al-Jumhuriyya then al-Ahram newspaper, 1961–91. Awards: Hiwar International Literary prize (refused), 1965; Medal of the Republic, 1966. Died: 1 August 1991.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

- Al-‘Askary al-aswad*. 1962.
Al-Sayyida Viryinna. 1977.
In the Eye of the Beholder: Tales of Egyptian Life from the Writings of Yusuf Idris, edited by Roger Allen. 1978.
Rings of Burnished Brass, translated by Catherine Cobham. 1984.
Al-Qisas al-qisrah. 2 vols. 1990–91.
Three Egyptian Short Stories; translated with introduction by Saad El-Gabalawy. 1991.

Short Stories

- Arkhas al-layali*. 1954; as The Cheapest Nights and Other Stories, translated by Wadida Wassef, 1990.
Qissat Hubb in Jumhuriyyat Farahaat. 1956; as City of Love and Ashes, translated by R. Neil Hewison, 1999.
Alysa kadhaliqa [Isn’t It So]. 1957.
Al-Batal [The Hero]. 1957.
Hadithat sharaf [Matters of Honor]. 1959.
Akhir al-dunya [The End of the World]. 1961.
Qa‘ al-madina [City Dregs]. 1964.
Lughat al-ay ay [The Language of Pain]. 1965.
Al-Naddaha [The Siren]. 1969; as La Sirene, et autres nouvelles, translated by Luc Barbulesco and Phillipe Cardinal, 1986.
Mashuq al-hams. 1969.
Laylat sayf. 1970.
Bayt min lahm [House of Flesh]. 1971.
Ana sultan qanun al-wujud [I Am Sultan, the Law of Being]. 1980.
Jumhuriyyat Farahat [Farahat’s Republic]. 1981.
Uqtulha [Kill Her]. 1982.
Al-‘Atab ‘ala al-nazar [Sight Is to Blame]. 1987.
Abu al-rijal. 1988; as A Leader of Men, translated by Saad Elkhadem, 1988.

Plays

- Malik il-qutn* [Cotton's King]. 1963.
Al-Lahza al-hariga [Critical Moment]. 1958.
Al-Mahzala al-ardiyya [The Face of the World]. 1966.
Al-Bahlawan [The Clown]. 1963.
Al-Farafir [The Flip Flaps]. 1963–64.
Al-Mukhattatin [The Stripped Ones]. 1969.
Al-Jins al-thalith [The Third Sex]. 1971.
Al-Irada. 1985.

Novels

- Al-Haram* (produced 1965). 1959; as Sinners, translated by Kristin Peterson-Ishaq, 1984; as Le Tabou, translated into French by France M. Douvier, 1987.
Al-'Ayb (produced 1967). [The Shame] 1963.
Rijal wa thiran. [Men and Oxen] 1964.
Al-Bayda'. [The White Woman] 1970.
Iktishaf qara. 1972.
Bisaraha ghayr Mutlaqa. 1968.
Niyu Yurk. 1980.
Al-Ab al-gha'ib. 1987.

Essays

- Kitab nahwa masrah 'arabi*. 1974.
Mufakkirat doctor Yusuf Idris. 2 vols., 1977.
Bahth 'an al-Sadat. 1984.
Ahammiyyat an natathaqqaf ya nas. 1985.
Faqr al-fikr wa fikr al-faqr. 1985.
Intiba'at mustafizza. 1986.
Khulw al-bal. 1986.
'Azf munfarid. 1987.
Al-'Idz al-'arabi. 1989.
Islam bi-la difaf. 1989.
Madinat al-mala'ika. 1989.
Dhikrayat Yusuf Idris. 1991.
Yusuf Idris 'ala fawhat burkan. 1991.
Jabarti al-sittinat. N.d.

*

Critical Studies: Broken Idols: The Death of Religion as Reflected in Two Short Stories by Idris and Mahfouz by Mona Mikhail, 1974; Sex and Society in Yusuf Idris: Qa' al-Madina by Catherine Cobham, 1975; The Search for the Authentic Self within Idris's City by Mona Mikhail, 1977; Studies in the Short Fiction of Naguib Mahfouz and Yusuf Idris by Mona Mikhail, 1992; Yusuf Idris: Changing Vision by Dalya Cohen-Mor, 1992; Egyptian Drama and Social Change: A Study of Thematic and Artistic Development in Yusuf Idris's Plays by Dorota Rudnicka-Kassem, 1993; Critical Perspectives on Yusuf Idris, edited by Roger Allen, 1994; Critical Perspectives on Yusuf Idris by Issa J. Boullata, 1995; The Western Encounter in the Works of Yusuf Idris by Rasheed El-Eanny, 1997; The Short Stories of Yusuf Idris: A Modern Egyptian Author by P. M. Kurpershoek, 1997.

* * *

Yusuf Idris, though trained as a physician, was considered the greatest short story writer of the Arab world. He was the first Egyptian realist writer to break down the divide between fiction and reality, introducing new themes, atmospheres, and social groups into Arab fiction and drama. With vivid images of human interaction, he explored the psychology of the oppressed classes in both the village and the city and created narratives of social and political significance. He explored themes of love, politics, and changing social and moral values through stories of sexual relationships. For Idris, sex highlighted the hypocrisy in society, either by reinforcing the human comedy or by shifting events in the direction of tragedy. Idris' foremost accomplishment was his incorporation of the spoken language in the different dialogues of his characters. This incorporation of the spoken Arabic language heightened the sense of realism in creating a more truthful picture of characters' lives, traditions, failings, and virtues as they struggled against the restrictions of class in Egyptian society.

Idris's stylistic devices varied from realism and existentialism to absurdity, all in reaction to the changing political conditions of Egypt. This variation is demonstrated in the chronology of Idris's work. He began as a social realist in the 1950s, and his Marxist views led him to address contemporary problems and their impact upon Egyptian life. His themes during this early period included Egypt's transition from a feudal to a socialist society, the plight of the Egyptian lower classes, and issues of child labor, overpopulation, and migrant workers. The setting for most of Idris's early work was the Egyptian village or the urban slum areas of Cairo. The characters were mostly peasants and migrant villagers with whom many readers could identify. Idris's collection Arkhas al-layali (The Cheapest Night) depicted popular literature, Al-Batal (The Hero) portrayed patriotic sentiments of fighting the British occupation, Love Story (Qissat hubb) and Al-Bayda' [White Woman] weaved a narrative of Egyptians' defense of their country's independence and with love stories. Al-Haram (Sinners) addressed moral issues such as the permeation of corruption in the government and described the group psychology of two poor social groups, the unprivileged seasonal migrant workers and the villagers.

Idris examined social injustice and class struggle through the sexual relationships of his characters, especially the sexual relationships between people of different classes which highlighted the wide gap between public morality and private behavior. In the village, sexual relations are sanctioned within the marriage framework. The moral codes overlap and are at odds among classes. Predictably it is the affluent who can afford secrecy and successfully avoided punishment, a privilege not afforded to the working class. Generally, the glamour of the city suggests misfortunes. The poor, whose identities and lives change drastically in the city, struggle with varying standards of behavior that create confusion. For example, poverty and deprivation lead a police sergeant to fantasize and drive a servant woman to theft, immorality, and prostitution in Al-'Ayb (The Shame) and Qa' al-madina [City Dregs]. In Al-Naddaha [Sirens], the loss of innocence is a metaphor for the search for identity and freedom.

But Idris's vision later became absurd and surreal with an emphasis on the conflict between the vulnerable individual and the hostile or cruelly indifferent institution. His style became more economical, and the narrative mode became more experimental in its use of time and imagery, with the line between reality and dream often blurred. This change in the style developed from the degenerating political environment, the absence of freedom, and a desire to reconcile science and metaphysics. Abandoning his realist approach for this metaphysical style, Idris created new works that generated various responses, from support to rejection from his realist fans as well as those opposing the use of dialects in literature. His foremost absurdist work, Al-Farafir [The Flip Flaps], written during a time of great change and challenge in Egypt, caused a literary uproar for two weeks in 1964 before it was banned. The play marked him as the leader of the post-socialist rebellion. Fliplap, named after its protagonist, is a two-person dialogue between a master and a slave. The slave, Fliplap, imparts Idris's social, political, moral, and metaphysical ideas through allusions and symbols. Although the play is a political satire of the regime, its distinctiveness stems from the way it engages the audience to find alternative social and political positions that secure dignity, self-respect, liberty, and egalitarianism. Among the other themes discussed are marriage, birth, death, the structural hierarchy of society, and social injustice. In this play, Idris argues that the problem is originally cosmic.

The significance of Al-Farafir lies in Idris's experimental approach to breaking down the barriers between actors and audiences by adopting an indigenous form of popular drama, particularly the shadow plays, to modern theatre. Such settings, in Idris's opinion, heighten the collective experience in which actors and audiences engage in an interactive dialogue to reach a solution to problems. In his work Towards an Egyptian Theatre, Idris asserted the existence of theatrical roots in Egyptian folklore and called for the exploration of settings and themes different from the traditional ones in an effort to reach a wide audience. Critics, however, accredited his new form of theatre to the Western dramatic tradition of Brecht and Pirandello. Subsequently, Idris wrote a second political allegory Al-Mukhattatun [The Stripped Ones] that lashes out at the totalitarian, one-party State and discusses man's control over his destiny. His fantasy Al-Jins al-thalith [The Third Sex], on the other hand, did not receive much critical attention.

Idris's existentialist views are illustrated in his parabolic religious story ("A Table from the Sky" from the collection of Hadithat sharaf [Matters of Honor]), in which folklore and religious metaphors are weaved together to discuss the relationship between man and God and to suggest that the protagonist challenge those teachings. As in "The Language of Pain," living is, according to Idris, freeing oneself from the standard rules of society through experiencing pain. Idris assumed the role of a historian recording the social and political conditions during Naser's era in his work Jabarti of the Sixties, al-Jabarti being the great Egyptian historian of the 19th century.

Idris enriched literary life with numerous productions in drama, fiction, and critical studies and his work provides an incandescent mirror of the time through which he lived.

—Hanaa Kilany

IHARA Saikaku

Pseudonyms: Kakuei (until 1673), Saikaku, and Saihō (1688–1691). Born: Hirayama Tōgo, evidently the fifth son of a merchant household in a chōnin (townsman, merchant and artisan) quarter near Ōsaka castle, Ōsaka, Japan, 1642. Education: Probably went to a temple school. Family: Married a woman who was nine years his junior and an amateur poet (died at the age of 25); three daughters, one of whom was blind. Career: Served as an apprentice to a tabi (two-toed boots, and in this case probably of leather) maker in Uemachi (Ōsaka) at about nine or ten years old; began writing haikai at fifteen and was a teacher of haikai at twenty-one, under the penname Kakuei (eternal crane; used as his pen name until late 1673); he then adopted Saikaku (western crane), the name by which he is known, and Saihō (western phoenix; used 1688–91 when the use of the crane character was banned by the Tokugawa Shogunate); a successful merchant; shaved his head and began living a monk-like existence, perhaps affiliated with the Pure Land Sect, early 1675 (nearly all extant portraits are of him with a shaved head); lived in Yariyamachi just to the west of warrior residences surrounding Ōsaka castle, from about 1679 till late in life; part of the Danrin haikai group of Nishiyama Sōin, who Saikaku succeeded as group leader (an indication of the unorthodoxy of Saikaku and his group was that they were labeled by contemporaries "orandaryū," the Holland School); recited 23,500 verses in one day at Sumiyoshi Shrine, 1684. Saikaku would not be much read today if not for his turn toward prose in 1682. In the last years of his life he composed a number of works that are universally considered part of the Japanese canon; Saikaku's death verse, "ukiyo no tsuki / misugoshi ni keru / sue ninen," Peter Nosco clearly rendered, "The span of human life is destined to be fifty years, which is rather too long for a man such as I. Nevertheless, I was allowed to enjoy the sight of the moon of this world for two extra years." Died: 9 September 1693.

PUBLICATIONS

Fiction

- Kōshoku Ichidai Otoko*. 1682; as Life of an Amorous Man, translated by Kenji Hamada, 1964.
- Kōshoku Gonin Onna*. 1686; as Five Women Who Loved Love, translated by Wm. Theodore de Bary, 1956.
- Kōshoku Ichidai Onna*. 1686; as Life of an Amorous Woman, translated and edited by Ivan Morris, 1963.
- Nanshoku Ōkagami*. 1687; as Great Mirror of Male Love, translated with introduction by Paul Gordon, 1990.
- Budō Denraiki* [A Record of the Traditions of the Warrior's Way]. 1687.
- Nippon Eitai Kura*. 1688; as The Eternal Storehouse of Japan, The Japanese Family Storehouse, and The Millionaire's Gospel Modernised, translated by G. W. Sargent, 1959.
- Buke Giri Monogatari*. 1688; as Tales of Samuari Honor, translated by Caryl Ann Callahan, 1981.
- Seken Mune Sanyō*. 1692; as This Scheming World, translated by Masanori Takasuka and David C. Stubbs, 1965.
- Saikaku Oridome*. 1694; as The Last Fragments of Saikaku's Cloth or Some Final Words of Advice, translated by Peter Nosco, 1980.

*

Critical Studies: In the Shade of Spring Leaves by Robert Danly, 1981; Kindai Izen by Etō Jun, 1985; "Saikaku and Burlesque Fiction" by Howard Hibbett, in HJAS, vol. 20, 1957; The Floating World in Japanese Fiction, 1959; World within Walls by Donald Keene, 1976; "The Beginnings of the Modern Japanese Novel: Kanazōshi, 1600–1682" by Richard Lane, in HJAS, vol. 20, 1957; "Saikaku and the Modern Japanese Novel," in Japan's Modern Century, 1968; Japanese Thought in the Tokugawa Period by Tetsuo Najita, 1978;

Visions of Virtue in Tokugawa Japan, 1987; Saikaku Shinkō by Noma Kōshin, 1981; Saikaku Kenkyū Josetsu by Taniwaki Masachika, 1992; Saikaku Shinron by Teruoka Yasutaka, 1981.

* * *

Ihara Saikaku is one of a trio of esteemed writers of the Genroku cultural period (the others being Matsuo Bashō and Chikamatsu Monzaemon) who along with thinkers such as Ōgyū Sorai and Arai Hakuseki, contribute to making the Genroku cultural period among the richest in Japanese history. Tetsuo Najita views the Genroku as a period of idiosyncratic iconoclasts and Saikaku was one of the earliest in a long line. Clear evidence of this is the fact that Saikaku's most important haikai collections and poetic events were performed alone, when haikai was quintessentially a product of group composition. His 23,500 verses at Sumiyoshi Shrine in 1684 could only be tallied by scribes. Danrin poetics were dominated by humor, punning, parody, assonance, alliteration, and a quick tempo. Such compositional energy naturally led to narrative composition late in his life.

Saikaku's work is known in Japan today as a predecessor to the first novels, if not actually the first novels, either modern or realistic. Taking cues from Noma Kōshin and Teruoka Yasutaka, Keene and Lane discuss Kōshoku Ichidai Otoko (Life of an Amorous Man) as the culmination and transcendence of the kana-zōshi tradition (1600–1682). It is universally accepted as the start of the ukiyo-zōshi genre (1682–1783), which, at least in its beginnings, developed hand-in-hand with the ukiyo-e, floating world prints. It may also be observed that Saikaku's work, especially in its playfulness, must have exerted great influence on the writers of gesaku fiction and particularly the genres, sharebon, kibyōshi, and kokkeibon, which reveled in the punning and word play possibilities in the homophonic quality of Japanese. However, Saikaku's work was increasingly ignored until the "Saikaku revival" in the 1890s. Subsequently, Saikaku was co-opted in the Meiji period (1868–1912) as a pre-European influence novelist. The artificiality of this construction is attacked by Etō Jun, who is of the "merchant energy" school of Saikaku criticism, contending that the rediscovery of Saikaku was largely ideological. Lane contends that even while the Meiji period fascination with the European novel held sway, Saikaku's style attracted writers such as Ōzaki Kōyō (1867–1903), Kōda Rohan (1867–1947), Mori Ōgai (1862–1922), and Higuchi Ichiyō (1872–1896). There is some combination of style, erotic aestheticism, and subject matter which carries Saikaku's influence over into the late Edo and Meiji novel. However, the eroticism came under periods of censorship leaving style the main and sometimes only focus of literary studies of Saikaku's texts. Donald Keene's synopsis of the elements of Saikaku's style describes sentences frequently ending in nouns, grammatical particles, and subjects missing, plays on words, the elliptical omission of an implied conclusion, borrowings from classics, shifts from classical idiom to contemporary colloquial earthy descriptions, poetic phraseology, colloquial flavor, and an oral delivery. One could add the mixture of classical and colloquial styles, long sentences consisting of short phrases, and the predominance of imagery. Robert Danly writes in In the Shade of Spring Leaves that Saikaku's fiction consisted of "extended light-hearted sequences of episodes or separate stories, often short on plot and long on what smacks of free association, bound by a common theme and written in a highly elliptical style." Saikaku's narrative production includes a broad range of portraiture and subject matter.

Saikaku is most remembered for the kōshokubon (novels of sensuality) published between 1682 and 1687, and his portraits of merchant life published between 1688 and 1696. The most esteemed texts of the kōshokubon are Life of the Amorous Man, Kōshoku Gonin Onna (Five Women Who Loved Love), and Kōshoku Ichidai Onna (Life of an Amorous Woman). In Amorous Man the main character, Yonosuke, wanders Japan seeking the perfect courtesan. With Five Women, Saikaku's focus shifts to the themes of giri (duty) and ninjō (human emotion). The couples involved in all the short stories have to choose between love, such as marriages outside one's caste, and some form of filial duty to one's family or society, and all but one of these novellas ends in death. The Life of an Amorous Woman deals with the fortunes of a courtesan who writes her own confessional tale. This novel moves between celebration and lamentation within the framework of a parody of the confessional tale.

The second group of narratives is a miscellany of short stories mostly spanning 1685 to 1689 which often parody legends and satirize folk wisdom. These include Nanshoku Ōkagami (Great Mirror of Male Love), Budō Denraiki [A Record of the Traditions of the Warrior's Way], and Buke Giri Monogatari (Tales of Samurai Codes of Honor). All of these samurai stories while compassionate, leave one with the sense of the outmoded morality of the samurai class.

The final group of Saikaku narratives makes up a portrait of the merchant class. Nippon Eitai Kura (The Eternal Storehouse of Japan), Seken Mune Sanyō (This Scheming World), and Saikaku's Parting Gift are the collections of this group published before his death in 1693. In addition, Saikaku Oridome (Some Final Words of Advice) was published posthumously. These narratives are largely the source of the "realism" label in that they portray the details of the daily lives of the merchant class. This substantial narrative production earned Saikaku one of the highest positions in Japanese literary history.

Saikaku's oeuvre contains some treatment of virtually every sector of the society of his day. The close contact of his narratives especially with the plebeian history of his time has earned him the title of "realist," however, as a small number of critics have observed, objective description is not Saikaku's intent. Comparisons are often made to Boccaccio, Fielding, Rabelais, Balzac, Cervantes, and most often to Defoe—the combination of playfulness, descriptions of the rising bourgeoisie, depictions of lowlife, and emphasis on material life, go part way in explaining these comparisons. However, the centrality of parody, punning, hyperbole, and satirical observation puts Saikaku closer to Boccaccio, Rabelais, Cervantes, and the picaresque. Keene's states in World within Walls that beyond entertainment, Saikaku's intent "may have been to challenge the literature of the past." Nonetheless, to date only Teruoka and Johnson have centered studies on Saikaku's comedy.

—Jeffrey Johnson

ILLYÉS, Gyula

Born: Rácegrespuszta, Hungary, 2 November 1902. Education: Educated in Budapest, 1916–19; the Sorbonne, Paris, in the 1920s. Family: Married Flóra Kozmutza; one daughter. Career: Forced to leave Hungary in 1921 because of leftist activity; lived in Paris until 1926, then returned to Hungary; contributor from 1928 and editor, with Mihály Babits, 1937–41, Nyugat [West]; founding editor, Magyar Csillag [Hungarian Star], 1941–44; editor, Válasz [The Answer], 1946–48. Co-founder, 1939, and parliamentary representative from 1945, National Peasant Party. Vice-president, International PEN, from 1970. Awards: Baumgarten prize, four times in the 1930s; Kossuth prize, 1948, 1953, 1970; International grand prize for poetry, 1965. Commandeur, l'Ordre des Arts et des Lettres (France), 1974. Died: 14 April 1983.

PUBLICATIONS

Verse

Nehéz föld [Heavy Earth]. 1928.
Sarjürendek [Swaths of Hay]. 1931.
Három öreg [Three Old Men]. 1932.
Hősökről beszélek [I Speak of Heroes]. 1933.
Ifjúiség [Youth]. 1934.
Szálló egek alatt [Under a Moving Sky]. 1935.
Rend a romokban [Order Upon Ruins]. 1937.
Külön világban [In a Separate World]. 1939.
Összegyűjtött versei [Collected Poems]. 1940.
Válogatott versek [Selected Verse]. 1943.
Egy év [One Year]. 1945.
Összes versei [Complete Poems]. 3 vols., 1947.
Szembenézve [Face to Face]. 1947.
Tizenkét nap Bulgáriában [12 Days in Bulgaria]. 1947.
Két kéz [Two Hands]. 1950.
Válogatott versei [Selected Verses]. 1952.
Kézfogások [Handclasps]. 1956.
Új versek [New Poems]. 1961.
Nem volt elég. . . [It Was Not Enough. . .]. 1962.
Nyitott ajtó [Open Door]. 1963.
Dőlt vitorla [With Tilted Sail]. 1965.
Poharaim [My Cups]. 1967.
A Tribute to Gyula Illyés, edited by Thomas Kabdebo and Paul Tabori, various translators. 1968.
Fekete-fehér [Black-White]. 1968.
Kháron ladikján [In Charon's Boat]. 1969; as Charon's Ferry: Fifty Poems, translated with introduction by Bruce Berlind, 2000.
Selected Poems, edited by Thomas Kabdebo and Paul Tabori. 1971.
Abbahagyott versek [Unfinished Poems]. 1971.
Haza a magasban: Összegyűjtött versek 1920–1945 [Homeland in the Heights: Collected Poems]. 1972.
Teremteni: Összegyűjtött versek 1946–1968 [To Create: Collected Poems]. 1972.
Minden lehet: Új versek [Everything Is Possible: New Poems]. 1973.
Különös testamentum [A Strange Testament]. 1977.
Szemelt szőlő, válogatott versek, edited by Miklós Béládi. 1980.
Közügy [Public Matter]. 1981.
Konok kikelet [Stubborn Springtime]. 1981.
Mert szemben ülsz velem. 1982.
Táviratok. 1982.
A semmi közelít [The Approach of Nothingness]. 1983.
Szemben a támadással. összegyűjtött versek 1969–1981, edited by Miklós Borsos. 1984.
Menet a ködben. 1986.
What You Have Almost Forgotten: Selected Poems, edited with introduction by William Jay Smith. 1999.

Plays

A tűfoka [The Eye of the Needle]. 1944.
Lélekbúvár [The Psychiatrist]. 1948.
Tűz-víz [Fire-Water]. 1952; revised version. as Fáklyaláng [Torchbearers]. 1953.
Ozorai példa [The Example of Ozora]. 1952.
Tűvé-tevők [Turning the House Upside Down]. 1953.
Dózsa György [George Dózsa]. 1954.
Malom a Sédén [Mill on the Séd]. 1960.
Bolhabál [Flea Dance]. 1962.
Különc [The Eccentric]. 1963.
Kegyenc [The Minion], from a play by László Teleki. 1963.
Az éden elvesztése: Oratórium [The Loss of Eden: An Oratorio]. 1967.
Drámák [Plays]. 2 vols., 1969.
Tiszták [The Pure Ones]. 1969.
Testvérek [Brothers]. 1972.
Bál a pusztán; Bölcsék a fán [Ball at the Ranch; Wise Men on the Tree]. 1972.
Újabb drámák [More Recent Plays]. 1974.
Dániel az övéi közt [Daniel among His Own People]. 1976.
Sorsválasztók. 1982.
Csak az igazat. 1983.

Fiction

Puszták népe. 1936; as People of the Puszta, translated by G.F. Cushing. 1967.
Kora tavasz [Early Spring]. 1941.
Húnok Párizsban [Huns in Paris]. 1946.
Két férfi [Two Men]. 1950.

Other

Oroszország [Russia]. 1934.
Petőfi (biography). 1936; as Petőfi, edited by Joseph M. Értavy-Barráth, translated by Anton N. Nyerges, 1973.
Magyarok [Hungarians]. 1938.
Ki a magyar? [The Hungarian—Who Is He?]. 1939.
Lélek és kenyér [Soul and Bread], with Flora Kozmutza. 1939.
Csizma az asztalon [Boots on the Table]. 1941.
Mint a darvak [Like Cranes]. 1942.
Honfoglalók között [Among the New Masters]. 1945.
Franciaországi változások [Changes in France]. 1947.
Ebéd a kastélyban [Lunch in the Castle]. 1962.
Ingyen lakoma: Tanulmányok, vallomások [A Free Feast: Studies. Confessions]. 2 vols., 1964.
Munkái [Works]. 1969–.
Hajszálgyökerek [Capillary. Roots]. 1971.
Hét meg hét népmese (for children). 1975.
Matt the Gooseherd (for children), retold by Illyés, translated by Paul Tabori. 1976.
Itt élned kell [You Have to Live Here]. 1976.
Beatrice apródjai [The Pages of Beatrice]. 1978.
Szellem es erőszak. 1978.
Szulofolden. 1984.
A kolto felel (interviews), with Anna Foldes. 1986.
Naplőjegyzetek [Entries in a Diary]. 5 vols., 1986–91.

Editor. A francia irodalom kincsháza [The Treasure-House of French Literature]. 1942.

Editor. Once upon a Time: Forty Hungarian Folk-Tales, translated by Barna Balogh and Susan Kun. 1970.

*

Bibliography: A magyar irodalomtörténet bibliográfiája, 1905–1945 by Ferenc Botka and Kálmán Vargha, vol. 1, 1982.

Critical Studies: Az ismeretlen Illyés [The Unknown Illyés] by László Gara. 1965; ‘‘The Seventy Years of Illyés’’ by Miklós Béládi, in New Hungarian Quarterly 48, 1972; Illyés Gyula költői viláképe by József Izsák, 1982; ‘‘Gyula Illyés: An Appraisal’’ by George Gömöri, in World Literature Today, Summer 1984.

* * *

Gyula Illyés was a poet first and foremost, although he created works of importance in practically all literary genres. Born into a poor family on a manorial estate in western Hungary, he remained loyal to the cause of the underprivileged throughout his life, though in old age he was regarded by many as the most forceful literary representative of the whole Hungarian nation. His early poetry was influenced by French surrealism and the constructivism of Lajos Kassák but soon after his return to Hungary from Paris in 1926 he found his own distinctive voice. While in his epic poems he followed the traditions of popular realism, his lyrical verse was characterized by a supple syntax, admirable intellectual vigour, and sharp psychological introspection. In some pre-war poems such as ‘‘The Wonder Castle’’ Illyés foretold the collapse of the anachronistic social system of Hungary based on entrenched class privilege; to World War II he reacted with the lyrical diary Egy év [One Year] and with the rousing condemnation of the poem ‘‘It Did Not Help.’’ Among his post-war collections probably Kézfogások [Handclasps] and Dólt vitorla [With Tilted Sail] were the most accomplished. Outside Hungary he will be best remembered for the powerful ‘‘Egy mondat a zsarnokságról’’ (‘‘A Sentence for Tyranny’’), a long litany of unfreedom told through a succession of poetic metaphors including this stanza:

Where seek tyranny? Think again:
Everyone is a link in the chain;
Of tyranny’s stench you are not free:
You yourself are tyranny.

(translated by Vernon Watkins)

A Socialist since his youth, Illyés was bitterly disappointed at the unsocialist manner in which most communist regimes in central east Europe suppressed and forcibly tried to assimilate their Hungarian national minorities. His solidarity with fellow-Hungarians outside the borders of Hungary was expressed in a number of poems as well as essays; for example he wrote an introduction to Kálmán Janics’s book on the persecution of the Hungarian ethnic minority in Czechoslovakia after 1945. Illyés was a master of the essay and published several collections of essays before and after World War II, Hajszálgyökerek [Capillary Roots] being the most comprehensive. He also wrote two autobiographical novels as well as an objective though cautious travelogue about Soviet Russia (following his visit there in 1934), but his most memorable prose works were probably Puszták népe (People of the Puszta), which first focused attention on the semi-Asiatic living conditions of the Hungarian agrarian proletariat, and the short biography of the 19th-century revolutionary poet, Sándor Petőfi. The genuine radicalism and uncompromising character of Petőfi exerted a great attraction on the less passionate but no less committed Illyés; like Petőfi he also believed that a politically active literature can promote the democratization of society.

Illyés the playwright was particularly fertile in the 1950s and 1960s when he wrote a cycle of historical plays tackling national issues. Both Fáklyaláng [Torchbearers] and Ozorai példa [The Example of Ozora] are about events of the War of Independence which followed the Hungarian revolution of 1848. Later the character of László Teleki, a far-sighted but tragic political figure of the Kossuth emigration, captured Illyés’s imagination and he wrote Különc [The Eccentric] about him, while another play entitled Kegyenc [The Minion] is the adaptation of a play by Teleki on a Roman theme, showing that it is impossible to serve tyranny without being dehumanized in the process. Of Illyés’s later plays probably Tiszták [The Pure Ones] is the most interesting with its tale of moral conflict among the Cathar believers just before the fall of Monségur. By and large, Illyés’s comedies are less successful than his dramas, though even the best plays suffer from an overdose of noble rhetoric and from too much concentration on national issues.

Apart from Hungary where since 1956 his standing has been exceptionally high, Illyés was better known in France than anywhere else in Europe; many French poets translated his work, and he reciprocated by translating French poetry into Hungarian and editing in 1942 an excellent anthology A francia irodalom kincsháza [The Treasure-House of French Literature].

—George Gömöri

See the essay on ‘‘A Sentence for Tyranny.’’

IONESCO, Eugène

Born: Slatina, Romania, 26 November 1909 (13 November according to Orthodox calendar; some sources erroneously give 1912); grew up in France; returned to Romania to join father after parents’ divorce, 1922. Education: Educated at the lycée Sfântul-Sava, Bucharest; learned Romanian; lycée, Craiova, baccalauréat, 1928; studied French literature at the University of Bucharest, 1928–33, Capacitate (teaching diploma) 1934. Family: Married Rodica Burileanu in 1936; one daughter. Career: Taught French in Cernavodă and Bucharest 1936–38; moved to Paris, 1939; contributed to Viata Românească [Romanian Life], 1939, travelled to Paris, 1939; lived in Marseille during World War II; settled in Paris after its liberation, 1944; proofreader, Éditions Administratives, Paris, c. 1945, and subsequently full-time writer. Also an artist: exhibited artwork in Biarritz and the Galerie Mouf, Paris, 1970. Awards: Tours Festival prize, for film, 1959; Prix Italia, 1963; Society of Authors theatre prize (France), 1966; National Grand Prix for Theatre, 1969; Monaco Grand Prix, 1969; Austrian State prize for European literature, 1970; Jerusalem prize, 1973. Honorary doctorates: New York University, 1971, and the universities of Louvain, Warwick, Tel Aviv. Chevalier, Légion d’honneur, 1970. Member: Académie française, 1970. Died: 18 March 1994.

PUBLICATIONS

Collection

Théâtre complet, edited by Emmanuel Jacquart, 1991.

Plays

La Cantatrice chauve (produced 1950). In Théâtre I, 1954; as The Bald Prima Donna, translated by Donald Watson, in Plays I, 1958; as The Bald Soprano, translated by Donald M. Allen, in Four Plays, 1958.

La Leçon (produced 1951). In Théâtre I, 1954; as The Lesson, translated by Donald Watson, in Plays I, 1958; also translated by Donald M. Allen, in Four Plays, 1958; and with Rhinoceros and The Chairs, 1989.

Les Chaises (produced 1952). In Théâtre I, 1954; as The Chairs, translated by Donald Watson, in Plays I, 1958; also translated by Donald M. Allen, in Four Plays, 1958; and with Rhinoceros and The Lesson, 1989.

Sept petits sketches (includes Les Grandes Chaleurs; Le connaissez-vous?; Le Rhume onirique; La Jeune Fille à marier; Le Maître; La Nièce-Épouse; Le Salon de l'automobile) (produced 1953). La Jeune Fille à marier in Théâtre II, 1958, as Maid to Marry, translated by Donald Watson, in Plays III, 1960; Le Maître in Théâtre II, 1958, as The Leader, translated by Derek Prouse, in Plays IV, 1960; La Nièce-Épouse as The Niece-Wife, translated by Richard N. Coe, in Ionesco: A Study of His Plays, revised edition, 1971; Le Salon de l'automobile in Théâtre IV, 1966, as The Motor Show, translated by Donald Watson, in Plays V, 1963.

Victimes du devoir (produced 1953). In Theatre I, 1954; as Victims of Duty, translated by Donald Watson, in Plays II, 1958.

Théâtre I (includes La Cantatrice chauve; La Leçon; Jacques; ou, La Soumission; Les Chaises; Victimes du devoir; Amédée, ou, Comment s'en débarrasser). 1954.

Amédée; ou, Comment s'en débarrasser (produced 1954). In Théâtre I, 1954; as Amédée; or, How to Get Rid of It, translated by Donald Watson, in Plays II, 1958.

Jacques; ou, La Soumission (produced 1955). In Théâtre I, 1954; as Jacques, or Obedience, translated by Donald Watson, in Plays I, 1958; as Jack; or, The Submission, translated by Donald M. Allen, in Four Plays, 1958.

Le Nouveau Locataire (produced 1955). In Théâtre II, 1958; as The New Tenant, translated by Donald Watson, in Plays II, 1958.

Le Tableau (produced 1955). In Théâtre III, 1963; as The Picture, translated by Donald Watson, in Plays VII, 1968.

L'Impromptu de l'Alma; ou, Le Caméléon du berger (produced 1956). In Théâtre II, 1958; as Improvisation; or, The Shepherd's Chameleon, translated by Donald Watson, in Plays III, 1960.

L'Avenir est dans les oeufs; ou, Il faut de tout pour faire un monde (produced 1957). In Théâtre II, 1958; as The Future Is in Eggs; or, It Takes All Sorts to Make a World, translated by Donald Watson, in Plays IV, 1960.

Impromptu pour la Duchesse de Windsor (produced 1957). Plays I (includes The Chairs; The Bald Prima Donna; The Lesson; Jacques, or Obedience), translated by Donald Watson. 1958. Four Plays (includes The Bald Soprano; The Lesson; Jack; or, The Submission; The Chairs), translated by Donald M. Allen. 1958. Théâtre II (includes L'Impromptu de l'Alma, ou, Le Caméléon du berger; Tueur sans gages; Le Nouveau Locataire; L'Avenir est dans les oeufs, ou, Il faut de tout pour faire un monde; Le Maître; La Jeune Fille à marier). 1958.

Tueur sans gages (produced 1959). In Théâtre II, 1958; as The Killer, translated by Donald Watson, in Plays III, 1960.

Plays II (includes Amédée, or, How to Get Rid of It; The New Tenant; Victims of Duty) translated by Donald Watson. 1958.

Rhinocéros (produced 1959). In Théâtre III, 1963; as Rhinoceros, translated by Derek Prouse, in Plays IV, 1960.

Scène à quatre (produced 1959). In Théâtre III, 1963; as Foursome, translated by Donald Watson, in Plays V, 1963.

Apprendre à marcher (ballet scenario; produced 1960). In Théâtre IV, 1966; as Learning to Walk, translated by Donald Watson, in Plays IX, 1973.

Plays III (includes The Killer; Improvisation, or, The Shepherd's Chameleon; Maid to Marry), translated by Donald Watson. 1960.

Plays IV (includes Rhinoceros; The Leader; The Future Is in Eggs, or, It Takes All Sorts to Make a World), translated by Derek Prouse. 1960.

Rhinoceros; The Chairs; The Lesson, translated by Donald Watson. 1962.

Délire à deux (produced 1962). In Théâtre III, 1963; as Frenzy for Two, translated by Donald Watson, in Plays VI, 1965.

Le Roi se meurt (produced 1962). 1963; as Exit the King, translated by Donald Watson, in Plays V, 1963.

Le Piéton de l'air (produced 1962). In Théâtre III, 1963; as A Stroll in the Air, translated by Donald Watson, in Plays VI, 1965.

Théâtre III (includes Rhinocéros; Le Piéton de l'air; Délire à deux; Le Tableau; Scène à quatre; Les Salutations; La Colère). 1963.

Plays V (includes Exit the King; The Motor Show; Foursome), translated by Donald Watson. 1963.

Plays (includes The Chairs; The Killer; Maid to Marry), translated by Donald Watson. 1963.

Les Salutations (produced 1970). In Théâtre III, 1963; as Salutations, translated by Donald Watson, in Plays VII, 1968.

La Soif et la faim (produced 1964). In Théâtre IV, 1966; as Hunger and Thirst, translated by Donald Watson, in Plays VII, 1968.

La Lacune (produced 1965). In Théâtre IV, 1966.

Plays VI (includes A Stroll in the Air; Frenzy for Two), translated by Donald Watson. 1965.

Pour préparer un oeuf dur (produced 1966). In Théâtre IV, 1966.

Théâtre IV (includes Le Roi se meurt; La Soif et la faim; La Lacune; Le Salon de l'automobile; L'Oeuf dur; Pour préparer un oeuf dur; Le Jeune Homme à marier; Apprendre à marcher). 1966.

L'Oeuf dur, in Théâtre IV, 1966; as The Hard-Boiled Egg, translated by Donald Watson, in Plays X, 1976.

Leçons de français pour Américains (produced 1966). As Exercices de conversation et de diction françaises pour étudiants américains, in Théâtre V, 1974.

Plays VII (includes Hunger and Thirst; The Picture; Anger; Salutations), translated by Donald Watson. 1968.

Jeux de massacre (produced 1970). 1970; as Here Comes a Chopper, translated by Donald Watson, in Plays VIII, 1971; as Killing Game, translated by Helen Gary Bishop, 1974.

Plays VIII (includes Here Comes a Chopper; The Oversight; The Foot of the Wall), translated by Donald Watson. 1971.

The Duel (produced 1971). In Plays XI, translated by Clifford Williams, 1979.

Double Act (produced 1971). In Plays XI, translated by Clifford Williams, 1979.

Macbett (produced 1972). 1972; as Macbett, translated by Donald Watson, in Plays IX, 1973.

Plays IX (includes Macbett; The Mire; Learning to Walk), translated by Donald Watson. 1973.

Ce formidable bordel (produced 1973). 1973; as A Hell of a Mess, translated by Helen Gary Bishop, 1975; as Oh What a Bloody Circus, in Plays X, translated by Donald Watson, 1976.

La Vase. In Théâtre V, 1974.

Théâtre V (includes Jeux de massacre; Macbett; La Vase; Exercices de conversation et de diction françaises pour étudiants américains). 1974.

L'Homme aux valises (produced 1975). 1975; as Man with Bags, translated by Marie-France Ionesco and adapted by Israel Horowitz, 1977; as The Man with the Luggage, translated by Donald Watson, in Plays XI, 1979.

Plays X (includes Oh What a Bloody Circus; The Hard-Boiled Egg; with essay Ionesco and His Early English Critics by Donald Watson), translated by Donald Watson. 1976.

Plays XI (includes The Man with the Luggage; The Duel; Double Act; with essay Why Do I Write?), translated by Donald Watson and Clifford Williams. 1979.

Voyages chez les morts (as Voyages among the Dead, 1980; scenes produced, 1983). As Théâtre VIII (Voyages chez les morts: Thèmes et variations), 1981; as Plays XII (Journeys Among the Dead), translated by Barbara Wright, 1985.

Plays XII (includes Journeys Among the Dead), translated by Barbara Wright. 1985.

Screenplays: "La Colère" episode in Les Sept Péchés capitaux, 1962; Monsieur Tête (animated film), 1970 (published in Théâtre V, 1974).

Ballet Scenarios: For television, with Fleming Flindt: La Leçon, 1963; Le Jeune Homme à marier, 1965; La Vase, 1970; Le Triomphe de la mort, 1971.

Fiction

La Photo du Colonel. 1962; as The Colonel's Photograph, translated by Jean Stewart and John Russell, 1967.

Le Solitaire. 1973; as The Hermit, translated by Richard Seaver, 1974.

Other

Elegii pentru fiinti mici. 1931.

Nu. 1934; as Non (in French), translated by Marie-France Ionesco, 1986.

Notes et contre-notes. 1962; revised edition, 1966; as Notes and Counter-Notes, translated by Donald Watson, 1964.

Entretiens avec Claude Bonnefoy. 1966; as Conversations with Ionesco, edited by Claude Bonnefoy, translated by Jan Dawson, 1970.

Journal en miettes. 1967; as Fragments of a Journal, translated by Jean Stewart, 1968.

Présent passé passé présent. 1968; as Present Past, Past Present, translated by Helen Lane, 1971.

Contes pour enfants. 4 vols., 1969–75; as Story no. 1, translated by Calvin K. Towle, 1968; Story no. 2, translated by Calvin K. Towle, 1970; Story no. 3, translated by Ciba Vaughan, 1971; Story no. 4, translated by Ciba Vaughan, 1973.

Découvertes, illustrated by Ionesco. 1969.

Mise en train: Première année de français, with Michael Benamou. 1969.

Discours de réception à l'Académie française. . . 1971.

Entre la vie et la rêve: Entretiens avec Claude Bonnefoy. 1977.

Antidotes. 1977.

Un homme en question. 1979.

Le Noir et le blanc. 1980.

Hugoliade. 1982; as Hugoliad; or, The Grotesque and Tragic Life of Victor Hugo, 1987.

Pourquoi j'écris. 1986; as Why Do I Write?, translated by Donald Watson, in Plays XI, 1979.

La Quêje intermittente (autobiography). 1987; as The Intermittent Quest, 1988.

*

Bibliography: Ionesco: A Bibliography by Griffith R. Hughes and Ruth Bury, 1974; Bibliographie et index thématique des études sur Ionesco by Wolfgang Leiner, 1980.

Critical Studies: Ionesco: A Study of His Plays by Richard N. Coe, 1961, revised edition, 1971; The Theatre of the Absurd by Martin Esslin 1961, revised edition 1980. Four Playwrights and a Postscript: Brecht, Ionesco, Beckett, Genet by David I. Grossvogel, 1962; Avant-Garde: The Experimental Theatre in France by Leonard C. Pronko, 1962; Eugène Ionesco by Leonard C. Pronko, 1965; Eugène Ionesco: An Introduction to His Work by Kenneth R. Dutton, 1967; Ionesco and Genet by Josephine Jacobsen and William Randolph Mueller, 1968; Brecht and Ionesco: Commitment in Context by J.H. Wulbern, 1971; Eugène Ionesco by Ronald Hayman, 1972, revised edition, 1976; Ionesco by Allan Lewis, 1972; Ionesco: A Collection of Critical Essays edited by Rosette C. Lamont, 1973, and The Two Faces of Ionesco edited by Lamont and M.J. Friedman, 1978; Ionesco: Rhinocéros by C.E.J. Dolamore, 1984; Langage et corps, fantasmé dans le théâtre des années cinquante: Ionesco, Beckett, Adamov by Marie-Claude Hubert, 1987. Ionesco's Imperatives: The Politics of Culture by Rosette C. Lamont, 1993; Understanding Eugene Ionesco by Nancy Lane, 1994; Eugène Ionesco Revisited by Deborah B. Gaensbauer, 1996.

* * *

Eugène Ionesco's one-act plays of the early 1950s, together with those of Beckett, revitalized post-war drama and introduced what came to be known as the "theatre of the absurd." La Cantatrice chauve (The Bald Prima Donna), La Leçon (The Lesson), and Les Chaises (The Chairs) present different images of man's incomprehensible existence, expressed not so much through plot and characterization, which are minimal, as through the disintegration of language into chaos, silence, and death. The style is akin to farce, the tone a disturbing mixture of comic and tragic, for comedy, in Ionesco's view, is "the intuition of the absurd, . . . more despairing than tragedy." The Bald Prima Donna, which has enjoyed a continuous run at La Huchette since 1957, had its source in the conversational banalities of a beginner's English textbook. Superficially, it parodies petty-bourgeois life and the clichés of everyday speech, but the author's purpose was to express the astonishing meaninglessness of life and, with it, "the tragedy of language," that is, not the problem of social communication, but our inability to penetrate the silence that surrounds us.

This metaphysical theme, which underlies the whole of Ionesco's work, is most clearly expressed in The Chairs. An old couple look back regretfully on their inconsequential lives, while expressing vague nostalgia for a lost "City of Light." Wishing to leave a "message" for posterity before they die, they have invited a large number of guests to their isolated home. As the guests, who are invisible, arrive, the couple fill the stage with a vast number of chairs. The proliferation of meaningless objects, which has become a hallmark of Ionesco's plays, here signifies spiritual absence, the essential void: there is no message. With The Lesson, a further dimension emerges: the abuse of man's power, which is developed in more specific terms in later plays. During the course of a private lesson, the teacher gradually dominates his young female pupil by the manipulation of language (meaningless words which proliferate like the chairs) and pseudo-learning (reminiscent of ideological brainwashing). Finally carried away with his own power and desire, he kills the girl with the mesmerically repeated word "cou-teau" (knife), in an act of violation containing both sexual and political overtones.

The longer, more ambitious plays, which subsequently predominate in Ionesco's output, frequently use the raw material of dreams and introduce us directly into the playwright's private obsessions: his sense of guilt; his spiritual frustration; his fear of death; his bewilderment at mankind's murderous nature. At the same time, his inventiveness and comic genius produce audacious dramatic images both grotesque and memorable, such as the huge expanding corpse of Amédée; ou, Comment s'en débarrasser (Amédée; or, How to Get Rid of It), or the transformation of people into monstrous pachyderms in Rhinocéros (Rhinoceros).

Rhinoceros, probably his most successful full-length play, evokes the rapid advance of fascism in the 1930s and, more generally, the threat of all conformist ideologies. The strength of the play lies not in its condemnation of ideology as such, but in its dramatization of the experience of the individual, Bérenger, who resists the tide of mass transformation. By preserving, intuitively rather than heroically, his human qualities—his inner world of fears, complexes, passion—he stands alone against the threatening herd in a final image of great dramatic power.

The denunciation of evil, especially that which is politically motivated, is a major theme of many of Ionesco's works, e.g. Tueur sans gages (The Killer), Délire à deux (Frenzy for Two), Macbett, Ce formidable bordel (Oh What a Bloody Circus). The tone is one of naive astonishment rather than righteous indignation; the caricature and humour of farce remain predominant. Macbett, a parody of Shakespeare by way of Jarry's Ubu Roi, is one of Ionesco's blackest and funniest plays, satirizing the tyrant's lust for power. Oh What a Bloody Circus, a dramatization of his only novel, Le Solitaire (The Hermit), and containing echoes of the political unrest in France in 1968, is a despairing inventory of all the horrors of the world and a cry of metaphysical anguish; with bitter irony, the play ends in hysterical laughter at the "huge joke" God has played on mankind.

Ionesco's obsessional fear of death forms the subject of Le Roi se meurt (Exit the King), in which King Bérenger must prepare himself to die "at the end of the play," and of Jeux de massacre (Killing Game), a series of 18 tableaux, inspired by Defoe's Journal of the Plague Year, and presenting the fundamental tenet of the absurd: "That's what life is: dying." Ionesco's own search for spiritual enlightenment found expression in the image of the quest in a number of dream-inspired plays, from the psychoanalytical Victimes du devoir (Victims of Duty) to the less successful autobiographical sagas, L'Homme aux valises (Man with Bags) and Voyages chez les morts

(Journeys among the Dead), which rework dreams and memories already published in diary form. In La Soif et la faim (Hunger and Thirst) the protagonist, having finally rejected human love, goes vainly in search of higher spiritual fulfilment, finally to be trapped in a Kafkaesque, monastery-like institution characterized by tyranny and indoctrination and signifying "purgatory or hell."

This generally bleak picture of human life, marked by guilt, violence and metaphysical alienation, is offset by Ionesco's original sense of comedy, his childlike delight in nonsense, contradiction and wordplay. There are also flights—sometimes literally, as in Le Piéton de l'air (A Stroll in the Air)—of poetic wonderment and the hope of salvation through love. But wonder invariably gives way to horror, love constantly fails, and the smile freezes on our lips as comedy reveals its tragic face. In the later autobiographical plays, humour is a rare ingredient and provokes sparse, uneasy laughter.

In his volume of autobiography, La Quête intermittente (The Intermittent Quest), Ionesco rejects literature in favour of painting and the spiritual quest, acknowledging the failure of language to give meaning to human existence. In his last play, Journeys among the Dead, words finally disintegrate, without producing the anarchic humour which such an effect produced in The Bald Prima Donna. Their incoherence expresses the protagonist's, and the author's, bewildered incomprehension of life.

—C.E.J. Dolamore

See the essays on The Bald Prima Donna and Rhinoceros.

ISHIGAKI Rin

Born: Akasaka, Tokyo, 21 February 1920. Education: Kindergarten, 1925; local elementary school, 1926–32; Akasaka Higher Elementary School, and reading of poetry collections and young women's magazines (shōjo zasshi) at local library and home, 1932–34. Career: Worked in Industrial Bank of Japan, 1934–75. Began and edited literary magazine for women Dansō [Dislocation], 1938–43. Awards: 19th H prize of Japanese Contemporary Poets Society, 1969; 12th Tamura Ayako award, 1972; 4th Earth prize, 1979. Member: Union-sponsored literary groups, first Ginkakei [The Milky Way] and then Jikan [Time], 1948–50; Rekitei poet's group, 1965–88.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Gendai Shijin Bunko 46 Ishigaki Rin Shishū. 1971.
Gendai no Shijin 5 Ishigaki Rin. 1983.
Ishigaki Rin Bunko. 4 vols., 1987–1990.
Sora wo katsuide. 1997.
Ishigaki Rin Shishū. 1998.

Poetry

Watakushi no mae ni aru nabe to okama to moeru hi to. 1959.
Hyōsatsu nado. 1968.
Ryakureki. 1979.
Yasashii Kotoba. 1984.

Essays

Yuumoa no Sakoku. 1973.
Honō ni te wo kazashite. 1980.
Yoru no Taiko. 1989.

Other

Katei no shi. 1980.
Shi no Fūkei. 1992.

*

Critical Studies: Chapters in Jojō no zensen [On the front lines of lyricism] by Kiyooka Takayuki, 1970; Seikimatsu no bikō—Ayukawa Nobuo, sono ta [The thin light of the fin de siècle—Ayukawa Nobuo and others] by Kitamura Tarō, 1988; Gendai josei shijinron—jidai wo kakeru joseitachi [Contemporary women poets: women ahead of their time] by Asō Naoko, 1991; “Ishigaki Rin: The Venus of Tokyo” by Janine Beichman, in Across Time and Genre: Reading and Writing Japanese Women’s Texts, ed. Janice Brown and Sonya Arntzen, 2002.

* * *

Ishigaki Rin is one of the foremost contemporary women poets of Japan, and in spite of her age, appeals strongly to the younger generation. Imaginative and elliptical, her exuberant, deeply-felt poetry expresses both social and metaphysical concerns.

In the difficult postwar days of the Occupation (1945–1952), Ishigaki struggled to support single-handedly her parents and two younger brothers, one unemployed and the other disabled. The ambivalence this aroused was intense. In her first collection, Watakushi no mae ni aru nabe to okama to moeru hi to [Before Me the Pot, the Pan, and the Burning Flame], a number of poems depict the hell of home and family. In other poems, confined domestic spaces are forgotten in favor of open-ended visions. Some are natural scenes of the sea and other landscapes in Izu, the rural area where her parents were born. Others are transcendent, supernatural vistas that evoke the infinite horizon of the heart and a powerful drive to self-actualization.

Ishigaki’s most recent collections, Ryakureki [My Life in Brief] and Yasashii Kotoba [Gentle Words], were written when she was in her fifties and sixties. In a number of poems from that period, the poet simultaneously contemplates her own end and the lost past. Nor does she forget those who lost their lives in war, an important theme in her work from the early postwar period. The distinction between past and present is obliterated; both are part of one eternity in which life and death are dissolved. Death, in fact, is not so much an end as a surrender to a new mode of existence. The focus on death and aging was new in these collections, but the sense of matter-of-fact, unsentimental intimacy with everything alive, whether animal, vegetable or mineral, was not. In the poems of Hyōsatsu nado [Nameplates etc.], her second collection, self and other interpenetrate, as if the wall between them were porous.

Ishigaki believes that poetry can only come out of one’s own life, but at the same time, she does not think of it as simple autobiography, but more as a distillation. Of her first collection, she wrote that because she “did not want anything that was not wholly cooked,” it took her nine years to “boil down,” and even then, it and her second collection still had some “raw parts” left in them. She considers herself an “amateur” poet in the sense that she does not separate life and poetry: “How else,” she asks, “could you write poetry except from your own life?”

“The Japanese language,” she writes, “is my first and only real home.” Words are living creatures to her, and she refers to them with the suffix -tachi, ordinarily used only for human beings. The care with which she uses words (she once walked around Tokyo for several hours trying to decide whether to use the particle o or wa after a certain noun) gives her poems a surface simplicity, for everything unnecessary is pared away. At the same time, there is an elliptical quality to her work, for she believes in the necessity of leaving a certain amount of “blank space.” Her poems are also notable for their lack of literary allusion.

Ishigaki’s appeal lies in the high-spirited combination of anger, wit, and tenderness that animates her poetry; her tone is at once pungent and lyrical, pugnacious and forgiving, earthly and transcendent. She is, above all, a poet in whom individualism and a sense of community are intertwined in a particularly compelling way. The chronicle of contemporary Japanese poetry is still being written, but it seems more than possible that Ishigaki Rin will be remembered as one of the representative poets of 20th century Japan.

—Janine Beichman

J

JACOB, Max

---

Born: Quimper, France, 11 July 1876. Education: Educated at École Coloniale, 1894. Career: Moved to Paris; gave piano lessons and attended art courses; art critic, Le Gaulois, Paris, 1898, resigned; returned to Quimper and had a variety of jobs; returned to Paris, 1901; clerk and labourer, the department store, Entrepôt Voltaire; closely associated with Apollinaire, q.v., and Picasso, who became his godfather in 1915, after Jacob's conversion to Roman Catholicism; settled at a Benedictine monastery, Saint-Benoît-sur-Loire, after 1921; returned to Paris, 1928–35, and associated with Cocteau, q.v. Spent most of his retirement in poverty. Arrested as a Jew by the Nazis, 1944. Award: Légion d'honneur, 1932. Died: (in Drancy Concentration Camp) 5 March 1944.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Hesitant Fire: Selected Prose, edited and translated by Moishe Black and Maria Green. 1991.
Théâtre. 1953.
Selected Poems of Max Jacob, edited and translated by William Kulik, 1999.

Verse

Saint Matorel, illustrated by Picasso. 1911; enlarged edition, 1936.
La Côte: Recueil de chants celtiques inédits. 1911; reprinted with 17 watercolours by Jacob, 1927.
Les Oeuvres burlesques et mystiques de Frère Matorel, mort au couvent de Barcelone, illustrated by André Derain. 1912.
Les Alliés sont en Arménie: Poème. 1916; revised edition, 1976.
Le Cornet à dés: Poèmes en prose. 1917; as The Dice Cup: Selected Prose Poems, edited by Michael Brownstein, translated by John Ashbery, and others, 1979; selections translated by Judith Morganroth Schneider, in The Play of the Text, 1981, and in Double Life: Thirty Prose Poems, translated by Michael Bullock, 1989.
La Défense de Tartuffe: Extases, remords, visions, prières, poèmes, et Méditations d'un juif converti, illustrated by Picasso and Jacob. 1919.
Le Voyage en autobus. 1920.
Le Laboratoire central. 1921.
Visions infernales: poèmes en prose. 1924.
Les Pénitents en maillots roses. 1925.
Fond de l'eau. 1927.
Le Sacrifice impérial. 1929.
Rivage. 1931.
Cinq poèmes, music by Francis Poulenc. 1932.

Le Chemin de croix infernal, illustrated by Jean-Mario Prassinis. 1935.
Ballades. 1938.
L'Homme de cristal. 1946; revised edition, 1967.
Derniers poèmes en vers et en prose. 1945; revised edition, 1961.
Les Poèmes de Morvan le Gaëlique. 1953.
Trois quatrains. 1953.
A poèmes rompus. 1960.
Double Life: Thirty Prose Poems, translated by Michael Bullock. 1989.

Fiction

L'Histoire du roi Kaboul ler et du Marmiton Gauvain (for children). 1903; revised edition, 1971; as Story of King Kabul the First and Gawain the Kitchen-Boy, translated by Moishe Black and Maria Green, 1994.
Le Géant du soleil (for children). 1904.
Le Siège de Jérusalem: Drame céleste, illustrated by Picasso. 1914.
La Phanérogame. 1918.
Cinématoma. 1919.
Le Roi de Boétie: nouvelles. 1921; revised edition 1971.
Wenceslas, ancien cocher. 1921; revised edition, 1971.
Filibuth; ou, La Montre en or. 1922.
Le Cabinet noir. 1922; enlarged edition, 1928.
La Couronne de vulcain (stories), illustrated by Suzanne Roger. 1923.
Le Terrain bouchaballe. 2 vols., 1923; revised edition, 1964.
L'Homme de chair et l'homme reflet. 1924.
Le Nom: nouvelle. 1926.
Aguedal II. 1944.

Plays

Isabelle et Pantalon (opera libretto), music by Roland Manuel. 1922.
Fable sans moralité (ballet scenario), music by H. Bordes. 1931.
Le Bal masqué (ballet scenario), music by Francis Poulenc. 1932.

Other

Matorel en province. 1921; revised edition, 1936.
Ne coupez pas, mademoiselle; ou, Les Erreurs des PTT: plaquette de grand luxe, illustrated by Juan Gris. 1921.
Dos d'Arlequin, illustrated by Jacob. 1921.
Art poétique. 1922.
Le Chien de pique. 1928.
Visions des souffrances et de la mort de Jésus, fils de Dieu, illustrated by Jacob. 1928.
Tableau de la bourgeoisie, illustrated by Jacob. 1929.
Bourgeois de France et d'ailleurs (portraits). 1932.
Morceaux choisis, edited by Paul Petit. 1936.

Conseils à un jeune poète, conseils à un jeune étudiant. 1945; as Advice to a Young Poet, translated by John Adlard, 1976.

Méditations religieuses. 1945.

Lettres à Edmond Jabès. 1945.

Lettres inédites du poète à Guillaume Apollinaire. 1946.

En février 1942, Max Jacob écrivait. 1947.

Le Symbolisme de la face. 1948.

Choix de lettres de Max Jacob à Jean Cocteau (1919–1944). 1949.

Miroir d'astrologie, with Claude Valence. 1949.

Choix de lettres à Jean Cocteau, 1919–1944. 1950.

Lettres à un ami: correspondance 1922–1937, with Jean Grenier. 1951.

Drawings and Poems, edited and translated by Stanley J. Collier. 1951.

Lettres à Bernard Esdras-Gosse (1924–1944). 1953.

Correspondance, edited by François Garnier. 2 vols., 1953–55.

Lettres aux Salacrou (août 1923–janvier 1926). 1957.

Lettres à Marcel Béalu. 1959.

Quatre problèmes à résoudre. 1962.

Max Jacob and Les Feux de Paris (correspondence), edited by Neal Oxenhandler. 1964.

Lettres à T. Briant et C. Valence (1920–1941), edited by Stanley J. Collier. 1966.

Lettres 1920–41. 1966.

Lettres à Michel Levanti, suivies des poèmes de Michel Levanti, edited by Lawrence A. Joseph. 1975.

Lettres à René Villard, suivies du Cahier des Maximes, edited by Yannick Pelletier. 1978.

Lettres à Marcel Jouhandeau, edited by Anne Kimball. 1979.

Lettres à Liane de Pougy. 1980.

Lettres à René Rimbart, edited by Christine Andréucci and Maria Green. 1983.

Max Jacob et Quimper (selection). 1984.

Lettres mystiques 1934–1944 à Clotilde Baugeon. 1984.

Lettres à Michel Manoll, edited by Maria Green. 1985.

Méditations religieuses: Derniers cahiers 1942–1943. 1986.

Chroniques d'art 1898–1900, with Léon David, edited by Lawrence A. Joseph. 1987.

Lettres à Pierre Minet, edited by Anne Kimball. 1988.

Lettres à Nino Frank, edited by Anne Kimball. 1989.

Lettres à Florent Fels, edited by Maria Green. 1990.

Translator, with A. de Barreau, Le Livre de l'ami et de l'aimé, by Raymond Lulle. 1920.

*

Bibliography: Bibliographie et documentation sur Max Jacob by Maria Green, 1988.

Critical Studies: Max Jacob, mystique et martyr by Pierre Lagarde, 1944; Max Jacob by André Billy, 1946; Jacob by Maurice Sachs in his Witches Sabbath, 1964; Max Jacob and the Poetics of Cubism by Gerald Kamber, 1971; "Realism and Fantasy in the Work of Max Jacob: Some Verse Poems" by S.I. Lockerbie, in Order and Adventure in Post-Romantic French Poetry edited by E.M. Beaumont, J.M. Cocking and J. Cruickshank, 1973; "Max Jacob: The Poetics of Le Cornet à dés" by Renée Riese Hubert, in About French Poetry from Dada to "Tel Quel" edited by Mary Ann Caws, 1974; "Max Jacob's Bourgeois Voices" by Renée Riese Hubert in Folio, 9, 1976; Poetry and Antipoetry: A Study of Selected Aspects of Max Jacob's Poetic Style by Annette Thau, 1976; "Max Jacob" by Francis Poulenc in his

My Friends and Myself translated by James Harding, 1978; Clown at the Altar: The Religious Poetry of Max Jacob by Judith M. Schneider, 1978; Max Jacob by Lina Lachgar, 1981; The Play of the Text: Max Jacob's Le Cornet à dés by S. Lévy, 1981; "Max Jacob: Style, Situation" by Theo Hermans, in The Structure of Modernist Poetry, 1982; Looking for Heroes in Postwar France: Albert Camus, Max Jacob, Simone Weil by Neal Oxenhandler, 1996.

* * *

Although Max Jacob's work is very rich and varied, it is his book of prose poems, Le Cornet à dés (The Dice Cup), which has attracted the most readers and the most critical attention. Published in 1917, the collection brought together texts Jacob had been writing since the early 1900s and represented its author's major contribution to the literary and artistic modernism exemplified by Apollinaire and Picasso. Commentators have even spoken retrospectively of "literary Cubism," although no such notion existed at the time. The poems of The Dice Cup tend to be short and couched in relatively simple language, but they offer twists and turns of narrative and juxtapositions of fragmentary realities that defy the habits of logic and representation. The title itself suggests a notion of chance, as though the poet randomly selected or juggled with words and elements of stories. yet at the same time it is also the image of something multi-faceted and whole, like the die, which is implied. The prose poem as a genre had already attained a certain artistic maturity in the work of Baudelaire and Rimbaud, spelling liberation from the traditional approach to poetry based on prosody and, to a certain extent, the mimesis of external reality or inner feelings. Yet Jacob went one step further. In his preface to The Dice Cup he rejects Baudelaire and Rimbaud as models: the former identified the prose poem too closely with the fable, while the latter's work constituted the triumph of "Romantic disorder" leading inevitably to "exasperation." Jacob emphasizes instead what he terms "style" and "situation." "Style" is not simply the writer's use of language, but his ability to marshal and compose the various elements of his work. The more successful a work, the more it will give the impression of being an autonomous, self-enclosed unity, however disparate its component parts might otherwise have seemed. "Situation" refers to the distance between the reader and the work: if Baudelaire believed the prose poem should "surprise" the reader, Jacob felt that it should transplant him from the reality he normally accepts and inhabits into the reality of the work.

Both "style" and "situation" implied the assembling of apparently dissimilar fragments or view-points into a synthetic unity somewhat reminiscent of the Cubist painting or "papier collé." And yet the often absurd combinations thrown up by the prose poems looked forward to Surrealism. In a later preface Jacob indeed spoke of the "unconscious" as manifested in random associations of words and ideas or in dreams and hallucinations. Where he differed from the automatic writing of the Surrealists was in his insistence that the poem should be not an out-pouring but a construction. Contrasting his own work with that of Rimbaud, he stipulated that the prose poem must be a "jewel" and not a "jeweller's shop window." His achievement lies in part in this balance between the surrender of conscious control and the will to shape and construct. In his view the essence of lyricism lay in "unconsciousness, but an unconsciousness that is watched over" (Conseils à un jeune poète [Advice to a Young Poet]).

The impression given by The Dice Cup is that of a kaleidoscope. Each poem either offers a multiplicity of scenes or magnifies some fragment that adds to the heteroclit effect of the collection as a whole. Frequently, illogical connections or consequences are presented with such linguistic and narrative casualness as to appear natural, as in “Il n’y a pas de valet de chambre pour un grand homme” (“A Great Man Needs No Valet”):

Meanwhile the lobster banquet was giving rise to entrances through the roof, to conversations with legs dangling from skylights and to frying pans catching on fire.

The miniature phantasmagorias often revel in their own factitiousness: “Chariot au bord de la mer” (“Charlie Chaplin at the Seashore”) ends, “A lady is minding a child on a bank of loose stones. I jostle him and the scene disappears.” The result is a celebration of the ludicrous. Almost anything may appear, but its contours will always be brought into sharp focus within the restricted space of the prose poem. However, the kaleidoscope effect and the playful nature of the reality produced by the texts is not simply the result of brusque changes of scene or tense. It is also inherent in language itself. Wordplay and puns are made the basis of startling comparisons and sequences. One poem proclaims in its title: “Fausses nouvelles! Fosses nouvelles!”—or “Grave News! New Graves!” in Michael Browstein’s rendering. Another poem speculates on the possible confusion of “patte” (“paw,” “mitt”) and “pâte” (“paste” or “cream”). Nearly all the texts aim to exploit playfully and subversively the well-trodden paths of language in the form of platitudes or literary and para-literary genres. Some poems read like bewildering snatches from some serialized pot-boiler or detective novel (two pieces even have the eponymous hero of the contemporary crime serial, Fantômas, as their title). Others seem to be speeded up medieval visions, burlesque news articles, or repositories of undiscovered popular wisdom. Overall, the products of Jacob’s dice cup tend to parody and cannibalize existing literature and patterns of language in an inventive and liberating fashion that was to be vital for Surrealism and successive avant-garde groups even into the 1970s.

The same multiplicity of sources and guises covering the range of high and low literature and spanning history characterizes most of Jacob’s other works. In verse he sought inspiration in the Breton folk ballad (La Côte and Les Poèmes de Morvan le Gaëlique) as well as in the traditions of religious mysticism. Yet even here the bizarre irony of The Dice Cup often reappears, undercutting any pretensions to directly serious statement, but leaving an oblique emotion all the more striking for its apparent self-deprecation. “Exhortation” from La Défense de Tartuffe [The Defense of Tartuffe] shows the poet unable to read a message from heaven because it is Hebrew and ends: “The angel is furious at finding me so stupid.” He could achieve sustained seriousness, as in “eportage de juin 1940” (“eportage June 1940”) in Derniers poèmes en vers et en prose [Last Poems in Verse and Prose] on the fall of France—a key event in his own tragic destiny. His novels are varied. Le Cabinet noir, for example, is a collection of letters by different characters, satirically parodying human types and their discourses, while Le Terrain bouchaballe [The Terrain of Bouchaballe] deals with small town corruption. In all his work Jacob’s main drive was to absorb the multiplicity of the world into the self, while retaining a self-deprecating irony:

We don’t know very well those we love
But I understand them fairly well
Being all these people myself
I who am however but a baboon.
 (“Do You Know Meister Eckhart?,” Derniers poèmes en vers et en prose)

—J.R. Stubbs

JARRY, Alfred (Henri)

Born: Laval, France, 8 September 1873. Education: Educated at schools in Saint-Brieuc, 1879–88, and Rennes, 1888–91; Lycée Henri IV, Paris, 1891–93. Military Service: Brief military service, June–November 1895; discharged because of poor health. Career: Contributor, L’Art littéraire in the 1890s; co-founder, with Rémy de Gourmont, art review L’Ymagier, 1894, and co-director, 1894–95; founder and publisher, art journal Perhinderion, 1896 (closed after second issue); assistant to Lugné-Poe, director of the Théâtre de l’Oeuvre, 1896; columnist, La Revue blanche, 1900–03; suffering from malnutrition and the consequences of alcoholism, attempted recuperation at his sister’s home in Laval, 1906. Died: 1 November 1907.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Oeuvres poétiques complètes, edited by Henri Parisot. 1945.
Oeuvres complètes, edited by René Massat. 8 vols., 1948.
Selected Works (includes The Ubu Cycle; Writings on the Theatre; Poems; Essays and Speculations; Fiction Selections), edited by Roger Shattuck and Simon Watson Taylor. 1965.
Oeuvres complètes, edited by Michel Arrivé. 2 vols., 1972–87.

Plays

César-Antéchrist. 1895; as Caesar Antichrist, translated by James H. Bierman, 1971.
Tout Ubu (includes Ubu Roi; Ubu cocu; Ubu enchaîné; Almanach du père Ubu; Ubu sur la butte), edited by Maurice Saillet. 1962; as Ubu, edited by Noël Arnaud and Henri Bordillon, 1980; selection as The Ubu Plays (includes Ubu Rex; Ubu Enchained; Ubu Cuckolded), edited by Simon Watson Taylor, translated by Watson Taylor and Cyril Connolly. 1968.
Ubu Roi (produced 1896). 1896; as Ubu Roi, translated by Barbara Wright, 1951; as King Turd, translated by B. Keith and G. Legman, 1953; as King Ubu, in Modern French Theatre, edited by Michael Benedikt and George E. Wellwarth, 1964; as Ubu Rex, in The Ubu Plays, 1968; also translated by David Copelin, 1973; as Ubu the King, translated by Maya Slater in Three Pre-surrealist Plays, 1997.
Ubu enchaîné (produced 1937). 1900; as Ubu Enslaved, translated by Simon Watson Taylor, 1953; as Ubu Enchained, in The Ubu Plays, 1968.

Ubu sur la butte (condensed marionette version of Ubu roi, with songs; produced 1901). 1906.

Ubu cocu (produced 1946). 1944; as Ubu Cuckolded, translated by Cyril Connolly, 1965, and in The Ubu Plays, 1968.

Par la taille (for marionettes). 1906.

Le Moutardier du page. 1907; as La Papesse Jeanne, edited by Marc Voline, 1981.

Pantagruel, with Eugène Demolder, music by Claude Terrasse. 1911.

Les Silènes, from a play by Christian Dietrich Grabbe, edited by Pascal Pia. 1926.

L'Objet aimé (produced 1937). 1953.

Fiction

Les Jours et les nuits. 1897; as Days and Nights: Novel of a Deserter, translated by Alexis Lykiard, with The Other Alcestis, 1989.

L'Amour en visites. 1898.

L'Amour absolu. 1899; edited by Noël Arnaud and Henri Bordillon, 1980.

Messaline. 1900; as The Garden of Priapus, translated by Louis Colman, 1932; as Messalina, translated by John Harman, 1985.

Le Surmâle. 1902; as The Supermale, translated by Barbara Wright, 1968.

Les Gestes et opinions du docteur Faustroll, Pataphysicien. 1911; edited by Noël Arnaud and Henri Bordillon, 1980.

La Dragonne, completed by Charlotte Jarry. 1943.

Verse

La Revanche de la nuit, edited by Maurice Saillet. 1949.

Other

Les Minutes de sable, mémorial (miscellany). 1894.

Spéculations. 1911.

Le Manoir enchanté et quatre autres oeuvres inédites, edited by Noël Arnaud. 1974.

Adventures in 'Pataphysics, translated by Paul Edwards and Antony Melville. 2001.

Other works have been issued in Cahiers and Dossiers of the Collège de Pataphysique, since 1950.

*

Bibliography: "Alfred Jarry: Essai de bibliographie critique," in Interférences, 9, 1979.

Critical Studies: The Banquet Years: The Arts in France 1885–1918 by Roger Shattuck, 1959, revised edition, 1968; Jarry: D'Ubu roi au Docteur Faustroll by Noël Arnaud, 1974; Ubu roi: An Analytical Study by Judith Cooper, 1974; Alfred Jarry, dramaturge, 1980, and Les Cultures de Jarry, 1988, both by Henri Béhar, and Jarry et cie: Communications du Colloque international, 1985, edited by Béhar and Brunella Eruli; Jarry: Nihilism and the Theatre of the Absurd by Maurice Marc LaBelle, 1980; Alfred Jarry: A Critical and Biographical Study, 1984, and Jarry: Ubu roi, 1987, both by Keith Beaumont; Alfred Jarry: The Man with the Axe by Nigel Lennon, 1984; Alfred Jarry and Guillaume Apollinaire by Claude Schumacher, 1984;

Gestes et opinions de Alfred Jarry, écrivain by Henri Bordillon, 1986; Alfred Jarry by Vincenzo Accame, 1993; The Pataphysician's Library: An Exploration of Alfred Jarry's Livres Pairs by Ben Fisher, 2000.

* * *

Alfred Jarry was born in Laval, a town some distance from the Brittany whose traditions of Celtic magic and intense Catholicism he claimed later to have inherited and to represent. He saw little of his father, whose business collapsed in 1879 and who was forced to return to his original employment as a commercial traveller. Together with his sister, Caroline-Marie, he was brought up almost exclusively by his mother. His strong attachment to her may explain his homosexuality, a feature of his life which links him to the tradition of Gide, Proust, and Genet as well as to the relationship between Verlaine and Rimbaud. In spite of the priapism celebrated in the novel Le Surmâle (The Supermale), published in La Revue blanche in 1902, it is doubtful whether he ever enjoyed a sexual relationship with a woman. His admiration for the author, Marguerite Eymery, the wife of his friend Alfred Vallette, was based on the feeling that she alone really understood him. This may have been true in a way, since she is the only person who records him speaking in a normal voice and not in the stilted, aggressive, staccato tones which he borrowed for his most famous creation, père Ubu.

Jarry felt at home intellectually in the literary Paris of the 1890s where the Symbolist movement, under the influence of Mallarmé, encouraged him in his dislike of the earlier climate of naturalism, with its view that literature ought to talk about real life, and in his adoption instead of the solipsistic attitude embodied in Schopenhauer's phrase "The world is my representation." The production at the Théâtre de l'Oeuvre on 10 December 1896 of his "dramatic comedy" Ubu Roi (Ubu Rex), the work to which he owes his literary survival and continued fame, provoked a great controversy.

After the first word, merdre (the translation as "Shit!") does not quite have the ring of the French), nothing could be heard for 20 minutes. Jarry subsequently went to the trouble to select all the most hostile reviews, paste them on to sheets of blue and pink notepaper, and bind them in a file. This was not discovered after his death. The bill for 1,300 francs in production costs, which reduced the young director of the Théâtre de l'Oeuvre, Lugné-Poe, to despair, was like all the other debts that Jarry incurred and left behind him: unpaid. Lugné-Poe had to console himself by contemplation of the fact that his theatre is now remembered principally for the events of December 1896. On 28 January 1898, Ubu Rex was performed successfully by the marionettes of the Théâtre des Pantins. This was more than a further sign of the rejection of the naturalistic conventions of 19th-century drama which helps to make Ubu Rex a precursor of the absurdist plays of Beckett, Ionesco, and Genet. It reflected Jarry's not unreasonable view that 19th-century actors and actresses expected to be, and were, given far too much importance by playwrights and audiences.

Ubu Rex, with its starting point as a schoolboy farce inspired by the antics of the physics master, a M. Hébert, at the lycée in Rennes, is virtually the only play written by a Frenchman in the 19th century to be performed nowadays as anything other than a museum piece. It has been particularly successful with English-speaking audiences and made into an opera, as well as a ballet. It is, nevertheless, the only work by Jarry to be anything but the expression of a disordered personality and of a fundamentally very sad life. André Breton's remark, in the first Manifeste du surréalisme (Surrealist Manifesto) in 1924, that Jarry was “a surrealist in absinth” is true in so far as Jarry did drink an enormous amount. This was, however, also because he could not afford to buy food, and it is not true that he died of alcoholic poisoning. The probable cause of his death was tubercular meningitis, brought on by a pulmonary infection produced by inadequate food, cold, and damp. There are other aspects of Jarry’s behaviour that make him a precursor of surrealism, and his predilection for firearms may have inspired Breton’s other remark that the simplest surrealist act was to go down into the street with a revolver and fire at random into the crowd. On one occasion, in a crowded restaurant, Jarry fired a shot at the sculptor Manoco, exclaiming as he did so how beautiful his action was as literature. He claimed also to have shot a nightingale which was disturbing his sleep, and witnesses confirmed how he terrified his landlady by using the wall between their rooms for target practice. When she complained that the bullets might go through the wall and kill her children, he replied that he would, if it happened, help her to have others. The remark was taken up in Gide’s 1926 novel Les Faux-monnayeurs (The Counterfeiters), who used his depiction of a group of unpleasant adolescent schoolboys.

Like Rimbaud, whom he resembles by his eccentricity of behaviour, as well as by the impression given by his later life of great talents squandered needlessly, Jarry was looked after at the end of his life by his sister. Like Isabelle Rimbaud, Caroline-Marie encouraged the belief that her brother had undergone a late conversion to Catholicism. The evidence is unconvincing in both cases and goes against the predominant atmosphere in the work of both writers. What did characterize Jarry’s attitude in the early 1890s was the adoption, in common with many others from the Mercure de France and Revue blanche groups, of a set of views that were highly nationalistic and violently anti-semitic. The taste for random violence that marked Jarry’s own behaviour is also a fiction of the Collège de Pataphysique, whose members still take pleasure in interrupting lectures and meetings of which they disapprove. Jarry was undoubtedly the founder of what he also claimed was the “science” of pataphysics, described variously as the science of imaginary solutions, the destruction of all forms of knowledge to make way for a new mysticism, and the “synthesis of immediate knowledge” said to characterize the imaginative world of the child. Jarry’s critical writings also insist on the primacy of form in literature and denigrate the importance of content.

—Philip Thody

See the essay on Ubu Rex.

JENSEN, Johannes V.

Born: Farsø, Denmark, 20 January, 1873. Education: Attended Cathedral School, Viborg, Denmark, 1889–93; finished the first part of a medical degree, University of Copenhagen, 1893–98. Military Service: Completed Danish military service as infantryman, 1899–1900. Family: Married Else Marie Ulrik, 1904; three sons. Career: After leaving the university, devoted himself to a life of writing and traveling; traveled to the United States, 1896; became correspondent in Spain, 1898, and at the World’s Fair in Paris, 1900; journey around the world via Suez Canal, Singapore (living among natives in what is now Malaysia for five weeks), Japan, and the United States, especially Chicago and New York, 1902–03; married and established a home in Copenhagen, 1904; further subsequent travels to the United States (1905, 1914, 1937, 1939), Norway (1907, 1910, 1938), many parts of Asia (1912), Berlin, Egypt and Palestine (1925), Canary Islands, Berlin, and Rome (1928), Czechoslovakia (1932), London (1935), and France (1948). Awards: Honorary doctorate, University of Lund, Norway, 1929; Nobel prize for literature, 1944. Died: 25 November, 1950.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Himmerlandshistorier. 2 vols., 1904, 1910.
Himmerlandshistorier, edited by Aage Marcus. 1973, 1995.
Skrifter. 8 vols., 1916.
Skrifter. 5 vols., 1925.
Den Lange Rejse. 2 vols., 1938.
Digte, 1901–41. 1943.
Myter, edited by Aage Marcus. 2 vols., 1946, 1960.
Nordisk Foraar: Myter, edited by Niels Birger Wamberg. 1999.

Fiction

Danskere. 1896.
Einar Elkær. 1898.
Himmerlandsfolk. 1898.
Intermezzo. 3 vols., 1900–1901; as The Fall of the King.
Kongens Fald. 1901.
Madame d’Ora. 1904.
Nye Himmerlandshistorier. 1904.
Skovene. 1904.
Hjulet. 1905.
Eksotiske Noveller
Singaporenoveller. 1907
Den Lange Rejse. 6 vols., 1908–22; as The Long Journey.
Braen. 1908.
Lille Ahasverus. 1909
Skibet. 1912
Olivia Marianne. 1915
Norne-Gæst. 1919.
Det tabte Land. 1919.
Christofer Columbus. 1921.
Cimbrernes Tog. 1922.
Himmerlandshistorier. Tredie Samling. 1910.
Jørgine. 1926.
Dr. Renault’s Fristelser. 1935.
Gudrun. 1936.

Myths

Myter og Jagter. 1907.
Nye Myter. 1908.
Myter, ny Samling. 1910.
Myter, fjerde Samling. 1912.
Myter. 3 vols., 1924.
Ved Livets Bred. 1928.
Pisangen. 1932.
Kornmarken. 1932.
Sælernes Ø. 1934.

Poetry

Digte. 1906.
Aarstiderne. 1923.
Verdens Lys. 1926.
Den jydsk Blæst. 1931.
Paaskebadet. 1937.

Essays

Den gotiske Renaissance. 1901.
Den ny Verden. 1907.
Nordisk Aand. 1911.
Rudyard Kipling. 1912.
Introduktion til vor Tidsalder. 1915.
Aarbog 1916. 1916.
Aarbog 1917. 1917.
Johannes Larsen og hans Billeder. 1920.
Æstetik og Udvikling. 1923.
Hamlet. 1924.
Evolution og Moral. 1925.
Aarets Højtider. 1925.
Thorvaldsens Portrætbuster. 1926.
Dyrenes Forvandling. 1927.
Aandens Stadier. 1928.
Retninger i Tiden. 1930.
Form og Sjæl. 1931.
Paa danske Veje. 1931.
Det Blivende. 1934.
Jydske Folkelivsmalere. 1937.
Thorvaldsen. Haandværkeren og Manden. 1938.
Nordvejen. 1939.
Fra Fristaterne. 1939.
Gutenberg. 1939.
Mindets Tavle. 1941.
Vor Oprindelse. 1941.
Om Sproget og Undervisningen. 1942.
Kvinden i Sagatiden. 1942.
Folkeslagene i Østen. 1943.
Afrika. Opdagelsesrejserne. 1949.
Swift og Oehlenschläger. 1950.
Tilblivelsen. 1951.

Other

Sangerinden. 1921.
Darduse. 1937.

*

Bibliography: Johannes V. Jensen. En bibliografi by Frits Johansen and Aage Marcus, 2 vols., 1933–51; Litteratur om Johannes V. Jensen by Aage Jørgensen, 1998.

Critical Studies: Johannes V. Jensen by Alf Henriques, 1938; Johannes V. Jensen: Kurven i hans Udvikling by Otto Gelsted, 1938; Johannes V. Jensen. 1873–20. januar—1943 edited by Felix Nørgaard and Aage Marcus, 1943; Johannes V. Jensen by Niels Birger Wamberg, 1961; Johannes V. Jensen. Liv of forfatterskab by Leif Nedergaard, 1968; Om sammenhængen i Johannes V. Jensens Forfatterskab by Aage Schjøttz-Christensen, 1969; Studier i Johannes V. Jensens forfatterskab by Harry Andersen, 1972; Den unge Johannes

V. Jensen by Oluf Friis, 2 vols., 1974; Den titaniske eros. Drifts- og karakterfortolkning i Johannes V. Jensens forfatterskab by Henrik Wivel, 1982; Johannes V. Jensen by Sven Rossel, 1984; Johannes V. Jensen og den hvide mans byrde: eksotisme og imperialisme by Bent Haugaard, 1984; Johannes V. Jensen by Jørgen Elbek; Kongens Fald: en analyse af Johannes V. Jensens roman by Poul Bager; Et Spring ind i et Billede: Johannes V. Jensens Mytedigtning edited by Aage Jørgensen and Anders Thyrring Andersen, 2000.

* * *

Johannes V. Jensen was, in many ways, a modern mythmaker. Winner of the Nobel prize in literature in 1944, he was a prolific novelist, short story writer, essayist, journalist, travel writer, and poet, and a key figure and trend-setter in early 20th century Danish literature. Jensen's enormous body of work impresses us today with its mythic scope—its ability to invest characters and settings with a sense of timeless, universal importance—and its rootedness in powerful experiences in nature, whether on the windswept flatlands of Western Denmark or the sweltering Malaysian jungle.

Jensen's most famous novel, Kongens Fald (The Fall of the King), recently named the “Danish novel of the century,” has considerable stature in Danish cultural consciousness. Set in the early 16th century, it tells the story of King Christian II, the last ruler to govern all three Scandinavian countries, but by focusing primarily on the adventures, meditations, and personal growth of the King's assistant, the mercenary Mikkel Thøgersen. The novel has been praised for passages of great lyric beauty as well as for harsh realism, notably a stirring and brutal scene in which a horse is butchered. It is also admired for its historically comprehensive depiction of Denmark's loss of stature and power, and for the symbolic portrayal of our impermanence as humans.

Jensen's talents as a mythmaker appear most clearly in two large bodies of work. The first is his major epic, Den Lange Rejse (The Long Journey), a cycle of six novels recounting the history of humankind from the pre-Ice Age era to Columbus' voyage across the Atlantic. This sweeping story, heavily influenced by Darwin's evolutionary theories, follows the progress of different tribes and communities in northern Europe as they struggle with extreme natural hardships and yearn to discover and settle new territories. Jensen's prose is intense in its naturalistic descriptions, and lofty in its depiction of fundamental human themes and symbols.

The second kind of mythmaking appeared over several decades in many collections of approximately 160 short stories and essays which he called Myter [Myths]. Some of these short pieces seem “mythic” in a traditional sense, but many others are journalistic sketches, biographical anecdotes, and travel essays that are realistic works of non-fiction. Whether these “myths” are surreal fables, descriptions of scenes in nature (such as Mount Fujiyama, or a field of waving rye), or specific experiences from Jensen's life, Jensen uses a heightened, poetic language to convey how these moments are charged with timeless significance. Collectively, they reinforce one of his key concerns, which is to depict how each person, event in nature, or moment of observation carries a universal meaning by being linked to other moments across time.

Jensen has had a tremendous influence on modern Danish writing, thanks to his many essays, his vividly realistic tales of his native Jutland in Himmerlandshistorier [Tales from Himmerland], and his poetry, which was written in both traditional verse and in an innovative prose style. Jensen believed in an active, pragmatic attitude to life, but his writing is also permeated with a mythic vision of the interconnectedness and timeless significance of our daily experience of the world.

—Erik Christensen

JEROME, St.

Born: Eusebius Sophronius Hieronymus in Stridon Dalmatia, c. AD 347. Education: Studied Greek and Roman rhetoric in Rome under Aelius Donatus. Career: Went to Trèves (Trier) to dedicate himself to Christian religion; settled to a life of asceticism in Aquileia, on the Adriatic coast of Italy, 370; then went east, studying Greek in Antioch, where he fell ill. Retired to the desert of Chalcis, southeast of Antioch, to learn Hebrew and live as a hermit, c. 375; ordained as priest in Antioch, 377; met Greek theologian Gregory of Nazianzus while travelling to Rome, 382; in Rome became secretary to Pope Damasus I, and revised old Latin texts of the Gospels. Left Rome to lead a pilgrimage to Palestine in 385; travelled to Egypt; settled in Bethlehem, 386; founded a religious house, 389, and worked on his Vulgate, the first Latin translation of the Bible from the original Hebrew, completed c. 405. Died: AD 420.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

[Works; Paris Edition]. 11 vols., 1842–46; also in Patrologia Graeca, edited by Jacques Paul Migne, vols. 19–24, 1857; also edited by J. Hausleiter, I. Hilberg, and S. Reiter, in Corpus Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum Latinorum, vols. 49, 54–56, 59, 1866–1913; in Corpus Christianorum: Series Latina, vols. 72, 78, 1958–59. The Principal Works, translated by W.H. Freemantle, in A Select Library of Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers, series 2, vol. 6. 1893.

Works

De nominis Hebraicis [Book on Hebrew Names], edited by P. de Lagarde. 1870.
De viris illustribus [On Famous Men], edited by G. Herdingius. 1879; also edited by C.A. Bernouilli, 1895, and E.C. Richardson, 1896; as Lives of Illustrious Men, translated by E.C. Richardson, in A Select Library of Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers, series 2, vol. 3, 1892; as On Illustrious Men, translated by Thomas P. Halton, 1999.
Epistolae, as Letters, translated by Charles Christopher Mierow. 1963; edited by James Duff, 1942, and Carl Favus, 1956; selection edited and translated by F.A. Wright, 1933; selection as Satirical Letters, translated by Paul Carroll, 1956.
Prologus Galeatus: The Middle English Bible; Prefatory Epistles of St. Jerome, edited by C. Lindberg. 1978.
Quaestiones Hebraicae in Genesim [Hebrew Questions], edited by P. de Lagarde. 1868; as Saint Jerome's Hebrew Questions on Genesis, translated with introduction and commentary by C.T.R. Hayward, 1995.
Vitae Patrum [Lives of the Saints], as The . . . Lyff of the Old Auncyent Holy Faders Hermytes, translated by William Caxton. 1495, reprinted 1977; as The History of the Monks, translated by E.A.W.

Budge, 1934; selections as Lives of St. Paul the First Hermit, St. Hilarion and Malchus, translated by Sister Marie Liguori Ewald, in Fathers of the Church, vol. 15, 1952.
Vulgate (first Latin translation of Old and New Testaments). 1452–55.
Homilies, translated by Sister Marie Liguori Ewald. 2 vols., 1964–66.
Dogmatic and Political Works, translated by John N. Hritzu, in Fathers of the Church, vol. 53. 1965.
Translation of Jerome's Chronicon with Historical Commentary by Malcolm Drew Donaldson. 1996.

Other

Correspondence (394–419), between Jerome and Augustine of Hippo, translated with introduction and notes by Carolinne White. 1990.

*

Critical Studies: St. Jerome by A. Largent, 1900; Life and Times as Revealed in the Writings of St. Jerome by Mary J. Kelly, 1944; St. Jerome by Mary Beattie, 1945; Hieronymus by L. Huizinga, 1946; St. Jerome and the Bible by George Sanderlin, 1961; St. Jerome as a Biblical Translator by William H. Semple, 1965; The Vulgate as a Translation by Benjamin Kedar-Kipfstein, 1968; Jerome: His Life, Writings and Controversies by John N.D. Kelly, 1975; New Jerome Biblical Commentary, edited by Raymond E. Brown, 1989; Vir Trilinguis: A Study in the Biblical Exegesis of Saint Jerome by Dennis Brown, 1992; Consoling Heliodorus: Commentary of Jerome "Letter 60" by J.H.D. Scourfield, 1992; Jerome, Greek Scholarship and the Hebrew Bible: A Study of the "Quaestiones Hebraicae in Genesim" by Adam Kamesar, 1993.

* * *

St. Jerome is one of the two famous Fathers of the Latin Church from the 4th and 5th centuries, the other being St. Augustine. He is chiefly remembered for having translated the Old and New Testaments from the original Hebrew and Greek into Latin. This translation, later known as the Vulgate, has been the authoritative version of the Catholic Church since the 16th century. St. Jerome's translations and commentaries on the Sacred Scriptures are the most serious intellectual attempt at biblical exegesis produced in Latin from the early Christian Church, written at a time when the Roman Empire was crumbling under the onslaught of the Barbarian invasions.

After studying the Seven Liberal Arts in Rome, Jerome converted to Christianity at the age of 20. A famous dream recounts how Jerome turned away from the Classical pagan authors, notably Cicero, to a new centre of interest, the writings of the Christian revelation, which preoccupied him all the rest of his life. The first stage of his career took place in the East, at Constantinople. Having perfected his knowledge of Greek in AD 379–80, Jerome translated a series of Homilies written by the 3rd-century Greek theologian, Origen of Alexandria. He translated into Latin 14 homilies on the prophet Jeremiah, the same number on Ezekiel, and nine on Isaiah. Later he translated Origen's commentary on the Song of Songs (AD 382–84), and 39 of his homilies on St. Luke (AD 386–90). It is thanks to Jerome's translation that Western Europe became familiar with some of Origen's teaching and thought. Origen remained a decisive influence on Jerome, although he was later moved to criticize what he considered to be heretical elements in Origen's writings.

Imbued with a strong historical sense, Jerome was familiar with the works of both the Latin and Greek historians—Tacitus, Livy, Suetonius, Herodotus, and Xenophon. In AD 382 Jerome set about translating the Chronicle of Eusebius of Caesarea, originally written in Greek at the beginning of the 4th century. Eusebius had written a history of the world from Adam to the reign of Constantine. Jerome, wishing to give Christianity a solid historical context, translated Eusebius' history, bringing it up to his own time. Jerome's work had a major influence during the Middle Ages, and served as a model for later chronicles of Church history, especially for Isidore of Seville (AD 570–636) and the Venerable Bede (c. AD 673–735).

Back in Rome in AD 382, Jerome, under the direction of Pope Damasus I, was entrusted with making a new translation of the Bible. By the 4th century it had become necessary to revise the Old Latin version of the Bible, a text compiled from various anonymous authors from the 2nd and 3rd centuries, and itself a translation from the Septuagint, a translation for Greek-speaking Jews of the Old Testament, made between 301 BC and 150 BC. As well as these two texts, Jerome was able to consult the now lost Hexaplar Text of Origen, a six-column version of the Old Testament in Hebrew and Greek. Jerome's originality and genius exist in his methodological approach. He gained a thorough knowledge of spoken and written Hebrew and studied Syriac, Coptic, and Aramaic, all of which prepared him for the 15-year task he had set himself: to translate the Old Testament from the original Hebrew and the New Testament from its Greek versions, as well as checking with previous translations for inconsistencies and errors. The translation produced by Jerome is the fruit of a vast encyclopaedic knowledge and the work of an extremely erudite man. It earned him the title Doctor Maximus in sacris Scripturis explanandis, the "Greatest Teacher in setting forth the Sacred Scripture." In a decree of 1546, the Council of Trent declared the Vulgate (a term first used by Roger Bacon in the 13th century to describe Jerome's translation) the authorized version of the Bible for the Catholic Church.

In 385 Jerome finally left Rome and moved to Bethlehem, where he remained until his death. It is here that he wrote a large number of exegeses, biblical commentaries, on both the Old and New Testaments, in the 390s and at the beginning of the 5th century. Origen is remembered for favouring the allegorical meaning of Scripture, but Jerome defended the theoretical principle of investigating and establishing its literal sense. He did not neglect interpreting biblical symbols and metaphors, with the help of Jewish scholars.

Three closely related works from the 390s are Jerome's Quaestiones Hebraicae in Genesim (Hebrew Questions on Genesis), a series of notes he made on various passages of the Book of Genesis, stemming from the work of Josephus, Origen, Philo, Porphyry, and Eusebius. In his De nominibus Hebraicis [Book on Hebrew Names] and Onomasticon urbium ac locorum sanctae Scripturae [Book on Cities and Sites of Holy Scripture], Jerome sought to explain the meaning of proper names which could not be translated. With often fanciful and popular etymologies, sometimes devoid of scientific exactness, Jerome, working from the Onomasticon by Eusebius, produced the main source of material on Hebrew proper names, later used during the Middle Ages.

Jerome is also the author of seven controversial treatises, written at times in an acerbic tongue against contemporaries who defended heretical doctrine. These polemical works were begun in the late 370s and Jerome was still venting his temper when Contra pelagianos [Against the Pelagians] was published in AD 415. The previous titles were: Altercatio luciferiani et orthodoxi [Debate of a Luciferian and an Orthodox] (AD 378) in which Jerome was concerned with the validity of heretical baptism; Adversus Helvidium [Against Helvidius]

(AD 383) who doubted the virginity of the Blessed Virgin; Liber contra Jovinianum [Against Jovinian] (AD 393) who criticized celibacy and asceticism; Contra Joannem Hierosolymitanum [Against John of Jerusalem] (AD 397) and Apologia adversus Rufinum [Against Rufinus] (AD 401) who both defended certain "heresies" of Origen; and Contra Vigilantium liber [Against Vigilantius] (AD 406), a critic of the worship of saints and relics. Like St. Augustine, Jerome saw his role as vigilant supporter of an orthodox Christianity, but his polemics sometimes degenerated into personal attacks on men rather than on ideas. Finally, Jerome wrote a handbook on 135 Christian authors, De viris illustribus (On Illustrious Men) (AD 392), based on Suetonius' secular manual, as well as 117 Letters, which enjoyed an enormous popularity during the Middle Ages.

—David Coad

JIMÉNEZ (MANTECÓN), Juan Ramón

Born: Moguer, Spain, 23 December 1881. Education: Educated at a Jesuit school in Cádiz, 1891–96; University of Seville, 1896. Family: Married Zenobia Camprubí Aymar in 1916 (died 1956). Career: In sanatoriums, 1901–05, then a writer: settled in Madrid, 1912, but left Spain in 1936; travelled and taught in Puerto Rico, Cuba, North Carolina, and Florida, 1939–42, Washington, DC, 1942–51; faculty member, University of Puerto Rico, Río Piedras, 1951–58. Awards: Nobel prize for literature, 1956. Died: 29 May 1958.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Libros de poesía, edited by Agustín Caballero. 1957.

Primeros libros de poesía, edited by Francisco Garfias. 1960.

Antología general en prosa, edited by Angel Crespo and Pilar Gómez Bedate. 1981.

Lorca and Jiménez: Selected Poems, edited and translated by Robert Bly, 1997.

Verse

Almas de violeta. 1900.

Ninfeas. 1900.

Rimas. 1902.

Arias tristes. 1903.

Jardines lejanos. 1904.

Elegías. 3 vols., 1908–10.

Olvidanzas. 1909; edited by Francisco Garfias, 1968.

Baladas de primavera. 1910.

La soledad sonora. 1911.

Pastorales. 1911.

Poemas mágicos y dolientes. 1911.

Melancolía. 1912.

Laberinto. 1913.

Platero y yo: Elegía andaluza. 1914; complete edition, 1917; edited by Michael P. Predmore, 1980, Francisco López Estrada, 1986, and Richard Cardwell, 1988; as Platero and I, translated by

- William and Mary Roberts, 1956; translated by Eloise Roach, 1958; Antonio T. De Nicolás, 1986; S. O-Carboneres, 1990; also translated by Myra Cohn Livingston and Joseph F. Domínguez, 1994.
- Estío*. 1916.
- Sonetos espirituales*. 1917; as Spiritual Sonnets, translated by Carl W. Cobb, 1996.
- Diario de un poeta recién casado*. 1917; revised editions, as Diario de poeta y mar, 1948, 1955.
- Poesías escogidas*. 1917.
- Eternidades*. 1918.
- Piedra y cielo*. 1919.
- Segunda antología poética*. 1922.
- Poesía*. 1923.
- Belleza*. 1923.
- Canción*. 1936.
- Voces de mi copla*. 1945.
- La estación total*. 1946.
- Romances de Coral Gables*. 1948.
- Animal de fondo*. 1949.
- Fifty Spanish Poems*, translated by J.B. Trend. 1950.
- Tercera antología poética 1898–1953*. 1957.
- Three Hundred Poems 1903–1953*, translated by Eloise Roach. 1962.
- Dios deseado y deseante*. 1964; as God Desired and Desiring, translated by Antonio T. De Nicolás, 1987.
- Lorca and Jiménez*, translated by Robert Bly. 1973.
- Jiménez and Machado*, translated by J.B. Trend and J.L. Gili. 1974.
- Naked Music: Poems*, translated by Dennis Maloney. 1976.
- Leyenda*, edited by A. Sánchez Romeralo. 1978.
- The Flower Scenes* (selection), translated by J.C.R. Green. 1982.
- Realidad invisible: Libro inédito*, edited by A. Sánchez Romeralo. 1984; as Invisible Reality (bilingual edition), translated by Antonio T. De Nicolás, 1987.
- Time and Space: A Poetic Autobiography*, translated by Antonio T. De Nicolás. 1988.
- The Complete Perfectionist: A Poetics of Work*, edited and translated by Christopher Maurer. 1997.

Other

- Conferencias I: Política poética*. 1936.
- Ciego ante ciegos*. 1938.
- Españoles de tres mundos*. 1942.
- El zaratán*. 1946.
- Selected Writings*, translated by H.R. Hays. 1957.
- Olvidos de Granada*. 1960.
- Cuadernos*, edited by Francisco Garfias. 1960.
- La corriente infinita*. 1961.
- El trabajo gustoso*. 1961.
- Cartas*, edited by Francisco Garfias. 1962.
- Primeras prosas*, edited by Francisco Garfias. 1962.
- Estética y ética estética*. 1967.
- Libros de prosa*. 1969–.
- Stories of Life and Death*, translated by Antonio T. De Nicolás. 1986.
- Light and Shadows: Selected Poems and Prose, 1881–1958*, translated by Dennis Maloney. 1987.
- Ideología: 1897–1957: Metamorfosis IV*, edited by Antonio Sánchez Romeralo. 1990.
- Translator, with Z. Camprubí de Jiménez, Jinetes hacia el mar, by J.M. Synge. 1920.

*

Bibliography: Bibliografía generada de Juan Ramón Jiménez by Antonio Campoamor González, 1982.

Critical Studies: The Victorious Expression: A Study of Four Contemporary Spanish Poets: Miguel de Unamuno, Antonio Machado, Juan Ramón Jiménez, Federico García Lorca, 1964, and The Line in the Margin: Juan Ramón Jiménez and His Readings in Blake, Shelley, and Yeats, 1980, both by Howard T. Young; The Religious Instinct in the Poetry of Jiménez by Leo R. Cole, 1967; Circles of Paradox: Time and Essence in the Poetry of Juan Ramón Jiménez by Paul R. Olson, 1967; Juan Ramón Jiménez by Donald F. Fogelquist, 1976; Jiménez: The Modernist Apprenticeship 1895–1900 by Richard A. Cardwell, 1977; Word and Work in the Poetry of Juan Ramón Jiménez by Mervyn Coke-Enguidanos, 1982; Perfume and Poison: A Study of the Relationship Between José Bergamín and Juan Ramón Jiménez by Nigel Dennis, 1985; Self and Image in Juan Ramón Jiménez: Modern and Post-modern Readings by John C. Wilcox, 1987; Poesía Popular en la Obra de Juan Ramón Jiménez by María Isabel López Martínez, 1992; Encounters with Juan Ramón Jiménez by William Kluback, 1995.

* * *

Although he could be looked upon as the juvenile filter of a highly sentimental form of fin de siècle decadence in his first two books (published in 1900), Juan Ramón Jiménez quickly grew more constrained and became a sensitive transmitter and adapter of Verlaine's style of symbolism, as well as a successor of Bécquer in such works as Rimas [Rhymes] and Arias tristes [Sad Airs]. This early lyrical stage led eventually to the triumph of the Diario de un poeta recién casado [Diary of a Newly-Married Poet]. Written as a result of its author's wedding in New York to Zenobia Camprubí Aymar, a Puerto Rican educated in America and Spain, the book exerted enormous influence on subsequent Hispanic poetry. It stands between the towers of Bécquer's Rimas (1871) and Lorca's Primer romancero gitano (Gypsy Ballads, 1928) as one of the indisputable landmarks of the modern Spanish lyric.

Leaving aside the prose descriptions of New York, Boston, and Philadelphia, the style of the Diario is lucid, stripped down to a minimum of adjectives and expressed in an unrhymed and brief free verse form. The imagists had introduced verso libre to the United States at about that time, and Jiménez reacted with a version he called verso desnudo (naked verse), a short stanza that had considerable impact on younger poets.

In the Diario the characteristic mature tone of Jiménez is set. Highly self-referential but less hermetic than Mallarmé, he began in this book a long series of poems that continue in Eternidades [Eternities] and Belleza [Beauty]. They record epiphanies that express the manifold aspects of a mind perceiving the indifferent beauty of the world. Pebbles and petals on the one hand and the sea and sidereal distances on the other were among the fragments of his surroundings that Jiménez sought to appraise, reconnoitre, and finally to possess.

However, for many readers, Jiménez is the author of only one book: Platero y yo (Platero and I). It is a pastoral prose poem that reveals many layers of meaning and nuance as the sombrely clad poet-narrator, with his Nazarene beard, rides the donkey Platero through the village of Moguer and out into the countryside. The book also contains astute observations on the poor and oppressed.

Jiménez returned to the United States at the outbreak of the Spanish Civil War in 1936. The flat open land of the Florida Everglades inspired the much admired “Espacio” [Space]. An audacious experiment with form, “Espacio” turns discourse into an examination of the possibilities of language. Contingency, the confluence of past and present, memory, spiritual versus carnal love, destiny, and mortality are its themes.

Animal de fondo [Enduring Animal] celebrates the encounter with a humanistic god. Like Blake, he discovered the divinity of the creative consciousness, which seemed to him a god within and without, desiring and desired. On this note of apodictic humanism, with “all the clouds ablaze,” the best of Jiménez’s work concludes.

Except for the uneven early books, his work, although repetitive and unduly extensive—30 books and a mass of unpublished material—sustains a remarkably high quality. He was a scrupulous self-critic and devoted much time to revising and rewriting large amounts of his poetry.

—Howard T. Young

See the essay on Platero and I.

JOHN OF THE CROSS, St.

Also known as San Juan de la Cruz. Born: Juan de Yepes y Álvarez in Fontiveros, Spain, 1542. Education: Studied at Jesuit college, Medina del Campo, 1559–63; took the habit as Fray Juan de Santo Matía; attended Carmelite College of San Andrés, University of Salamanca, 1564–68; ordained, 1567. Career: Boarded at an orphanage by his widowed mother; joined St. Teresa’s reformed Discalced Order of Carmel in a priory at Duruelo, near Fontiveros, as San Juan de la Cruz, 1568–70, then at Mancera, 1570; rector of a new Carmelite college at University of Alcalá, 1571–72; confessor at convent in Avila, 1572–77; controversy over reformation of the Carmelite order caused him to be confined in conventual prison in Toledo, 1577–78, because of his reforming attitudes; escaped to a nearby convent; at El Calvario hermitage near convent at Beas de Segura, 1578–79; rector of new Carmelite college at Baeza, 1579–82; prior of Los Mártires, Granada, 1582–88; prior at Segovia, 1588–91; out of favour with head of Discalced Order, and made a simple friar at Priory of La Peñvela, 1591. Beatified, 1675; Canonized, 1726. Died: 14 December 1591.

PUBLICATIONS

Works

Complete Works, edited and translated by E. Allison Peers. 3 vols., 1934–35; poems also translated by Roy Campbell, 1951; John Frederick Nims, 1959, revised edition, 1968; Kieran Kavanaugh and Otilio Rodríguez, 1964, selection from this edition published as A Song in the Night, 1991; and Willis Barnstone, 1968; as Poems of St. John of the Cross, translated with introduction by Kathleen Jones, 1993; as Poems of St. John of the Cross, translated by Ken Krabbenhoft, 1999.

Vida y obras completas, edited by Crisógono de Jesús, Matías del Niño, and Lucinio Ruano. 1946; 6th edition, 1972.

Four Poems, translated by Yon Oria. 1984.

The Living Flame of Love, translated by J. Vernard. 1990; translated by E. Allison Peers, 1991; as Living Flame of Love: Versions A and B, translated with introduction by Jane Ackerman, 1995.

The Spiritual Canticle, translated by J. Vernard. 1991.

Prayers of Saint John of the Cross, compiled by Alphonse Ruiz. 1991.

Loving God Through the Darkness: Selected Writings of John of the Cross, selected, edited and introduced by Keith Beasley-Topliffe. 2000.

Ascent of Joy: Selected Spiritual Writings, selected, annotated and introduced by Marc Foley. 2002.

Dark Night of the Soul, translated and introduced by Mirabai Starr. 2002.

*

Bibliography: Bibliografía di S. Juan de la Cruz by Pier P. Ottonello, 1966.

Critical Studies: St. John of the Cross and Other Lectures and Addresses, 1946, and Handbook to the Life and Times of Saint Teresa and Saint John of the Cross, 1954, both by E. Allison Peers; Medieval Mystical Tradition and Saint John of the Cross by a Benedictine of Stanbrook Abbey, 1954; San Juan de la Cruz, Saint John of the Cross by Bernardo Gicovate, 1971; St. John of the Cross: His Life and Poetry by Gerald Brenan, 1973; San Juan de la Cruz: Poems by Margaret Wilson, 1975; The Poet and the Mystic: A Study of the Cántico Espiritual of San Juan de la Cruz by Colin P. Thompson, 1977; St. John of the Cross: Alchemist of the Soul by Antonio T. De Nicolás, 1989; St. John of the Cross by Bede Frost, 1991; St. John of the Cross: Studies on His Life, Doctrine, and Times, edited by Justin Panakal, 1991; Knowledge and Symbolization in Saint John of the Cross by Elizabeth Wilhelmsen, 1993; The Contemporary Challenge of John the Cross: An Introduction to His Life and Teaching by Leonard Doohan, 1995; Canciones entre el alma y el esposo of Juan de la Cruz: A Hermeneutical Interpretation by David Brian Perrin, 1996; John of the Cross by Wilfrid McGreal, 1996; Words of Wisdom for Our World: The Precautions and Counsels of St. John of the Cross by Susan Muto, 1996; John of the Cross: Doctor of Light and Love by Kieran Kavanaugh, 1999; St. John of the Cross and the Bhagavad-Gita: Love, Union, and Renunciation by Thomas Myladil, 2000; Mysticism and Cognition: The Cognitive Development of John the Cross as Revealed in His Works by Birgitta Mark, 2000.

* * *

The 22 poems of St. John of the Cross must certainly constitute one of the briefest opuses of any major poet, but, since the 1880s, they have exerted a significant influence on the course of European and American poetry. In his conviction that words provide, at best, only indirect access to experience and that meaning does not exist on a one-to-one basis but, instead, spills over from the play of rhetorical devices (see the 1584 prologue to “The Spiritual Canticle”), St. John anticipated the basic symbolist tenet of indirect expression as expounded by Mallarmé and Valéry (the latter acknowledged the importance to him of St. John). The highly polished lyrical quality of his lines in Spanish inspired Bécquer, whose work represents a transition from romanticism to symbolism, and found a worthy follower in the leading Spanish symbolist poet Juan Ramón Jiménez. St. John’s presence may be discovered in “East Coker,” the first of T.S. Eliot’s Four Quartets, and the image “dark night of the soul” has gained much currency among modern writers.

The major theme of St. John’s poetry is a description of the various stages of development that the soul undergoes in its efforts to become unified with God. In St. John’s hands, this mystical undertaking achieves one of the highest levels of lyricism known to Western poetry. Delicate alliteration and simple diction endow the poems with pellucid beauty. St. John chose to recount the story of divine love by having recourse to the symbols and devices used to portray human love, and this accounts for the strong but refined sensuality that characterizes his work.

“The Dark Night,” “The Spiritual Canticle,” “The Living Flame of Love,” and “Although by Night,” to mention only some of the better-known poems, are nourished by three distinct sources: the pastoral tradition, exemplified in Spanish by Garcilaso de la Vega; the ballads (romances); and the Bible, above all “The Song of Songs.” St. John drew heavily from Solomon’s adaptation of Eastern nuptial songs to limn the marriage between the soul and God.

Part of the modern attraction of these poems is that they lend themselves so readily to multiple levels of meaning. “The Dark Night” is, at once, great amorous verse, a biographical description of escape from prison, and an allegory of mystical experience.

St. John left assiduously detailed comments on these poems. Those for “Ascent of Mount Carmel” and “Dark Night of the Soul” are incomplete; notes on the latter do not get beyond the first 11 lines. The glosses on “The Spiritual Canticle” and “The Living Flame of Love” are complete. Written within the hermeneutic tradition of the Counter-Reformation, these commentaries, except for scattered moments, display none of the consummate literary talent of the poetry. Such is the disparity that it is almost as if one were reading two different authors. Sayings of Light and Love, a collection of aphorisms, and, incidentally, the only autograph of his work extant, displays many pleasant paradoxes, but hardly surpasses any other such miscellany. Clearly, it was only as a lyrical poet that he excelled.

—Howard T. Young

JOHNSON, Uwe

Born: Kämmin, Pomerania (now in Poland), 20 July 1934. Education: Educated at school in Güstrow; University of Rostock, 1952–54;

University of Leipzig, 1954–56, diploma in philosophy 1956. Family: Married Elisabeth Schmidt in 1962; one daughter. Career: Freelance writer; lived in Güstrow until 1959, in West Berlin, 1959–74, and in England from 1975; lecturer, Wayne State University, Detroit, and Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1961; editor of German writing, Harcourt Brace, publishers, New York, 1966–67. Awards: Berlin Academy Fontane prize, 1960; International Publishers prize, 1962; Villa Massimo grant, 1962; Büchner prize, 1971; Raabe prize, 1975; Thomas Mann prize (Lübeck), 1978. Died: 15 March 1984.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Speculations about Jakob and Other Writings, edited by Alexander Stephan. 2000.

Fiction

Mutmassungen über Jakob. 1959; as Speculations about Jakob, translated by Ursule Molinaro, 1963; edited by Alexander Stephan, 2000.

Das dritte Buch über Achim. 1961; as The Third Book about Achim, translated by Ursule Molinaro, 1967.

Karsch und andere Prosa. 1964; translated in part as An Absence, by Richard and Clara Winston, 1969.

Zwei Ansichten. 1965; as Two Views, translated by Richard and Clara Winston, 1966.

Jahrestage: Aus dem Leben von Gesine Cresspahl. 1970–83; as Anniversaries: From the Life of Gesine Cresspahl, vols. 1–2 translated by Leila Vennewitz, 1975; vols. 2–4 translated by Vennewitz and Walter Arndt, 1987.

Von dem Fischer un syner Fru: Ein Märchen nach Philipp Otto Runge. 1976.

Skizze eines Verunglückten. 1982.

Ingrid Babendererde: Reifepfprüfung 1953. 1985.

Versuch, einen Vater zu finden. Marthas Ferien. 1988.

Other

Eine Reise nach Klagenfurt. 1974.

Berliner Sachen: Aufsätze. 1975.

Begleitumstände: Frankfurter Vorlesungen. 1980.

Der 5. Kanal. 1987.

Ich überlege mir die Geschichte: Uwe Johnson im Gespräch, edited by Eberhard Fahlke. 1988.

Editor, Me-ti: Buch der Wendungen, by Bertolt Brecht. 1965.

Editor, with Hans Meyer, Das Werk von Samuel Beckett—Berliner Colloquium. 1975.

Editor, Stich-Worte, by Max Frisch. 1975.

Editor, Verzweigungen, by Margret Boveri. 1977.

Translator, Israel Potter, by Herman Melville. 1960.

Translator, In diesem Land, by John Knowles. 1963.

*

Bibliography: Uwe Johnson: Bibliographie by Nicolai Riedel, 2 vols., 1976; revised edition, 1981.

Critical Studies: Uwe Johnson by Mark Boulby, 1974; Ich und Er: First and Third Person Self-Reference and Problems of Identity in Three Contemporary German-Language Novels by Paul F. Botheroyd, 1976; Beyond the Single Vision: Henry James, Michel Butor, Uwe Johnson by Marianne Hirsch, 1981; Uwe Johnson edited by Rainer Gerlach and Matthias Richter, 1984; Uwe Johnsons Jahrestage edited by Michael Bengel, 1985; Neither Left nor Right: The Politics of Individualism in Uwe Johnson's Work by Kurt J. Fickert, 1987; Difficulties of Saying "I": The Narrator as Protagonist in Uwe Johnson's Jahrestage and Christa Wolf's Kindheitsmuster by Robert K. Shirer, 1988; The Ethics of Narration: Uwe Johnson's Novels from Ingrid Babendererde to Jahrestage by Colin Riordan, 1989; Uwe Johnsons "Jahrestage." Erzählstruktur und politische Subjektivität by Ulrich Fries, 1990; Über Uwe Johnson edited by Raimund Fellingner, 1992; German History and German Identity: Uwe Johnson's Jahrestage by D.G. Bond, 1993; Dialogue With the Reader: The Narrative Stance in Uwe Johnson's Fiction by Kurt Fickert, 1996; Distorted Reflections: The Public and Private Uses of the Author in the Work of Uwe Johnson, Günter Grass and Martin Walser, 1965–1975 by Stuart Taberner, 1998; Understanding Uwe Johnson by Gary L. Baker, 1999.

* * *

Although less well known internationally than Heinrich Böll or Günter Grass, Uwe Johnson is unquestionably one of the towering figures of post-war German literature. Having grown up in the German Democratic Republic and moved to the West in 1959, he became the first German writer of stature to tackle the pre-eminent theme of post-war Germany: the division into separate States. In 1967, after three novels and a volume of short stories which drew on the divisions of Germany for wide-ranging analyses of historical, moral, and literary dilemmas, Johnson embarked on his epic novel Jahrestage (Anniversaries). Completed a year before the author's early death from heart disease in 1984, Anniversaries in its later stages was influenced by a debilitating personal crisis which dogged the last ten years of Johnson's life. A number of minor pieces written during the 1970s reflect both Johnson's life in England and his personal tribulations. Not until after his death did Johnson's first, originally unpublished novel appear.

Begun when Johnson was 19, rewritten four times and finished by the time he was 22, Ingrid Babendererde, published in 1985, is a novel of astonishing maturity. Rejected by publishers in the GDR as politically dangerous, and by a West German publisher as sympathetic to communism, the novel tells the story of the last few days in school of a class about to take school-leaving examinations in April 1953, shortly after Stalin's death and two months before the workers' uprising. The examination becomes political and moral rather than strictly educational, however, because the eponymous heroine comes into conflict with the authorities over the persecution by the State of a religious youth organization. Finally she is left with no choice but to leave for the West. While Ingrid Babendererde, as a school novel, does betray the youth of its author, it nevertheless displays the sensitivity to subtle moral and political dilemmas (presented in this case by life in an aspiring socialist, but actually totalitarian regime) which was to characterize much of Johnson's later work.

Mutmassungen über Jakob (Speculations about Jakob), written in the GDR but published in the Federal Republic in 1959, marked Johnson's emergence as a new literary talent. A young East German railway worker, Jakob Abs, is killed by a train after having been to the Federal Republic to visit his lover, Gesine Cresspahl, whom the secret police had hoped to recruit as an agent through Jakob. The novel concerns the efforts of the characters, including Gesine, the secret police captain Rohlf, and Jonas, Jakob's friend, to reconstruct the last month of Jakob's life. This seems straightforward enough, but extensive use of flashback, unidentified interior monologue, and structural complexity reminiscent of William Faulkner give rise on first reading to a kind of foggy indistinctness which bewildered many early reviewers and critics. Close analysis shows, however, that the work's component parts can be reassembled in an easily comprehensible form. Despite the title, then, the reader is called upon not to speculate, but to observe with the utmost precision. The speculation in which the characters are forced to indulge, immersed as they are in an atmosphere of extreme mutual mistrust arising from the exigencies of the Cold War, reflects the reality of a divided Germany which was no more than partly penetrable by those caught up in its complexities.

Karsh, a Hamburg journalist, the hero of Johnson's second published novel, Das dritte Buch über Achim (The Third Book about Achim), similarly feels the effects of mutual inter-German mistrust upon his own person. In response to a telephone invitation from a former girlfriend, Karsch travels to the GDR. His former girlfriend is now closely involved with Joachim ("Achim") T., famous racing cyclist and folk-hero, and the subject of two biographies. Karsch is asked to produce a third book about Achim, which he works on but never finishes. The reasons for his failure form the main object of interest. The fallible workings of memory (and of literature), as well as the linguistic divergence between the two countries which engenders epistemological clashes, all contribute to the problems Karsch encounters. Ultimately, however, political pressures conflict with ethical dictates: unable to preserve his integrity as a writer and simultaneously connive at the State's self-interested remodelling of Achim's image, the journalist makes his decision to return empty-handed to the West, constrained by the moral imperatives which characterize so much of Johnson's work.

Johnson re-worked the Achim story in his collection of short prose Karsch und andere Prosa [Karsch and Other Prose], concentrating on the breakdown which Karsch suffered on his return to the West. The collection also contains a number of short stories prefiguring the later novel Anniversaries. Zwei Ansichten (Two Views), topped the West German bestseller lists with its topical tale of two lovers divided by the Berlin wall. This is no Romeo and Juliet, however, since the motives of both participants are complex and ambiguous. Although the young East German woman, Nurse D., does eventually reach West Berlin, there is no fairytale happy ending. The apparent simplicity of star-crossed lovers seeking happiness in each other's arms is superseded by the realization that the characters are in the grip of complex historical forces which they are unable to comprehend and powerless to control.

The effect which historical circumstances have on the lives of individuals forms a central concern in Johnson's greatest achievement, Anniversaries. The four-volume novel recounts a year in the life of Gesine Cresspahl (familiar from Speculations about Jakob), who lives and works as a single mother in New York with her 11-year-old daughter Marie (daughter of Jakob Abs). Each day of the year in question—20 August 1967 to 20 August 1968—is individually documented on two chronological levels. The first documents daily events in New York and the United States as perceived by Gesine through her reading of the New York Times and her personal experience. The second follows Gesine's efforts to retrace the story of her family and forebears in pre-war Germany, progressing through the war and the establishment of the GDR to the early 1960s when Gesine left for the United States. These two levels are connected using sophisticated narratological devices as anniversaries of events in the earlier story occur, though both can be read as stories in their own right. The novel encompasses a broad sweep of 20th-century history, concentrating particularly on the moral dilemmas faced by Gesine and her parents, dilemmas encapsulated in the "moral Switzerland" problem: "Where is the moral Switzerland that we can emigrate to?" asks Gesine in despair. While Gesine bitterly regrets her parents' failure to leave Nazi Germany when they had the opportunity, she finds herself bringing up her own daughter in a country riven by race-riots and embroiled in a hopeless, costly war. Gesine finds no solution, and her hopes of experiencing democratic, humane socialism are dashed as she plans a trip to Czechoslovakia on the day of the Soviet invasion, the final day of the Anniversaries year. Such a brief description cannot do justice to what is a richly interwoven, absorbing, and meticulously crafted text. Anniversaries stands out as one of the great German novels of the post-war era, indeed of the 20th century, encapsulating as it does the origins and development of many of the problems which beset the world we know today.

—Colin Riordan

JUANA INÉS DE LA CRUZ, Sor

Born: Juana Inés Ramírez de Asbaje (or Asuaje) in San Miguel de Nepantla, Viceroyalty of New Spain (now Mexico), 12 November 1651 (some sources give 1648). Education: Largely self-educated. Career: Invited to attend the court of the Spanish Viceroy's wife, the Marquise de Mancera, in Mexico City, c. 1659, and subsequently wrote verses for official events; member of the Carmelite convent in Mexico City, 1667 (for three months); entered Jeronymite Convent of San Paula, Mexico City, 1669, and adopted the religious name Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz; abandoned writing, c. 1693, because of the increasing pressure from Church authorities after 1689. Died: 17 April 1695.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Obras escogidas, edited by Manuel Toussaint. 1928.
Obras completas, edited by Alfonso Mendez Plancarte and Alberto Salceda. 4 vols., 1951–57.
Poesía, teatro y prosa (selections), edited by Antonio Castro Leal. 1965.

Obras selectas, edited by Georgina Sabat de Rivers and Elias L. Rivers. 1976.

Obra selecta, edited by Lusi Sáinz de Medrano. 1987.

Answer: Including a Selection of Poems, translated by Electa Arenal and Amanda Powell. 1994.

Poems, Protest, and a Dream: Selected Writings, translated with notes by Margaret Sayers Peden. 1997.

Verse

Villancicos. 12 vols., 1676–91.

Poesías escogidas, edited by Antonio Elías de Molins. c. 1901.

Poesías completas, edited by Emilio Abreu Gómez. 1940.

Poesías (selection), edited by Elena Amat. 1941.

The Pathless Grove: Sonnets, translated by Pauline Cook. 1950.

El sueño, edited by Alfonso Méndez Plancarte. 1951; as Primero sueño, edited by Gerardo Moldenhauer and Juan Carlos Merlo, 1953; as El sueño, translated by John Campion, 1983; as Sor Juana's Dream, translated by Luis Harss, 1986.

Endechas, edited by Xavier Villaurrutia. 1952.

Sonetos y endechas, edited by Rosa Chacel. 1980.

Lírica, edited by Raquel Asún. 1983.

Poems: A Bilingual Anthology, edited and translated by Margaret Sayers Peden. 1985.

Sonnets of Sor Juana Ines de la Cruz in English Verse, translated by Carl W. Cobb. 2001.

Plays (individual 17th-century editions)

Auto sacramental de "El divino Narciso" (produced 1689). 1690; as Divine Narcissus, translated and annotated by Patricia A. Peters and Renée Domeier, 1998.

Los empeños de una casa (produced 1683). N.d.; as The House of Trials, translated by David Pasto, 1996.

Amor es más laberinto. N.d.

Neptuno alegórico. N.d.

Three Secular Plays of Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz by Guillermo Schmidhuber in collaboration with Olga Marthat Peña Doria, translated by Shelby Thacker. 2000.

Other

Carta atenagórica. 1690.

Explicación sucinta del arco triunfal. . . N.d.

La respuesta a Sor Filotea de la Cruz. 1691; as A Woman of Genius: The Intellectual Biography of Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz, translated by Margaret Sayers Peden, 1982.

[Works]. 3 vols., 1691–1700.

1. Inundación castálida (includes verse and the play El neptuno alegórico). 1689; as Poemas, 1690; edited by Georgina Sabat de Rivers, as Inundación castálida, 1982.
2. Segundo volumen de las obras (includes "El sueño"; the autos El cetro de José, El mártir del Sacramento, San Hermenegildo, El divino Narciso; the comedies Los empeños de una casa, Amor es más laberinto; and Crisis sobre un sermón: Carta atenagórica). 1692.
3. Fama y obras póstumas (includes La respuesta a Sor Filotea). 1700.

Carta atenagórica; Respuesta a Sor Filotea, edited by Emilio Abreu Gómez. 1934.
Poesía y teatro, edited by Matilde Muñoz. 1946.
Antología Sorjuanina, edited by Giuseppe Bellini. 1961.
Antología, edited by Elias L. Rivers. 1968.
Antología clave, edited by Hernán Loyola. 1971.
Selección, edited by L. Ortega Galindo. 1978.
A Sor Juana Anthology (bilingual edition), translated by Alan S. Trueblood. 1988.
Sor Juana's Love Poems; Poemas de amor: A Bilingual Edition, translated by Joan Larkin and Jaime Manrique. 1997.

*

Bibliography: Bibliografía de Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz by Dorothy Schons, 1927; Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz: Bibliografía y biblioteca by Emilio Abreu Gómez, 1934.

Critical Studies: "Some Obscure Points in the Life of Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz" by Dorothy Schons, in Modern Philology, 24, 1926; La santificación de Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz by Genaro Fernández MacGregor, 1932; Vida de Sor Juana by P. Diego Calleja, 1936; La ruta de Sor Juana, 1938, and Semblanza de Sor Juana, 1938, by Emilio Abreu Gómez; Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz by Clara Carilla, 1944; Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz: Poetisa de corte y convento by Elizabeth Wallace, 1944; Juana de Asbaje by Amado Nervo, 1946; Cuatro documentos relativos a Sor Juana by Lota Spell, 1947; "The Tenth Muse of America" by Alfonso Reyes in The Position of America, 1950; Razón y pasión de Sor Juana by Anita Arroyo, 1952; Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz by Patricia Cox, 1958; Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz: Claro en la selva by C.G. de Gullarte, 1958; Baroque Times in Old Mexico by Leonard Irving, 1959; "A Revision of the Philosophy of Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz," in Hispania, 43, 1960, "The Alleged Mysticism of Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz," in Hispanic Review, 28(3), 1960, "The Primero sueño of Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz: A Revision of the Criticism," in Revista Iberoamericana de Literatura, 15, 1965, and Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz, 1971, all by Gerard C. Flynn; Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz: La décima musa de México by Ludwig Pfandl, translated by Juan Antonio Ortega y Medina, 1963; Genio y figura de Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz by Ramón Xirau, 1967; Autos sacramentales de Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz by Sergio Fernández, 1970; "Human and Divine Love in the Poetry of Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz" by Arthur Terry, in Studies in Spanish Literature of the Golden Age, 1973; Del encausto a la sangre: Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz by Mirta Aguirre, 1975; Lo americano en el teatro de Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz by María E. Pérez, 1975; Juana de Asbaje: Aproximación a la autobiografía de la Décima Musa by Carlos E. Galeano Ospina, 1976; El Sueño de Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz: Tradiciones literarias y originalidad by Georgina Sabat de Rivers, 1977; "The Tenth Muse," in Americas, 30(2), 1978, and "Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz: Let Your Women Keep Silence in the Churches," in Women's Studies in International Forum, 5(8), 1985, both by Nina M. Scott; Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz ante la historia by Francisco de la Maza and Elías Trabulse, 1980, and El hermetismo y Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz: Orígenes e interpretación by Trabulse, 1980; Virtue or Vice?: Sor Juana's Use of Thomistic Thought by Constance M. Montross, 1981; "Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz Speaking the Mother Tongue," in University of Dayton Review, 16(2), 1983, and "The Convent as a Catalyst for Autonomy: Two Hispanic Nuns of the Seventeenth Century," in Women in Hispanic Literature: Icons and Fallen Idols edited by Beth Miller, 1983, and "This Life Within Me Won't Keep Still," in Reinventing the Americas edited by Bell Gale Chevigny and Gari Laguardia, 1986, all by Electra Arenal; "Hermetic Traditions in Sor Juana's Primero sueño" by Manuel Durán, in University of Dayton Review, 16(2), 1983; Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz; o, Las trampas de la Fe by Octavio Paz, 1982, as Sor Juana; or, The Traps of Faith, translated by Margaret Sayers Peden, 1988; Plotting Women: Gender and Representation in Mexico by Jean Franco, 1989; Feminist Perspectives on Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz edited by Stephanie Merrim, 1991; Juana Inés de la Cruz and the Theology of Beauty by George H. Tavard, 1991; Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz: Religion, Art, and Feminism by Pamela Kirk, 1998; Early Modern Women's Writing and Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz by Stephanie Merrim, 1999.

* * *

Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz has been hailed as the first great writer of Spanish America, and has been compared to Anne Bradstreet (1612–71), her New England contemporary whose poetry became one of the first literary landmarks of North America. That two such powerful writers in the New World of the 17th century should have been women has been the focus of feminist critical attention, especially since both wrote immensely personal poetry, and both questioned the subservient role of women generally accepted at the time.

Sor Juana was well-educated, and claims that her desire to study was a powerful motivating force from the age of barely three. She claimed to have pressed her mother to allow her to attend university in Mexico City dressed as a boy (women were not allowed to study at universities in the colonies). She became a nun in order to "live alone and avoid obligations that would disturb my freedom to study," even though she acknowledged that there would be aspects of convent life with which she might find it difficult to cope. She seems to have been a rebel all her life, refusing to accept easy solutions, writing, despite the misgivings of powerful members of the clergy, and searching for ways to express her radical views on the role of women in the world. Jean Franco has examined Sor Juana's attempts to move beyond gender, to escape from the limitations of a society structured along binary oppositions of male and female, in which the female was the subordinate partner. As a nun, she claimed to be outside sexual difference, and her poem Primero sueño (Dream), which she said was her only work written just for herself, is the metaphysical journey of a soul which, in dream, is set free from the constraints of gender categorization.

Most of her work (all of it, she claimed, in her autobiographical La respuesta a Sor Filotea de la Cruz, translated as A Woman of Genius: The Intellectual Biography of Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz), was written for specific purposes, at the request of a patron, or to celebrate a certain event. Her earliest poems were dedicated to the Viceroy's wife; a number of poems were written for religious or viceregal holidays; and she wrote ballads, songs, carols and poems on religious themes. Her play Los empeños de una casa (The House of Trials) was performed in 1683 for the Viceroys. Her later play, generally considered to be a masterpiece, El divino Narciso (Divine Narcissus) was written in 1688 and performed in Madrid the following year. At this time Sor Juana was at the height of her fame, but in 1690 the antagonism felt for her by some of the bishops reached crisis point. Sor Juana's interpretation of the Bible had a very definite slant: she consistently praised the virtues of heroic female figures, not only Mary and Mary Magdalene and the women of the New Testament, but powerfully symbolic women such as Esther, Rebecca, Deborah, and Judith. Her criticism of the Jesuit Father Vieyra's Maundy Thursday sermon, intended for private circulation only, was published without her consent by the Bishop of Puebla using the pseudonym of Sor Filotea under the title of Carta atenagórica [Letter Worthy of Athene]. The publication of this text caused a scandal, as did her reply that appeared three months later, A Woman of Genius. The effect of this crisis was a desperate one for Sor Juana: publicly humiliated and rebuked by the Church authorities, she was devastated by what she saw as an act of treachery by the Bishop of Puebla in publishing a private document. Although a new edition of her poems came out in 1689 (the Inundación castálida), and her religious autos were published in 1692 (see [Works], 3 vols., 1691–1700), she dismantled her library, and in 1694 again took her vows as a nun, to proclaim symbolically her decision to live under a new austerity. In 1695 she died during a plague epidemic.

The end of Sor Juana's writing career was poignant one. After a lifetime of struggle, during which she had asserted her voice with a power unique in the Americas—and in the Spanish-speaking world as a whole—she was finally silenced by the very forces of repressive authoritarianism against which she had fought. In A Woman of Genius she comments bitterly on how her desire to learn and to write “led me closer to the flames of persecution,” declaring that never again would she speak out to defend herself. The dismantling of her personal library was a potent sign of her decision to choose silence in the face of overt hostility from her religious superiors.

The emotive details of Sor Juana's biography, and the fascination that the content of her works has for today's readers, has meant that less attention has been paid to the skills of her poetic technique. Influenced by Góngora and the Golden Age writers, Sor Juana can be described as a Baroque lyricist, whose use of rhyme, rhythm, and imagery distinguish her as a particularly gifted poet. Octavio Paz claims that Quevedo and Lope de Vega were ultimately greater writers, but that what makes Sor Juana's writing unique is the combination of passion and conscience, of dynamic energy and a questing soul. We might add to that the tragic conflict between a mind that wanted to explore the universe and tried to do so through the pen, and the body of a woman in a nun's habit, firmly and constrictingly located in the world of a 17th-century colonial convent.

—Susan Bassnett

JÜNGER, Ernst

Born: Heidelberg, Germany, 29 March 1895. Education: Educated at Lyceum II, 1901–05, Hanover Internaten, Hanover and Braunschweig, 1905–07; studied biology in Leipzig and Naples, 1923–26. Military Service: Joined the French Foreign Legion, 1913, brought back home by his father; volunteer with the German army during World War I, served on the Western Front, 1914–18; captain during World War II, discharged 1944. Family: Married 1) Gretha von Jeinsen in 1925 (died 1960), two sons (one deceased); 2) Liselotte Lohrer in 1962. Career: Officer in the Reichswehr, 1919–23; contributor to radical right-wing journals including Standarte, Arminius, Widerstand, and Der Vormarsch, 1925–31; moved to Berlin, 1927; freelance writer from 1927; lived in Goslar, 1933–36; Überlingen, 1936–39; Kirchhorst, 1939–48; Revensburg, 1948–50; and Wilflingen, from 1950; banned from publishing his work in 1945; ban lifted, 1949; travelled extensively in the 1950s and 1960s; co-editor of the journal Antaios, 1959–71. Awards: Culture prize (Goslar), 1955; City of Bremen prize, 1955; literary prize of the Federal League of German Industry, 1960; Immermann prize (Düsseldorf), 1965; Humboldt Society gold medal, 1981, Goethe prize, 1982; Accademia Casentinese, Dante Alighieri International prize, 1987; Tevere Intern prize, 1987. Honorary Doctorate: University of Bilbao, Spain. Great Order of Merit, Federal Republic of Germany, 1959. Died: 17 February 1998 in Wilflingen, Germany.

PUBLICATIONS

Fiction

- In Stahlgewittern: Aus dem Tagebuch eines Stosstruppführers*. 1920; as The Storm of Steel: From the Diary of a German Storm-Troop Officer on the Western Front, translated by Basil Creighton, 1929.
- Das Wäldchen 125: Eine Chronik aus den Grabenkämpfen 1918*. 1925; as Copse 125: A Chronicle from the Trench Warfare of 1918, translated by Basil Creighton, 1930.
- Afrikanische Spiele*. 1936; as African Diversions, translated by Stuart Hood, 1954.
- Auf den Marmorklippen*. 1939; as On the Marble Cliffs, translated by Stuart Hood, 1947.
- Heliopolis: Rückblick auf eine Stadt*. 1949.
- Besuch auf Godenholm* (stories). 1952.
- Gläserne Bienen*. 1957; revised edition, 1960; as The Glass Bees, translated by Louise Bogan and Elizabeth Mayer, 1961.
- Sturm*. 1963.
- Die Zwille*. 1973.
- Eumeswil*. 1977; translated by Joachim Neugroschel, 1993.
- Aladins Problem*. 1983; as Aladdin's Problems, translated by Joachim Neugroschel, 1993.
- Eine gefährliche Begegnung*. 1985.

Other

- Der Kampf als inneres Erlebnis*. 1922.
- Feuer und Blur: Ein kleiner Ausschnitt aus einer grossen Schlacht*. 1925.
- Das abenteuerliche Herz: Aufzeichnungen bei Tag und Nacht* (essays). 1929.
- Die totale Mobilmachung*. 1931.
- Hier spricht der Feind*. 1931.
- Der Arbeiter: Herrschaft und Gestalt*. 1932.
- Blätter und Steine* (essays). 1934.
- Geheimnisse der Sprache: Zwei Essays*. 1934.
- Lob der Vokale*. 1937.

Gärten und Strassen: Aus den Tagebüchern von 1939 und 1940 (diaries). 2 vols., 1942.

Myrdun: Briefe aus Norwegen. 1943.

Der Friede: Ein Wort an die Jugend Europas, ein Wort an die Jugend der Welt. 1945; as The Peace, translated by Stuart Hood, 1948.

Atlantische Fahrt: Nur für Kriegsgefangene gedruckt (diaries). 1947.

Sprache und Körperbau. 1947; revised edition, 1949.

Ein Inselfrühling: Ein Tagebuch aus Rhodos. 1948.

Strahlungen (diary). 1949.

Über die Linie. 1950.

Das Haus der Briefe. 1951.

Am Kieselstrand. 1951.

Der Waldgang. 1951.

Drei Kiesel. 1952.

Der gordische Knoten. 1953.

Ernst Jünger: Eine Auswahl, edited by Arnim Mohler. 1953.

Das Sanduhrbuch. 1954.

Geburtstagsbrief: Zum 4. November 1955. 1955.

Die Herzmuschel. 1955.

Sonnentau: Pflanzenbilder. 1955.

Am Sarazenturm (on Sardinia). 1955.

Die Schleife, Dokumente zum Weg. 1955.

Rivarol. 1956.

Serpentara. 1957.

San Pietro. 1957.

Jahre der Okkupation (diary). 1958.

Mantrana. 1958.

An der Zeitmauer. 1959.

Der Weltstaat: Organismus und Organisation. 1960.

Ein Vormittag in Antibes. 1960.

Sgraffiti (essays). 1960.

Werke. 10 vols., 1960–65.

Das spanische Mondhorn. 1962.

Fassungen. 1963.

An Friedrich Georg zum 65. Geburtstag. 1963.

Typus, Name, Gestalt. 1963.

Grenzgänge (essays). 1966.

Subtile Jagden (essays). 1967.

Im Granit (on Corsica). 1967.

Zwei Inseln: Formosa, Ceylon. 1968.

Federbälle. 1969.

Annäherungen: Drogen und Rausch. 1970.

Lettern und Ideogramme (on Japan). 1970.

Ad Hoc (essays). 1970.

Sinn und Bedeutung: Ein Figurenspiel (essays). 1971.

Zahlen und Götter. Philemon und Baucis: Zwei Essays. 1974.

Eine Begegnung: acht Abbildungen nach Zeichnungen und Briefen von Ernst Jünger und Alfred Kubin. (correspondence). 1975.

Sämtliche Werke. 18 vols., 1978–83.

Siebzig verweht (diary). 2 vols., 1980–81.

Flugträume (selections). 1983.

Autor und Autorschaft. 1984.

Die Schere. 1990.

Editor, Aufmarsch des Nationalismus. 1926.

Editor, Die Unvergessenen. 1928.

Editor, Das Antlitz des Weltkrieges. 1930.

Editor, Krieg und Krieger. 1930.

Editor, Luftfahrt ist not! 1930.

Editor, Der feurige Weg, by Franz Schauwecker. 1930.

Editor, Der Kampf um das Reich. 1931.

*

Bibliography: Ernst Jünger: Eine Bibliographie by Karl O. Paetel, 1953; Bibliographie der Werke Ernst Jüngers by Hans Peter des Coudres, 1970.

Critical Studies: Ernst Jünger: A Writer of Our Time by J.P. Stern, 1953; Ernst Jünger by Heinz Ludwig Arnold, 1966; Ernst Jünger by Wolfgang Kaempter, 1981; Ernst Jünger and the Nature of Political Commitment by Roger Woods, 1982; Ernst Jünger: Leben und Werk in Bildern und Texten edited by Heimo Schwillk, 1988; Ernst Jünger by Martin Meyer, 1990; Ernst Jünger's Visions and Revisions on the European Right by Marcus Paul Bullock, 1992; The Details of Time: Conversations with Ernst Jünger by Julien Hervier, translated by Joachim Neugroschel, 1995; Ernst Jünger and Germany: Into the Abyss, 1914–1945 by Thomas Nevin, 1996; A Dubious Past: Ernst Jünger and the Politics of Literature after Nazism by Elliot Y. Neaman, 1999.

* * *

Ernst Jünger is not only German's longest-lived author, but also one of its most controversial literary figures. Considered to have been among the leading, most innovative, and most productive writers of the country's intellectual and political right in his earlier years, in mid-career he assumed the position of an iconoclast and an inhabitant of the proverbial ivory tower without, however, completely eschewing his earlier political and philosophical convictions. Distancing himself from the tenets and practices of National Socialism prior to and during the years of the Third Reich, he nonetheless did not espouse a very strong and open anti-Nazi stance, preferring the status of a not always clearly defined "Inner Emigration" to that of the Nazi opposition in exile. His later years are highlighted by extensive travels and keen stylistic and thematic experimentations in his literary endeavours.

An adventurer at heart who not merely fantasized about the outer limits of human existence in his fiction but actively sought to experience such situations and encounters throughout his life, Jünger combines the pursuits and experiences of the soldier/warrior with those of the investigator, researcher, and traveller in a fashion that betrays an intellectuality rooted in the Renaissance. Deeply steeped in the German classical intellectual tradition, yet also influenced by French moralism, his plots and themes deal not just with past and present settings and conditions, but imaginatively conjure up futuristic developments. His style can be said to have varied from "heroic realism" via surrealism to aberrant sado-masochism in his fiction. His extensive essayistic work, on the other hand, displays a stylistic lucidity which stands in sharp contrast to the enigmatic prose of Heidegger, a philosopher with whom Jünger engaged in a lively intellectual exchange of ideas for many years.

Jünger's work can be roughly divided into three segments, irrespective of the chronology involved. The perhaps most basic part of it, underlying the other two, is thematically guided by his war-time experiences from 1915 to 1918 and his post-war political convictions issuing therefrom and extending into World War II and beyond. It includes In Stahlgewittern (The Storm of Steel), Das Wäldchen 125 (Copse 125), Der Kampf als inneres Erlebnis [Fighting as an Inner Experience], Feuer und Blut [Fire and Blood], Die totale Mobilmachung [Total Mobilization], Der Friede (The Peace), and Der Weltstaat [The World State]. This segment reflects both the impact of World War I on his thinking and the reverberations of the experiences he gathered during and after World War II. The central core of his oeuvre consists of fiction. The principal works represented in this part are Afrikanische Spiele (African Diversions), Auf den Marmorklippen (On the Marble Cliffs), Heliopolis, Gläserne Bienen (The Glass Bees), Eumeswil, and Eine gefährliche Begegnung [A Dangerous Meeting]. Although these works also incorporate personal experience and philosophical constructs, they are primarily imaginative literature intent on both entertaining the reader and provoking his intellectual, if not visceral, reaction to themes of supreme interest to the author himself. The third part of his writings deals with nonpolitical observations, travel experiences, and investigations that occupy a middle ground between scientific enquiry and innermost reflections. Examples of this type of writing, though interspersed in and throughout his oeuvre, are principally Das abenteuerliche Herz, Geheimnisse der Sprache, Sprache und Körperbau, Sgraffiti; Sonnentau; Pflanzenbilder, and Annäherungen: Drogen und Rausch.

The Storm of Steel is not only the trend setter in Jünger's largest segment of writings with monographic leanings but also the work that established his national and international reputation. Written in diary form and covering his own war experiences from 1915 to 1918, the book gives an inside view of the plight and the glory of the soldier in modern warfare without, however, passing judgement on the moral dilemma it generates. Subsequent works—such as Copse 125, Der Kampf als inneres Erlebnis, and Feuer und Blut—deal with the same basic experiences and sentiments in a more systematic and deliberate manner. In Der Kampf als inneres Erlebnis, Jünger celebrates war as the expression of an elementary natural force. He puts this metaphysical sublimation of warfare on a more expansive philosophical and political basis in his treatise Die totale Mobilmachung. This work, in effect, advocates the total mobilization of society for total warfare. However, a complete reversal of attitude brought about the certainty of Germany's inevitable defeat in World War II is voiced in the treatise Der Friede. Jünger wrote this essay in secret at the height of Nazi power, and circulated it among friends for commentary. Field Marshal Erwin Rommel, an avowed enemy of Hitler's military adventurism, saw it as an ethical basis for resistance to the Nazi regime. The two-part document not only envisages the achievement of a just and equitable peace, but also develops a political programme along philosophical lines that might serve as a guideline for both Europe and the world to avoid future conflicts. Nearly two decades later, Jünger wrote a sequel to Der Friede. He called it Der Weltstaat: Organismus und Organisation. In this work he envisages a world state that is no longer a source of external or internal conflict, as previous nation states had been, but a guarantor of a just, organic, and moral mode of human existence, freed from the coercive forces of organization.

Jünger's fiction is highlighted by two novels, On the Marble Cliff and Heliopolis. In contrast to his earlier narrative African Diversions which took many of its cues from his youthful excursion into Africa while attempting to join the Foreign Legion, On the Marble Cliffs is an abstract, surrealist novel in a timeless setting that not only has futuristic and mythic features, but also reflects contemporary scenarios. Although the peaceful life of contemplation and pursuit of botanical and linguistic studies proves illusory to the anonymous narrator and his brother Otho in a belligerent human world bent on self-destruction, the brothers can escape annihilation and may be able to re-establish themselves at a distant shore. This novel with its thinly veiled references to the political power struggles in Germany in the 1920s and 1930s has been hailed as an exemplary work of the "Inner Emigration," a loose movement of writers remaining in Germany during the Nazi era and criticizing the regime in symbolic and allegorical form. Heliopolis, by contrast, is a clearly futuristic novel in which man's possible future development is outlined in a highly politicized and philosophical fashion. The city-state Heliopolis is an imaginary place postdating the era of the second nihilism and that of the global workers' state. Yet it has not achieved internal peace. As in On the Marble Cliffs, dialectically opposed political forces, representing the opposite world views of technological perfection and human perfectibility, vie for political dominance. Although the novel's protagonist, Lucius de Geer, whose personal characteristics reflect Jünger's own, fails in his political undertakings on the side of humanist causes, he gains intellectually and spiritually. His celebration of free will and altruistic individualism and his rejection of collectivism and the heartless worship of power again betray Jünger's changed world-view in his maturing years. Later fiction, principally represented in The Glass Bees and Eumeswil, deals further with the ideas expounded in Heliopolis, albeit in more limited and less universal settings. Jünger's later novel, Eine gefährliche Begegnung, however, is a more traditional work that takes the reader back into the Paris of the late 19th century and the sensuality, intrigues, murderous plots, superficiality, and decadence of an epoch that in many ways reflects our own.

Jünger's reflective and pseudo-scientific writings, while basically also experiential, differ from his previously categorized works not only in content but also in style. They are stylistically more diverse than those dealing with his war-time experiences and their imprints in his intellectual and political psyche. What is most significant, however, is the fact that this body of writing is also endowed with a Goethean inclination toward the universal. The two most interesting works in this segment are Das abenteuerliche Herz [The Adventurous Heart] and Annäherungen: Drogen und Rausch [Approach: Drugs and Intoxication]. While Das abenteuerliche Herz, a collection of essays, was in its original version still very much influenced by his World War I experiences, Jünger's intention went from the very outset beyond the merely adventurous. His aim was both internal and external. Internally he meant to convey impressions of a more personal nature. Externally—and this became the overriding intent in the revised edition of the work—he aimed to discuss the whole gamut of the organic life of man, animal, and plant, a Goethean undertaking. In contrast to Sgraffiti, a volume of essays patterned after Das abenteuerliche Herz and an obvious sequel to this work, Annäherungen: Drogen und Rausch is a book about mind-altering drugs and their effect on the human psyche. Although Jünger experimented with drugs throughout his adult life, he was, unlike some of his literary predecessors in this area such as Thomas De Quincey, Charles Baudelaire, and Edgar Allan Poe, never an addict. The experimentation was another one of his attempts to penetrate the innermost core of his psyche.

This last discussed work in particular makes it clear that Jünger was basically a neo-Romantic at heart who was constantly journeying to and probing the higher as well as the innermost regions of both his consciousness and his intellect. This overwhelming urge on his part also helps to explain his argumentative, essayistic, observational, reflective, and speculative style, which defies easy labelling and categorization. His proto-fascist political leanings early in life have done much harm to his later reception. His contribution to literature and thought has consequently been vastly underrated, and his reputation as a major writer in 20th-century German, indeed world, literature appears to be in need of a revision.

—Carl Steiner

JUVENAL

Born: Decimus Junius Juvenalis, c. AD 50–65, or perhaps later. Possibly native of Aquinum. Career: Wrote his Satires under Trajan and Hadrian. May have been wealthy; does not mention a patron. Accounts of his army career and exile by Domitian have no foundation. Mentioned by Martial, and was acquainted with him, otherwise not well-known in his own lifetime. Died: after AD 130.

PUBLICATIONS

Works

[Satires], edited by A.E. Housman. 1931; also edited by W.V. Clausen (with satires by Persius), 1959, revised edition, 1992, J.D. Duff, 1970, and John Ferguson (with commentary), 1979; 1, 3, and 10 edited by Niall Rudd and Edward Courtney, 1977; edited and translated by G.G. Ramsey [Loeb Edition], 1918, revised edition, 1940; translated by John Dryden and others, 1735, reprinted 1979; also translated by T. Sheridan, 1739; Edward Owen, 2 vols., 1785; F. Hodgson, 1807; Charles Badham, 1814; James Sinclair, 1814; Lewis Evans, 1848; T.J. Arnold and R. Mongan, 1889; W. Gifford, 1906; Rolfe Humphries, 1958; Hubert Creekmore, 1963; Jerome Mazzaro, 1965; Peter Green, 1967; Charles Plumb, 1968; Steven Robinson, 1983; Niall Rudd, 1991; 13 Satires, translated by J.E.B. Mayor, 1872–78; also translated by H.A. Strong and A. Leeper, 1882; Sidney G. Owen, 1903; commentary by J.E.B. Mayor (omits 2, 6, and 9), 2 vols., 1880–81, and J.D. Duff, 1898 (omits 2, 9, and selected passages).

*

Critical Studies: The Grand Style in the Satires of Juvenal by I.G. Smith, 1927; Juvenal the Satirist, 1954, and The Anatomy of Satire, 1962, both by Gilbert Highet; Post-Augustan Poetry from Seneca to Juvenal by Harold E. Butler, 1977; Irony in Juvenal by Alba Claudia Romano, 1979; A Study of Juvenal's Tenth Satire by E. Tengström, 1980; Essays on Roman Satire by William S. Anderson, 1982; Three Classical Poets: Sappho, Catullus, and Juvenal by Richard Jenkyns, 1982; The Persona in Three Satires of Juvenal by Martin M. Winkler, 1983; Themes in Roman Satire by Niall Rudd, 1986; Juvenal and Boileau by Robert C. Colton, 1987; A Prosopography to the Poems of Juvenal by John Ferguson, 1987; The Imperial Muse: To Juvenal Through Ovid: Ramus Essays on Roman Literature of the Empire edited by A.J. Boyle, 1988; Beyond Anger: A Study of Juvenal's Third Book of Satires by S.H. Braund, 1988; The Satiric Voice: Program, Form and Meaning in Persius and Juvenal by William Thomas Wehrle, 1992; Figuring Out Roman Nobility: Juvenal's Eighth Satire by John Henderson, 1997; Satires of Rome: Threatening Poses from Lucilius to Juvenal by Kirk Freudenburg, 2001; Juvenal in English, edited by Martin M. Winkler, 2001.

* * *

Juvenal's entire oeuvre comprises 16 Satires in hexameters. They were published in five separate books during the reigns of the emperors Trajan and Hadrian.

In his first book (Satires 1–5) Juvenal adopts an indignant persona, following the convention of using a first-person mouthpiece expressing views not necessarily attributable to the poet himself. The angry man whose voice we hear in Book I was a type familiar to the Romans from philosophical works, for example, those of Seneca. As suits the angry man, the poems have the appearance of being a jumbled and excited outburst. Yet there is order behind the façade of disorder: Juvenal has arranged the poems in an alternating sequence featuring the patron-client relationship perverted by mercenary preoccupations (Satires 1, 3, and 5) and the corrupt nobility as a canker at the heart of Roman society (Satires 2 and 4). The satiric technique invites us to agree with the angry rantings and to ridicule the angry man for his narrow-minded, petty, and vicious obsessions. The high epic tone adopted ought to dignify the attack on society but the intrusion of mundane and crude words and ideas deflates the pretensions of the angry persona. The “angry” approach proved to be Juvenal's most important legacy to, and influence on, later European satire.

The angry stance is maintained in Book II (Satire 6), a huge attack of epic proportions and unparalleled length in Roman satire on women, couched as a dissuasion from marriage. The angry man reveals himself as utterly unreasonable (e.g., he cannot stand even a perfect woman!) and hence absurd.

Juvenal has now exhausted the “angry” approach and in his remaining three books he adopts an ironic and detached persona. In the three poems of Book III Juvenal applies this new approach to the main themes of Book I, patrons and clients (Satires 7 and 9) and the nobility (Satire 8). The poems of Books IV and V feature a wide variety of topics: men's prayers (Satire 10), a simple meal (Satire 11), true and false friendship (Satire 12); anger and vengeance (Satire 13), parents' bad examples to their children (Satire 14), the quality of humanness (Satire 15), the advantages of the soldier's life (Satire 16, incomplete). These poems are reminiscent of Horace's satire, sharing his interest in friendship and moderation and his double-edged ironic approach. At the same time, Juvenal's abandonment of the early angry persona emerges clearly from Satire 13 where anger is explicitly condemned.

Complementing the variety of the Satires, there are characteristic features present throughout Juvenal's work. The Satires constantly reflect the rhetorical nature of Roman education. Rhetoric is Juvenal's idiom which he exploits brilliantly to produce many memorable epigrammatic phrases. He is clearly steeped in Roman literature: the poems are packed with literary allusions, and throughout Juvenal shows his debt to his predecessors in the genre, Lucilius, Horace, and Persius. In every poem, Juvenal's powers of vivid visualization are evident. He prefers to depict vice in the concrete rather than the abstract, ranging from brief vignettes of crooks or perverts sumptuously dressed to extended descriptions, for example of a subhuman act of cannibalism.

Finally, Juvenal's essential satiric technique may perhaps be encapsulated in the word “surprise.” Throughout his poems, Juvenal springs on his audience surprise after surprise, revealing his great fund of wit and humour. On a large scale, it is impossible to predict the direction or proportions of a poem: Juvenal often links two unconnected topics to create surprise. On a smaller scale, he often saves for the end of a section or sentence or line an unexpected word or idea: deflating, pompous, witty, funny, or absurd. Particularly powerful are pithy juxtapositions like “princess whore” and “muleteer consul.” All such surprises were highly effective in the original context of oral recitation. In short, Juvenal exemplifies Feinberg’s definition of satire as “the playfully critical distortion of the familiar.”

—S.H. Braund

See the essay on “Satire 10.”

K

KABĪR

---

Born: Varanasi Benares, Uttar Pradesh, India, 1398 (some sources give c. 1440). Family: Probably brought up by Muslim foster parents in a poor weaver's family. Career: Probably a devotee of Rām, and a preacher; influenced by Hindu and Muslim ideas, and Sufi mysticism. Exiled from Benares by the Muslim emperor, Sikandar Lōdī. Wrote devotional (bhakti) poetry, mainly in a Hindi dialect. His major texts exist in three major regional variants (recensions): Eastern (the Bijak), Rajasthani (Kābir-Granthāvalī), and Punjabi with Hindi (contained in the Adi Granth). Died: 1448 (some sources give 1518).

PUBLICATIONS

Verse

- Bijak* [Account]. 1868; 1872 (with "Trijya" commentary); edited by Prem Chand, 1890; also edited by Bābā Puran Dās, 1905, Ahmed Shah, 1911, Vicardas Shastri, 1926, Hamsdas Shastri and Mahabir Prasad ("standard" edition), 1950, and Shukdev Singh (critical edition), 1972; as Bijak Satguru Kabīr Sāhab Kā, 1982; as Bijaka (Hindi text, English commentary), 1987; as Bijak, translated by Prem Chand, 1911; also translated by Ahmad Shah, 1917; Linda Hess and Shukdev Singh, 1983; as Kabir, translated by S.H. Jhabvala, 1955.
- The Adi Granth* (including Kabīr's Punjabi/Hindi verse), translated by E. Trumpp. 1877.
- Granthāvalī* [Complete Works]. Edited by S.S. Das, 3 vols., 1928; also edited by P.N. Tiwari, 1961, M.P. Gupta, 1969, and Dr. Syamasundravadasa, 1976; as Kabīr, translated by Charlotte Vaudeville, 1974.
- One Hundred Poems of Kabīr*, translated by Rabindranath Tagore, with Evelyn Underhill. 1914.
- Kabīr the Great Mystic* (selection), translated by Isaac A. Exekiel. 1966.
- Couplets from Kabir* (bilingual edition), translated by G.N. Das. 1991.
- Songs of Kabir from the Adi Granth*, translated by Nirmal Dass. 1991.
- Love Songs of Kabīr* (bilingual edition), translated by G.N. Das. 1992.
- Mystical Poems of Kabir*, translation and commentary by Swami Rama and Robert B. Regli. 1990.
- Touch of Grace: Songs of Kabir*, translated by Linda Hess and Shukdev Singh. 1994.
- Kabīr: In the Light of Kriyayoga*, translated and edited by Jogesh Chandra Bhattacharya. 1997.
- Selected Couplets from the Sakhi in Transversion: 400-odd Verses in Iambic Tetrameter Stanza Form/Kabir*, translated by Mohan Singh Karki. 2001.

Other

- The Sayings of Kabir*, edited and translated by Lala Kannoo Mal. 1923.
- Maxims of Kabir* by G.N. Das. 1999.
- The Thirsty Fish: Kabir bhajans*, translated by Sushil Rao. 2000.

*

Critical Studies: Kabir and the Kabir Panth by George H. Westcott, 1907, reprinted 1974; A History of Hindi Literature, 1920, and Kabir and His Followers, 1931, both by Frank E. Keay; Kabīr (includes translations) by Charlotte Vaudeville, 1974; Kabir, the Apostle of Hindu-Muslim Unity (with bibliography) by M. Hedayetullah, 1977; Kabir's Mythology: The Religious Perceptions, Doctrines and Practices of a Medieval Saint, 1985; A Weaver Named Kabir: Selected Verses with a Detailed Biographical and Historical Introduction by Charlotte Vaudeville, 1993; A New Look at Kabir by Krishna P. Bahadur, 1997; The Dialogues of Kabir by B.K. Narayan and Rajeev Sawhney, 1998; Lord Kabir by Sharan Malhotra, 2000.

* * *

Kabīr is perhaps the most representative figure of the monotheistic movement that characterized 15th-century India. According to legend, he was the son of a widowed Brahmin woman who abandoned him. Although he seems to have been adopted by a Muslim weaver, he later became the greatest of the disciples of the Vaiṣṇava bhakti teacher Rāmaānanda.

Kabīr's fame led to many legends, but unfortunately we lack reliable information about his life. Whether he was a Muslim or not, the influence of the Islamic doctrine in his sayings is undeniable. He calls himself "the son of Allah and Rāma," and his poetry shows an influence of the Vedantic doctrine; but his rejection of most Hindu rituals and Muslim traditions caused the hatred of the most conservative sector of the Indian society, the Brahmanic caste, as well as that of the Muslims. He is said to have been persecuted by the Muslim Emperor Sikandar Lōdī, who exiled him from Benares. All these events earned him the reputation of a bold social reformer, and his impact on the masses of Northern India was profound. Further evidence of Kabīr's influence is found in the Kabīrpanthīs, the religious sect whose members claim to be the followers of Kabīr's teaching and preserve the poems and sayings attributed to him.

Although a large number of works have been attributed to Kabīr, there is no certainty about the authorship of many of them. Kabīr's humble origin and the decisive aversion for the written word that we see in his poems may be an indication of his illiteracy. Therefore, and although there is no conclusive evidence, we may assume that his poems were written by his disciples. Kabīr's verses are found in four compilations. The Bijak [Account] was the first of Kabīr's works to attract the attention of Western scholars. The members of the Kabīrpanth compiled this book after the death of Kabīr, and considered it the most important and most representative of his doctrine. The Granth [Book], compiled at the beginning of the 17th century, became the sacred book of the Sikh religion. A large number of poems traditionally attributed to Kabīr are also found in the Pañcvānīs, a collection of sayings of the “five saints.” The five saints or “dādū-panthīs” are the followers of a Muslim cotton-cleaner, Dādū Dayāl, who seems to owe his inspiration to the teaching of Kabīr. Finally, the Sarbangī is the work of Rajjab, Dādū Dayāl’s most distinguished disciple. It contains an important collection of Kabīr’s verses, but unfortunately it has never been published.

Kabīr may have spoken the old Avadhi dialect of Hindi, but his poems are chiefly preserved in mixed dialect. They are characterized by an extraordinary vigour; yet they are often rough and unpolished. The absence of any kind of literary ornament in Kabīr’s poetry proves his contempt for the sacred Brahmanic language. The metrical forms in his poems, dohās and padas, are popular in origin. The dohās were lyrical compositions in popular dialects, which the common people used to sing or quote; the padas were short, rhymed poems, originally folksongs adapted to religious purposes. In the Granth collection the lyrical compositions are called saloku (Sanskrit śloka, verse); elsewhere, they are called sākhīs (or witnesses): they are pithy utterances, “witnesses” of the ultimate truth. All the main compilations of Kabīr’s poems contain a large number of these pithy utterances; but he also makes use of a variety of metres. Although his verses contain numerous allusions to the common realities of daily life, the use of the Tantric language and symbols often render his poetry obscure. This deliberate contrast, and the simultaneous use of Hindu and Muslim references and vocabulary, is the result of his bitter irony, a proof of his sarcastic irreverence to traditional formalism as well as to Islamic and Hindu beliefs.

Kabīr’s poems convey the spiritual turmoil that pervaded Northern India in the 15th century. This turmoil began to take place two centuries before, both in the Deccan and in Northern India, and coincided with the permanent establishment of Muslim domination in the subcontinent. The 15th century is also the period in which the modern vernaculars of India were taking shape, so it is not strange to see that Kabīr’s language and style has played such an important role in the development of Hindi. Kabīr’s monotheism was part of the religious revival which found manifestation in the cult of popular divinities such as Rāma and Kṛṣṇa, and all these religious movements used the vernacular for their literature. Kabīr’s poetry evidently denounces the rigidity of the Hindu social system. However, his debt to Hindu tradition is undeniable, not only in the numerous allusions to Brahma or to Rāma, but also in the importance attached to the guru or spiritual leader, and particularly to the relationship between the guru and his disciple. Moreover, despite his attacks on the bigotry of Muslims, he was obviously influenced by Islamic monotheism as well as by the eclectic mysticism of Sufis.

Kabīr reflects the efforts of a number of religious movements in Northern India to advocate tolerance and unity. But his role as a unifier of the two conflicting religions, Islam and Hinduism, makes him appear as a holy man who stands alone. On the one hand, Kabīr voiced the aspirations of the common people; on the other, he was considered a danger both by Hindus and by Muslims for the vehemence with which he attacks their beliefs. Kabīr is conscious of the contradictions that he incurred, and his poetry can be read as a means of justifying the confrontation with society and with himself. He, “the slave of the spirit of the quest,” as he calls himself in one of the poems translated by Tagore, confesses that “the true path is rarely found,” and this is perhaps the principal message that the poet has left to posterity.

—Ana M. Ranero

KADARE, Ismail

Also known as Ismaïl Kadaré. Pseudonym: Gent Arbana. Born: Gjirokastra, Albania, 28 January 1936; emigrated to Paris, October 1990. Education: Primary and secondary school education in Gjirokastra; studied at the University of Tirana, 1953–58; graduated as a teacher of Albanian language and literature, 1958; post-graduate studies in Moscow at the Gorky Institute for World Literature, 1958–60. Family: Married Helena Gushi (writer Elena Kadare), two daughters. Career: After a break in political relations between the Soviet Union and China (with which Stalinist Albania had taken sides) in 1961, Kadare was forced to interrupt his studies in Russia and return to Albania, where he embarked upon a career as a professional writer; trip to China, 1967; period of internal exile in late 1970s; return to Tirana, 1978. Awards: Académie des Sciences Morales et Politiques, France, 1996; Officier de la Légion d’Honneur, France.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Komplete veprash. 1980.
Vepra letrare 1–12. 1981.
Vepra 1–10. 1993–2001.
Oeuvres 1–10. 1993–2000.

Fiction

Gjenerali i ushtrisë së vdekur—roman. 1963, 1967; as The General of the Dead Army, translated from the French by Derek Coltman, 1971, 1983, 1986, 1991.
Dasma—roman. 1968.
Kështjella—roman. 1970; as The Castle, translated by Pavli Qesku, 1974.
Kronikë në gur—roman. 1971; as Chronicle in Stone, 1987.
Dimri i vetmisë së madhe—roman. 1973.
Nëntori i një kryeqyteti—roman. 1975.
Dimri i madh, botim i tretë—roman. 1977.
Emblema e dikurshme: tregime e novella. 1977.
Ura me tri harqe: triptik me një intermexo. 1978; as The Three-arched Bridge, translated from the Albanian by John Hodgson, 1997.
Gjakftohtësia—novela. 1980.
Kush e solli Doruntinën, published in the volume Gjakftohtësia. 1980; as Doruntine: A Novel, translated by Jon Rothschild, 1988.
Prilli i thyer, published in the volume Gjakftohtësia. 1980; as Broken April, 1990.
Koha e shkrimeve—tregime, novela, përshkrime. 1986.
Krushqit janë të ngrirë, published in the volume Koha e shkrimeve. 1986; as The Wedding Procession Turned to Ice, translated from the Albanian by Robert Elsie in Kosovo: In the Heart of the Powder Keg, edited by Robert Elsie, 1997.
Koncert në fund të dimrit—roman. 1988; as The Concert, translated by Barbara Bray from the French by Jusuf Vriani, 1994, 1998.
Dosja H—roman. 1990; as The File on H, translated by David Bellos from the French version by Jusuf Vriani, 1997.
Ftesë në studio. 1990.
Ëndërr mashtruese—tregime e novela. 1991.

Nga një dhjetor në tjetrin—kronikë, këmbim letrash, persiatje. 1991; as Albanian Spring: The Anatomy of Tyranny, 1994.
Përbindëshi. 1991.
Pesha e kryqit. 1991.
Piramida—roman. 1995; as The Pyramid, translated by David Bellos from the French version by Jusuf Vrioni, 1996.
Dialog me Alain Bosquet. 1996.
Nëpunësi i pallati i ëndrrave—versioni përfundimtar. 1996; as The Palace of Dreams, translated by Barbara Bray from the French version by Jusuf Vrioni, 1993.
Shkaba—roman. 1996.
Spiritus—roman me kaos, zbulesë dhe çmërs. 1996.
Tri këngë zie për Kosovën. 1998; as Three Elegies for Kosovo, translated from the Albanian by Peter Constantine, 2000.
Ikja e shtergut. 1999.
Qorrfermani. 1999.
Ra ky mort e u pamë: ditar për Kosovën, artikuj, letra. 1999.
Vjedhja e gjumit mbretëror—tregime. 1999.
Kohë barbare: nga Shqipëria në Kosovë—biseda. 2000.
Lulet e flohta të Marsit—roman. 2000.
Qyteti pa reklama—roman. 2001.
Unaza në kthetra—sprova letrare, shkrime të ndryshme, intervista. 2001.

Poetry

Shekulli im—vjersha dhe poema. 1961.
Përse mendohen këto male—vjersha dhe poema. 1964.
Vjersha dhe poema. 1969.
Poèmes, 1957–1997 (French version by the author, Claude Durand, with Mira Meksi, Edmond Tupja, and Jusuf Vrioni). 1997.

*

Bibliography: Kadare në gjuhët e botës by Bashkim Kuçuku, 2001.

Critical Studies: “Subversion vs. Conformism: The Kadare phenomenon” by Arshi Pipa, in Telos, vol. 73, 1987; Un rhapsode albanais: Ismail Kadaré by Anne-Marie Mitchell, 1990; Ismail Kadaré: entretiens avec Eric Faye, en lisant en écrivant et Ismail Kadaré: Prométhée porte-feu both by Eric Faye, 1991; Mythologie am Werk: Kazantzakis, Andriç, Kadare: eine vergleichende Untersuchung am besonderen Beispiel des Bauopfermotivs by Ardian Klosi, 1991; Contemporary Albanian Literature by Arshi Pipa, 1991; Ismail Kadaré by Fabien Terpan, 1992; Présentation d’Ismail Kadaré by Maurice Druon, 1993; History of Albanian Literature by Robert Elsie, 1995; De Scanderbeg à Ismail Kadaré: propos d’histoire et de littérature albanaises by Alexandre Zotos, 1997.

* * *

Ismail Kadare began his literary career with poetry but turned increasingly to prose, of which he soon became the undisputed master and by far the most popular writer of the whole of Albanian literature. Though he is not unadmired as a poet in Albania, his reputation and, in particular, his international reputation now rests entirely upon his prose.

Ismail Kadare’s first major novel, and still one of his best known, was Gjenerali i ushtrisë së vdekur (The General of the Dead Army). It is the vision, or better nightmare, of an Italian general in the company of a laconic priest on a mission to Albania to recover the remains of his soldiers who had perished some twenty years earlier. After a revised Albanian edition in 1967, the French-language edition Le général de l’armée morte, laid the foundations for Kadare’s renown abroad. The novel has been widely translated.

In the 1970s, Kadare turned increasingly to historical prose, a safer haven after the Cultural Revolution, and became an unrivalled master of the genre. The 244-page Kështjella (The Castle), a novel reminiscent of Dino Buzzati’s Il deserto dei Tatars [The Tatar Steppe], 1940, takes us back to the 15th century, the age of the Albanian national hero Scanderbeg and, in carefully composed, minute detail, depicts the siege of a medieval Albanian fortress, symbolic of Albania itself, by the Turks during one of their numerous punitive expeditions to subdue the country. As in The General of the Dead Army, Albania is seen through the eyes of a foreigner, the Turkish pasha. Scanderbeg himself does not even appear in person. The allusion to political events of the 1960s as seen by many critics was not unintentional. In 1961, ties had been broken off with the mighty Soviet Union, and after the 1968 invasion of Czechoslovakia, the Albanian leaders felt the very real possibility that the Soviets might try to use military force to bring the country back into the fold.

In the period of relative calm between the end of the Cultural Revolution in 1969 and the Purge of the Liberals in 1973, Ismail Kadare published one of his most impressive works: Kronikë në gur (Chronicle in Stone). This novel in eighteen chapters and an epilogue is the chronicle of the beautiful city of Gjirokastra in southern Albania under occupation during World War II.

Dimri i madh (The Great Winter) is a literary digestion of the traumatic rupture of relations with the Soviet Union, a novel of monumental historical and political dimensions. The harsh winter of 1960–61 was indeed a momentous one in post-war Albanian history. It was that year which marked the break between Nikita Khrushchev and Enver Hoxha and saw the definitive withdrawal of Albania from the Soviet sphere. The principal character of the novel is Besnik Struga, a Tirana journalist, who finds himself assigned to the Albanian delegation as an interpreter and who departs for Moscow as the first snows of the great winter descend over Eastern Europe. There he takes part in negotiations, receptions and secret high-level talks, experiencing political intrigue and power politics first hand. Kadare’s portrait of Enver Hoxha, as one might expect, is somewhat flattering and strengthened his position as the Party’s “writer in residence.” Kadare later alleged that it was The Great Winter that ensured his physical survival. Enver Hoxha appreciated the portrait made of him in The Great Winter and did not wish to jeopardize it. Kadare’s liquidation would have been incompatible with the survival of the novel.

With Ura me tri harqe (The Three-Arched Bridge), Kadare returns to the mythical fountainhead of Albania’s haunted history to bring to life one of the most awesome motifs of Balkan legendry, that of immurement. The legend of a human being walled in during the construction of a bridge or castle is widespread in Albanian oral literature (cf. The Tale of Rozafat Castle) and is based no doubt on a reality. The novel has been interpreted as an Albanian response to Bosnian Serb Nobel prize winner Ivo Andrić’s Na Drini ćuprija (Bridge on the Drina). Kadare is at his best with Balkan themes.

Prilli i thyer (Broken April), published in the volume Gjakftohësia, begins with a murder in the 1930s. Gjorg Berisha has accomplished what all his family and relatives insisted he must do: cleanse his honour by slaying his brother’s murderer from the rival Kryeqyqë clan. There was no way out of the bloody rituals of vendetta, anchored in the ancient Code of Lekë Dukagjini. Whole families had been wiped out in the “taking of blood” and now he, too, was obliged to follow suit, only to set himself up as the next victim.

Nëpunësi i pallatit të ëndrrave (The Palace of Dreams) is considered one of Kadare’s masterpieces. It is the world of Franz Kafka and of George Orwell’s 1984 set in the sybaritic, if somewhat torpid atmosphere of the Ottoman Empire. Mark-Alemi, scion of a noted family of public servants, is appointed to work at the Tabir Saraj, the awesome government office responsible for the study of sleep and dreams. It is his duty to analyse and categorize the dreams and nightmares of the Sultan’s subjects and interpret them in order to enable the authorities to stifle any incipient rebellion and prevent criminal acts. It is a surprisingly humorous novel, though perhaps not entirely so for those who have lived in a totalitarian state. The analogy for the Albanians was more than evident.

In contrast to his many shorter novels of the period, Kadare’s Koncert në fund të dimrit (The Concert) returns to the epic proportions of Dimri i madh with which it has many parallels. This 700-page chronicle offers the reader here a monumental review of Albania’s dramatic break with post-Maoist China in 1978.

In the novel Dosja H (The File on H), two fictive Irish-American scholars, Max Roth and Willy Norton, set off for the isolated mountains of pre-war northern Albania, tape recorder in hand, in search of the homeland of the epic. The two folklorists are intent on investigating the possibility of a direct link between Homeric verse and the heroic songs sung by the Albanian mountaineers on their one-stringed lahutas. The File on H is a delightful satire on two innocent foreigners endeavouring to fathom the Albanian soul and, in particular, on the foibles of Albanian life at which foreign visitors often marvel: the Balkan love of rumours and gossip, administrative incompetence, and a childish fear or suspicion on the part of the authorities of everything foreign. By placing his tale in the 1930s once again, Kadare was able to take a safe sideswipe at his country’s isolationist proclivities and at the bungling interference of the security apparatus in all spheres of contemporary life.

The novel Piramida (The Pyramid), is an historical and political allegory that is set in ancient Egypt. The pyramid was, of course, the huge “Enver Hoxha Museum” erected on the main boulevard of Tirana. Like so many of the Albanian writer’s works, this novel can only be understood properly if read as a political allegory. The Pyramid is the mind-boggling tale of the conception and construction of the Cheops pyramid in ancient Egypt, but also of absolute political power and indeed of human folly. The Egyptian masses set to work on an absurd construction in the desert, just as four and a half millennia after them, the Albanian people set to work on the building of literally hundreds of thousands of cement bunkers throughout the country to defend themselves against a supposedly imminent imperialist invasion, and on the construction of a marble mausoleum for their own pharaoh.

Ismail Kadare’s talents both as a poet and as a prose writer have lost none of their innovative force over the last four decades. His courage in attacking literary mediocrity within the system brought a breath of fresh air to Albanian culture during the long years of the Stalinist dictatorship (1944–90). Kadare was privileged by the authorities, in particular once his works became known internationally. Indeed, he was able to pursue literary and personal objectives for which other writers would certainly have been sent into internal exile or to prison. But Kadare knew well that liberties in communist Albania could be withdrawn easily, by a stroke of the tyrant’s quill, and had to tread carefully at times. However, there is no doubt that he used his ‘relative’ freedom and his talent under the Stalinist dictatorship to launch many a subtle attack against the regime in the form of political allegories which occur throughout his works. Kadare was the most prominent representative of Albanian literature under the dictatorship of Enver Hoxha and, at the same time, its most talented adversary. His works were extremely influential throughout the 1970s and 1980s and, for many readers, he was the only ray of hope in the cold, grey prison that was communist Albania. Though some observers in Albania silently viewed him as a political opportunist and many Albanians in exile later criticized him vociferously for the compromises he made, it is Ismail Kadare more than anyone else who, from within the system, dealt the deathblow to the literature of Albanian socialist realism.

At the end of October 1990, a mere two months before the final collapse of the dictatorship, Kadare left Tirana and applied for political asylum in France. His departure enabled him, for the first time, to exercise his profession with complete freedom. His years of Parisian exile have been productive and have accorded him further success and recognition, both as a writer in Albanian and in French. He has published his collected works in ten thick volumes, each in an Albanian-language and a French-language edition, and has been honoured with membership in the prestigious Académie Française.

—Robert Elsie

KAFKA, Franz

Born: Prague, Austro-Hungarian Empire (now Czech Republic), 3 July 1883. Education: Educated at Staatsgymnasium, Prague, 1893–1902; studied jurisprudence at Karl Ferdinand University, Prague, 1901–06, qualified in law, 1907; unpaid work in law courts, 1906–07. Family: Engaged to Felice Bauer twice but never married. Career: Worked for Assicurazioni Generali insurance company, 1907–08; Workers Accident Insurance Institute, 1908–22; developed tuberculosis, 1917, confined to a sanatorium, 1920–21, retired because of ill health. Died: 3 June 1924.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

- Gesammelte Werke*, edited by Max Brod and others. 11 vols., 1950–.
- Sämtliche Erzählungen*, edited by Paul Raabe. 1970.
- Complete Stories*, edited by Nahum N. Glatzer. 1971.
- Shorter Works*, edited and translated by Malcolm Pasley. 1973.
- The Complete Novels*, translated by Edwin and Willa Muir. 1983.
- Schriften, Tagebücher, Briefe*, edited by Nahum N. Glatzer and others. 1983–.
- Collected Stories*, edited by Gabriel Josipovici, translated by Edwin Muir. 1993.
- The Metamorphosis and Other Stories*, translated by Joachim Neugroschel. 1993.
- Best Short Stories: Die schönsten Erzählungen: A Dual-language Book*, edited and translated by Stanley Appelbaum. 1997.

Fiction

- Betrachtung*. 1913.
Der Heizer: ein Fragment. 1913.
Die Verwandlung. 1915; edited by Peter Hutchinson and Michael Minden, 1985; as The Metamorphosis, translated by A.L. Lloyd, 1937; also edited and translated by Stanley Corngold, 1972.
Das Urteil. 1916.
In der Strafkolonie. 1919; as In the Penal Settlement: Tales and Short Prose Works, translated by Ernst Kaiser and Eithne Wilkins, 1949.
Ein Landarzt. 1919; as A Country Doctor, translated by Kevin Blahut, 1997.
Ein Hungerkünstler (stories). 1924.
Der Prozess. 1925; edited by Malcolm Pasley, 1990; as The Trial, translated by Edwin and Willa Muir, 1937, revised edition, 1956; also translated by Douglas Scott and Chris Waller, 1977.
Das Schloss. 1926; as The Castle, translated by Edwin and Willa Muir, 1930; revised edition, 1953; translated with preface by Mark Harman, 1998.
Amerika. 1927; original version, as Der Verschollene, edited by Jost Schillemeit, 1983; as America, translated by Edwin and Willa Muir, 1938.
Beim Bau der chinesischen Mauer. 1931; as The Great Wall of China, and Other Pieces, translated by Edwin and Willa Muir, 1933.
Parables in German and English, translated by Edwin and Willa Muir. 1947.
The Penal Colony, Stories and Short Pieces, translated by Edwin and Willa Muir. 1948.
Wedding Preparations in the Country and Other Stories, translated by Ernst Kaiser and Eithne Wilkins. 1953.
Dearest Father: Stories and Other Writings, translated by Ernst Kaiser and Eithne Wilkins. 1954.
Metamorphosis and Other Stories, translated by Edwin and Willa Muir. 1961.
Parables and Paradoxes: Parabeln und Paradoxe (bilingual edition). 1961.
Description of a Struggle and Other Stories, translated by Willa Muir and others. 1979.
Stories 1904–1924, translated by J.A. Underwood. 1981.
The Transformation and Other Stories, edited and translated by Malcolm Pasley. 1992.
Selected Stories, translated by Edwin and Willa Muir. 1994.

Other

- Tagebücher 1910–23*. 1951; edited by Hans Gerd Koch, Michael Müller, and Malcolm Pasley, 1990; as Diaries, 1919–1923, edited by Max Brod, translated by Joseph Kresh, 1948; Diaries, 1914–1923, translated by Martin Greenberg, 1949.
Briefe an Milena, edited by Willy Haas. 1952; revised edition by Jürgen Born and Michael Müller, 1983; as Letters to Milena, translated by Tania and James Stern, 1953; also translated by Philip Boehm, 1990.
Briefe 1902–24, edited by Max Brod. 1958; as Letters to Friends, Family and Editors, translated by Richard and Clara Winston, 1977.
Briefe an Felice, edited by Erich Heller and Jürgen Born. 1967; as Letters to Felice, translated by James Stern and Elisabeth Duckworth, 1973.

- Briefe an Ottilia und die Familie*, edited by Klaus Wagenbach and Hartmut Binder. 1974; as Letters to Ottilia and the Family, translated by Richard and Clara Winston, 1982.
Max Brod, Franz Kafka: Ein Freundschaft. 2 vols., 1987–1989.
Briefe an die Eltern aus den Jahren 1922–1924, edited by Josef Čermák and Martin Svatos. 1990.

*

Bibliography: Franz Kafka: Eine Bibliographie by Rudolph Hemmerle, 1958; A Kafka Bibliography 1908–76 by Angel Flores, 1976; Franz Kafkas Werke: Eine Bibliographie der Primärliteratur (1908–1980) by Maria Luise Caputo-Mayr and Julius M. Herz, 1982; Franz Kafka: Die Veröffentlichungen zu seinen Lebzeiten (1908–1924): Eine textkritische und kommentierte Bibliographie by Ludwig Dietz, 1982.

Critical Studies: The Kafka Problem, 1946, and The Kafka Debate: New Perspectives for Our Time, 1977, both edited by Angel Flores; Franz Kafka: A Biography by Max Brod, 1947; Kafka's Castle, 1956, and Franz Kafka, 1973, both by Ronald Gray, and Kafka: A Collection of Critical Essays edited by Gray, 1962; Franz Kafka: Parable and Paradox by Heinz Politzer, 1962; Franz Kafka by Erich Heller, 1964; Franz Kafka by Walter H. Sokel, 1966; The Reluctant Pessimist: A Study of Franz Kafka by A.P. Foulkes, 1967; The Process of Kafka's "Trial" by Adrian Jaffe, 1967; Franz Kafka: A Critical Study of His Writings by Wilhelm Emrich, translated by Sheema Zeven Buehne, 1968; The Terror of Art: Kafka and Modern Literature by Martin Greenberg, 1968; Dreams, Life, and Literature: A Study of Franz Kafka by Curtis S. Hall and Richard E. Lind, 1970; Kafka and the Yiddish Theater: Its Impact on His Work by Evelyn Torton Beck, 1971; Kafka and Prague, by Johann Bauer, translated by P.S. Falla, 1971; Conversations with Kafka by Gustav Janouch, translated by Goronwy Rees, 2nd edition, 1971; Kafka and Anarchism by Mijal Levi, 1972; Kafka: A Study by Anthony Thorlby, 1972; The Commentator's Despair: The Interpretation of Kafka's "Metamorphosis", 1973, and Franz Kafka: The Necessity of Form, 1988, both Stanley Corngold; On Kafka's "Castle": A Study by Richard Sheppard, 1973; Moment of Torment: An Interpretation of Franz Kafka's Short Stories by Ruth Tiefenbrun, 1973; Kafka's Other Trial by Elias Canetti, 1974; Franz Kafka: A Collection of Criticism edited by Leo Hamalian, 1974; Franz Kafka: Literature as Corrective Punishment by Franz Kuna, 1974, and On Kafka: Semi-Centenary Perspectives edited by Kuna, 1976; Kafka's Narrative Theatre by James Rolleston, 1974; Kafka in Context by John Hibberd, 1975; Kafka's "Trial": The Case Against Josef K. by Eric Marson, 1975; Gesture as a Stylistic Device in Kleist's "Michael Kohlhaas" and Kafka's "Der Prozess" by David E. Smith, 1976; Franz Kafka by Meno Spann, 1976; A Complete Contextual Concordance to Franz Kafka's "Der Prozess" by Walter H. Speidel, 1978; Kafka's Doubles by Kurt J. Flickert, 1979; Franz Kafka: Geometrician of Metaphor by Henry Sussman, 1979; The Secret Raven: Conflict and Transformation in the Life of Franz Kafka by Daryl Sharp, 1980; The World of Franz Kafka edited by J.P. Stern, 1980, and Franz Kafka Symposium: Paths and Labyrinths edited by Stern and J.J. White, 1985; K: A Biography of Kafka by Ronald Hayman, 1981; Kafka: Geometrician of Metaphor by Henry Sussman, 1981; Kafka's Narrators: A Study of His Stories and Sketches by Roy Pascal, 1982; Franz Kafka of Prague by Jiří Gruša, 1983; The Nightmare of Reason: A Life of Franz Kafka by Ernst Pawel, 1984; Kafka: Judaism, Politics, and Literature by Ritchie

Robertson, 1985; Kafka's "Landarzt" Collection: Rhetoric and Interpretation by Gregory B. Triffitt, 1985; Franz Kafka, 1986, Frank Kafka's The Trial, 1987, Franz Kafka's The Castle, 1988, and Franz Kafka's The Metamorphosis, 1988, all edited by Harold Bloom; Sympathy for the Abyss: A Study in the Novel of German Modernism: Kafka, Broch, Musil and Thomas Mann by Stephen D. Dowden, 1986; The Loves of Franz Kafka by Nahum N. Glatzer, 1986; Franz Kafka's Use of Law in Fiction: A New Interpretation of In der Strafkolonie, Der Prozess and Das Schloss by Lida Kirchberger, 1986; Outside Humanity: A Study of Kafka's Fiction by Ramón G. Mendoza, 1986; As Lonely as Franz Kafka by Marthe Robert, translated by Ralph Manheim, 1986; Kafka's Contextuality, 1986, and Kafka and the Contemporary Critical Performance: Centenary Readings, 1987, both edited by Alan Udoff; Franz Kafka (1883–1983): His Craft and Thought edited by Roman Struc and J.C. Yardley, 1986; The Dove and the Mole: Kafka's Journey into Darkness and Creativity edited by Ronald Gottesman and Moshe Lazar, 1987; Kafka's Prussian Advocate: A Study of the Influence of Heinrich von Kleist on Franz Kafka by John M. Grandin, 1987; Constructive Destruction: Kafka's Aphorisms by Richard T. Gray, 1987; The Jewish Mystic in Kafka by Jean Jofen, 1987; On the Threshold of the New Kabbalah: Kafka's Later Tales by Walter A. Strauss, 1988; Reading Kafka: Prague, Politics and the fin de siècle edited by Mark Anderson, 1989, and Kafka's Clothes: Ornament and Aestheticism in the Habsburg fin de siècle by Anderson, 1992; Kafka's Rhetoric: The Passion of Reading by Clayton Koelb, 1989; A Hesitation before Birth: The Life of Franz Kafka by Peter Mailloux, 1989; After Kafka: The Influence of Kafka's Fiction by Shimon Sandbank, 1989; Kafka by Pietro Citati, 1990; Necessary Angels: Tradition and Modernity in Kafka, Benjamin and Scholem by Robert Alter, 1991; Kafka and Language: In the Stream of Thoughts and Life by Gabriele von Natamer Cooper, 1991; Someone Like K: Kafka's Novels by Herbert Kraft, translated by R.J. Kavanagh, 1991; The Landscape of Alienation: Ideological Subversion in Kafka, Céline and Onetti by Jack Murray, 1991; Kafka's Relatives: Their Lives and His Writing by Anthony Northey, 1991; A Life Study of Franz Kafka by Ronald Gestwicki, 1992; Franz Kafka: Representative Man by Frederick Karl, 1993; End of a Mission: Kafka's Search for Truth in His Last Stories by Kurt Fickert, 1993; Introducing Kafka by David Zane Mairowitz and Robert Crumb, 1994; Franz Kafka: A Writer's Life by Joachim Unseld, translated by Paul F. Dvorak, 1994; Kafka and Kabbalah by Karl Erich Grözinger, translated by Susan Hecker Ray, 1994; Everyone's Darling: Kafka and the Critics of His Fiction by Franz R. Kempf, 1994; The Intellectual Contexts of Kafka's Fictions: Philosophy, Law, Religion by Arnold Heidsieck, 1994; Kafka: The Metamorphosis, The Trial, and The Castle, edited and introduced by William J. Dodd, 1995; Franz Kafka: The Jewish Patient by Sander L. Gilman, 1995; Kafka's Castle and the Critical Imagination by Stephen D. Dowden, 1995; Meditations on Metamorphosis by Steven Berkoff, 1995; Franz Kafka and Prague by Karol Kállay, 1996; Kafka and China, edited by Adrian Hsia, 1996; Kafka: Gender, Class and Race in the Letters and Fictions by Elizabeth Boa, 1996; The Legacy of Kafka in Contemporary Austrian Literature, edited by Frank Pilipp, 1997; Constructing China: Kafka's Orientalist Discourse by Rolf J. Goebel, 1997; Franz Kafka by Ronald Speirs and Beatrice Sandberg, 1997; Franz Kafka and Prague by Harald Salfellner, 1998; Kafka and Pinter: Shadow-boxing: The Struggle between

Father and Son by Raymond Armstrong, 1999; Prague Territories: National Conflict and Cultural Innovation in Franz Kafka's fin de siècle by Scott Spector, 2000.

* * *

If one were to judge the worth of an author solely according to the amount of critical commentary which his works have generated, then there is no doubt that Franz Kafka has already earned his place beside Shakespeare, Goethe, and Cervantes. The primary attraction and challenge for the critic lie in the strange and enigmatic quality of the fiction, its disturbing capacity to invite and yet to resist interpretation, and at the same time the intuitive belief of many readers that they are being addressed by a writer who has managed to capture in words the very essence of 20th-century experience and angst. Kafka's stories, moreover, possess a degree of semantic openness which makes it possible to re-express many of his narrated scenes and images within the interpretative schemes which have come to dominate modern thought, be they derived from political systems, theological concerns, psychoanalysis, or philosophy. Nor is it difficult, once such an interpretation has been put forward, to "corroborate" it by referring to events in the author's life or indeed to more general cultural factors which helped shape early 20th-century views of the individual's relationship to society, to his own unconscious self, or to the Divine. And finally, the lack of specificity characteristic of Kafka's fiction can be resolved into conceptual systems derived from the author's non-fiction writings, for the critic has at his disposal a considerable collection of posthumously published letters, diaries, fragments, and conversations.

There is some evidence, when we consider Kafka's work in its chronological entirety, that the author was increasingly concerned to forestall the kind of criticism which might attempt to view his fictional creations as referring in a straightforward way to events, localities, or people outside the narratives. In the three novels this process is apparent in the progressive disappearance of all references to actual topographical entities as well as in the names of the three main protagonists, Karl Rossmann, Josef K., and K. Some of the later short stories, told through the first-person mental associations of shadowy animal narrators, carry this stylistic device to the point that the reader is deprived of almost any familiar landmark which might indicate a concealed meaning waiting to be discovered.

Kafka's earliest novel Amerika (America), first published in 1927, has attracted less critical attention than his later works, and is regarded by some as an only partially successful attempt to satirize the institutions of the New World by recounting them from the perspective of Karl Rossmann, a young European who has been packed off to America by his parents after he is seduced by a servant girl. The bizarre adventures which befall Karl certainly possess a Chaplin-like quality, and significantly they provide us with one of Kafka's few overt examples of social criticism, for the episodic narrative is a reversal of the Horatio Alger, poor-boy-makes-good myth; Karl, despite his unflinching optimism and his determination to succeed, is slowly destroyed by the very system of values in which he has faith. The novel is fragmentary and unfinished, and a final interpretation would have to speculate on the possible ending. Max Brod, Kafka's biographer and confidant, insisted that the novel was to end "on a note of reconciliation," but this is thrown into doubt by a diary entry (30 September 1915) in which Kafka stated that the “innocent” Rossmann, just like the “guilty” K., was to meet his death.

Der Prozess and Das Schloss, translated respectively as The Trial and The Castle, are also fragmentary, and The Castle, like America, remained without an ending. The two later novels have in common a number of thematic similarities, and to a much greater extent than America they portray the singular and oppressive dreamlike sequences which have enriched many of the world’s languages with the phrase “it’s like something out of Kafka.” Reflecting the two sides of Kafka’s aphorism, according to which, “He who seeks, will not find; he who does not seek will be found,” the two novels suggest the existence of aloof and inscrutable authorities which can reach out to destroy, as in The Trial, or which will withdraw into a state of total inaccessibility as in The Castle. In each case the authorities are represented by a lower hierarchy of pompous officials and libertine servants, and they have additionally given rise to a vast body of anecdotal and superstitious lore designed to divine their intentions in order that one may either cooperate with them or thwart their will. The diversity of opinion typical of Kafka interpretation is strikingly evident in the interpretations of these two novels. They have been seen as the vain struggle of the individual seeking to comprehend the faceless bureaucracies which govern him, as depictions of the alienated Jew in a hostile Christian world, as grotesque fictive transmutations of Kafka’s obsession with his father’s power, and as parables on humanity’s eternal but fruitless striving for the Absolute. Before embracing any one of these interpretations, the reader might do well to heed the words of advice offered to Josef K. by the prison chaplain in The Trial: “You mustn’t pay too much attention to opinions. The words are unchangeable, and the opinions are often just an expression of despair about that.”

According to Max Brod, Kafka “thought in pictures and he spoke in pictures.” This tendency to pictorialize inner thoughts and feelings, to lend visual form to the subjective and the abstract, is a feature which Kafka’s writings share with dreams, and it can be seen as one of the guiding structural principles of the short stories and of the literary experimentation published in the volume Wedding Preparations in the Country. On the surface Kafka’s short pieces treat a remarkable variety of themes and situations, including the father-son conflict in “The Judgement,” the transformation of a commercial traveller into a monstrous insect in Die Verwandlung (The Metamorphosis), the horrifying method of execution described in In der Strafkolonie (In the Penal Colony), and the self-imposed death by starvation depicted in “A Hunger Artist.” There are stories narrated both by and about animals, and pieces concerning themselves with circus riders, country doctors, mysterious hunters, Ulysses, and the Emperor of China. A unifying stylistic factor behind this thematic diversity is the fact that each story can be interpreted as the manifest portrayal of certain inner experiences and states of mind which recur constantly in Kafka’s fiction. This does not mean of course that the stories should be regarded simply as variations to be reduced to the same theme, for each work contributes uniquely through its imagery and structure to the thematic aspect which it embodies. Nor should it be forgotten that the fiction, even though Kafka himself once described it as “the representation of my inner life,” has been received as significant and compelling by countless readers who have related it to their own experience of the 20th century.

—A.P. Foulkes

See the essays on The Castle, The Metamorphosis, and The Trial.

KAISER, Georg

Born: Magdeburg, Germany, 25 November 1878. Education: Educated at the school of a Lutheran monastery, 1888–95. Family: Married Margarete Habenicht in 1908; two sons and one daughter; also had a daughter by Maria von Mühfeld in 1919. Career: Bookshop assistant in Magdeburg, 1895; apprentice with an import/export business, 1896–99; sailed to Buenos Aires, Argentina, worked with the local branch of the Berlin AEG [General Electric Company], 1899; contracted malaria, returned to Germany, 1901; in sanatorium, following a nervous breakdown, 1902; lost house through financial difficulties, moved to Munich, 1918; arrested on a charge of embezzlement, because of his selling of rented furniture, and imprisoned in Munich for six months, 1920–21; settled in Berlin after his release, 1921; became Germany’s most widely performed dramatist, 1921–33; under the Nazi regime, his works banned from publication or production, from 1933, and his books burnt; continued writing in Berlin, 1934–37; learned of impending investigation by the Gestapo and fled to Switzerland via Amsterdam, 1938; lived in various parts of Switzerland, 1939–44. Awards: Elected to Prussian Academy of Arts, 1926, and the German Academy, 1930 (membership later withdrawn under Nazi pressure). Honorary president, Association for German Writers in Exile, 1945. Died: 4 June 1945.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Stücke, Erzählungen, Aufsätze, Gedichte, edited by Walther Huder. 1966.

Werke, edited by Walther Huder. 6 vols., 1971–72.

Plays

Die jüdische Witwe (produced 1921). 1911.

Claudius (produced 1918). In Hyperion, 1911.

Friedrich und Anna (produced 1918). In Hyperion, 1911.

König Hahnrei (produced 1931). 1913.

Der Fall des Schülers Vehgesack (produced 1915). 1914.

Rektor Kleist (produced 1918). 1914.

Grossbürger Möller (produced 1915). 1914; revised version, as David und Goliath (produced 1922). 1920; as David and Goliath, translated by B.J. Kenworthy, in Plays 2, 1981.

Die Bürger von Calais (produced 1917). 1914; as The Burghers of Calais, translated by J.M. Ritchie and Rex Last, in Five Plays, 1971.

Europa (produced 1920). 1915.

Der Zentaur (produced 1917). 1916.

Von Morgens bis mitternachts (produced 1917). 1916; as From Morn to Midnight, translated by Ashley Dukes, in Poet Lore, (21), 1920; also translated by Ulrich Weisstein, in Plays for the Theatre: An Anthology of World Drama, edited by O.G. and L. Brockett, 1967; as From Morning to Midnight, translated by J.M. Ritchie, in Five Plays, 1971.

Die Sorina; oder, Der Kindermord (produced 1917). 1917.

Die Versuchung (produced 1917). 1917.

Die Koralle (produced 1917). 1917; as The Coral, translated by Winifred Katzin, 1963; also translated by B.J. Kenworthy, in Five Plays, 1971.

Das Frauenopfer (produced 1918). 1918.

Juana (produced 1918). 1918.

Gas I (produced 1918). 1918; as Gas I, translated by Herman Scheffauer, 1957; also translated by B.J. Kenworthy, in Five Plays, 1971.

Der Brand im Opernhaus (produced 1918). 1919; as Fire in the Opera House translated by Winifred Katzin, in Eight European Plays, 1927.

Hölle Weg Erde (produced 1919). 1919.

Gas II (produced 1920). 1920; as Gas II, translated by Winifred Katzin, 1963; also translated by B.J. Kenworthy, in Five Plays, 1971.

Der gerettete Alkibiades (produced 1920). 1920; as Alkibiades Saved, translated by Bayard Quincy Morgan, in An Anthology of German Expressionist Drama, edited by Walter H. Sokel, 1963.

Der Protagonist (produced 1922). 1921; as The Protagonist, translated by H.F. Garten, in Tulane Drama Review, (5), 1960.

Noli me tangere. 1922.

Kanzlist Krehler (produced 1922). 1922.

Der Geist der Antike. 1923.

Gilles und Jeanne (produced 1923). 1923.

Die Flucht nach Venedig (produced 1923). 1923; as The Flight to Venice, translated by B.J. Kenworthy, in Plays 2, 1981.

Nebeneinander (produced 1923). 1923.

Kolportage (produced 1924). 1924.

Gats (produced 1925). 1925.

Der mutige Seefahrer (produced 1925). 1926.

Zweimal Oliver (produced 1926). 1926.

Papiermühle (produced 1926). 1927.

Der Zar lässt sich photographieren, music by Kurt Weill (produced 1928). 1927.

Der Präsident (produced 1928). 1927; as The President, translated by B.J. Kenworthy, in Plays 2, 1981.

Oktobertag (produced 1928). 1928; as The Phantom Lover, translated by Hermann Bernstein and Adolf E. Meyer, 1928; as One Day in October, translated by B.J. Kenworthy, in Plays 2, 1981.

Die Lederköpfe (produced 1928). 1928.

Hellseherei (produced 1929). 1929.

Zwei Krawatten (produced 1929). 1929.

Mississippi (produced 1930). 1930.

Der Silbersee (produced 1933). 1933.

Adrienne Ambrosat (produced 1935). 1948(?); translated as Adrienne Ambrosat, in Continental Plays 2, 1935.

Das Los des Ossian Balvesen (produced 1936). 1947(?).

Der Gärtner von Toulouse (produced 1945). 1938.

Der Schuss in die Öffentlichkeit (produced 1949). 1939.

Der Soldat Tanaka (produced 1940). 1940.

Rosamunde Floris (produced 1953). 1940.

Alain und Elise (produced 1954). 1940.

Die Spieldose (produced 1943). In Stücke, Erzählungen, Aufsätze, Gedichte, 1966.

Zweimal Amphitryon (produced 1944). In Griechische Dramen, 1948.

Das Floss der Medusa (produced 1945). 1963; as The Raft of the Medusa, translated by Ulrich Weisstein, in First Stage, 1, 1962; also translated by George Wellwarth, in Postwar German Theater, edited by Michael Benedikt and George E. Wellwarth; H.F. Garten and Elizabeth Sprigge, in Plays 2, 1981.

Agnete (produced 1949). 1948(?).

Pygmalion (produced 1953). In Griechische Dramen, 1948.

Bellerophon (produced 1953). In Griechische Dramen, 1948.

Klawitter (produced 1949). 1949.

Napoleon in New Orleans (produced 1950). In Stücke, Erzählungen, Aufsätze, Gedichte, 1966.

Schellenkönig. In Stücke, Erzählungen, Aufsätze, Gedichte, 1966.

Das gordische Ei (unfinished). N.d.

Five Plays (includes From Morn to Midnight; The Burghers of Calais; The Coral: Gas I; Gas II), translated by B.J. Kenworthy, Rex Last, and J.M. Ritchie. 1971; as Plays I, 1985.

Plays 2, (includes The Flight to Venice; One Day in October; The Raft of the Medusa; David and Goliath; The President), translated by B.J. Kenworthy, H.F. Garten, and Elizabeth Sprigge. 1981.

Radio Plays: Der englische Sender, 1947.

Fiction

Es ist genug. 1932.

Villa Aurea. 1940.

Leutnant Welzeck (fragment). In Stücke, Erzählungen, Aufsätze, Gedichte, 1966.

Other

Vision und Figur. 1918.

Georg Kaiser in Sachen Georg Kaiser: Briefe 1916–1933, edited by Gesa M. Valk. 1989.

*

Bibliography: “Georg Kaiser (1878–1945): A Bio-Bibliographical Report” by Leroy W. Shaw, in Texas Studies in Literature and Language, (3), 1961.

Critical Studies: Kaiser und seine Bühnenwerke by Willibald Omankowski, 1922; Der Denkspieler, Georg Kaiser by Bernhard Diebold, 1924; Georg Kaisers Werk by Max Freyhan, 1926; Georg Kaiser by Hugo Königsgarten, 1928; Georg Kaiser und seine Stellung im Expressionismus by Eric A. Fivian, 1946; Georg Kaiser by Brian J. Kenworthy, 1957; Georg Kaiser: Die Perspektiven seines Werkes by Wolfgang Paulsen, 1960; Georg Kaiser by Wilhelm Steffens, 1969; Die Suche nach dem Menschen im Drama Georg Kaisers by M. Kuxdorf, 1971; Georg Kaiser und Bertolt Brecht by Ernst Schürer, 1971; “Georg Kaiser Re-examined” by Hugo F. Garten, in German and Dutch Literature, edited by W.D. Robson-Scott, 1973; Georg Kaisers Drama “Die Koralle”: Persönliche Erfahrung und ästhetische Abstraktion by Heinrich Breloer, 1977; Georg Kaisers “Gas I”: Textanalyse und Konzept einer szenischen Realisation by Peter Schlapp, 1983; German Expressionist Drama: Ernst Toller and Georg Kaiser by Renate Benson, 1984, German edition, 1987; The Reception of Georg Kaiser (1915–1945): Texts and Analysis by Peter K. Tyson, 2 vols., 1984; Théâtre expressionniste et le sacré: Georg Kaiser, Ernst Toller, Ernst Barlach by Catherine Mazellier-Grünbeck, 1994; Georg Kaiser and the Critics: A Profile of Expressionism’s Leading Playwright by Audrone B. Willeke, 1995.

* * *

Georg Kaiser, the greatest, most prolific, and certainly the most eccentric of the German Expressionist dramatists, was born in Magdeburg, the son of an insurance salesman, in 1878. Such was the diversity and profusion of his work (over a hundred dramas, as well as poetry and prose) that he was suspected by one critic of being a collective of writers toiling away under the company name of Kaiser.

Kaiser was convinced of the centrality and overwhelming significance of his mission as a writer, before which all else paled into insignificance. His central conviction found its clearest expression in his key essay Vision und Figur [Vision and Form] (1918), in which he states:

The Vision is everything, because it is one. The forms which are bearers of this vision are manifold, laden by the fiery hand of the poet with the weighty burden of his message. In many ways does the poet fashion but one thing: the vision, which has existed since the dawn of time. And of what nature is this vision? There is only one: The renewal of man.

This quasi-religious idealism finds its most complete expression in Kaiser's difficult but rewarding masterpiece, Die Bürger von Calais (The Burghers of Calais), first performed with great success in 1917, when the tide of war was turning and audiences had become attuned to the strong pacifist element in the play's message. It borrows both from the historical account of the siege of Calais at the beginning of the Hundred Years War and from the New Testament. Duguesclin, commander of the French army, represents the forces of the old world, of the "chain of deeds" of violence which Eustache de Saint-Pierre, a leading Calais merchant, seeks to break with his concept of community effort towards an unselfish and peaceful society.

At first, Eustache endeavours to convert the whole community to his idealism, then he turns to the other volunteers for the self-sacrifice demanded by the besieging English forces (six citizens to be hanged as a penance for the town and to guarantee its safety), but ultimately only he achieves the ideal—through death.

Kaiser depicts the path to the ideal in terms of a sudden chance awakening or opportunity for escape from the trammels of the Old World. At that instant, the "New Man" is born, as at the death of the old and birth of the new in a Christian convert, and is utterly committed to the struggle toward the renewal of mankind.

Then the process of debate to persuade others to recognize and espouse that ideal begins in earnest. Such is the centrality of the dialectic in Kaiser's dramas that he describes writing a drama in terms of "thinking a thought to its end." In The Burghers of Calais, the debate takes place in a setting which deliberately parallels the Last Supper, and in which the aspiration toward self-sacrifice fights a losing battle against self-interest and fear of the unknown. At the end, Eustache commits suicide, and his old blind father paradoxically proclaims "I have seen the New Man! Last night was he born!"

Although that ideal—not untypically of German idealism through history—is far beyond mortal reach, Kaiser the activist stresses the key significance of the struggle to attain it. This awakening and commitment take place in a variety of contexts, from the purely personal, in a drama like Oktoberfest (One Day in October), in which Catherine, made pregnant by a butcher's boy, persuades a certain lieutenant Marrien by an act of will that he is the father, literally demonstrating the power of mind over matter, to, at the other extreme, Die Koralle (The Coral) and the Gas plays, which explore the wider social scene in the conflict between the brute force of industry and human ideals. The workers would rather continue to manufacture gas, which in the last part of the trilogy becomes poison gas, than take a leap into uncertainty, demolish the factories, and return to a community lifestyle closer to the natural world. In his anti-industrial and anti-war stance, Kaiser anticipates many of the themes and preoccupations of the German Green movement, although his political preoccupations are too broad to be associated with any one political party.

The Coral also underlines Kaiser's fascination with the notion of the doppelgänger and the problems of personal identity, although it must be stressed that in his work Kaiser is concerned with the human psyche, rather than with human psychology.

The language and style of his works reflect the huge tensions which he is seeking to expose and cause to interact—paradox and the grotesque are never far from the centre stage, and the language itself oscillates between extreme concentration on isolated concrete nouns to rambling, expansive, and highly stylized speeches, in which the punctuation serves almost to orchestrate and define the style of delivery demanded of the actor.

In Kaiser's work there is to be found a great variety of different forms of drama, from the small domestic scale to the vast arena of Calais town hall or the six-day cycle races in Berlin; from traditional three-act dramatic form to the Stationendrama of the kind made most famous by Brecht, in which the action focuses not on plot but on theme, and is held together by one central figure.

Among all his writings, Kaiser's despairing but determined idealism is most vividly encapsulated in the closing moments of the grotesque comedy Von Morgens bis mitternachts (From Morn to Midnight), in which the bank clerk (a representative type rather than a psychologically delineated figure), who from being an automaton processing money in the bank is transformed by the touch of an exotic woman's hand into a parody of the New Man, steals a large sum from the bank, and goes off in pursuit of the ideal. Failing in a number of such endeavours, he finally comes to the Salvation Army Hall, where in a long speech he confesses the overwhelming significance of spirituality, proclaims that "money destroys true value . . . money is the most wretched swindle in the world," and casts his ill-gotten gains among the startled congregation.

After an astonished silence as the stolen banknotes fall through the air, the onlookers revert to type and grasp at the money, and even the Salvation Army girl who led the bank clerk there betrays him. At the end, he is spread-eagled, in a parody of the crucifixion, against the cross sewn into the curtain on the stage. Like Eustache, he has achieved his ideal; like Eustache he is alone; and like Eustache, he has left this world behind.

—Rex Last

See the essay on The Gas Trilogy: The Coral (Die Koralle), , Gas I, Gas II.

KĀLIDĀSA

Born: Date of birth unknown; flourished c. AD 400. Career: Poet and dramatist who wrote in Sanskrit and who may have been in the city of Ujjain, at the court of the North Indian ruler Chandragupta Vikramāditya or of his successor Kumāragupta, or both, for some years between about 388 and c. 455. Texts exist in several regional variants (recensions). Died: 5th century(?).

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Shakuntala and Other Works, translated by Arthur Ryder. 1912; as Shakuntala and Other Writings, 1959.

Kālidāsa Lexicon (Sanskrit texts), edited by A. Scharpé. 5 vols., 1954–75.

Granthavali [Collected Works] (Hindi and Sanskrit). 1965.

Complete Works (Sanskrit), edited by V.P. Joshi. 1976.

Granthāvalī/Works (Sanskrit), edited by R.P. Dwivedī. 1976; 2nd edition, 1986.

The Loom of Time (includes Ṛtusamhāram; Meghadūtam; Abhijnānaśākuntalam), translated by Chandra Rajan. 1989.

Complete Works of Kalidasa, translated by Sudhanshu Chaturvedi. 2000.

Verse

Ṛtusamhāra, as The Season: A Descriptive Poem, edited by W. Jones. 1792; as The Ritusamhara, translated by M. Nandy, 1970; as Ṛtusamhāram, in The Loom of Time, 1989; as The Seasons (bilingual edition), translated by John T. Roberts, 1990.

Raghuvamśa, edited by G.N. Nandargikar (with Mallinātha's commentary). 1811 (reprinted 1982); also edited (with Latin translation) by F.A. Stenzler, 1832; as The Story of Raghu's Line, translated by P.D.L. Johnstone, 1902; as The Dynasty of Raghu, translated by Robert Antoine, 1972; as Kalidasa's Raghuvamsham: An Account of the Family of Raghu, edited by Lallanji Gopal, 1992.

Kumārasambhava, edited by F.A. Stenzler (songs 1–8, with Latin translation). 1838; critical edition, 1962; edited by M.S. Narayana Murti, in Verzeichnis der orientalischen Handschriften in Deutschland, supplement 20(1), 1980; as The Birth of the War God, translated by R.T.H. Griffith, 1877; as The Origin of the Young God, translated by Hank Heifetz, 1985.

Meghadūta, in Meghaduta et Cringaratilaka, edited by J. Gildemeister. 1841; edited by E. Hultzsch (with Vallabhadeva's commentary), 1911; also edited by S.K. De, 1957 (critical edition), and M.R. Kale (bilingual edition), 7th edition, 1967; as Meghaduta; or, Cloud Messenger, translated by H.H. Wilson, 1843; as Meghaduta, translated by G.H. Rooke, 1935; as The Cloud Messenger, translated by Franklin and Eleanor Edgerton, 1964; as The Transport of Love, translated by Leonard Nathan, 1976; as Meghadūtam, in The Loom of Time, 1989; edited by A.L. Sancheti and Dayanand Bhargava, 1998.

Plays

Abhijnāna Śakuntalā. 1761; edited by Richard Pischel (Bengali recension), 1922; edited by N.R. Acharya, with commentary by Rāghavabhaṭṭa (Devanagari recension), 1958 (12th edition); as Shakuntala, translated by William Jones, 1789; also translated by Arthur Ryder, in Shakuntala and Other Works, 1912; P. Lal, in Great Sanskrit Plays, 1957; as Śakuntalā, translated by M.

Monier-Williams, 1853; Michael Coulson, in Three Sanskrit Plays, 1981; as Abhijnāśakuntalā, translated by M.R. Kale, 1898; as Sakuntala, translated by J.G. Jennings, 1902; also translated by Murray Emeneau, 1962; as Abhijna Shakuntala, translated by Hemant Kanitkar, 1984; as Sakuntala and the Ring of Recollection, in Theater of Memory: The Plays of Kālidāsa, 1984; as Abhijnānaśākuntalam, in The Loom of Time, 1989; translated by V. Gowri Shanker, 1994; translated by P.C. Jain Daljeet, 1998; as Recognition of Sakuntala: A Play in Seven Acts, translated by W.J. Johnson, 2001; as Sacontala, or, The Fatal Ring, translated by William Jones, 2001.

Vikramorvaśīya, edited (with Latin translation) by R. Lenz. 1833; also edited by S.P. Pandit, 1889, H.D. Velankar, 1961; as Vikramorvasiya (bilingual edition), translated by M.R. Kale, 1889, and subsequent editions; also translated by Dhruva Sumana, 1912; as Urvaśī Won By Valor, in Theater of Memory: The Plays of Kālidāsa, 1984.

Mālavikāgnimitra, as Malvika et Agnimitra, edited by O.F. Tullberg. 1840; also edited by Friedrich Bollensen, 1879, C.S. Rama Sastri, 1929, N.R. Acharya, 1950, and K.A. Subramania, 1978; as Malvikagnimitra, edited and translated by D.S. Sane, G.H. Godbole, and H.S. Ursekar, 1950; also translated by C.H. Tawney, 1964 (3rd edition); as Mālvikā and Agnimitra, in Theater of Memory: The Plays of Kālidāsa, 1984.

Theater of Memory: The Plays of Kālidāsa, edited by Barbara Stoler Miller, translated by Edwin Gerow, David Gitomer, and Miller. 1984.

*

Bibliography: Kalidasa Bibliography by S.P. Narang, 1976.

Critical Studies: The Sanskrit Drama: Its Origin, Development, Theory and Practice by Arthur Berriedale Keith, 1924; Kalidasa: His Period, Personality and Poetry by K.S. Ramaswami, 1933; Kalidasa: Poet of Nature by Mary B. Harris, 1936 India in Kalidasa by B.S. Upadhyaya, 1947; Kalidasa by Walter Ruben, 1957; The Classical Drama of India by Henry Willis Wells, 1963; Kalidasa: Date, Life, Works by V.V. Mirashi, 1969; A Critical Study of the Sources of Kalidasa by B.R. Yadau, 1974; The Imagery of Kalidasa by V. Aggarwal, 1985; Kalidasa as Dramatist by P.C. Mandel, 1986; The Literary Semantics of Kalidasa by H.L. Shukla, 1987; Kālidāsa by K. Krishnamoorthy, 1994; Juridical Studies in Kālidāsa by Satya Pal Narang, 1996; Sakuntala: Texts, Readings, Histories by Romila Thapar, 1999; Kālidāsa: The Man and the Mind by P.N. Kawthekar, 1999.

* * *

Kālidāsa occupies a special place in world literature, a poet who has contributed outstanding examples of epic, lyric, and dramatic works. Later Indian poets, critics, and theorists have considered him the central reference point of the tradition, and for over 15 centuries his works have continued to attract devoted readers. Two lyric poems are ascribed to Kālidāsa (the first less certainly): Ṛtusamhāra (The Seasons) and Meghadūta (The Cloud Messenger). Both are poems of love and describe a natural universe transfigured by the lover's imagination and enthusiasm. The Seasons contains 140 stanzas, the first extended lyric poem in the literature. It is divided into six books corresponding to six parts of the year: Spring, Summer, the Rainy Season, Autumn, Early Winter, and Winter. In each, a newly married young man sees all of nature with the eyes of love: the sun, the sea, the rivers, trees and vines, birds and beasts, flowers and insects, all are seen as participating in the dance of love. The elaborateness and conviction of this sensual imagery set a new style in Sanskrit poetry, which had previously been more concerned with religious or patriotic themes. The Cloud Messenger, like The Seasons, is more a lyric meditation than a story. Here a lover is separated from his beloved and the same plants and flowers, rivers and lakes, birds and fish that inspired such ecstasies in The Seasons serve him as bitter reminders of his loss. He pours out his grief to a passing rain cloud and begs it to carry his love message to his beloved. The first book of the poem describes in loving and erotic detail the countryside over which the cloud passes on its journey. The second book, at the journey's end, describes the lover's pining wife and her reception of the comforting message borne to her by the cloud. Although the primary mood of the poem is lyric, it combines many elements; religious poetry is mixed with love poetry, elegiac and pastoral elements with the lyric.

Although Kālidāsa may be said to have originated the extended lyric poem, when he turned to the epic he had before him the great traditional works, the Rāmāyaṇa and the Mahābhārata. Drawing upon these and other poetic sources, he created two major epics, Kumārasambhava (The Birth of the War God) and Raghuvamśa (The Story of Raghu's Line). The first poem contains 17 cantos, although most Sanskrit scholars consider only the first eight to be the work of Kālidāsa, and the rest a later addition, even though the war-god Kumāra is not in fact yet born in the first eight cantos. These eight, distinctly superior in poetic style and imagination, tell of the process by which the supreme god Śiva is drawn from a state of contemplation to enter into marriage with Pārvatī, a union that will produce a hero to destroy the evil demon Tāraka, who is troubling all the gods in the Hindu pantheon. Clearly, the subject allows Kālidāsa to explore again the poetry of love and nature, but also that of spiritual ecstasy, divine vision, and even the pain of death, in the famous elegy that is pronounced by Rati, the consort of Kāma and the god of love, who is destroyed by Śiva when he first attempts to interrupt the supreme deity's meditations. The Story of Raghu's Line concerns legendary kings rather than gods, and is not a single story but a sprawling collection of the deeds of great heroes. The careers of almost 30 dynastic rulers are traced, but the first three, Dilīpa, Raghu, and Aja, receive particularly detailed and loving attention.

Kālidāsa is probably best known in the West as a playwright. He is the author of three plays, one of which, Śakuntalā, is the most famous Sanskrit drama. His two other plays are Mālavikāgnimitra and Vikramorvaśīya. As might be expected from Kālidāsa's other works, all three plays deal with love, and all are examples of the nāṭaka type of Sanskrit drama, using history or legend with a king as a protagonist. Mālavikāgnimitra tells of the king's passion for a serving girl in the queen's retinue and how, through the manipulations of his clever jester and opportune political developments at the close of the play, his love succeeds. Vikramorvaśīya tells of a king who falls in love with a celestial nymph. Both undergo great suffering and torment but at the end Indra, Hindu god of the sky, intervenes to unite the lovers. Both of the plays provide a rich texture of poetry, music, and dance, but for Western tastes their rather arbitrary actions and thin characterizations are serious drawbacks.

Śakuntalā is much more satisfying on these points, though it, too, is set in a fairytale world of strange and unexpected events. King Duṣyanta, during a hunting expedition, meets Śakuntalā, the daughter of a nymph and a sage, and they fall in love. The king returns to his capital, leaving his new bride to follow him later. After his departure, Śakuntalā unwittingly offends a hermit who pronounces a curse on her: that her husband will forget her until he sees a ring he left with her as a token. Unhappily Śakuntalā, unaware of the curse, loses the ring in a river on her way to her husband and is rejected by him. She seeks refuge among the gods in heaven, where her son Bharata is born. Meanwhile, a fisherman discovers the ring inside a fish he has caught. He is suspected of having stolen it and brought before King Duṣyanta, whose memory of Śakuntalā is thus restored. Having provided us in the early section of the play with the expression of love's delights, Kālidāsa now turns to the sorrows of love lost.

Despite his anguish, the king wins an important battle for Indra, and, returning to his home from her heavenly realm, he stops at the hermitage of a sage, allowing Kālidāsa to laud the ascetic life in richly poetic terms. So peaceful is this site that the king observes a six-year-old boy playing happily with a lion cub. In a lengthy and moving recognition scene, Duṣyanta comes to realize that this is his own son, and Śakuntalā soon appears to complete his happiness. Their reunion is blessed by the sage, who explains the curse and prophesies future glory for Bharata. As in all his works, Kālidāsa creates a rich panorama of the effects of love, fulfilled and frustrated, and of the penetration of nature itself by the lovers' moods; but his canvas in this play is particularly rich and colourful, because of the complex gallery of dramatic characters and the sweep of the action, extending from earth to heaven. Goethe, one of the few authors whose range of poetic achievement resembles that of Kālidāsa, was one of the many Western admirers of Śakuntalā, commenting that it combined the flowers of youth and the fruits of age, delight and enchantment, heaven and earth, all in a single work.

—Marvin Carlson

See the essays on The Cloud Messenger and Śakuntalā.

KANZE ZEAMI MOTOKIYO

See ZEAMI

KAPLINSKI, Jaan

Born: Tartu, Estonia, 22 January 1941. Education: Attended primary and secondary school in Tartu, 1947–58; Tartu University, 1958–64. Family: Married 1) Küllike Kolk, one daughter; 2) Tiia Toomet in 1969; four sons and a daughter. Career: Freelance writer and translator since 1972; research assistant at botanical garden in Tallinn, 1974–80; worked for theatre Ugala in Viljandi, Estonia, 1980–82; lecturer at Tartu University, 1983–88; deputy of the Estonian Parliament (Riigikogu), 1992–95; member of the Académie Universelle des Cultures, since 1994; regular contributor to Estonian newspaper Sõnumileht, 1996–98; writer in residence at the Aberystwyth Arts Centre in Wales, 1997; guest professor, Tartu University, 2000–01. Awards: Juhan Liiv poetry prize, 1967; short list, Nobel prize in literature, 1996; Estonian Cultural Endowment prize, 1997; Baltic Assembly prize for literature, 1997.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

The New Heaven and Earth of Jaan Kaplinski: Poems, selected and translated by Ants Eert. 1981.

Käöraamat: Luulet 1956–1980. 1986.

Kirjutatud: Valitud Luuletused. 2000.

Poetry

Jäljed allikal. 1965.

Kalad punuvad pesi. 1966.

Tolmust ja värvidest. 1967.

Valge joon Võrumaa kohale: 54 luuletust 1967–1968. 1972.

Ma vaatasin päikese aknasse: luulet. 1976.

Uute kivide kasvamine. 1977.

Raske on kergeks saada. 1982.

Tule tagasi helmemänd. 1984.

Õhtu toob tagasi kõik. 1985.

The Wandering Border, translated by Kaplinski with Sam Hamill and Riina Tamm. 1987.

Hinge tagasitulek: poeem. 1990.

I Am the Spring in Tartu and Other Poems Written in English, edited by Laurence P.A. Kitching. 1991.

Tükk elatud elu: tekste 1986–1989. 1991; as Through the Forest, translated by Hildi Hawkins, 1996.

Õölinnud, öömõtted, yölintuja, yöajatukia: luuletusi 1995–1997. 1998.

Plays

Pögenik (produced 1976).

Neljakuningapäev (produced 1977).

Liblikas ja peegel (produced 1982).

Indiaaninägemused (produced 1995).

Children's Books

Kuhu need värvid jäävad, with Tiia Toomet. 1975.

Kes mida sööb, kes keda sööb. 1977.

Udujutt. 1977.

Jänes. 1980.

Jalgrataste talveuni. 1987.

Essays

Poliitika ja antipoliitika. 1992.

Teekond Ayia Triadasse. 1993.

Jää ja Titanic. 1995.

See ja teine. 1996.

Võimaluste võimalikkus. 1997.

Usk on uskumatus. 1998.

Kevad kahel rannikul ehk tundeline teekond Ameerikasse. 2000.

Kajakas võltsmunal. 2000.

Other

Kust tuli öö: proosat. 1990.

Mitu suve ja kevadet: luulet ja märkmeid. 1995.

Silm; Hektor. 2000.

*

Critical Studies: “Jaan Kaplinski. Tolmust ja värvidest” by Ivar Ivask, in Books Abroad [World Literature Today], no. 42, 1968; “For a New Heaven and a New Earth: Comments on the Poetry of Jaan Kaplinski” by Hellar Grabbi, in Books Abroad [World Literature Today], no. 47, 1973; “The Transcendence of Jaan Kaplinski’s Poetry” by Jüri Talvet, in Estonian Literary Magazine, Spring 1998; “Escape Artists and Freedom’s Children” by Thomas Salumets, in Interlitteraria, no. 3, 1998; “Crossing the Sea: Tomas Tranströmer and Jaan Kaplinski” by Ene-Reet Soovik, in Interlitteraria, no. 4, 1999.

* * *

Being both Estonian and Jewish-Polish ties Jaan Kaplinski to “two cultures that were not given a chance to develop fully, strangled and destroyed by the Western and Eastern imperialists. . . . As the Jews are mourning over the destruction of their temple . . . the Estonians, Finns, Saamis, Samoyeds, Maris and others can mourn over the destruction of their sacred groves, trees and lakes,” he writes on his web page (<http://jaan.kaplinski.com>). From these “two fatal identities,” a childhood in war-torn Estonia, and adolescence and adulthood in the grey depression of an occupied country there emerged a prolific author with an inspiring passion for nature and all things living.

Kaplinski is the author of numerous collections of poetry, plays, children’s books, essays, and prose fiction. In 1968, at the age of 27, Kaplinski was awarded the prestigious Juhan Liiv poetry prize and people in the West began to take notice. Ivar Ivask wrote in Books Abroad: “With his second collection [Tolmust ja Värvidest], Jaan Kaplinski has clearly established himself as the most original and exciting young poet . . . writing in Soviet Estonia today. His interesting poetry would no doubt evoke a wide international echo if translated into one of the major Western languages.” As the Iron Curtain began to lift with Soviet premier Gorbachev’s perestroika in the 1980s, Kaplinski, a household name in his native Estonia since the mid-1960s, established himself on the international scene. In relatively quick succession, English translations appeared—The Same Sea in Us All (1985), The Wandering Border (1987), I Am the Spring in Tartu (1991)—as well as translations into thirteen other languages, among them Japanese, Icelandic, Dutch, Russian, Swedish, Czech and Spanish. In 1996 Kaplinski was short-listed for the Nobel prize in literature. Kaplinski, reluctant poet laureate of his small nordic country with its long colonial and ancient finno-ugric past, had arrived. Today, he is known well beyond the borders of his native Estonia.

The appeal of Kaplinski’s poetry is apparent in his success at home and abroad, but the reasons for the attraction are difficult to describe. To write about Kaplinski’s poetry is to engage with someone who works at the limits of what can be contained in words and conveyed through art. Moreover, while writing lightly on difficult matters, Kaplinski connects to greater, more complex, elusive, and often forgotten or otherwise endangered contexts. For Kaplinski, these greater contexts include the world of the Siberian shaman as guardian of folkloristic knowledge and mediator between animals, human beings, and nature, and between the living and the dead. He embraces the quest of Taoists, Buddhists, and other thinkers and religions open to paradox and mystical experiences. Seeking closeness to nature, his artistic imagination also extends into Native American culture and the vanishing pre-European, pre-Christian animistic past of his Estonian ancestors. If we are to move closer to one another poetry, in Kaplinski's view, is meant to remind us of something which we have forgotten or haven't noticed yet.

Sweeping across all sorts of boundaries, Kaplinski's poetry evokes many other aspects which go hand in hand with what could be called interdependencies. Among them are: seeing the individual as part of a continuously shifting, open-ended network of human beings who co-determine one-another, the primacy of change and the relational, the unintended consequences of planned action, resisting reification, the interconnectedness of past and present, and the social and natural world. Consequently, his poems emphasize "the openness of things" (The Wandering Border); being open to that which is outside the exclusively rational is central to his writing. As a result, for Kaplinski nouns are "like ice and snow; in them is death and eternity, which is almost the same" and he sometimes dreams "of a language in which there are no nouns, only verbs," he writes in Tiikk elatud elu (Through the Forest). Although Kaplinski "ended up in literature," as he explained in Through the Forest, "because it seems, perhaps, closest to [his] proper place," he does not think of it as a special place, a place somehow removed, on its own, or exotic. Such lines of separation are not real; they only appear to be. But when they are mistaken for reality, literature can point a way out of the confusion.

Kaplinski's relationship with words and literature is further complicated by his awareness of the limitations of language and art. Life, as Kaplinski's poetry evokes it—including his concern for all things living, the simple and small things we so easily overlook—"cannot be contained in words . . . cannot be explained or understood . . . can only be lived, and perhaps also protected," as he put it in Through the Forest. Poems are therefore best left unwritten, unless one "cannot do otherwise," which is to say, unless poems help make us "insiders of life again," they are not only superfluous but become part of the problem. To put it differently, as he did in an essay in Võimaluste Võimalus, we "need writers just as we do physicians; we shouldn't think however, that this need for both could not disappear and that such a condition would be bad." Moreover, writing and living rarely go hand in hand. Instead, writing more often than not means having "stepped away from life." What is implied here as the aim of literature—not the survival of art, but life itself—writers sometimes forget; Jaan Kaplinski rarely does.

—Thomas Salumets

KAWABATA Yasunari

Born: Osaka, Japan, 11 June 1899. Education: Educated at Ibaragi Middle School, 1915–17, and First Higher School 1917–20, Tokyo; Tokyo Imperial University, 1920–24, degree in Japanese literature 1924. Family: Married Hideko; one daughter. Career: Writer and journalist: helped found Bungei Jidai magazine, 1924, and Kamakura

Bunko, publishers, Kamakura, later in Tokyo, 1945. Author-in-residence, University of Hawaii, Honolulu, 1969. President, Japanese PEN, 1959–69. Awards: Bungei Konwa Kai prize, 1937; Kikuchi Kan prize, 1944; Geijutsuin-shō prize, 1952; Japan Academy of Arts prize, 1952; Noma literary prize, 1954; Goethe medal (Frankfurt), 1959; Prix du Meilleur Livre Étranger, 1961; Nobel prize for literature, 1968. Member: Japan Academy of Arts, 1954. First Class Order of the Rising Sun, 1972. Died: (suicide) 16 April 1972.

PUBLICATIONS

Collection

Zenshū [Collected Works]. 19 vols., 1969–74.
Dancing Girl of Izu and Other Stories, translated by J. Martin Holman. 1998.

Fiction

Kanjo shushoku [Sentimental Decoration]. 1926.
Tenohira no shosetsu. 1926; as Palm-of-the-Hand Stories, translated by Lane Dunlop and J. Martin Helman, 1988.
Izu no odoriko. 1926; as The Izu Dancer, translated by Edward Seidensticker, in The Izu Dancer and Others, 1964.
Asakusa kurenaidan [The Red Gang of Asakusa]. 1930.
Jojōka [Lyrical Feelings]. 1934.
Kinjū. 1935; as Of Birds and Beasts, translated by Edward Seidensticker, in House of the Sleeping Beauties and Other Stories, 1969.
Hana no warutsu [The Flower Waltz]. 1936.
Yukiguni. 1937; revised, enlarged edition, 1948; as Snow Country, translated by Edward Seidensticker, 1957.
Aisuru hitotachi [Lovers]. 1941.
Utsukushii tabi [Beautiful Travel]. 1947.
Otome no minato [Sea-Port with a Girl]. 1948.
Shiroi mangetsu [White Full-Moon]. 1948.
Maihime [The Dancer]. 1951.
Meijin, in Shincho. 1951; revised, enlarged edition, in book form, 1954; shorter version as The Master of Go, translated by Edward Seidensticker, 1972.
Sembazuru. 1952; as Thousand Cranes, translated by Edward Seidensticker, 1959.
Hi mo tsuki mo [Days and Months]. 1953.
Suigetsu. 1953; as The Moon on the Water, translated by George Suitō, in The Izu Dancer and Others, 1964.
Yama no oto. 1954; as The Sound of the Mountain, translated by Edward Seidensticker, 1970.
Mizuumi. 1955; as The Lake, translated by Reiko Tsukimura, 1974.
Onna de aru koto [To Be a Woman]. 1956–58.
Nemureru bijō. 1961; as House of the Sleeping Beauties, translated by Edward Seidensticker, in House of the Sleeping Beauties and Other Stories, 1969.
The Izu Dancer and Others (includes Izu Dancer; Reencounter; The Mole; The Moon on the Water; bilingual edition), translated by Edward Seidensticker and others. 1964.
Kata-ude. 1965; as One Arm, translated by Edward Seidensticker, in House of the Sleeping Beauties and Other Stories, 1969.
Utsukushisa to kanashimi to. 1965; as Beauty and Sadness, translated by Howard S. Hibbett, 1975.
Sakuhin sen [Selected Works]. 1968.

House of the Sleeping Beauties and Other Stories, translated by Edward Seidensticker. 1969.
Tampopo [Dandelion]. 1972.
First Snow on Fuji, translated by Michael Emmerich. 1999.

Other

Bunsho [Prose Style]. 1942.
Zenshū [Collected Works]. 16 vols., 1948–54; revised edition, 12 vols., 1959–61.
Aishu [Sorrow] (stories and essays). 1949.
Asakusa monogatari [Asakusa Story]. 1950.
Shosetsu no kenkyū [Studies of the Novel]. 1953.
Tokyo no hito [The People of Tokyo]. 4 vols., 1955.
Who's Who among Japanese Writers, with Aono Suekichi. 1957.
Koto. 1962; as The Old Capital, translated by J. Martin Holman, 1987.
Senshū [Selected Works], edited by Yoshiyuki Junnosuke. 1968.
Utsukushii nihon no watakushi; Japan, The Beautiful, and Myself (Nobel prize lecture; bilingual edition), translated by Edward Seidensticker. 1969.
Shosetsu nyūmon [Introduction to the Novel]. 1970.

*

Critical Studies: Accomplices of Silence: The Modern Japanese Novel by Masao Miyoshi, 1974; The Search for Authenticity in Modern Japanese Literature by Hisaaki Yamanouchi, 1978; The Moon in the Water: Understanding Tanizaki, Kawabata, and Mishima by Gwenn Boardman Petersen, 1979; Three Modern Novelists: Sōseki, Tanizaki, Kawabata by Van C. Gessel, 1993; Soundings in Time: The Fictive Art of Kawabata Yasunari by Roy Starrs, 1998.

* * *

The first of two Japanese Nobel laureates in literature (Ōe Kenzaburo is the other), Kawabata Yasunari is perhaps better known than any other recent writer of his country. His standing at home, however, may not be quite so unchallenged: a large number of critics might mention more intellectual and ideological writers as truly representative of the modern Japanese tradition.

Kawabata's reputation rests on the subtly evocative images that continually startle the reader with clarity and brilliance. When successful—as in Yukiguni (Snow Country), Yama no oto (The Sound of the Mountain), or Nemureru bijō (House of the Sleeping Beauties)—the images serve to add dimensions to the straightforward narrative flow. They suspend the plot, deflect the causal expectation, and open up new spaces for meaning. The narrative vibrates with the fullness of sensory perception that reaches out toward what remains untold. When overcharged, however, the images tend to turn inert. In Sembazuru (Thousand Cranes) or Utsukushisa to kanashimi to (Beauty and Sadness), for instance, image after image lights up aimlessly, as if prettiness were the tale's sole objective. The result is an ostentatious display in the manner of airline posters. Kawabata is never completely free from such pitfalls.

Kawabata's dependence on visualization must be explained by the fact that he is essentially a short-story writer. By this it is not meant that he principally wrote short stories—though he in fact did write a great many—but that his “novels” were nearly always accumulated short stories. His longer works grew out of assembled modules, each managing to remain flexible and open-ended like individual verse-stanzas in a renga (linked poem). That is, his narrative is generated by spatialization and detemporalization of acts and events. Hence it is not causal but casual: it intersects time and offers the still moments pictorially. Neither psychological nor sociological, Kawabata's narrative is antithetical to novelistic representation and is likewise resistant to novelistic analysis. His characters are often unfulfilled swift sketches, and his plots are series of unconnected tableaux vivants. Both are embedded among the beauties of background. In the Kawabata territory, scenery is serious.

Although sensitive to popular demands, Kawabata had a streak of stubbornness that saved as well as damned him. During World War II, he was reluctant to play an active role in the militarist programmes, spending his time quietly reading the nation's classics. In the post-war years when most intellectuals switched their allegiance to Western humanism, Kawabata kept recalling Japan's traditional heritage. Later, when Mishima Yukio's self-destructive histrionics were increasingly antagonizing Japan's literary establishment, Kawabata steadfastly stood with the younger writer. His uncharacteristic involvement in municipal politics just before his own suicide, too, seems inseparable from his attachment to his nationalist friend.

It would be a mistake to latch on to Kawabata's art as the quintessence of the famed “Japanese lyricism.” And yet one recalls even now how solacing and encouraging the sensitive images in his work were to the war-ravaged Japanese in those dark post-war years. Kawabata is thus remembered despite his refusal to propose any particular reflection or recommendation in his art.

—Masao Miyoshi

See the essay on Snow Country.

KAZANTZAKIS, Nikos

Born: Heraklion, Crete, 18 February 1883. Education: Educated at French School of Holy Cross, Naxos, 1897–99; Gymnasium, Heraklion, 1899–1902; University of Athens, 1902–06, degree in law; studied in Paris, Germany, and Italy, 1906–10. Family: Married 1) Galatea Alexiou in 1911 (divorced 1926); 2) Eleni Samios in 1945. Career: Writer and traveller; Director General of Ministry of Public Welfare, 1919–20; Cabinet Minister Without Portfolio, 1945; served in UNESCO's Department of Translations of the Classics, 1947–48. Awards: Lenin peace prize. Died: 26 October 1957.

PUBLICATIONS

Fiction

Ophis ke Krino. 1906; as Serpent and Lily, translated by Theodora Vasils, with The Sickness of the Age, 1980.
Toda Raba (written in French). 1933; as Toda Raba, translated by Amy Mims, 1964.
Vios ke Politia tou Alexi Zorba. 1946; as Zorba the Greek, translated by Carl Wildman, 1952.

- O Kapetan Michalis*. 1953; as Freedom or Death, translated by Jonathan Griffin, 1956; as Freedom and Death, translated by Griffin, 1956.
- O Christos Xanastavronete*. 1954; as The Greek Passion, translated by Jonathan Griffin, 1953; as Christ Recrucified, translated by Griffin, 1954.
- O Tefteos Piramos*. 1955; as The Last Temptation, translated by Peter Bien, 1960; as The Last Temptation of Christ, translated by Bien, 1960.
- O Ftochoulis tou Theou*. 1956; as God's Pauper, translated by Peter Bien, 1962; as Saint Francis, translated by Bien, 1962.
- Le Jardin des rochers* (written in French). 1959; as The Rock Garden, translated by Richard Howard (passages from The Saviors of God translated by Kimon Friar), 1963.
- Aderfofades*. 1963; as The Fratricides, translated by Athena Gianakas Dallas, 1964.
- Sta Palatia tes Knossou*. 1981; as At the Palace of Knossos, translated by Theodora and Themis Vasils, 1987.

Plays

- Ximeroni* [Day Is Breaking] (produced 1907). In Nea Estia, 1977.
- O Protomastoras* [The Master Builder] (produced as operatic version, music by Manolis Kalomiris, 1916). In Panathinea, 1910.
- Nikoforos Fokas* [Niciphoros Phokas] (produced 1984). 1927.
- Christos* [Christ]. 1928.
- Melissa* (produced in French, 1960; produced in Greek, 1962). In Nea Estia, 1939; in book form (author's own French translation), with Thésée, 1953; as Melissa, translated by Athena Gianakas Dallas, in Three Plays, 1969.
- Ioulianos o Paravatis* [Julian the Apostate] (produced in French, 1945; produced in Greek, 1959). 1945.
- Kapodistrias* [Capodistria] (produced 1946). 1946.
- Sodhoma ke Ghomora* (produced 1983). In Nea Estia, 1949; as Sodom and Gomorrah, translated by Kimon Friar, in Two Plays, 1982.
- Konstantinos Paleologhos* [Constantine Paleologos] (produced in operatic version, music by Manolis Kalomiris, 1962; produced as play 1965). In Nea Estia, 1953.
- Kouros*, from the radio play (produced in English, 1971; produced in Greek, 1977). In author's own French translation, as Thésée, with Melissa, 1953; in Greek, 1955; as Kouros, translated by Athena Gianakas Dallas, in Three Plays, 1969.
- Prometheas* [Prometheus]. In Theatro, vol. 1, 1955.
- Theatro: Tragodies* (includes Prometheas; Kouros; Odhisseas; Melissa; Ioulianos; Nikoforos Fokas; Konstantinos Paleologhos; Kapodistrias; Christoforos Colomvos; Sodhoma ke Ghomora; Vudhas). 3 vols., 1955–56.
- Vudhas* (produced 1978). In Theatro, vol. 3, 1956; as The Buddha, translated by Kimon Friar and Athena Dallis-Damis, 1983.
- Christoforos Colomvos* (produced 1975). In Theatro, vol. 3, 1956; as Christopher Columbus, translated by Athena Gianakas Dallas, in Three Plays, 1969.
- Comodhia*. In Nea Estia, 1958; as Comedy, translated by Kimon Friar, 1982.
- O Othelos Xanayirizi* [Othello Returns]. In Nea Estia, 1962.
- Three Plays* (includes Melissa; Kouros; Christopher Columbus), translated by Athena Gianakas Dallas, 1969.
- Eos Pote* [Until When]. In Nea Estia, 1977.
- Fasgha* [Swaddling Clothes]. In Nea Estia, 1977.

- Two Plays* (includes Sodom and Gomorrah; Comedy), translated by Kimon Friar. 1982.

Verse

- Odhisseas*. 1938; as The Odyssey: A Modern Sequel, translated by Kimon Friar, 1958.
- Tertsines* [Poems in Terza Rima]. 1960.
- Symposium*. 1971; as Symposium, translated by Theodora and Themis Vasils, 1973.

Other

- O Friderikos Nitse* [Friedrich Nietzsche]. 1909.
- Salvatores Dei: Askitiki*. 1927; revised edition, 1945; as The Saviors of God: Spiritual Exercises, translated by Kimon Friar, 1960.
- Taxidevontas* (travel writing). 1927.
- Te eida set Rousia*. 2 vols., 1928; later published as Taxidevontas: Rousia, 1956; translated as Russia: A Chronicle of Three Journeys in the Aftermath of the Revolution, 1989.
- Historia tes Rosikes logotechnias* [History of Russian Literature]. 2 vols., 1930.
- Taxidevontas: Ispania*. 1937; as Spain, translated by Amy Mims, 1963.
- O Morias*. 1937; as Journey to the Morea, translated by F.A. Reed, 1965; as Travels in Greece, translated by Reed, 1966.
- Taxidevontas II: Iaponia, Kina*. 1938; as Japan, China, translated by George Pappageotes, 1963; as Travels in China and Japan, translated by Pappageotes, 1964.
- Taxidevontas III: Anglia*. 1941; translated as England: A Travel Journal, 1965.
- Epistoles pros te Galatia*. 1958; as The Suffering God: Selected Letters to Galatia and to Papastefanou, translated by Philip Ramp and Katerina Anghelaki Rooke, 1979.
- Anafora ston Greco*. 1961; as Report to Greco, translated by Peter Bien, 1965.
- Tetrakosia grammata tou Kazantzakis sto Prevelaki* (letters). 1965.
- Journeying: Travels in Italy, Egypt, Sinai, Jerusalem, and Cyprus*, translated by Themis and Theodora Vasils. 1975.
- Arrostia tou aionos*, as The Sickness of the Age, translated by Theodora Vasils, with Serpent and Lily. 1980.
- Megas Alexandros* (for children), as Alexander the Great, translated by Theodora Vasils. 1982.
- Translator, The Divine Comedy by Dante; Faust by Goethe; Iliad by Homer; several Platonic dialogues; The Birth of Tragedy and Thus Spake Zarathustra by Nietzsche; The Prince by Machiavelli; Conversations with Goethe by Eckermann; Origin of Species by Darwin; On Laughter by Bergson; and other works, including many books for children.

*

Bibliography: Kazantzakis bibliografi by G.K. Katsimpales, 1958; "Kazantzakis in America: A Bibliography of Translations and Comment" by Sandra A. Parker, in Bulletin of Bibliography, 25, 1968.

Critical Studies: Kazantzakis and His Odyssey by Pandelis Prevelakis, 1961; Nikos Kazantzakis: A Biography Based on His Letters, 1968, and Kazantzakis, 1970, both by Helen Kazantzakis; Kazantzakis and the Linguistic Revolution in Greek Literature, 1972, Three Generations of Greek Writers: Introductions to Cavafy, Kazantzakis, Ritsos, 1983, Nikos Kazantzakis: Novelist, 1989, and Kazantzakis: Politics of the Spirit, 1989, all by Peter Bien; Kazantzakis: The Politics of Salvation by James F. Lea, 1979; The Cretan Glance: The World and Art of Nikos Kazantzakis by Morton P. Levitt, 1980; God's Struggler: Religion in the Writings of Nikos Kazantzakis, edited by Darren J.N. Middleton and Peter Bien, 1996; Kazantzakis and God by Daniel A. Dombrowski, 1997.

* * *

Nikos Kazantzakis was an insatiable traveller, internally and externally. He visited many countries. He read a vast amount of books. He calls to mind Wordsworth's lines about Newton: "a mind for ever/voyaging through strange seas of thought, alone" (Prelude III, 62–3). No wonder he took as the hero of his epic a timeless, intellectual Odysseus. This ploy enabled him, in the course of 33,333 lines of great virtuosity, to explore again various answers to the human predicament which he had already considered in travel books, in the slim but significant Salvatores Dei: Askitiki (The Saviors of God: Spiritual Exercises), and in several plays of unrelieved seriousness. These answers include the philosophy of Nietzsche and Bergson, communism (which he had seen at first hand on visits to Russia in the 1920s), the idea of Christ (rather than any particular form of Christianity), Buddhism, anarchy, nihilism, and so on. In the end they are all found wanting.

Kazantzakis makes his Odysseus exclaim (II, 960): "Hail, my soul, whose homeland has always been the journey!". It is really the poet himself who is speaking. Kazantzakis's view of the world was too all-encompassing for him to be contained by any one literal homeland, even though his Cretan origins were tremendously important to him. Kazantzakis was forever moving on, from one country to another, from one creed to another. But, apart from the journey, there was one "homeland" to which he always remained loyal: "The demotic language is our homeland," he wrote in Taxidevontas III: Anglia (England: A Travel Journal). He loved natural, spoken Greek passionately. His Odhisseas (The Odyssey) is not only a hymn to the spirit of man, it is also a hymn to the Greek language.

If Kazantzakis had died in 1938, aged 55, he would probably be known only to a few researchers. The plays "smell of the ink-well," as the Greeks say. The travel books are charming, but slight. The Odyssey is too vast, rambling, and daunting. There the case would rest. But on the island of Aegina, during the German occupation, between 1941 and 1943, Kazantzakis wrote his novel Vios ke Politia tou Alexi Zorba [The Life and Times of Alexis Zorba], known in English as Zorba the Greek. In Zorba he exclaims: "if only I could do that, remain silent until the abstract idea reaches its highest point and becomes fable"—which is exactly what he did.

He managed, in his remaining 15 or so years, in five major novels—O Kapetan Michalis (Freedom and Death), O Christos Xanastavronete (Christ Recrucified), O Telefteos Pirasmos (The Last Temptation), O Ftochoulis tou Theou (Saint Francis), Aderfofades (The Fratricides)—and one autobiographical masterpiece, Anaforaton Greco (Report to Greco), to rework, as fables, all the themes that had preoccupied him for years with, for the first time, humanity and humour.

Among Kazantzakis's papers was found a note which said: "Major work—the Odyssey. Everything else—spin-offs." It might be more accurate to say that his real odyssey was his lifelong search for the meaning of existence, and that all his works, including the enormous epic, were spin-offs from that.

—Roger Green

See the essay on The Last Temptation.

KELLER, Gottfried

Born: Zurich, Switzerland, 19 July 1819. Education: Educated at Armenschule zum Brunnenurm; Landknabeninstitut, to age 13; Industrieschule, 1832–33; studied painting with Peter Steiger, 1834, and Rudolf Meyer, 1837; Munich Academy, 1840–42. Career: Gave up art for writing in Zurich, 1842: government grant to study at University of Heidelberg, 1848–50, and University of Berlin, 1850–55; cantonal secretary (Staatschreiber), 1861–76. Awards: Honorary doctorate: University of Zurich, 1869. Honorary Citizen, Zurich, 1878. Member: Order of Maximilian (Bavaria), 1876. Died: 15 July 1890.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Sämtliche Werke, edited by Jonas Fränkel and Carl Helbling. 24 vols., 1926–54.

Werke, edited by Clemens Heselhaus. 2 vols., 1982.

Fiction

Der grüne Heinrich. 1853–55; revised edition, 1880; as Green Henry, translated by A.M. Holt, 1960.

Die Leute von Seldwyla (includes Frau Regel Amrain und ihr Jüngster; Kleider machen Leute; Pankraz, der Schmoller; Romeo und Julia auf dem Dorfe; Der Schmied seines Glückes). 1856–74; as The People of Seldwyla, translated by Martin Wyness, 1911; also translated by M.D. Hottinger, with Seven Legends, 1929.

Sieben Legenden. 1872; edited by K. Reichert, 1965; as Seven Legends, translated by Martin Wyness, 1911; also translated by C.H. Handschin, 1911; M.D. Hottinger, with The People of Seldwyla, 1929.

Züricher Novellen (includes Hadlaub; Der Landvogt von Greifensee). 1877.

Das Sinngedicht. 1881.

Martin Salander. 1886; as Martin Salander, translated by Kenneth Halwas, 1963.

Clothes Maketh Man and Other Swiss Stories, translated by K. Freiligrath Kroeker. 1894.

Stories, edited by Frank G. Ryder. 1982.

Verse

Gedichte. 1846.

Neue Gedichte. 1852.

Gesammelte Gedichte. 1883.

Gedichte, edited by Albert Köster. 1922.

Other

- Briefwechsel*, with Theodor Storm, edited by Albert Köster. 1904.
Briefwechsel, with Paul Heyse, edited by Max Kalbeck. 1919.
Gottfried Keller in seinen Briefen, edited by Heinz Amelung. 1921.
Briefwechsel, with J.V. Widmann, edited by Max Widmann. 1922.
Briefe an Vieweg, edited by Jonas Fränkel. 1938.
Gesammelte Briefe, edited by Cart Helbling. 4 vols., 1950–54.
Briefwechsel, with Hermann Hettner, edited by Jürgen Jahn. 1964.
Aus Gottfried Kellers glücklicher Zeit: der Dichter im Briefwechsel mit Marie und Adolf Exner, edited by Irmgard Smidt. 1981.
Kellers Briefe, edited by Peter Goldammer. 1982.
Mein lieber Herr und bester Freund: Gottfried Keller im Briefwechsel mit Wilhelm Petersen, edited by Irmgard Smidt. 1984.
Briefwechsel, with Emil Kuh, edited by Irmgard Smidt and Erwin Streitfeld. 1988.

*

Bibliography: Keller Bibliographie 1844–1934 by Charles C. Zippermann, 1935.

Critical Studies: The Cyclical Method of Composition in Keller's "Sinngedicht" by Priscilla M. Kramer, 1939; Keller: Kleidermachen Leute by B.A. Rowley, 1960; Keller: Life and Works by J.M. Lindsay, 1968; Light and Darkness in Keller's "Der grüne Heinrich" by Lucie Karcic, 1976; Gottfried Keller: Welterfahrung, Werkstruktur und Stil by Kaspar T. Locher, 1985; Gottfried Keller: Poet, Pedagogue and Humanist by Richard R. Ruppel, 1988; Readers and their Fictions in the Novels and Novellas of Gottfried Keller by Gail K. Hart, 1989; The Poetics of Scepticism: Gottfried Keller and Die Leute von Seldwyla by Eric Swales, 1994; Gottfried Keller and His Critics: A Case Study in Scholarly Criticism by Richard R. Ruppel, 1998.

* * *

Gottfried Keller, together with Jeremias Gotthelf and Conrad Ferdinand Meyer, is today generally regarded as one of the three pillars of 19th-century Swiss-German literature. His poems are no longer widely read, and he is remembered chiefly for his novel Der grüne Heinrich (Green Henry), his four collections of short stories, and the correspondence he conducted with writers such as Theodor Storm and Paul Heyse. His reputation was slow to establish itself even in the German-speaking countries, and outside Germany his works have never attracted a readership which truly reflected Keller's standing as a master storyteller and an acute but humane observer of human passion and folly.

Green Henry, conceived as a novel of education (Bildungsroman) within a German tradition which stretches from the medieval Parzival to Thomas Mann's Der Zauberberg (The Magic Mountain) and beyond, depicts in sympathetic and at times painful detail the early life of Heinrich Lee, a young Swiss who is torn between the compulsion to be an artist and the demands of domestic and civic duty. Partly autobiographical, the novel portrays a number of scenes and situations familiar to Keller, ranging from the small Swiss village to student life in Munich. The descriptions of Heinrich's early childhood, his thoughts on religion, his encounters at school, above all his ability to project an inner poetic vision onto events and experiences, reveal strikingly Keller's powers of psychological observation and his capacity to bring out the symbolic and the significant in his treatment of everyday and indeed mundane occurrences.

The second version of the novel lacks the lyrical spontaneity and exuberance of the first; it is provided with a more conciliatory ending and is altogether more measured and distanced in tone and style. It no doubt reflects Keller's own mature view that to renounce art for the sake of duty was not of necessity a tragic choice.

Keller's ability to transcend the surface meaning of events and human actions, and to attribute to them a more universal significance, is even more clearly evident in his collections of stories and short novels, especially in Die Leute von Seldwyla (The People of Seldwyla) and the cycle of Züricher Novellen [Zurich Novellas]. The two groups of Seldwyla tales take as their fictional milieu a small town described by Keller as being "situated somewhere in Switzerland, surrounded by the same old city walls and towers as it was three hundred years ago." The narratives which revolve around this setting display a playful inventiveness and a sharp eye for incongruity and pretence. With humour and gentle irony they lay bare the realities underlying the seemingly placid exterior of peasant and bourgeois life in 19th-century Switzerland, and in doing so they illuminate and clarify the reader's understanding of the perennial conflicts deriving from personal and social relationships.

Literary history tends to assign Keller and his writings to the period of "poetic realism," a movement which some modern critics would disparage as a manifestation of political quiescence produced both for and by the German bourgeoisie. Such generalizations can on occasion be useful, but they would do scant justice to stories like "Romeo und Julia auf dem Dorfe" and "Der Landvogt von Greifensee" which, quite apart from their artistic perfection as narrative structures, touch upon the most basic contradictions which appear whenever individual conscience and consciousness seek to define themselves within systems of social values and traditional beliefs.

—A.P. Foulkes

KENKŌ

Also known as: Yoshida Kenkō; Kenkō hōshi; Urabe Kenkō. Born: Urabe Kaneyoshi, in Kyoto, or by one theory in Kamakura, in about 1283. Education: Received training appropriate to a low-ranking member of the aristocracy, including native and Chinese classics, poetry, court customs, and Shintō religious texts, in preparation for a hereditary career in shrine service; probably had brief training in scholastic Tendai Buddhism on Mt. Hiei at Yokawa; entrusted with transmissions of secret poetic knowledge by head of Nijō school of poetry. Military Service: Assistant Commander of the Left Military Guard (sahyōe no suke) at fifth rank before retiring from public life. Career: Steward (keishi) to Horikawa family, and through these connections became Sixth Rank Chamberlain (rokui no kurōdo) to the sovereign Go-Nijō (r.1301–1308); became a monk by 1313; lived as a recluse in Ono and Shūgakuin; traveled east to Kamakura in about 1306 and again perhaps in 1318; returned to live in capital of Kyoto during crisis in leadership of Nijō school of poetry; served as advisor on court customs to at least one military leader; no evidence that he lived at Mt. Yoshida, legends of which earned him the surname Yoshida centuries after his death. Died: Probably in Kyoto, no earlier than 1352.

PUBLICATIONS

Essays

Tsurezuregusa. Between 1308 and 1348?; as Essays in Idleness, translated by Donald Keene, 1967.

Verse

Kenkō hōshishū. c. 1346?; eight verses added in about 1349; parts translated in Waiting for the Wind: Thirty-Six Poets of Japan's Late Medieval Age by Steven D. Carter, 1989.

Minbukyōke hōhen waka. c. 1345–1350.

*

Critical Studies: “Japanese Aesthetics” by Donald Keene, Philosophy East and West vol. 19, no. 3, July 1969; “The Birth of the Essay: a Comparative Study of Michel de Montaigne and Yoshida Kenkō” by Naoko Fuwa Thornton, Ph.D. dissertation, Indiana University, 1973; Formless in Form: Kenkō, Tsurezuregusa, and the Rhetoric of Japanese Fragmentary Prose by Linda H. Chance, 1997.

* * *

A poet of renown in his own day, Kenkō made his mark on Japanese literary history with a work of prose. We have no knowledge of how or when he composed Tsurezuregusa (Essays in Idleness), and no evidence that his contemporaries knew of or read it. Yet this assemblage of miscellaneous jottings (an introduction and 243 segments, in modern editions) had an enormous impact on later generations, inspiring many readers to call it the most characteristically Japanese piece of literature.

The positive response to Essays in Idleness derives from both its form and content. It shares with other classics of Japanese literature a brevity and conciseness of expression. One section (number 192) reads in its entirety “It is best to pay reverence to the gods or the Buddhas on days when others do not, or at night.” The aphoristic quality and plain language are common to Buddhist maxims. Other passages invoke the rhetoric and spirit of such female-authored fictions as The Tale of Genji. In them, Kenkō creates a romantic atmosphere as he sketches an elegant young man pushing his way through dew-drenched grass (section 44), or a lover pensively watching the moon (section 32). Each such episode finishes with a touch of resigned melancholy, noting, for example, that the young man’s identity was a mystery, or that the protagonist has passed away.

Essays in Idleness’ ground-note is the impermanence of life, and its renditions of the concept are some of the most famous in Japanese history. How would anything move us, he asks, if life were not fleeting? (section 7). We are most attached to that which is most easily lost, and most deceived about the swiftness with which time threatens to deprive us. From this he concludes that impermanence is not loss, but our highest positive value. Must we have our blossoms in abundance and the moon in a clear sky? Is it not more evocative to conjure spring in a room with the blinds drawn? he inquires (section 137). This emphasis is at the base of Japan’s exemplary aesthetic focus—seen in the arts from ink painting and gardening to ritual tea—on the understated, suggestive, and insufficient. That which is incomplete allows the observer to contribute to the process of its perfection. Rejecting attachment to successful love affairs, in one example, he writes: “To linger over the pain of meetings that ended without intimacy, lament a vow that came to nothing, spend the long night awake and alone, dwell on distant clouds beyond reach, yearn for the past spent in a dwelling overgrown with rushes—all this is within the pursuit of passion.” Few can now comprehend what made Kenkō’s fellow poets count him among the “Four Guardian Kings” of native verse (waka no shitennō). The lines of Kenkō hōshishū [Lay Priest Kenkō’s Poetry Collection] follow medieval guidelines with scarcely a breath of originality, but his prose still sings to readers.

In addition to delicate, elliptical musings, Kenkō is a master of sharp-tongued pronouncements on the foolishness of humanity. He likens us to ants that scurry east and west, heedless of the futility of our labors (section 74); he warns that no one would be expected to waste time with trivial things were this known to be his or her last night on earth (section 108). Kenkō promotes attentiveness in all things. Each of the arts that a cultured individual might practice, calligraphy or horse-riding, poetry or tree-climbing, should be approached with mental discipline and dedication, as though it were a “Way” toward enlightenment. This pattern of thought had great currency in the 14th century, shaping religious and artistic practices equally. Aesthetic pursuits were the material embodiment of religious sentiment, in fact, an understanding that Kenkō often expresses. He exhorts us to attend to the matter of death, whether revealed in the flourishing of a cherry blossom or the deterioration of a grave, and to hasten on with our devotions.

The past had special attraction for Kenkō, who lamented the degeneracy of behavior the present. One of his professional interests was the transmission of court procedure and precedent. Comments in Essays in Idleness indicate that knowledge of the proper methods of tying pheasants to branches (section 66), caring for football fields (section 177), and attaching prisoners to a rack for whipping (section 204) was lost to his contemporaries, to his chagrin.

Kenkō provides some of the more endearing comic portrayals in the literature. A priest who went out for an evening of linked verse competition is attacked on the way home by a man-eating creature he had been warned of. When neighbors rescue him from the river, they learn the attacker was his own dog (section 89). An elderly nun continually mutters a magic word for her absent charge, in case he might be sneezing and in need of protection (section 47); a bishop fumes as people assign him ever more ridiculous nicknames (section 45).

Kenkō’s ability to capture the telling moment was enhanced by his reading of Makura no sōshi [Pillow Book] of Sei Shōnagon, a work from the late 10th century. Sei is witty and opinionated; Kenkō borrows her technique of tersely enumerating the details that peg a bore or a bumpkin (section 78). Later critics put the two works together as exemplars of the same genre, which they called zuihitsu. This Chinese loanword, literally “following the brush,” became acknowledged over the centuries as denoting the most amenable form of prose for Japanese sensibility. Capturing a flow of seemingly random thoughts in a work of reflection and restrained comment is still valued highly. Some would say its influence contaminates other genres, producing fiction that downplays plot and scholarly writing that eschews logic. There is a certain logic to the fragment, however, that writers such as Kenkō exploit to great effect. Fragments remind us of the contingency of existence; they force us to participate in a negotiation of meaning as we try to ferret out relationships among them.

Many, especially philosophers and educators, have searched for a single, consistent reading of Essays in Idleness nonetheless. At different points in its critical reception, Buddhist moralism, didactic Confucianism, lyricism, or gentlemanly advice have been called key. Critics often note the “contradictions” that surface at multiple points in the text. Whether there is a true contradiction between an injunction to avoid matrimony (section 190) and an observation that men without children have no human feeling (section 142) is open to debate. Yet the fact remains that whenever he seems to contradict himself via his variety of tones and topics, Kenkō incites readers to wonder what attitude he holds. This shifts attention away from the author, who remains at a distance even as he seems to provide strong opinions, while throwing the reader into the work of interpretation. In the process, the reader cannot help but notice that the great issues of life are not so settled after all, and that we must dedicate ourselves to determining how best to manage our short lives.

Some may fault Tsurezuregusa for lacking stylistic unity, but mainstream literary tradition accepts this as its primary virtue. From the late 16th century on, when it was first used as a tool for educating the young in the classical modes of Japanese literature, Essays in Idleness became an object of wide imitation. Some of those imitations were parodies that ranged from clever to vulgar, but others were serious works that absorbed its manner of moving from subject to subject without obvious transitions. Thus did a work that its author claimed (in a customary humble pose) he planned to tear up spread its imprint on the written heritage.

—Linda H. Chance

KHATIBI, Abdelkebir

Born: El Jadida, Morocco, 11 February 1938; son of Ahmed Belfassi, a theologian and a merchant who died when Khatibi was twelve, and grandson of a stucco craftsman from Fez. Education: Received primary education in his hometown, later attended school at the College Sidi Mohammed in Marrakesh, 1950–57; Lycee Lyautey in Casablanca, 1957–58; Sorbonne University, Paris, 1958–64, doctorate in Sociology in 1965. Family: Married; one son and one daughter. Career: Khatibi joined the faculty of Mohammed V University as a social scientist, Rabat, 1965; while working at the University he became extremely active, not only as a writer and teacher, but also as a significant voice in local politics; one of the founding members of the Union of University Teachers. Wrote his first literary work, La mémoire tatouée, which was published in Paris, 1971; wrote numerous fictional and autobiographical works as well as essays in art criticism, cultural inquiry, social science research and non-fiction reflection pieces; withdrew from teaching in order to devote himself to writing, 1979. Director, University Institute for Scientific Research, Rabat, 2002. Awards: Grand Prix de l'Académie Française, 1994; Chevalier (Fariss) de l'ordre du trône, 1996; Chevalier de l'Ordre Français des Arts et Lettres, 1997; Lauréat du Grand Prix Atlas, 1997; Grand Prix du Maroc, 1998.

PUBLICATIONS

Collected Essays

- Le roman maghrébin*. 1968; as Der maghrebinische Roman, German translation, 1971.
La blessure du nom proper. 1974.
Vomito blanco. 1974.
Maghreb pluriel. 1983.
Figures de l'étranger. 1987.
Par dessus l'épaule. 1988.
Penser le Maghreb. 1993.

Fiction

- La mémoire tatouée*. 1971; as La memoria tatuada, translated by Kadhim Jihad, 1986.
Le livre de sang. 1979; second edition, 1986; Amour bilingue, 1983; as Love in Two Languages, translated by Richard Howard, 1990; as Amore bilingue, Italian translation, 1992.
Un été à Stockholm. 1990; Arabic translation by Farid Zahi, 1992.
Triptyque de Rabat. 1993.

Poetry

- Le lutteur de classe à la manière taoïste*. 1979.
Dédicace à l'année qui vient. 1986.

Plays

- Le prophète voile*. 1979 (produced, Paris, 1973).

Selected essays in literary and cultural criticism

- Roman maghrébin et culture nationale*, in Souffles 3. 1966.
De la critique du langage à la lutte des classes, in Le Monde. 1971.
Le Maghreb comme horizon de pensée, in Les temps modernes. 1977.
La double critique, in Liberation 91. 1977.
De la bi-langue, in Ecritures. 1981.
De l'Aimance, in Intersignes 6–7. 1993.

Selected articles in sociology

- Histoire et sociologie au Maroc*. 1966.
Perception et fonction de l'enquête d'opinion. 1966.
Planification familiale et société marocaine. 1966.
Stratification sociale et développement. 1967.
Deux propositions sur le changement social et l'acculturation. 1968.
Bilan de la sociologie au Maroc. 1968.
Pouvoir et administration. 1970.
Ouvriers, bourgeois, fonctionnaires. 1970.
La manipulation des aspirations collectives, in Aspirations et transformations sociales. 1970.
Hiérarchies pré-coloniales. 1971.
Décolonisation de la sociologie au Maghreb. 1974.
Sociologie du monde arabe, as Double Criticism in Contemporary North Africa. 1984.
Mémoire d'une quête, as Space-time-culture in the proceedings of the international conference on urbanism in Islam, Tokyo. 1989.

Other

Anthologie de la littérature nord-africaine d'expression française, with A. Memmi et al. 1964.

Bibliographie de la littérature nord-africaine d'expression française, with J. Dejeux, et al. 1965.

Ecrivains marocains, with M.T. Benjelloun et al. 1975.

L'art calligraphique arabe, with Mohammed Sijelmassi. 1976.

La peinture de Ahmed Charkaoui, with E.A. El Maleh, et al. 1976; second edition as Ahmed Cherkaoui: La passion du signe, 1996.

Le même livre, with Jacques Hassoun. 1985.

Du bilinguisme. 1985.

L'art contemporain au Maroc, with Mohamed Sijelmassi. 1989.

Du signe à l'image (le tapis marocain). 1995.

L'art calligraphique de l'islam. 1995; as The Splendour of Islamic Calligraphy, translated by James Hughes, 1995.

*

Bibliography: L'Oeuvre de Abdelkebir Khatibi, Marsam Publications, 1997.

Critical Studies: Imaginaires de l'autre, Paris, 1987; Abdelkebir Khatibi, Rabat, 1990; Abdelkebir Khatibi, Philadelphia, 1990; Lectures de la pensée de Abdelkebir Khatibi, 1990; "Itinéraires du politique dans le champ intellectuel marocain" by Abdellah Saaf, in Politique et savoir, 1991; "Abdelkebir Khatibi: Writing a Dynamic Identity" by Abdallah Mdarhri Alaoui, in Research in African Literatures, 1992; A. Khatibi by Marc Gontard, in Le moi étrange, 1993; "Decolonizing the Sign: Language and Identity in Abdelkebir Khatibi's La Mémoire tatouée" by L.S. McNeece, in Yale French Studies, 1993; Abdelkebir Khatibi: l'écriture de la dualité by Abdellah Memmes, 1994; "The Fiction of Translation: Abdelkebir Khatibi's Love in Two Languages" by Thomas O. Beebee, in Sub-Stance, 1994; Les mots du monde by Hassan Wahbi, 1995; Lecture des récits de Abdelkebir Khatibi by Rachida Saigh Bousta, 1996.

* * *

One of the leading Francophone writers of North Africa, Abdelkebir Khatibi occupies a unique position in the world of letters. A North African Arab steeped in Western culture, Khatibi represents the borderland condition of the postcolonial identity—a perpetually transitional condition of dislocation, providing a double vision, at once liberating and conflicting. Khatibi's writing defies categorization. His narratives, hardly definable as fiction, fall between the genres of poetry, essay, and autobiography; his essays, on the other hand, lyrical and elliptical, offer the reader no linear argument. Articulated in the French language, Khatibi's writing reveals Arabic structures of thought; it is thus a split language, a bilangue (a French word Khatibi uses: literally "bi-language"), containing an androgynous indeterminacy that frees it from the univocal, paraphrasable sense.

Bilingualism is one of Khatibi's key motifs. Perhaps his most important work, Amour bilingue, published in 1983 and translated into English by Richard Howard as Love in Two Languages, is both about the condition of bilingualism and is itself a passionate engagement with language that grows precisely out of this internal encounter of otherness—an encounter of self and other in the "two tongues" of the bilingual. According to Khatibi, bilingualism is a hybridity that does not assimilate but maintains difference; it is also a condition of language. Bilingualism, he maintains, is an inherent structural fact of all languages. He emphasizes the split between spoken word and written text—diglossia—as an inherent quality of doubleness and desymmetry, creating endless linguistic possibilities. This dualism is again multiplied in the two languages of the bilingual—in Khatibi's case, French/Arabic. This linguistic duality tends to recur on various levels of self-expression, and shapes the nature of Khatibian thought in general.

But most significantly, for Khatibi, and particularly in Love in Two Languages, the language question is not one of choice or compromise—or even of reconciliation—between the two languages; rather, the task is one of furnishing the unthinkable space where both languages can inscribe their reality. Khatibi's vision—double, blurred, layered—redefines the language question for postcolonial culture and emerges in a play of discourse that finally accounts for the uniqueness of his style and the apparent opacity of his text.

The Khatibian reader is formed by the Khatibian text. The reader, too, like the writer, must allow language itself to lead. In an interview with Isabelle Larrivée in L'Oeuvre de Abdelkebir Khatibi, Khatibi explains that for him, reality is like a tapestry, and his (the writer's) task is simply to find a thread, to let himself be guided by the force of a moment. The author does not authorize language, but seeks to capture a tone and a rhythm, to embody life in the shape and sound of language: "to transplant from life into writing—this is my passion, my task." Khatibi speaks of being a guest in his own text. Khatibi's writing emerges from that interstitial space in an unexpected genre—elliptical and fragmented, the thought always seduced by the play of words and signs.

The seduction of the language continually leads the writer—and the good reader—in multiple directions. Amour bilingue becomes finally a space of the transcultural condition of the Francophone North African Arab. Within the framework of a love story, Khatibi's recit becomes a theoretical discourse, which itself verges on the lyrical and the poetic. The fiction itself becomes almost external, a "pre-text," as Rachida Saigh Bousta argues. Far from presenting a consumable object in the tradition of narrative fiction, she suggests that the Khatibian recit is primarily a literary embodiment of a theoretical reflection and a means of provoking the reader's diligence.

Readers have often complained about the recalcitrance of the Khatibian text, its resistance to interpretation, its elliptical nature, the dispersion of the storyline into various fragments of prose, its elusiveness. In response to a question posed during an interview concerning these difficulties that readers seem to encounter, Khatibi quoted Roland Barthes who had been reproached for the same reasons. When people ask you to be clear, Barthes had told Khatibi, it simply means that they are asking you to be like themselves. For Khatibi, a reader's experience of the difficulty of a text is a confession of that reader's difficult relation with the text. The reader must be engaged in the process of the text's emergence as language and not only a recipient of a message. For Khatibi, language is a process, a movement—both fluid and formative—rather than a vehicle to represent a referential reality.

Khatibi's relationship with language, his existence in several linguistic spaces at once, his painstaking chiseling (in words) of the postcolonial identity—all contribute to the interpenetration of different discourses and different genres in his narratives and essays. In La mémoire tatouée [The Tattooed Memory], Khatibi's first literary narrative and his most explicitly autobiographical work, the characteristic attempt to transcend established genres is already manifest.

The generic homogeneity of the narrative is deconstructed by the frequent intrusion of contrasting discourse—poetic and philosophical elements. Like all of Khatibi's texts, La mémoire tatouée is written in a continuous mirroring, from the inside out and from the outside in—representing the specular quality of the bilingual identity. In Khatibi's hand, the autobiographical novel is also an account of its theoretical genesis. In it, he dramatizes the genesis and affirmation of his cultural hybridity. The story is constantly being deferred by means of intruding utterances, creating a mosaic-like form of writing. Neither the beginning nor the end of the text is easily determined. The narrative proper is preceded by a prologue which, in turn, is preceded by a preface, written by the author himself, thus creating multiple beginnings. The end of the narrative rendered by the narrator is followed by a stylized parody of a ritualistic monologue, which is followed by a Socratic dialogue, which is followed by a "supplement." Each of these beginnings and endings is written in a clearly different register, contributing to the double-voicedness evident in the whole.

This method of intergenre writing has the important effect of destroying the convention of verisimilitude. Instead of pretending to recreate the temporal experience of a lived past, Khatibi presents us with reflections on the construction of identity in a context of multiple sign systems. The use of this technique—the grafting of various discourses in the narrative—common in the postmodern text, is one of the elements contributing to the opacity of the Khatibian text.

A second and more intriguing element that renders the Khatibian text recalcitrant is his use of images, signs, traces, marks, and letters to form his text. These reaffirm the inherent duality of the subject, for they are taken from Khatibi's Arabo-Islamic heritage and inscribed in the French language, thus remaining inside both signifying systems, yet belonging to neither. Signs, for the narrator in La mémoire tatouée for instance, are linked to the sacred; they radiate by association, and serve to bind the individual to his heritage.

Yet, asked about the thinkers who influenced him and to whom he feels indebted, Khatibi lists exclusively European thinkers: Sartre, Marx, Nietzsche, Kierkegaard, Derrida, Blanchot, and Foucault. And in spite of this very accurate perception of his intellectual formation, Khatibi remains a North African intellectual—a foreigner in his own culture, a host and a guest in the postcolonial text of the 21st century.

—Faiza Shereen

KHLEBNIKOV, Velimir

Born: Viktor Vladimirovich Khlebnikov in Malye Derbety, near Tundutovo, Astrakhan province, Russia, 28 October 1885. Education: Educated at Kazan' Third Gymnasium, 1898–1903; studied mathematics and natural sciences at University of Kazan', 1903–08; studied biology and Slavic languages, University of St. Petersburg, 1909–11. Military Service: Served in Tsarist army, 1916–17. Career: Associated with Futurist and other literary groups; wandering poet, travelled across Russia: arrested by Whites in Kharkov, then by Reds, 1919; worked in Caucasus propaganda bureau (Rosta) in Baku, 1920; lecturer in Revolutionary army headquarters in Persia, 1921; night watchman in Rosta office in Piatigorsk, 1921. Died: 28 June 1922.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

- Stikhi* [Poems]. 1923.
Sobranie proizvedenii [Collected Works], edited by Yurii Tynianov and Nikolai Stepanov. 5 vols., 1928–33.
Neizdannye proizvedenii [Unpublished Works], edited by N. Khardziev and T. Grits. 1940.
Stikhotvoreniia i poemy [Poetry and Narrative Verse], edited by Nikolai Stepanov. 1960.
Sobranie sochinenii [Collected Works]. 4 vols., 1968–72.
Snake Train: Poetry and Prose, edited by Gary Kern, translated by Gary Kern, Richard Sheldon, Edward J. Brown, Neil Cornwell, and Lily Feiler. 1976.
The King of Time, edited by Charlotte Douglas, translated by Paul Schmidt. 1985.
Izbrannoe [Selection], edited by V. Smirnov. 1986.
Collected Works:
1. Letters and Theoretical Writings, edited by Charlotte Douglas, translated by Paul Schmidt. 1987.
  2. Prose, Plays and Supersagas, edited by Ronald Vroon. 1989.

Works

- Uchitel' i uchenik* [Teacher and Pupil]. 1912.
Igra v adu [A Game in Hell]. 1912.
Riav! Perchatki 1908–1914 [Roar! The Gauntlets]. 1913.
Izbornik stikhov 1907–1914 [Selected Verse]. 1914.
Tvoreniia (1906–1908) [Creations]. 1914.
Bitvy 1915–1917: Novoe uchenie o voine [Battles: The New Teaching about War]. 1915.
Vremia mera mira [Time the Measure of the World]. 1916.
Truba marsian [The Martian Pipe]. 1916.
Oshibka smerti [Death's Mistake] (produced 1920). 1916.
Ladimir [Goodworld]. 1920.
Noch' v okope [A Night in the Trench]. 1921.
Vestnik [Herald]. 2 vols., 1922.
Zangezi. 1922.
Otryvok iz dosok sud'by [Fragment from the Boards of Destiny]. 3 vols., 1922–23.
Nastoiashchee [Genuine]. 1926.
Vsem: Nochnoi bal [For Everyone: The Night Ball]. 1927.
Zverinets [Menagerie]. 1930.
Voisko pesen [Military Song]. 1985.
Stikhotvoreniia. Poemy. Dramy. Proza [Poetry. Narrative Verse. Drama. Prose]. 1986.
Stikhotvoreniia [Poetry]. 1988.
Utes iz budushchego [The Rock of the Future]. 1988.
Proza [Prose]. 1990.
Stikhi, poemy [Poems, Narrative Verse]. 1991.

*

Critical Studies: The Longer Poems of Khlebnikov, 1961, and Russian Futurism: A History, 1968, both by Vladimir Markov; Khlebnikov and Carnival: An Analysis of the Poem "Poet" by Barbara Lonnqvist, 1979; Velimir Khlebnikov's Shorter Poems: A Key to the Coinages by Ronald Vroon, 1983; Velimir Chlebnikov and the Development of Poetical Language in Russian Symbolism and Futurism by Willem G. Weststeyn, 1983.

* * *

When the Russian Futurists “slapped the face of public taste” it was largely with the gauntlet of Velimir Khlebnikov’s work that they administered the blow. His experimentation with the Russian language and his ingenious neologisms helped to earn the Futurists the notoriety they were seeking. His work on the word was an embodiment of the Futurist aesthetic stance. He placed the word at the centre of attention, showed how it could develop according to an inner logic. A fossilized literary language came alive at his touch.

The Futurists proclaimed Khlebnikov “King of Russian Poetry.” He could not, however, summon the regal presence or stentorian tones of such as Maiakovskii. Although the Futurists toured Russia, Khlebnikov did not take part. He seemed to have a pathological inability to perform in public. Yet, Russian Futurism without Khlebnikov would have been an empty shell.

Nevertheless, Khlebnikov’s association with the Futurists was somewhat double-edged. Their tendency to publicize those of his works which reflected the movement’s iconoclastic interests led to him acquiring a reputation as a poet of gibberish. This is a grave misjudgement. Despite his espousal of the “self-developed” word, Khlebnikov was a keen seeker after meaning. Even his transrational language (zäum) was designed not to destroy meaning but to enhance it.

Khlebnikov’s preoccupation with language should not be stressed unduly. His work reveals a considerable concern for the world as well as the word. Social and ideological motivations provided a major inspiration for his writing. Many works reflect militant pan-Slavist and revolutionary sentiments. He was opposed to Western influence and looked towards the folk art of the Russian and Slavic peoples. He also directed his gaze eastwards towards India, Persia, and Central Asia.

After the outbreak of World War I Khlebnikov directed his poetic militancy against war. This campaign soon intermingled with a general assault on the arbitrary nature of fate. He became increasingly preoccupied with numerological theories aimed at discovering the laws of time. By practical prophecy he wished to make man the master of his destiny, to make him capable of directing his passage through the centuries like a ship along the Volga. This utopian element finds expression in much of his work. However, running parallel to it is a vivid awareness of the conflict and disaster constantly threatening mankind. Convinced that events unfolded according to some determinable and rational schema, Khlebnikov proclaimed that “measure” had come to replace faith. Yet there is something irrational about his faith in “measure.” His mathematical formulas can appear as incantational as his verse.

As well as his “experimental” works Khlebnikov was an author of long poems with an unusual epic sweep, of short lyric verse with surprising depth, of prose, and of drama. Above all he was a visionary, and it is this vision coupled with an acute sensitivity towards the world which makes some of his works among the best in Russian literature.

—Ray Cooke

See the essay on “Incantation by Laughter.”

KIERKEGAARD, Søren

Pseudonyms: Victor Eremita, Johannes de Silentino, Constantinus Constantinus, Virgilius Haufniensis, Johannes Climacus, Hilarius Bogbinder, Anti-Climacus, H.H. Moreover. Born: Søren Aabye Kierkegaard, in Copenhagen, Denmark, 5 May 1813. Education: Studied theology at the University of Copenhagen, graduating with distinction in 1840. Family: Engaged to Regine Olsen, 1840–41. Career: Entered the University of Copenhagen to study theology according to his father’s wishes, and instead immersed himself in the study of literature, philosophy, and history, 1830; rejected Christianity and became estranged from father, 1830–36; resisted suicidal temptation, 1836; received a sizable inheritance when his father died, 1838; returned to Christianity after experience of “indescribable joy,” 1838; defended his thesis, The Concept of Irony, decided against becoming a minister, 1841; published Either/Or, 1843; visited Berlin, Germany, 1846; attacked the publication Corsair and was lampooned by the publication; 1846; attacked the Danish State Church as an institution of secular humanism, 1848; increased his negative criticism of Danish State Church following death of family friend Bishop Mynster, 1854. Died: 4 November 1855, following a massive stroke suffered while passing out pamphlets on a Copenhagen street.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Papirer. 1909–48; as Søren Kierkegaard's Journals and Papers, 1967–78.

Samlede Vaerker. 1962–64.

Without Authority: Kierkegaard's Writings. 25 vols., edited and translated by Howard V. Hong and Edna H. Hong, with introduction and notes, 1997.

Philosophy

Om Begrebet Ironi med stadigt Hensyn til Socrates. 1841; as On the Concept of Irony, with Special Reference to Socrates, translated by Lee M. Capel, 1966; as The Concept of Irony, with Continual Reference to Socrates: Together with Notes of Schelling's Berlin Lectures, edited and translated by Howard V. Hong and Edna H. Hong, 1989.

Enten/Eller (as Victor Eremita). 1843; as Either/Or: A Fragment of Life, translated by David F. Swenson and Lillian Marvin Swenson, 1944; also translated by George L. Stengren, 1986; Howard V. Hong and Edna H. Hong, 1987; Alastair Hannay, 1992.

Frygt og Bæven (as Johannes de Silentino). 1843; as Fear and Trembling: A Dialectical Lyric by Johannes de Silentino, translated by Robert Payne, 1939; also translated by Walter Lowrie, 1941; Howard V. Hong and Edna H. Hong, 1983; Alastair Hannay, 1985.

Gjentagelsen: Et Forsøg I den eksperimenterende Psychologi (as Constantinus Constantinus). 1843; as Repetition: An Essay in Experimental Psychology, translated by Walter Lowrie, 1941.

Opbyggelige Taler. 1843–44; as Edifying Discourses, translated by David F. and Lillian Marvin Swenson, 1943–46.

Begrebet Angest (as Virgilius Haufniensis). 1844; as The Concept of Anxiety, translated with introduction and notes by Walter Lowrie, 1944.

Philosophiske Smuler (as Johannes Climacus). 1844; as Philosophical Fragments; or, A Fragment of Philosophy, translated by David F. Swenson, 1936; revised translation by Howard V. Hong, 1962.

Stadier paa Livets Vej (as Hilarius Bogbinder). 1845; as Stages on Life's Way, translated by Walter Lowrie, 1940; also translated by Howard V. Hong and Edna H. Hong, 1988.

Tre Taler ved taenkte Leiligheder. 1845; as Thoughts on Crucial Situations in Human Life: Three Discourses on Imagined Occasions, translated by David F. Swenson, 1941.

Afsluttende uvidenskabelig Efterskrift (as Johannes Climacus). 1846; as Concluding Unscientific Postscript to the Philosophical Fragments, translated by David F. Swenson and Walter Lowrie, 1941; also translated and edited by Howard V. Hong and Edna H. Hong, 1992.

En literair Anmeldelse. To Tidsaldre. 1846; as Two Ages: The Age of Revolution and the Present Age, A Literary Review, translated and edited by Howard V. Hong and Edna H. Hong, 1978.

Bogem om Adler. 1846–47; as On Authority and Revelation: The Book on Adler, translated with introduction by Walter Lowrie, 1955.

Kjerlighedens Gjerninger. 1847; as Works of Love, translated by David F. Swenson and Lillian Marvin Swenson, 1946.

Opbyggelige Taler Iforskjellig Aand. 1847; as Edifying Discourses in a Different Vein, translated by David F. Swenson and Lillian Marvin Swenson, 1938.

Krisen og en Krise I en Skuespillerindes Liv. 1848; as Crisis in the Life of an Actress, in Crisis in the Life of an Actress, and Other Essays on Drama by Søren Kierkegaard, translated with introduction and notes by Stephen Crites, 1967; also translated by Howard V. Hong and Edna H. Hong, in Christian Discourses: The Crisis and a Crisis in the Life of an Actress, 1997.

Christelige Taler. 1848; as Christian Discourses, translated by Walter Lowrie, 1939; also translated by Howard V. Hong and Edna H. Hong, in Christian Discourses: The Crisis and a Crisis in the Life of an Actress, 1997.

Sygdommen til Døden (as Anti-Climacus). 1849; as The Sickness unto Death, translated by Walter Lowrie, 1941; also translated by Howard V. Hong and Edna H. Hong, 1980; Alastair Hannay, 1989.

Tre Taler ved Altergangen om Fredagen. 1849; as Three Discourses at the Communion on Fridays, translated by Walter Lowrie, 1939; also translated by Howard V. Hong and Edna H. Hong in Kierkegaard's Writings: XVIII: Without Authority, 1997.

Tvende ethisk-religieuse Smaa-Afhandlinger (as H.H. Moreover). 1849; as Two Minor Ethico-Religious Treatises, translated by Alexander Dru and Walter Lowrie, 1940.

Indovelse i Christendom (as Anti-Climacus). 1850; as Training in Christianity, translated by Walter Lowrie, 1941.

Om min Forfatter-Virksomhed. 1851; as On My Work as an Author, published in The Point of View for My Work as an Author, translated by Walter Lowrie, 1939; also translated by Howard V. Hong and Edna H. Hong, 1998.

Til Selprovelse. 1851; as For Self-Examination, translated by Walter Lowrie, 1940; also translated by Howard V. Hong and Edna H. Hong, 1990.

Hvad Christus dommer om official Christendom. 1855; as Kierkegaard's Attack upon "Christendom," 1854–1855, translated by Walter Lowrie, 1944.

*

Bibliography: Søren Kierkegaard and His Critics: An International Bibliography of Criticism, compiled by François H. Lapointe, 1980.

Critical Studies: A History of Philosophy; Volume VII: Modern Philosophy from the Post-Kantian Idealists to Marx, Kierkegaard, and Nietzsche by Frederick Copleston, S.J., 1965; Socrates to Sartre: A History of Philosophy by Samuel Enoch Stumpf, 1966; Kierkegaard's Authorship: A Guide to the Writings of Kierkegaard by George Bartholomew and George E. Arbaugh, 1968; Philosophy & the Christian Faith by Colin Brown, 1968; Søren Kierkegaard by Brita K. Stendahl, 1976; A Kierkegaard Handbook by Frederick Sontag, 1978; Kierkegaard and Literature: Irony, Repetition, and Criticism edited by Ronald Schleifer and Robert Markley, 1984; Foundations of Kierkegaard's Vision of Community: Religion, Ethics, and Politics in Kierkegaard edited by George B. Connell and C. Stephen Evans, 1992; Kierkegaard for Beginners by Donald D. Palmer, 1996.

* * *

Søren Kierkegaard is considered by many historians of philosophy as the progenitor of the existentialist school of thought. Existentialism, as named by French philosopher and novelist Jean-Paul Sartre—who considered Kierkegaard one of his major inspirations—emphasizes the individual and the personal, subjective choice to either exercise ultimate freedom or responsible restraint. Kierkegaard endured ridicule and had a reputation as a crackpot, especially in the years immediately preceding his death, in the then small, enclosed town of Copenhagen. About 70 years after his death, 20th-century philosophers and translators introduced Kierkegaard's works to a larger audience outside Denmark, causing him to be reassessed as one of the modern age's most prodigious and profound philosophical thinkers.

Many of Kierkegaard's writings were reactions against the predominant philosophy of the early 19th-century, primarily the writings of German metaphysical idealist Georg Wilhelm Friedrich Hegel. Hegel attempted to construct a dialectic that explained both the world and its divine governance according to human reason. Kierkegaard argued that Hegel's system relied too heavily on a belief in objective or universal truths and neglected to consider the choices made by individuals. Kierkegaard wrote that men and women exercise self-commitment in choosing one action or belief over another and, furthermore, that these acts of self-commitment are based upon the subjective determination of each individual rather than upon universally agreed-upon truths.

Central to Kierkegaard's system of belief is that individuals operate in one of three realms—the aesthetic, the ethical, or the religious. Aesthetic humans engage in a life of the senses and emotion. Rather than limit his definition of the aesthetic human to such hedonists as Don Juan, Kierkegaard included the Romantic poets who engaged in what he considered the worship of ultimate freedom, nature, and imagination. Kierkegaard believed that submission to an aesthetic life void of salvation led to a despair that could only be mediated by choosing to commit oneself to the ethical realm. The ethical human, represented by the Greek philosopher Socrates, believes that humans can overcome their individual foibles by acts of willpower guided by ethical ideals. For example, a hedonist may suppress his or her sexual impulses by choosing to adopt a life of marital fidelity, which Kierkegaard believed to be an ethical choice. This realm, however, is predicated on the assumption that humankind is capable of determining all differences between right and wrong without the acknowledgement of the existence of sin in terms of divine law. This determination can be achieved only through religious faith. To illustrate his point, Kierkegaard employed the Old Testament story of Abraham and Isaac. Abraham's choice to murder his son at the bequest of God, Kierkegaard said, was not an ethical choice, but a religious choice based upon Abraham's faith. Such a faith cannot be explained in terms of human reason and ethics, but only through an individual's relationship with God. The belief in such a God required what Kierkegaard called a "leap of faith," which is a conscious exercise of choice to accept the existence of God, and the willingness to trust in God's demands however contrary such demands are to human standards of morality.

—Bruce Walker

KIŠ, Danilo

Born: Subotica, Serbia, 22 February 1935. Jewish parents sent to Auschwitz in 1944; brought up by uncle in Cetinje, Yugoslavia. Education: Educated locally in Hungary to age 13, then high school in Cetinje; Belgrade University, degree in comparative literature 1958. Career: Editor, Vidici; lecturer in Serbo-Croat, Universities of Strasbourg, 1961–63, Bordeaux, 1973–76, and Lille, 1979–83; also translator from a number of languages; lived and worked in Paris, from 1979. Awards: NIN prize, 1973; Ivan Goran Kovacich prize, 1977; Grand Aigle d'Or (Nice), 1980; Ivo Andrić award, 1984; PEN Bruno Schulz prize 1989. Died: 15 October 1989.

PUBLICATIONS

Fiction

Mansarda; Psalam 44 [The Garret; Psalm 44]. 1962.
Bašta, pepeo. 1965; as Garden, Ashes, translated by William J. Hannaher, 1976.
Rani jadi [Early Sorrows] (stories). 1969; as Early Sorrows: For Children and Sensitive Readers, translated by Michael Henry Heim, 1998.
Peščanik. 1972; as Hourglass, translated by Ralph Manheim, 1990.
Grobница za Borisa Davidoviča (stories). 1976; as A Tomb for Boris Davidovich, translated by Duška Mikić-Mitchell, 1978.
Enciklopedija mrtvih. 1983; as The Encyclopedia of the Dead, translated by Michael Henry Heim, 1989.

Plays

Elektra (produced 1969).

Noć i magla [Night and Mist] (includes Papagaj [The Parrot]; Drveni sanduk Tomasa Vulfa [The Wooden Chest of Thomas Wolfe]; Mehanički lavovi [The Mechanical Lions]). 1983.

Other

Po-etika [Poetics]. 2 vols., 1972–74.
Caš anatomije [The Anatomy Lesson]. 1978.
Homo poeticus. 1983; as Homo poeticus: Essays and Interviews, edited with introduction by Susan Sontag, 1995.
Sabrana dela [Collected Works]. 10 vols., 1983.
Gorki talog iskustva (interviews), with Mirjana Miočinović. 1990.
Pesme i preperi, edited by Predrag Cudic. 1992.
 Editor, with Mirjana Miočinović, Sabrana dela [Collected Works], by Lautréamont. 1964.
 Translator of the poetry of Verlaine and Baudelaire.

*

Critical Studies: "Imaginary-Real Lives: On Danilo Kiš" by Norbert Czarny and Catherine Vincent, in Cross Currents, 3, 1984; "Danilo Kiš: From 'Enchantment' to 'Documentation'" by Branko Gorjup, in Canadian Slavonic Papers, 29(4), 1987; "Danilo Kiš: Encyclopedia of the Dead" by Predrag Matvejevic, in Cross Currents, 1988; "The Awakening of Sleepers in Danilo Kiš's Encyclopedia of the Dead" by Jelena S. Bankovic-Rosul, in Serbian Studies, Spring 1990; "Danilo Kiš, 1935–1989" by Gyorgy Spiro, in New Hungarian Quarterly, 31(119), 1990; "Silk, Scissors, Gardens, Ashes: The Autobiographical Writing of Irena Vrkljan and Danilo Kiš" by Celia Hawkesworth, in her Literature and Politics in Eastern Europe, 1992; Proza Danila Kiša by Peter Pijanović, 1992.

* * *

Danilo Kiš occupied a pre-eminent position among contemporary Yugoslav writers on the strength of his carefully crafted fiction, but his other literary ventures—plays for radio and television, essays and translations from French, Hungarian, and Russian—have also been held in high esteem. His early novels, Mansarda [The Garret] and Psalam 44 [Psalm 44], have clearly indicated two important features of Kiš as a fiction writer: his keen interest in the themes of human suffering and his lack of interest in the vestiges of traditional realistic narrative and classical psychological analysis.

Mansarda is basically a story of youthful love patterned on the myth of Orpheus and Eurydice, but what the novel captures best is the garret atmosphere of the hero's juvenile world of capricious daydreams, hallucinations, paradoxical reasoning, and cynicism from which he is "dethroned" and brought down to face the demanding banalities of everyday life. Many quotations and literary and mythological allusions give the novel a strong intellectual edge. The author's concern with the contrasting facets of existence and the playful dance of his language make this story of how innocence changes into experience one of the most original first novels published in Yugoslavia after World War II.

Psalam 44 is Kiš's attempt at the literature of the Holocaust. It is a stream-of-consciousness novel in which a young Jewish girl reveals her distressing history in the tense moments preceding her escape from the Birkenau concentration camp with her newborn baby and her French girlfriend. The account of her desperate efforts to survive after the escape is concluded with a qualified happy ending: the reunited family visit the camp six years afterwards in order to hand down to the child “the joy of those who, out of death and love, were able to create life.” The most impressive feature of the novel is the dispassionate, almost lethargic calmness of the narrative, which recaptures in most grisly detail the abyss of human agony.

Kiš’s next novel, Bašta, pepeo (Garden, Ashes), has a strong autobiographical element. The narrator-protagonist is the Jewish boy Andreas Sam, who grows up in the Danubian plains in the 1940s, before, during, and after the war. His memories concentrate on a small, tightly knit group of characters, but are dominated by the overpowering personality of his father, Eduard, a railway official who has compiled a gigantic Universal Timetable and who disappears during the Holocaust. The book is in large measure the search by a son for the father (a hypochondriac, lunatic dreamer, drunkard, and loner) he lost even before his death, in an attempt to establish distant and unnoticed connections which in his childhood he could not believe existed. A skilful interweaving of introspective poetic strands, striking intellectual displays, and reminiscences almost sensuously brought to life makes this book a particular kind of creative autobiography, clothed in a fine net of soft lyrical weave. Kiš followed it with a sequel, Rani jadi [Early Sorrows], a collection of short stories where the Sam family appears again portrayed in the same tone of melancholic lyricism and psychological subtlety.

Peščanik (Hourglass), where the same father-figure turns up under the initials E.S., is a novel which seemingly lacks all thematic and narrative coherence. It is composed of various texts referring to E.S., his motivations and actions, but the key to understanding these diverse writings (letters, documents, reports, and notes), which demand the reader’s utmost concentration and patience, is given at the end of the book, in a letter written by E.S. to his sister. It casts a revealing light on Kiš’s apparently chaotic narrative and discloses its moral seriousness in the history of a man who, in the inferno of history and amid the atmosphere of selfishness and indifference, tries to secure the survival of his family.

Grobnica za Borisa Davidoviča (A Tomb for Boris Davidovich), a collection of short stories concerned with the theme of suffering of the innocent, makes a new departure. All the stories except one, which takes place in southern France in 1330, describe the misfortunes of several characters (mostly Jewish) who perished in the Soviet labour camps or died in the USSR as the victims of forces of terror. The stories, based on authentic documents and case histories, are an original hybrid of fiction and “faction” and bear a general resemblance to Arthur Koestler’s Darkness at Noon, “although surpassing it in both horrifying detail and narrative skill,” as Joseph Brodskii said in his introduction to the English translation. Accused of plagiarism by some Yugoslav critics, Kiš refuted their allegations in the highly polemic Caš anatomije [The Anatomy Lesson], turning his defence into a virulent satire of his critics.

In his last volume of short stories, Enciklopedija mrtvih (The Encyclopedia of the Dead), Kiš widened his thematic range through his interest in ancient legends and metaphysical strata of existence. His paramount concern for human suffering caused by forces of history, however, preserved its centrality in all his writing.

—Dušan Puvačić

KLEIST, (Bernd) Heinrich (Wilhelm) von

Born: Frankfurt an der Oder, Brandenburg (now Germany), 18 October 1777. Education: Studied law, University of Frankfurt, 1799. Military Service: Entered the Prussian army in 1792; took part in the siege of Mainz, 1793, promoted to second lieutenant, 1799, resigned his commission, 1799. Career: Travelled throughout Germany, and to Paris and Switzerland, 1800–04; attempted to join the French army, 1803; civil servant, Königsberg, 1805–06; co-founder, with Adam Müller, and editor, Phöbus, Dresden, 1808–09; attempted unsuccessfully to publish the newspaper Germania, in Prague, 1809; editor, Berliner Abendblätter, 1810–11. Suffered many nervous breakdowns. Died: (suicide) 21 November 1811.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Hinterlassene Schriften, edited by Ludwig Tieck. 1821.

Gesammelte Schriften, edited by Ludwig Tieck. 3 vols., 1826.

Werke, edited by Erich Schmidt and others. 5 vols., 1904–05; revised edition, 7 vols., 1936–38.

Sämtliche Werke und Briefe, edited by Helmut Sembdner. 2 vols., 1961.

Three Plays, translated by Noel Clark. 1997.

Three Major Plays, translated by Carl R. Mueller. 2000.

Plays

Die Familie Schroffenstein (produced 1804). 1803; as The Feud of the Schroffensteins, translated by Mary J. and Lawrence M. Price, 1916.

Amphitryon (produced 1899). 1807; as Amphitryon, translated by Marion Sonnenfeld, 1962; also translated by Charles E. Passage, in Amphitryon: Three Plays in New Verse Translations, 1973; Martin Greenberg, in Five Plays, 1988; as God’s Gift: A Version of Amphitryon by Heinrich von Kleist by John Banville, 2000.

Der zerbrochene Krug (produced 1808). 1811; as The Broken Pitcher, translated by Bayard Quincy Morgan, 1961; also translated by Jon Swan, in Plays, 1982; as The Broken Jug, translated by Lawrence P.R. Wilson, in Four Continental Plays, edited by John P. Allen, 1964; also translated by Roger Jones, 1977; Martin Greenberg, in Five Plays, 1988; translated and adapted by Blake Morrison as The Cracked Pot: A Play, 1996. Penthesilea (produced 1876). 1808; as Penthesilea, translated by Humphry Trevelyan, in The Classic Theatre, edited by Eric Bentley, 1959; also translated by Martin Greenberg, in Five Plays, 1988; as Penthesilea: A Tragic Drama, translated and introduced by Joel Agee, 1998.

Das Käthchen von Heilbronn (produced 1810). 1810; as Kate of Heilbronn, translated by Elijah B. Impey, in Illustrations of German Poetry, 1841; as Käthchen of Heilbronn; or, the Test of Fire, translated by Frederick E. Pierce, in Fiction and Fantasy of German Literature, 1927.

Prinz Friedrich von Homburg (produced 1821). In Hinterlassene Schriften, 1821; as The Prince of Homburg, translated by Charles E. Passage, 1956; also translated by James Kirkup, in The Classic Theatre, edited by Eric Bentley, 1959; as Prince Frederick of Homburg, translated by Peggy Meyer Sherry, in Plays, 1982; also translated by Martin Greenberg, 1988.

Die Hermannsschlacht (produced 1839). In Hinterlassene Schriften, 1821.

Robert Guiskard (unfinished; produced 1901). In Gesammelte Schriften, 1826; as A Fragment of the Tragedy of Robert Guiscard, translated by Martin Greenberg, in Five Plays, 1988.

Plays (The Broken Pitcher; Amphitryon; Penthesilea; Prince Frederick of Homburg), edited by Walter Hinderer. 1982.

Five Plays (includes Amphitryon; The Broken Jug; Penthesilea; Prince Frederick of Homburg; A Fragment of the Tragedy of Robert Guiscard), translated by Martin Greenberg. 1988.

Fiction

Erzählungen. 2 vols., 1810–11.

The Marquise of O. and Other Stories, translated by Martin Greenberg. 1960; also translated by David Luke and Nigel Reeves, 1978.

Michael Kohlhaas, translated by J. Oxenford, 1844; also translated by F. Lloyd and W. Newton, 1875; F.H. King, 1919; James Kirkup, 1967; Harry Steinhauer, in Twelve German Novellas, 1977; David Luke and Nigel Reeves, in The Marquiss of O. and Other Stories, 1978.

Other

Briefe an seine Schwester Ulrike, edited by August Koberstein. 1860.

Briefe an seine Braut, edited by Karl Biedermann and others. 1884.

Über das Marionettentheater: Aufsätze und Anekdoten, edited by Helmut Sembdner. 1935; revised edition, 1980; as On a Theatre of Marionettes, translated by G. Wilford, 1989; as On Puppetshows, translated by David Paisley, 1991.

Lebensspuren: Dokumente und Berichte der Zeitgenossen, edited by Helmut Sembdner. 1964.

An Abyss Deep Enough: Letters of Heinrich von Kleist (includes essays), edited and translated by Philip B. Miller. 1982.

*

Bibliography: Kleist-Bibliographie 1803–1862 by Helmut Sembdner, 1966.

Critical Studies: Reason and Energy by Michael Hamburger, 1957; Kleist: Studies in His Work and Literary Character by Walter Silz, 1961; Heinrich von Kleist's Dramas by E.L. Stahl, 1961; Kleist's "Prinz Friedrich von Homburg": An Interpretation Through Word Patterns by Mary Garland, 1968; Kleist: A Study in Tragedy and Anxiety by John Gearey, 1968; Kleist's Prinz Friedrich von Homburg: A Critical Study, 1970, and Heinrich von Kleist, 1979, both by J.M. Ellis; From Lessing to Hauptmann: Studies in German Drama by Ladislaus Löb, 1974; The Major Works of Heinrich von Kleist by R.E. Helbling, 1975; Kleist and the Tragic Ideal: A Study of Penthesilea and its Relationship to Kleist's Personal and Literary Development, 1806–1808 by H.M. Brown, 1977; The Stories of Kleist: A Critical Study by Denys Dyer, 1977; Heinrich von Kleist: Word into Flesh: A Poet's Quest for the Symbol by Ilse Graham, 1977; Von Kleist: From Hussar to Panzer Marshal by Clyde R. Davis, 1979; Heinrich von Kleist: Studies in the Character and Meaning of His Writings by J.M. Ellis, 1979; Kleist's Lost Year and the Quest for Robert Guiskard by R.H. Samuel, 1981; Kleist: A Biography by Joachim Maass, translated by Ralph Manheim, 1983; Desire's Sway: The Plays and Stories of Heinrich von Kleist by James M. McGlathery, 1983; Spirited Women Heroes: Major Female Characters in the Dramas of Goethe, Schiller and Kleist by Julie D. Prandi, 1983; Prison and Idylls: Studies in Heinrich von Kleist's Fictional World by Linda Dietrick, 1985; Heinrich von Kleist: A Critical Study by Raymond Cooke, 1987; The Manipulation of Reality in Works by Heinrich von Kleist by Robert E. Glenny, 1987; Kafka's Prussian Advocate: The Influence of Heinrich von Kleist on Franz Kafka by John M. Grandin, 1987; In Pursuit of Power: Heinrich von Kleist's Machiavellian Protagonists, 1987, Kleist's Aristocratic Heritage and Das Käthchen von Heilbronn, 1991, and Kleist on Stage, 1804–1987, 1993, all by William C. Reeve; Laughter, Comedy and Aesthetics: Kleist's Der zerbrochene Krug by Mark G. Ward, 1989; Heinrich von Kleist: The Dramas and Stories by Anthony Stephens, 1994; The Poetics of Death: The Short Prose of Kleist and Balzac by Beatrice Martina Guenther, 1996; The Plays of Heinrich von Kleist: Ideals and Illusions by Seán Allan, 1996; The Retreat of Representation: The Concept of Darstellung in German Critical Discourse by Martha B. Helfer, 1996; Heinrich Von Kleist: The Ambiguity of Art and the Necessity of Form by Hilda Meldrum Brown, 1998; The School of Days: Heinrich von Kleist and the Traumas of Education by Nancy Nobile, 1999.

* * *

Throughout his short life Heinrich von Kleist was bedevilled by contradictions and misfortunes. A Prussian aristocrat alienated from his class, brilliantly gifted yet deeply neurotic, he was torn between pedantry and passion, sensitivity and violence, furious ambition and a paralysing sense of failure. His obsessive striving for absolute certainties was confounded by doubts. His uncompromising search for fulfilment through love, friendship, nation, nature, or art foundered on external obstacles and on his own instability. Some moments of euphoria apart, his dominant mood was despair, leading to an early suicide. It is suitably ironic that, having been declared sick by Goethe and ignored for a century, he should have come to be regarded, not least by Kafka and Thomas Mann, as one of Germany's greatest writers. Kleist shared the subjectivism and spiritualism of the Romantics, but unlike them he incorporated, rather than suppressed, the recalcitrance of objective reality in his writing. Anticipating psychoanalysis, sceptical about communication, and rejecting traditional philosophical, moral, and social assumptions in his treatment of existential issues, he seems strikingly modern.

Kleist's central problem—documented in his correspondence and occasional essays—was that of knowledge. At first he sought happiness through both Enlightenment rationalism and Rousseauesque sensibility, but he was shattered when some ideas of Kant confirmed his suspicion that the intellect was "unable to decide whether what we call truth is truly the truth, or only appears so to us" (letter to Wilhelmine Zenge, 22 March 1801). He continued to commend "feeling," and he claimed—notably in Über das Marionettentheater (On Puppetshows)—that the pristine grace of an unthinking condition, which was upset by reflection, would be regained in a divine state of infinite awareness. Basically, however, he believed that emotion, in its inconstancy, was as unreliable as reason, and that the impossibility of making informed choices or recognizing any providential purpose rendered human freedom an illusion and fate synonymous with chance. His creative works explore these dilemmas from a variety of angles.

Kleist's first play, Die Familie Schroffenstein (The Feud of the Schroffensteins), is a Gothic melodrama in which the trust of the young lovers proves helpless against the accidents, errors, and enmities that destroy them. His next two plays mix hope and anxiety: in Amphitryon, an adaptation of Plautus and Molière, the tragicomedy of Jupiter impersonating the title hero to seduce his wife, alongside the farcical impersonation of the servant Sosias by Mercury, raises vexing questions about personal identity, the fallibility of perception, and the afflictions of love; in Der zerbrochene Krug (The Broken Jug), a rural comedy with overtones of Greek and Biblical myth, the truth emerges as the judge Adam convicts himself of his advances to the virtuous Eve, but her fiancé's distrustfulness almost causes disaster. Two subsequent plays, as Kleist noted, are complementary: in Penthesilea, a tragedy on Greek legend, the inefficacy of the intellect is compounded by the ambivalence of emotion as the Amazon queen, after many misunderstandings, slaughters the warrior Achilles in a paroxysm of love-hate and wills herself to death; in Das Käthchen von Heilbronn (Käthchen of Heilbronn), a medievalizing romance, the assurance of undivided devotion prevails as the heroine, supported by suprasensory promises, conquers the reluctant hero against all reasonable expectation. Kleist's vaguely historical last play, Prinz Friedrich von Homburg (The Prince of Homburg), is also his most celebrated. The hero, who disobeys orders but wins a battle and who after agonies of fear welcomes the death penalty but is rehabilitated, apparently achieves a "classical" reconciliation of subjective inclination and objective duty; but again misconceptions abound, destiny as embodied in the Elector remains arbitrary, the chauvinistic exaltation of the Prussian state rings hollow, and the happy ending which completes the hero's initial somnambulistic fantasy of love and glory is literally called "a dream."

Of Kleist's collected stories five are commonly regarded as the most important. In "The Earthquake in Chile" a young couple is lynched in a resurgence of religious hysteria after an interlude of idyllic peace following the collapse of the city. In "The Engagement in Santo Domingo" the hero, misinterpreting the heroine's attempt to save his life during a colonial uprising, kills her, and, on learning the truth, kills himself. In "The Marquise of O" the conundrum of the celibate but pregnant heroine is resolved by the confession of her eventual husband, who raped her while she was unconscious. In "The Duel" the champion's belief in his lady's innocence is vindicated when he recovers from the near-fatal wound he sustained in the trial by ordeal, while the villain, whose alibi rests on delusion, dies of a slight injury. In Michael Kohlhaas, Kleist's greatest story, a righteous horsedealer becomes a vindictive outlaw when he is denied a fair legal hearing, and triumphs, with supernatural aid, at the very moment of his execution, when his grievances are redressed and his enemies punished. Love, trust, and intuitive confidence thus thrive in some cases and perish in others. In all cases, however, deceptive appearances, intellectual fallacies, and emotional disturbances, allied with strange coincidences and baffling incongruities, reiterate Kleist's view of the irrationality and mystery of existence.

Kleist's style, which is highly original though not deliberately experimental, is marked by ambiguity, irony, and paradox. His characters, faced with surprising situations, locked in fierce conflicts or painful isolation, driven by forces they can neither understand nor control, represent extreme impulses rather than normal human behaviour. His superbly timed actions replace conventional linearity with cyclic recurrences, sudden reversals, abrupt contrasts, and complex symbolic variations on a relatively limited number of enigmatic themes. His restraint from authorial comment and analytical explanation, his shifting perspectives, his insistence on accurate detail in the midst of upheaval and confusion invest his subjective concerns with a semblance of objectivity and provide solid realistic foundations for his visions. Rather than discussing his experience in conceptual terms, he conveys it directly through the structure of his language: blending fancy with matter-of-factness, dryness with lyricism, profuse rhetoric with explosive compression; revelling in bold metaphors, puns, equivocations, and relentless question-and-answer sequences; interrupting long hypotactical periods by encapsulated elucidations, qualifications, and objections before rushing headlong to their conclusion; and breaking down into speechless gestures, blushing and fainting, when words fail. It is this masterly use of dramatic, narrative, and linguistic devices that enables Kleist to impose aesthetic order on a chaotic world and to turn his torments into art.

—Ladislav Löb

See the essay on The Broken Jug, Michael Kohlhaas, and The Prince of Homburg.

KLÍMA, Ivan

Born: Prague, Czech Republic, 14 September 1931. Education: Attended school in Prague; education interrupted when he spent three years in the concentration camp Terezín; high school in Prague, after 1945; studied Czech literature and philology at Charles University in Prague, graduating with a thesis on Karel Čapek, 1952–56. Family: Married Helena Malá (now the well-known psychotherapist Helena Klímová) in 1958; one daughter and one son. Career: Editor of Květen, a short-lived journal of young writers, 1956–59; book editor for Československý spisovatel, 1959–63; joined the editorial staff of Literární noviny, the weekly journal of the Writers' Union, an outspoken prestigious publication (in 1968 renamed Literární listy, then Listy), 1963; during the literary renaissance that peaked in the "Prague Spring" editor-in-chief (the journal was banned in 1969); Visiting Professor at The University of Michigan at Ann Arbor, 1969–70; decided to return to Czechoslovakia which, following the Soviet occupation in August 1968, was by then again under harsh Communist rule; no possibilities for carrying on his editorial work; held various jobs, e.g. as ambulance man, surveying assistant, messenger during the 1970s and 1980s; his writings were banned in Czechoslovakia but published abroad in several translations; involved in the initiation of the now renowned samizdat publication where most of his works appeared; continued writing against the greatest odds; after the demise of Communism in 1989 president of Czech PEN, 1990; his writings now published in translations into thirty languages; travels widely, lecturing and giving author's readings; from 1991 on contributor to literary journals and dailies (including Sweden and Germany).

PUBLICATIONS

Fiction

A Wonderful Day. 1960.

Hodina ticha. 1963.

Milenci na jednu noc. 1964.

Lod' jménem naděje. 1969; as A Ship Named Hope (includes two novels: The Jury and A Ship Named Hope); translated by Ewald Osers, 1970.

Markétčin zvěřinec (first appeared in samizdat). 1973.

Má veselá jitra (first appeared in samizdat). 1978; as My Merry Mornings, translated by George Theiner, 1985.

Moje první lásky (first appeared in samizdat). 1990; as My First Loves, translated by Ewald Osers, 1986.

Milostné léto. 1979; as A Summer Affair, 1979; revised edition translated by Ewald Osers, 1985.

Láska a smetí (first appeared in samizdat). 1986; as Love and Garbage, translated by Ewald Osers, 1990.

Soudce z Milosti (first appeared in samizdat). 1986; as Judge on Trial, translated by A.G. Brain [pseudonym for Alice and Gerald Turner], 1991.

Má zlatá řemesla. 1989; as My Golden Trades, translated by Paul Wilson, 1992.

Čekání na tmu, čekání na světlo (first appeared in samizdat). 1993; as Waiting for the Dark, Waiting for the Light, translated by Paul Wilson, 1994.

Milostné rozhovory [Lovers' Conversations]. 1995; some of these short texts appeared in the collection Lovers for a Day.

Poslední stupeň důvěrnosti. 1996; as The Ultimate Intimacy, translated by A.G. Brain, 1997.

Lovers for a Day [collected stories from the 1960s to the 1990s], translated by Gerald Turner. 1999.

Ani svatí ani anděle. 1999; as No Saints or Angels, translated by Gerald Turner, 2001.

Plays

Zámek. 1965.

Mistr. 1967.

Klára a dva páni (produced in Vancouver, B.C., 1985). 1968; as Klara and Two Men, translated by Peter Stenberg and Marketa Goetz-Stankiewicz in Prism International, XXI:4, summer 1983.

Cukrárna Myriam (produced as Sweetshop Myriam in New York, 1968). 1968.

Ženich pro Marcelu (produced as Bridegroom for Marcela in New York, 1969). 1968.

Porota (produced in Prague, 1969). 1969.

Pokoj pro dva a jiné hry (contains three plays; first appeared in samizdat). 1973.

Ministr a anděl (first appeared in samizdat). 1973.

Hromobítí (first appeared in samizdat; produced in Vancouver, B.C. [in Czech], 1995). 1973.

Amerika, with Pavel Kohout [based on Franz Kafka's novel]. 1974.

Hry (contains four plays; first appeared in samizdat). 1974.

Hry (first appeared in samizdat; produced in Vancouver, B.C., 1981, in London, 1990). 1974; as Games, translated by Jan Drabek, in Dramacontemporary Czechoslovakia, 1985.

Franz a Felice (first appeared in samizdat). 1984; as Franz and Felice, translated by Jan Drabek, in Cross Currents 5, 1986.

Other

Karel Čapek (critical study). 1962.

The Spirit of Prague (essays written between 1974 and 1993) translated by Paul Wilson. 1994.

Kruh nepřátel českého jazyka (selected feuilletons). 1998.

Between Security and Insecurity (essays). 1999; translated by Gerry Turner.

*

Critical Studies: Czech Theatre Since World War II by Paul I. Trensky, 1978; The Silenced Theatre: Czech Playwrights without a Stage by Marketa Goetz-Stankiewicz, 1979; Selfjustification through Writing by Marlene A. Schiwy, M.A. thesis, University of British Columbia, 1983; "Profile: Ivan Klíma" by Igor Hájek, in Index on Censorship, vol. 12, no. 2, 1983; "A Conversation in Prague" by Philip Roth, New York Review, April 1990; "Love and Garbage: Can Ivan Klíma Do Without an Adjective?" by Marketa-Goetz-Stankiewicz, in Czechoslovak and Central European Journal, vol. 11, no. 2, Winter 1993.

* * *

When, in 1970, students and colleagues at the University of Michigan tried to talk Ivan Klíma into staying with his family in the United States, he explained the reason for his decision to return: in America all he could be—at best—was a professor, whereas in his home he could always remain a writer, even if he had to sweep the streets. It is ironic that this is just about what happened (see Láska a smetí [Love and Garbage]). But while going through a series of menial jobs, political harassment, banning of his works, loss of basic human rights, Ivan Klíma remained a writer. As such, he combines three qualities that are rarely found in the same person: he is a novelist and short story writer, a playwright (although this genre relates to his past) and a literary critic cum feuilletonist. What is called his "career" above, shows the complexity, indeed absurdity of his biography. For example, had he started writing a few years earlier, this writer, striving all through his life for understanding and tolerance between human beings and seeking to reveal ethical values, would have been censored or banned by two diametrically opposed political regimes—National Socialism and Communism. He shares this fate with another Prague writer whom he admires and whose work he adapted and discussed: Franz Kafka.

Broadly speaking, Klíma's work falls into three areas. There are (spanning his whole career): short stories that are veritable gems of finely drawn miniatures, dealing with the changeable reflections of human affection Moje první lásky (My First Loves); the comic/tragic incidents a banned writer experiences when he works at menial jobs and turns these often absurd experiences into gently ironic celebrations of human resilience Má zlatá řemesla (My Golden Trades); the shockingly funny or funnily shocking incidents of Má veselá jitra (My Merry Mornings); and the intimate encounters between man and woman, whose emotional fragility is illuminated by the sharp yet kindly lingering gaze of the author's eye Milostné rozhovory [Lovers' Conversations].

Then there are his novels: work on the mighty volume Soudce z Milosti (Judge on Trial) spanned two decades (the first version, under the title There Stands a Gallows appeared in samizdat in 1978, the final version almost twenty years later). Malcolm Bradbury wrote that "it was likely to survive as the key version of the later 20th century Eastern European political novel." More austere and lacking the ironic humor that pervades Klíma's short stories and to a certain extent also his later novels, it moves, as all of the author's works do, on the borderline of ethical dilemmas: it is a trial of conscience of a man who seems to have done everything "properly"; yet at the end, when the sum of his life is being tested, little of value remains. Milostné léto (A Summer Affair) explores a mature man's passion for an indifferent young woman, tracing a sort of finding and losing oneself; Love and Garbage, loosely based on Klíma's own experience, deals with a banned writer who becomes part of a street-sweeping crew and thus gains a view of society from below; merging political satire with a love story and the author's perennial meditations on the nature of guilt and innocence, compulsion and freedom of choice. The finely hued balance of moral condemnation and forgiving understanding also marks the succeeding two novels: In Čekání na tmu, čekání na světlo (Waiting for the Dark, Waiting for the Light), the first novel written after the Velvet Revolution, as a "free" writer, Klíma explores the timely topic of a man's many-layered moral confusion: the hero, a television cameraman who has carried on in the so-called "grey zone" by working, albeit uneasily, within the constraints of the Communist regime, finds himself unprepared for the challenging tasks demanded by the post-1990 era of new freedom and remains stuck in the mediocrity that used to be his safe haven and has now become his mental prison. The central figure of Poslední stupeň důvěrnosti (The Ultimate Intimacy) is another one of Klíma's ruminating and questioning figures, a Protestant pastor, whose life unravels before the reader's eyes, as the changes of the political scene intrude, and as he weighs love against eros, oppression against freedom, trust in God against trust in human beings.

As far as the third area of his work is concerned, Klíma moved away from the dramatic genre several decades ago. His one-act plays that could be called black comedies steeped in high-spirited irony, feed on the clash between the absurdities of the system and the partially resourceful, partially semi-tragic attempts of individuals to evade them. Klíma's innate ability to write good dialogue now enlivens his prose.

Of Klíma's numerous other writings, feuilletons, essays, commentaries, the two slim volumes The Spirit of Prague and Between Security and Insecurity ought to be mentioned. The former one charts five critical decades in the history of his country, yet remains a personal account of the author. The latter tackles problems that today concern us all: rationality and irrationality, apathy and aggressiveness, the mass media, the abdication of art, the nature of hope and the new problems that humanity faces. Invariably sharp-edged and critical, Klíma's voice is also deeply humane and wise.

—Marketa Goetz-Stankiewicz

KLOPSTOCK, Friedrich Gottlieb

Born: Quedlinburg, Saxony, Germany, 2 July 1724. Education: Educated in Quedlinburg, 1736–39 and Schulpforta, 1739–45; studied theology, University of Jena, 1745–46; University of Leipzig, 1746–48. Family: Married 1) Margareta (Meta) Moller in 1754 (died in childbirth 1758); 2) Johanna Elisabeth von Winthem in 1791. Career: Private tutor, Langensalza, Saxony, 1748–50; visited Zurich at the invitation of the influential Swiss literary figure Johann Jacob Bodmer, 1750; invited to Copenhagen in 1751; received life pension from Frederick V of Denmark at the behest of Count Bernstoff; left Denmark in 1770 and moved to Hamburg where he spent the rest of his life; awarded honorary citizenship of the French Republic, 1792. Died: 14 March 1803.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Werke. 12 vols., 1798–1817.

Odes of Klopstock from 1747 to 1780, translated by William Nind. 1848.

Oden, edited by F. Muncker and J. Pawel. 1889.

Ausgewählte Werke, edited by K.A. Schleiden. 1962.

Werke und Briefe [Hamburg Edition], edited by Horst Gronemeyer, Elisabeth Höpker-Herberg, Klaus Hurlebusch, and Rose-Maria Hurlebusch. 1974–.

Verse

Der Messias. 1751, enlarged editions, 1755, 1769, 1773, and 1780; translated in part as The Messiah by Mary and Joseph Collyer, 1763; also translated by Solomon Hallings, 1810; Mary Collyer and Mrs. Meeke, 1811; Thomas Raffles, 1814; G.H.C. Egestorff, 1821–22; Catharine Head, 1826.

Oden. 1750.

Ode an Gott. 1751.

Geistliche Lieder. 1758–69.

Die frühen Gräber. 1764.

Die Sommernacht. 1766.

Rothschilds Gräber. 1766.

Oden und Elegien: Vier und dreysigmal gedruckt. 1771.

Kleine poetische und prosaische Werke, edited by Christian Friedrich Schubart. 1771.

Ode an den Kaiser. 1782.

Das Vaterunser, ein Psalm. 1790.

Poetische Werke. 1794–96.

Plays

Der Tod Adams. 1757; as The Death of Adam, translated by Robert Lloyd, 1763.

Salomo. 1764; as Solomon, translated by Robert Huish, 1809.

Hermanns Schlacht. 1769.

David. 1772.

Hermann und die Fürsten. 1784.

Hermanns Tod. 1787.

Other

Die Deutsche Gelehrtenrepublik. 1774.

Über die deutsche Rechtschreibung. 1778.

Über Sprache und Dichtkunst: Fragmente. 1779–80.

Grammatische Gespräche. 1794.

Memoirs of Frederick and Margaret Klopstock, translated by Elizabeth Smith. 1808.

Klopstock und seine Freunde: Briefwechsel der Familie Klopstock unter sich, und zwischen dieser Familie, Gleim, Schmidt, Fanny, Meta und andern Freunden, edited by Klamer Schmidt. 2 vols., 1810; as Klopstock and His Friends: A Series of Family Letters, Written between the Years 1750 and 1803, translated by Elizabeth Ogilvy, 1814.

Auswahl aus Klopstocks nachgelassenem Briefwechsel und übrigen Papieren: Ein Denkmal für seine Verehrer, edited by Christian August Heinrich Clodius. 2 vols., 1821.

Kurzer Briefwechsel zwischen Klopstock und Goethe im Jahre 1776. 1833.

Briefe an Herder. 1856.

Briefe von und an Klopstock: Ein Beitrag zur Literaturgeschichte seiner Zeit, edited by Johann Martin Lappenberg. 1867; reprinted 1970.

Briefwechsel zwischen Klopstock und den Grafen Christian und Friedrich Leopold zu Stolberg. Mit einem Anhang: Briefwechsel zwischen Klopstock und Herder, edited by Jürgen Behrens and Sabine Jodeleit. 1964.

Briefe 1738–1750, edited by Horst Gronemeyer. 1979.

Editor, Hinterlassene Schriften, by Meta Klopstock. 1759.

*

Bibliography: by Gerhard Burkhardt and Heinz Nicolai, in Werke und Briefe, 1975; Die zeitgenössischen Drucke von Klopstocks Werken by Christiane Boghardt, and others, 1981.

Critical Studies: “Klopstock’s Occasional Poetry” by Terence K. Thayer, in Lessing Yearbook, (2), 1970; Studien zu Klopstocks Poetik by W. Grosse, 1977; “Klopstock’s Poetic Innovations: The Emergence of German as a Prosodic Language” by Beth Bjorklund, in Germanic Review, 1981; “Klopstock’s Temple Imagery,” in Lessing Yearbook, (13), 1982, and “A Question of Influence: Goethe, Klopstock, and ‘Wanderers Sturmlied,’” in German Quarterly, (55), 1982, both by Meredith Lee; Philosophy, Letters, and the Fine Arts in Klopstock’s Thought by Kevin Hilliard, 1987; Rhetoric, the Bible, and the Origins of Free Verse: The Early Hymns of Friedrich Gottlieb Klopstock by Katrin M. Kohl, 1990; Displacing Authority: Goethe’s Poetic Reception of Klopstock by Meredith Lee, 1999.

* * *

Der Messias (The Messiah) is the most ambitious large-scale epic poem on a religious subject in modern German literature. In 1748 the publication in a Bremen literary periodical of its first three cantos (there were to be 20 in all) was a landmark in the evolution of German literature. Discerning readers were quick to recognize that here, at last, was a new and distinctive voice. The young Friedrich Gottlieb Klopstock (he was 24 at the time) not only possessed a poetic vision of Miltonic proportions: he also had the command of language necessary to express that vision and communicate it to his readership. The poem was hailed as a work of genius.

When the first three cantos appeared, the creative literature of Germany had scarcely begun to fulfil the hopes and recommendations of the new school of literary theorists and critics who had been exploring the role of the imagination in artistic creation. In Zurich Johann Jakob Bodmer (1698–1783) and Johann Jakob Breitinger (1701–76) had formulated their pioneering conception of poetry in a joint treatise on the influence and use of the imagination (1727); this they had followed up with Bodmer’s prose translation of Milton’s Paradise Lost (1732), a work in which they saw that conception fully realized. It fell to the young North German poet to achieve a poetic masterpiece which rivalled Milton in scale and sublimity of theme and similarly appealed to both a critical readership and the general reader.

Klopstock had discovered Milton’s work when he was a pupil at the famous school of Schulpforta at Bad Kösen near Halle in Saxony. He left school determined to create for Protestant Germany a work which would stand comparison with Paradise Lost itself. Milton’s subject had been the Fall of Man: Klopstock responded by selecting Man’s redemption through Christ’s atonement. His epic poem focuses on the course of events from Christ’s entry into Jerusalem on Palm Sunday to his completion of his redemptive mission and his ascension into heaven. But the relatively straightforward sequence of events retold by the evangelists is often little more than a framework for a spiritual, moral, and above all emotional experience of cosmic proportions. As a result, the dynamic forward impetus of epic poetry as exemplified by Homer and Virgil is replaced by a more discursive approach in which material of the poet’s own invention swamps the simplicity of the Gospel narrative.

There is little realism of the Homeric kind in The Messiah and none of Virgil’s nation-making mythical purpose. Instead Klopstock exploits his considerable descriptive and lyrical powers to construct a fantasy world which many of his original readers would have shunned had it not been more or less firmly anchored in orthodox Christian theology. Scarcely anything actually takes place before the reader’s eyes: it is the reaction within the reader that counts. The epic’s celebrated opening line (“Sing, immortal soul, the redemption of sinful mankind”) sets the tone for what is to come. The soul, susceptible to a whole gamut of spiritual experiences, is the eyewitness of past events re-created by the poet: their quasi-symbolic and transcendent significance far outweighs their historical or narrative credibility. Time and again the modern reader is struck by anticipations of Blake in prophetic, visionary mood, though Klopstock is also sporadically capable of passages of graphic narrative such as Christ’s harrowing ascent of Golgotha in Canto 8.

Underlying the whole extraordinary enterprise are two basic and complementary impulses. On the one hand the poet is intent on making his reader “feel” what hitherto he (and she) had been taught to ponder. On the other, he frequently appears to be displaying the power of language to evoke a poetic world that transcends the norms of reality by dissolving the normal dimensions of space and time. Thus the locations of much of the epic’s storyline are vague in the extreme, whereas the mental and moral agonies and ecstasies of some of the many figures involved in it possess an extraordinary immediacy. As a result, the epic, though couched in a German equivalent of the Latin hexameter and characterized by highly stylized vocabulary and syntax appropriate to its sublime theme, contains many stretches which are closer to Samuel Richardson’s epistolary novels and the intense self-scrutiny of their characters than to Milton’s strongly visual yet intensely intellectual Biblical poem. It is no coincidence that Clarissa and The Messiah are contemporaneous and that both scored an enormous success with the predominantly middle-class mid-18th-century reading public.

In England the success of The Messiah was not as great as that of Richardson’s novels in Germany, and it never achieved the popularity of Der Tod Adams (The Death of Adam), 1758, a religious work in somewhat similar vein by Klopstock’s Swiss contemporary, Salomon Gessner. Nevertheless the prose translation of the first 10 cantos by Gessner’s translator Mary Collyer and her husband Josiah Collyer ran to three editions during the 1760s.

Klopstock’s contribution to the emergence of German classical literature in the mid-18th century was far-reaching; but his epic was too long. By the time he completed and published the last of its 20 cantos in 1773 it had swelled to almost 20,000 lines. Its novelty was past and its popularity was on the wane except among the large readership that continued to rank it second only to the Bible itself. However, long after its sprawling shapelessness and rapt intensity had been decried by a new generation, it continued to haunt the imagination. For instance the pure but ardent attachment between Cidli, the daughter of Jairus, and Semida, the son of the widow of Nain, both saved from death by miracles wrought by Christ (Canto 15), struck a responsive chord in readers eager for romance of an uplifting Christian kind such as could be safely read on a Sunday. The delicate sentimentality of such episodes provided a Protestant equivalent or echo of Tasso's Gerusalemme liberata (Jerusalem Delivered) which proved very acceptable well into the 19th century. In this respect Klopstock's greatest stroke of genius was the tormented figure of Abbadona, the remorseful devil. Originally one of the evil spirits who conspired against the Messiah, Abbadona's protracted remorse and ultimate pardon in heaven brought tears to many an eye in an age which regarded sentimentality differently from our own.

When in Goethe's epoch-making novel Die Leiden des jungen Werthers (The Sufferings of Young Werther) Lotte and Werther both utter the name "Klopstock" at the same moment, recognition is paid to the achievement of a writer whose masterpiece spans the years between Handel's oratorio Messiah (1742) and the climax of the Sturm und Drang.

—Peter Skrine

KOCHANOWSKI, Jan

Born: Sycyna, Poland, in 1530. Education: Educated at Cracow Academy, 1544–49; University of Królewiec, 1551–52; University of Padua, 1552–55. Family: Married Dorota Podłodowska in 1570; six daughters. Career: Courtier: secretary to King Zygmunt, 1560–68; retired to estate in Czarnolas, 1570. Died: 22 August 1584.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Dzieła wszystkie [Complete Works]. 4 vols., 1884–97.
Dzieła polskie [Polish Works], edited by Julian Krzyżanowski. 3 vols., 1960.
Dzieła wszystkie [Complete Works], edited by Maria Renata Mayenowa and others. 4 vols., 1982–91.

Verse

Zuzanna [Susanna]. 1562.
Szachy [A Game of Chess]. 1562(?); edited by Kazimierz Nitsch, 1923; also edited by Julian Krzyżanowski, 1966.
Zgoda [Concord]. 1564.
Satyry; albo, dziki mąż [The Satyr; or, The Wild Man]. 1564; edited by Paulina Buchwald-Pelcowa, 1983.
Psalterz Dawidów [Psalms of David]. 1579, reprinted 1985.
Treny. 1583; edited by Wiktor Weintraub, 1943; also edited by Tadeusz Sinko, 1966, Julian Krzyżanowski, 1967, and Janusz Pelc, 1972; as Laments, translated by Dorothea Prall Radin, 1920; also translated by Seamus Heaney and Stanislaw Baranczak, 1995.
Lyricorum libellus. 1580.
Elegiarum libri IV, elusdem Foricoenia sive epigrammatum libellus [Four Books of Elegies and the Trifles]. 1584; as Fraszki [Trifles], 1612; edited by Antonina Jelicz, 1956; also edited by Aleksander Soszynski, 1980;

Pieśni [Songs]. 1586; edited by Tadeusz Sinko, 1948.
Elegie [Elegies], translated (from Latin) by K. Brodziński. 1829.
Poems, edited by G.R. Noyes, translated by Noyes, Dorothea Prall Radin, and others. 1928.

Plays

Odprawa posłów greckich (produced 1578). 1578; edited by Tadeusz Sinko, 1915; also edited by Tadeusz Ulewicz, 1962; as The Dismissal of the Greek Envoys, translated by G.R. Noyes and Ruth Earl Merrill (verse), 1918; also translated by Charles S. Kraszewski, 1994.

*

Bibliography: Bibliografia dzieł Jana Kochanowskiego: wiek XVI–XVII by Kazimierz Piekarski, 1934.

Critical Studies: "The Medieval Dream Formula in Kochanowski's Laments" by Jerzy Peterkiewicz, in Slavonic and East European Review, 31(77), 1953; "Mythological Allusions in Kochanowski's Laments" by Ray J. Parrott, in Polish Review, 14(1), 1969; Jan Kochanowski by David J. Welsh, 1974; Jan Kochanowski in Glasgow edited by Donald Pirie, 1985; The Polish Renaissance in Its European Context edited by Samuel Fiszman, 1988.

* * *

Jan Kochanowski's reputation outside the Polish cultural sphere is small, and his significance in European terms is difficult to assess, though his works are of an ingenuity and sophistication that compete with the best among his international contemporaries.

His debut was as a cosmopolitan poet taking advantage of the medium of progressive humanist culture, Neo-Latin. The erudite and inventive Virgilian verse of his early work, widely circulated in manuscript after 1550, was published much later as the Lyricorum libellus in 1580. Well known among the small cultured élite of the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth's few courts, Kochanowski was patronized by both courtiers and clerics, eventually securing himself the position of Royal Secretary for most of the 1560s. It was in this milieu that he switched to his native idiom, in which he wrote first the vignettes of humorous verse in the anthology entitled Fraszki [Trifles], which satirize contemporary society and its mores.

Kochanowski soon advanced to a combination of the sophisticated style of Neo-Latin verse and its classical models and genres with Polish vocabulary and syntax in the Pieśni [Songs] (again, known widely, but published posthumously in 1586), closely modelled on Horace's Odes. In these highly polished "songs," he set the stylistic and thematic standards for almost two centuries. His subjects range from subtle (and not so subtle) panegyric dedicated to court patrons, through hymns on the beauty of Creation, to the erotic and melancholic, pastoral and religious. While some are artful paraphrases from Horace, most are entirely original, and stand as a testament of the achievements of the "Augustan" Golden Age under the sophisticated Zygmunt August (1548–72). The Pieśni are a fusing of two cultures (Roman and Sarmatian), two languages (Latin and Polish), and two poets (Horace the master, and Kochanowski the apprentice).

Towards 1570, however, for reasons that are unclear, Kochanowski had severed his dependence on court favour, and retired with his new wife to his estate at Czarnolas, evoked so lyrically in the “Pieśń świętojańska o Sobótce” (published with Pieśni). Despite irregular commissions from his earlier patrons, such as his experimental Euripidean tragedy in Polish, Odprawa posłów greckich (The Dismissal of the Greek Envoys), in this idyllic environment he concentrated on his true “vocation,” a versified paraphrase of the Psalter in Polish. This huge work, the Psalterz Dawidów [Psalms of David], is another blending of biblical, classical Latin, and Polish vernacular ingredients. His version surpassed all others in originality, beauty, and popularity. On all levels it is the culmination of his life’s work.

The last five years of the poet’s life were overshadowed by the deaths of court friends, relatives, and in particular his own children. A record of the struggle between faith and despair following the death of his three-year-old daughter Orszula, entitled the Treny (Laments), was published in 1580. It contains a cycle of contemplative lyrics on the implications of Orszula’s demise and his sense of loss. Once again there is the combination of contrasting elements—the classical and biblical, the philosophical and personal, the lyrical and dramatic, all focused by the factual event that inspired the cycle. Together they transform these laments from a conventional exercise into an extraordinarily honest psychological document, revealing much of the mentality of 16th-century man.

With the exception of some secondary political and panegyric verse, Kochanowski’s sublime poetry is not the product of a provincial. Single-handedly he extended the Polish language’s limits in all directions. The Laments are his last word, a personal legacy of the potential of Christian humanism, after which the poet abandoned his artificial lute for the rewards of David’s faith.

—Donald Pirie

KOUROUMA, Ahmadou

Born: Togbala, French West Africa (now Ivory Coast), c. 1927. Education: Attended École Technique Supérieure, Bamako (now Mali), 1947–49; Institut des Actuaire, Lyon, France, 1956–59. Military Service: Enlisted in French army in present-day Mali; was sent to Abidjan (now Ivory Coast); service in Indochina, interpreter in Saigon, 1951–54. Family: Married; four children. Career: Returned to Ivory Coast, 1960; jailed, then exiled, 1963; actuary, Algeria, 1964–73; returned to Ivory Coast, exiled, 1974; Director General of the International Insurance Institute Yaoundé, Cameroon, then of the Compagnie Commune des Reassurances des Etats de l’Afrique Francophone, Lomé, Togo, 1974–93; retired 1994. Lives with family in France, travels frequently to Ivory Coast. Awards: Prix littéraire de la Francité, University of Montreal, Canada, 1967; Grand Prix Littéraire de l’Afrique Noire, Lifetime award, 1990; Prix Tropiques 1999, and Prix du Livre Inter 1999, Paris, France; Prix Renaudot 2000, Paris, France; Commandeur dans l’Ordre National de la Côte d’Ivoire, Abidjan, Ivory Coast, 2000.

PUBLICATIONS

Fiction

Les Soleils des independences. 1970; as The Suns of Independence, translated by Adrian Adams, 1981.

Monné: outrages et defies. 1990, as Monnew, translated by Nidra Poller, 1993.

Yacouba, chasseur africain [Yacuba, African Hunter] (juvenile). 1998.

En attendant le vote des bêtes sauvages. 1998; as Waiting for the Vote of the Wild Beasts, translated by Carrol Coates, 2001.

Une Journée avec le Griot [A Day with a Praise-singer] (juvenile). 1999.

Allah n’est pas obligé [Allah Is Not Obligated]. 2000.

Plays

Toungnantigui, ou le diseur de vérité [Toungnantigui, or the Speaker of Truth]. 1974.

*

Bibliography: “Ahmadou Kourouma: A Bibliography” by Carrol F. Coates, in Callaloo, vol. 23, no. 4, 2000.

Critical Studies: “End of the Line: Time in Kourouma’s ‘Les Soleils des Indépendances’” by H.R. Ireland, Présence Francophone, no. 23, 1981; Comprendre ‘Les Soleils des Indépendances’ d’Ahmadou Kourouma by Jean-Claude Nicolas, 1985; “La confrérie des chasseurs Malinké et Bambara” in Mythes, rites et récits initiatiques by Youssouf Cissé, 1994; “Independence Acquired—Hope or Disillusionment” by Mildred Mortimer, in Research in African Literatures, vol. 21, Summer 1990; “Bound to Textual Violence: Gabriel Okara and Ahmadou Kourouma” in The African Palimpsest: Indigenization of Language in the West African Europhone Novel by Chantal Zabus, 1991; La Langue d’Ahmadou Kourouma, ou Le Français sous le soleil d’Afrique by Makhily Gassama, 1995; The Modernity of Witchcraft: Politics and the Occult in Postcolonial Africa by Peter Geschiere, 1997; “Kourouma’s ‘Monné’ as Aesthetics of Lying” by Karim Traoré, in Callaloo, vol. 23, no. 4, 2000; “Ahmadou Kourouma: Fiction Writer” by Carror F. Coates in Callaloo, vol. 23, no. 4, 2000; “Entretien avec Ahmadou Kourouma” by Jean Ouedraogo, in French Review, no. 74, March 2001.

* * *

Ahmadou Kourouma’s artistic talent and originality have attracted worldwide attention to his urgent message: corruption, dictatorship, and ethnic strife must end for Africans to be free and take their proper place in the world community. This, Kourouma believes, can happen only if Africans face the unvarnished truth of their history.

For Kourouma, truth must be spoken about the present as well as the past: an ancient past of contributions to human development, traditions, glories, and magic; a more recent past of victimization by slavery, colonialism, and cold war rivalries; and a present of disorientation, discord, and exploitation by power and money greedy post-independence African leaders. Yes, Kourouma says, Africa has been abused, but it must accept its own share of responsibility and move on. La parole [the word] will set Africa free. To this project he dedicates his writings, combining modern ideas with traditional images in a highly personal language he creates.

He began writing in mid-life. His first novel, Les Soleils des independences (Suns of Independence), reflects the values and knowledge he has acquired growing up in the tradition-steeped, educated Malinke hunter elite as well as his own disappointments under colonialism and post-colonialism, but is not autobiographical. Like all his fiction it is highly imaginative, though supported by thorough historical research.

The novel's protagonist is Fama, a fallen Malinke prince shaken first by colonialism, and then reduced to begging by the post-independence ruling tyrant. Fama's distress is compounded by family problems. His wives appear to be barren, notwithstanding recourse to Allah and magic alike. This condemns him to the worst fate of all, that of dying without progeny. Actually, Fama is the sterile one. He, the great prince, has lost all power. Unable to accept the truth, he makes a last desperate attempt to recapture his past by fleeing to his former Malinke lands, but is senselessly shot for illegally crossing a border that did not exist in his youth. Publisher after publisher, in both Africa and France, refused the politically explosive novel until after it had received a prize in Montreal.

Back in the Ivory Coast, Kourouma staged a play hoping that the spoken word would bring his message to a wider audience in the essentially non-reading country. In Tougnantigui ou le diseur de vérité [Tougnantigui, or the Speaker of Truth], two groups evoke a happy past when they were united. They are now disunited and unsure of their very identity. Foreigners have disrupted their society with alien concepts, but Africans have allowed this to happen. Kourouma indicates that accepting responsibility for the past and adopting an independent and more rational approach to problems will lead to better days. The success of the play in Abidjan in 1972 caused Kourouma to be exiled again.

Years of professional activity went by before Kourouma, the actuary, wrote his second novel, entitled Monné (Monnew), a Malinke word signifying outrage, defiance, contempt, and humiliation. Here he shows myth and history as inseparable. He portrays Djigui, who has been ruling the African Kingdom of Soba for 100 years, losing control when confronted with the French conquest. Suffering is widespread in Soba, yet neither Djigui nor religious leaders are of any help and therefore they share responsibility for the disasters. All are subjected to the author's biting irony.

After another long hiatus, Kourouma wrote what is probably his most important work to date, En attendant le vote des bêtes sauvages (Waiting for the Vote of the Wild Beasts); an Orwellian satire of African dictatorships spawned and supported by foreign powers during the cold war with consequences which persist to this day. The novel is the story of Koyaga, the Malinke hunter with magic powers, narrated against the historical background of colonialism and post-colonialism. After World War II, Koyaga, a decorated veteran, overthrows the first president of the fictional independent Republic of the Gulf and rules it for 30 years thanks to his supernatural capabilities. Kourouma clearly indicates that while to understand Africa one must also understand its belief in magic, magic is useless: it has not prevented any of the ills which have befallen the population.

In the novel reality catches up with Koyaga when the sources of his powers, his mother and his main fetishist, both mysteriously disappear and he can no longer control the inhabitants of the Republic. The only solution left to him appears to be to persuade wild beasts to vote for him in the next election—a possibility made to seem almost realistic in that atmosphere of magic. The book, Kourouma explains, is a donsonoma, a traditional Malinke epic about a hunter's extraordinary deeds. Donsonoma are sung to purify the protagonist of the deeds, participants, and audience alike; but for them to work, the protagonist must listen and hear the truth presented. Koyaga does gather his hunters and praise-singers to truthfully celebrate his life. The irony and criticism of the praise-singers are stinging, but Koyaga is too vain to realize this. Purification does not occur.

Kourouma selected the Malinke format because he finds western narrative techniques ill suited to write about a continent where magic is a component of everyday life. Similarly he writes in a French which is close to Malinke. Ever since The Suns of Independence his fiction illustrates his concept that standard French cannot express African thought and experience adequately. His style is improvisational, as is the oral literature from which his writings derive. The narrator intervenes to address both characters and readers. Repetition, rhetorical questions, redundancy, Malinke words, images, proverbs, unusual sentence structures, and neologisms all reflect indigenous speech. Aphorisms convey African philosophy. He creates a language meant to strike a responsive chord in his fellow Africans, while also helping foreigners understand Africa better.

Consistent with Kourouma's goals is his recent novel, Allah n'est pas obligé [Allah Is Not Obligated], the story of children who soldier in the civil wars which continue to ravage West Africa. These child-soldiers have lost everything; they rob, maim, and kill at random, without really understanding their own actions. They play with machine guns, ruthlessly and naïvely at the same time. The picture is horrifyingly brutal, but Allah is not obliged to be just on the earth he created, hence the child protagonist, Brahima, has no such obligation either. The facts presented are historically correct; it is fiction only because everything is seen and told by a twelve-year-old as he perceives it. To relieve the horror the author lends him an ironic tone. Kourouma tells us that he wrote this book to keep a promise made to child soldiers he met in Ethiopia, who asked him to write about tribal wars. As all of Kourouma's fiction, this book is not merely good literature, but also a participatory act.

—L. Natalie Sandomirsky

KRASIŃSKI, Zygmunt

Born: Paris, France, 19 February 1812. Grew up on family estate in Opinogóra, Poland. Education: Educated at home, then in Warsaw until 1828; University of Warsaw until 1829; University of Geneva, c. 1830. Military Service: Short military service. Family: Married Countess Elżbieta Branicka in 1843. Career: Travelled to St. Petersburg with his father, where he met Tsar Nicholas I, 1832; returned to Poland, 1832, and in 1843–44. Seriously ill for much of his life; spent most of 1830s and 1840s in spas in France and Italy, rarely coming home. Published many works anonymously. Died: 23 February 1859.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Pisma [Works], edited by J. Czubek. 8 vols., 1912; also edited by L. Piwiński, 7 vols., 1931.
Dzieła literackie [Literary Works], edited by Paweł Hertz. 3 vols., 1973.

Plays

Nie-Boska Komedia (produced 1902). 1835; as The Undivine Comedy, translated by M.W. Cook, in The Undivine Comedy and Other

Poems, 1875; as The Un-Divine Comedy, translated by Harold B. Segel, in Polish Romantic Drama, 1977; as Undivine Comedy, translated by Charles S. Kraszewski, 1999.

Irydion (produced 1908). 1836; as Irydion, translated by Florence Noyes, 1927.

Fiction

Pan trzech pagórków [Lord of Three Hills]. 1828.

Grób rodziny Reichstalów [The Tomb of the Reichstal Family]. 1828.

Sen Elżbiey Pileckiej [Elizabeth Pilecka's Dream]. 1829.

Władysław Herman i dwór jego [Vladislav Herman and His Court]. 3 vols., 1830.

Agay-Han. 1834.

Verse

Modlitewnik [Prayer Book]. 1837.

Noc letnia [Summer Night]. 1841.

Pokusa [Temptation]. 1841.

Przedświt [Pre-Dawn]. 1843.

Psalmy przyszłości [Future Psalms]. 1845; enlarged edition, 1848.

Ostatni [The Last One]. 1847.

Dzień dzisiejszy [Today]. 1847.

Psalm żalu [Psalm of Regret]. 1848.

Psalm dobrej woli [Psalm of Goodwill]. 1848.

Niedokończony poemat [The Unfinished Poem]. 1860.

The Undivine Comedy and Other Poems (includes play), translated by M.W. Cook. 1875.

Other

Trzy myśli Henryka Ligenzy [Henry Ligenza's Three Thoughts]. 1840.

O stanowisku Polski z bożych i ludzkich względów [About Poland's Position from the Viewpoint of God and People]. 1841.

Lettres à Montalembert et . . . Lamartine. 1847.

Listy o poemacie Kajeta Koźmiana Stefan Czarniecki [Letters to S.C. Koźmian]. 1859.

Briefe. 1860.

Listy od roku 1835 do 1844 pisane do Edwarda Jaroszyńskiego [Letters to Edward Jaroszyński]. 1871.

Listy [Letters]. 3 vols., 1882–87.

Correspondance de Sigismond Krasinski et de Henry Reeve. 2 vols., 1902.

Listy [Letters], with Ary Scheffer. 1909.

Listy do Augusta Cieszkowskiego [Letters to August Cieszkowski]. 2 vols., 1912.

Listy do A. Potockiego [Letters to A. Potocki]. 1922.

Listy do Delfiny Potockiej [Letters to Delfina Potocka]. 3 vols., 1930–38.

Listy wybrane [Selected Letters]. 1937.

Listy do ojca [Letters to His Father]. 1963.

Listy do Jerzego Lubomirskiego [Letters to Jerzy Lubomirski]. 1965.

Listy do Adama Sołtana [Letters to Adam Sołtan]. 1970.

Listy do Konstantego Gaszyńskiego [Letters to Konstanty Gaszyński]. 1971.

*

Critical Studies: Zygmunt Krasiński by J. Kallenbach, 2 vols., 1904; The Anonymous Poet of Poland: A Life of Zygmunt Krasiński by Monica M. Gardner, 1919; Zygmunt Krasinski: Romantic Universalist: An International Tribute by W. Lednicki, 1964.

* * *

Zygmunt Krasiński came from a rich aristocratic family in Poland. His father, Wincenty, was a conservative general in the army of the Congress Kingdom and supported the Tsar and Poland's Russian rulers even during the November Uprising of 1830. Young Zygmunt was sent abroad to finish his higher studies, and it was in Geneva that he began writing plays that reflected the major philosophical and social questions of the age. While Krasiński first published his works anonymously (as the "Nameless Poet of Poland") to avoid embarrassment for his family, his entire mature life was characterized by a struggle between his conflicting loyalties—whether to side with his father or with the cause of national independence, the fatherland. Krasiński made his home abroad (mostly in Germany), wrote poetry, a vast number of letters, and two plays which—though unstaged in his lifetime—belong to the best achievements of Polish Romantic drama.

Although of the plays Irydion was conceived first, the final version of Nie-Boska Komedia (The Undivine Comedy) came to be published first in 1835 in Paris. The latter is a poetic drama in four "parts" (acts) which deals with one of the most crucial issues of the modern age beginning with the French Revolution—the struggle of the "haves" and the "have-nots," that of aristocracy with revolutionary democracy. The background to this historic conflict is provided by the career of Count Henryk. He is first shown to be a failure in private life for he is much more interested in poetry (symbolized by a demonic maiden) than in domestic happiness with his newly wedded wife. In fact, he leaves his wife and is almost killed by the Maiden who wants to lure him to a precipice. At the end of Act I, Henryk's wife dies with the wish that their son Orcio should become a poet—the wish is fulfilled, though Orcio remains incurably blind. The first two acts of the play are very sketchy, but they lead up to the powerful Act III, not unlike Juliusz Słowacki's play Kordian (1834). In one of the scenes of Act II Count Henryk declares: "Farewell, Mother Nature! I leave you, to become a man. I go to fight with my brethren." Abandoning all other myths of romanticism, Henryk tests the last one: that of progress in society.

The third act takes place some time in the undefined future when the rebellious masses have managed to take over most of the civilized world. Only the Castle of Holy Trinity holds out in a vain attempt to stem the tide. Here all the rich and mighty (aristocrats, bankers, bishops) assemble; down in the valley the vast coalition of the poor and their radical leaders set up their camp to lay siege to the castle. Henryk, at night and in disguise, visits the camp and is appalled by the wrath of the masses and their thirst for revenge. All the same, Krasiński observes and indicates certain latent conflicts between the simple participants of the struggle, their ideologues, and the military "technicians." Henryk's tour of the camp is followed by a return visit by Pankracy, the leader of the revolutionaries, to the castle; his confrontation with Count Henryk (who later is elected Commander-in-Chief by the beleaguered "aristocrats") produces some of the best scenes in the play. The values of both leaders are shown to be flawed; Henryk's concept of "honour" is hopelessly anachronistic, and Pankracy's promise of a radiant future is utopian and clearly unrealizable.

The Undivine Comedy nearly ends with the victory of the revolutionary mobs. Count Henryk prefers to commit suicide at the moment when they take the castle by storm. Nonetheless, the victorious Pankracy is suddenly smitten by a vision of Julian the Apostate: "Galileae vicisti!" ("You have won, O Christ!"). The message of this unexpected scene is fairly clear: no "godless" revolution can be truly victorious; the new age will not dawn until it finds a way to reconcile democracy with Christianity.

Staged for the first time in the 20th century, The Undivine Comedy has been steadily gaining topicality with the rise of (basically anti-Christian) mass totalitarian movements. Adam Mickiewicz, in the middle of the 19th century, regarded it as "the highest achievement of the Slavonic theatre"; Czesław Miłosz called it, more recently, "a truly pioneering work in its treatment of an unusual subject and in its visual elements." Although several English translations exist, the play has been, on the whole, ignored outside Poland, even by directors otherwise interested in the Polish theatre.

Kraśiński's other play, Irydion, published in 1836, takes place in imperial Rome in the 3rd century AD. It is the story of a half-Greek, half-Germanic hero, Irydion ("the son of the rainbow"), who is bent on the destruction of corrupt, decadent Rome. To achieve this aim he is ready to sacrifice his sister Elsinoe to the lust of the Emperor Heliogabalus. His plot to subvert and then destroy Rome fails in the end because of the Christians' reluctance to take up arms against their rulers. Irydion was written as an indirect response to Mickiewicz's influential poem Konrad Wallenrod, a work which advocated revenge against the enemy by any means, including morally reprehensible methods. Kraśiński's play is written in an "ornate arhythmical, utterly Romantic prose," as described by Miłosz, partly modelled on Chateaubriand, and while it enjoyed some popularity in the 19th century, it has not been resurrected on the stage in contemporary Poland.

—George Gömöri

KRLEŽA, Miroslav

Born: Zagreb, Croatia (then in the Austro-Hungarian Empire), 7 July 1893. Education: Educated at Lucoviceum military academy, Budapest. Military Service: Served in the Serbian Army, 1912; suspected of spying, expelled from Serbia and arrested by the Austrians; served in the Austrian Army during World War I. Family: Married Bela Kangrga. Career: Communist Party from 1918; expelled, 1939; rehabilitated by Tito, 1952; founded the periodicals Plamen [Flame], 1919, Književna republika [Literary Republic], 1923–27, Danas [Today], 1934, Pečat [Seal], 1939–40, and Republika, 1945–46; director, Lexicographic Institute, Zagreb, from 1952; editor, Pomorska enciklopedija, 1954–64, Enciklopedija Jugoslavije, 1955–71, and Enciklopedija Leksikografskog savoda, 1955–64. Deputy, Yugoslav National Assembly. President, Yugoslav Writers Union; vice-president, Yugoslav Academy of Science and Art. Died: 29 December 1981.

PUBLICATIONS

Collection

Sabrana djela [Collected Works]. 1980–.

Fiction

- Tri kavalira gospoice Melanije* [Three Suitors of Miss Melania]. 1920.
Magyar királyi honvéd novela [Short Story on the Royal Hungarian Homeguards]. 1921.
Hrvatski bog Mars [The Croatian God Mars]. 1922.
Novele. 1923.
Vražji otok [Devil's Island]. 1924.
Povratak Filipa Latinovicza. 1932; as The Return of Philip Latinovicz, translated by Zora Depolo, 1959.
Hiljadu i jedna smrt [A Thousand and One Deaths]. 1933.
Novele. 1937.
Na rubu pameti. 1938; as On the Edge of Reason, translated by Zora Depolo, 1976.
Banket u Blitvi [Banquet in Blitva]. 3 vols., 1938–64.
Tri domobrana [Three Homeguards]. 1950.
Zastave [Banners]. 4 vols., 1967.
The Cricket beneath the Waterfall and Other Stories, edited by Branco Lenski. 1972; as Cvrčak pod vodopadom, i druge novele, 1973.
Baraka pet be i druge novele (collection). 1976.

Verse

- Pan*. 1917.
Tri simfonije [Three Symphonies]. 1917.
Pjesme 1–3 [Poems]. 3 vols., 1918–19.
Lirika [Lyrics]. 1919.
Knjiga pjesama [A Book of Poems]. 1931.
Knjiga lirike [A Book of Lyrics]. 1932.
Simfonije [Symphonies]. 1933.
Balade Petrice Kerempuha [Ballads of Petrica Kerempuh]. 1936.
Pjesme u tmini [Poems in Darkness]. 1937.

Plays

- Hrvatska rapsodija* [Croatian Rhapsody]. 1918.
Golgota [Golgotha] (produced 1922). 1926.
Vučjak (produced 1922). 1923.
Michelangelo Buonarroti (produced 1925).
Adam i Eva [Adam and Eve] (produced 1925).
Gospoda Glembajevi [The Glembays] (produced 1929). 1928.
U agoniji (produced 1928; revised version produced 1959). 1931.
Leda (produced 1930).
Legende [Legends] (includes 6 plays). 1933.
U logoru [In the Camp] (produced 1937). With Vučjak, 1934.
Maskerata [Masquerade] (produced 1955).
Kraljevo [The Kermess] (produced 1955).
Kristofor Kolumbo (produced 1955).
Aretej; ili, Legenda o Svetoj Ancili [Aretheus; or, The Legend of St. Ancilla] (produced 1959). 1963.
Saloma [Salome] (produced 1963).
Put u raj [Journey to Paradise] (produced 1973). 1970.

Other

- Izlet u Rusiju* [Excursion to Russia]. 1926.
Eseji [Essays]. 1932.
Moj obračun s njima [My Squaring of Accounts]. 1932.
Podravski motivi [Motifs of Podravina]. 1933.
Evropa danas [Europe Today]. 1935.
Deset krvavih godina [Ten Years in Blood]. 1937.
Eppur si muove. 1938.
Knjiga proze [A Book of Prose]. 1938.
Dijalektički antibarbarus [A Dialectical Antibarbarian]. 1939.
Knjiga studija i putopisa [A Book of Studies and Travels]. 1939.
Goya. 1948.
O Marinu Držiću [On Marin Držić]. 1949.
Zlato i srebro Zadra. 1951; translated as The Gold and Silver of Zadar, 1972.
Djetinjstvo u Agramu godine 1902–1903 [Childhood in Agram]. 1952.
Kalendar jedne bitke 1942 [Almanac of a 1942 Battle]. 1953.
Kalendar jedne parlamentarne komedije [Almanac of a Parliamentary Comedy]. 1953.
O Erasmu Rotterdamskom [On Erasmus of Rotterdam]. 1953.
Sabrana djela [Collected Works]. 27 vols., 1953–72.
Davni dani [Long Bygone Days]. 1956.
Eseji [Essays]. 1958.
Eseji [Essays]. 6 vols., 1961–67.
Razgovori s Miroslavom Krležom [Conversations with Miroslav Krleža]. 1969.
99 varijacija lexicographica [99 Lexicographic Variations]. 1972.
Djetinjstvo 1902–1903 i drugi zapisi [Childhood and Other Pieces]. 1972.
Panorama pogleda, pojava i pojmova. 5 vols., 1975.
Dnevnik [Diary]. 5 vols., 1977.
Tito 1892–1937–1977, with Edvard Kardelj. 1977.
Eseji i članci (essays). 1979–.
Iz naše književne krčme. 1983.
Ratne teme. 1983.
Sa uredničkog stola. 1983.
 Editor, with others, Danas [Today]. 2 vols., 1971.

*

Bibliography: Bibliografija djela Miroslava Krleže by T. Jakić, 1953; Literatura o Miroslavu Krleži 1914–1963 by D. Kapetanić, 1967.

Critical Studies: Studien zur Romanteknik Miroslav Krležas by Sibylle Schneider, 1969; La Vie et l'oeuvre de Miroslav Krleža by Marijan Matković, 1977; Miroslav Krleža und der deutsche Expressionismus by Reinhard Lauer, 1984; Die Gestalt des Künstlers bei Miroslav Krleža by Andreas Leitner, 1986; The Writer as Naysayer: Miroslav Krleža and the Aesthetic of Interwar Central Europe by Ralph Bogert, 1990; On the Edge of Reason, translated by Zora Depolo, 1995; Literature, History, and Postcolonial Cultural Identity in Africa and the Balkans: The Search for a Useable Past in Farah, Ngugi, Krleža, and Andrić by Dubravka Juraga, 1996.

* * *

Miroslav Krleža was the dominant figure in 20th-century Croatian literature. As the writer of novels, short stories, poems, essays, journals, travelogues, polemics, and memoirs, and as the editor of a series of leftist literary journals, he had a considerable influence on his contemporaries. His search for an enlightened humanism brought him to communism after the collapse of the Austro-Hungarian empire, but he was never an obedient Party member who marched uncritically, following the Party policy. His criticism of the Marxist dogmatism and of the notion of Socialist Realism in the arts as well as his outspoken demands “for freedom of artistic expression, for the simultaneous existence of differing schools and styles, for liberty of choice and independence of moral and political convictions” left their lasting mark on the cultural climate of post-World War II Yugoslavia.

Krleža began his literary career as a poet celebrating in pagan terms the triumph of life over the powers of darkness, mysticism, and death. However, World War I brought a dramatic change in his outlook. His war poems evoke in a series of striking expressionistic images the idea of the futility of life and the absurdity of death and have as their underlying theme one of Krleža’s favourite notions, that of the supremacy of stupidity over reason in human life. The same theme, articulated as dehumanization caused by the horrors of the war, is central to his collection of short stories Hrvatski bog Mars [The Croatian God Mars], in which the useless squandering of lives of the Croats enlisted to fight for Austria in the war of 1914–18 is depicted in a dramatic and memorable narrative.

The poetry he continued to write in the 1920s and 1930s shows an increased social awareness and concerns itself primarily with the themes of social protest. The peak of his career as a poet was reached by the publication of his Balade Petrice Kerempuha [Ballads of Petrica Kerempuh], a collection of poems written in the dialect of north-western Croatia, used by the writers of the 17th and the 18th centuries. It is a unique satirical saga of Croatian history. Although overwhelmed with suffering, injustice, blood, and the symbol of gallows, the Croatian past is approached without any romantic illusions and rather treated in a bitter but mocking tone of Rabelaisian laughter.

In his youthful plays, published in a collection entitled Legende [Legends], Krleža used historical figures and themes as means of handling underlying themes of his time. His reputation as a dramatist was established with the piece Golgota [Golgotha], a socialist play set in a shipyard, and enhanced with two anti-war plays, Vučjak and U logoru [In the Camp]. The best known, and the best, of his plays make up his Glembay trilogy: Gospoda Glembajevi [The Glembays], U agoniji [In Agony], and Leda constitute an organic unity with the short stories of the same cycle. The plays and the short stories combine to portray the rise and decline of a rich Croatian family against the background of the agony of a dying civilization (the Austro-Hungarian empire). Ibsenesque in character and scope, these plays were written in the best vein of psychological realism.

Povratak Filipa Latinovicza (The Return of Philip Latinovicz) is the most popular of his four novels. It tells a story of an expatriate artist who, in a moment of personal and creative crisis, returns to his native Panonia to establish his paternity. But his pilgrimage turns into a quest for his own identity and a scathing portrayal of provincial decadence and his struggle to confront it. Na rubu pameti (On the Edge of Reason) is a novel of a model citizen who falls from society’s grace after speaking his mind. Abandoned by both his family and his friends, persecuted and jailed, put into an asylum, he finishes as a lonely and desperate man listening in his hotel room to the discordant and meaningless sounds coming from the radio. Krleža’s two other novels provide an imaginative and critical portrait of both Yugoslavia and Europe in the first decades of the 20th century, and make some major political, social, and psychological statements about the predicament of modern man. Banket u Blitvi [Banquet in Blitva] shows Krleža as a political satirist at his best. It is a political-allegorical novel with various references to those European countries (including his own) where, after World War I, people were deprived of their freedoms and democratic rights by military dictatorships. The vivid and dramatic story of a struggle between a dictator and a courageous political idealist is interspersed with typical Krleža polemics, soliloquies, and conversations with the intention of showing the amoral nature of politics in general. Zastave [Banners] spans the period between 1912 and 1922 in Croatian and Yugoslav history. The novel is built upon one of Krleža's recurring themes, that of the conflict between a father, a loyal and acquiescent servant of the Establishment, and his only son, the embittered, freedom-loving rebel. Their precarious relations are designed to bring out a psychological and ideological drama caused by the disillusionments of the two generations in the political upheavals of the early 20th century.

Alongside the best of Krleža's creative writing may be set the best of his non-fiction prose: the essays which reflect his vast reading and his moral and intellectual integrity; the two books of memoirs, Djetinjstvo u Agramu godine 1902–1903 [Childhood in Agram] and Davni dani [Long Bygone Days]; the account of his visit to the USSR in 1925, Izlet u Rusiju [Excursion to Russia]; and, finally, his writings and annotations for the Yugoslav Encyclopedia, of which he was the spiritus movens and the editor-in-chief.

—Dušan Puvačić

KROSS, Jaan

Born: Tallinn, Estonia, 19 February 1920. Education: Attended Westholm high school, Tallinn, 1928–38; Tartu University, 1938–44. Family: Married 1) Helga Roos, 1954 (marriage ended, 1958); 2) Ellen Niit (née Hiob), 1958; two daughters. Career: Translator, 1943; arrested by German forces, 1944; lecturer at Tartu University, 1944–46; political prisoner, 1946–54; freelance writer and translator, since 1954; chair, Young Authors' Society, 1957–60; secretary, Estonian Writers' Union, 1976–81; member, Estonian Parliament (riigikogu), 1992–93. Awards: Eeva Joenpelto award, 1988; Amnesty International award, 1991; Herder prize, 1997. Honorary doctorate, Tartu University, 1989, and Helsinki University, 1990.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Voog ja kolmpii: Luuletusi 1938–1968. 1971.
Kogutud teosed [Works]. 1997.

Poetry

Söerikastaja. 1958.
Tuule-Juku: (Üle 16 a. vanustele keelatud). 1963.
Kivist viulid. 1964.
Lauljad laevavööridel. 1966.
Hetk. 1968.
Vihm teeb toredaid asju. 1969.
Põhjatud silmapilgud. 1990.

Prose

Kolme katku vahel: Balthasar Russowi romaan. 1970–1977, 1980.
Neli monoloogi Püha Jüri asjus. 1970.
Michelsoni immatrikuleerimine: Tosin üksikkõnet trummi, väntoreli ja torupilliga tumma flöödi saatel. 1971.
Klio silma all. 1972.
Mardileib. 1973.
Kolmandad mäed. 1975.
Taevakivi. 1975; as The Rock from the Sky, 1983.
Keisri Hull. 1978; as The Czar's Madman: A Novel, translated by Anselm Hollo, 1993.
Kajalood. 1980.
Ülesõidukohad. 1981.
Rakvere romaan. 1982.
Professor Martensi ärasõit. 1984; as Professor Martens' Departure, translated by Anselm Hollo, 1994.
Vastutuulelaev: Bernhard Schmidt'i romaan. 1987.
Silmade avamise päev. 1988; as The Conspiracy and Other Stories, translated by Eric Dickens, 1995.
Wikmani poisid. 1988.
Väljakaevamised. 1990.
Tabamatus: Jüri Vilmsi romaan. 1993.
Järelehüüd. 1994.
Mesmeri ring: Romaniseeritud memuaarid nagu kõik memuaarid ja peaaegu iga romaan. 1995.
Paigallend: Ullo Paeranna romaan. 1998.
Tahtamaa. 2001.

Other

Muld ja marmor: Möödasõitnu meenutusi, with Ellen Niit. 1968.
Vahelugemised 1–6. 1968–95.

*

Bibliography: Bibliograafia: Jaan Kross by Vaime Kabur and Gerli Palk, 1997.

Critical Studies: Der Verrückte des Zaren. Jaan Kross in Loccum, edited by Olaf Schwencke, 1990; "The Antic Disposition of a Finno-Ugric Novelist" by Mardi Valgemäe, in Journal of Baltic Studies, vol. 24, no. 4, 1993; Special Issue: Jaan Kross, edited by Thomas Salumets, Journal of Baltic Studies, vol. 31, no. 3, 2000; "Jaan Kross: Negotiating Nation" by Thomas Salumets, in Interlitteraria, no. 5, 2000; Die historischen Romane von Jaan Kross. Am Beispiel einer Untersuchung der deutschen und englischen Übersetzungen von Professor Martensi ärasõit by Kerttu Wagner, 2001.

* * *

Shortly after Estonia was occupied by the Soviet Union, Jaan Kross was deported to Siberia, sharing the fate of tens of thousands of fellow Estonians and countless other victims of the widespread terror under Stalin's dictatorship. Following his release from a labor camp in 1954, Kross returned to Estonia's largest city, Tallinn. There he was able to work as a translator and writer. In the late 1950s and 1960s, during the period of relative liberalization in the Soviet Union, he published several collections of poems. Perhaps the most influential among them is Söerikastaja [The Coal Enricher]. None of his other publications, however, are as remarkable as his historical-autobiographical prose fiction. Among his twenty-one novels and collections of short stories are the trilogy Kolme katku vahel [Between Three Plagues], Professor Martensi ärasõit (Professor Martens' Departure), Silmade avamise päev (The Conspiracy and Other Short Stories), and Paigallend [Flying in Place]. His most successful novel internationally is Keisri hull (The Czar's Madman). It tells the story of a Baltic-German nobleman, Timotheus von Bock, who is asked by his friend, Czar Alexander I, to always speak the truth. He does. As a consequence of his outspokenness, he has to serve nine years in solitary confinement in one of the worst dungeons of the empire. Staying under close surveillance, he is allowed to return to his Estonian wife as long as he is deemed insane by the authorities. The Czar's Madman has been translated into English and more than twenty other languages.

With his prose fiction, Kross maps Estonia's past from the 16th century to the time shortly after Estonia regained its independence in 1991, the subject of his latest novel Tahtamaa. Although there often is a strong autobiographical element that characterizes his texts, they are not autobiographical novels. Instead, Kross writes about the often universal struggles of remarkable, but not so well known, characters in Estonian history. He tells stories about the entanglement of artists, scientists, physicians, aristocrats, academics, and others in a country ruled for centuries by Germans, Swedes, and Russians and, after a brief period of independence from 1918 to 1940, occupied by the Soviet Union. Kross asks questions about dissidence, conformism, truth, madness, betrayal, compromise, escape, and resistance. His latest novel, a bestseller in Estonia, is somewhat of an exception. It is set in contemporary, post-Communist Estonia and explores issues related to the transition to a free market economy, including the privatization boom that characterized much of independent Estonia in the 1990s.

Although Kross casts his novels in a wide and often very sophisticated, richly adorned, distinctly European cultural context, the stories turn on one single geographical pivot: his native Estonia. It is a profound and complex sense of loss, dignity and, at times, also guilt as well as a deep concern for the very survival of his people and their home and language that informs Kross' work. More than that, his novels and short stories are probably best understood as chapters of Estonian history. As such, in no small measure, they have shaped the idea of an independent Estonia, kept it alive during the better part of its almost fifty years of Communist colonization and cultural genocide, and served as a reminder of Estonia's identity as a nation.

Not surprisingly, the role of pain and suffering is of particular importance in this quest for nationhood and the struggle for survival as a people. However, as Maire Jaanus has pointed out, pain and suffering are not only a sign of lost freedom or masochistic delight; they are also a sign of survival. Thus, seemingly paradoxically, pain, where it turns into suffering, goes hand in hand with the kind of pleasure we experience when we are able to intervene, make a difference, contribute, be ourselves. This complex and often hidden dimension of the human condition in no small measure co-determines the consciousness of the Estonian people; Kross also explores this dimension in his writing, especially in his 1998 novel with the telling title Paigallend.

In addition to the psychological perspective, another perspective—the historical—also reveals the striking richness and significance of Kross' work. Whatever factual disputes there might be between historians and Jaan Kross, in his fiction, Estonia's history comes across as more real than the dominant discourse of professional historians, East and West, permitted for a long time. It is only recently that Estonian historiography, both in Estonia and elsewhere, has caught up with Kross and has become less driven by ideological concerns or the narrow, self-serving perspective that often informs the stories colonizers tell about the colonized. To be sure, at the core of Kross' narrative style is the voice of a native Estonian informant. After all, telling stories from the inside about struggles against dominant outsiders is among the distinguishing characteristics of Jaan Kross' autobiographical-historical fiction. But Kross' novels are not about ethnic singularity. Instead, they provide "thick," dynamic, and complex descriptions that bear witness to a cross-cultural Estonian identity shaped by a long history of colonization.

—Thomas Salumets

KUNCEWICZ, Maria

Also known as Maria Kuncewiczowa. Born: Maria Zofia Szczepańska in Samara, Russia, probably on 30 October 1895 (some sources quote 1897 or 1899); naturalized United States citizen, 1960. Education: Schooled internationally in languages, music, and French and Polish philology in Nancy, France, at the Jagiellonian University in Cracow and the University of Warsaw; considered a career as a concert singer following her studies at the conservatories in Warsaw and Paris. Family: Married Jerzy Kuncewicz, lawyer and writer, in 1921 (died 1984); one son. Career: Traveled before World War II (Europe, Middle East), debuted with stories, journalism, and translations in newly independent Poland, 1918; involved in the Polish PEN Club, from 1924, elected vice president, 1938; translated literary works from Russian, French, and English, wrote the first radio serial in Europe; by World War II widely recognized in Poland and abroad for her short stories and first novel, Cudzoziemka (The Stranger); fled to Romania, France, and England, 1939; engaged in émigré publications and radio broadcasts; wrote an appeal to the United Nations on behalf of post-war international refugees, 1949; one of the founders of the International Pen-Club Center for Writers in Exile, 1951, Honorary President, 1951–57; following their son, immigrated with husband to the United States, 1955; continued writing novels and autobiographical prose in Polish and English, taught at the University of Chicago, broadcast a radio serial with Radio Free Europe, edited anthologies and lectured on Polish literature; returned to Poland in 1958, resumed publishing in Polish journals and periodicals despite censorship, and resettled there in later years as an American citizen; communist government returned her family house "Kuncewiczówka" in Kazimierz nad Wisłą in the 1960s; re-joined the official Association of Polish Writers, 1962; continued travelling and paid regular visits to the United States; after husband's death in 1984 suffered from ill health; wrote until her death; her last will turned "Kuncewiczówka" into a cultural center. Awards: Krzyż Niepodległości, 1931; Literary award of the City of Warsaw, 1937; Złoty Krzyż Zasługi, 1938; American Council of Learned Societies award, 1963; Kosciuszko

Foundation medal for "Contributions to Polish and American Cultures," 1971; Polish National award, First Class, 1974; Krzyż Komandorski Orderu Odrodzenia Polski, declined in 1982, accepted 1987. Died: 15 July 1989 in Lublin.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Dzieła. Seria I–II. 1978–86.
Dzieła wybrane Marii i Jerzego Kuncewiczów. 8 vols, 1989–1997.

Prose

Tseu-Hi, władczyni bokserów. 1926.
Przymierze z dzieckiem. Powieść. 1927.
Twarz mężczyzny. Powieść. 1928.
Miłość Panieńska. Sztuka w 4 aktach. 1932.
Dwa Księżycy. 1933.
Dyliżans warszawski. 1935.
Cudzoziemka. 1936; as The Stranger, translated by B.W.A. Massey, 1944, 1945.
Dni powszednie państwa Kowalskich. Powieść radiowa. 1938; revised 1938, 1960; 1984.
Kowalscy się odnaleźli. Uzupełnienie powieści radiowej "Dni powszednie państwa Kowalskich." 1938.
Serce Kraju. 1938.
Przyjaciele ludzkości. 1939.
Miasto Heroda. Notatki palestyńskie. 1939.
W domu i w Polsce. 1939.
Zagranica. 1939.
Klucze. 1943; revised edition, 1948; as The Keys: A Journey through Europe at War, 1946.
Zmowa nieobecnych. Powieść. 1 vol., 1946; expanded, 2 vols., 1950; as The Conspiracy of the Absent: A Novel, translated by Maurice Michael and Harry Stevens, 1950.
Leśnik. Powieść. 1952; as The Forester: A Novel, translated by Stevens, 1954.
Odkrycie Patusanu. 1958.
Gaj oliwny. 1961; English version published as The Olive Grove, 1963.
Don Kichote i Niańki. 1965.
Tristan 1946. 1967; English version published as Tristan: A Novel, 1974.
Fantomy. 1971.
Natura. 1975.
Fantasia alla polacca. 1979.
Przezrocza. Notatki włoskie. 1985.
Listy do Jerzego. 1988.

Plays

Radio Plays: Dni powszednie państwa Kowalskich. Powieść mowiona, 1936–37; Kowalscy się odnaleźli. Powieść mówiona, 1937; Dialog o zmierzchu. Powieść mówiona, 1939; Polskie żarna, 1942; Oblężenie i obrona Warszawy, 1949; Państwo Kowalscy na emigracji: Kowalscy w Anglii, and Kowalscy w Ameryce, 1956.

Other

"Avec les réfugiés," in Paris aux yeux du monde, edited by Boris Metzler. 1951.
Cudzoziemka (screenplay). 1986.
 Editor, The Modern Polish Mind: An Anthology. 1962.
 Editor, Modern Polish Prose. 1945.
 Translator, Gra by Jack London. 1923.
 Translator, Podła kobieta by Jack London. 1923.
 Translator, Arcybestia by Jack London. 1926.
 Translator, Lato R. 1925 by Ilija Erenburg. 1927.
 Translator, Bella by Jean Giraudoux. 1929.
 Translator, Pani Hjelde by Sigrid Undset. 1931.
 Translator, Macierzyństwo by Sigrid Undset. 1933.

*

Bibliography: Maria Kuncewiczowa: Bibliografia by Anna Palczak, 1989; Maria Kuncewiczowa: monografia dokumentacyjna 1895–1989 by Alicja Szalagan, 1995; Współcześni pisarze polscy i badacze literatury. Słownik bibliograficzny, vol. 4, 1996.

Critical Studies: Introduction to The Stranger by Margaret Storm Jameson, 1945; Kobiety piszą . . . Sylwetki i szkice by Stefania Podhorska-Okołów, 1938; "The Stranger: A Study and Note about Maria Kuncewicz" by Mary C. Smith, in Polish Review, 1969; "Cudzoziemka Marii Kuncewiczowej. Powstanie, dzieje, recepcja" by Alicja Szalagan, in Pamiętnik Literacki, vol. 3, 1986; W stronę Kuncewiczowej. Studia i szkice, edited by Włodzimierz Wójcik, 1988; "Ethnicity in Exile in Maria Kuncewicz's Writings" by Magdalena J. Zaborowska, in Something of My Very Own to Say: American Women Writers of Polish Descent, edited by Thomas S. Gladsky and Rita Holmes Gladsky, 1997; "In Alien Worlds: Transcending the Boundaries of Exile in the Works of Maria Kuncewicz" by Magdalena J. Zaborowska, in How We Found America: Reading Gender through East European Immigrant Narratives, 1995; "Writing the Virgin, Writing the Crone: Maria Kuncewicz's Embodiments of Faith," by Magdalena J. Zaborowska, in Engendering Slavic Literatures, edited by Sibelan Forrester and Pamela Chester, 1996; "W stronę utopii. Nad książkami Marii Kuncewiczowej" by Helena Zaworska, in Odra, 1987; Maria Kuncewiczowa by Helena Zaworska, 1973; Maria Kuncewiczowa by Stanisław Żak, 1971; Kuncewiczowa by Halina Ivanickova, translated by Krystyna Cękałska, 1974; Rozmowy z Maria Kuncewiczową, edited by Helena Zaworska, 1983.

* * *

Maria Kuncewicz is one of the most engaging and important Polish writers of the 20th century. Her works span the genres of short story, novel, travel notebook, autobiography, reportage, radio serial, play, and essay. Upon her literary debut after World War I, she won acclaim from the most influential literary critics of the day with her stories focused on women's issues—motherhood, sexuality, puberty, marriage. But while later writing in exile, she expanded her thematic focus to authorship across cultures and languages, the impact of space and geographic location on identity, and the individual versus the state and international politics. Although she lived and wrote internationally, was nominated for the Nobel prize in literature in 1970s, and had her works translated into several languages, Kuncewicz has not gained wide recognition outside of Poland. One of the reasons for her relative obscurity is the continued hegemony of male writers from Eastern Europe on the world's literary scene, which has been aided by the preferences of Western editors and critics. Another reason may be the unavailability of her work in English: there are no up-to-date translations of her works and the two novels she wrote in English have been out of print since 1970s.

Kuncewicz's writings display a keen sense of observation, attention to detail, and subtle depiction of mood and character; the narrative voice of her later, autobiographical notebooks Fantomy [Phantoms], Natura [Nature], Przezrocza [Slides] draws the reader in effortlessly by combining an intimate perspective on people and places in many countries with the distance and irony of a seasoned witness of history and human folly. Kuncewicz's writing can be deeply lyrical, daring, and experimental, as in the descriptions of music, desire, erotics, and nature in her early stories and her first novels, Przymierze z dzieckiem [Covenant with a Child], Dwa Księżycy [Two Moons], and Cudzoziemka (The Stranger). She is an astute reader of different aspects of identity—ethnicity, class, gender and sexuality—and thus able to paint a rich portrait of Poland between the wars and of some of its human types: bohemian artists, small-town Jews, petty bourgeoisie, anti-Semites, displaced persons (Dwa Księżycy, Dylichans warszawski [Warsaw Stagecoach], Miłość panińska [A Maiden's Love]). She excels at psychological sketches, especially of women (Cudzoziemka, Tristan, Gaj oliwny [The Olive Grove]), and belongs in the ranks of international feminist writers who boldly explored the complexities of women's psyche and physiology against the bourgeois mentality of the first half of the 20th century.

Well-traveled and then forced into exile by the war and the communist takeover of Poland, Kuncewicz is also a chronicler and a keen observer of contemporary events. The Keys, a war memoir, steers masterfully between profoundly personal and self-ironic, distanced observations of what seems to be the end of the world in Nazi invaded Poland, where the author's house is wiped out by an explosion, and under the bomb-filled sky of London, where she finds refuge. She is also the author of the first European radio serial, Dni powszednie państwa Kowalskich, which became famous and set the standard for the genre in Poland. It explored the lives of average, working class people and poor intelligentsia; it was later continued when Kuncewicz was living in England and the United States (Państwo Kowalscy na emigracji: Kowalscy w Anglii, Kowalscy w Ameryce [Mr. and Mrs. Kowalski in Exile: The Kowalskis in England, The Kowalskis in America]). However, enraged colleagues at Radio Free Europe cancelled the series and even destroyed some unaired episodes when Kuncewicz agreed, after the political "thaw" of 1956, to have her works published in Poland again. Following the end of Stalinism, changes in the Polish government and shifts in Moscow's foreign policy allowed for more cultural freedom, and Kuncewicz responded to the call of her family and readers to return home as a writer. Although she continued to be a "citizen of the world," which was easy with her American passport, her decision to be published in Poland made her unpopular among the "professional refugees," or those who thought it impossible to write under the constraints of the communist regime. It is not clear how much Kuncewicz had to compromise, although it is highly unlikely that she "collaborated" with the government in any way. Her works were subjected to censorship just as those by any other writer living in Poland; she chose to pay that price in order to return to her beloved home in Kazimierz and her mother tongue.

Kuncewicz's later writings—her autobiographical notebooks and her tribute to her late husband, Listy do Jerzego [Letters to George]—came perhaps ahead of their time, for the critical apparatus needed to assess her craft has been only very recently forged in the fields of interdisciplinary feminist and cultural studies. Her diverse oeuvre makes for a fascinating study, for it records and responds to the major events of the century—two world wars, the Cold War, the birth of Israel (Miasto Heroda), Soviet domination, and the 1960s in the United States. Her preoccupation with the creative process and political responsibility of writers, whom she saw as products/witnesses of their social and historical contexts, makes her worthy of sustained international attention.

—Magdalena J. Zaborowska

KUNDERA, Milan

Born: Brno, Czechoslovakia, 1 April 1929. Education: Graduated from a secondary school in Brno, 1948, began studying literature and aesthetics at the Arts Faculty of Charles University, Prague, 1948, after one year transferred to the Film Academy, Prague, where he studied film direction and scriptwriting, graduated in 1952. Family: Married Věra Hrabánková in 1967. Career: Taught world literature at the Film Academy, Prague, 1952–70; after the 1968 Warsaw Pact invasion of Czechoslovakia he became a banned writer and remained unemployed, 1970–75. Visiting professor at the University of Rennes, France, 1975, then he taught at the Ecoles des Hautes Etudes, Paris. Awards: Czechoslovak state prize, 1964, Czechoslovak Writers Union Prize, 1968, Prix Médicis, France, 1973, Premio letterario Mondello, Italy, 1978; American Commonwealth award, 1981, European literature prize, 1982, Doctor honoris causa of the University of Michigan, United States, 1983; Jerusalem prize, 1985; Critics' prize of the Academie Francaise, 1987; Austrian prize for European Literature, 1987; Knight of the Légion Étrangère, France, 1990; The Independent Newspaper prize for Foreign Literature, 1991; Jaroslav Seifert prize, Czech Republic, 1994, Herder prize, Austria 2000.

PUBLICATIONS

Fiction

Směšné lásky: tři melancholické anekdoty [Laughable Loves: Three Melancholy Anecdotes]. 1963.

Druhý sešit směšných lásek [Second volume of Laughable Loves]. 1965.

Třetí sešit směšných lásek [Third volume of Laughable Loves]. 1968. Směšné lásky. 1970; definitive version published in French as Risibles amours, 1970; emigré Czech edition, 1981; as Laughable Loves, definitive English edition, translated by Suzanne Rappaport, 1987.

Žert. 1967; as The Joke, abridged English translation by David Hamblyn and Oliver Stallybrass, 1969; complete English translation by Michael Henry Heim, 1982; definitive English edition, 1992.

Život je jinde. As La vie est ailleurs, translated by François Kérel, 1973; as Life is Elsewhere, translated by Peter Kussi, 1974; emigré Czech edition, 1979; definitive English edition, 1986.

Valčík na rozloučenou. As The Farewell Party, translated by Peter Kussi, 1974; emigré Czech edition, 1979.

Kniha smíchu a zapomnění. As Le livre du rire et de l'oubli, translated by François Kérel, 1979; as The Book of Laughter and Forgetting, translated by Michael Henry Heim, 1980; emigré Czech edition, 1981.

Nesnesitelná lehkost bytí. As The Unbearable Lightness of Being, translated by Michael Henry Heim, 1984; emigré Czech edition, 1985.

Nesmrtelnost. As L'immortalité, by Eva Bloch, 1990; as Immortality, translated by Peter Kussi, 1991; emigré Czech edition, 1993.

La Lenteur. 1995; as Slowness, translated by Linda Asher, 1996.

L'Identité: roman. 1997; as Identity: A Novel, translated by Linda Asher, 1998.

La ignorancia. Spanish translation from French by Beatriz de Moura, 2000; as Ignorance, translated from French by Linda Asher, 2002.

Verse

Člověk, zahrada širá [Man, a Wide Garden]. 1953.

Poslední máj [The Last May]. 1955.

Monology [Monologues]. 1957; extended and rewritten, 1964; extended and rewritten 1965.

Plays

Majitelé klíčů [The Owners of the Keys]. 1962.

Jakub a jeho pán: pocta Denisi Diderotovi. As Jacques et son maître: Hommage à Denis Diderot en trois, 1981; as Jacques and His Master: An Homage to Diderot in Three Acts, 1985.

Other

Umění románu: cesta Vladislava Vančury za velkou epikou [The Art of the Novel: Vladislav Vančura's journey towards great epic writing]. 1960.

L'art du roman: essai. 1986; as The Art of the Novel by Linda Asher, 1988.

Les testaments trahis. 1993; as Testaments Betrayed: An Essay in Nine Parts by Linda Asher, 1995.

*

Bibliography: Milan Kundera: An Annotated Bibliography by Glen Brand, 1988.

Critical Studies: Europäische Ideen, vol. 20, 1976; Liberté, no. 121, 1979; L'Infini, no. 5, 1984; Salmagundi, no. 73, winter 1987; The Review of Contemporary Fiction, vol. 9, no. 2, summer 1989; Proměny, vol. 28, no. 1, 1991; Milan Kundera and the Art of Fiction. Critical Essays, edited by Aron Aji, 1992; L'Infini, no. 44, 1993; Die Fallen der Welt. Der Romancier Milan Kundera by Květoslav Chvatík, 1994; in Czech as Svět románů Milana Kundery, 1994; Understanding Milan Kundera. Public Events, Private Affairs by Fred Misurella, 1993; Terminal Paradox: The Novels of Milan Kundera by Maria Němcová-Banerjee, 1990; Kundera ou La mémoire du désir by Eva Le Grand, 1995, in English as Kundera or The Memory of Desire, 1999; "Milan Kundera" by Jan Čulík, in Dictionary of Literary Biography, vol. 232, 2001.

* * *

Milan Kundera is a major contemporary French/Czech writer who has succeeded in communicating the East European experience of life under totalitarian communism to a wide international public. Most recently, he has used his experience of life both in the East and in the West for commenting on contemporary Western civilization. Milan Kundera's knowledge of life in Czechoslovakia under Soviet rule has led him to important insights regarding the human condition of people living both in the East and in the West. Since Kundera moved to France in 1975, he has become an author of considerable international renown.

In Czechoslovakia after World War II, Kundera was a member of the young, idealist communist generation who were trying to bring about a "paradise on Earth," a communist utopia. It was not until their middle age that they realised that the communist regime had abused their idealism and that they had brought their nation into subjugation. This realisation resulted in a feeling of guilt which Milan Kundera has been trying to exorcise by his literary work in which, especially after leaving for the West, he has been able, by contrasting the Western and the East European experience, to elucidate important aspects of contemporary human existence. Kundera's mature work serves as a warning: the author argues that human perception is flawed and that human beings fall prey to false interpretations of reality. The primary impulse for this cognitive scepticism is undoubtedly Kundera's traumatic experience of his younger years when he uncritically supported communist ideology.

While he lived in Czechoslovakia, Kundera was always in the forefront of indigenous public debate on cultural issues. In the 1950s, he published lyrical poetry which while conforming to the demands of official communist literary style of "socialist realism" highlighted the importance of individual personal experience. Later, Kundera came to abhor lyricism and sentimentality.

In his own words, he "found himself" as a writer when, in the mid-1960s, he wrote short stories, later gathered in Laughable Loves. These are miniature dramas of intimate human relationships. Most of these short stories are based on bittersweet anecdotes which deal with sexual relations of two or three characters. Kundera believes that looking at people through the prism of erotic relationships reveals much about human nature. Sex and love-making is an important instrument for Kundera which enables him to delve into the minds of his characters in all his mature works.

Many Czech critics regard Kundera's first novel, Žert (The Joke) as his finest achievement. Here Kundera develops for the first time his most important theme: the warning that it is impossible to understand and control reality. The novel is a story of a young communist student, Ludvík Jahn, who, out of frustration that he cannot get a female-fellow student into bed, sends her a postcard in which he mocks her political beliefs. The postcard is intercepted and Ludvík is punished by being expelled from university and sent to work in the mines. Throughout his later life, Ludvík bears a grudge against all his former fellow students who voted for his expulsion. He plans an intricate revenge. However, it is impossible to enter the same river twice and Ludvík's plan misfires: although he prides himself on his intellectual capacity, his perception of reality is just as flawed as the perception of the "emotional" and "lyrical" women whom he despises. The structure of the novel is pluralist and polyphonic: the author compares and contrasts the testimonies of a number of different protagonists, thus forcing the reader to come to the conclusion that reality is unknowable. Most Western critics saw The Joke primarily as a criticism of Stalinist communism, yet Kundera rightly rejected such a simplistic interpretation.

Kundera further developed his writing style particularly in his novels Knihla smíchu a zapomnění (The Book of Laughter and Forgetting) and Nesnesitelná lehkost bytí (The Unbearable Lightness of Being), which made his name in the West in the 1980s. He argues that he has invented a new method of writing a novel. His major works written since the 1980s consist of a series of texts which are bound together by a number of salient themes rather than by the narrative itself. These themes are examined and analysed by means of variations, like in a musical composition.

In The Book of Laughter and Forgetting, a major theme when analysing people's insufficiencies in perceiving reality, is forgetting. One of the main characters of the novel, Czech emigré Tamina, who leads a meaningless and isolated existence in France, is trying desperately and unsuccessfully to reconstruct her life in Czechoslovakia with her now dead husband. In The Unbearable Lightness of Being, a work which was hailed in the West as a masterpiece, Kundera's preoccupations with insufficiencies of perception, lyricism, privacy and misunderstanding are re-examined in a polyphonic structure with a more traditional narrative line. It is a story of two Czech emigrés, Tomáš and Tereza who return to communist Czechoslovakia on an impulse and suffer the consequences.

In his later works, Kundera deals with various frustrating features of human behaviour, and again returns to the themes of privacy, individuality, perception and herd behaviour. Immortality, "a novel of debate," is—among other things—a strong criticism of contemporary, superficial, Western civilisation in which commercial media and advertising images rule supreme and reduce everything to manipulated, meaningless drivel. Kundera here stands in awe over the mystery and authenticity of life and protests with all his might against its trite, consumerist simplification.

—Jan Čulík

L

LA FONTAINE, Jean de

---

Born: Château-Thierry, France, 8 July 1621. Family: Married Marie Héricart in 1647 (separated 1658). Career: Succeeded his father as Maître des Eaux et Forêts of the Duchy of Château-Thierry; possibly licensed to practice as a lawyer; writer in Paris; patronized by Fouquet and others, especially Mme. de la Sablière. Member: Académie française, 1684. Died: 13 March 1695.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Oeuvres complètes, edited by H. de Regnier. 11 vols., 1883–92.
Oeuvres: Fables, contes, et nouvelles; Oeuvres diverses, edited by René Groos, Jacques Schiffrin, and Pierre Clarac. 2 vols., 1942–54.
The Complete Fables, translated by Norman B. Spector. 1988.
Oeuvres complètes, edited by Jean-Pierre Collinet. 1991–.
Selected Fables, translated by Christopher Wood. 1995.
Selected Fables: A Dual-language Book, edited and translated by Stanley Appelbaum. 1997.
Complete Tales in Verse, translated by Guido Waldman. 2000.
Love and Folly: Selected Fables and Tales of La Fontaine, translated by Marie Ponsot. 2002.

Verse

Élégie aux nymphes de Vaux. 1661.
Nouvelles en vers. 1665.
Contes et nouvelles en vers (4 parts). 4 vols., 1665–74; enlarged edition, 1686; edited by Jacqueline Zeugschmitt, 2 vols., 1972; as Tales and Novels in Verse, translated by Samuel Humphreys, 1735; as La Fontaine's Bawdy: Of Libertines, Louts, and Lechers, translations from the Contes et nouvelles en vers by Norman R. Shapiro, 1992.
Fables (12 parts). Vols. 1–6, 1668; vols. 7–11, 1678–79; vol. 12, 1693; translated as Fables, 1804; also translated by Edward Marsh, 1931; Marianne Moore, 1954; Reginald Jarman, 1962; Elizur Wright, 1975; James Michie, 1979; Francis Scarfe, 1985; Walter Thornbury, 1984; Liza Commager, 1985; Norman Shapiro, 1988.
Fables nouvelles et autres poésies. 1671; as Fables and Other Poems, translated by John Cairncross, 1982.
Poème du Quinquina et autres ouvrages en vers. 1682.

Fiction

Les Amours de Psyché et de Cupidon. 1669; as The Loves of Cupid and Psyche, translated by Joseph Lockman, 1744.

Plays

L'Eunuque, from the play by Terence. 1654.

Les Rieurs de Beau-Richard (ballet; produced 1659–60). In Oeuvres, 1827.

Astrée, music by Pascal Colasse (produced 1691). 1691.

Other

Voyage en Limousin. 1663.

Ouvrages de prose et de poésie, with Abbé François de Maucroix. 2 vols., 1685.

Oeuvres posthumes. 1696.

*

Critical Studies: Young La Fontaine by P. Wadsworth, 1952; La Fontaine by M. Sutherland, 1953; La Fontaine: Fables by Odette de Mourgues, 1960; La Fontaine, Poet and Counterpoet by Margaret O. Guiton, 1961; The Style of La Fontaine's Fables by Jean Dominique Biard, 1966; The Esthetics of Negligence: La Fontaine's Contes by John C. Lapp, 1971; La Fontaine and His Friends: A Biography by Agnes Ethel MacKay, 1972; Fables in Frames: La Fontaine and Visual Culture in Nineteenth-Century France by Kirsten H. Powell, 1997; Reading Undercover: Audience and Authority in Jean de La Fontaine by Anne L. Birberick, 1998; The Fables of La Fontaine: Wisdom Brought Down to Earth by Andrew Calder, 2001.

* * *

Jean de La Fontaine stands out as the one French writer of the 17th century to have written sympathetically about animals and the natural world, and the one poet in the classical period to have combined a deep respect for form with a readiness and ability to experiment in different types of versification. His two collections of Fables continue to make him probably the most frequently read and quoted of all French poets, and he is probably the only great French writer to be equally appreciated by children and by adults. His first book of Fables was written for the instruction of the Dauphin, the future Louis XIV, and offers a view of the world that contains a greater awareness of Realpolitik than of the nobler elements in the concept of Christian monarchy. Thus when, in “La Génisse, la chèvre, et la brebis en société avec le lion” (“The Heifer, the Goat, and the Sheep in company with the Lion”), the animals prepare to share out the spoils, the lion—the King of Beasts—takes the largest share on the indisputable grounds that he is called Lion and is the strongest. One of the best known fables, “Le Loup et l’Agneau” (“The Wolf and the Lamb”) demonstrates the truth that might is right, and the qualities needed to succeed, or even to survive, in the social world depicted in La Fontaine’s animal allegories are exactly those that Hobbes considered inseparable from the State of Nature. For it is indeed the war of all against all in which the cardinal virtues are force and fraud, and the human beings who make an appearance in this world tend to be on the same moral level as the animals who represent the various ranks in the extremely hierarchical society that La Fontaine knew. When a bird is wounded in a fight and lands in a field, a child casually throws a stone to kill it, thus illustrating the pre-Rousseauist view of children as “an age without pity.” Only perhaps by adopting an attitude of suspicion, humility, and self-effacement can those at the bottom end of the social spectrum survive, and it is clear that La Fontaine had no vision of a society in which a king or any other kind of ruler might act or intervene to improve the lot of his subjects.

Most of the actual stories, of course, are traditional, coming down from Aesop and Phaedra, and the almost unremitting pessimism which is the quality that most strikes the modern reader may well have been more axiomatic and therefore less surprising for La Fontaine’s contemporaries. This pessimism is also occasionally relieved by fables such as “Les Deux Amis” (“The Two Friends”), showing as it does an idealized vision of friendship, and is prevented from making a really deep emotional impact by the humour of versification and characterization that run through all the Fables. La Fontaine excels in matching verbal rhythms to the physical features of the animals he describes, writing about mice in short, neat, light, precise lines, and about bears and lions in more ponderous and self-important tones. You can see his animals moving as you read or listen to the Fables, and visualize the French countryside against which the action takes place.

In his lifetime, and by connoisseurs since the 17th century, La Fontaine was also known as the author of a number of Contes et nouvelles en vers (Tales and Novels in Verse), whose agreeably pagan inspiration gave way to a more orthodox Christian sensibility in the “ecueil de Poésies Chrésiennes” (“Collection of Christian Poetry”) in 1671. It is traditional in France to refer to the author of the Fables as “le bon La Fontaine,” a reference more to his genial disposition than to the view of humanity running through his work.

—Philip Thody

See the essay on Fables.

LA MOTTE FOUQUÉ, Caroline

See FOUQUÉ, Caroline de la Motte

LA MOTTE FOUQUÉ, Friedrich

See FOUQUÉ, Friedrich de la Motte

LA ROCHEFOUCAULD, François

Born: Paris, France, 15 September 1613. Family: Married Andrée de Vivonne in 1628; eight children. Career: Chief of staff, 1629, served in Italy, Netherlands, 1635–36, Rocroi, 1643, and Gravelines, 1644; took part in Louis XIV’s Dutch campaign, 1667–68; participated in the Frondes, 1648–52; intrigues against Richelieu; severely wounded in fighting in Paris, 1652; imprisoned by Richelieu for eight days, then banished to Verteuil for two years. Lived in retirement among a small intellectual circle including Mme. de Sablé, Mme. de Sévigné, and Mme. de Lafayette. Died: 17 March 1680.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Oeuvres. 1818.

Oeuvres complètes. 1825.

Oeuvres inédites. 1863.

Oeuvres complètes, edited by D.L. Gilbert and J. Gourdault. 4 vols., 1868–83.

Oeuvres complètes, edited by A. Chassang. 2 vols., 1883–84.

Oeuvres complètes, edited by Louis Martin-Chauffier and Jean Marchand. 1935; revised editions, 1957, 1964.

Works

Portrait de La Rochefoucauld par lui-même. 1659.

Mémoires. 1662.

Sentences et maximes de morale (pirate edition). 1664; as Réflexions; ou, Sentences et maximes morales. 1665; 5th edition, 1678; enlarged edition as Nouvelles réflexions ou sentences et maximes morales, 1693; as Maximes, edited by Robert L. Cru, 1927, Henry A. Grubbs, 1929, F.C. Green, 1945, Roland Barthes, 1961, Jean Starobinski, 1964, Dominique Secretan, 1967, and by Jacques Truchet, 1967; as Maximes, translated by Aphra Behn 1685; also translated by A.S. Bolton, 1884; F.C. Stevens, 1939; Constantine Fitzgibbon, 1957; Louis Kronenberger, 1959; Leonard W. Tancock, 1959; as Maxims, translated by Stuart D. Warner and Stéphane Dovard, 2001.

Mémoires du duc de L.R. 1664.

La Justification de l’amour (attributed to La Rochefoucauld), edited by J.D. Hubert. 1971.

A Frenchman’s Year in Suffolk, edited and translated by Norman Scarfe. 1988.

Innocent Espionage: The La Rochefoucauld Brothers’ Tour of England in 1785, edited and translated by Norman Scarfe. 1995.

*

Bibliography: Bibliographie générale raisonnée de La Rochefoucauld by Jean Marchand, 1948; François de la Rochefoucauld by Edith Mora, 1965.

Critical Studies: Le Vrai visage de la Rochefoucauld by Emile Magne, 1923; The Originality of La Rochefoucauld’s Maxims by H.A. Grubbs, 1929; The Life and Adventures of La Rochefoucauld by Maurice Bishop, 1951; New Aspects of Style in the Maxims of La Rochefoucauld by Mary F. Zeller, 1954; The Concept of Love in the Maxims of La Rochefoucauld by May W. Buttrick, 1959; La Rochefoucauld: His Mind and Art by Will G. Moore, 1969; Vauvenargues and La Rochefoucauld by Peter M. Fine, 1974; La Rochefoucauld: The Art of Abstraction by Philip E. Lewis, 1977; Two French Moralists: La Rochefoucauld and La Bruyère by Odette de Mourgues, 1978; Collaboration et originalité chez La Rochefoucauld by Susan Read Baker, 1980; La Rochefoucauld and the Seventeenth Century Concept of the Self by Vivien Thweatt, 1980; Images de La Rochefoucauld: Acres du tricentenaire, 1680–1980 edited by Jean Lafond and Jean Mesnard, 1984; Procès à La Rochefoucauld et à la maxime by Corraso Rosso, 1986; La Rochefoucauld and the Language of Unmasking in Seventeenth-Century France by Henry C.

Clark, 1994; La Rochefoucauld: Maxims by D.J. Culpin, 1995; Falsehood Disguised: Unmasking the Truth in La Rochefoucauld by Richard G. Hodgson, 1995; Concordance to the Maxims of La Rochefoucauld, edited by Robyn Holman and Jacques Barchilon, 1996.

* * *

The 17th-century French ideal of the honnête homme was epitomized in the later life of François, duc de La Rochefoucauld, and is immortalized in his famous Réflexions; ou, Sentences et maxims morales (Maxims). His views on man and life were determined in large measure by the failure of his political ambitions and by his active role in the armed rebellion against the crown in the civil wars (the Frondes, 1648–52) in which he was seriously wounded. Deceived by his mistress, the duchesse de Longueville, La Rochefoucauld became bitter and disillusioned, retiring from public life at the age of 40. In 1659, he was allowed to resume residence in Paris, where he regularly attended the brilliant salon of Mme. de Sablé. In this cultured, sophisticated society, La Rochefoucauld displayed and honed his ideas and his literary skills. The art of conversation was highly valued among the habitués of literary salons, and their influence on language, attitudes, and ideas was profound. The nature of man and his behaviour were among the most discussed subjects in salon society. La Rochefoucauld asserted that man was not always a rational being but was governed by his “humeurs” or temperament. In humankind amour-propre (self-love) was the motivating factor, the well-spring of all actions. He saw a world in which men lied and cheated, and were devoid of honour and gratitude. Only man’s natural tendency to la paresse (indolence; laziness) prevented him from acting intemperately; moderation in pursuit of virtue or vice was due to indifference and innate dullness. This grim portrait of humanity was widely held by many thoughtful people at the time, and their opinion of the common masses was even more disparaging.

La Rochefoucauld’s writings reflect these pessimistic views of man and society, but he also held firmly to the masculine ideal of the age, that of the cultured gentleman; birth and breeding, manners and social graces were distinguishing features of an élite class. Open-mindedness, bienséance (decorum; decency), and wit were to be cultivated among men of rank. La Rochefoucauld embodied these aristocratic characteristics of the gentleman who avoided pedantry, offending others, or trying to improve one’s fellow men through moral exhortation; but the reality was that “we give nothing so liberally as our advice,” according to La Rochefoucauld.

In La Rochefoucauld’s Portrait de La Rochefoucauld par lui-même (Portrait of La Rochefoucauld by Himself) one finds a degree of idealization as the author measures himself against the notion of the honnête homme. It reveals a self-sufficient man, aloof, proud, and conscious of his aristocratic rank. He claims a melancholic temperament, prone to depression, reserved, and even secretive. Moderation and self-control, intelligence, retentive memory, and “fluent tongue” are cited among his more notable qualities in the Portrait de La Rochefoucauld par lui-même. Further, he claims that he was “right thinking and naturally inclined towards good . . . ,” fond of his friends, but not overtly demonstrative. The portrait is a kind of manifesto by which the author hoped to be judged favourably by his contemporaries. Appearance was of prime importance in French society, to the people of quality, as La Rochefoucauld would have put it. His self-portrait may have been idealized to some degree, but one can recognize the same sombre, irresolute man pictured in the Cardinal de Retz’s pen-portrait of La Rochefoucauld.

Numerous pen-portraits are the most salient feature of La Rochefoucauld’s Mémoires. Sketches of his contemporaries reveal the attitudes and ideals of the French upper classes, the fostering of honnêteté (civility), self-discipline, and social order. Unpleasant characteristics, physical or moral, are seldom mentioned—a gentleman avoided deliberately giving offence. The Mémoires are not in the modern sense autobiographical. Indeed, they reveal more about La Rochefoucauld’s social milieu and the culture of the age of Louis XIV than about the memoirist.

On the other hand, La Rochefoucauld’s deservedly famous maxims reveal a great deal about the personality and ideas of the writer as he probes human nature, motives, and conduct. The ideal of the honnête homme is counterpoised to reality; the Maxims describe man as he is, not as he ought to be. One can discern a definite point of view, one that is often harsh, bitter, cynical, and pessimistic. La Rochefoucauld’s likes and dislikes, and those of his aristocratic peers, are evident as he deals with subjects such as love, friendship, old age, death, women, and human virtues and vices. His attitude towards women is particularly striking: “Most virtuous women are hidden treasures, safe only because no one is looking for them.” And about love he declares: “Nothing is more natural or deceptive than to believe one is loved.” The moral and ethical standards found in the Maxims generally reflect those commonly held by upper-class 17th-century society: man is by nature weak and irrational, motivated by amour-propre but just as frequently immobilized by la paresse, which renders him indecisive and impassive. However, La Rochefoucauld’s own experiences undoubtedly influenced his ideas, especially those relating to women, love, self-interest, mistrust, and ingratitude. Betrayed by the woman he loved, denied a post at Court, censured for rebellion against his monarch, and forever labelled a “frondeur,” La Rochefoucauld became disenchanted with his fellow men and with the pursuit of worldly power and position.

La Rochefoucauld was an astute observer, a recorder of human follies and foibles. His intention was to inform, not to reform, mankind, and he avoided dogmatic statements and the appearance of preaching. He accepts that man’s nature is what it is; one’s conduct is often restrained only by the need to be socially accepted. Without question, the Maxims are universally applicable, unrestricted by time or place. In these timeless aphorisms that speak to all, the language employed is markedly neutral, avoiding words that would evoke an emotional rather than a rational reaction. The carefully crafted sentences are notable for their terseness, precise phrasing, and minimal vocabulary. They are immediately understandable, devoid of esoteric allusions, metaphors, and other scholarly devices. The highly polished style of La Rochefoucauld’s sentences is due in large part to years of refining and honing of ideas and language in the Paris salons. Creating pithy proverbs, witticisms, and maxims was a popular “parlour-game” among French sophisticates; their search for principles of universal validity was taken seriously and led these perceptive salonniers to accept that “we find few sensible people, except those who are of our way of thinking.” In Mme. de Sablé’s salon, men and women discussed, analyzed, and criticized both the form and the content of ideas, stressing clarity, precision, and simplicity. The Maxims also mirror the 17th-century tendency to self-examination, the inward-looking, reflective nature of the French upper classes. The harsh, cynical sentiments expressed in the Maxims were softened in later editions, most likely through the influence of La Rochefoucauld’s closest women friends, Mme. de Lafayette and Mme. de Sévigné. La Rochefoucauld’s Maxims, according to Voltaire, helped to shape the French taste for precision and accuracy, attributes which still set the standards for their thought and writing.

—Jeanne A. Ojala

See the essay on Maxims.

LACLOS, (Pierre Ambroise Francois) Choderlos de

Born: Amiens, France, 18 October 1741. Education: Educated at École d' Artillerie de la Fère, 1759–63. Military Service: 2nd lieutenant, 1762; served in Toul, 1763–66; Strasbourg, 1766–69; Grenoble, 1769–75; Besançon, 1775–76; Valence, 1776–78; l'Île d'Aix, 1778–88; left the army for a brief period as politician; rejoined army as Maréchal de camp, 1792; general of the artillery in the army of Naples, 1800. Family: Married Marie-Soulange Duperré in 1786. Career: Editor, Journal des Amis de la Constitution, 1790–91. Died: 5 September 1803.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Oeuvres complètes, edited by Maurice Allem. 1944; revised edition, edited by Laurent Versani, 1979.

Fiction

Les Liaisons dangereuses. 1782; edited by René Pomeau, 1981; as Dangerous Connections, 1784; as Dangerous Acquaintances, translated by Richard Aldington, 1924; as Les Liaisons dangereuses, translated by P.W.K. Stone, 1961; also translated and adapted by Christopher Hampton, 1985; translated and edited by Douglas Parmée, 1995; translated by Ernest Dowson, 1998.

Plays

Ernestine, music by Saint-Georges, from a novel by Mme. Riccoboni (produced 1777).

Verse

Poésies, edited by Arthur Symons and Louis Thomas. 1908.

Other

Lettre à M.M. de l'Académie française. 1786.
La Galerie des États-Généraux, with others. 1789.
La Galerie des dames françaises. 1789.
Causes secrètes de la révolution. 1795.
De l'éducation des femmes, edited by Édouard Champion. 1903.
Lettres inédites, edited by Louis de Chauvigny. 1904.

*

Bibliography: Choderlos de Laclos: The Man, His Works and His Critics: An Annotated Bibliography by Colette Verger Michael, 1982.

Critical Studies: Laclos and the Epistolary Novel by Dorothy R. Thelander, 1963; The Novel of Worldliness: Crébillon, Marivaux, Laclos, and Stendhal by Peter P. Brooks, 1969; Laclos: Les Liaisons dangereuses by Philip Thody, 1970, revised edition, 1975; Critical Approaches to Les Liaisons dangereuses edited by Lloyd R. Free, 1978; Intimate, Intrusive and Triumphant: Readers in the "Liaisons dangereuses" by Peter V. Conroy, 1987; Laclos: Les Liaisons dangereuses by Simon Davies, 1987; The Seducer as Mythic Figure in Richardson, Laclos and Kierkegaard by Betty Becker-Theye, 1988; Strategies of Resistance in Les Liaisons dangereuses: Heroines in Search of "Author-ity" by Ann-Marie Brinsmead, 1989; Les Liaisons dangereuses: A Study of Motives and Moral by Patrick W. Byrne, 1989; Resistance to Culture in Molière, Laclos, Flaubert, and Camus: A Post-modernist Approach by Larry W. Riggs, 1992; Terrible Sociability: The Text of Manners in Laclos, Goethe, and James by Susan Winnett, 1993; Virtue, Gender, and the Authentic Self in Eighteenth-century Fiction: Richardson, Rousseau, and Laclos by Christine Roulston, 1998.

* * *

Choderlos de Laclos is a man of one book, Les Liaisons dangereuses, an impeccably constructed epistolary novel describing and analysing the sexual immorality which is said to have characterized certain members of the French aristocracy in the years immediately preceding the Revolution of 1789. But the novel is not the endorsement of promiscuity it was considered to be in the 19th century, any more than it is the transference into fiction of Laclos's own exploits and world view, or a realistic novel in the sense of one based on actual events. Indeed, recent historical research has revealed how the principal male character, the Vicomte de Valmont, far from being drawn from life, served rather as a model to would-be seducers who wished to follow his example after reading the novel. Laclos himself, unlike Valmont, was a very minor nobleman, whose dislike of the top aristocracy of the day may well have stemmed from the slowness with which, as a professional soldier, he obtained promotion in the artillery in the ancien régime. Les Liaisons dangereuses can thus be seen as a socially committed novel written by a man sympathetic to the revolutionary and moralistic views of Rousseau, and intended to show, by contrast, the superiority of the more modest but increasingly self-confident middle-class. Laclos's own marriage, to a girl who was 17 when he married her at the age of 45, was a very happy one. Indeed, a letter exists, written to her while he was on active service with the Revolutionary armies in the 1790s, telling her of his ambition to write a novel proving that "true happiness can be found only in the Family."

The plot of Les Liaisons dangereuses can certainly be interpreted as a criticism of how Valmont and his female accomplice, the Marquise de Merteuil, behave in their sexual relationships to other people and to each other, and it is also possible to see the extremely intelligent and somewhat terrifying Marquise as a very conscious warning of how feminism can go sour. For Laclos, as an essay published long after his death revealed, held views on the equality of women and men which are advanced even by modern standards ("Learn," he wrote, "that one escapes from slavery only by a great revolution"), and Madame de Merteuil is the strongest willed, the most intellectual, the most interesting, and the least successful of all French fictional heroines. Les Liaisons dangereuses is nevertheless too complex and ambiguous a novel to be interpreted in only one light. It deserves its place as the best novel written in France in the 18th century, and one of the best studies ever published of evil, of sexual aggression and of the lust for power. There is also an intriguing contrast between the perfection of its formal finish and the endlessly interesting questions to which it gives rise.

—Philip Thody

See the essay on Les Liaisons dangereuses.

LAFAYETTE, Madame de

Born: Marie-Madeleine Pioche de la Vergne, in Paris, France, in 1634. Family: Married François, Comte de Lafayette, in 1655 (died 1683), two sons. Career: Grew up in Paris, and after a period of life in her husband's château of Nades, lived in Paris after 1659; friend of Henriette d'Angleterre, wife of Louis XIV's brother, of Mme. de Sévigné, and the duc de La Rochefoucauld q.v. Died: 25 May 1693.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Oeuvres, edited by Robert Lejeune. 3 vols., 1925–30.

Romans et nouvelles, edited by Emile Magne. 1958.

Secret History of Henrietta, Princess of England: First Wife of Philippe, duc d'Orléans; Together with, Memoirs of the Court of France for the Years 1688–1689, translated with an introduction by J.M. Shelmerdine. 1993.

Fiction

La Princesse de Montpensier. 1662; as The Princess Montpensier, translated anonymously, 1666; also translated by Anthony Bonner, 1805; edited and translated by Terence Cave, with The Princesse de Clèves and The Comtesse de Tende, 1992; edited with translation by John D. Lyons, 1994; translated by Michael G. Paulson and Tamara Alvarez-Detrell, 1995.

Zaïde. 1669–70; as Zayde: A Spanish History, translated by P. Porter, 1678.

La Princesse de Clèves. 1678; edited by Emile Magne, 1950; also edited by Peter H. Nurse, 1971; as The Princess of Cleves, translated anonymously, 1679; also translated by Thomas Segeant Perry, 1777; Nancy Mitford, 1950; Walter J. Cobb, 1961; Robin Buss, 1992; edited and translated by Terence Cave, with The Princesse de Montpensier and The Comtesse de Tende, 1992.

La Comtesse de Tende. 1724; edited and translated by Terence Cave, with The Princesse de Montpensier and The Princesse de Clèves, 1992.

Other

Histoire d'Henriette d'Angleterre. 1720; edited by Gilbert Sigaux, 1965; as Fatal Gallantry, translated anonymously, 1722.

Mémoires de la cour de France. 1731; edited by Gilbert Sigaux, 1965. Correspondance, edited by A. Beaunier. 2 vols., 1942.

*

Bibliography: Madame de Lafayette: A Selected Critical Bibliography by James W. Scott, 1974.

Critical Studies: Moral Perspective in "La Princesse de Clèves" by Helen Kaps, 1968; Madame de Lafayette by Stirling Haig, 1970; Classical Voices: Studies of Corneille, Racine, Moliere, Madame de Lafayette by Peter H. Nurse, 1971; Madame de Lafayette and "La Princesse de Clèves" by Janet Raitt, 1971; La Princesse de Clèves: The Tension of Elegance by Barbara R. Woshinsky, 1973; Narrative Strategies in La Princesse de Clèves by Donna Kuizenga, 1976; A Structural Analysis of "La Princesse de Clèves" by Susan W. Tiefenbrun, 1976; Madame de Lafayette: La Princesse de Clèves by J.W. Scott, 1983; Order in the Court: History and Society in La Princesse de Clèves by Laurence A. Gregorio, 1986; Une amitié parisienne au Grand siècle: Mme. de Lafayette et Mme. de Sévigné 1648–1693 by Denis Mayer, 1990; A Critical Analysis of de Lafayette's La Princess de Clèves as a Royal Novel: Kings, Queens and Splendor by Michael G. Paulson, 1991; An Inimitable Example: The Case for the Princess de Clèves, edited by Patrick Henry, 1993; The Princess of Clèves: Contemporary Reactions, Criticism, edited with a revised translation by John D. Lyons, 1994; Privileged Anonymity: The Writings of Madame de Lafayette by Anne Green, 1996; Approaches to Teaching Lafayette's The Princess of Clèves, edited by Faith E. Beasley and Katherine Ann Jensen, 1998.

* * *

As a member of the nobility, Madame de Lafayette was an amateur writer, and was reluctant to admit authorship of her novels. Indeed, she wrote them to a certain extent in collaboration with male friends, particularly Gilles Ménage and La Rochefoucauld. But they are unquestionably her creation and bear the stamp of her particular if somewhat narrowly focused genius. Her works have survived because one of them, La Princesse de Clèves (The Princess of Cleves), ranks among the finest psychological novels ever written. Her other books, however, are of interest primarily to the literary historian.

She left four works of fiction. All are variations on the same theme—a love story in the form of a pseudo-historical romance. La Comtesse de Tende is a slight novella about an adulterous wife, the countess of the title, who nobly repents before her death. Zaïde (Zayde) is a "Spanish history" very much in the taste of the time, replete with digressions, adventures, and discourses on the finer points of amorous activity, and needless to say describes love's tribulations at generous length. La Princesse de Montpensier (The Princess Montpensier) is a more solid effort, which argues, as does the Comtesse de Tende's story, that women can be sure of attaining happiness only if both prudence and virtue govern their actions; but they find that rather difficult, and most of them allow men to make a mess of their lives.

A somewhat mechanistic psychology allied with a platitudinous morality considerably reduces the interest of these works for the modern reader. It is all the more remarkable, then, that using the same ingredients Madame de Lafayette produced one novel that is a masterpiece. The Princess of Cleves is set in the 16th century (the material is lifted, with some changes as was her wont, from the candid memoirs of Pierre de Brantôme). It tells of a beautiful young woman who arrives at the French court and is soon married to the Prince of Cleves. She likes and respects him, but is not sexually attracted to him. When the Duc de Nemours appears at court, however, this handsome and seductive creature steals her heart. For a long time she conceals her violent feelings from Nemours, and indeed from everyone else except her own stern mother, but eventually she betrays herself when she experiences acute jealousy over a love letter that she assumes (wrongly) has been sent to Nemours by another woman. When her mother dies she turns for comfort to exactly the wrong person: her husband. Her famous “avowal” of her feelings for a rival poisons his life, and he dies not long afterwards of a broken heart. She is now, paradoxically, free to marry the man she loves, but she decides not to do so. This is partly out of remorse at having precipitated her husband’s death, but mainly because she fears Nemours will be unfaithful to her once he has made her his wife. So she sacrifices her love on the altar of her peace of mind, and dies not long afterwards, an unattached and virtuous woman. This early blow for feminism, coupled with precise insight into the painful ecstasies of erotic attraction, has ensured the survival of this at first sight unlikely classic.

—John Fletcher

LAFORGUE, Jules

Born: Montevideo, Uruguay, 16 August 1860. Moved to France with his family, 1866. Education: Educated at Tarbes from 1866: Collège Impérial, 1869–76; Lycée Condorcet, Paris, 1876–77. Family: Married Leah Lee in 1886. Career: First poems published in magazines in Tarbes and Toulouse, 1879; part-time assistant to Charles Ephrussi, art historian and editor, 1881; French reader to Empress Augusta of Germany, in Berlin and travelling, 1881–86. Died: 21 August 1887.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

- Poésies complètes*. 1894.
Oeuvres complètes, edited by G. Jean-Aubry. 6 vols., 1922–30.
Poésies complètes, edited by Pascal Pia. 2 vols., 1979.
Oeuvres complètes. 1988.
Selected Poems, translated with introduction and notes by Graham Dunstan Martin. 1998.
Poems of Jules Laforgue, translated and introduced by Peter Dale. 2001.

Verse

- Les Complaintes*. 1885; edited by Michael Collie, 1977; also edited by Pierre Reboul, 1981.
L’Imitation de Notre-Dame la Lune. 1886; edited by Pierre Reboul, 1981.
Le Concile féérique. 1886.
Les Derniers Vers. 1890; edited by Michael Collie and J.M. L’Heureux, 1965; as The Last Poems, edited by Madeleine Betts, 1973.
Poems, translated by Patricia Terry. 1958.
Poems, translated by Peter Dale. 1986.

Fiction

- Moralités légendaires*. 1887; edited by Daniel Grojnowski, 1980; as Moral Tales, translated by William J. Smith, 1985.

Other

- Hamlet; or, The Consequences of Filial Piety*, translated by Gustave Leopold van Roosbroeck. 1934.
Lettres à un ami 1880–86. 1941.
Stéphane Vassiliew. 1946.
Selected Writings, edited and translated by William Jay Smith. 1956.
 Translator, Oeuvres choisies, by Walt Whitman. 1918.

*

Critical Studies: Laforgue and the Ironic Inheritance by Warren Ramsey, 1953, and Laforgue: Essays on a Poet’s Life and Work edited by Ramsey, 1969; Laforgue, 1963, and Jules Laforgue, 1977, both by Michael Collie; Looking for Laforgue: An Informal Biography by David Arkell, 1979; Jules Laforgue: Poet of His Age by Laurence J. Watson, 1980; Exiles and Ironists: Essays on the Kinship of Heine and Laforgue by Ursula Franklin, 1988; Parody and Decadence: Laforgue’s Moralités Légendaires by Michele Hannoosh, 1989; Jules Laforgue and Poetic Innovation by Anne Holmes, 1993.

* * *

Jules Laforgue helped liberate and rejuvenate French prosody by means of a series of bold, iconoclastic, but highly original verse experiments that had the effect of establishing free verse as a legitimate and viable poetic mode not only in France, but also in Britain and the United States. Though disguised as a dilettante, Laforgue was devoted to literature; though a fashionable dandy, he worked through the night and in a short career was extremely productive. His early poems, Le Sanglot de la terre [The Sob of the Earth], he himself suppressed, realizing they were derivative, tendentious, verbally flat, and technically uninspired. Two other volumes, L’Imitation de Notre-Dame la Lune [Imitation of Our Lady of the Moon] and Le Concile féérique, are distinctly modish and lightweight, though some of the Pierrot poems in the first of these show a pleasing cleverness in the dramatization of the clown’s anguish. Laforgue’s reputation, however, rests chiefly on two volumes of great historical as well as intrinsic importance: Les Complaintes and Les Derniers Vers (The Last Poems).

In these two volumes he challenged not just traditional, middle-class ideas about institutions such as marriage and the church, but also the stability of language itself. Standard usage and normal meanings are in both books ironically subverted by puns and neologisms; by disruptive, unconventional rhymes; by a vigorous, but controlled disturbance of metrical expectation; and by the invention, or at least adoption of new forms. A reader brought up on Lamartine and Hugo could only be shocked by Laforgue’s rejection of traditional poetic rhetoric. The witty poems in Les Complaintes are remarkably inventive, superbly sophisticated verbal confections presented in the demotic guise of reworked street tunes and popular ballads, confections, one can say, because of their artificiality and high-spiritedness, but none the less in many cases brilliantly imaginative as well (e.g., “Complainte du pauvre chevalier-errant” and “Complainte d’une convalescence en Mai”). The 12 poems of The Last Poems constitute a further advance in lexical and prosodic experimentation. Influenced, as he acknowledged himself, both by the theory of Impressionist painting and by the music of Wagner, Laforgue wrote a set of free-verse tone poems whose emphasis and impact were artistic, in the fin-de-siècle art-for-art’s-sake sense, rather than moral. He interested himself in anything that was different, modern, untraditional: photography, for example, and contemporary sculpture. In Paris he had seen the work of Monet, Sisley, and Pissarro. In Germany he had heard the music of Wagner. He had read about these, and other artists, in avant-garde journals like La Vogue and La Revue Wagnérienne. He had studied and translated Whitman. Thoroughly imbued with a nihilistic, but technically innovative, modern spirit, he proceeded right at the end of his short life to produce The Last Poems, the poetic tour de force that first established free-verse as an exciting extension of what was possible in French, and then later exerted a strong influence on English and American writers, most notably T.S. Eliot.

Laforgue's nihilism was that of the late 19th-century flâneur whose mind, like Ibsen's, was dominated by the imagined reality of biological determinism. In that post-Darwinian intellectual climate no man acted freely; all men were helpless pawns in a meaningless biological game; women were despised because seemingly ignorant of their merely sexual role; and the individual's only hope of personal integrity was not to participate in other people's normal activities. Experience was a kaleidoscope of impressions; nothing whatsoever could be trusted absolutely. In highly crafted poems like "Dimanches," "Solo de Lune," and "L'Hiver qui vient" Laforgue gave expression to the sensations of disbelief, the psychology of alienation, the loneliness in a world where "il n'y plus de raison" and where the subjunctive and the conditional must necessarily have greater appeal than either the present or the future tense. "J'eusse été le modèle des époux," said Laforgue; "your heart would have responded/Gaily" said T.S. Eliot some years later in imitation of him. Whatever one may think, ultimately, about Laforgue's tantalizing amalgam of irony and sentiment—his cynicism fretted with nostalgia—there seems no doubt that the poems of The Last Poems are one of the landmarks of 19th-century French poetry, marking the point at which freedom from conventional rhetoric had been fully achieved.

The same ironic, nihilist sensibility was given expression in a collection called Moralités légendaires (Moral Tales). Laforgue amused himself by giving popular stories or myths an extravagantly anti-romantic treatment, negating the idealism of the original and poking fun at out-moded heroism. The flippancy and ebullience of these stories can still be enjoyed, as can their affected decadent prose, even though the underlying tone is remorselessly negative. Nor need one be too severe in judging these nihilistic contrivances; Laforgue died at the age of 27, with his great talent denied its full expression.

—Michael Collic

See the essay on The Last Poems.

LAGERKVIST, Pär (Fabian)

Born: Växjö, Sweden, 23 May 1891. Education: Educated at the University of Uppsala, 1911–12. Family: Married 1) Karen Dagmar Johanne Sørensen in 1918 (divorced 1925); 2) Elaine Luella Hallberg in 1925. Career: Theatre critic, Svenska Dagbladet, Stockholm, 1919. Awards: Samfundet De Nio prize, 1928; Bellman prize, 1945; Saint-Beuve prize, 1946; Foreign Book prize (France), 1951; Nobel prize for literature, 1951. Honorary degree: University of Gothenburg, 1941. Member: Swedish Academy of Literature, 1940. Died: 11 July 1974.

PUBLICATIONS

Fiction

Människor [People]. 1912.

Två sagor om livet [Two Tales about Life]. 1913.

Järn och människor. 1915; as Iron and Men, translated by Roy Arthur Swanson, in Five Early Works, 1989.

Det eviga leendet. 1920; as The Eternal Smile, translated by Denys W. Harding and Erik Mesterton, 1934, and in Guest of Reality, 1936; also translated by Alan Blair, in The Eternal Smile and Other Stories, 1954.

Onda sagor [Evil Tales]. 1924.

Gäst hos verkligheten. 1925; as Guest of Reality, translated by Denys W. Harding and Erik Mesterton, 1936; also translated by Robin Fulton, in Guest of Reality and Other Stories, 1989.

Kämpande ande [Struggling Spirit]. 1930; translated in part as Masquerade of Souls, 1954.

Bödeln. 1933; as The Hangman, in Guest of Reality, translated by Denys W. Harding and Erik Mesterton, 1936; as The Executioner, translated by David O'Gorman, in The Eternal Smile and Other Stories, 1971.

I den tiden [In That Time]. 1935.

Guest of Reality (includes Guest of Reality; The Eternal Smile; The Hangman), translated by Denys W. Harding and Erik Mesterton. 1936.

Dvärgen. 1944; as The Dwarf, translated by Alexandra Dick, 1945.

Barabbas. 1950; as Barabbas, translated by Alan Blair, 1951.

The Eternal Smile and Other Stories, translated by Alan Blair and others. 1954.

The Marriage Feast and Other Stories, translated by Alan Blair and Carl Eric Lindin. 1955.

Sibyllan. 1956; as The Sibyl, translated by Alexandra Dick, 1953; also translated by Naomi Walford, 1958.

Pilgrimen [The Pilgrim] (trilogy). 1966.

Ahasverus död. 1960; as The Death of Ahasuerus, translated by Naomi Walford, 1962.

Pilgrim på hayet. 1962; as Pilgrim at Sea, translated by Naomi Walford, 1964.

Det heliga landet. 1964; as The Holy Land, translated by Naomi Walford, 1966.

Mariamne. 1967; as Herod and Mariamne, translated by Naomi Walford, 1968; as Mariamne, translated by Walford, 1968.

The Eternal Smile and Other Stories (includes The Eternal Smile; Guest of Reality; The Executioner), translated by Erik Mesterton, Denys W. Harding, and David O'Gorman. 1971.

Den svåra resan (selected stories). 1985.

Guest of Reality and Other Stories, translated by Robin Fulton. 1989.

Verse

Motiv [Motifs]. 1914.

Ångest [Angst]. 1916.

Den lyckliges väg [The Happy One's Road]. 1921.

Hjärtats sånger [Songs of the Heart]. 1926.

Vid lägereld [By the Campfire]. 1932.

Genius. 1937.

Sång och strid [Song and Battle]. 1940.

Dikter [Verse]. 1941; revised edition, 1958, 1974.

Hemmet och stjärnan [The Home and the Stars]. 1942.

Aftonland. 1953; as Evening Land, translated by W.H. Auden and Leif Sjöberg, 1977.
Valda dikter [Selected Poems]. 1967.

Plays

Sista Mänskan. 1917; as The Last Man, translated by Roy Arthur Swanson, in Five Early Works, 1989.
Den svåra stunden (three one-act plays; produced 1918). In Teater, 1918; as The Difficult Hour I–III, translated by Thomas R. Buckman, in Modern Theatre: Seven Plays and an Essay, 1966.
Himlens hemlighet (produced 1921). In Kaos, 1919; as The Secret of Heaven, translated by Thomas R. Buckman, in Modern Theatre: Seven Plays and an Essay, 1966.
Den osynlige [The Invisible One] (produced 1924). 1923.
Han som fick leva om sitt liv (produced 1928). 1928; as The Man Who Lived His Life Over, translated in Five Scandinavian Plays, 1971.
Konungen (produced 1950). 1932; as The King, translated by Thomas R. Buckman, in Modern Theatre: Seven Plays and an Essay, 1966.
Bödeln, from his own novel (produced 1934). In Dramatik, 1946; as The Hangman, translated by Thomas R. Buckman, in Modern Theatre: Seven Plays and an Essay, 1966.
Mannen utan själ (produced 1938). 1936; as The Man Without a Soul, translated by Helge Kökeritz, in Scandinavian Plays of the Twentieth Century 1, 1944.
Seger i mörker [Victory in Darkness] (produced 1940). 1939.
Midssommardröm i fattighuset (produced 1941). 1941; as Midsummer Dream in the Workhouse, translated by Alan Blair, 1953.
Dramatik [Plays]. 1946; revised edition, 1956.
Den vises sten (produced 1948). 1947; as The Philosopher's Stone, translated by Thomas R. Buckman, in Modern Theatre: Seven Plays and an Essay, 1966.
Låt människan leva (produced 1949). 1949; as Let Man Live, in Scandinavian Plays of the Twentieth Century 3, translated by Henry Alexander and Llewellyn Jones, 1951.
Barabbas, from his own novel (produced 1953). 1953.
Modern Theatre: Seven Plays and an Essay (includes The Difficult Hour I–III; The Secret of Heaven; The King; The Hangman; The Philosopher's Stone; the essay "Points of View and Attack"), translated by Thomas R. Buckman. 1966.

Other

Ordkonst och bildkonst. 1913; as Literary Art and Pictorial Art: On the Decadence of Modern Literature—On the Vitality of Modern Art, translated by Roy Arthur Swanson and E.M. Ellestad, 1991.
Kaos [Chaos]. 1919.
Det besegrade livet [The Conquered Life]. 1927.
Skrifter [Writings]. 3 vols., 1932.
Den knutna näven. 1934; as The Clenched Fist, translated by Roy Arthur Swanson, in Five Early Works, 1989.
Den befriade människan [Liberated Man]. 1939.
Prosa. 5 vols., 1945; revised edition, 1949.
Antecknat [Noted] (diary), edited by Elin Lagerkvist. 1977.
Five Early Works (includes Iron and Men; The Last Man; The Expectant Guest; The Morning; The Clenched Fist), translated by Roy Arthur Swanson. 1989.

*

Bibliography: Pär Lagerkvists bibliografi by U. Willers, 1951; Pär Lagerkvist in Translation: A Bibliography by A. Ryberg, 1964; Pär Lagerkvists kritiker: En recensjonsbibliografi by R. Yrliid, 1970.

Critical Studies: Pär Lagerkvist: An Introduction by Irene Scobbie, 1963, and "Lagerkvist," in Aspects of Swedish Literature, edited by Scobbie, 1988; Pär Lagerkvist: A Critical Essay by Winston Weathers, 1968; Lagerkvist supplement, in Scandinavica, 1971; Pär Lagerkvist by Robert Spector, 1973; Pär Lagerkvist by Leif Sjöberg, 1976; Pär Lagerkvist in America by Ray Lewis White, 1979; Som är från evighet by Willy Jönsson, translated by I. Nettervik, 1991.

* * *

As lyric poet, dramatist, satirist, and novelist Pär Lagerkvist was an innovator and one of Sweden's most influential writers of the 20th century. The autobiographical prose work Gäst hos verkligheten (Guest of Reality) shows his deep affection for his pious parents and a yearning for a faith but an inability to accept their god. The resultant spiritual void and a fevered reaction to the bloodshed of World War I led to an overwhelming angst conveyed in his poems Ångest [Angst] and the plays Sista Mänskan (The Last Man), Den svåra stunden (The Difficult Hour), and Himlens hemlighet (The Secret of Heaven), in which he emerged as Sweden's leading expressionist writer. The prose fantasy Det eviga leendet (The Eternal Smile) reflects a newly found resignation, an appreciation of the beauty of the world and a tentative belief in humanity. Two of his best cycles of poems included in Hjärtats sånger [Songs of the Heart] also suggest an inner harmony. This was dispelled as totalitarian regimes took control in Europe. In 1933 Lagerkvist published Bödeln (The Hangman), where the role of the symbolic central character is examined in a medieval and then contemporary setting. Modern man's propensity for evil clearly surpasses the superstitious crudities of the Middle Ages. A further powerful symbol of evil is the title figure in Dvärgen (The Dwarf), a masterly novel in diary form set in an Italian Renaissance court. We all have a dwarf within us which when unleashed exults in destruction. The dwarf is in chains in the final chapter but is certain of eventual release.

In Barabbas, largely instrumental in his winning the Nobel prize for literature, Lagerkvist makes the biblical robber and insurgent an existentialist figure searching for a belief. Born into a world of violence and hatred, he cannot accept the Christian message, but having met Christ, he cannot shake off his influence. Afraid of death, unable to believe in an afterlife, he remains a lonely, moving representative of modern man. Man's relation to God is explored further in a series of symbolic novels. For the Pythia in Sibyllan (The Sibyl) the god can be both wonderful and terrible but her life without him would have been nothing; the Wandering Jew in Ahasverus död (The Death of Ahasuerus) bears God's curse and achieves death only by turning his back on religion; in Pilgrim på havet (Pilgrim at Sea) and Det heliga landet (The Holy Land) the struggling pilgrim finally finds reconciliation with God and man. In Mariamne (Herod and Mariamne) evil in man is embodied in the symbolic figure of Herod. It is a desolate book, for Herod has Mariamne the Good killed, but it ends in hope—the Magi have found their way to a new-born babe.

Lagerkvist's last cycle of poems, Aftonland (Evening Land), contains beautifully expressed reminiscences and an indication of his unsolved paradox: “The non-existing god/he has set my soul in flames.” In his early twenties Lagerkvist wrote numerous articles on Cubism and other forms of modern art. He subsequently endeavoured to apply the Cubists’ method of composition to his creative writing. Even at its most feverishly inspired his work is carefully constructed, his novels particularly having an almost architectural structure.

—Irene Scobbie

LAGERLÖF, Selma (Ottoliana Lovisa)

Born: Mårbacka, Värmland, Sweden, 20 November 1858. Education: Lame from age 3, and educated at home; studied at Teachers’ Seminary, Stockholm, 1882–85. Career: Taught in a school in Landskrona until 1895, then writer: lived in Falun and, after she bought back her birthplace, Mårbacka. Awards: Idun magazine prize, 1895; travelling fellowship, 1895; Swedish Academy gold medal, 1904; Nobel prize for literature, 1909. Ph.D.: Uppsala University, 1907. Member: Swedish Academy, 1914. Died: 16 March 1940.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Skrifter. 12 vols., 1949–56.

Girl From the Marsh Croft and Other Stories, selected and edited by Greta Anderson, 1996.

Fiction

Gösta Berlings Saga. 1891; as Gösta Berling’s Saga, translated by Pauline Bancroft Flach, 1898; as The Story of Gösta Berling, translated by Lillie Tudeer, 1898; also translated by Robert Bly, 1982.

Osynliga länkar: Berättelser. 1894; as Invisible Links, translated by Pauline Bancroft Flach, 1899.

Antikrists mirakler. 1897; as The Miracles of Antichrist, translated by Pauline Bancroft Flach, 1899.

Drotningar i Kungahälla jämte andra berättelser. 1899; as The Queens of Kungahälla and Other Sketches, translated by Claud Field, 1917.

En herrgårdssägen. 1899; as From a Swedish Homestead, translated by Jessie Brochner, 1901; as The Tale of a Manor and Other Sketches, 1917.

Jerusalem I–II. 1901–02; as Jerusalem and The Holy City, translated by J. Brochner, 2 vols., 1903–18.

Herr Arnes Penningar. 1903; as Herr Arne’s Hoard, translated by Arthur G. Chater, 1923.

Legender: Berättade [Legends: Stories]. 3 vols., 1904.

Kristuslegender. 1904; as Christ Legends, translated by Velma Swanston Howard, 1908.

En saga om en saga och andra sagor. 1908; as The Girl from the Marsh Croft, translated by Velma Swanston Howard, 1911.

Meli. 1909.

Liljecronas hem. 1911; as Liliecrona’s Home, translated by Anna Barwell, 1913.

Körkarlen. 1912; as The Soul Shall Bear Witness, translated by William F. Harvey, 1921.

Astrid och andra berättelser [Astrid and Other Stories]. 1914.

Kejsarn av Portugallien. 1914; as The Emperor of Portugallia, translated by Velma Swanston Howard, 1916.

Silvergruvan och andra berättelser [The Silver Mine and Other Stories]. 1915.

Troll och människor [Trolls and Humans]. 1915.

Kavaljersnoveller. 1918.

Bannlyst. 1918; as The Outcast, translated by William Worster, 1920.

Legender i urval [Selected Legends]. 1922.

The Tale of a Manor and Other Sketches, translated by Claud Field. 1922.

The Ring of the Löwenskölds, translated by Frances Martin and Velma Swanston Howard. 3 vols., 1931; as Löwenskölds Ring, translated by Linda Schenck, 1991.

Löwensköldska ringen. 1925; as The General’s Ring, translated by Frances Martin, 1928; as The Löwensköld Ring, translated by Linda Schenck, 1991.

Charlotte Löwensköld. 1925; as Charlotte Löwensköld, translated by Velma Swanston Howard, 1927.

Anna Svärd. 1928; as Anna Svärd, translated by Velma Swanston Howard, 1931.

Mors porträtt och andra berättelser [Portrait of Mother and Other Stories]. 1930.

Julberättelser [Christmas Stories]. 1938.

Plays

Fritiofs saga [Fritiof’s Story], music by E. Andrée. 1899.

Stormyrtsösen [Girl from the Marshes], with Bernt Fredgren, from a story by Lagerlöf. 1913.

Dunungen [The Cynnet]. 1914.

Vinterballaden [Winter Ballad], from a play by Gerhart Hauptmann. 1919.

The Lighting of the Christmas Tree, adapted by Josephine L. Palmer and Annie L. Thorp (from The Christmas Guest). 1921.

Kejsarn av Portugallien, with Poul Knudsen, from the novel by Lagerlöf. 1939.

Other

Nils Holgerssons underbara resa (for children). 2 vols., 1906–07; as The Wonderful [and Further] Adventures of Nils, translated by Velma Swanston Howard, 2 vols., 1907–11; also translated by Richard E. Oldeburg, 1967.

Mårbacka.

Mårbacka. 1922; as Mårbacka, translated by Velma Swanston Howard, 1924; as Memories of Mårbacka, compiled with notes by Greta Anderson, 1996.

Ett barns memoarer. 1930; as Memories of My Childhood, translated by Velma Swanston Howard, 1934.

Dagbok. 1932; as Diary, translated by Velma Swanston Howard, 1936.

Höst: Berättelser och tal. 1933; as Harvest: Tales and Essays, translated by Florence and Naboth Hedin, 1935.

Från skilda tider: Efterlämnade skrifter [Posthumous Works], edited by Nils Afzelius. 2 vols., 1943–45.

Brev 1871–1940 [Letters], edited by Ying Toijer-Nilsson. 2 vols., 1967–69.

*

Bibliography: Lagerlöfs bibliografi originalskrifter by Nils Afzelius, 1975.

Critical Studies: Lagerlöf by H.A. Larsen, 1936; Six Scandinavian Novelists: Lie, Jacobsen, Heidenstam, Selma Lagerlöf, Hamsun, Sigrid Undset by Alrik Gustafson, 1940; Fact and Fiction in the Autobiographical Works of Lagerlöf by Folkerdina Stientje de Vrieze, 1958; Lagerlöf (in Swedish) by Carl O. Zamore, 1958; Lagerlöf by Walter A. Berendsohn, 1968; Lagerlöf: Herr Arnwes Penningar by Brita Green, 1977; Selma Lagerlöf, 1984, and Selma Lagerlöfs litterära profil, 1986, both by Vivi Edström; Rediscoveries in Children's Literature by Suzanne Rahn, 1995.

* * *

Selma Lagerlöf's childhood at Mårbacka offered a rich store of old Värmland traditions but the realistic mode of writing in the 1880s was alien to her temperament and material. Witnessing the sale of Mårbacka in 1888, she resolved to eschew current fashion and write "in the Mårbacka manner." Gösta Berlings Saga (Gösta Berling's Saga) was completed in 1891. Gösta, the handsome, Byronic, defrocked parson, joins 12 "cavaliers" who are to run Ekeby estate for a year provided they live only for beauty and pleasure. There is much merrymaking, but Lagerlöf could not wholly accept a carpe diem philosophy and ends by eulogizing hard work. This novel introduces typical Lagerlöfian themes: guilt and atonement; the saving qualities of a woman's selfless love; how to combine happiness with goodness. Having betrayed his calling Gösta must purge his guilt. The magnificent Margareta Celsing, the major's wife, has broken two commandments and accepts banishment until she has expiated her sin. The supernatural is introduced when the cavaliers sell their souls to the Mephistophelian Sintram, while the elements are used both to heighten effect and to force characters' courses of action. The style ranges from rhetoric and Sturm und Drang tempestuousness to textbook prose, but the book bears the stamp of genius.

In En herrgårdssägen (The Tale of a Manor) Lagerlöf successfully fuses Beauty and the Beast with a Dalarna legend. Fear of losing his estate threatens Gunnar Hede's sanity but a young girl's unselfish love saves him. Within the framework of symbolic folktale Lagerlöf produces a valid psychological study of schizophrenia.

On a visit to Palestine in 1900 Lagerlöf discovered a settlement of Dalarna peasants and this inspired the novel Jerusalem, at the heart of which are the Ingmarssons representing such sterling qualities as loyalty to one's province, an innate sense of justice, simple faith, and moral courage. The powerful stylized characterization and the epic scope of the novel show the influence of the Icelandic saga. Acknowledged as her masterpiece, Jerusalem won universal acclaim. The supernatural, merely suggested in Jerusalem, is a major element in Herr Arnes Penningar (Herr Arne's Hoard) where a murdered girl's ghost is instrumental in bringing the murderers of Herr Arne's household to justice. Commissioned to write a school textbook Lagerlöf, influenced partly by Kipling's Jungle Book, wrote Nils

Holgerssons underbara resa (The Wonderful Adventures of Nils), in which Sweden's geography, flora, and fauna become part of a tale about a boy's magic journey on a goose's back.

World War I had a debilitating effect, and although Lagerlöf subsequently wrote autobiographies centred on Mårbacka and completed the Löwensköld trilogy, her creative genius was spent. Her greatest gift was that of a storyteller. She refashioned local oral tradition into powerful universal prose works reflecting her instinctive understanding of the human heart and conscience. Her attitude to miracles and religion is ambivalent but her innate sense of justice and natural order ultimately restores harmony in her works. There is nothing facile in such happy endings, however, for they are achieved by personal sacrifice and a supreme effort to overcome destructive elements in human nature.

—Irene Scobbie

See the essay on Gösta Berling's Saga.

LAMARTINE, Alphonse (-Marie-Louis de Prat) de

Born: Mâcon, France, 21 October 1790. Education: Educated at Institut Puppier, Lyons, 1801–03; Jesuit college, Belley, 1803–07. Family: Married Anna Eliza Birch in 1820 (died 1863); one son and one daughter; one daughter from a previous relationship with Nina de Pierreclau. Career: Served in Louis XVIII's Garde-du-Corps, 1814–15. Mayor of Milly, 1812; diplomat, Naples, 1820–25; embassy secretary, Florence, 1825–29; elected to the Académie française, 1830; stood for the Chamber of Deputies, (unsuccessfully 1831), elected, 1833; minister of foreign affairs, 1848; defeated in the presidential election and retired from public life, 1851. Travelled to Greece, Syria, and Palestine. Died: 28 February 1869.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Oeuvres. 2 vols., 1893.

Oeuvres. 22 vols., 1900–07.

Poésies. 1957.

Oeuvres poétiques complètes, edited by Marius-François Guyard. 1963.

Oeuvres poétiques. 1977.

Verse

Méditations poétiques. 1820; as Poetical Meditations, translated by Henry Christmas, 1839; also translated with introduction by Gervase Hittle, 1993; as The Poetical Meditations, translated by William Pulling, 1849; as Translations from the Meditations, translated by James T. Smith, 1852.

La Mort de Socrate. 1823; as The Death of Socrates, translated by Harriet Cope, 1829.

Nouvelles méditations poétiques. 1823.

Le Dernier Chant du pèlerinage d'Harold. 1825; as The Last Canto of Childe Harold's Pilgrimage, translated anonymously, 1827.

Épîtres. 1825.

Chant du sacre. 1825.

Harmonies poétiques et religieuses. 2 vols., 1830.

Contre la peine de mort. 1830.

À Némesis. 1831.

Jocelyn. 2 vols., 1836; as Jocelyn: An Episode, translated by F.H. Jobert, 1837; also translated by Robert Anstruther, 1844; as Jocelyn, translated by H.G. Evans and T.W. Swift, 1868; as Jocelyn: A Romance in Verse, translated by Hazel Patterson Stewart, 1954.

Gethsémani, in Souvenirs, impressions, pensées et paysages pendant un voyage en orient. 1835; as Gethsemane: or, the Death of Julia, translated by I.H. Urquhart, 1838.

La Chute d'un ange. 2 vols., 1838.

Recueils poétiques. 1839.

Premières et nouvelles méditations poétiques (selection). 1855; as Selected Poems, edited and translated by George O. Curme, 1888.

Poésies inédites. 1873; revised edition, 1881.

Premières méditations poétiques. 1907.

Méditations, edited by Fernand Letessier. 1968.

Fiction

Graziella. 1849; edited by Alfred T. Baker, 1904; as Graziella; or, My First Sorrow, and Other Poems . . ., translated by W.C. Urquhart, 1871; as Graziella, translated by Bertha Norwood, 1876; as Graziella; or The History of a Broken Heart, translated by J.B.S., 1882; also translated by Ralph Wright, 1929.

Raphaël. 1849; as Raphaël, translated anonymously, 1849.

Les Confidences. 1849; as Confidential Disclosures, translated by E. Plunkett, 1849; as Memoirs of My Youth, translated anonymously, 1849.

Les Nouvelles Confidences. 1851; as The Wanderer and His Home, translated anonymously, 1851.

Le Tailleur des pierres de Saint-Point, récit villageois. 1851; as The Stonecutter of St-Point, translated anonymously, 1851; as The Stonemason of St-Point, translated anonymously, 1851.

Geneviève: Histoire d'un servante. 1850; as Genevieve; or, The History of a Servant Girl, translated by A.R. Scoble, 1850; as Genevieve; or, Peasant Love and Sorrow, translated by Fayette Robinson, 1850; as Genevieve: A Tale of Peasant Life, translated by Mary Howitt, 1851.

Antoniella. 1867.

Plays

Toussaint L'Ouverture (produced 1850). 1850.

Fior d'Aliza. 1863; as Fior d'Aliza, translated by G. Perry, 1869.

Saül. 1879.

Other

De la politique rationnelle. 1831; as The Polity of Reason, translated anonymously, 1848.

Oeuvres. 4 vols., 1832.

Oeuvres complètes. 13 vols., 1834–43.

Souvenirs, impressions, pensées et paysages pendant un voyage en orient (1832–1833); ou, Notes d'un voyageur. 4 vols., 1835; as A

Pilgrimage to the Holy Land, translated anonymously, 1835, reprinted 1978; as De Lamartine's Visit to the Holy Land, translated by Thomas Phipson, 1847.

Histoire des Girondins. 8 vols., 1847; as Deux Héroïnes de la Révolution française, edited by Mary Bentinck Smith, 1904; as History of the Girondists, translated by H.T. Ryde, 3 vols., 1847–48; as Pictures of the First Revolution, translated by J.F.S. Wilde, 1850.

Manifeste à l'Europe. 1848.

Trois Mois au pouvoir. 1848; as Three Months in Power: A History and Vindication of My Political Conduct During the Late Revolution in France, translated by H.T. Ryde, 1848.

Oeuvres [Souscripteurs Edition]. 14 vols., 1849–50.

Histoire de la Restauration. 8 vols., 1851–52; as The History of the Restoration of Monarchy in France, parts written in English by Lamartine the remainder translated by Captain Rafter, 4 vols., 1851–53.

Histoire de la révolution de 1848. 2 vols., 1849; as History of the French Revolution of 1848, translated anonymously, 1849; also translated by Francis Durivage and William Chase, 1849.

Nouveau voyage en orient. 1851.

Nelson. 1853.

Cromwell. 1854; as Life of Oliver Cromwell, translated anonymously, 1859.

Histoire des Constituants. 2 vols., 1854; as History of the Constituent Assembly, 4 vols., translated anonymously, 1858.

Histoire de la Turquie. 5 vols., 1854; as History of Turkey, 3 vols., translated anonymously, 1855–57.

Histoire de la Russie. 1855.

Cours familier de littérature. 28 vols., 1856–69.

Vie d'Alexandre le Grand. 2 vols., 1859.

Oeuvres complètes de Lamartine publiées et inédites. 41 vols., 1860–66.

Cicéron. 1863.

Christophe Colomb. 1863; as Life of Christopher Columbus, translated anonymously, 1859; as The Life and Voyages of Christopher Columbus, translated by E.M. Goldsmid, 1887.

Homère et Socrate. 1863; as Homer and Socrates, translated by Elizabeth Winchell Smith, 1872.

Jeanne d'Arc. 1863; as Joan of Arc: A Biography, translated by H.M. Grimké, 1867.

Madame de Sévigné (biography). 1864.

La France parlementaire (1834–1851), oeuvres, oratoires et écrits politiques. 6 vols., 1864–65.

Les Grands Hommes de l'Orient. 1865.

Les Hommes de la révolution. 1865.

Portraits et biographies. 1865; as Biographies and Portraits, translated anonymously, 1866.

Shakespeare et son oeuvre. 1865.

Vie de César. 1865.

Vie de Lord Byron. 1865; revised edition, edited by Marie-Renée Morin, 1989.

Balzac et ses oeuvres. 1866.

Jean Jacques Rousseau. 1866.

Mémoires inédits 1790–1815. 1870; as 25 Years of My Life, translated by Lady Herbert, 2 vols., 1872.

Manuscrit de ma mère. 1871; as Memoirs of My Mother, translated by Lady Herbert, with 25 Years of My Life, 2 vols, 1872; as My Mother's Manuscript, translated by Maria Louisa Helper, 1877.

Correspondance publiée par Mme. Valentine de Lamartine. 6 vols., 1873–1875; 4 vols., 1881–82.
Correspondance. 4 vols., 1873–74.
La Politique de Lamartine (selection). 1878.
Correspondance 1873–1875. 2 vols., 1881–82.
A. de Lamartine par lui-même (autobiography). 1892.
L'Album de Saint-Point (correspondence). 1923.
Lamartine et ses nièces (correspondence). 1928.
Un grand vigneron (correspondence). 1933.
Correspondance générale, edited by Maurice Levailant. 2 vols., 1943–48.
Lettres inédites 1821–51, edited by Henri Guillemin. 1944.
Lettres à Clériade Vacher (1811–1818), edited by Jean Richer. 1963.
Correspondance Alphonse de Lamartine-Aymon de Virieu 1808–15, edited by Marie-Renée Morin. 2 vols., 1987.
Correspondance 1809–1858, with Henry-Roch Dupuys, edited by Marie-Renée Morin. 1989.
Mémoires de jeunesse: 1790–1815, edited by Marie-Renée Marin. 1990.

*

Critical Studies: The Life of Lamartine by H. Remsen Whitehouse, 2 vols., 1918; Lamartine by Paul Hazard, 1925; Lamartine et la Savoie by Georges Roth, 1927; Les Méditations de Lamartine by G. Fréjaville, 1931; Lamartine et le sentiment de la nature by Yvonne Boeniger, 1934; Lamartine by Louis Bertrand, 1940; Lamartine and Romantic Unanimism by Albert J. George, 1940; Lamartine, l'homme et l'oeuvre by H. Guillemin, 1940; Les Travaux et les jours d'Alphonse de Lamartine by Marquis de Luppé, 1942; Lamartine by Marius-François Guyard, 1956; Les Amours italiennes de Lamartine, Graziella et Lena by Abel Verdier, 1963; Lamartine: A Revaluation by John C. Ireson, 1969; Lamartine; ou, l'amour de la vie by Maurice Toesca, 1969; La Vie sentimentale de Lamartine by Abel Verdier, 1971; Lamartine: Le Livre du centenaire edited by Paul Viallaneix, 1971; Lamartine by Charles M. Lombard, 1973; In Search of Eden: Lamartine's Symbols of Despair and Deliverance by Norman Araujo, 1976; Lamartine and the Poetics of Landscape by Mary Ellen Birkett, 1982; Alphonse de Lamartine: A Political Biography by William Fortescue, 1983; L'Auteur des Girondins; ou, Les Cent-vingt Jours de Lamartine, 1988, and Les Girondins de Lamartine, 1988, both by Antoine Court; Lamartine by Xavier de la Fourrière, 1990; Maternal Echoes: The Poetry of Marceline Desbordes-Valmore and Alphonse de Lamartine by Aimée Boutin, 2001.

* * *

It was Alphonse de Lamartine who created the image, in France, of the Romantic poet. The publication of his first collection, Méditations poétiques (Poetical Meditations), in 1820 was undoubtedly a landmark in French literature. Without radically modifying the form of French poetry, Lamartine gave it back a soft lyrical quality it had lost in the previous century. Though "Le Lac" ("The Lake") is probably the best-known poem in the volume, the opening text, "L'Isololement" ("Isolation") likewise epitomizes its plaintive tonality and illustrates the way in which the natural world cast an ambiguous spell over the poet:

Que me font ces vallons, ces palais, ces chaumières,
 Vains objets dont pour moi le charme est envolé?
 Fleuves, rochers, forêts, solitudes si chères,
 Un seul être vous manque, et tout est dépeuplé!

(These valleys, these palaces, these cottages, what are they to me?
 Vain objects whose charm for me has flown;
 Rivers, rocks, forests, solitudes so dear,
 One single being is missing and everything is empty!)

Elsewhere in the collection Lamartine meditates on religious and philosophical matters, giving voice to the thoughts and feelings of his generation. Yet even more than this first book or its sequel, the Nouvelles méditations poétiques [New Poetic Meditations] of 1823, the Harmonies poétiques et religieuses [Poetical and Religious Harmonies] of 1830 are generally recognized as Lamartine's masterpieces. The title of his work evokes almost perfectly the nature of the poems, where the recognition of both divine ubiquity and mankind's religious instinct finds expression in the mellifluous musicality of the verses. With a sense of awe and mystery Lamartine writes of "The idea of God"; with humility and wonder he composes "Eternité de la nature, brièveté de l'homme" ("Eternity of Nature, Brevity of Man"); influenced by Pascal, he conceives of "L'Infini dans les cieux" ("Infinity in the Heavens").

Having made his reputation as a lyric poet, Lamartine turned to the epic. Jocelyn was originally intended to form part of a greater work, but the subject-matter, the life and love of a humble priest, may have been more suitable for treatment in a different literary genre. The stature of the hero of La Chute d'un ange [The Fall of an Angel] was more obviously epic, but the style of the work too often bordered on the melodramatic. However, the structuring of the poem into "visions" was an imaginative solution to the problem of form.

When Lamartine turned his hand to prose, his first success came with his Souvenirs, impressions, pensées et paysages pendant un voyage en orient (Visit to the Holy Land), an impressionistic personal record, in the form of a diary, of a trip to the Near East three years earlier. In his foreword he made it clear that he was writing as a poet and a philosopher, and not as a historian or a geographer. From time to time he cannot resist the temptation to express his sentiments in verse, but many of his accounts, e.g. those of the peoples of Lebanon, are informative, and his editor gave the text a special poignancy by inserting after the evocation of Jerusalem the poem "Gethsémani," that Lamartine wrote to commemorate the death of his ten-year-old daughter Julia.

With the eight volumes of his Histoire des Girondins (History of the Girondists) he set out his stall as a historian, but although the work was a popular success it reads more like an historical novel with a very visual quality. There are inaccuracies, and the writer seems at times to seek to curry favour with contemporary voters. Other histories, of the Restoration, of the Constituent Assembly, of Russia, and of Turkey were to follow in the 1850s.

Immediately after the high point of his political career in 1849, Lamartine published Graziella, which fictionalized his affair in 1811 with a seductive Neapolitan girl. Also in 1849 he brought out another novel, Raphaël, which treated in a similar fashion his more famous love-affair with Julie Charles. With Geneviève, the story of a servant girl, Lamartine attempted to produce a social novel, but its realism was somewhat superficial, despite the author's evident sympathies with the ordinary people. His last attempt at fiction, Antoniella, again demonstrated his inability to come up with convincing plots.

Right at the start of his career Lamartine had tried to write for the theatre: he composed Saül in 1817, hoping—in vain—that Talma, the leading tragic actor of the day, would play the title role. Although Toussaint L'Ouverture was performed in 1850, its failure made him abandon thoughts of becoming a dramatist. The choice of subject, the Haitian national hero, was interesting, however, and may be related to Lamartine's freeing of the slaves in all French territories in 1848.

In an attempt to pay off his debts he published between 1856 and his death in 1869 the 28 volumes of the Cours familier de littérature, structured in the form of entretiens (conversations) of a very eclectic nature. Despite the title, the work was not confined to literature: Lamartine digressed to the other arts (considering Mozart, Michelangelo, and Cellini, for example), to religion (especially Hinduism), to science (Alexander Humboldt), and even personal reminiscences, in addition to his coverage of a wide range of writers throughout the ages.

It was within this context that Lamartine brought out his last two major poems, "Le Désert; ou, L'Immatérialité de Dieu" [The Desert; or, The Immateriality of God], 1856, and "La Vigne et la maison" [The Vine and the House], 1857. The former, heavily influenced by the Book of Job, emphasizes the importance of mystery in the relationship between man and the deity; "La Vigne et la Maison," a dialogue between the elderly poet and his soul, reveals how much he longed for happier days, but how the sight of well-loved places served only to remind him of the absence and the death of loved ones. The final address to God, however, brought the poet a kind of peace and he found his true voice once more, as a lyric poet, and one by which he should always be judged.

—Keith Aspley

LAMPEDUSA, Giuseppe Tomasi di

Also known as Duke of Palma and, from 1934, Prince of Lampedusa. Born: Palermo, Sicily, Italy, 23 December 1896. Education: Educated at Liceo-Ginnasio Garibaldi, Palermo, 1911–14; enrolled (but probably did not take classes) at University of Genoa, 1914–15; University of Rome, 1920. Military Service: Trained to be officer in Italian army, 1915–17; lance-corporal during World War I; taken prisoner, but succeeded in his second escape attempt, and found his way back to Italy in disguise; discharged from the army, 1920 (some sources give 1925). Family: Married Baroness Alessandra (Licy) von Wolff-Stomersee in 1932; one adopted son. Career: Largely withdrew from public life after the rise to power of Mussolini and the Fascists, and devoted himself to travelling and writing; contributor, Le Opere e i Giorni, Geneva, 1926–27. Awards: Strega prize (posthumously), 1959. Died: 23 July 1957.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

The Siren and Selected Writings, translated by Archibald Colquhoun, David Gilmour and Guido Waldman. 1995.

Fiction

Il Gattopardo. 1959; as The Leopard, translated by Archibald Colquhoun. 1960.

Racconti (includes "I luoghi della mia prima infanzia," "Il mattino di un mezzadro," "La gioia e la Legge, Lighea"). 1961; revised and enlarged edition, 1988; as Two Stories and a Memory (includes "Places of My Infancy," "The Professor and the Siren," "The Blind Kittens"), translated by Archibald Colquhoun, 1962, and with The Leopard, 1986.

Other

Lezioni su Stendhal (criticism). 1977.

Invito alle lettere francesi del Cinquecento (criticism). 1979.

Lettere a Licy: Un matrimonio epistolare (selected letters to his wife). 1987.

Letteratura inglese. Dalle origini al Settecento (criticism). 1990.

Letteratura inglese. L'Ottocento e il Novecento (criticism). 1991.

*

Critical Studies: "Lampedusa in Sicily: The Lair of the Leopard" by Archibald Colquhoun, in The Atlantic Extra, February 1963; Ricordo di Lampedusa by Francesco Orlando, 1963; "Lampedusa's The Leopard" by David Nolan, in Studies, Winter 1966; "Lampedusa and De Roberto" in Italica, 47 (2), 1970, and "Ants and Flags: Tomasi di Lampedusa's Gattopardo" in The Italianist, 13, 1993, both by Tom O'Neill; Invito alla lettura di Giuseppe Tomasi di Lampedusa by Giancarlo Buzzi, 1972, revised editions 1976 and 1984; Tomasi di Lampedusa by Simonetta Salvestroni, 1973; Il Gattopardo; I Racconti: Lampedusa by Giuseppe Paolo Samona, 1974; "Stendhal, Lampedusa and the Limits of Admiration" by W.J.S. Kirton, in Trivium, 10, 1975; "Stendhal, Tomasi di Lampedusa, and the Novel," by Olga Ragusa, in her Narrative and Drama: Essays in Modern Italian Literature from Verga to Pasolini, 1976; "The Risorgimento and Social Change: Reflections in the Sicilian Novel" by Christopher Cairns, in Trivium, 13, 1978; "The Structure of Meaning in Lampedusa's Il Gattopardo" by Richard H. Lansing, in Publications of the Modern Language Association, 93, 1978; "Tomasi di Lampedusa's Il Gattopardo: Figure and Temporality in an Historical Novel" by Gregory L. Lucente, in Modern Language Notes, 1978; Il Gattopardo o, la metafora decadente dell'esistenza by Maria Pagliara-Giacovazzo, 1983; I Gattopardi e le lene. Il messaggio inattuale di Tomasi di Lampedusa by Nunzio Zago, 1983; Sirene siciliane: L'anima esiliata in Lighea di Tomasi di Lampedusa by Basilio Reale, 1986; Giuseppe Tomasi di Lampedusa (biography) by Andrea Vitello, 1987; Giuseppe Tomasi di Lampedusa: La figura e l'opera (includes texts and bibliography) by Nunzio Zago, 1987; The Last Leopard: A Life of Giuseppe di Lampedusa by David Gilmour, 1988; "Nobility and Literature: Questions on Tomasi di Lampedusa" by Edoardo Saccone, in Modern Language Notes, 106(1), 1991; Tomasi di Lampedusa by Manuela Bertone, 1995.

* * *

With the exception of three brief articles which appeared in a monthly review in Genoa in 1926–27, Giuseppe Tomasi di Lampedusa's work, essentially concentrated into the final years of his life, was published posthumously. It consists of Il Gattopardo (The Leopard), his only full-length novel and the work on which his reputation substantially rests; Racconti (Two Stories and a Memory), including “I luoghi della mia prima infanzia” (“Places of My Infancy”), important for understanding the strong autobiographical thread running through the novel, and “La gioia e la Legge, Lighea” (The Professor and the Siren’), no less important for understanding his concern with death and immortality; Lezioni su Stendhal [Lessons on Stendhal], which, with hindsight, tell us much about his own aspirations as a writer (in theory if not in practice: Stendhal was to him a commendably “thin” writer, while he himself was “fat”); and Invito alle lettere francesi del Cinquecento [Introduction to 16th-Century French Literature], a series of “lectures” on French literature from Rabelais to Montaigne. In addition, there are two substantial volumes of “lectures” (Letteratura inglese) on English literature, from Beowulf to Lampedusa’s own days, all of which bear witness to the wide-ranging, exquisitely literary cast of a mind refined over a lifetime of aristocratic leisure.

Lampedusa’s original idea in The Leopard was to deal, in Joyce-like fashion (Ulysses serving as model), with 24 hours in the life of his great-grandfather at the time of Garibaldi’s landing at Marsala on 11 May 1860, which was to lead to the eventual unification of Italy under the House of Savoy. The time span of the novel, however, was extended well beyond its original 24 hours to May 1910, the 50th anniversary of the historic event. Given its extensive historical background most Italian critics assumed (not unreasonably) that the work was basically a historical novel, and not a very good one at that, since it essentially replicated Federico De Roberto’s late 19th-century novel, I vicere (The Viceroy). They assumed, moreover, a total identification between the novel’s protagonist, Don Fabrizio Salina, and its aristocratic author, attributing what they perceived as the novel’s arch-conservative and static vision of history to Lampedusa himself: in part one there is the enigmatic remark of Fabrizio’s nephew, Tancredi, as he is about to go off to join Garibaldi: “If we want things to stay as they are, things will have to change”; and, in part four, Fabrizio remarks to some English naval officers apropos Garibaldi’s volunteers: “They are coming to teach us good manners . . . But they won’t succeed, because we are gods.” What these early readers failed to appreciate was the novel’s irony, whereby the seemingly unchanged and unchanging surface nature of Sicilian society (“Thanks be to God, everything seems as usual,” thinks Fabrizio in part two, on his arrival at his summer residence of Donnafugata, after Garibaldi’s “revolution”) is undermined by a multiplicity of symbols in the text, clearly designed to undermine the immediate impression—the dismemberment of the fortress-like rum jelly in part one, for example, “rather threatening at first sight,” but in the end consisting only “of shattered walls and hunks of wobbly rubble”; or the observation at the ball, in part six, apropos its aristocratic guests, that “They thought themselves eternal; but a bomb manufactured in Pittsburgh, Penn., was to prove the contrary in 1943.”

The catapulting forward in time, from 1862 to 1943 (specifically to 5 April 1943, when Allied bombs substantially damaged Palazzo Lampedusa, the author’s own home since birth, as “Places of My Infancy” informs us), focuses on the importance of places rather than people in Lampedusa’s life and, indeed, his work (the numerous and often minute correspondences between “Places of My Infancy” and The Leopard have been traced by Daniel Devoto); and the importance given to places should provide caution against an excessively political reading of Fabrizio’s actions (or, more accurately, non-actions) in the novel. He is, perhaps not surprisingly, an astronomer, preferring the world of the stars to that of men, as he muses in part six, because “they were distant, they were omnipotent and at the same time they were docile to his calculations; just the contrary to humans, always too near, so weak and yet so quarrelsome.”

While much of the early fascination with the work derived from its author’s sense of place, its continuing fascination lies elsewhere, for “though he is dealing with a closed, dead society, though his knowledge is esoteric,” as David Nolan has observed, “the reader feels that there by the grace of Lampedusa, life has been described.” The range and variety of the novel’s “minor” characters confirms the truth of the observation—from Fabrizio’s hysterical wife, Stella, to his stubborn eldest daughter, Concetta; from his charming, politically trimming nephew, Tancredi, to the beautiful and sensual Angelica Sedara, destined through her marriage to Tancredi to bring about the new social order incarnated in her clearly mafioso father, Don Calogero.

But it is the novel’s protagonist, Don Fabrizio, who literally dominates from the outset (“the sudden movement of his huge frame made the floor tremble, and a glint of pride flashed in his light-blue eyes at this fleeting confirmation of his lordship over both humans and their works”). This physical presence, however, is all there is in reality, for the principal trait in his character is a deep-rooted need for peace and quiet, at any cost. The fine figure of a man is, deep down, a moral coward, and moreover one who is invariably misunderstood. In an emblematic moment in part three, the advice he gives to vote in favour of the Revolution is interpreted as being ironic by his listeners. Their self-congratulation at having penetrated his meaning casts a retrospective shadow over the accuracy of Fabrizio’s own interpretation of Tancredi’s earlier words in part one, and both events anticipate the moment in the novel’s final section when Concetta, too, is obliged to contemplate the possibility that misinterpretation of events, of words, 50 years earlier, stunted the rest of her life. The events of history blend with the private, politics gives way to psychology, and all are subsumed in the final question, “But was it the truth?,” which highlights Lampedusa’s concern with enigma and myth—the qualities which perhaps give the novel its enduring appeal.

—Tom O’Neill

LAO She

Also known as Shu Sheyu. Born: Shu Qingchun in Beijing, China, 3 February 1899. Education: Attended Beijing shifan xuexiao [Beijing Normal School], Beijing, 1913–18. Family: Married Hu Jieqing, 1931; one son and three daughters. Career: Appointed headmaster, Jingshi gongli dishiqi gaodeng xiaoxuexiao [Beijing 17th Public Elementary School], 1918–20; Supervisor, Beiqu quanxuesuo [Northern Educational Section], 1920–22; Baptized, 1922; Chinese Instructor, Nankai xuexiao zhongxuebu [Nankai Middle School], Tianjin, 1922–23; worked as a staff in Beijing jiaoyuhui [Beijing Education Society] and Chinese Instructor at Diyi zhongxue [First Middle School], Beijing, 1923–24; Chinese Lecturer, London University, 1924–29; joined Wenxue yanjiuhui [Literary Studies Association], 1926; Professor and Director, Qilu daxue guoxue yanjiusuo [Institute for Chinese Studies, Qilu University], Jinan, 1930–34; Professor, Shandong daxue [Shandong University], Qingdao, 1934–36; Member of the Executive Committee and Director, Zhonghua quanguo wenyijie kangdi xiehui [General Department, All China Association of Writers and Artists against Aggression] (renamed as Zhonghua quanguo wenyijie xiehui [All China Association of Writers and Artists]), 1945, 1938–46; visited the United States, 1947–49; elected Chairman, Beijing shi wenlian [Association of Beijing Writers and Artists], 1950; elected Vice Chairman, Zhongguo zuojia xiehui [Chinese Writers' Association], 1953; visited Korea during the Korean War, 1953–54. Awards: Renmin yishujia [People's Artist] medal, awarded by Beijing Municipal Government, 1951. Died: (suicide), 24 August 1966 in Beijing.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Lao She youmo shiwen ji. 1934.
Lao She chuanguo xuan. 1936.
Lao She xuanji. 1936.
Lao She xuanji. 1951.
Lao She wenji. 1981–91.

Fiction

Lao Zhang de zhexue. 1928.
Zhao Ziyue. 1928.
Maocheng ji. 1933; as City of Cats, translated by James E. Dew, 1964; as Cat Country, translated by William A. Lyell, 1970.
Lihun. 1933, as Divorce, translated by Evan King, 1948; as The Quest for Love of Lao Lee, translated by Helena Kuo, 1948.
Xiaopo de shengri. 1934.
Ganji. 1934.
Si wai. 1934.
Er Ma. 1935; as The Two Mas, translated by Kenny K. Huang & David Finkelstein, 1984; as Mr. Ma & Son: A Sojourn in London, translated by Julie Jimmerson, 1991.
Yinghai ji. 1935.
Gazao ji. 1936.
Niu Tianci zhuan. 1936, as Heavensent, translated by Xiong Deni, 1986.
Huoche ji. 1939.
Luotuo Xiangzi. 1939; as Rickshaw Boy, translated by Evan King, 1945; as Camel Xiangzi, translated by Shi Xiaoqing, 1981.
Wen boshi. 1940.
Huozang. 1944.
Pinxue ji. 1944.
Sishi tongtang. 1946.
Huanghuo. 1947.
Tousheng. 1947.
Wo zhe yibeizi. 1947.
Weishen ji. 1947.
Yueya ji. 1948; as Crescent Moon and Other Stories, 1985.
Wuming gaodi youle ming. 1955.
Lao She duanpian xiaoshuo xuan. 1956.
Yueyaer. 1959.
Jihuang. 1975.
Zheng hongqi xia. 1980; as Beneath the Red Banner, translated by Don J. Cohn, 1982.
Gushu yiren (translated back by Ma Xiaomi from the English translation of the original manuscript, which was lost). 1980; as The Drum Singers, translated by Helena Kuo, 1952.
Lao She xiaoshuo jiwaiji. 1982.

Prose

Fuxing ji. 1958.
Xiao huaduo ji. 1963.

Plays

Can wu. 1940.
Dadi longshe. 1942.
Guiqulai xi. 1943.
Guojia zhishang. 1943.
Shui xian daole Chongqing. 1943.
Zhang Zizhong. 1943.
Taoli chunfeng. 1943.
Mianzi wenti. 1945.
Lao She xiju ji. 1947.
Fang Zhenzhu. 1950.
Longxugou. 1951, as Dragon Beard Ditch, translated by Liao Hungying, 1956.
Xiaomie bingjun. 1952.
Qingnian tujidui. 1955.
Xiwang Changan. 1956.
Shiwu guan. 1956.
Chaguan. 1958, as Teahouse, translated by John Howard-Gibbon, 1980.
Hong dayuan. 1959.
Lao She juzuo xuan. 1959.
Nüdianyuan. 1959.
Qingxia danlei. 1959.
Quanxia fu. 1959.
Bao chuan. 1961.
He zhu pei. 1962.
Shenquan. 1963.

Verse

Lao She xinshi xuan. 1983.
Lao She juitishi jizhu. 2000.

Other

Laoniu poche. 1937.
Guo xinnian. 1951.
Guanyu xiangsheng xiezu. 1951.
He gongren tongzhi tan xiezu. 1952.
Wenxue yuyan wenti. 1955.
Guanyu yuyan guifanhua. 1956.
Shangren. 1958.
Chukou chengzhang. 1964.
Lao She lun chuanguo. 1980.
Lao She xiezu shengya. 1981.
Lao She quyiyi wenxuan. 1982.
Lao She shenghuo yu chuanguo zishu. 1982.

*

Bibliography: Lao She zhuyi bianmu by Zhang Guixing, 2000.

Critical Studies: Lao She and the Chinese Revolution by Ranbir Vohra, 1974; Lao She he ta de zuopin by Hu Jinquan, 1977; Two Writers and the Cultural Revolution: Lao She and Chen Jo-hsi edited by George Kao, 1980; Lao She de hua ju yi shu, edited by Ke Ying and Li Ying, 1982; Lao She yanjiu lunwen ji, edited by Meng Guanglai et al., 1983; Lao She zuopin zhong de Beijinghua ciyu lishi by Yang Yuxiu, 1984; Lao She yanjiu ziliao, edited by Wu Huaibin and Zeng Guangcan, 1985; “Split Consciousness: The Dialectic of Desire in Camel Xiangzi” by Stephen Chan, in Modern Chinese Literature, vol. 2, no. 2, 1986; Lao She juzuo yanjiu by Ran Yiqiao and Li Zhentong, 1988; Lao She yu Zhongguo wenhua guannian by Song Yongyi, 1988; “Lao She’s Wartime Fiction” by David Wang, in Modern Chinese Literature, vol. 5, no. 2, 1989; Meng Guanglai lunzhu ji: Lao She yanjiu, edited by Meng Dan, 1991; Fictional Realism in Twentieth-Century China: Mao Dun, Lao She, Shen Congwen by David Wang, 1992; Lao She de xiaoshuo shijie yu dongxifang wenhua by Wu Xiaomei and Wei Shaohua, 1992; Lao She de yishu shijie by Sun Junzheng, 1992; Lao She zai Lundun by Li Zhenjie, 1992; Lao She huaju de yishu shijie by Hong Zhonghuang, Ke Ying, 1993; Lao She lungao by Wang Huiyun et al, 1993; Lao She wenxue sixiang de shengcheng yu fazhan by Shi Xingze, 1993; Lao She yu Beijing wenhua by Gan Hailan, 1993; Lao She chuanguo lun by Zhang Huizhu, 1994; Lao She xiaoshuo yishu xinli yanjiu by Xie Zhaoxin, 1994; Lao She xiaoshuo xinlun by Wang Runhua, 1995; Lao She de yuyan yishu by Wang Jianhua, 1996; “Who is Yuan Ming? A Political Mystery in Lao She’s Camel Xiangxi” by Qiguang Zhang, in China Information, vol. 12, no. 3, Winter 1997–98; Lao She yu Jinan by Li Yaoxi and Zhou Chang feng, 1998; Lao She ziliao kaoshi by Zhang Guixing, 1998; Lao She xinlun by Wang Xiaoqin, 1999; Jianming Lao She cidian, edited by Shi Chengjun, 2000; Lao She wenxue cidian, edited by Shu Ji et al., 2000; Lao She xiaoshuo chuanguo bijiao yanjiu by Cheng Mei, 2000; Lao She yanjiu lunwen ji, edited by Li Runxin and Zhou Siyuan, 2000; Lao She yu dier guxiang by Zhang Guixing, 2000; Lao She yu ershi shiji, edited by Zeng Guangcan, 2000; Lao She ziliao kaoshi by Zhang Guixing, 2000; Lao She pingzhuan by Guan Jixin, 2001.

* * *

Lao She was one of the most prolific novelists, playwrights, and short story writers in 20th-century China. Generally considered a realist, Lao She wrote in a way more sophisticated than is categorized. His style, influenced by both western realism and Chinese vernacular fiction, often contains melodramatic and farcical elements at the same time.

Lao She’s first novel, Lao Zhang de zhexue [The Philosophy of Lao Zhang], excels in its grotesque and comic account of an urban villain and his vicious actions in a Dickensian manner. His art of buffoonery and burlesque develops in Zhao Ziyue, Er Ma (The Two Mas), and Lihun (Divorce), in which his satiric narratives are to be read as critiques of the “national character,” following the May Fourth tradition of social enlightenment. Benefited from his living experience in London, The Two Mas is one of the earliest in modern Chinese literature to examine the clashes between Chinese and Western cultures, a theme that continues in his later novels such as Wen boshi [Dr. Wen]. Unique among Lao She’s writings is his Maocheng ji (City of Cats), an allegorical novel whose exposé of avarice, ignorance, chaos and barbarity in the city of cats points, though indirectly, to the human world.

Luotuo Xiangzi (Rickshaw Boy) marks the peak of Lao She’s literary career. Often regarded as one of the literary masterpieces in the first half of the 20th century, the novel portrays how a physically sturdy and morally innocent rickshaw puller labors, suffers and degenerates in a world of rapid economic and social change. The theme of historical change is also developed in his epic trilogy Sishi tongtang [Four Generations under One Roof], including Huanghuo [Bewilderment], Tousheng [Ignoble Life], and Jihuang [Famine], which, spanning the whole Japanese occupation period, represents the life and struggle in a typical Chinese family facing national crisis.

Lao She’s short stories reflect his observations of various aspects of modern China, especially the dramatic moments against the background of social history. Duanhun qiang [Soul-Breaking Spear] features the marvel of traditional Chinese martial arts and laments its decline; in Yueyaer [Crescent], a lower-class girl is forced to become a prostitute and is sent to reformatory and finally prison; and Lao zihao [An Old and Established Name] shows a dismal picture of how old, disciplined mode of civilization is irretrievably replaced by the modern and somewhat flashy one.

Throughout his writing career Lao She expresses both love for, and critique of, Chinese society and culture. He is especially acclaimed for his skillful use of Beijing dialect, registering comical flavor in the specific cultural environment. His interest in folk culture also prompted his extensive writings of popular literature during the time of Japanese occupation and after the establishment of the People’s Republic.

Lao She began to use drama as a form of propaganda during the Anti-Japanese War period. Under the cultural policy of the People’s Republic, drama became again the major genre of Lao She’s writings. Modern plays such as Fang Zhenzhu and Longxugou (Dragon Beard Ditch) were intended to glorify the “new society” and denounce the old one by way of stage performance. Among Lao She’s most frequently performed and most celebrated plays is Chaguan (Teahouse), which chronicles the historical vicissitude of modern China by unfolding a series of incidents that take place in a teahouse throughout different historical moments.

Hailed as the “master of language” and “master of humor,” Lao She has a great influence on the later generations with his satirical power and sensitivity to living language. Many of his novels have been adapted into films and TV serials, which popularize his works decades after his tragic suicide.

—Xiaobin Yang

See the essay on Rickshaw Boy.

LAUTRÉAMONT, Comte de

Born: Isidore Lucien Ducasse in Montevideo, Uruguay, 4 April 1846. Education: Educated at Collège Imperial de Tarbes, France, 1859–63; Lycée de Pau, 1963–65. Career: Little is known of his life. Returned briefly to Montevideo, 1867; moved to Paris, 1867, where he was supported by a private income. Died: 24 November 1870.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

- Oeuvres complètes*, edited by Philippe Soupault. 1927.
Oeuvres complètes. 1938.
Les Chants de Lautréamont et oeuvres complètes. 1947.
Oeuvres complètes, edited by Alfred Jarry. 1953–1977.
Oeuvres complètes, edited by Maurice Saillet. 1963.
Oeuvres complètes, edited by Marguerite Bonnet. 1969.
Oeuvres complètes, edited by Pierre Olivier Walzer. 1970.
Oeuvres complètes, edited by Herbert Juin. 1970.
Oeuvres complètes, edited by Jean Marcel and Arpad Mezei. 1971.
Poésies and Complete Miscellanea, edited and translated by Alexis Lykiard. 1978.
Maldoror and the Complete Works of the Comte de Lautreamont, translated by Alexis Lykiard, 1994.

Verse

- Les Chants de Maldoror*. 1868–69; revised editions, 1874, 1980; edited by Jean Cocteau, 1963, and by Philippe Sellier, 1980; as The Lay of Maldoror, translated by John Rodker, 1924; also translated by Guy Wernham, 1943; Alexis Lykiard, 1970; Paul Knight, 1978.
Poésies I and II (published privately). 1870; edited by J.L. Steinmetz, 1990.
Préface à un livre futur. 1922.
Poésies, edited by Georges Goldfayn and Gérard Legrand. 1960.

*

Critical Studies: Lautréamont by Gaston Bachelard, 1939, enlarged edition, 1963; Lautréamont's Imagery: A Stylistic Approach by Peter Nesselroth, 1969; Isidore Ducasse, Comte de Lautréamont by François Caradec, 1970, revised edition, 1975; Vie de Lautréamont by Edouard Peyrouzet, 1970; Lectures de Lautréamont by M. Philip, 1971; Lautréamont et le style homérique by Lucienne Rochon, 1971; Lauréamont: The Violent Narcissus by Paul Zweig, 1972; Lautréamont and Les Chants de Maldoror by Alexander H.F. de Jonge, 1973; Lautréamont, du lieu commun à la parodie by Claude Bouché, 1974; Le Visage de Lautréamont: Isidore Ducasse à Tarbes et à Pau by Jacques Lefrère, 1977; Lautréamont et la cohérence de l'écriture: Études structurales des variantes du Chant premier des Chants de Maldoror by Jean Peytard, 1977; Lautréamont génie; ou, maladies mentale, suivie de Nouveau bilan psychopathologique by Jean Pierre Soulier, 1978; Lautréamont, le texte du vampire by J.M. Olivier, 1981; Lautréamont: Ethique à Maldoror by Michel Pierssens, 1984; La Guerre sainte, Lautréamont et Isidore Ducasse by Liliane Durant-Dessert, 2 vols., 1988; Lautréamont-Ducasse: Image, Theme and Self Identity by Robert Pickering, 1990; Isidore de Lautréamont by Sylvain-Christian David, 1991; Poetics of the Pretext: Reading Lautréamont by Roland-François Lack, 1998.

* * *

Le Comte de Lautréamont's two works, Les Chants de Maldoror (The Lay of Maldoror) and Poésies [Poems], were published in comparative obscurity and for three decades received only passing attention from very few, albeit important, men of letters (Gourmont, Bloy, Fargue, and Larbaud). However, beginning in the 1920s, these texts were to provide the inspiration for a number of French avant-garde movements, from the Surrealists to the Tel Quel group of the 1960s, and were to be an object of study for some of the most original and influential French critics, including Edmond Jaloux, Roger Caillois, Gaston Bachelard, Maurice Blanchot, and Julia Kristève. As André Gide wrote in 1925, "[Lautréamont's] influence in the 19th century was nil; but . . . he has opened the flood-gates for the literature of tomorrow." Apart from the themes of iconoclasm and revolt evident in The Lay of Maldoror, both the works pose profound questions concerning the status of authorship, the meaning of a text, and the reception and influence of a literary work.

Far longer than the Poésies, The Lay of Maldoror reads like a parody-cum-apotheosis of all the early 19th-century literature of Romantic revolt and Gothic macabre. The hero, Maldoror, narrates or is shown in a series of scenes in which he battles with his arch-enemy God, torments a humanity he despises, and engages in acts as contrary to nature as possible. Often the latter are so much more original and extreme than anything in Romantic literature that all idea of subservience to a model is surpassed. In the second "Song," for example, Maldoror dives into the ocean to help a female shark fight off rival members of her own species; the scene concludes with Maldoror copulating with the creature in the midst of a raging tempest.

While outstripping the most "frenetic" aspects of Romanticism, the episode is indicative of a more profound theme. It begins with the words, "I sought a soul that might resemble mine, and I could not find it." The central character displays a very human need for companionship, but is able only to destroy and mutilate the human objects of his affection. Instead his need is perversely satisfied more often than not among supposedly lower forms of life. The Lay of Maldoror is filled with toads, snakes, leeches, lice, and all manner of insects, and Maldoror himself is not afraid to engage in or to extol metamorphosis into other members of the animal kingdom. He becomes, in Bachelard's coinage, a "superanimal" able to adopt the forms and aggressive energy of a natural world that is closer to the Marquis de Sade or to Darwin than to the Romantic sublime. The old hierarchy of creation, from beast to man to God, is turned upside down. The deity is reviled and mankind humiliated in the name of a revolt that rejoices in its own protean inventiveness.

The Romantic sources do not make The Lay of Maldoror any easier to classify from the point of view of genre. The text is written in prose and sometimes recalls the Gothic romance à la Maturin (the author of Melmoth the Wanderer is mentioned in the Poésies), or the serial novel of fantastic or criminal adventures as exemplified in France by Sue, Féval, and Ponson du Terrail (the final "Song," in which Maldoror murders a Parisian adolescent, is very reminiscent of the 19th-century crime novel). Yet for all that, Lautréamont's prose is highly poetic. The sentences are frequently very long, sinuous, and rhapsodic, often borrowing the lofty diction of verse and launching into grandiloquent apostrophe. At the same time the discourse frequently refers to itself or is self-mocking. The result is an absolutely unique tone, managing to combine the sublime seriousness of Romanticism with a grotesque form of parodic humour, which looks forward to French modernism of the following century. A particular feature of Lautréamont's style is the use of unsettling metaphors, and this was to be a prime attraction for the Surrealists, always fond of quoting, "He is fair . . . above all, as the chance meeting on a dissecting-table of a sewing-machine and an umbrella."

In fact, despite the use of prose, the most explicit generic model is a poetic one. The structure of the work echoes the Roman verse epic, as practised by the likes of Lamartine and Quinet, which recounted the cosmic deeds of an angel or hero in a series of cantos. Laútréamont's work does just this for Maldoror in the set of six "Songs." Yet beyond Romanticism lies the epic itself as a genre, from Homer to Dante and Milton, and the reader of The Lay of Maldoror seems to find multiple reminiscences working concurrently from a vast array of literary texts. Whether these are conscious sources or unconscious recreations, it is as though this one book called into play many others, and Blanchot has gone so far as to speak of a collective and impersonal level of literature. Yet The Lay of Maldoror simultaneously calls into question the notion and practices of literature itself. They mock and parody not only literary styles, but also narrative and descriptive devices, drawing attention to the tacit contract between the writer and the reader whereby the latter agrees to try and believe what the former strains to fabricate for him. The book opens with a warning only to carry on if one is equal to the work's ferocious savagery, while towards the end Laútréamont has the reader say, "One must give him his due. He has considerably cretinized me" (6th "Song"). At various points on the way the narrator/Maldoror talks of his struggle to write (at one point being struck by a thunderbolt in a vain attempt on God's part to prevent the writing of so blasphemous a work), of how far one can believe either supposedly real phenomena or words, and of the likely acceptability of his style to the reader. It is in this self-consciousness of literary processes and of the power and treacherousness of language that Laútréamont's revolutionary qualities lie.

The other work, Poésies, is entirely different in nature. It consists of two instalments of manifesto-like declarations about literature and morality that denounce explicitly the Romantic poetry of Satanic revolt and macabre exaggeration embodied by The Lay of Maldoror. Yet a connection remains, for his work proposes a new form of creation based on rewriting or rearranging the words of others, much of Poésies II being a series of aphorisms from the French 17th-century moralists turned inside out. Here, as in the The Lay of Maldoror, Laútréamont shows a modernist awareness of language and literature as vast systems over which individuals do not have the degree of control they believe they have, but which can be exploited as systems to transcend the limited notions of logic and of individual consciousness that had hitherto prevailed.

—J.R. Stubbs

LAXNESS, Halldór (Kiljan)

Born: Halldór Gujónsson in Reykjavík, Iceland, 23 April 1902. Education: Educated at a grammar school, Reykjavík; lived in Benedictine monastery, Luxembourg; Jesuit school, Champion House, Osterley, England, 1923–24. Family: Married 1) Ingibjörg Einarsdóttir in 1930, one son; 2) Auur Sveinsdóttir in 1945, two daughters. Career: Lived in Europe, from 1919, then in the United States, 1927–29, and in Iceland from 1930. Awards: International Peace Movement prize, 1953; Nobel prize for literature, 1955; Sonning prize, 1969. Honorary degrees: Aabo University, 1968; University of Iceland, 1972; Eberhaar-Karls University, Tübingen, 1982. Honorary member, Union of Icelandic Artists. Died: 8 February 1998, near Reykjavík, Iceland.

PUBLICATIONS

Fiction

- Barn náttúrunnar* [Child of Nature]. 1919.
Nokkrar sögur [Several Stories]. 1923.
Undir Helgahnúk [Under the Holy Mountain]. 1924.
Vefarinn mikli frá Kasmír [The Great Weaver from Kashmir]. 1927.
Salka Valka (þu vinnviður hreini, Fuglinn í fjörunni). 2 vols., 1931–32; as Salka Valka, translated by F.H. Lyon, 1936; revised edition, 1963.
Fótatak manna [Footsteps of Men]. 1933.
Sjálfstætt fólk. 2 vols., 1934–35; as Independent People, translated by J.A. Thompson, 1945.
Þórður gamli halti [Old Þórður the Lame]. 1935.
Heimsljós. 2 vols., 1955; as World Light, translated by Magnus Magnusson, 1969.
 1. Ljós heimsins [The Light of the World]. 1937.
 2. Höll sumarlandsins [The Palace of the Summerland]. 1938.
 3. Hús skáldsins [The Poet's House]. 1939.
 4. Fegurð himinsins [The Beauty of the Sky]. 1940.
Gerska æfintýri [The Russian Adventure]. 1938.
Sjö töframenn [Seven Magicians]. 1942.
 Trilogy:
 1. Íslandsklukkan [Iceland's Bell]. 1943.
 2. Hið ljósa man [The Bright Maiden]. 1944.
 3. Eldur í Kaupinhafn [Fire in Copenhagen]. 1946.
Atómstöðin. 1948; as The Atom Station, translated by Magnus Magnusson, 1961.
Gerpla. 1952; as The Happy Warriors, translated by Katherine John, 1958.
Brekkukotsannáll. 1957; as The Fish Can Sing, translated by Magnus Magnusson, 1966.
Ungfrúin góða og Husi [The Honour of the House]. 1959.
Paradisarheimt. 1960; as Paradise Reclaimed, translated by Magnus Magnusson, 1962.
Sjöstafakverið. 1964; as A Quire of Seven, translated by Alan Boucher, 1974.
Kristnihald undir Jökli. 1968; translated as Christianity at the Glacier, 1972.
Guðsgjafapula [A Narration of God's Gifts]. 1972.
Seiseijú, mikil ósköp [Oh Yes! By Jove]. 1977.
Dagar hjá múnkum [Day Spent with Monks]. 1987.

Plays

- Straumrof* [Short Circuit]. 1934.
Snaefriður Íslandssól [Snaefriður, Iceland's Sun]. 1950.
Silfurtúnglið [The Silver Moon]. 1954.
Strompleikurinn [The Chimney Play]. 1961.
Þrjónastofan Sólin [The Sun Knitting Works]. 1962.
Dúfnaveislan. 1966; as The Pigeon Banquet, translated by Alan Boucher, 1973.
Úa. 1970.
Norðanstulkan [The Girl from the North]. 1972.

Verse

- Kvaeðakver* [A Sheaf of Poems]. 1930.

Other

- Kaþólsk viðhorf* [Catholic Views]. 1925.
Althýðubókin [The Book of the Plain People]. 1929.
Í austurvegi [On the Eastern Road]. 1933.
Dagleið á fjöllum: greinar [Day's Journey in the Mountains]. 1937.
Vettvangur dagsins [Forum of the Day]. 1942.
Sjálfsagðir hlutir [Things Taken for Granted]. 1946.
Reisubókarkorn [A Little Travel Book]. 1950.
Heiman eg fór [I Left Home]. 1952.
Dagur í senn [A Day at a Time]. 1955.
Gjörningabók [Miscellany]. 1959.
Skáldatími [Poets' Time]. 1963.
Upphaf mannúarstefnu [The Origin of Humanism]. 1965.
Íslendíngaspjall [Talk of Icelanders]. 1967.
Vinlandspúnktar [Vineland Notes]. 1969.
Innansveitarkronika [A Parish Chronicle]. 1970.
Yfirskygir staðir [Overshadowed Places]. 1971.
Þjóðhátíðarrolla [Book of National Celebration]. 1974.
Í túninu heima [In the Hayfields of Home]. 1975.
Úngur eg var [Young I Was]. 1976.
Sjömeistarasagan [The Story of the Seven Masters]. 1978.
Grikklandsári [The Year in Greece]. 1980.
Við heygarshornið. 1981.
N. Tryggvadóttir: Serenity and Power, with Hrafnhildur Schram. 1982.
Og árin líða [And the Years Pass]. 1984.
Af menningarástandi [On the Cultural Situation]. 1986.
Sagan af brauði nu dýra/The Bread of Life, translated by Magnus Magnusson. 1987.
Editor, Grettissaga [The Saga of Grettir the Strong]. 1946.
Editor, Laxdæla saga [The Laxdalers' Saga]. 1973.
Translator, Aðventa [Advent], by Gunnar Gunnarsson. 1939.
Translator, Alexandreis; það, Er Alexanders saga mikla [Alexandreis; That Is, the Saga of Alexander the Great]. 1945.
Also translator of A Farewell to Arms and A Moveable Feast by Hemingway and Candide by Voltaire.

*

Bibliography: by Haraldur Sigurðsson, in Landsbókasafn Íslands: Árbok, 1971, and in Skirnir 146, 1972; "Halldór Laxness and America: A Bibliography" by Fred R. Jacobs, in The Serif, 10(4), 1973.

Critical Studies: Den store vävaren, 1954, Skaldens hus, 1956, Halldór Laxness, 1971, and "Halldór Laxness and the Icelandic Sagas," in Leeds Studies in English, 13, 1982, all by Peter Hallberg; "Halldór Kiljan Laxness" by Lawrence S. Thompson, in Books Abroad, 28, 1954; "Halldór Kiljan Laxness: Iceland's First Nobel Prize Winner," in American-Scandinavian Review, 44, 1956, and "The World of Halldór Laxness," in World Literature Today, 6(33), 1992, both by Sigurur A. Magnússon; "Christianity on the Slopes of the Glacier" by Richard N. Ringler, in Books Abroad, 44, 1970; Laxness issue of Scandinavica, 11(2), 1972; "Beyond The Atom Station" by Hermann Pálsson, in Ideas and Ideologies, 1975; "Halldór Kiljan Laxness and the Modern Scottish Novel: Some Sociolinguistic Parallels" by Harry D. Watson, in Scandinavica, 21(2), 1982; "Eldorado and the Garden in Laxness' Paradisarheimt" by George S. Tate, in Scripta Islandica, 36, 1985; "The Quintessence in the Novels of Halldór Laxness" by Wilhelm Friese, in Skandivistik, 16(2), 1986; Halldór Laxness die Romane: Ein Einführung by Wilhelm Friese, 1995; Moskvulínan: Kommúnistaflokkur Íslands og Komintern, Halldó Laxness og Sovétríkin by Arnór Hannibalsson, 1999.

* * *

Halldór Laxness made his breakthrough in 1927 with the novel Vefarinn mikli frá Kasmír [The Great Weaver from Kashmir]. It is a conversion novel, inspired by the spirit, if not the facts, of Laxness's own conversion to Roman Catholicism. It confronts a baffling number of conflicting views of the world, and makes clear that in turning to religion, Stein Ellidi is renouncing human claims. Thus it represents an important element in Laxness's work: the problem of the individual vis-à-vis a monolithic authority, the claims of the individual conscience as opposed to the conformative nature of the major ideologies.

Laxness subsequently spent a period in America where under the influence of Upton Sinclair and Sinclair Lewis he developed a sense of social injustice and became a Communist. One result was the major novel Salka Valka, concerning the establishment of a trade union in a fishing village and its effect on the environment, and in particular on Salka Valka herself. Social novels continued with Sjálfstætt fólk (Independent People), portraying the individualist peasant who believes he is free but is in fact being exploited by society, and Heimsljós (World Light), about a visionary pauper persecuted by his peers.

In 1943–46 Laxness turned to the historical novel, beginning with Íslandsklukkan [Iceland's Bell], about Jón Hreggvidsson's battle with the authorities. Unjustly condemned to death, he pursues a prolonged and ultimately successful struggle against bureaucracy. There are distinct national overtones, but also a poetical element centred on the main female character. The novel can be seen as a glorification of the Icelandic character, but it also represents the individual confronted with an impersonal bureaucracy. Similar ideas are found in Atómstöðin (The Atom Station) and Gerpla (The Happy Warriors).

The national theme, though with universal overtones, appears in Paradisarheimt (Paradise Reclaimed), about a poor Icelandic farmer tempted by a Mormon bishop to emigrate to the earthly paradise of Salt Lake City. In a touching, but sometimes biting satirical novel, Steinar experiences the unswerving faith of an ideology, but fails to accept it fully himself, and he returns to his home in Iceland, his paradise.

Laxness then moved from the long epic to the more concentrated, pithy novel, closely related to the plays with which he also experimented. Outstanding is Kristnihald undir Jökli (Christianity at the Glacier), a humorous but nevertheless serious and philosophical novel about a bishop who sends an assistant to examine the state of Christianity in an outlying village. The result, when he finds a priest who cannot be bothered to bury the dead, preferring to shoe horses and offer his congregation practical help, a doctor who has given up a brilliant career to study the skies, and a pastor's wife who has been both nun and prostitute, is a picture of humankind in all its diversity.

In portraying the individual's confrontation with societies and ideologies, Laxness constantly takes the side of the individual. He examines both Catholicism and communism, but ultimately it is probably Taoism, with its demand for tolerance and humanity, that attracts him most. He weds his philosophical considerations to his intense national feeling and gives the two a universal significance.

—W. Glyn Jones

LENZ, Jakob Michael Reinhold

Born: Sesswegen, Russian Baltic Province of Livonia, 23 January 1751. Family moved to Dorpat (now Tartu), Estonia, 1759. Education: Educated at Latin grammar school, Dorpat; University of Königsberg, studied theology, 1768–71. Career: Tutor to the Kleist brothers in Strasbourg, 1771; entered literary circles, meeting Goethe, Salzmann, and others; freelance writer from 1774, supplementing income with tuition; co-founder, Deutsche Gesellschaft [German Society], Strasbourg, 1775, and contributor to its journal, Der Bürgerfreund [The Citizens' Friend]; travelled throughout Germany and Switzerland, 1776–77; suffered first bout of mental illness, 1777; first suicide attempt, 1778; taken by his brother to Riga, 1779; travelled to St. Petersburg, 1780, attempt to become teacher and soldier failed, and to Moscow, 1781, held a number of positions as tutor; mental health deteriorated seriously during the 1780s. Died: 4 June 1792.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Dramatischer Nachlass, edited by Karl Weinhold. 1884.
Werke und Schriften, edited by Britta Titel and Hellmut Haug. 2 vols., 1966–67.
Werke und Schriften, edited by Richard Daunicht. 1967.
Gedichte, edited by Helmut Haug. 1968.
Werke und Briefe, edited by Sigrid Damm. 3 vols., 1987.
Werke, edited by Karen Lauer. 1992.

Plays

Der Hofmeister; oder, Die Vorteile der Privaterziehung (produced 1778). 1774; edited by Michael Kohlenbach, 1986; as The Tutor, translated by William E. Yuill, with The Soldiers, 1972; also translated and adapted by Pip Broughton, 1988; Anthony Meech, in Three Plays, 1993.
Lustspiele nach dem Plautus (adaptations from Plautus; includes Das Väterchen; Die Aussteuer; Die Entführungen; Die Buhlschwester; Die Türkensklavin; Die beiden Alten). 1774.
Amor vincit omnia, from Love's Labours Lost by Shakespeare. With Anmerkungen übers Theater, 1774.
Der neue Menoza; oder, Die Geschichte des cubanischen Prinzen Tandi. 1774; as The New Menoza, translated by Meredith Oakes, in Three Plays, 1993; as Prince Tandi of Cumba, Or, The New Mendoza, adapted by Theresa Heskins, 1995.
Pandämonium Germanicum. 1775.
Die Soldaten (produced 1863). 1776; as The Soldiers, translated by William E. Yuill, with The Tutor, 1972; also translated by Robert David MacDonald, in Three Plays, 1993.
Die Freunde machen den Philosophen. 1776.
Der Engländer. 1777.
Die Sizilianische Vesper. In Liefländisches Magazin der Lektüre, 1782.
Myrsa Polagi; oder, Die Irrgärten. In Liefländisches Magazin der Lektüre, 1782.
Tantalus. 1798.

Leopold Wagner, Verfasser des Schauspiels von neuen Monaten im Walfischbauch; oder, Eine Matinee. 1828.
Der verwundete Bräutigam, edited by K.L. Blum. 1845.
Three Plays (includes The Soldiers; The New Menoza; The Tutor). 1993.

Verse

Die Landplagen. 1769.
Der Herr Professor Kant. 1770.
Petrarch. 1776.

Fiction

Der Landprediger. 1777.
Der Waldbruder (fragment). 1797; edited by Max von Waldberg, 1882.
Zerbin; oder, Die neuere Philosophie, edited by Alfred Gerz. 1943.

Other

Anmerkungen übers Theater. With Amor vincit omnia, 1774.
Tagebuch. In Deutsche Rundschau, 11, 1877; in book form, in Werke und Briefe, 1987.
Briefe von und an J.M.R. Lenz, edited by Karl Freye and Wolfgang Stammler. 2 vols., 1918.

*

Critical Studies: J.M.R. Lenz: Moralist und Aufklärer by R. Ottomar, 1969; "Lenz's Hofmeister and the Drama of Storm and Stress" by M.A. Brown, in Periods in German Literature, 2: Texts and Contexts, 1970; "Structural Unity in J.M.R. Lenz's Der Hofmeister: A Revaluation" by Edward P. Harris, in Seminar, (8), 1972; Epische Elemente in Jakob Michael Reinhold Lenzens Drama "Der Hofmeister" by Ford B. Parkes, 1973; "Language and Politics: The Patriotic Endeavours of J.M.R. Lenz" by Allan Blunden, in Deutsche Vierteljahresschrift für Literatur und Geschichte, (49), 1975; J.M.R. Lenz: The Renunciation of Heroism by John Osborne, 1975; J.M.R. Lenz in Selbstzeugnissen und Bilddokumenten by C. Hohoff, 1977; "Character and Paradox in Lenz's Der Hofmeister" by Michael Butler, in German Life and Letters, (32), 1979; Lenz: "Der Hofmeister"; "Die Soldaten"; mit Brechts "Hofmeister" Bearbeitung und Materialien by Herbert Haffner, 1979; Shakespeare in Deutschland: Der Fall Lenz by Eva Maria Inbar, 1982; Lenz and Büchner: Studies in Dramatic Form by John D. Guthrie, 1984; Dasein und Realität: Theorie und Praxis des Realismus bei J.M.R. Lenz by H.G. Schwarz, 1985; Vögel, die verkünden Land: Das Leben des Jakob Michael Reinhold Lenz by Sigrid Damm, 1986; Jakob Michael Reinhold Lenz: "Der Hofmeister oder Vorteile der Privaterziehung": Erläuterungen und Dokumente edited by Friedrich Voit, 1986; "Irrtum als dramatische Sprachfigur. Sozialfall und Erziehungsdebatte in J.M.R. Lenzens Hofmeister" by Klaus Bohnen, 1987; "A Question of Norms: The Stage Reception of Lenz's Der Hofmeister" by Helga Madland, 1987; J.M.R. Lenz by Hans-Gerd Winter, 1987; "Das Politische" in Die Soldaten by David Hill, 1988; Lenz Jahrbuch edited by M. Luserke and Christoph Weiss, 1991; A Critique of Lenz's Art of Scenic Variation by Edward Batley, 1993; Space to Act: The Theater of J.M.R. Lenz by Alan C. Leidner and Helga S. Madland, 1994; Image and Text: J.M.R. Lenz by Helga Stipa Madland, 1994; Unpopular Virtues: The Critical Reception of J.M.R. Lenz by Alan C. Leidner and Karin A. Wurst, 1999.

* * *

Jakob Michael Reinhold Lenz was a writer of considerable talent whose major output coincided with that short but explosive period of German literature dubbed the Sturm und Drang (Storm and Stress). This pre-Revolutionary movement, expounding the Encyclopaedists' ideals of equality, liberty, and fraternity, as well as individual writers within it, exerted a profound influence on European literature, principally German Romanticism, Realism, Junges Deutschland, Naturalism, Expressionism, and Modernism. It laid the foundations for the development of German social drama, bourgeois and working-class, by writers such as Georg Büchner, Gerhart Hauptmann, Frank Wedekind, and Bertold Brecht. The style and content of Büchner's theatre reflects Lenz's innovative approach to the medium, while Büchner's unique psycho-analytical Novelle was inspired by Lenz's mental illness, his name providing its title. Brecht revived interest in Lenz with his Berlin adaptation and production of Der Hofmeister (The Tutor) in 1950 and Rolf Hochhuth's preface to his documentary play on Churchill and the bombing of Dresden, Soldaten (Soldiers) of 1967 acknowledged his indebtedness to Lenz's play of the same title. Modern German opera from Alban Berg to Bernd Alois Zimmermann showed itself particularly appreciative of his unique theatrical style and visual appeal.

However, Lenz's seminal influence generally has long been undervalued, principally for two reasons. First, his productive years were restricted almost without exception to the 1770s, while the talent which outlasted, outlived, and outshone him, Goethe, not only abandoned his former friend after his departure from Court but also caricatured him unappreciatively in his own autobiography, Aus meinem Leben: Dichtung und Wahrheit [Poetry and Truth]. Second, partly inspired by the older Goethe's rather jaundiced view of the period, the Sturm und Drang came to be looked on, and written off as, a period of literary excess, indulgence, and adolescence, despite the younger Goethe having been its leading light. Recent scholarship has begun the process of evaluating Lenz's works independently of the shadow which Goethe cast upon them.

In the short productive span allotted to him, Lenz wrote poetry, essays, short prose works, novels, and plays. His remarkable gift was that of being able to assimilate a wide variety of styles, from the classical and neo-classical to the popular folk traditions, and to mould them together organically. Lenz's poetry shows these characteristics too, a neo-classical and classical inheritance bound up with an ability to use language to evoke mood in a way which prefigures German Romantic poetry. Its innovative forms apart, his poetry is in this sense untypical of the Sturm und Drang. Lenz's poetry, essays, and prose writing are not as widely known or researched as his plays, although, with three international conferences devoted to him in 1992, 200 years after his death, these expressions of his literary activity are now being reassessed. Der Waldbruder [The Forest Hermit], a conscious pendant to Goethe's novel The Sufferings of Young Werther, satirizes his own romantic self-indulgence. Zerbin; oder, Die neuere Philosophie [Zerbin, or The Modern Philosophy] converts its hero to the "modern philosophy" of exploiting others for personal advantage, until Marie's execution, out of unswerving loyalty to him, leads Zerbin to despair and suicide. Der Landprediger [The Country Vicar], told with gentler irony, relates the story of Father Oberlin of Waldersbach, who helps members of the local farming community find salvation not in learning the catechism by rote but in reflecting on the activity of their daily lives. The vicar's method of teaching the "best way of watering meadows" is the truly Christian way to salvation.

Lenz's style of theatre is occasionally offensive: penetratingly critical of human behaviour as of society, its naturalism is as daring as Hauptmann's and its proposals for reform more tangible than Brecht's. Shot through with irony, parody, and stark realism, Lenz's work reflects his utter sincerity. He presents audiences and reading public alike not only with incisive criticisms of contemporary German society, its hypocrisy, class-consciousness, aping of French manners, snobbery, pretentiousness, indulgent sexuality, foibles, wickedness, cruelty, and weakness, but also with practical proposals for reform. He takes up issues treated in his own dramatic dialogue in serious reformatory essays. In "Die Soldatenehen" [On Soldiers Marrying] he presents persuasive spiritual, moral, economic, military, and political arguments in favour of allowing soldiers to marry, having first given the subject a public airing on the stage in his Die Soldaten (The Soldiers). Several plays remained unfinished, and some were never performed in his own lifetime. His sketch of Pandämonium Germanicum [The Hall of German Heroes] reflects his adulation of Goethe, his criticism of imitators, journalists, and philistines, a playful attitude towards other contemporary writers such as Wieland, Uz, Gellert, Gleim, Rabener, Lessing, and Heder, and a teasingly self-deprecating view of himself.

He is best known for three plays. The Tutor depicts quite uninhibitedly the wretchedness caused when a spoilt and lonely young woman is given private lessons, in her own room, by a family tutor who has no sense of purpose or vocation. The educational issue of family tuition in the home versus community education in the village school is hotly debated and also provides the central and unifying theme of a complex play which, although it contains seduction, attempted suicide, and castration, ends happily for most of the cast. Der neue Menoza (The New Menoza), a parody of the traditional comedy of revealed identities, has the sibling relationship between Prince Tandy and Wilhelmina disclosed to them only after they are married to each other, but baby swapping is finally identified as the original cause of this misinformation.

The Soldiers, set in and around Lille, depicts how a foolish and irresistibly attractive shopkeeper's daughter Marie becomes disloyal to her fiancé, involved with one officer after another before being attracted to a young Count. Although the Countess tries to reform her, Marie's degradation continues until, stripped of all the trappings of middle-class civilization, she and her father roll on the ground wrapped in each other's arms, ecstatic at being together again, and embodying for a moment the elemental society envisioned by Rousseau, one of the several writers who profoundly influenced Lenz. Lenz's translations of the comedies of Plautus and of plays by Shakespeare nourished his own Anmerkungen übers Theater [Notes on the Theatre] and his essays on Hamlet and on scene change in Shakespeare, but they are also reflected in his wholesale non-conformist yet organic style of theatre. Rejecting the barrenness of the neoclassical conventions of the unities of action, place, and time, Lenz developed a composite form of artistry which moulded together in one major unifying theme the characters and types he had created, the theatrical situations in which they found themselves, and the setting and sequencing of scenes: education in The Tutor the hypocrisy of middle-class German society in The New Menoza, and the question of whether soldiers should be allowed to marry in The Soldiers. It is in the theatre above all that Lenz's artistic genius, drawn from his concept of Anschauung (seeing and reflecting), is acknowledged today, but there is a renaissance of interest in his poetry, prose writing, and reformist zeal which gives promise of far more comprehensive appreciation of this unique writer.

—Edward Batley

See the essay on The Tutor.

LENZ, Siegfried

Born: Lyck, East Prussia (now Elk, Poland), 17 March 1926. Education: Educated at the University of Hamburg, 1945–48. Military Service: Served in the navy during World War II. Family: Married Lieselotte Lenz in 1949. Career: Reporter, 1948–50, and editor, 1950–51, Die Welt newspaper, Hamburg; since 1951 freelance writer; visiting lecturer, University of Houston, Texas, 1969; campaign speaker for Social Democratic party, from 1965. Lives in Hamburg, Germany. Awards: Schickele prize, 1952; Lessing prize, 1953; Hauptmann prize, 1961; Mackensen prize, 1962; Schickele prize, 1962; City of Bremen prize, 1962; State of North Rhine-Westphalia arts prize, 1966; Gryphius prize, 1979; German Free Masons prize, 1979; Thomas Mann prize, 1984; Raabe prize, 1987; Federal Booksellers peace prize, 1988; Galinsky Foundation prize, 1989. Honorary doctorate: University of Hamburg, 1976. Member: Gruppe 47.

PUBLICATIONS

Fiction

Es waren Habichte in der Luft. 1951.
Duell mit dem Schatten. 1953.
So zärtlich war Suleyken (stories). 1955.
Der Mann im Strom. 1957.
Dasselbe. 1957.
Jäger des Spotts. 1958; as Jäger des Spotts, und andere Erzählungen, edited by Robert H. Spaethling, 1965.
Brot und Spiele. 1959.
Das Feuerschiff (stories). 1960; title story as The Lightship, translated by Michael Bullock, 1962.
Das Wunder von Striegeldorf: Geschichten. 1961.
Stimmungen der See. 1962.
Stadtgespräch, adapted from his play Zeit der Schuldlosen. 1963; as The Survivor, translated by Michael Bullock, 1965.
Der Hafen ist voller Geheimnisse: Ein Feature in Erzählungen und zwei masurische Geschichten. 1963.
Lehmans Erzählungen; oder, So schön war mein Markt: Aus den Bekenntnissen eines Schwarzhändlers. 1964.
Der Spielverderber. 1965.
Begegnung mit Tieren, with Hans Bender and Werner Bergengruen. 1966.
Das Wrack, and Other Stories, edited by C.A.H. Russ. 1967.
Die Festung und andere Novellen. 1968.

Deutschstunde. 1968; as The German Lesson, translated by Ernst Kaiser and Eithne Wilkins, 1971.
Hamilkar Schass aus Suleyken. 1970.
Lukas, sanftmütiger Knecht. 1970.
Gesammelte Erzählungen. 1970.
So war es mit dem Zirkus: Fünf Geschichten aus Suleyken (stories). 1971.
Erzählungen. 1972.
Meistererzählungen. 1972.
Ein Haus aus lauter Liebe. 1973.
Das Vorbild. 1973; as An Exemplary Life, translated by Douglas Parmée, 1976.
Der Geist der Mirabelle: Geschichten aus Bollerup. 1975.
Einstein überquert die Elbe bei Hamburg. 1975.
Die Kunstradfahrer und andere Geschichten. 1976.
Heimattmuseum. 1978; as The Heritage, translated by Krishna Winston, 1981.
Der Verlust. 1981; as The Breakdown, translated by Ralph R. Read, 1986.
Der Anfang von etwas. 1981.
Ein Kriegsende. 1984.
Exerzierplatz. 1985; as Training Ground, translated by Geoffrey Skelton, 1991.
Der Verzicht. 1985.
Die Erzählungen: 1949–1984. 3 vols., 1986.
Das serbische Mädchen. 1987.
Geschichten ut Bollerup. 1987.
Motivsuche. 1988.
Selected Stories, edited and translated by Breon Mitchell. 1989.
Die Klangprobe. 1990.

Plays

Das schönste Fest der Welt (radio play). 1956.
Zeit der Schuldlosen; Zeit der Schuldigen (radio play). 1961; stage adaptation (in German), 1966.
Das Gesicht: Komödie (produced 1964). 1964.
Haussuchung (radio play), 1967.
Die Augenbinde; Schauspiel; Nicht alle Förster sind froh: Ein Dialog. 1970.
Drei Stücke. 1980.
Zeit der Schuldlosen und andere Stücke. 1988.
 Radio Plays: Zeit der Schuldlosen/Zeit der Schuldigen, 1961; Das schönste Fest der Welt.

Other

So leicht fängt man keine Katze. 1954.
Der einsame Jäger. 1955.
Das Kabinett der Konterbande. 1956.
Flug über Land und Meer: Nordsee—Hotstein—Nordsee, with Dieter Seelmann. 1967; as Wo die Möwen schreien: Flug über Norddeutschlands Küsten und Länder, 1976.
Leute von Hamburg: Satirische Porträts. 1968.
Versäum nicht den Termin der Freude. 1970.
Lotte soll nicht sterben (for children). 1970; as Lotte macht alles mit, 1978.
Beziehungen: Ansichten und Bekenntnisse zur Literatur. 1970.
Die Herrschaftssprache der CDU. 1971.

- Verlorenes Land—gewonnene Nachbarschaft: zur Ostpolitik der Bundesregierung.* 1971.
Der Amüsierdokter. 1972.
Der Leseteufel. 1972(?).
Elfenbeinturm und Barrikade: Schriftsteller zwischen Literatur und Politik. 1976.
Die Wracks von Hamburg: Hörfunk-Features. 1978.
Himmel, Wolken, weites Land: Flug über Meer, Marsch, Geest und Heide, with Dieter Seelmann. 1979.
Waldboden: Sechsuunddreissig Farbstiftzeichnungen, illustrated by Liselotte Lenz. 1979.
Gespräche mit Manès Sperber und Leszek Kołakowski, edited by Alfred Mensak. 1980.
Über Phantasie: Siegfried Lenz, Gespräche mit Heinrich Böll, Günter Grass, Walter Kempowski, Pavel Kohout, edited by Alfred Mensak. 1982.
Fast einem Triumph: aus ein Album. 1982.
Elfenbeinturm und Barrikade: Erfahrungen am Schreibtisch. 1983.
Manès Sperber, sein letztes Jahr, with Manès and Jenka Sperber. 1985.
Etwas über Namen (address). 1985.
Kleines Strandgut, illustrated by Liselotte Lenz. 1986.
Am Rande des Friedens. 1989.
 Editor, with Egon Schramm, Wippchens charmante Scharmützel, by Julius Stettenheim. 1960.

*

Critical Studies: “From the Gulf Stream in the Main Stream: Siegfried Lenz and Hemingway” by Sumner Kirshner, in Research Studies, 1967; “Narrowing the Distance: Siegfried Lenz’s Deutschstunde” by Robert H. Paslick, in German Quarterly, 1973; “The Macabre Festival: A Consideration of Six Stories by Siegfried Lenz” by Colin Russ, in Deutung und Bedeutung: Studies in German and Comparative Literature, edited by Brigitte Schludermann and others, 1973; “How It Seems and How It Is: Marriage in Three Stories by Siegfried Lenz” by Esther N. Elstun, in Orbis litterarum, (29), 1974; “Ironic Reversal in the Short Stories of Siegfried Lenz,” in Neophilologus, (58), 1974, and Siegfried Lenz, 1978, both by Brian O. Murdoch; “Siegfried Lenz’s Deutschstunde: A North German Novel,” in German Life and Letters, 1975, and “The ‘Lesson’ in Siegfried Lenz’s Deutschstunde,” in Seminar, February 1977, both by Peter Russell; “Zygmunt’s Follies? On Siegfried Lenz’s Heimatmuseum” by Geoffrey P. Butler, in German Life and Letters, 1980; “Captive Creator in Siegfried Lenz’s Deutschstunde: Writer, Reader, and Response” by Todd Kontje, in German Quarterly, (53), 1980; “The Interlocutor and the Narrative Transmission of the Past: On Siegfried Lenz’s Heimatmuseum” by Marilyn Sibley Fries, in Monatshefte, 1987; “The Eye of the Witness: Photography in Siegfried Lenz’s Short Stories” by Hanna Geldrich-Zeffmann, in Modern Language Review, 1989; Realisme de Siegfried Lenz by Dorothee Merchiers, 2001.

* * *

In his career Siegfried Lenz has long focused heart and mind on his homeland in Eastern Europe, and this is reflected in his fiction and in his critical writings as a political commentator. Born in East Prussia in 1926, he observed as an adolescent the German occupation of Poland. At the age of 17, he served in the Navy during the latter part of World War II. In the immediate and difficult post-war years he studied philosophy and literature at the University of Hamburg. That post-war atmosphere is humorously, indeed satirically portrayed in Lehmans Erzählungen; oder, So schön war mein Markt, while World War II and the serious moral dilemmas confronting the fictional protagonist have continued to occupy Lenz’s attention, as in Ein Kriegsende. Lenz’s nascent interest in literature was evident already at university and was stimulated more directly by his work as a journalist and literary editor on Die Welt. The journalistic eye for detail and atmosphere undoubtedly helped his literary apprenticeship during which he produced his first short stories published in serial form or in toto in newspapers and journals.

The publication of his first novel Es waren Habichte in der Luft [There Were Hawks in the Sky] determined Lenz’s career as a freelance writer. The story immediately points to his subsequent thematic concentration on border regions, marginal situations, on danger, flight, failure, and the inescapability of fate. The setting is Karelia just after World War I and deals with the establishment of the communist regime there. Stenka, a teacher, is on the run, accused of murder although in reality he was only a witness to the deed. A pessimistic viewpoint is suggested by the notion of death at the border (though Erkii, a former pupil, does survive the ordeal) and the predatory hawks are symbolically ever watchful and ever present. The straightforwardness of style and language, reminiscent of Heinrich Böll and Wolfgang Borchert, in his early short stories and novels reflects incidentally the effect of Kahlschlad as well as an acknowledgement of Hemingway’s influence.

The post-World War II setting of Hamburg harbour and the clearing of wrecks in the waters there provides the background to the novel Der Mann im Strom [The Man in the River]. Hinrichs is a good diver but fear of unemployment makes him falsify his real age on his papers. But there is no escape from the inevitability of events and he is eventually dismissed. Generational conflict—so redolent in Lenz’s fiction—is present here in the figure of the younger diver Manfred who has been trained by Hinrichs but is then killed as a result of his own inexperience. Manfred’s relationship with Hinrich’s daughter Lena provides another important complicating factor in this tale of personal guilt. The end of a career and fear of failure preoccupy the thoughts of the lonely long-distance runner Bert Buchner in Brot und Spiele as he relives the course of his life in his last race, the European 10,000 metres. This is ultimately not a race against other competitors but against himself: his conjuring up of memories of earlier races, other experiences, his dealings with people, force him to recognize now some serious shortcomings in what had seemed to him and in fact had been a successful and popular athletics career. The theme of pursuit, be it by British soldiers in the war or subsequently competitors on the track, registers strongly in the novel. Buschner’s fall before the end of the race symbolizes his position. The relationship of the protagonist and the narrator as a factor in the process of understanding and self-understanding is of importance in this novel as in other of Lenz’s stories, for example in Stadtgespräch (The Survivor). The overcoming of the past and the question of guilt—here both individual and collective—is the thematic kernel of The Survivor. The story is seen through the eyes of the narrator Tobias Lund who recalls the botched attack by Resistance fighters on a visiting German general to a town in (presumably) occupied Norway during World War II. In reprisal, 44 townsmen are taken hostage and eventually killed after Daniel, leader of the Resistance fighters, has failed to surrender. Should he have given himself up? That was the question asked at the time and continually posed after the war as different people relate different aspects of the same story. Daniel, the embodiment of the idea of opposition, serves as a symbol of the moral dilemma presented.

Lenz's overall concern with getting his fictional characters to try to make sense of a situation and gain a true perspective on life is arguably best manifested in Deutschstunde (The German Lesson). Ensnared in a corrective institution for juvenile offenders that is significantly situated on an island in the river Elbe and hence distanced from society, Siggi Jepsen faces the task of writing an essay on the joys of duty. As such, it becomes a German lesson that reveals his own life story against the backcloth of Germany in the last years of World War II. Once again, a remote setting is chosen—not the lightship on the water in Das Feuerschiff (The Lightship), nor the small town set in a Norwegian fjord in The Survivor, but the distant north German coast near the Danish border where, though not at the hub of events, the village inhabitants are inextricably caught up in them and duly suffer from the conflicting and burdensome claims of family ties, loyalties to the state, and individual responsibilities. This is as true for Siggi's father the community policeman, and Nansen the celebrated Expressionist painter, as it is for Siggi himself. The lesson of history so often is that no one learns from it, and here within the framework setting of the institution a decade later, towards the end of Siggi's stay there, Siggi pointedly remarks that both he and Himpel, the institution's director, will each think to have won. A serious question mark must remain over whether the young offender had properly prepared himself or been prepared for future life in society. The self-questioning and the revelations of individual and societal inadequacies continue in the search by three disparate individuals for a role model to complete an educational reader in Das Vorbild (An Exemplary Life). The lives of Pundt, Heller, and Rita Süßfeldt that reflect varying generational, social, and political interests in the urban setting of Hamburg are all beset with shortcomings and even their final chosen example is revealed to be less than an ideal figure.

Like Günter Grass, Lenz has turned his eyes to his homeland in the East. The story collections So zärtlich war Suleyken [So Tender Was Suleyken] and So war es mit dem Zirkus had pointed the way in a series of anecdotes on life in his native Masurda that constitute a sympathetic and humorous recollection of a golden past (to be counterbalanced incidentally by his north German tales from Bollerup, Der Geist der Mirabelle [1975], where the real, bustling modern world threatens to intrude). The novel Heimatmuseum (The Heritage) returns to Masuria in a far more serious vein: in a series of flashbacks told from his hospital bed where he is recovering from burns sustained in the conflagration of the regional museum that was in his care but to which he had set fire, Zygmunt Rogalla relives the original desire to recapture and preserve past cultural traditions (not least of all carpet weaving) in the face of change that threatens first from Nazi ideological intentions and then the war itself. Flight to the West makes possible the eventual rebuilding of the folk museum in Schleswig-Holstein, only for it to become endangered once again through misuse. Fire plays an important symbolic role here as in The German Lesson, but in The Heritage an acceptance of guilt and recognition of the need for adjustment to change seems ultimately to be better understood.

Lenz professes to write stories to try to understand the world. His multifarious fictional forays underscore his stated endeavour. His tales are tightly woven (though proliferation of them in the novels in the shape of sub-plots is sometimes negatively viewed by the critics). The element of violence is often a feature in his fiction, as is emotional and spiritual tension which can produce a dramatic effect particularly in the short works (the title piece of the collection The Lightship is a good example). Lenz displays a compassion for many of his characters while being equally capable of casting a sharply critical eye, and as with Böll, the moral factor features strongly in his writings. In this connection, the role of the observer-cum-narrator or interlocutor is important in as much as that character, in following the course of events befalling the protagonist, can pose questions, search for an understanding, provide another perspective—and hence serve us and for us, the readers.

In the 1960s Lenz wrote sporadically for the theatre and the radio with mixed success. Zeit der Schuldlosen [Time of the Innocents], on the theme of guilt and serving as a basis for the novel The Survivor, is widely regarded as his best dramatic work. But fiction remains his forte. He was a member of Gruppe 47, later sided openly with the SPD, and worked in political journalism and broadcasting. The association of politics and writing has never been far removed from Lenz's thinking as is suggested in Elfenbeinturm und Barrikade: Schriftsteller zwischen Literatur und Politik. The need to communicate, to tell stories as a means of understanding the world is what motivates Lenz. Of significance then is the novel Der Verlust (The Breakdown), where Lenz, on the heels of Wittgenstein and Handke, turns to the question of the loss of speech as the protagonist Ulrich Martens becomes more powerless to communicate. Today Lenz stands in the forefront of major German writers in the second half of the 20th century. His success and popularity may be gauged in part by the numerous translations of his works into foreign languages and the filming of several of his stories, to say nothing of the sheer frequency of editions of his books.

—Ian Hilton

See the essay on The German Lesson.

LEOPARDI, Giacomo

Born: Recanati, Italy, 29 June 1798; became a Count on his father's death. Education: Educated at home by tutors; studied privately until 1822. Career: Lived in Rome, 1822–23; advisor, A.F. Stella, publishers, Milan, 1825–28; lived in Bologna, Florence, and Pisa, and in Naples from 1833. Died: 14 June 1837.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Opere (includes "La ginestra"), edited by Antonio Ranieri. 6 vols., 1845–49.

Opere inedite, edited by Giuseppe Cugnoni. 2 vols., 1878–80.

Tutte le opere, edited by Francesco Flora. 5 vols., 1937–49.

Tutte le opere, edited by Walter Binni and Enrico Ghidetti. 2 vols., 1969.

A Leopardi Reader, edited by Ottavio M. Casale (bilingual edition). 1981.

Leopardi: Selected Poems, translated by Eamon Grennan. 1997.

Verse

- Canzoni*. 1819.
Canzone ad Angelo Mai. 1820.
Versi. 1824.
Versi, edited by Pietro Brigherti. 1826.
I canti. 1831; revised edition, 1835; edited by I. Sanesi, 1943, by Francesco Flora, 1949, and by Mario Fubini, 1970; as Canti, translated by J.H. Whitfield, 1962.
I Paralipomeni della Batracomiomachia. 1842; as The War of the Mice and the Crabs, edited and translated by Ernesto G. Caserta, 1976.
Poems, translated by Frederick Townsend. 1887.
The Poems, translated by Francis H. Cliffe. 1893.
The Poems ("Canti"), translated by J.M. Morrison. 1900.
Poems, translated by Theodore Martin. 1904.
Poems, edited by Francis Brooks. 1909.
The Poems, edited and translated by Geoffrey L. Bickersteth (bilingual edition). 1923.
[Selections], translated by R.C. Trevelyan. 1941.
Poems, translated by John Heath-Stubbs. 1946.
Poems, translated by J.-P. Barricelli. 1963.
Canti, paraliomeni, poesie varie, traduzioni, poetiche, e versi puerili, edited by C. Muscetta and G. Savoca. 1968.
Canti, edited by G. Singh, various translators. 1990.
Canti, translated by Paul Lawton. 1996.
Canti: With a Selection of His Prose, translated by J.G. Nichols. 1998.
Leopardi's Canti, translated by Joseph Tusiani. 1998.

Other

- Operette morali*. 1827; revised edition, 1836; edited by Cesare Galimberti, 1978; as Essays and Dialogues, translated by Charles Edwardes, 1882; as Essays, Dialogues and Thoughts, translated by Patick Maxwell, 1893, also translated by James Thomson, 1905; as Operette Morali, Essays and Dialogues, edited and translated by Giovanni Cecchetti, 1982; as Moral Tales, translated by Patrick Creagh, 1983.
Pensieri di varia filosofia e di bella letteratura [Lo Zibaldone]. 7 vols., 1898–1900; edited by Anna Maria Moroni, 2 vols., 1972, and by Giuseppe Pacella, 3 vols., 1991; as Zibaldone: A Selection, translated by Martha King and Daniela Bini, 1992.
Epistolario, edited by F. Moroncini and others. 7 vols., 1934–41.
Selected Prose and Poetry, edited and translated by Iris Origo and John Heath-Stubbs. 1966.
Poems and Prose, edited by Angel Flores (bilingual edition). 1966.
Entro dipinta gabbia, edited by Maria Corti. 1972.
Lettere, edited by Sergio and Raffaella Solmi. 1977.
Pensieri, edited and translated by W.S. Di Piero (bilingual edition). 1981.
Editor, Rime, by Petrarch. 1826.
Editor, Crestomazia italiana: prosa, poesia. 2 vols., 1827–28.

*

Bibliography: Bibliografia leopardiana, 3 vols., 1931–53; Bibliografia analitica leopardiana, 2 vols., 1963–73; Bibliografia analitica leopardiana (1971–1980) by Ermanno Carini, 1986; Il labirinto leopardiano: bibliografia, 1976–1983, con una breve appendice, 1984–1985 by Emilio Giordano, 1986.

Critical Studies: Leopardi: A Biography by Iris Origo, 1935, revised edition, as Leopardi: A Study, in Solitude, 1953; Giacomo Leopardi by J.H. Whitfield, 1954; The Artifice of Reality: Poetic Style in Wordsworth, Foscolo, Keats, and Leopardi by Karl Kroeber, 1964; Leopardi and the Theory of Poetry, 1964, and Leopardi e i poeti inglese, 1990, both by G. Singh; Night and the Sublime in Giacomo Leopardi by Nicolas James Parella, 1970; Giacomo Leopardi: The Unheeded Voice by Giovanni Carsaniga, 1977; A Fragrance from the Desert: Poetry and Philosophy in Giacomo Leopardi by Daniela Bini, 1983; Giacomo Leopardi by J.-P. Barricelli, 1986; The Aspiration toward a Lost Natural Harmony in the Work of Three Italian Writers: Leopardi, Verga and Moravia by Foscarina Alexander, 1990; Leopardi: A Study in Solitude by Iris Origo, 1999.

* * *

No Italian poet—not even Dante—exemplifies with such vigour and conviction as Leopardi the validity of Coleridge's dictum that a great poet is also a profound philosopher. The union between poetry and first-hand thought—critical as well as philosophical, analytical as well as exploratory—gives Leopardi's style and language an unmistakably personal timbre which is at the same time a hallmark of universality. A contemporary of the English Romantic poets, Leopardi was not "romantic" in the way they were; in fact, as his essay "Discorso di un italiano intorno alla poesia romantica" [An Italian's Discourse on Romantic Poetry] shows, he adopted a polemical attitude to Romanticism, or to what he understood this to mean; and although a contemporary of Goethe and Hölderlin, he wasn't "classical" in the way they were. Similarly, although he was (like Baudelaire) a precursor of poetic modernity, his art is as different in ethos and temperament from Baudelaire's as it is from Byron's, Keats's, or Shelley's. Moreover, although he was saturated—as few poets were—in classical literature and classical learning, his poetry is refreshingly free from the weight of such learning. Ill-health and growing blindness as well as frustration in love dogged him all his life, but he managed to rise above them, transforming his joy and pain, and the vicissitudes of his uneventful but emotionally rich life, into material for poetry and philosophic contemplation which is at once rapt and deliberate, cool and impassioned. Hence his poetry, even at its most lyrical, is at bottom philosophical, and his style and diction, even at their most charged, have a philosophic calm and detachment about them. In fact, Leopardi may be said to have created a new poetic genre in Italian—the philosophic lyric—through which he interfused, to borrow Eliot's words, the man who suffers and the mind which creates.

Leopardi's poetic genius finds its supreme manifestation in the Canti, just as his analytical and speculative powers do theirs in his Operette morali (Essays and Dialogues). Epistolario, on the other hand, is a richly human document of the psychological and autobiographical side of Leopardi's personality, and Pensieri di varia filosofia e di bella letteratura (or Lo Zibaldone) [Thoughts on Various Philosophies and Great Literature]—a monumental miscellany of notes, comments, and reflections—is an encyclopedic mine of literary, philological, and cultural erudition all rolled into one. Binding all these works together as well as underlying them is a singularly gifted mind—at once creative and critical, learned and inventive, cultivated and inquisitive—with an unsurpassed mastery over prose and verse.

The English critics, together with Sainte-Beuve, were the first to recognize and critically comment on these qualities of Leopardi's art and personality. "A man of acknowledged genius and irreproachable character," wrote Henry Crabb Robinson after meeting Leopardi in Florence in 1830–31. “There have been,” observed H.G. Lewes, apropos of Leopardi’s patriotic odes, “no more piercing, manly, vigorous strains than those which vibrate in the organ-peal of patriotism sent forth by Leopardi.” And as a poet of despair, Lewes went on, “we know of no equal to Leopardi . . . His grief is so real and so profound that it is inexhaustible in expression, to say nothing of the beauty in which he embalms it.” According to Gladstone, too, Leopardi applies to his work, “with a power rarely equalled, all the resources of thought and passion, all that his introspective habit had taught him . . . and he unites to a very peculiar grace a masculine energy and even majesty of expression which is not surpassed . . . in the whole range of poetry.” And as far as Leopardi’s mastery over form and style is concerned, here is Matthew Arnold’s testimony: Leopardi “has the very qualities which we have found wanting in Byron; he has the sense for form and style, the passion for just expression, the sure and firm touch of the true artist . . . he has a far wider culture than Wordsworth, more mental lucidity, more freedom from illusions as to the real character of the established fact and of reigning conventions; above all, this Italian, with his pure and sure touch, with his fineness of perception, is far more of the artist [than Wordsworth].” But besides being that of a stylist and an artist of such calibre, Leopardi’s poetry has something perpetually modern about it, as has his theory of poetry. Leopardi jotted down his reflections on and analysed the nature of poetry, style, poetic inspiration, the language of poetry—in fact no poet in the history of Italian literature has occupied himself with the theory of poetry as much as Leopardi, and, indeed, as Maurice Bowra remarks, “few men have given so much hard thought to the matter”—so that he may be regarded justly as a worthy peer of Goethe, Wordsworth, and Coleridge. Moreover, certain aspects of his poetics—and poetry—are startlingly modern and anticipate the development of 20th-century poetry.

For although Leopardi’s poetry deals with themes that are conventional—love, death, youth, nature, memory, the transience of life, etc.—what comes out of his treatment of such themes is of the very essence of modernity: modernity of thought as well as of spirit. And if his poetry has a philosophic basis, it is not because it expounds a particular philosophy, or is inspired by or dependent on a particular philosophic system as such. It is because it is firmly rooted in his perception of the truth about life as he saw it and of the illusions one needed in order to be able to bear it, since “human kind cannot bear very much reality.”

Thus Leopardi’s pessimism, in the Canti no less than in Operette morali, is not so much a creed based on emotional or imaginative grounds as an outcome of closely argued premises, conclusions and convictions regarding the nature of life and human destiny, which the poet-philosopher has the courage to look unflinchingly in the face. At the same time he embraces what his own experience of life and his knowledge as well as observation of the world and of man in society have taught him. From his very early life Leopardi was filled with what he himself calls “the infinite desire to know precisely,” that never abandoned him. His explorations of reality were conveyed in accents of matchless lyricism with which he covered “the nudity of things.” That is why his art was admired not only by a modern poet like Pound—“Leopardi splendid, and the only author since Dante who need trouble you,” Pound wrote to Iris Berry—but also by a modern philosopher like Bertrand Russell. In a letter to me Russell said that he found Leopardi’s poetry and philosophy “the most beautiful expression of what should be the creed of a scientist,” and described “La ginestra” (“The Broom”) as expressing “more effectively than any other poem known to me my views about the universe and the human passions.”

—G. Singh

See the essays on “The Broom,” “The Infinite,” and “To Himself.”

LERMONTOV, Mikhail (Iur’evich)

Born: Moscow, Russia, 2/3 October 1814. Education: Educated at School for the Nobility, Moscow, 1828–30; University of Moscow, 1830–32; Junker School, St. Petersburg, 1832–34. Career: Cavalry cornet in Regiment of Life Guards Hussars; exiled to the Caucasus for poems on Pushkin’s death, 1835–38; because of a duel, again exiled, to Tenginskii Infantry Regiment on Black Sea, 1840–41. Died: In duel, 15 July 1841.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Sochineniia [Works]. 6 vols., 1954–57.

Izbrannye sochineniia [Selected Works]. 4 vols., 1958–59.

Sobranie sochinenii [Collected Works], edited by V. Arkhipov. 4 vols., 1969.

Sochineniia [Works], edited by I.M. Andronikov. 2 vols., 1970.

Sobranie sochinenii [Collected Works], edited by I.M. Andronikov. 4 vols., 1975.

Selected Works, translated by Avril Pyman, Irina Zheleznova, and Martin Parker. 1976.

Sobranie sochinenii [Collected Works], edited by V.A. Manuilov. 4 vols., 1979.

Izbrannye sochineniia [Selected Works], edited by V. Vatsuro. 1983.

Sobranie sochinenii [Collected Works], edited by Iu. Bondarev. 4 vols., 1985.

Izbrannye sochineniia [Selected Works], edited by G.I. Belen’kii. 1987.

Sochineniia [Works], edited by G.A. Andzhaparidze. 2 vols., 1988.

Sobranie sochinenii [Collected Works], edited by G.P. Makogonenko. 4 vols., 1989.

Polnoe sobranie stikhotvorenii [Complete Collected Poetry], edited by Iu. A. Andreev. 2 vols., 1989.

Fiction

Geroi nashego vremeni. 1840; translated as Sketches of Russian Life in the Caucasus, 1853; as The Hero of Our Days, translated by T. Pulsky, 1854; as The Heart of a Russian, translated by J. Wisdom and M. Murray, 1912; as A Hero of Nowadays, translated by John Swinnerton Phillimore, 1920; as A Hero of Our Time, translated by Reginald Merton, 1928, also translated by Vladimir and Dmitri Nabokov, 1958; Philip Longworth, 1962; Paul Foote, 1966; Martin Parker, 1995; as A Hero of Our Own Times, translated by Eden and Cedar Paul, 1940.

Vadim (unfinished), in Sochineniia, 6. 1957; edited and translated by Helen Gosciolo, 1984.

Plays

Maskarad [Masquerade]. 1836.

Verse

Pesnia pro tsaria Ivana Vasil'evicha. 1837; as A Song about Tsar Ivan Vasilyevich, translated by John Cournos, 1929.

Mtsyri. 1840; as The Circassian Boy, translated by S. Conant, 1875.

Demon. 1842; as The Demon, translated by A. Stephens, 1875; also translated by F. Storr, 1894; E. Richter, 1910; R. Burness, 1918; G. Shelley, 1930.

Selected Poetry. 1965.

Major Poetical Works, edited and translated by Anatoly Liberman. 1983.

Poemy i povesti v stikhakh [Narrative Verse and Stories in Verse]. 1984.

Narrative Poems by Pushkin and Lermontov, translated by Charles Johnston. 1983.

Poemy i stikhotvoreniia [Narrative Verse and Poetry]. 1985.

Poemy [Narrative Verse]. 1990.

Other

Proza [Prose]. 1941.

Proizvedeniia na kavkazskie temy [Works on the Caucasian Theme]. 1968.

Proza. Poemy. Lirika [Prose. Narrative Verse. Lyrics]. 1982.

M.Iu. Lermontov v russkoi kritike [M.Iu. Lermontov in Russian Criticism]. 1985.

M.Iu. Lermontov v vospominaniakh sovremennikov [M.Iu. Lermontov in the Reminiscences of Contemporaries]. 1989.

Lermontov (al'bom) [Lermontov (album)]. 1991.

*

Critical Studies: Lermontov by Janko Lavrin, 1959; Lermontov by John Mersereau, Jr., 1962; Lermontov: Tragedy in the Caucasus by Laurence Kelly, 1977; An Essay on Lermontov's "A Hero of Our Times" by C.J.G. Turner, 1978; Lermontov: A Study in Literary-Historical Evaluation by B.M. Eikhenbaum, translated by Ray Parrott and Harry Weber, 1981; Lermontov by John Garrard, 1982; A Wicked Irony: The Rhetoric of a Hero of Our Time by Andrew Barratt and A.D.P. Briggs, 1989; The Fey Hussar by Jessie Davies, 1989; Lermontov's A Hero of Our Time by Robert Reid, 1997; Lermontov's Narratives of Heroism by Vladimir Golstein, 1998; M. Iu. Lermontov: His Life and Work by Walter N. Vickery, 2001.

* * *

Mikhail Lermontov is often thought of as Pushkin's successor in the role of Russian national poet. Lermontov was profoundly influenced by Pushkin, but an equally potent and more visible influence was that of Byron. Whereas Pushkin's ingrained classical instincts allowed him to assimilate classical influences (often ironically) without wholly succumbing to Romantic style, Lermontov must be regarded as a full-blooded representative of the Romantic movement.

During his short life Lermontov attempted most literary genres but was chiefly a lyric and narrative poet. His drama is less memorable but his single prose work of note, Geroi nashego vremeni (A Hero of Our Time), is one of the most original and influential of Russian novels.

Lermontov's lyrics are often highly subjective and reflect the isolation of the post-Decembrist poet and the search for inner consolation which eluded Lermontov more than his contemporary, Tiutchev. Lermontov also uses lyric poetry as a means of expressing his metaphysical, often symbolically. Inanimate objects in juxtaposition (a rock and a cloud; a dead leaf floating in a river) or in isolation (a mountain peak; a solitary tree) are used in an almost Ovidian way to convey the tragic helplessness of particular aspects of the human condition. Ineluctable fate is a brooding presence throughout Lermontov's work: in the short poem "Angel" (1831), the human soul is conceived as pre-existing physical birth, birth itself being the forcible removal of the soul from a state of heavenly bliss to bodily imprisonment and exile among the world's miseries.

Fate, however, is not to be accepted blindly. Lermontov's most memorable creations are those in which Sisyphus-like characters struggle heroically against insuperable forces. Early in his literary career Lermontov became fascinated by the demonic personality, which, though shunned by God, is nevertheless capable of love and passion. As well as several lyrics on this theme, Lermontov produced, in successive drafts, a narrative poem called The Demon in which a demon, expelled from heaven, seeks redemption through the love of a Georgian girl but is eventually thwarted by God. Undemonic, but equally heroic, the hero of Mtsyri (The Circassian Boy) is a young postulant of Circassian origin. He is brought up in a Georgian monastery, and his one wish is to return to his home in the Caucasus but, after an ill-fated attempt to escape, he is brought back to the monastery and dies.

A Caucasian setting and demonic exertion of the will against fate also dominate A Hero of Our Time. This work, generally thought to be Lermontov's greatest, is sometimes said by critics to show that, by the end of his life, Lermontov was forsaking Romanticism in favour of realism. Certainly Lermontov takes great pains to motivate his novel, to suggest that it has as its initial impulse a documentary rather than a fictional intention. But the hero himself is still an embittered representative of the Byronic tradition and, though at times self-deprecating, is never a vehicle for parodying or diminishing that tradition. The most remarkable feature of A Hero of Our Time is its architecture: five structurally autonomous but thematically intermeshed first-person narratives create the illusion of a living, multi-dimensional hero who makes himself known to the reader by the gradual accumulation of psychological detail rather than by the consecutive unfolding of plot. Lermontov's prose style in the novel, remarkably simple but capable of sustaining impressive passages of natural description, influenced later writers, particularly short-story writers such as Chekhov. The character of Pechorin, the hero, has come to epitomize "the superfluous man," the disillusioned internal exile who figures so largely in the 19th-century Russian novel.

—Robert Reid

See the essay on A Hero of Our Time.

LESAGE, Alain-René

Born: Sarzeau, Brittany, France, 8 May (13 December in some sources) 1668. Education: Educated by Jesuits in Vannes, Brittany; studied law in Paris. Family: Married Marie-Élizabeth Huyard in 1694; three sons, including the actor Montménil, and one daughter. Career: Possibly a lawyer in Paris, 1690s; wrote original plays and adaptations/translations from the Spanish for the Comédie-Française, Paris, 1700–09; broke with the Comédie-Française, and subsequently wrote farces, comic operas, vaudevilles, and other pieces for the Paris fairs of St. Germain and St. Laurent, often in collaboration with Louis Fuzelier, d'Orneval, and others; lived with one son, the Abbé de Lyon, in Boulogne, from 1743. Died: 7 November 1747.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Le Théâtre de la foire; ou, L'Opéra-comique (10 vols.: two of them numbered as 9). 1721–37.
Oeuvres choisies de Lesage, edited by C.J. Mayer. 16 vols., 1810.
Oeuvres complètes. 12 vols., 1821.
Novels. 4 vols., 1821.
Oeuvres de Le Sage. 1877.
Théâtre. 1911.
Oeuvres complètes. 1935–.
Théâtre, edited by Maurice Bardon. 1948.
Il Teatro della foire. 1965.
Three French Comedies, translated with introduction by James Magruder. 1996.

Plays (adaptations and plays for the legitimate stage)

Le Traître puni, from a play by Rojas Zorilla. In Théâtre espagnol, 1700.
Don Félix de Mendocce, from a play by Lope de Vega. In Théâtre espagnol, 1700.
Le Point d'honneur, from a play by Rojas Zorilla (produced 1702). 1739.
Don César Ursin, from a play by Calderón (produced 1707). 1739.
Crispin, rival de son maître (produced 1707). 1707; revised version, in Recueil des pièces mises au Théâtre Français, 1738; edited by Andrew Clark, 1910, Marcello Spaziani, 1956, and by T.E. Lawrenson, 1961; as Neck or Nothing, translated by D. Garrick, 1766; as Crispin, Rival of His Master, translated by Barrett H. Clark, 1915; as The Rival of His Master, translated by W.S. Merwin, in Tulane Drama Review, 6(4), 1962.
Turcaret (produced 1709). 1709; revised version, in Recueil des pièces mises au Théâtre Français, 1738; edited by A. Hamilton Thompson, 1918, T.E. Lawrenson, 1969, B. Blanc, 1970, and by E. Lavielle, 1964; translated by John Norman, 1989.
La Tontine (produced 1732). In Recueil des pièces mises au Théâtre Français, 1738.
Les Amants jaloux (produced 1735). 1736.
Recueil des pièces mises au Théâtre Français (includes final versions of Turcaret; Crispin, rival de son maître; La Tontine). 1738.

Pièces forains produced at Fair of St. Germain; the dates given are those of first production: Le Retour d'Arlequin à la foire, 1712; Arlequin Baron Allemand, 1712; Arlequin roi de Sérendib, 1713; Arlequin colonel, 1714; La Ceinture de Vénus, 1715; Parodie de l'opéra de Télémaque, 1715; Arlequin gentilhomme malgré lui, with d'Orneval, 1716; Le Temple d'ennui, with Louis Fuzelier, 1716; Le Tableau du mariage, with Louis Fuzelier, 1716; L'École des amants, with Louis Fuzelier, 1716; L'Ombre de la foire, with d'Orneval, 1720; L'Île du Gougou, with d'Orneval, 1720; Arlequin roi des ogres; ou, Les Bottes de sept lieues, with d'Orneval and Fuzelier, 1720; La Queue de vérité, with d'Orneval and Fuzelier, 1720; Magotin, with d'Orneval, 1721; Prologue, with d'Orneval and Fuzelier, 1721; Arlequin Endymion, with d'Orneval, 1721; La Forêt de Dodôre, with d'Orneval, 1721; L'Ombre du cocher poète, with d'Orneval and Fuzelier, 1722; L Rémouleur d'amour, with d'Orneval and Fuzelier, 1722; Pierrot Romulus; ou, Le Ravisser poli, with d'Orneval and Fuzelier, 1722; Arlequin barbet, pagode et médecin, with d'Orneval, 1723; Les Trois Commères, with d'Orneval, 1723; Les Couplets en procès, with d'Orneval, 1729; La Reine du Barostan, with d'Orneval, 1729; L'Opéra-comique assiégé, with d'Orneval, 1730; Pièces du Théâtre de la Foire (includes previously uncollected plays), 1731.

Pièces forains produced at the Fair of St. Laurent; the dates given are those of first production: Les Petits-mâîtres, 1712; Arlequin et Mezzetin morts par amour, 1712; Arlequin Thétis, 1713; Arlequin invisible, 1713; La Foire de Guibray, 1714; Arlequin Mahomet, 1714; Le Tombeau de Nostradamus, 1714; Le Temple du destin, 1715; Les Eaux de Merlin, 1715; Colombine Arlequin; ou, Arlequin Colombine, 1715; Arlequin Hulta; ou, La Femme répudiée, with d'Orneval, 1716; La Princesse de Charizme, 1718; La Querelle des théâtres, with Joseph de Lafont, 1718; Le Monde renversé, with d'Orneval, 1718; Les Amours de Nanterre, with d'Orneval and Jacques Autreau, 1718; Les Funérailles de la foire, with d'Orneval and Fuzelier, 1718; La Statue merveilleuse, with d'Orneval, 1720; L'Île des Amazones, with d'Orneval, 1720; La Fausse foire, with d'Orneval and Fuzelier, 1721; La Boîte de Pandore, with d'Orneval and Fuzelier, 1721; La Tête noire, with d'Orneval and Fuzelier, 1721; Le Rappel de la foire à la vie, with d'Orneval and Fuzelier, 1721; Le Régiment de la Calotte, with d'Orneval and Fuzelier, 1721; Le Jeune Vieillard, with d'Orneval and Fuzelier, 1722; Le Dieu du hasard, with d'Orneval and Fuzelier, 1722; La Force de l'amour, with d'Orneval and Fuzelier, 1722; La Foire des fées, with d'Orneval and Fuzelier, 1722; Les Captifs d'Alger, with d'Orneval, 1724; La Toison d'or, with d'Orneval, 1724; L'Oracle muet, with d'Orneval, 1724; La Pudeur à la foire, with d'Orneval, 1724; La Matrone de Charenton, with d'Orneval, 1724; Les Vendanges de la foire, with d'Orneval, 1724; L'Enchanteur Mirliton, with d'Orneval and Fuzelier, 1725; Le Temple du mémoire, with d'Orneval and Fuzelier, 1725; Les Enragés; ou, La Rage d'amour, with d'Orneval and Fuzelier, 1725; Les Pèlerins de la Mecque, with d'Orneval, 1726; Les Comédiens corsaires, with d'Orneval and Fuzelier, 1726; L'Obstacle favorable, with d'Orneval and Fuzelier, 1726; Les Amours déguisés, with d'Orneval and Fuzelier, 1726; Achmet et Almanzine, with d'Orneval and Fuzelier, 1728; La Pénélope moderne, with d'Orneval and Fuzelier, 1728; Les Amours de Protée, with d'Orneval and Fuzelier, 1728; La Princesse de la Chine, with d'Orneval, 1729; Les Spectacles malades, with d'Orneval, 1729; L'Industrie, with d'Orneval and Fuzelier, 1730; Zémine et Almanzor, with d'Orneval and Fuzelier, 1730; Les Routes du monde, with d'Orneval and Fuzelier, 1730; L'Indifférence, with d'Orneval and Fuzelier, 1730; L'Amour marin, with d'Orneval and Fuzelier, 1730; L'Espérance, with d'Orneval and Fuzelier, 1730; Roger roi de Sicile, surnommé le roi sans chagrin, with d'Orneval, 1731; Les Désespérés, with d'Orneval, 1732; Sophie et Sigismond, with d'Orneval, 1732; La Sauvagesse; ou, La Fille sauvage, with d'Orneval, 1732; Le Rival dangereux, 1734; Les Deux Frères, 1734; La Première Représentation, 1734; Les Mariages de Canada, 1734; L'Histoire de l'Opéra-Comique; ou, Les Métamorphoses de la foire, 1736; Le Mari préféré, 1736; Les Vieillards rajeunis, with Nicolas Fromaget, 1736; Le Neveu supposé, 1738.

Fiction

Lettres galantes d'Aristénète. 1695.

Nouvelles aventures de l'admirable Don Quichotte de la Marche. 1704; as The New Adventures of Don Quixote, 1705.

Le Diable boiteux. 1707; revised editions, 1726, 1737; edited by Roger Laufer, 1970; as The Devil Upon Two Sticks, translated anonymously, 1708; several subsequent translations under same title; as Asmodeus; or, the Devil Upon Two Sticks, translated by Lesage, 1729; as The Devil Upon Crutches, translated by Joseph Thomas, 1841; as The Lame Devil, translated anonymously, 1870.

Les Mille et un jours, contes persans (satire of the Arabian Nights). 5 vols., 1710–12; translated, 1714.

Histoire de Gil Blas de Santillane. 3 vols., 1715–35; revised edition, 1747; as The History and Adventures of Gil Blas of Santillane, translated anonymously, 1716; as The Adventures of Gil Blas, translated by Tobias Smollett, 1749; several subsequent translations including by Percival Proctor, 1774, and W.H. Dilworth, 1790.

Nouvelle Traduction de Roland l'amoureux, from Orlando innamorato by Boiardo. 2 vols., 1717.

Histoire de Guzman d'Alfarache, from a romance by Matheo Aleman. 2 vols., 1732; as The Pleasant Adventures of Gusman of Alfarache, translated by A. O'Connor, 1812.

Les Aventures de Monsieur Robert Chevalier, capitaine des filibustiers dans la Nouvelle-France. 2 vols., 1732; edited by H. Kurtz, 1926; as The Adventures of Robert Chevalier, translated anonymously, 1747.

Une Journée des parques. 1734; as A Day of the Fates, translated by Adam L. Gowans, 1922.

Histoire d'Estevanille Gonzalez, surnommé le garçon de bonne humeur, from a work by Vincention Espinella. 4 vols., 1734–41; as The History of Vanillo of Gonzales, Surnamed the Merry Bachelor, translated anonymously, 1735; as The Merry Bachelor, translated anonymously, 1812.

Le Bachelier de Salamanque; ou, Les Mémoires de D. Chérubin de la Ronda. 2 vols., 1736–38; as The Bachelor of Salamanca, 2 vols., translated by Mr. Lockman, 1737–39; also translated by J. Townsend, 1822.

La Valise trouvée. 1740.

Other

Mélanges amusants de saillies d'esprit et de traits historiques des plus frappants. 1743.

*

Bibliography: Essai bibliographique sur les oeuvres d'Alain-René Lesage by H. Cordier, 1910.

Critical Studies: Lesage et Gil Blas by C. Dédéyan, 2 vols., 1965; The Theatre of Alain-René Lesage by Ardelle Striker, 1968; Lesage; ou, Le Métier de romancier by Roger Laufer, 1971; The Interrelationship Between Prominent Character Types in "Le Diable Boiteux," "Gil Blas," and "Le Théâtre de la Foire" by Alain-René Lesage by Raymond Joseph Pelletier, 1977; Lesage et le picaresque by Francis Assaf, 1983; L'Espagne dans la trilogie "picaresque" de Lesage. Emprunts littéraires, empreinte culturelle by C. Cavillac, 2 vols., 1984; Le Type du valet chez Molière et ses successeurs: Regnard, Dufresny, Dancourt et Lesage by G. Gouvernet, 1985; Lesage: Crispin rival de son maître and Turcaret by George Evans, 1987; Lesage, Gil Blas by Malcolm Cook, 1988.

* * *

Although he had already translated several Spanish plays into French, Alain-René Lesage's literary career really began in 1707 when he wrote both a successful play, Crispin, rival de son maître (Crispin, Rival of His Master) and a successful novel, Le Diable boiteux (The Devil Upon Crutches). Crispin is a one-act prose comedy with a complex plot involving deception and impersonation. Crispin, the valet of Valère, impersonates Damis in an attempt to make off with the dowry of Angélique, the woman whom Valère loves but who has been promised to Damis, who has secretly married another woman. The plot is foiled, the valets are forgiven, and all ends well. In its plot, use of deception, and complex love relationships, the play recalls Molière's comedies; the unscrupulous motivation of Crispin for his own gain at the expense of his master contrasts sharply with Molière's lackeys who engage in their ruses in order to help their masters.

In Turcaret, Lesage increases the sharpness of his satire and the comedy becomes what has been called a bitter comedy. The play presents a host of heartless, mean characters and draws its comedy from the fact that none of the victims is worthy of sympathy, but all rather deserve the punishment they receive. The plot is less complex than that of Crispin in that it is constructed in a series of layers of deceptions for financial gain. Lesage uses the motif of the trickster tricked, but here the trickster is no longer a likeable fellow. Turcaret, a dishonest tax farmer, has abandoned his wife, who is searching for him. In spite of his cleverness in financial matters, he has fallen under the spell of the Baronne, who is trying to dupe him; his wife in turn is being duped by her lover, the Chevalier. Both the Baronne and the Chevalier are in turn being cheated by their servants. All of the trickery is brought to a halt when Turcaret's wife arrives and he is arrested. This dénouement recalls the just punishment of Tartuffe at the close of Molière's famous comedy. The play, which was a scathing attack upon the tax farmers of the period, enjoyed enormous success in spite of the efforts of those it attacked to suppress it. La Tontine, also deals with the world of finance and is another comedy of manners.

In addition to these three major plays, Lesage wrote more than 100 farces. Both Crispin and Turcaret were written for the Comédie-Français; soon after the performance of Turcaret, Lesage quarrelled with the Comédie-Français over their acting style and associated himself with the Théâtre de la Foire, for whom he wrote his farces either alone or in collaboration.

Lesage's novels reflect the same interests and preoccupations as his plays. He is considered by many critics to be the creator of the novel of manners. The Devil Upon Crutches is based on the Spanish novel Diablo conjuelo by Guevara. Although the action takes place in Madrid, the novel is actually a satirical portrayal of 18th-century Parisian society. Asmodée, the lame devil, once he is released from the bottle in which he has been imprisoned, entertains his benefactor by lifting the roofs off the houses in Madrid (actually Paris) to reveal the activity within. The novel is at times referred to as a romance because it contains a secondary plot in which Asmodée arranges the marriage of his benefactor with Seraphina. However, the greater part of the novel is a series of anecdotes, satires of manners, and portraits.

It is in Lesage's major novel Histoire de Gil Blas de Santillane (The Adventures of Gil Blas) that we really see his development as a novelist. Lesage uses the Spanish genre of the picaresque and once again satirizes his French contemporaries under the guise of a Spanish setting. The hero experiences the traditional picaresque alternation of good and bad fortune; a whole panorama of social ranks, professions, and situations is presented. Lesage adds a moral sense to the picaresque novel for his hero Gil Blas advances not only in social rank but also in his sense of moral values. Gil Blas is both a spectator of and a participant in society, whereas the lame devil and his benefactor only observe. As Henri Coulet (Le Roman jusqu'à la Révolution) has stated, the novel progresses from a simple comic narration to become a work imbued with a serious realism. Gil Blas, unlike the typical 18th-century novel, does not depend upon the motif of love. In its panoramic portrayal of society, it foretells the novels of Balzac.

While writing Gil Blas, Lesage also composed two other novels: in 1732, Histoire de Gusman d'Alfarache (The Pleasant Adventures of Gusman of Alfarache), which he based heavily on the work of Mateo Aleman, and in 1734, Histoire d'Estevanille Gonzalez (The History of Vanillo of Gonzales). In 1736, he created a totally original novel (that is, no models have been found for it), Le Bachelier de Salamanque (The Bachelor of Salamanca). This novel is a delightful romp through adventure after adventure, with little concern for verisimilitude. Lesage also published Les Aventures de Monsieur Robert Chevalier (The Adventures of Robert Chevalier), in 1732, a curious novel that includes the exploits of an adventurer in the New World and several narratives treating themes used by other contemporary writers, particularly Prévost and Marivaux.

The plays and novels of Lesage were very popular during the 18th century. In the theatre, he further developed the comedy of manners and added a more satirical tone to comedy. He also contributed significantly to the development of the novel of the period, influencing many of the novelists of the time such as Marivaux and Voltaire (although Voltaire failed to acknowledge this influence). His work does, however, present certain contrasts to the body of 18th-century fiction: he turned to Spain rather than to England for his models, and he found subjects other than love for his novels.

—Shawncey J. Webb

LESSING, Gotthold Ephraim

Born: Kamenz, Saxony (then part of the Holy Roman Empire), 23 January 1729. Education: Educated at school of St. Afra, Meissen, 1741–46; studied theology, then medicine, at University of Leipzig, 1746–48; University of Wittenberg, 1748, 1751–52, master of arts 1752. Family: Married Eva König in 1776 (died 1778); one son (died in infancy). Career: Writer from 1748 in Berlin; editor, with Christlob Mylius, Beiträge zur Historie und Aufnahme des Theaters, 1750; editor, Theatralische Bibliothek, 1754–58, and Briefe, die neueste Literatur betreffend (Literaturbriefe), 1759; official secretary to General Bogislav von Tauentzien, Breslau, 1760–65; resident adviser to the National Theatre in Hamburg, 1767–68; librarian to the Duke of Brunswick, Wolfenbüttel, 1770–81. Member: Academy of Mannheim, 1776. Died: 15 February 1781.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

- Dramatic Works*, edited and translated by E. Bell. 2 vols., 1878.
Sämtliche Schriften, edited by Karl Lachmann, revised by Franz Muncker. 23 vols., 1886–1924; reprinted 1979.
Werke, edited by Julius Petersen and Waldemar von Olshausen. 25 vols., 1925; supplement, 5 vols., 1929–35.
Werke, edited by H.G. Göpfert and others. 8 vols., 1970–79.
Werke und Briefe, edited by Wilfried Barner and others. 1985–.

Plays

- Der junge Gelehrte*, with others (produced 1748). In Schriften, 1754.
Die alte Jungfer. 1749.
Die Juden (produced 1749). In Schriften, 1754.
Der Freigeist (produced 1767). In Schriften. 1753–55.
Miss Sara Sampson (produced 1755). In Schriften, 1755; edited by K. Eibl, 1971; as Miss Sarah Sampson, translated by E. Bell, in World Drama, edited by Barrett Clark, 1933; as Sara, 1990.
Philotas (produced 1780). 1759.
Lustspiele. 2 vols., 1767.
Minna von Barnhelm (produced 1767). 1767; edited by Dieter Hildebrandt, 1969; as The Disbanded Officer, translated and adapted by James Johnstone, 1786; as The School for Honor, 1789; as Minna von Barnhelm, translated by F. Holcroft, 1805; also translated by W.C. Wrangmore, 1858; P. Maxwell, 1899; W.A. Steel, with Laocoon and Nathan the Wise, 1930; E. Bell, 1933; K.J. Northcott, 1972; Anthony Meech, 1990; as The Way of Honour, translated by E.U. Oules, 1929; as Minna von Barnhelm or the Soldier's Fortune: Comedy in Five Acts, translated by Arnold P. Grunwald, 1999.
Trauerspiele. 1772.
Emilia Galotti (produced 1772). In Trauerspiele, 1772; as Emilia Galotti, translated by Benjamin Thompson, 1800; also translated by Edward Dvoretzky, 1962; F.J. Lamport, in Five German Tragedies, 1969; A.J.G. von Aesch, 1981.
Nathan der Weise (produced 1783). 1779; edited by P. Demetz, 1966, also edited by Renate Waack, 1979; as Nathan the Wise, translated by R.E. Raspe, 1781; numerous subsequent translations including by A. Reich, 1860; Robert Willis, 1868; W.A. Steel, with Laocoon and Minna von Barnhelm, 1930; Bayard Quincy Morgan, 1955; T.H. Lustig, in Classical German Drama, 1963; Walter F.C. Ade, 1972.

Other

- Schriften*. 6 vols., 1753–55; revised edition, 1771.
Fabeln. 1759; revised edition, 1777; as Fables, translated by J. Richardson, 1773.
Laocoon; oder, Über die Grenzen der Malerei und Poesie. 1766; as Laocoon; or, The Limits of Poetry and Painting, translated by W. Ross, 1836; numerous subsequent translations including by E.C. Beasley, 1853; W.B. Rönnfeldt, 1895; W.A. Steel, with Nathan

- the Wise and Minna von Barnhelm*, 1930; Edward Allen McCormick, 1962.
- Briefe, antiquarischen Inhalts*. 2 vols., 1768.
- Berengarius Turonensis*. 1770.
- Zur Geschichte und Literatur* [so-called Wolfenbütteler Beiträge]. 3 vols., 1773–81.
- Anti-Goeze*, 1–11. 1778.
- Ernst und Falk*. 1778–81; edited by Wolfgang Kelsch, 1981; as Ernst and Falk, 1854–72; as Masonic Dialogues, translated by A. Cohen, 1927.
- Die Erziehung des Menschengeschlechts*. 1780; edited by Louis Ferdinand Helbig, 1980; as The Education of the Human Race, translated by F.W. Robertson, 1858; also translated by H. Chadwick, in Lessing's Theological Writings, 1956.
- Theologischer Nachlass*, edited by K.G. Lessing. 1784.
- Theatralischer Nachlass*, edited by K.G. Lessing. 2 vols., 1784–86.
- Literarischer Nachlass*, edited by K.G. Lessing. 3 vols., 1793–95.
- Hamburgische Dramaturgie (1767–69)*, edited by O. Mann. 1958; translated in Lessing's Prose Works, edited by E. Bell, 1897.
- Lessing im Gespräch*, edited by Richard Daunicht. 1971.
- Briefwechsel über das Trauerspiel*, edited by J. Schulte-Sasse. 1972.
- Briefe aus Wolfenbüttel*, edited by Günter Schulz. 1975.
- Meine liebste Madam: Briefwechsel*, with Eva König, edited by Günter and Ursula Schulz. 1979.
- Gotthold Ephraim Lessing: A Selection of His Fables in English and German*, translated by Lesley Macdonald and H. Weissenborn. 1979.
- Dialog in Briefen und andere ausgewählte Dokumente zum Leben Gotthold Ephraim Lessings mit Eva Catharina König*, edited by Helmut Rudolff. 1981.
- Unvergängliche Prosa: die phitosophischen, theologischen und esoterischen Schriften* (selections), edited by Konrad Dietzfelbinger. 1981.
- Die Ehre hat reich nie gesucht: Lessing in Berlin* (selections), edited by Gerhard Wolf. 1985.

*

Bibliography: Gotthold Ephraim Lessing by G. and S. Bauer, 1968, revised edition, 1986; Lessing-Bibliographie [to 1971] by Siegfried Seifert, 1973; Lessing-Bibliographie 1971–1985 by Doris Kuhles, 1988.

Critical Studies: Lessing, The Founder of Modern German Literature by Henry B. Garland, 1937, revised edition, 1962; Lessing's Dramatic Theory by J.G. Robertson, 1939, reprinted 1965; G.E. Lessing: Laocoon edited by D. Reich, 1965; Lessing and the Enlightenment by Henry E. Allison, 1966; Lessing and the Language of Comedy by M.M. Metzger, 1966; Gotthold Ephraim Lessing by F. Andrew Brown, 1971; Gotthold Ephraim Lessing's Theology by L.P. Wessell, 1977; Lessing and the Drama by F.J. Lampport, 1981; Lessing's Laocoon: Semiotics and Aesthetics in the Age of Reason by David E. Wellbery, 1984; Minna von Barnhelm by Robin Harrison, 1985; Lessing and the Enlightenment edited by Alexej Ugrinsky, 1986; Aesthetic Reconstructions: The Seminal Writings of Lessing, Kant and Schiller by Anthony Savile, 1987; The Spinoza Conversations between Lessing and Jacobi: Text with Excerpts from the Ensuing Controversy by Gérard Vallée, 1988; Catalyst of Enlightenment, Gotthold Ephraim Lessing: Productive Criticism of Eighteenth-Century Germany by Edward M. Batley, 1990; Behind the Mask: Kierkegaard's Pseudonymic Treatment of Lessing in the Concluding Unscientific Postscript by Michelle Stott, 1993; Lessing's Nathan the Wise and the Critics, 1779–1991 by Jo-Jacqueline Eckardt, 1993; The Disciplines of Interpretation: Lessing, Herder, Schlegel and Hermeneutics in Germany, 1750–1800 by Robert S. Leventhal, 1994; Absent Mothers and Orphaned Fathers: Narcissism and Abjection in Lessing's Aesthetic and Dramatic Production by Susan E. Gustafson, 1995; Enlightenment and Community: Lessing, Abbt, Herder and the Quest for a German Public by Benjamin W. Redekop, 2000; The Reconstruction of Religion: Lessing, Kierkegaard, and Nietzsche by Jan-Olav Henriksen, 2001; Lessing's Philosophy of Religion and the German Enlightenment: Lessing on Christianity and Reason by Toshimasa Yasukata, 2002.

* * *

Gotthold Ephraim Lessing is the principal literary figure of the German Enlightenment and founder of the modern German drama. Intending to follow his father into the Lutheran ministry, he made his literary debut while still a theological student with a number of comedies, for the most part conventional but in some cases (Die Juden, Der Freigeist) touching upon serious matters of intellectual controversy and humanitarian concern. By the time he was 25 he had also established a reputation as a trenchant critic and essayist on a wide range of topics. But the series of works upon which his lasting reputation rests begins with Miss Sara Sampson. This “domestic” or “middle-class” tragedy was the first successful attempt in German, indeed in European drama, at the serious and in some measure “realistic” depiction of ordinary contemporary characters, situations, and issues. This vein is continued in Minna von Barnhelm, a comedy of love and reconciliation in the aftermath of the Seven Years War, and the tragedy Emilia Galotti, a powerful amalgam of social and psychological conflict with a strong (if only implicit) note of political criticism. These works paved the way for the realistic social drama which was only to develop fully in the 19th century. Less successful was the laconic Philotas, a tragedy of patriotic fanaticism in a neo-classical setting. Lessing admired the Greeks, and in Laocoon (Laocoon) praised Greek art as the supreme expression of the human spirit, while attacking what he saw as perversions of the true classical tradition; similarly in the Hamburgische Dramaturgie (Hamburg Dramaturgy) he sought to liberate German drama from any dependence on the neo-classical style of 17th-century France. Laocoon also seeks to delimit the proper spheres of the various arts, attacking the doctrine “ut pictura poesis” and maintaining that while the scope of the visual arts is limited to beauty, poetry and literature should depict actions.

In the 1770s Lessing's interests returned largely to theology. Beginning with the defence of various so-called heretics and of the rights of freedom of conscience, of intellectual inquiry, and of expression, he proceeded to a number of searching examinations of the concept of religious truth. Truth itself becomes increasingly elusive, increasingly relative, but Lessing holds fast to the belief in an ultimately benevolent Providence and in the supreme importance of ethical conduct in man. This faith is proclaimed in his last play, Nathan der Weise (Nathan the Wise): here Lessing abandons his earlier realism for a kind of symbolic fairytale, in which Christian, Muslim, and Jew are ultimately revealed as members of one family. His final treatise, Die Erziehung des Menschengeschlechts (The Education of the Human Race), traces the course of human history as a dialectic between human reason and divine revelation, between developing human autonomy and a transcendent providential plan.

By his own and succeeding generations, Lessing has been regarded above all as a liberator, a champion of humanity, and an unrelenting critic of intolerance and pretension. His major plays are still successfully performed today; his critical writings are models of supple and incisive German prose.

—F.J. Lamport

See the essays on Minna von Barnhelm and Nathan the Wise.

LEVI, Carlo

Born: Turin, Italy, 29 November 1902. Education: Educated at the University of Turin, degree in medicine 1924. Career: Gave up a brief medical practice to be a painter: exhibited first in 1923, in the expressionist “Six Painters of Turin” exhibition, 1929, and subsequently at the Venice Bi-Annual Exhibition, where a room was designated exclusively for his work in 1954. Active in political action and journalism: contributor, Giustizia e Libertà, early 1930s; co-editor, underground publication Lotta politica; arrested, 1934, exiled in Grassano and Gagliano, both in Lucania (i.e. Basilicata), 1936, freed under a general amnesty, 1936; resumed political activity and emigrated to France; returned to Italy to work with the Resistance; in Florence during conflict, 1942, re-arrested; co-editor, La Nazione del Popolo, the publication of the CTLN; editor, the Action Party’s L’Italia Libera, Rome, 1945–46; frequent contributor to La Stampa, Turin; independent parliamentary deputy, on the Communist Party list, 1963–72. Died: 4 January 1975.

PUBLICATIONS

Fiction

L’orologio. 1950; as The Watch, translated by John Farrar, 1951.

Other

Cristo si è fermato a Eboli. 1945; edited by Peter M. Brown, 1965; as Christ Stopped at Eboli, translated by Frances Frenaye, 1947.

Paura della libertà. 1946; as Fear and Freedom, translated by Adolphe Gourevitch, 1950.

Le parole sono pietre: Tre giornate in Sicilia. 1955; as Words Are Stones: Impressions of Sicily, translated by Angus Davidson, 1958.

Il futuro ha un cuore antico: Viaggio nell’Unione Sovietica. 1956.

La doppia notte dei tigli. 1959; as The Linden Trees, translated by Joseph M. Bernstein, 1962; as The Two-Fold Night, translated by Bernstein, 1962.

Un volto che ci somiglia: Ritratto dell’Italia. 1960.

Coraggio dei miti: Scritti contemporanei (selection), edited by Gigliola De Donato. 1975.

Contadini e luigini: Testi e disegni, edited by Leonardo Sacco. 1975.

Levi si ferma a Firenze (exhibition publication), edited by Carlo Ludovico Ragghianti. 1977.

I monotipi di Carlo Levi (catalogue). 1977.

Carlo Levi 1928–1937 (catalogue), edited by Mario De Micheli. 1977.

Quaderni a cancelli. 1979.

Disegni 1920–1935. 1980.

In Lucania con Carlo Levi, photographs by Mario Carbone, commentary by Gino Melchiorre. 1980.

L’altro mondo è il Mezzogiorno, edited by Leonardo Sacco. 1980.

Carlo Levi e la Lucania: Dipinti del confino 1935–1936 (catalogue). 1990.

E questo il “carcer tetro”?: Lettere dal carcere 1934–1935, edited by Daniela Ferraro. 1991.

Editor, Amicizia: Storia di un vecchio poeta e di un giovane canarino, by Umberto Saba. 1951.

*

Critical Studies: Saggio su Carlo Levi by Gigliola De Donato, 1974; Carlo Levi by Giovanni Falaschi, 1978; Come leggere Cristo si è fermato a Eboli di Carlo Levi by Mario Miccinesi, 1979; Carlo Levi: Dall’antifascismo al mito contadino by Vincenzo Napolillo, 1984; “The Politics of Cristo si è fermato a Eboli” by Howard Moss, in Association of Teachers of Italian Journal, Spring 1988; L’azione politica di Carlo Levi by Ghislana Sirovich, 1988; “Carlo Levi: The Pursuit of the Essential in Christ Stopped at Eboli” by Vincenzo Bollettino, in Fusta, 8(1), 1990; Antifascisms: Cultural Politics in Italy, 1943–46: Benedetto Croce and the Liberals, Carlo Levi and the “Actionists” by David Ward, 1996.

* * *

Carlo Levi was one of Italy’s most prominent and influential intellectuals of the 20th century. He trained as a doctor, receiving a degree in medicine from the University of Turin in 1924, although he never formally practised. He is remembered as a great humanitarian, a painter, a writer, and a political activist, and his artistic activity was closely allied to his socialist engagement.

Levi reached adulthood during Mussolini’s Fascist regime, when the young man’s socialist ideals and Jewish heritage were not popular. He began therefore to spend extended periods of time in Paris with the leaders of the Italian Resistance. While in France, he helped to found the underground organization Giustizia e Libertà (Justice and Liberty). It was this activity which eventually led to his arrest and exile, first in the town of Grassano and later in Gagliano. Both villages are located in the southern Italian region of Lucania, known today as Basilicata. It was the practice of the Fascist party to confine political prisoners to remote areas of the peninsula in order to separate them from other activists. (Such key cultural figures as Antonio Gramsci, Cesare Pavese, and Leone and Natalia Ginzburg all spent long periods of exile under Mussolini’s dictatorship.) After his release, at the end of the war, Levi was instrumental in the formulation of the left-wing Action Party, and in the 1960s he was elected as a senator in the independent list of the Italian Communist Party, a position he held for almost a decade.

The principal achievement of Levi’s life was undoubtedly his campaign to achieve a greater awareness of both the gulf separating the industrial north of Italy from the rural south, and the resultant social problems. His political exile in Lucania was crucial for Levi, as it placed him in direct contact with the life of local peasants—an environment drastically different from his own upbringing in the industrial city of Turin. The inhabitants of Lucania still lived in a feudal society, virtually ignored by the modern Italian state. The publication of Cristo si è fermato a Eboli (Christ Stopped at Eboli) resulted in a literary cause célèbre in post-war Italy. With a candour impossible during the years of Fascist censorship, Levi described the social conditions of the tiny village of Gagliano, presented under the fictitious name of Aliano, which became a symbol of all such forgotten towns of the south.

Like the rest of Levi's writings, the work is of a nonfictional character. Indeed, the only truly literary aspect of these documentary memoirs is to be found in the title itself, which alludes to a local popular saying. Eboli is the last major town on the road southward to Lucania, the ancient Appian Way. Christ, or rather Christianity, is a metaphor for western culture that has not made its way beyond Eboli to the wasteland of Lucania. The peasants describe themselves as less than human beings, without civilization, and cut off from the world beyond the confines of their remote region. The harsh realities of their basic existence are related by Levi in a simple, direct manner, and it is for this reason that literary critics have referred to his work as "neo-realist" in both style and content. By presenting this reality to a national audience for the first time, Levi encouraged political debate on the Southern question, a central concern in post-war Italy, and to this day not yet resolved completely. Levi's name is thus inexorably linked to his first published book and the ensuing controversy. Throughout his later life, the author worked tirelessly to promote the concerns of the inhabitants of Italy's south.

Although it may be less celebrated, one other work is actually more crucial to an understanding of Levi's philosophy. Paura della libertà (Fear and Freedom) predates Christ Stopped at Eboli in its date of composition, but was published in the following year, after the great success of the author's first novel. This essay, never originally intended for publication, gives us the essence of the author's philosophy. Beginning with the premise that the crisis which led to the outbreak of World War II in Europe had its origins in the soul of modern man, Levi analyses various aspects of the contemporary soul in order to demonstrate that liberty is not to be feared, but rather to be understood and desired as a response to the empty rhetoric of Fascist authority.

Levi's minor works are all imbued with his political philosophy, and, with one exception, are all non-fictional. The only novel written by Levi is L'orologio (The Watch), a fictionalized account of the political situation in post-World War II Italy, during the passage from the period of the Resistance under Ferruccio Parri's leadership to the Cold War and Alcide De Gasperi's government. However, for most readers, Christ Stopped at Eboli is considered Levi's first and foremost literary work.

—Jordan Lancaster

See the essay on Christ Stopped at Eboli.

LEVI, Primo

Also wrote as Damiano Malabaila. Born: Turin, Italy, 31 July 1919. Education: Educated at d'Azeglio grammar school, Turin, from 1934; Turin University, degree in chemistry (summa cum laude) 1941. Family: Married Lucia Morpurgo in 1947, one son and one daughter. Career: Participated in the Italian Resistance, 1943; captured and imprisoned first in Fossoli, then sent to Auschwitz concentration camp, 1944; freed by Russian forces, 1945; returned to Italy in 1945 after a long journey through Eastern Europe. Industrial chemist, SIVA, Turin, 1945–77; retired in order to be a full-time writer. Regular contributor to La Stampa, Turin. Awards: Campiello prize, 1963, 1982; Bagutta prize, 1967; Prato prize (for Resistance work), 1975; Strega prize, 1979; Viareggio prize, 1982; Kenneth B. Smilen award (with Saul Bellow), 1985. Died: Suicide, 11 April 1987.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Opere. 3 vols., 1987–90.

Collected Poems, translated by Ruth Feldman and Brian Swann. 1988; revised edition, 1992.

If This Is a Man; The Truce, translated by Stuart Woolf. 1996.

Fiction

Storie naturali (as Damiano Malabaila). 1966; parts translated by Raymond Rosenthal, in The Sixth Day and Other Tales, 1990.

Vizio di forma (stories). 1971; as The Sixth Day, translated by Raymond Rosenthal, in The Sixth Day and Other Tales, 1990.

Il sistema periodico. 1975; as The Periodic Table, translated by Raymond Rosenthal, 1984.

La chiave a stella (stories). 1978; as The Monkey Wrench, translated by William Weaver, 1986; as The Wrench, translated by Weaver, 1987.

Lilì e altri racconti (stories). 1981; as Moments of Reprieve, translated by William Weaver, 1986; also translated by Ruth Feldman, 1986.

Se non ora, quando?. 1982; as If Not Now, When?, translated by William Weaver, 1985.

Verse

L'osteria di Brema. 1975; as Shema: Collected Poems, translated by Ruth Feldman and Brian Swann, 1976.

Ad ora incerta. 1984; as At an Uncertain Hour, in Collected Poems, 1988.

Plays

Intervista aziendale (radio play), with Carlo Carducci. 1968.

Se questo è un uomo, with Pieralberto Marché. 1966.

Other

Se questo è un uomo. 1947; as If This Is a Man, translated by Stuart Woolf, 1960; as Survival in Auschwitz: The Nazi Assault on Humanity, translated by Woolf, 1961.

La tregua. 1963; as The Reawakening, translated by Stuart Woolf, 1965; as The Truce: A Survivor's Journey Home from Auschwitz, translated by Woolf, 1965.

Abruzzo forte e gentile: Impressioni d'occhio e di cuore, edited by Virgilio Orsini. 1976.

If This Is a Man; The Truce, translated by Stuart Woolf. 1979; as Survival in Auschwitz; The Reawakening: Two Memoirs, translated by Woolf, 1986.

La ricerca delle radici: Antologia personale. 1981.

Dialogo (dialogues), with Tullio Regge. 1984; as Dialogo, translated by Raymond Rosenthal, 1989; as Conversations, translated by Rosenthal, 1989.

L'altrui mestiere (essays). 1985; as Other People's Trades, translated by Raymond Rosenthal, 1989.

I sommersi e i salvati. 1986; as The Drowned and the Saved, translated by Raymond Rosenthal, 1988.

Racconti e saggi. 1986; as The Mirror Maker: Stories and Essays, translated by Raymond Rosenthal, 1989.

Autoritratto. 1987; as Conversations with Primo Levi, with Ferdinando Camon, translated by John Shepley. 1989.

The Voice of Memory: Interviews, 1961–87, edited by Marco Belpoliti and Robert Gordon, translated by Robert Gordon. 2001.

Translator, Il processo, by Kafka. 1983.

Translator, Lo squalo da lontano, by Lévi-Strauss. 1984.

Translator, La via delle maschere, by Lévi-Strauss. 1985.

*

Critical Studies: Invito alla lettura di Primo Levi by Fiora Vincenti, 1973, revised edition, 1990; Primo Levi by Giuseppe Grassano, 1981; Prisoners of Hope: The Silver Age of the Italian Jews 1924–1974 by H. St. Hughes, 1983; “Primo Levi and the Language of Atrocity” by Adam Epstein, in Bulletin for the Society of Italian Studies, 20, 1987; Il Vocabolario italiano tedesco di Se questo è un uomo di Primo Levi by Rosemarie Wildi-Benedict, 1988; “Primo Levi’s Strenuous Clarity” by Lawrence R. Schehr, in Italica, 66(4), 1989; Primo Levi as Witness edited by Pietro Frassica, 1990; A Dante of Our Time—Primo Levi and Auschwitz by Risa B. Sodi, 1990; Reason and Light: Essays on Primo Levi edited by Susan Tarrow, 1990; Come leggere Se questo è un uomo by Claudio Toscani, 1990; Ascoltando Primo Levi: Organizzazione, narrazione, etica by Giuseppe Varchetta, 1991; Primo Levi e Se questo è un uomo by Alberto Cavaglian, 1993; Primo Levi: Bridges of Knowledge by Mirna Cicioni, 1995; Understanding Primo Levi by Nicholas Patruno, 1995; Primo Levi: Tragedy of an Optimist by Myriam Anissimov, translated by Steve Cox, 1998; Holocaust Literature: Schulz, Levi, Spiegelman and the Memory of the Offence by Gillian Banner, 2000; Primo Levi’s Ordinary Virtues: From Testimony to Ethics by Robert S.C. Gordon, 2001; Primo Levi and the Politics of Survival by Frederic D. Homer, 2001; Memory and Mastery: Primo Levi as Writer and Witness, edited by Roberta S. Kremer, 2001.

* * *

One of the most famous of contemporary Italian writers, and one of the world’s best writers on the Holocaust, Primo Levi repeatedly stated that his initial motivation to write came from the need to bear witness after his deportation from Italy. He is identified, both in Italy and abroad, with his testimony on Auschwitz, which is the central theme of three of his books, and which is present to varying degrees in all his writings. However, Levi’s works go far beyond mere testimony, and are characterized by the constant attempt to mediate between several different cultures and world-views.

Se questo è un uomo (If This Is a Man), published first in 1947, is the account of Levi’s arrest, deportation, and survival in Buna-Monowitz, one of the satellite camps of Auschwitz. It stands out among Holocaust literature because of the author’s determination not only to bear witness, but also to clarify and understand the “gigantic biological and social experience” of the camps. The aspect Levi consistently stresses, as suggested in the title, is the contrast between the order of the Lager (the camp), which dehumanizes, enslaves, and finally eliminates the prisoners with “geometrical madness,” and his own endeavours to ascertain “what is essential and what adventitious to the conduct of the human animal in the struggle for life.” The descriptions of life, work, and death in the camp are all the more powerful because they are filtered through Levi’s rigorous training as a scientist: they move inductively from particular experiences to universal reflections on what may constitute individual identity and self-awareness when everything—country, loved ones, language, name—has been forcibly removed. The numerous explicit or implicit references to Dante’s Inferno are, rather than mere literary conceits, attempts to convey the unprecedented degradation and despair of Auschwitz through the only available analogy.

La tregua (The Truce) follows the survivors’ eventful journey home and their gradual return to humanity from their initial utter shame and hopelessness. The survivor’s odyssey through the former Soviet Union and Eastern Europe is also a quest for human contacts and co-operation, and contains, as well as constant reminders that the poison of Auschwitz is “irreparable and final, present everywhere,” moments of relaxation and joy, and humorous descriptions of incongruous behaviour on the margins of civilization.

I sommersi e i salvati (The Drowned and the Saved), Levi’s last book, written 40 years after If This Is a Man, is a critical re-examination of the subject matter of the first book. Its explicitly stated purpose is to ascertain “how much of the concentration camp world is dead and will not return, [and] how much is back or coming back.” The title itself is problematic: through it, Levi stresses that those who survived, the “saved,” did so not because of their greater worth, but because they were in some cases lucky, and in most cases aggressive and ready to co-operate with the oppressors. The “drowned,” those who did not return to bear witness, were often the best people. The verbs “to know” and “to understand” recur throughout the text, highlighting the central argument: knowledge and understanding are essential, especially for those who are young 40 years after Auschwitz, because what happened once can happen again, everywhere. To keep asking questions—including uncomfortable questions about “the grey zone” of the victims who co-operated with the oppressors, and about the shame and guilt of the survivors—is emphasized as an intellectual as well as a moral duty.

The rest of Levi’s creative production is characterized by the explicit desire to build a variety of bridges between different cultures. Il sistema periodico (The Periodic Table)—a collection of 21 stories, each named after an element of Dimitri Mendeleev’s table, and arguably Levi’s masterpiece—is at the same time a fragmentary autobiography, a history of Levi’s generation, and an attempt to convey to readers of literature some aspects of the conflicts and lessons of scientific learning, specifically some aspects and meanings of the chemist’s trade, which is “a particular instance, a more strenuous version of the business of living.” La chiave a stella (The Wrench)—a collection of 14 stories in which a globe-trotting industrial steel-rigger recounts his humorous or dramatic successes and failures in several continents—can be read as a series of variations on the theme of skilled work, written in order to convey some of its practical and moral lessons to implied readers unfamiliar with technological processes.

Se non ora, quando? (If Not Now, When?)—the story of a band of Jewish guerrilla fighters who move through Nazi-occupied Eastern Europe, and finally set off from Italy for Palestine—was written with the purpose of paying homage to those Jews who had found the courage and the skills to fight back, and of explaining the cultural and ideological plurality of Jewishness, Ashkenazi Jewishness in particular, to Levi's Italian readers. It contains therefore both characters who represent diverse Jewish religious and secular ideologies, and a multiplicity of cultural references that include proverbs, songs, blessings, examples from the Talmud, folktales, and a number of carefully glossed Yiddish expressions.

The "technology-fiction" stories collected in Vizio di forma (The Sixth Day) are speculations on possible, and generally undesirable, future developments of highly industrialized capitalist societies, with an implicit continuity between the moral failings of contemporary science and the "geometric madness" of Auschwitz. The 50 or so brief essays written originally for La Stampa, and collected under the title L'altrui mestiere (Other People's Trades), are evidence of Levi's pleasure in extending his knowledge from the natural sciences to literature, from philology to the technology of the 1980s, and in communicating his discoveries to his readers. Levi also wrote some poetry, which ranges from the "concise and gruesome" poems written soon after his return from Auschwitz, to later meditations on individual isolation and implicit comparisons between animals and human beings.

In The Drowned and the Saved Levi defines an intellectual as "the person educated beyond his daily trade; whose culture is alive inasmuch as it makes an effort to renew itself, increase itself and keep up to date; and who does not react with indifference or irritation when confronted by any branch of knowledge." This clearly applies to Levi himself, and to his consistently rational and ethical production.

—Mirna Cicioni

See the essay on The Periodic Table.

LEZAMA LIMA, José

Born: Havana, Cuba, 19 December 1910 (some sources give 1912). Grew up in the Fort Barrancas military camp, Pensacola. Education: Educated at the Instituto de Havana, until 1928; University of Havana, degree in law 1938. Family: Married María Luisa Bautista in 1965. Career: Worked briefly in private law practice after graduation; official, Higher Council for Social Security, 1938–40, and from 1941; director, Department of Culture, Ministry of Education, from 1945; travelled to Mexico, 1949, Jamaica, 1950; director, Department of Literature and Publications, National Council of Culture, Havana, from 1959, and adviser, Cuban Centre for Literary Investigation. Editor or coeditor, Verbum (with Guy Pérez de Cisneros), 1937, Espuela de Plata, 1939–41, Nadie Parecía, 1942–44, Orígenes, 1944–56. One of six vice-presidents, Cuban Union of Artists and Writers (UNEAC), 1959–62. Died: 9 August 1976.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Obras completas, edited by Cintio Vitier. 2 vols., 1975–77.
Poesía completa. 1985.
Poesía, edited by Emilio de Armas. 1992.

Fiction

Paradiso. 1966; revised edition, edited by Julio Cortázar and Carlos Monsiváis, 1968; also edited by Eloísa Lezama Lima, 1980, and Cintio Vitier, 1988; as Paradiso, translated by Gregory Rabassa, 1974.
Lezama Lima (anthology). 1968.
Oppiano Licario (unfinished). 1977; edited by César López, 1989.
Juego de las decapitaciones (stories). 1982.
Relatos. 1987.

Verse

Muerte de Narciso. 1937; selection edited by David Huerta, 1988.
Enemigo rumor. 1941.
Aventuras sigilosas. 1945.
La fijeza, illustrations by René Portocarrero. 1949.
Dador. 1960.
Antología de la poesía cubana. 3 vols., 1965.
Poesía completa. 1970.
Poesía completa. 1975.
Fragmentos a su imán. 1977.

Other

Coloquio con Juan Ramón Jiménez. 1938.
La pintura de Aristides Fernández. 1950.
Aristides Fernández (essay). 1950.
Analecta del reloj (essays). 1953.
Gradual de laudes: El padre Gaztelu en la poesía. 1955.
La expresión americana (lectures). 1957.
Tratados en La Habana (essays). 1958.
Órbita (interviews and selected texts) edited by Armando Álvarez Bravo. 1966.
Los grandes todos (anthology). 1968.
Posible imagen de José Lezama Lima, edited by José Agustín Goytisolo. 1969.
Esferaimagen; Sierpe de Don Luis de Góngora; Las imágenes posibles, edited by José Agustín Goytisolo. 1970.
La cantidad hechizada (essays). 1970.
Nuevo encuentro con Víctor Manuel. 1970.
Introducción a Los vasos órficos (essays). 1971.
Algunos tratados en La Habana. 1971.
Las eras imaginarias. 1971; reprinted 1982.
Interrogando a Lezama Lima. 1972.
Cangrejos y golondrinas (stories and essays). 1977.
Cartas (1939–1976), edited by Eloísa Lezama Lima. 1979.
Imagen y posibilidad (miscellany), edited by Ciro Bianchi Ross. 1981.
El reino de la imagen (selected essays), edited by Julio Ortega. 1981.
Confluencias (essays). 1988.
La Habana, edited by Gastón Baquero. 1991.
Mi correspondencia con Lezama Lima, by José Rodríguez Feo. 1991.

*

Bibliography: "A Bibliography of the Fiction of Carpentier, Cabrera Infante, and Lezama Lima," in Abraxas, 1(3), 1971, and Cuban Literature: A Research Guide, 1985, both by David William Foster; Sobre José Lezama Lima y sus lectores: Guía y compendio bibliográfico by Justo C. Ulloa, 1987.

Critical Studies: Recopilación de textos sobre José Lezama Lima edited by Pedro Simón, 1970; Lezama Lima: Peregrino inmóvil (Paradiso al desnudo): Un estudio crítico by Álvaro de Villa and José Sánchez-Boudy, 1973; Major Cuban Novelists, 1976, and The Poetic Fiction of José Lezama Lima, 1983, both by Raymond D. Souza; Novelística cubana de los años 60: Paradiso; El mundo alucinante by Gladys Zaldívar, 1977; José Lezama Lima: Textos críticos edited by J.C. Ulloa, 1979; Bajo el signo de Orfeo: Lezama Lima y Proust by Jaime Valdivieso, 1980; Voces by Cintio Vitier, 1982; Coloquio internacional sobre la obra de José Lezama Lima edited by A. Álvarez Bravo, 2 vols., 1984; The American Gnosis of José Lezama Lima by Ruben Ríos-Ávila, 1984; El paradiso de Lezama Lima by Carmen Ruiz Barrionuevo, 1986; Lezama Lima edited by E. Suárez Galbán, 1987; José Lezama Lima; o, El hechizo de la búsqueda by Rita V. Molinero, 1989; José Lezama Lima's Joyful Vision: A Study of Paradiso and Other Prose by Gustavo Pellón, 1989; José Lezama Lima: Poet of the Image by Emilio Bejel, 1990; Lezama Lima. Una cosmología poética by Lourdes Rensoli and Ivette Fuentes, 1990; José Lezama Lima by E. Márquez, 1991; Assimilation/Generation/Resurrection: Contrapuntal Readings in the Poetry of José Lezama Lima by Ben A. Heller, 1997; From Modernism to Neobaroque: Joyce and Lezama Lima by César Augusto Salgado, 2001.

* * *

The work of the Cuban writer José Lezama Lima defies classification. Poet, novelist, essayist, and one of Cuba's leading intellectuals both before and after the Revolution, he made his name in Latin America and internationally with the novel Paradiso. Much of Lezama Lima's work was written before 1959, but his Catholic beliefs, open discussion of homosexuality, and the more general hermeticism of his work did not make him popular with the revolutionaries. Although Lezama Lima's work was somewhat marginalized in Cuba during the 1960s and 1970s (despite his holding of a series of official posts), it has been re-assessed more recently, and he is now considered a genius and visionary by many young Cuban writers, especially after the demise of Marxism in Europe.

Lezama Lima's creative writing should be approached as an integrated, coherent corpus. His life's objectives—to plumb the mysteries of the unknown, and to search the invisible and incomprehensible world which lies beyond reality as we know it—remained constant and uncompromising throughout. From the 1930s onwards, he founded and edited a series of avant-garde literary magazines culminating in the outstanding review, Orígenes, which became the focal point for a new generation of Cuban writers and artists including José Rodríguez Feo, Eliseo Diego, Cintio Vitier, and Fina García Marruz. It was in Orígenes that Lezama Lima published the first five chapters of Paradiso.

Lezama Lima's poetry, which he referred to as his "dark work," was much influenced by the neo-Góngora movement of the 1920s, his early encounter with Juan Ramón Jiménez, the French avant-garde, and surrealism. His first publication, the poem Muerte de Narciso [Death of Narcissus], exemplifies the complex baroque style and formal rigour he was to cultivate, and is best read as a coda to his work as a whole. Narciso, the aesthete and poet, who is bedazzled by his reflected self-image, fulfils his desire to penetrate and merge with the unknown self in death. The hermetic poems of Enemigo rumor [Enemy Murmur], often considered his most important collection, enquire into the nature of reality beyond appearances in a profusion of oneiric and quasi-mystical images. Aventuras sigilosas [Discreet

Adventures], more accessible and formally heterogeneous, includes poetic prose and cryptic aphorisms. La fijeza [Fixity] continues the quest for transcendental knowledge through art and erudition in lengthy poems, epigrammatic verse, and intensely worked poetic prose-essays. Dador [Donor], Lezama Lima's most extensive work of poetry, similarly exults in an outpouring of hyperbolic, esoteric imagery, while the posthumously published Fragmentos a su imán [Fragments to His Magnet], written during the 1970s, is less obscure. The 1985 volume of Lezama Lima's complete poetical works (dedicated in their entirety to his mother) includes poems not-previously published in books, as well as his first, hitherto unpublished collection, "Inicio y escape" [Beginning and Escape] (written 1927–32).

Poetry imbues all Lezama Lima's work. For him it was the rationality of the unreal, the cult of mystery, the revelation that conceals. According to Cintio Vitier (1958) poetry was Lezama Lima's means of penetrating reality: the image functions as axis between history and poetry, and metaphor enables the acquisition of self-knowledge through analogy. The mission of the South American poet, therefore, was to discover the nature of the image.

The key to the interpretation of Lezama Lima's prose and poetry is to be found in his collections of essays. These do not make for easy reading, but lift the essay genre to the heights of conceptual lyricism. Thematically, they are inseparable from the rest of his work and constitute further explorations into his teleology. Four collections are particularly important: Analecta del reloj [Analecta of the Clock], which deals with several writers including Garcilaso, Valéry, Julián de Casal, Joyce, and Mallarmé; La expresión americana [American Expression], where Lezama Lima posits criollo (Creole) art as fundamentally baroque, in as much as it is formed from the reconstitution of old myths; and Tratados en La Habana [Essays in Havana] and La cantidad hechizada [The Bewitched Quantity] which discuss poetics and aesthetics.

Lezama Lima gained international recognition with Paradiso, which, he claimed, could only be understood "beyond reason" by a few select readers. It was begun in the late 1940s and completed after his mother's death in 1964. To describe this masterpiece, the result of a lifetime's work, as a semi-autobiographical Bildungsroman would be to understate grossly the complex density of this unique text, referred to by Reinaldo Arenas as "the exuberant reconstruction of the life of a poet." Novel, epic, philosophical treatise, and poetic prose, Paradiso is usually read as an allegory or fable portraying the young hero, José Cemí (signifying "image" or "idol"), growing up and progressing through the various stages of spiritual perfection to fulfil his family destiny. The first eight chapters trace an autobiographical narrative centring on Cemí's family and childhood up to his father's death. This first half deals with the development of the embryonic man within the protective family womb dominated by the mother. The brutal sexuality of chapter eight, which describes in daring detail heterosexual and homosexual eroticism, announces the more amorphous second section of the novel. Through a series of juxtaposed anecdotes, the hero is seen to cross the intellectual quagmires presented by the philosophical disquisitions of his student companions, Fronesis and Foción (representing the positive and the negative respectively) at Upsalón (University of Havana), until he ascends out of the realms of darkness to reach the final encounter with the master himself, Oppiano Licario, in the penultimate chapter. Thus Cemí, initiated as poet and redeemed through poetry, moves towards inner growth and outer experience.

The novel is marked by a wealth of erudition and intertextual allusion, and by its exquisite language which often defies translation.

For example, from Paradiso: “Foción listened to him as one who watches a branch break off in relation to the stone it will cover, the tiger that it will awaken, the splash it will make in the current,” or:

After a dish of such impressive appearance, with flowing colours like those of a flambée, nearing the baroque but still gothic, owing to the baking and allegories sketched by the prawns, Doña Augusta wanted to calm the rhythm of the meal with a beet salad that had received a spatula lick of mayonnaise, crossed by Lubeck asparagus.

(translated by Gregory Rabassa)

Lezama Lima was working on the continuation of Paradiso, a novel entitled Oppiano Licario, when he died. Fragments of the novel were published posthumously in 1977 but other sections have since been discovered, and a new edition appeared in 1989. In this second novel the main characters from Paradiso reappear, but looming over them all is the singularly original yet paradigmatic Oppiano Licario (his name stemming from Icarus), the master and (some critics believe) the mirror-image of Lezama Lima himself. Oppiano Licario is complemented by the feminine principle, his sister Ynaca Eco who represents poetry. She infuses Cemí with divine spirituality through the sexual act, which—for Lezama Lima—was a means of reaching knowledge and of communicating with the universe.

Lezama Lima devised his impressive “poetic system” in an attempt to capture the unknown mysteries of the infinite through imagery, to express the inexpressible, and to make the invisible visible.

—Catherine Davies

Li Ang

Pseudonym for Shih Shu-tuan. Born: Lu-kang, Taiwan, 4 April 1952. Education: University of Chinese Culture, Taipei, Taiwan, B.A., 1974; University of Oregon at Eugene, M.A., 1977. Family: Never married; younger sister of Shih Shunü, literary critic, and Shih Shu-ch’ing, novelist. Career: Instructor of Dramatic Arts, University of Chinese Culture, Taipei, Taiwan. Lives in Taipei County, Taiwan. Award: United Daily News prize for fiction (Taiwan), 1983

PUBLICATIONS

Fiction

Hunsheng hechang [Mixed Chorus] (short stories). 1975.
Renjian shi [The Mundane World] (short stories). 1977.
Aiqing shiyan [Experiments in Love] (short stories). 1982.
Shafu. 1983; as The Butcher’s Wife, translated by Howard Goldblatt, 1986; reissued as The Butcher’s Wife and Other Stories, 1995.
Tamen de yanlei [Their Tears] (short stories). 1984.
Huaji [Flower Season] (short stories). 1985.
Anye [Dark Nights]. 1985.
Yifeng weiji de qingshu [A Love Letter Never Sent]. 1986.
Nianhua [Youthful Years]. 1988.
Miyuan [The Labyrinth]. 1991.

Beigang xianglu renren ca [Everybody Sticks Their Incense in the Beigang Burner] (novel in stories). 1997.
Zizhuan no xiaoshuo [Autobiography: A Novel]. 1999.

Other

Qunxiang [Images]. 1976.
Nüxing de yijian [A Woman’s Opinion] (newspaper columns). 1984.
Waiyu [Extramarital Affairs]. 1985.
Zouchu anye [Leaving the Dark Nights] (newspaper columns). 1986.
Maomi yu qingren [Cats and Lovers] (essays). 1987.
Li Ang shuo qing [Li Ang Talks of Love] (newspaper columns). 1994.
 Editor, Ai yu zui [Love and Sin]. 1979.
 Editor, Jing yu deng [The Mirror and the Lamp]. 1984.

*

Bibliography: Li Ang, Beigang xianglu renren ca, 1997.

Critical Studies: “Sex and Society: The Fiction of Li Ang” by Howard Goldblatt, in Worlds Apart, 1990; “From Sexual Protest to Feminist Social Criticism: Li Ang’s Works 1967–1987” by Helmut Martin, in Chinese Literature in Southeast Asia, 1989; “Li Ang’s The Butcher’s Wife” by Sheung-Yuen Daisy Ng, in Modern Chinese Literature, vol. 4, nos. 1–2, 1988; “The Labyrinth of Meaning: A Reading of Li Ang’s Fiction” by Sheung-Yuen Daisy Ng, in Tamkang Review, vol. 18, nos. 1–4, 1988; “Li Ang’s Experiments with the Epistolary Form” by Sheung-Yuen Daisy Ng, in Modern Chinese Literature, vol. 3, nos. 1–2, 1987; “Shapes of Darkness: Symbols in Li Ang’s Dark Night” by Michelle Yeh, in Modern Chinese Women Writers, 1989; “From Utopian to Dystopian World: Two Faces of Feminism in Contemporary Taiwanese Women’s Fiction” by Yingying Chien, in World Literature Today, vol. 68, nos. 1, 1994; “Panni yu jiushu—Li Ang guilai de xunxi” [“Rebellion and Redemption—the Message of Li Ang’s Homecoming”] by Lin I-chieh, in Appendix to Tamen de yanlei by Li Ang, 1984; “Protest of a Woman Author against Reckless Accusations” (self-interview), by Li Ang, in Modern Chinese Writers: Self-Portrayals, 1992.

* * *

Li Ang has often acknowledged that she draws most of her creative inspiration from the coastal town of Lu-kang in central Taiwan, where she was born. Generally regarded as one of Taiwan’s most talented and controversial writers, she began writing at the age of sixteen, when she published her first story, “Flower Season,” which deals with a young woman’s curiosity about sex at a time when such topics were taboo. Over the next few years, before entering college in Taipei, she published several more astonishingly mature stories, such as the Kafkaesque “Wedding Ritual” and the highly erotic “Curvaceous Dolls,” all of which deal with sexual awakening and fantasies, but with a degree of authorial distance that makes these stories seem gender-neutral. Nonetheless, traditional Chinese society’s aversion to the discussion of sex inevitably drew attacks to her, especially with the publication of a story titled “The Mundane World” in 1973, written while the author was still in college. Set in the environment of a public school, the author examines the tragic results of a culture-wide suppression of sexuality among the young. Interestingly, according to the author herself, not until she went to college did she actually see herself as a woman, and a more feminine tone than was apparent in her earliest works began to creep into her stories.

After returning from the University of Oregon in 1977, M.A. degree in hand, she recommenced her writing career, continuing to focus on issues of love, sexuality and, in particular, the abuse of women in a modernizing world. The latter culminated in the publication of an internationally acclaimed short novel, Shafu (The Butcher's Wife), which won Taiwan's prestigious United Daily News prize for fiction in 1983. Long before domestic abuse and violence against women had become a widely recognized problem, even in the United States, The Butcher's Wife brought the issue to the attention of Taiwanese society, which, not surprisingly, led to more attacks, many of them personal and extremely vicious. The novel centers on an abusive butcher who uses food to control his wife sexually and psychologically. The protagonist is forced to prostitute herself to her husband, while women of the neighborhood pass on moralistic judgment and scathing criticism of her. Driven by the double oppression of marital brutality and social pressures, she eventually takes up her husband's knife and butchers him in the same fashion that he slaughters pigs. Readers generally agree that this is a novel attacking the Chinese patriarchal society with the graphic descriptions of people's most basic needs—food and sex. But what has often escaped their attention is that the neighborhood women actually assist in pushing her farther into the inferno of abuses. In this sense, contrary to what many of her most severe critics have claimed, Li Ang is not attacking Chinese men, but Chinese tradition; in her own words, the novel is more about humanity than about women.

Although the issue of sexual politics in the Chinese context remains Li Ang's dominant theme, she nonetheless constantly seeks ways to broaden her scope and, more importantly, keep up with the rapid social and cultural changes in contemporary Taiwan. Her second novel, Anye [Dark Nights], is exemplary in this regard, although it is generally considered to be an artistically inferior, if more daring, novel. Depicting a group of middle- and upper-class men and women in the increasingly materialistic world of cosmopolitan Taipei, Anye attempts to capture the complexities of modern life without losing sight of the issues that concern the author most: infidelity, humiliation, and manipulation in the business world, and how women figure in the never-ending struggle with men. Explicit depictions of sexual activities remain the center of controversy over this work, although Li Ang's detractors often ignore the parallels between sexual conquest and domination in the ruthless world of business.

In 1991, four years after the lifting of martial law in Taiwan, Li Ang wrote her most political novel, Miyuan [The Labyrinth]. As writers began to publicly explore the effects of the "White Terror" of the Chiang Kai-shek regime, Li Ang merged the dual quest of recapturing both family and national (Taiwanese) history, releasing the secrets of the past through the protagonist's relationship with a man who mediates that quest, both intellectual and sexually. Even given the warming intellectual and political climate of the time, Li Ang was forced to self-publish this explosive novel (it was later re-released by one of Taiwan's most highly respected literary presses). Li Ang's experience as a female participant in a predominantly male politic milieu prompted her to compose her next work, Beigang xianglu renren ca [Everybody Sticks Their Incense in the Beigang Burner], a collection of four linked stories on sex and politics. A scandal erupted when one of the stories was serialized in a leading newspaper, The China Times, when readers identified the characters in her story with real life political figures: a flamboyant former DPP

Chairman and the female secretary of public relations. The secretary threatened to sue Li Ang for slander, which helped increase sales of the book to an unprecedented level. Unfortunately, the controversy obscured the core issues of Li Ang's work: an exploration of the intricate connection between sex and politics in post martial-law Taiwan, an examination of the role of women in the formation of a true opposition party in Taiwan's democratization process, and an investigation of the ways in which women obtain political power. Ultimately, the work forces the reader to ponder the fundamental question of feminism, that is, whether women should empower themselves by exploiting their sexuality.

Never content to cater to her reading public or shy away from controversy, Li Ang has been a catalyst for change in bringing important social, political, and cultural issues to the Taiwanese people's attention: from her earliest work, which tackles female sexuality and fantasy, to The Butcher's Wife, which deals with domestic abuse and sexual politics, to Anye, which exposes the roles of sex and women in the business world, and finally, to her latest works, Beigang xianglu renren ca, and Zizhuan no xiaoshuo [Autobiography: A Novel], both of which focus on women and politics, with the latter adding fiction to the known facts of an early 20th century feminist and member of the Taiwan Communist Party, narrated as autobiography.

—Sylvia Li-Chun Lin

LI BAI

Also known as Li Po and Li Taibo. Born: Central Asia, in 701 or possibly 705; brought up in Sichuan province, China. Family: Married four times. Career: Spent a few years as a Daoist hermit in his teens, and trained as a knight-errand before the age of 25. Spent early life in wandering; was summoned to the court of Emperor Xuanzong, 742, and retained as an unofficial court poet until 745; fell victim to the intrigue of the influential court officials and left the court in disgrace; lived as wanderer again, and entered service of Prince Lin, brother of Emperor Suzong, 757, but was banished after Lin's defeat in a bid for the throne, 759. Died: 762.

PUBLICATIONS

Works

Li Taibai wenji (works). 1717 (based on 8th-century manuscripts); modern editions: Sibu beiyao, 1936—; Li Taibai quanji [Complete Works], edited by Wang Qi, 3 vols., 1977; selections: Lyrics, translated by Michitaro Hisa and William Wells Newell, 1905; "Cathay," translated by Ezra Pound, in his Poetry, 1915; Lustra, translated by Ezra Pound, 1916; Li Po: The Chinese Poet, translated by Shigeyoshi Obata, 1922; Tu Fu and Li Po: Selected Poetry, edited and translated by Arthur Cooper, 1973; Li Po: A New Translation (bilingual edition), translated by Sun Yu, 1982; translated by Bradford S. Miller, 1997.

Endless River: Li Po and Tu Fu, A Friendship in Poetry, edited by Sam Hamill. 1993.

Three Chinese Poets: Translations of Poems by Wang Wei, Li Bai, and Du Fu, translated by Vikram Seth. 1992.

Selected Poems of Li Po, translated by David Hinton. 1996.

*

Critical Studies: The Poetry and Career of Li Po by Arthur Waley, 1950; "On Li Po" by E.O. Eide, in Perspectives on the T'ang, edited by A.F. Wright and D. Twitchett, 1973; The Genius of Li Po by Wong Siu-kit, 1974; The Poet Li Po by Yung Teng Chia-ye, 1975; "The Lonely Journey: The Travels of Li Po" by J.W. Fenn, in Asian Culture Quarterly, 8, 1980; "Li Po and Tu Fu: A Comparative Study" by Huang Kuo-pin, in Renditions, 21–22, 1984.

* * *

No poet, except Du Fu, holds so prominent a position as Li Bai among Chinese classical poets since the Tang dynasty. He was highly praised by the poets of his time, earning the title "celestial poet." His poems, especially because of their exuberant and romantic style, were admired and imitated by later poets, and also widely read by succeeding generations.

Li Bai was born of a wealthy family and lived an extravagant life when he was young. He learned swordplay and in his early years the scope of his reading was wide. At the age of 26 he left his native place and became a poor wanderer, travelling over most of the country. He visited famous mountains and rivers, Daoist priests and temples. As his reputation spread, he was recommended to the imperial court and soon summoned by the Emperor to Chang'an, the capital. Although he wanted to become involved in the administration of state affairs and to help improve the quality of people's lives, he was employed only to write poems for the Emperor's pleasure. He despised the corrupt and treacherous court officials. (On one occasion, he forced Gao Lishi, a powerful eunuch, to take off his boots in the presence of the Emperor.) After he left the court, he went through great hardships in his later life of wandering.

His love for the beauty of nature and his legendary experiences contributed a great deal to the enduring themes and style of his poems. In many poems he described the beautiful landscape of the swift Yellow River, the precipitous mountains, and the long and wide Yangzi River. Some of these poems, such as "Viewing the Waterfall at Mount Lu," rank as masterpieces. The scene of the falls delineated in the verse: "Flying waters descending straight three thousand feet, Till I think the Milky Way has tumbled from the ninth height of Heaven" is like a beautiful picture.

He was a patriot, and his poems express his love for the country and sympathy for the sufferings of the common people. He condemned the evil war in his verse: "White bones are piling up like hills, Why should the people suffer?" Failing to fulfil his wish to save the common people and help the country out of great difficulties, he nevertheless severely criticized and mocked the debauched and treacherous court officials in his poems, while, on the other hand, he revealed his personal anguish and melancholy. From time to time he found escape from his worldly trouble in retirement and indulgence in wine: "I'm glad to talk and drink good wine, Together with my hermit friend. I'm drunk and you're merry and glad, We both forget the world is sad." As he was unsatisfied with life, he expressed in his poems his wish to withdraw from human society and seek happiness by living in seclusion. For him wine was indispensable. He said bluntly in "The Song of Wine": "I wish to drink myself drunk, never to become sober again."

Among other poems, "I Miss My Husband When Spring Comes," "Lovesick," and "The Crows Caw in the Evening" are expressive of faithful love and the grief of lovers separated by long military service.

He described in "Ballads of Four Seasons" the feeling of a woman longing for her husband to return home: "When will they put down the barbarians and my good man come home from his far campaign?" Elsewhere he showed his sympathy with women forsaken by their husbands. "Waiting in Vain," for example, exhibits grudges borne by a fair lady against her lover who has probably deserted her: "Wet stains of tears can still be seen. Who, heartless, has caused her the pain?"

Li Bai learned from his predecessors and from the folk songs and ballads (yuefu poetry). He inherited the traditions of Chinese poetry but developed his own style, characterized by his brilliant imagination, exquisite but not ornate language, and by delicate, vivid, yet natural descriptions. As far as aesthetic value is concerned, in the history of Chinese literature there is hardly any ancient poet of later generations who could equal him.

—Binghong Lu

See the essays on "Hard is the Road to Shu" and "Invitation to Wine."

LI PO

See LI BAI

LI TAIBO

See LI BAI

LIMA, José Lezama

See LEZAMA LIMA, José

LINNA, Väinö

Born: Urjala, Finland, 20 December 1920. Military Service: Served in the army during Finland's Continuation War against the Soviet Union, 1941–44. Family: Married Kerttu Seuri in 1945; two children. Career: Worked on farms and in the mill industry; factory worker, Tampere, 1938–55. Awards: Finnish state literature prize, 1959, 1960; Nordic prize, 1963; Finnish cultural prize, 1974. Died: 21 April 1992.

PUBLICATIONS

Fiction

Päämäärä [The Goal]. 1947.

Musta rakkaus [Black Love]. 1948.

Tuntematon sotilas. 1954; translated as The Unknown Soldier, 1957. Täältä Pohjantähden alla [Here under the North Star]. 3 vols., 1959–62.

Other

Oheisia: esseitä ja puheenvuoroja [By the Way] (essays and addresses). 1967.

Murroksia: esseitä, puheita ja kirjoituksia [Transitions] (essays, articles, and talks). 1990.

*

Critical Studies: “Väinö Linna: A Classic in His Own Time” by Yrjö Varpio, in Books from Finland, 11(3), 1977; “What Do the People Sing? Singing in Väinö Linna’s Novel The Unknown Soldier” by Jyrki Nummi, in Proceedings of the Sixth Annual Meeting of the Finno-Ugric Studies Association of Canada, edited by Joel Ashmore Nevis, 1989.

* * *

Väinö Linna’s breakthrough novel, Tuntematon sotilas (The Unknown Soldier), has become a noteworthy critical and popular success. The novel has been translated into more than 20 languages, made into two films, adapted for stage performances, and has inspired the composition of an opera. The novel is often compared with Erich Maria Remarque’s Im Westen nichts Neues (All Quiet on the Western Front) and Norman Mailer’s The Naked and the Dead, invariably to The Unknown Soldier’s advantage. Upon its first appearance in 1954, however, the novel engendered more critical controversy in Finland than any other literary work to that date—controversy which subsequently came to be known as “the literary war.” Traditionalists, in particular, saw the novel as destroying the idealistic myth about the Finnish soldier as an unselfish, ultra-nationalistic hero, a myth which the army, media, and educational institutions had been perpetuating over 30 years. Rather, The Unknown Soldier reflected a general change in attitudes in post-war Finland. In retrospect, it is difficult to say to what extent the general attitudes of the people influenced the novel, and the novel shaped the thoughts and attitudes of the people. For the post-war generations The Unknown Soldier became, besides an anti-war novel, a historical document, not in the traditional documentary sense, but in the sense that it chronicled the experience of Finland’s 20th-century war, stripped of both varnish and rhetoric.

The Unknown Soldier describes the 1941–44 war between Finland and the (then) Soviet Union from the point of view of the ordinary rank-and-file soldier. More specifically, the central characters of the novel are a platoon of machine-gunners who belong to Finland’s 11th division, troops who at the beginning of hostilities are the first to endure the enemy’s firepower at its most devastating. Linna’s mode of writing about the men’s extraordinary physical and psychological tenacity, and their ability to adjust to the inhuman demands made on them, separates his novel from All Quiet on the Western Front and The Naked and the Dead. By showing the ability of human intelligence to carry on a dialogue with itself, to differentiate between what is valuable and what is worthless even in the midst of the worst adversity, Linna portrays bitter reality in a positive light rather than as a manifestation of all-encompassing moral decay. Moreover, each of Linna’s soldiers has an exceptionally strong sense of his own worth as a human being, and it is this unshakeable sense of self that gives him his remarkable strength to endure, no matter how miserable and insignificant his existence.

Although The Unknown Soldier shows the utter futility and mindlessness of war, it consciously avoids utopian sentimentalism.

Moreover, Linna’s opposition is not to nationalism as such, but its deterioration into ultra-nationalism which valorizes combat and attaches some kind of human value to war. His realistic treatment of his subject—a war story told at “ground-level” where the results of decisions made by those in power are experienced at their toughest; where utter misery silences rather than gives birth to jingoistic sentiments; and where fear is as much a physical as an emotional experience—searches and finds in the novel’s characters what might be termed “the core human.” Thus despite being a war novel, its characters ultimately affirm life and the novel retains a positive view of humanity.

Linna’s soldiers are from different parts of Finland and speak in the dialects of their home regions. The idiosyncrasies of speech not only provide much of the humour in the novel, but also function to emphasize the individual personalities of the men, thus adding life to the novel. The fact that each man has his own unique way of expressing himself separates him from his comrades, however common their day-to-day experiences; hence his colloquial mode of speech becomes a principal feature of each soldier, and each turn of dialogue corresponds with the speaker’s nature, resulting in living, multi-dimensional characterizations.

The soldiers are an amalgam of loggers, factory workers, and simple farmers, each with virtues and vices, who nevertheless accomplish heroic deeds which lead at times to victories. Linna’s soldier is more often than not a complaining individualist with an abundant reserve of black humour, who rises above the propagandist rhetoric about war and who fights when necessary out of fear of death and out of loyalty to his comrades, not as a reflex to army discipline. In that he fights and gives his life for his country, despite his irreverent attitude, lies his greatness. The central character in the novel, the stubborn farmer, Antti Rokka, is just such a rugged individualist. In drawing his character, Linna’s creative brilliance produces a Colossus, one who never learns to obey orders with which he does not agree, and yet who as a soldier is unmatched.

It has been argued that Linna’s treatment not only misrepresents (if not vilifies), but certainly diminishes the glory bestowed upon the Finnish soldier by military experts familiar with the Finnish army’s conduct during the so-called Winter War and the subsequent 1941–44 war. They maintain that no army could have fought as effectively without iron-fisted discipline. Military-historical arguments aside, The Unknown Soldier also acknowledges the size and weight of the contribution the soldiers made; this is particularly true of the second half of the novel. In his own way Linna acknowledges what is generally known, namely that it was the Finnish soldier who guaranteed Finnish independence although both wars ended in defeat for Finland.

Linna’s employment of the rich variations in Finnish language, both in terms of colloquialisms and regional dialects, not only links this epic work with the Finnish prose tradition, but makes it an unusually challenging and problematic novel to translate. Much of the humour in the novel, the positive contrast to the cruelty and misery of war, becomes lost and the psychological dimensions of the characters are diminished in translation. Among foreign-language editions, the Swedish translation has been the most successful and the English-language edition perhaps the least impressive owing, in part, to arbitrary omissions and mistranslations. Nevertheless, reception of the novel has been as varied outside as within the sphere of its original language. It has run the gamut from being viewed as a source of study for military reserve officers, a chronicle of 20th-century history in part, a fascinating tale of battle between a modern David and Goliath, a documentation of the Finland-Soviet War to, finally, what The Unknown Soldier is above all else, a representative of the international genre of war novels. As such it is ranked among the best of its kind.

—Seija Paddon

LISPECTOR, Clarice

Born: in Tchetchnik, Ukraine, USSR (now independent republic), 10 December 1925. Family moved to Brazil, 1925, and settled in Recife, 1927. Education: Educated at the Ginásio Pernambuco, 1935–36; Colégio Sílvio Leite, Rio de Janeiro, 1937; Colégio Andrews, Rio de Janeiro; National Faculty of Law, Rio de Janeiro, 1941–44, degree in law 1944. Family: Married Mauri Gurgel Valente in 1943 (separated 1959); two sons. Career: Editor and contributor, Agência Nacional and A Noite, while still a student, 1941–44; left Brazil because of her husband's diplomatic postings: lived in Europe (principally Naples and Berne), 1944–52, and in the United States, 1952–59; returned to Rio de Janeiro after separation from her husband, 1959. Awards: Graça Aranha Foundation prize, 1944; São Paulo Cármen Dolores Barbosa prize, 1962; Golfinho de Ouro prize, 1969; Tenth National Literary Library Competition prize, 1976. Died: 9 December 1977.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Antologia cometada, edited by Samira Youssef Campedello and Benjamin Abdalla. 1981.
Selected Cronicas, translated by Giovanni Pontiero. 1996.

Fiction

Perto do coração selvagem. 1944; as Near to the Wild Heart, translated by Giovanni Pontiero, 1990.
O lustre. 1946.
A cidade sitiada: romance. 1948; revised edition, 1964; translated by Giovanni Pontiero, 1995.
Alguns contos (stories). 1952.
Laços de família (stories). 1960; as Family Ties, translated by Giovanni Pontiero, 1972.
A maçã no escuro. 1961; as The Apple in the Dark, translated by Gregory Rabassa, 1967.
A Paixão Segundo G.H. 1964; edited by Benedito Nunes, 1988; as The Passion According to G.H., translated by Ronald W. Sousa, 1988.
A Legião Estrangeira (stories and chronicles). 1964; as The Foreign Legion, translated by Giovanni Pontiero, 1986.
O mistério do coelho pensante (for children). 1967.
A mulher que matou os peixes (for children). 1968; as The Woman Who Killed the Fish, translated by Earl E. Fitz, in Latin American Literary Review, 32, July-December 1988.
Uma aprendizagem; ou, o livro dos prazeres. 1969; as An Apprenticeship; or, The Book of Delights, translated by Richard A. Mazzara and Lorri A. Parris, 1986.
Felicidade clandestina: contos. 1971.

Água viva. 1973; as The Stream of Life, translated by Elizabeth Lowe and Earl E. Fitz, 1989.
A imitação da Rosa (stories). 1973.
Onde estivestes de noite (stories). 1974; selection in Soulstorm, 1989.
A via crucis do corpo (stories). 1974; selection in Soulstorm, 1989.
A vida íntima de Laura (for children). 1974.
Cont escolhidos (stories). 1976.
A hora da estrela. 1977; as The Hour of the Star, translated by Giovanni Pontiero, 1986.
Um sopro de vida: pulsações. 1978.
Quase de verdade (for children). 1978.
A Bela e a Fera (stories). 1979.
Soulstorm (stories), translated by Alexis Levitin. 1989.

Other

De corpos inteiro (interviews). 1975.
Seleta, edited by Renato Cordeiro Gomes and Amariles Guimarães Hill. 1975.
Visão do esplendor: impressões leves. 1975.
Para não esquecer (essays). 1978.
A descoberta do mundo (diary). 1984; as Discovering the World, translated by Giovanni Pontiero, 1992.
Reading with Clarice Lispector (miscellany), edited by Hèlène Cixous, translated by Verena Andermatt Conley. 1990.
Translator, O retrato de Dorian Gray, by Oscar Wilde. 1974.

*

Bibliography: Brazilian Literature: A Research Guide by David William Foster and Walter Rela, 1990.

Critical Studies: “Existence in Laços de família” by Rita Herman, in Luso-Brazilian Review, 4(1), 1967; Clarice Lispector by Assis Brasil, 1969; “Lispector: Fiction and Comic Vision” by Massuad Moisés, translated by Sara M. McCabe, in Studies in Short Fiction, 8(1), 1971; “The Drama of Existence in Laços de família,” in Studies in Short Fiction, 8(1), 1971, and “Lispector: An Intuitive Approach to Fiction,” in Knives and Angels edited by Susan Bassnett, 1990, both by Giovanni Pontiero; Leitura de Clarice Lispector by Benedito Nunes, 1973; “Clarice Lispector and the Lyrical Novel: A Re-Examination of A maçã no escuro,” in Luso-Brazilian Review, 14(2), 1973, “The Leitmotif of Darkness in Seven Novels by Clarice Lispector,” in Chasqui: Revista de Literatura Latinoamericana, 7(2), 1978, “Freedom and Self-Realization: Feminist Characterization in the Fiction of Clarice Lispector,” in Modern Language Studies, 10(3), 1980, “Point of View in Clarice Lispector’s A hora da estrela,” in Luso-Brazilian Review, 19(2), 1982, and Clarice Lispector, 1985, all by Earl E. Fitz; “Narrative Modes in Clarice Lispector’s Laços de família: The Rendering of Consciousness” by Maria Luísa Nunes, in Luso-Brazilian Review, 14(2), 1977; “Clarice Lispector: Articulating Women’s Experience” by Naomi Lindstrom, in Chasqui: Revista de Literatura Latinoamericana, 8(1), 1978; A escritura de Clarice Lispector by Olga de Sá, 1979; “Clarice Lispector and the Clamor of the Ineffable” by Daphne Patai, in Kentucky Romance Quarterly, 27(2), 1980; Clarice Lispector edited by Samira Y. Campedello and Benjamin Abdalla, 1981; Clarice Lispector: esboço para um possível retrato by Olga Borelli, 1981; Clarice Lispector by Berta Waldman, 1983; O alto criador de Clarice Lispector by Nicolino Novello, 1987; Clarice Lispector: A Bio-bibliography, edited by Diane E. Marting, 1993; Passionate Fictions: Gender, Narrative, and Violence in Clarice Lispector by Marta Peixoto, 1994; Clarice Lispector: Spinning the Webs of Passion by Maria José Somerlate Barbosa, 1997; Sexuality and Being in the Poststructuralist Universe of Clarice Lispector: The Différance of Desire by Earl E. Fitz, 2001.

* * *

When Clarice Lispector published her first novel, Perto do coração selvagem (Near to the Wild Heart), aged 17, the critical establishment hailed this event as a turning point in Brazilian fiction, heralding as it did the advent in Brazil of the technique of stream of consciousness first experimented with in Europe by James Joyce and Virginia Woolf. The significance of the assimilation of this formal innovation to Brazilian literature encompassed (as it had in the case of its European precursors) implications of much greater import than the purely stylistic, gesturing as it did—in the case of Brazil three decades later than in Europe—towards the beginning of the articulation of a crisis of modernity which had not truly made itself felt in that country until the period immediately following the world Depression in the 1930s. It is in the context of the emergence of a new reality demanding articulation, and of the difficulties inherent in this process of articulation, earlier confronted by the European Modernists' fragmented vision of the ruins of the old order and the uncharted territory of a post-World War I scenario, that Lispector's writing must be understood; and it is in the light of this awareness, too, that the fundamental importance in Lispector's writing of language itself as that which must at once be struggled against and drawn upon in the formulation of a new reality ought to be emphasized. In her narrative fiction, therefore, much more crucially than the social problems that underwrite the Brazilian crisis of modernity the Lispector's own vision (imminent national bankruptcy, poverty, unequal distribution of wealth, the situation of women under patriarchy), the impossibility of reaching a coherent verbal expression for these dilemmas figures as the immediate and irresolvable impasse of protagonists whose perception or gaze disintegrates the very reality they seek to understand.

It is discourse itself, therefore, and the brutal authoritarianism of a language rendered all-powerful in the face of the protagonists' existential difficulties, which rules the narrative: discourse as the demiurge of self and other, discourse as the creator, source and definer of the narrative world, discourse as the linguistic articulator, classifier, and omnipotent decision-maker concerning character, time, and place in these universes of fiction. Whether dealing with first- or third-person narration, therefore, it is language itself as the instrument of gnosis that beckons character and reader with the promise of understanding, only immediately to shatter that possibility; and it is the focus on precisely that moment of fragmentation, the moment that separates the time when knowledge, truth, and comprehension are still possible from the non-linearity and disconnection of the untimely space following the instant of breakage, that is the hallmark of Lispector's writing. She dwells repeatedly, throughout each of her novels and short stories on the process whereby the everyday, the ordinary, the linguistically, intellectually, and emotionally comprehensible is set adrift, stripped of cohesion and abandoned as the disorderly remnant of a previous, now inconceivable old order. In this new reality, the focus of narrative concern in the unfolding subjectivity of the protagonists, of the world through their eyes, the process of gazing upon an erstwhile ordinary reality unwarningly rendered imponderable; and in the process, too, the concept of "ordinary reality" becomes itself questionable, or impossible, in the face of the abrupt defamiliarization of the familiar, and its subsequent destruction.

Reading Lispector, therefore, requires the acceptance of loss on the part of the reader, loss of old points of reference, of established readership assumptions, of logic, received wisdom and expectation, and the tacit readerly agreement to flow with the language of the text, and to surrender to the disorder that this language carries in its wake, put to a use that is not now necessarily the fixation of narrative meaning, but its postponement or abolition.

In consideration Lispector's writing, the uncharted intellectual/existential/emotional terrain that her protagonists' subjectivity opens up, and in confronting the manner in which these protagonists' dilemmas force us to ask questions concerning their participation or exclusion from reality, the tenability of previous definitions or normality and consciousness, linearity of time, circumscription of space, and the possibility of meaning, we are also, as readers, forced to entertain the hypothesis that logic, language, and meaning are not monopolies of a single origin, but are rather defined by multiplicity, plurality, and dispersal, and that pre-existent, transcendental meaning, therefore, is not inevitably grasped by the reading spectator, but is possibly elusive and may not exist as a single entity.

It is this acceptance of disruption of reader expectation, in other words of the reader's entitlement to processed and digestible meaning, which is required of Lispector's readers, and her refusal to provide plot or clear-cut character outlines is also what forces her reader to posit the likelihood that here is indeed a new language focused on a new reality, not just an old one put to (relatively) new usage. Language, in Lispector, is of the essence, while refusing essential, unambiguous meaning; language is life-giving and life-destroying. It is the workings of language itself which we witness in these narratives, allowing us as readers to observe its backstage manoeuvres, discarding the realist need for readerly suspension of disbelief and replacing it instead with an exhibition of its narrative status as language per se, language at play in realities invented, rather than language as a transparent window held up to a pre-existing, comprehensible reality.

Lispector's fiction is peppered with moments of epiphany or revelation; this is not, however, the revelation of an ultimate or divine meaning or explanation, but only the realization that any meaning attained is likely to be so temporary and dispersed as to relinquish the right to the very concept of meaningfulness. In terms of plot parameters or character subjectivity, this realization, in works such as A hora da estrela (The Hour of the Star) or "A imitação da rosa" ("The Imitation of the Rose"), potentially leads to a temporary or indefinite suspension of sanity, or affirmation of madness. If, as is the case with Laura in the latter text, her madness allows us a glimpse of her immersion into a new, alternative reality, it is a reality that our language, circumscribed by the limitations of logic and reason cannot convey, being reduced instead to underpinning it through images of crazed incoherence. Madness, therefore, which becomes simply an alternative consciousness following the moment of severance with everyday reality, is a leitmotif in this writer's work. Another characteristic is the relinquishing of a social underpinning in favour of prioritizing philosophical abstraction and individual subjectivity.

The latter point elicits the question of whether or not there is a dimension of social and political concern to Lispector's work, a question all the more pertinent given her frequent choice of women or the dispossessed as central to the process of subjective fragmentation at the heart of her fiction. Several critical readings have pinpointed successfully a clear social preoccupation with both feminist and material or class issues in her writing, and a thematic constancy in her consideration of problems of human disenfranchisement as a variety of levels. Lispector remains, at all these levels, therefore, one of the essential voices of Brazilian modernism and continues to influence contemporary experimental authors and intellectuals within and outside Brazil.

—Maria Manuel Lisboa

LIVY

Born: Titus Livius in Patavium (now Padua), northern Italy, in 64 or 59 BC. Family: Had one daughter and one son. Career: Settled in Rome, c. 29 BC; came to know the emperor Augustus who expressed an interest in his work; encouraged the historical studies of the future emperor Claudius. Died: AD 12 or 17.

PUBLICATIONS

Works

Ab urbe condita, as History of Rome, edited by Charles William Stocker. 2 vols., 1838–44; also edited by W. Weissenborn, revised by Müller and Heraeus, 1887–1908; Books XXI–XXII edited by T.A. Dorey, 1971, Books XXVI–XXX by P.G. Walsh, 2 vols., 1982–86, Books XXXI–XL by J. Briscoe, 2 vols., 1991; Books I–X and XXI–XXXV edited by R.M. Ogilvie, C.F. Walters, A.H. McDonald, and others, 1919–74; also edited by J. Bayet and Paul Jal, 1947–; as Roman History, translated by Philemon Holland, 1600; also translated by William Gordon, 1783; J.H. Freese, A.J. Church, and W.J. Brodribb, 1898; as History of Rome, translated by George Baker, 6 vols., 1797, revised edition, 1864; also translated by D. Spillan, Cyrus Edmonds, and William A McDevitte, 4 vols., 1849–50; J.H. Freese and Edward Sprague Weymouth, 1892–93; William M. Roberts, 1912–24; B.O. Foster, E.T. Sage, A.C. Schlesinger, and F.G. Moore [Loeb Edition; bilingual], 14 vols., 1919–59; The Early History of Rome (Books I–V), 1960, and The War with Hannibal (Books XXI–XXX), 1965, both translated by Aubrey de Selincourt, and (Books XXI–XXX) translated by Selincourt and Betty Radice, 1970; Rome and the Mediterranean (Books XXXI–XLV) translated by Henry Bettenson, 1976; Rome and Italy (Books VI–X) translated by Betty Radice, 1982; selections as Stories from Livy, translated by R.M. Ogilvie, 1970, new edition, 1981; as Stories of Rome, translated by Roger Nichols, 1982; commentary on Books I–V by R.M. Ogilvie, 1965, on Books XXXI–XXXIII, 1973, and Books XXXIV–XXXVII, 1981, both by John Briscoe; commentary on Book VI by Christina Shuttleworth Kraus, 1994; as The Rise of Rome: Books One to Five, translated with introduction and notes by T.J. Luce, 1998; as The Dawn of the Roman Empire: Books Thirty-one to Forty, translated by J.C. Yardley, 2000.

*

Critical Studies: Constancy in Livy's Latinity by K. Gries, 1947; God and Fate in Livy by I. Kajanto, 1957; Livy: His Historical Aims and Methods, 1961, and Livy, 1974, both by P.G. Walsh; A Concordance to Livy by David W. Packard, 4 vols., 1969; Livy edited by T.A. Dorey, 1971; Livy: The Composition of His History by T.J. Luce, 1977; The Prose Rhythms of Sallust and Livy by Hans Aili, 1979; Notes on the Manuscripts of Livy's Fourth Decade by John Briscoe, 1980; A Historiographical Study of Livy, Books VI–X by J.P. Lipovsky, 1981; Infinity of Narration in Livy: A Study in Narrative Technique by Toivo Viljamaa, 1983; Artistry and Ideology: Livy's Vocabulary of Virtue by Timothy J. Moore, 1989; Scipio Africanus and Rome's Invasion of Africa: A Historical Commentary on Titus Livius, Book XXIX by Philip J. Smith, 1993; Livy: Reconstructing Early Rome by Gary B. Miles, 1995; The Initiation of the Second Macedonian War: An Explication of Livy Book 31 by Valerie M. Warrior, 1996; A Commentary on Livy: Books VI–X by S.P. Oakley, 1997; Livy's Written Rome by Mary Jaeger, 1997; Discourses on Livy by Niccolò Machiavelli, translated by Julia Conaway Bondanella and Peter Bondanella, 1997; Spectacle and Society in Livy's History by Andrew Feldherr, 1998; Liby and Early Rome: A Study in Historical Method and Judgement by Gary Forsythe, 1999; Livy's Exemplary History by Jane D. Chaplin, 2000.

* * *

Although the tradition of Roman historical writing goes back to the 3rd century BC, Cicero was still able to complain in the mid-50s BC (De oratore) that the earlier Roman historians had no pretensions to literary embellishment and were unable to tell a properly constructed story; he wished that they had brought to their works an elegant style and not regarded brevity as the only stylistic virtue. But it was more than 20 years before a historian set out to eclipse the writers whom Cicero had criticized, and to produce the great historical work which Cicero had desired. That historian was Livy.

Livy's original plan was immensely ambitious: to tell the story of Rome from its legendary foundation to the death of Cicero (43 BC) in 120 volumes. In his preface to the work, almost certainly written before the end of the civil wars (49–31 BC), Livy expresses dismay at his own times and relishes the prospect of being able to escape from them by reliving the past in his history. It may therefore be inferred that he saw Roman history in terms of decline, thus following a tradition of Roman historiography already established in the 2nd century BC according to which the course of Roman history was seen as undergoing progressive degeneration. At the same time, however, Livy intended to lay before his readers examples, drawn from history, of the kind of behaviour which they should imitate and avoid (preface 10); evidently he did not exclude the possibility of Rome's recovering from the nadir epitomized by contemporary society.

Unfortunately only 35 of Livy's 120 volumes have survived (1–10, 21–45), but the flavour of his work can be appreciated in a story such as Tarquin's rape of Lucretia. The story is divided, like a miniature play, into four 'acts,' each of which is subdivided into individual 'scenes'; the action is brought before the reader's eyes by means of judiciously selected detail and the use of direct speech at crucial moments; the pathos of the episode is further underlined by effective repetitions of word and phrase; and the whole drama is designed to praise Lucretia's pudicitia (chastity) and condemn Tarquin's vis, libido, and superbia (violence, lust, arrogance). Livy's achievement in this and many other passages can be gauged where we are able to compare his work with that of a predecessor. Thus earlier historians, writing 50 years or so before, described how Manlius Torquatus and Valerius Corvinus acquired their cognomina (surnames); but the accounts are brief and crude, written in an unambitious and inelegant style. Livy has expanded the episodes with a wealth of circumstantial detail and expressed them in a “periodic” style that is the historian’s counterpart of the oratorical period of Cicero. Here, no less than in his long and patriotic treatment of the struggle against Hannibal (Books XXI–XXX), Livy convinces the reader that he is witnessing one of the glorious episodes of Rome’s past history, written in an appropriately elevated style.

No doubt Livy originally intended these earlier and glorious periods of Rome’s history to emphasize by contrast the degeneration which had set in subsequently and which was epitomized by the civil wars of his own lifetime; but at some unknown point he decided to extend the scope of his work by almost 35 years, bringing the history down to the death of Augustus’ stepson Drusus in 9 bc. This decision radically affected the whole perspective of the work. No longer did the latest years of his history afford an unhappy comparison with the past: since the extra 22 volumes (of which none survives except in summary form) now took him midway through Augustus’ reign, his revised plan meant that the latest years of his history now actually challenged the past in glory. The explanation for Livy’s change of mind presumably rests with the emperor himself, with whom the historian, as mentor to the future emperor Claudius, was on personal terms and whom he came to see as the saviour of Rome. As a result, the 142 volumes of the completed enterprise constituted a monumental testimony to a nation’s inherent greatness and its remarkable capacity for survival.

—A.J. Woodman

LLOSA, Mario Vargas

See VARGAS LLOSA, Mario

LO-JOHANSSON, (Karl) Ivar

Born: Ösmo, Sweden, 23 February 1901. Education: Self-educated. Career: Worked as a stonecutter, farmhand, journalist, workman in France, England, and Hungary, 1925–29; then full-time writer. Awards: Nio Society prize, 1941; Foundation for the Promotion of Literature Little Nobel prize, 1953; Doubloug prize, 1953, 1973; Nordic Council prize, 1979. Ph.D.: University of Uppsala, 1964. Officier de l’Ordre des Arts et des Lettres (France), 1986. Died: 10 April 1990.

PUBLICATIONS

Fiction

Måna är död [Måna Is Dead]. 1932.
Godnatt, jord. 1933; as Breaking Free, translated by Allan Tapsell, 1990.
Kungsgatan [King’s Street]. 1935.
Statarna [The Estate Workers] (stories). 2 vols., 1936–37.
Bara en mor. 1939; as Only a Mother, translated by Robert E. Bjork, 1991.
Jordproletärerna [Proletarians of the Earth]. 1941.
Traktorn [The Tractor]. 1943.

Geniet: en roman om pubertet [The Genius: A Novel of Puberty]. 1947.
Ungdomsnoveller [Stories of Youth]. 1948.
 Autobiographical Series:
Analfabeten [The Illiterate Man]. 1951.
Gårdfarihandlaren [The Country Pedlar]. 1953; as Peddling My Wares, translated with introduction by Rochelle Wright, 1995.
Stockholmaren [The Stockholmer]. 1954.
Journatisten [The Journalist]. 1956.
Författaren [The Writer]. 1957.
Socialisten [The Socialist]. 1958.
Soldaten [The Soldier]. 1959.
Proletärförfattaren [The Proletarian Writer]. 1960.
Lyckan. 1962; as Bodies of Love, translated by Allan Tapsell, 1971.
Astronomens hus [Astronomer’s House]. 1966.
Elektra, kvinna år 2070 [Woman of the Year 2070]. 1967.
Passionerna: älskog [The Passions: Love]. 1968.
Martyrerna [The Martyrs]. 1968.
Girigbukarna [The Misers]. 1969.
Karriärsterna [The Careerists]. 1969.
Vällustingarna [The Lechers]. 1970.
Lögnhalsarna [The Liars]. 1971.
Vishetslärarna [Teachers of Wisdom]. 1972.
Orders makt: historien om språket [The Power of Words]. 1973.
Nunnan i Vadstena: sedeskildringar [The Nun of Vadstena: Moral Stories]. 1973.
Folket och herrarna [The People and the Masters]. 2 vols., 1973.
Furstarna: en krönika från Gustav Vasa till Karl XII [The Rulers]. 1974.
Lastbara berättelser [Stories of Vice]. 1974.
Passionsnoveller I–II [Stories of Passion] (selection). 2 vols., 1974.
En arbetares liv: proletärnoveller [A Worker’s Life: Proletarian Stories]. 1977.

Verse

Ur klyvnadens tid [The Splitting Time]. 1958.

Other

Vagabondliv i Frankrike [Vagabond Life in France] (travel writing). 1927.
Kolet i våld [The Coal’s Power]. 1928.
Statarliv [Farm Labourer’s Lives]. 1941.
Stridsskrifter [Polemical Pamphlets]. 1946.
Statarna i bild [Estate Workers], illustrated by Gunnar Lundh. 1948.
Monism. 1948.
Ålderdom [Old Age], illustrated by Sven Järlås, 1949.
Vagabondliv [Vagabond Life]. 1949.
Ålderdoms-Sverige [Sweden for the Aged]. 1952.
Okänt Paris [Unknown Paris], illustrated by Tore Johnson. 1954.
Zigenarväg [Gypsy Ways], illustrated by Anna Riwkin-Brick. 1955.
Att skriva en roman [Writing a Novel]. 1957.
Zigenare [Gypsies]. 1963.
Statarnas liv och död [The Lives and Deaths of the Estate Workers] (selection). 1963.
Statarskolan i litteraturen [The School of Literature of the Estate Workers]. 1972.
Dagbok från 20-talet I–II [Diary from the Twenties]. 1974.
Stridsskrifter I–II [Polemical Pamphlets]. 1974.

Dagar och dagsverken: debatter och memoarer [Days and Day's Work]. 1975.
Under de gröna ekarna i Sörmland [Under the Green Oaks in Sörmland]. 1976.
Passioner i urval [Passions] (selection). 1976.
Den sociala fotobildboken [The Social Photograph Book]. 1977.
Pubertet [Puberty] (memoirs). 1978.
Asfalt [Asphalt] (memoirs). 1979.
Att skriva en roman, en bok om författari [Writing a Novel, a Book on Writing] (selected articles). 1981.
Tröskeln [The Threshold] (memoirs). 1982.
Frihet [Freedom] (memoirs). 1985.
Till en författare [To an Author]. 1988.

*

Critical Studies: Ivar Lo-Johansson: Crusader for Social Justice' by Jan-Anders Paulsson, in American-Scandinavian Review, 59(1), 1971; "Ivar Lo-Johansson" by Peter Graves and Philip Holmes, in Essays on Swedish Literature from 1880 to the Present Day, edited by Irene Scobbie, 1978; "Ivar Lo-Johansson and the Passions" by Peter Graves, in Proceedings of the Conference of Scandinavian Studies in Great Britain and Northern Ireland, 1983; Lo-Johansson issue of Swedish Book Review, supplement, 1991; "Dream and Dream Imagery in Ivar Lo-Johansson's Godnatt, jord" by Rochelle Wright, in Scandinavian Studies, 64(1), 1992.

* * *

Ivar Lo-Johansson forms, together with Jan Fridegård and Moa Martinsson, the statareskolans in Swedish literature. All three come from the lowest class of agricultural workers, the estate workers (statare) who were tied to the big estates, being paid in kind and enduring substandard living conditions, and for all practical purposes not "free." It is remarkable that a social class where illiteracy was the norm produced three of Sweden's foremost writers.

Lo-Johansson is credited with opening the eyes of politicians and Swedes in general to the poverty and suffering of the statare through his fiction, thus contributing greatly to improving their lot and dismantling the system. His novel Godnatt, jord (Breaking Free) depicts a young man, Mikael, in his struggle for freedom. His dream world and his feelings for nature and beauty stand in sharp contrast to the reality of the conformist, subservient estate workers in their tedious work. They all, however, dream of freedom from their oppressive reality, but only Mikael is able to achieve it.

Probably better known is Bara en mor (Only a Mother), about a beautiful young woman, Rya-Rya, who swims nude in an isolated lake on a hot summer day and is branded by the conservative estate workers as a fallen woman. Defiantly, she marries a weak, irresponsible worker and produces one child after another, like the rest of the women. This gradually weakens her physically, while her social standing as a worker who can choose the work she does declines with her increasing alienation from her husband. He mistreats her in a feeble attempt to feel powerful, although he is, in fact, a miserable failure even as an estate worker. There is no question that Rya-Rya is the stronger and the more competent, but she is a woman and trapped in a life of repression while lacking the ability to change it. Only as a mother can she realize some of her strength, but she dies young and overworked. Rya-Rya's fate is a comment on the hypocritical Swedish attitude to a natural sensuality, expressed in her nude swimming, which is punished for life.

Lo-Johansson's other works dealing with the plight of the statare include Statarna [The Estate Workers], Jordproletärerna [Proletarians of the Earth], and Traktorn [The Tractor], which features a machine as the main character.

Contributing to the success of his statare, work was a keen eye for documentary details. He believed that literature should have a definite social function which is best met through realistic journalistic methods. In fact his first published work was a series of travel books, Vagabondliv i Frankrike [Vagabond Life in France], where adventure is mixed with social commentary.

Lo-Johansson is also one of Sweden's foremost writers on the erotic and human (male) sexuality. Early on, he scandalized the Swedes by arguing that young men should have access to young women as a natural outlet for their sexuality. His first novel, Måna är död [Måna Is Dead], deals with a young man's problems in combining his erotic yearnings with his work. Kungsgatan [King's Street] deals with a farm boy's life in a big city. Here Lo-Johansson describes prostitution and venereal disease with a frankness new for the times.

Lo-Johansson's fascination with love and sex, human vices and sins is also expressed in seven volumes of stories of passion published between 1968 and 1972, and dealing with the forces that drive people to abandon reason and will in their actions. Each volume is devoted to a particular human weakness, as indicated in their titles—for example Girigbukarna [The Misers], Vällustingarna [The Lechers], and Lögnhalsarna [The Liars].

A third major focus of his writing is autobiographical. In the 1950s he published eight autobiographical novels, beginning with Analfabeten [The Illiterate Man], a touching and loving portrayal of his father, and a masterpiece in Swedish literature. His father was a man of few words and great integrity, whose life and people around him are perceived with much humour. Through the other novels in the series we follow Lo-Johansson's career from Gårdfarihandlaren (Peddling My Wares) to Författaren [The Writer] and Proletärförfattaren [The Proletarian Writer]. His fellow writers were identified in these books by their initials, which engaged his readers in popular deciphering games.

Another series of autobiographical writings was published from 1978 to 1985, starting with Pubertet [Puberty], for which he received the Nordic Council literary prize in 1979. This was not his first distinction. In 1941 he had received the Nio Society prize for Only a Mother and in 1953 the so-called Little Nobel prize from the Foundation for the Promotion of Literature. His last award came from France where he was made Officier de l'Ordre des Arts et des Lettres de France in 1986.

Lo-Johansson was a major modern writer who produced over 50 volumes dealing with basic human questions about love, sex, vice, and sin. His characters are multi-dimensional and show a deep insight into what makes a human being human. He translated social consciousness and compassion into great literature and created many unforgettable characters. His language is rich and powerful, poetic and realistic, entertaining and captivating.

—Torborg Lundell

LONGINUS

See ON THE SUBLIME

LÖNNROT, Elias

See KALEVALA

LOPE DE VEGA CARPIO

See VEGA CARPIO, Lope de

LORCA, Federico García

See GARCÍA LORCA, Federico

LORRIS, Guillaume de

See ROMANCE OF THE ROSE

LU XUN

Also known as Lu Hsün. Pseudonym for Zhou Shuren. Born: Shaoxing, Zhejiang province, China, in 1881. Education: Educated at Jiangnan Naval Academy, Nanjing, 1898–99; School of Railways and Mines, Nanjing, 1899–1902; studied Japanese language in Japan, 1902–04, and medicine at Sendai Provincial Medical School, Japan, 1904–06; continued private studies in Japan, 1906–09. Career: Teacher in Shaoxing, 1910–11; served in the Ministry of Education, Beijing, 1912–26, and taught Chinese literature at National Beijing University, 1920–26; taught at Xiamen (Amoy) University, 1926, and University of Canton, 1927; then lived in international settlement of Shanghai: editor, Benliu [The Torrent], 1928, and Yiwen [Translation], 1934. Translated many works by Russian, German, and Japanese authors. Also a draughtsman. Died: 19 October 1936.

PUBLICATIONS*Collections

Lu Xun xiansheng quanji [Complete Works]. 20 vols., 1938; revised edition, 1973; supplements edited by Tang Tao, 2 vols., 1942–52; his original works republished as Lu Xun quanji, 10 vols., 1956–58. Selected Works, translated by Yang Hsien-yi and Gladys Yang. 4 vols., 1956–60.

Fiction

Nahan (stories). 1923; as The War Cry (bilingual edition), edited and translated by Jörgenson. 1949.
A Madman's Diary (stories; bilingual edition). 1924(?).
Panghuang (stories). 1926; as P'anghuang/Hesitation, edited and translated by Jörgenson, 1946.

The True Story of Ah Q, translated by George Kin Leung. 1926, bilingual edition, 1949; also translated by Yang Hsien-yi and Gladys Yang, 1960.

The Tragedy of Ah Qui and Other Modern Chinese Stories, edited by J. Kyn Yn-yu. 1930.

Gushi xinbian (stories). 1935; as Old Tales Retold, translated by Yang Hsien-yi and Gladys Yang, 1961.

Stories (includes Benediction; Divorce; Kites; Kung Yiji; A Little Incident; Medicine; Mother's), edited by Edgar Snow and Yao Hsinnung. 1936.

Ah Q and Others: Selected Stories, translated by Chi-chen Wang. 1941.

Selected Stories (in English). 1954.

Selected Stories, translated by Yang Hsien-yi and Gladys Yang. 1960.

Wild Grass (prose poems). 1974.

K'ung I-chi (stories; bilingual edition). 1975.

Verse

Selected Poems, translated by W.J.F. Jenner. 1982.

Other

Zhongguo xiaoshuo shilüe. 1924; as A Brief History of Chinese Fiction, translated by Yang Hsien-yi and Gladys Yang, 1959.

Lu Xun Shuxinji [Letters]. 1946; revised edition, 3 vols., 1976; selection translated as Letters, 1973.

Lu Xun riji [Diary]. 1951; revised edition, 3 vols., 1976.

Chun feng yüeh t'an (essays). 1954.

Selected Works. 1956.

A Lu Hsun Reader (Chinese text), edited by William A. Lyell, Jr. 1967.

Silent China: Selected Writings, edited and translated by Gladys Yang. 1973.

Extracts of Speeches on Criticism of the Doctrines of Confucius and Mencius (Chinese text). 1974.

Dawn Blossoms Plucked at Dusk, translated by Yang Hsienyi and Gladys Yang. 1976.

Love-letters and Privacy in Modern China: The Intimate Lives of Lu Xun and Xu Guangping, translated by Bonnie S. McDougall. 2002.

*

Critical Studies: Lu Hsün and the New Culture Movement of Modern China by Huang Sung-k'ang, 1957; Gate of Darkness by T.A. Hsia, 1974; The Social Thought of Lu Hsün 1881–1936: A Mirror of the Intellectual Current of Modern China by Pearl Hsia Chen, 1976; Lu Hsün's Vision of Reality by William A. Lyell, 1976; The Style of Lu Hsun by Raymond S.W. Hsu, 1980; Lu Xun: A Biography by Shiqing Wang, 1984; Lu Xun and his Legacy, 1985, and Voices from the Iron House: A Study of Lu Xun, 1987, both by Leo Ou-fan Lee; Lu Xun: A Chinese Writer for All Times by Ruth F. Weiss, 1985; A Selective Guide to Chinese Literature 1900–1949: Volume 2: The Short Story, edited by Zbigniew Slupski, 1988; Lu Xun as Translator: Lu Xun's Translation and Introduction of Literature and Literary Theory, 1903–1936 by Lennart Lundberg, 1989; The Lyrical Lu Xun: A Study of His Classical-style Verse by Jon Eugene von Kowallis, 1996; Lu Xun and Evolution by James Reeve Pusey, 1998; Children's Literature in China: From Lu Xun to Mao Zedong by Mary Ann Farquhar, 1999.

* * *

Lu Xun, whose real name was Zhou Shuren, has been regarded as one of the greatest modern Chinese writers. The first to compose Western-style fiction, he was also in the vanguard of the colloquial language movement starting in 1918. A Communist sympathizer from about 1929, he died in 1936 before the Revolution, and has since been praised as a cultural hero in the Peoples' Republic of China.

He decided upon a writing career after formative experiences during his studies in Japan from 1902 to 1909. From the start his goal was polemical—to take China to task for its traditionalism and its refusal to adjust to the modern world. But he produced only mediocre essays and one story in the classical language until 1918, when he wrote the first Western-style story in China, “The Diary of a Madman.” Based on a tale by Nikolai Gogol, the story is about a man who concludes that all around him intend to kill and eat him, and that such cannibalism is an inevitable result of hypocritical moral teachings of ancient China.

“The Diary of a Madman” and other stories were published in a collection called Nahan (The War Cry) in 1923. Of these the most famous is The True Story of Ah Q, which has received international acclaim. The character of Ah Q is the composite of all weak and lowly qualities of the Chinese national character, especially at the time in history when China was pathetically subservient to nations of greater physical and moral strength. He is the epitome of the individual who lacks self-knowledge, a condition that leads to absurd acts of self-abuse and accommodation to the external world. Although Ah Q is a composite and symbolic character, each detail of his behaviour, however grotesque or absurd, might as well be taken as a representation of what Lu Xun saw in actual life—for example, Ah Q's attempt to outdo someone else by searching his own body for lice and cracking them loudly between his teeth.

Panghuang (translated as Hesitation) is Lu Xun's second story collection, published in 1926. In general it is bleaker in tone than Nahan and is more mature and incisive, as Lu Xun himself asserted. As in all his works, the themes are topical and deal with various traditional evils. However, the stories in Hesitation are rarely lost on moral or polemical points and show how Lu Xun has mastered a technique of stark and essential portrayal. “Regret for the Past,” for example, is a concise and ironic story of a “modern” love affair. It begins with a period of idyllic attachment but then evolves to a state in which that beginning becomes history, only to be reinvoked in the form of a sort of sustaining ritual. It ends when neither can any longer play their original roles.

Lu Xun's stories have rightly been compared to those of James Joyce's Dubliners and also resemble the 19th-century fiction of Gogol or Dostoevskii. His characters are mostly petty but nevertheless real and sympathetic individuals, who are caught in a general condition of apathy, brutality, superstition, and hypocrisy.

In addition to writing stories, Lu Xun also composed a volume of prose poetry, Ye cao (Wild Grass), and a volume of childhood memories, Dawn Blossoms Plucked at Dusk. After 1926 he mainly wrote polemical essays, his only stories being those of Gushi xinbian (Old Tales Retold), in which he satirically revised the accounts of various ancient heroes. In his essays, besides repeatedly attacking wrong-headed contemporaries, he also sought to expose what he saw as an accumulated and collective national lethargy. He viewed the Chinese nation as a “dish of loose sand” in which individuals were separate and “oblivious to each other's sufferings” (“Silent China,” 1927). Moreover, he saw hierarchy as so ingrained that, as he literally demonstrated in Ah Q, “a hand cannot help but look down upon a foot” (his preface to the Russian translation of The True Story of Ah Q, 1925). Lu Xun must be counted among the sharpest and most astute critics and defenders of China that modern times have witnessed.

—Keith McMahon

LUCAN

Born: Marcus Annaeus Lucanus in Corduba (now Cordoba), Spain, 3 November AD 39. Grandson of Seneca the Elder and nephew of Seneca the Younger, q.v. Education: Studied in Rome and Athens. Career: Became a favourite of the emperor Nero, who made him financial administrator (quaestor) and augur; won the poetry contest in the Neronian games in AD 60, but fell out of favour and committed suicide under compulsion when his part in Piso's conspiracy against Nero was discovered. Died: 30 April AD 65.

PUBLICATIONS

Works

Civilis libri decem, edited by Alfred E. Housman, 1926; as De bello civili, edited by D.R. Shackleton Bailey, 1988; Book I edited by R.J. Getty (with commentary), 1940, corrected edition, 1955; Book VII edited by J.P. Postgate, 1913, revised by O.A.W. Dilke, 1960; Book VIII edited by J.P. Postgate, 1917, and R. Mayer, as Civil War III, 1981; as Pharsalia, translated by Sir A. Gorges, 1614; also translated by Nicholas Rowe (verse), 1713; Edward Ridley (verse), 1896; J.D. Duff [Loeb Edition], 1928; Robert Graves, 1956; Douglas Little (verse), 1989; Jane Wilson Joyce, 1994; as Civil War, translated by P.F. Widdows (verse), 1988; also translated by S.H. Braund, 1992; as Pharsalia, translated with introduction by Jane Wilson Joyce, 1993.

*

Bibliography: by Rudolf Helm, in Lustrum, 1, 1956, and by Werner Rutz, in Lustrum, 9, 1964, and Lustrum, 26, 1984.

Critical Studies: Nicholas Rowe's Translation of Lucan's Pharsalia, 1703–1718: A Study in Literary History by Alfred W. Hesse, 1950; The Poet Lucan by Mark P.O. Morford, 1967; Lucan: An Introduction by Frederick M. Ahl, 1976; Momentary Monsters: Lucan and His Heroes by W.R. Johnson, 1987; “Lucan/The Word at War” by J. Henderson, in The Imperial Muse, edited by A.J. Boyle, 1988; Poetry and Civil War in Lucan's Bellum Civile by Jamie Masters, 1992; M. Annaeus Lucanus Bellum Civile Book III: A Commentary by Vincent Hunink, 1992; Ideology in Cold Blood: A Reading of Lucan's Civil War by Shadi Bartsch, 1997; Lucan: Spectacle and Engagement by Matthew Leigh, 1997.

* * *

Lucan's poem De bello civili (popularly known as the Pharsalia) is an epic poem in hexameters, of which nine complete books and an incomplete tenth survive. Its subject is the civil war fought between Pompey and Caesar and it covers events from Caesar's crossing of the Rubicon in 49 BC (Book I) through the battle of Pharsalus (Book VII) and Pompey's death in Egypt in 49 BC (Book VIII). It was probably planned to end with the suicide of Cato at Utica after the battle of Thapsus in 46 BC. The poem has none of the glamour of mythological epic, such as Virgil's Aeneid, but sets out to present a stark condemnation of civil war. It achieves this by subverting and inverting the conventions of mythological epic. Thus none of the three protagonists can be called "the hero" in any meaningful sense. Caesar, the most prominent character, is presented as a terrifying, destructive, and irresistible force with superhuman powers. Pompey is presented much more sympathetically in human terms but as a man past his prime and weak, indecisive, and insecure. Cato, who in Book IX takes over the leadership of the Republican forces after Pompey's murder, is the austere embodiment of Stoic principles with no softening human qualities.

Lucan abandons the traditional divine machinery of anthropomorphic deities in favour of the impersonal Stoic concepts of Fate and Fortune in order to focus attention on human responsibility and culpability for the horrors of the civil war. He nonetheless makes telling use of the supernatural in the form of dreams and visions, portents and prophecies which enhance the macabre atmosphere. Appius' consultation of the Delphic oracle in Book V and the necromancy performed by the witch Erichtho in Book VI illustrate Lucan's virtuoso powers. In this and many other respects he reflects the tastes and interests of his contemporaries. His own literary, moral, and rhetorical training emerges in his use of historical exempla (Hannibal in Book I, Marius and Sulla in Book 2), his incorporation of mythological episodes (Hercules in Book IV), and his scientific discussions of geography, astrology, astronomy, and natural phenomena (concentrated in Books IX and X). He is clearly an educated man writing for an educated audience.

Lucan's treatment of warfare shows most clearly his condemnation of civil war. He incorporates many of the episodes that are "standard" in martial epic but gives them paradoxical or extreme treatment. For example, in Book VI Caesar's centurion Scaea makes an incredible single-handed stand (aristeia) against Pompey's troops and prevents them from breaking out of the blockade, and in Book III the sea battle off Marseilles is said to resemble a land battle once Caesar's ships have been rammed. Lucan takes every opportunity to describe bizarre forms of death, most of which are striking for their strangeness, suddenness, and lack of dignity and heroism. The horror of civil war—of Roman fighting Roman, brother fighting brother, father fighting son—is presented starkly with an unheroized spilling of blood and a strikingly large number of unburied bodies and headless corpses, of which the most memorable is that of Pompey himself.

On the basis of his novel treatment of many of the conventions of mythological epic poetry, Lucan's poem may be regarded as an anti-Virgilian poem, although not in the sense of an antipathy towards Virgil. His essentially pessimistic poem reworks some of the stirring, patriotic episodes of the Aeneid into shocking, black scenes which seem to require contemplation of the crime of civil war. The most obvious example is Aeneas and the Sibyl in the Underworld in Book VI, evoked by the necromancy in Civil War Book VI.

The same anti-Virgilian strain is true of his style. His use of the hexameter is repetitive, even monotonous, in contrast with Virgil's musical hexameter. Similarly, his diction is prosaic and unembellished. The poem has been called a "predominantly monochrome epic" (Bramble) in which black, grey, and white are the predominant colours, followed by the red of the blood spilled. Key words and images which recur throughout the poem indicate disintegration and destruction, on the level of the individual, the state, and the cosmos—words like ruina (collapse), viscera (guts), tabes (decay), and sanguis (gore). Lucan characteristically dwells on an idea, reiterating it to make the audience stop and confront the issue. He often uses arresting maxims (sententiae), antitheses, and paradoxes for the same purpose, of which the most memorable is "they abandon Rome and flee towards war." This also explains the marked disproportion between narrative and speeches in the poem: narrative of the events of the war, with which his original audience was familiar, is kept to a minimum and often punctuated by exclamations or condemnatory outbursts from the poet. Instead, Lucan supplies emotive scenes that have no actual impact on the events of the war, such as Caesar's battle with the storm in Book V and the necromancy in Book VI, together with many long speeches which set the emotional tone. Particularly striking is Lucan's use of apostrophe, when he enters the poem as an unnamed character in order to address one of the actors. This technique, perhaps above all, invites us to pause and comprehend the horror of the events of civil warfare.

Some readers find Lucan's stark portrayal of the suicide of a powerful nation not to their taste. This could be because the poem is too uncomfortable and too disconcerting. If so, it is salutary to remember that many poets and scholars of medieval, Renaissance, and modern times had a high regard for Lucan. In Dante's view, Lucan ranked with Homer, Horace, Ovid, and Virgil as an exponent of elevated poetry.

—S.H. Braund

LUCIAN

Born: Samosata, Syria (now Samsat, Turkey), c. AD 120. Probably not Greek. Family: Married; one son. Career: Apprenticed to a sculptor; then received an education in rhetoric, and became a pleader, then a travelling lecturer, practising sophistic rhetoric in Gaul; moved to Athens about age 40; may have accompanied the Emperor Verus to Antioch in 162; chief court usher (archistator) with the Roman administration in Alexandria in early 170s. Died: After AD 180.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

[Works], edited by M.D. MacLeod. 4 vols., 1972–87; also edited by John Dryden, various translators, 4 vols., 1711, and J. Sommerbrodt, 5 vols., 1886–99; translated by F. Spence, 5 vols., 1684–85; also translated by Thomas Francklin, 2 vols., 1780; William Tooke, 1820; H.W. and F.G. Fowler, 4 vols., 1905; A.M. Harmon (vols. 1–5), K. Kilburn (vol. 6), and M.D. MacLeod (vols. 7 and 8), 8 vols. [Loeb Edition], 1913–67; selections edited and translated by Emily James Smith, 1892; B.P. Reardon, 1965; Keith C. Sidwell, 1985; M.D. MacLeod (with commentary), 1990.

Works

Charon, Vita and Timon, translated by D.S. Smith. 1865.

Dialogues, translated by Jasper Mayne. 1638; also translated by John Dryden, 1739; William Maginn, 1856; H. Williams, 1888; R. Mongan and J.A. Prout, with Somnium, 1890; William Tooke, 1930; selection translated by "J.P.P.," 1845; Six Dialogues, translated by S.T. Irwin, 1894; Dialogues and Stories, translated by W.D. Sheldon, 1901; Seventy Dialogues, edited by H.L. Levy, 1977.

Somnium, with The Dialogues, translated by R. Mongan and J.A. Prout. 1890; also translated by William Armour, 1895.

Tragodopodagra, as The Trago-Podagra, or Gout Tragedy, translated by Rev. Symeon T. Bartlett. 1871.

Vera Historia [True Story], translated by Francis Hickes. 1634, reprinted 1925; also translated by Emily James Smith, 1892; J.A. Prout, 1901; selection as Trips to Wonderland, translated by Francis Hickes, 1905; as Lucian Goes A-Voyaging, translated and adapted by Agnes Carr Vaughan, 1930.

Cyprian Masques, translated by Ruby Melvill. 1929.

Satirical Sketches, translated by Paul Turner. 1961.

Selected Satires, edited by Lionel Casson. 1962.

*

Critical Studies: Lucian, Satirist and Artist by F.G. Allinson, 1926; The Translations of Lucian by Erasmus and Thomas More by C.R. Thompson, 1940; Literary Quotation and Allusion in Lucian by F.W. Householder, 1941; The Sophists in the Roman Empire by Glen W. Bowersock, 1969; Studies in Lucian by Barry Baldwin, 1973; Studies in Lucian's Comic Fiction by Graham Anderson, 1976; Ben Jonson and the Lucianic Tradition by Douglas Duncan, 1979; Lucian and His Influence in Europe by Christopher Robinson, 1979; Prolegomena to a New Text of Lucian's Vitarum Auctio and Piscator by Joel B. Itzkowitz, 1986; Culture and Society in Lucian by C.P. Jones, 1986; Unruly Eloquence: Lucian and the Comedy of Traditions by R. Bracht Branham, 1989; Lucian of Samosata in the Two Hesperias: An Essay in Literary and Cultural Translation by Michael O. Zappala, 1990; Lucian and the Latins: Humor and Humanism in the Early Renaissance by David Marsh, 1998.

* * *

Literal-minded Byzantines saw Lucian as an anti-Christ; Lord Macaulay dubbed him the Voltaire of antiquity. He deserves neither title. Lucian is best regarded as a journalist-cum-intellectual, unscrupulously versatile.

Least popular now are his occasional pieces on various rhetorical themes. One or two deserve attention, notably his essay on Slander which describes a Greek painting that inspired Botticelli's La Calumnia. Lucian is one of a relatively small number of ancient writers on art, which should commend him to modern counterparts.

As is ever the case with intellectuals, Lucian was frequently embroiled in controversies; several pamphlets commemorate these in vicious terms. Their contemporary bite has naturally staled, but two stand out. The Peregrinus lambasts its eponymous villain who, after flirting with Christianity and cynicism, immolates himself at the Olympic Games. Some mild comments on Christian credulity earned Lucian a place on the Catholic index of Forbidden Books. But Christians get a better press in his Alexander where, along with the Epicureans and Lucian himself, they oppose a trendy religious charlatan.

Lucian was also capable of appreciation, and wrote some admiring obituaries, notably the Demonax, commemorating a witty philosopher and preserving a large collection of his jokes. He also tried his hand at verse. Fifty or so epigrams attributed to him in the Greek Anthology are unremarkable. But his Tragodopodagra (Gout Tragedy) is a delicious parody of Greek drama, comparable to Housman's immortal Fragment of a Greek Tragedy.

Perhaps most congenial is the prose Vera Historia [True Story], at one level a parody of travellers' tall tales, but also enjoyable as early science fiction with monsters and adventures worthy of 20th-century inventions.

However, Lucian himself prized his satirical dialogues, a genre he revived and perfected. Some pass social comments on wealth and poverty that might endear him to the modern left, but which were politically safe in his own relatively enlightened age—Lucian was no martyr. His main targets are the absurdities of mythology, as well as the illogical and often hypocritical representatives of the philosophical schools. Typical pieces include Descent into Hell, Dialogues of the Dead, Philosophies for Sale—all much imitated in later times.

Lucian was no deep thinker, and had no obvious influence on his own times. His fame was in the future. He was a professional entertainer in a crowded and competitive field, and it is probably fair to suppose that his works survived because they were superior in elegance and wit to those that did not.

—Barry Baldwin

LUCRETIUS

Born: Titus Lucretius Carus, c. 99–94 BC. His work is dedicated to C. Memmius Gemellus, the friend of Catullus and Cinna; may have been acquainted with Cicero; otherwise nothing is known of his life.
Died: c. 55 BC.

PUBLICATIONS

Verse

De rerum natura, edited by Joseph Martin. 1953; also edited by William Ellery Leonard and Stanley Barney Smith, 1961, Alfred Ernout, 2 vols., 1964–66, and K. Müller, 1975; selections: edited and translated by Cyril Bailey, 1922, 1947, revised edition, 1977, and W.H.D. Rouse [Loeb Edition], 1928, revised by M.F. Smith, 1975; as On Matter and Man (Books I, II, IV, and V; in Latin), edited by A.S. Cox, 1967, Book III edited by E.J. Kenney, 1977, Book I edited by P.M. Brown, 1984, Book V edited by C.D.N. Costa, 1984, Book IV, 1986, and Book VI, 1991, both edited and translated by John Godwin; as On the Nature of Things, translated by J.S. Watson and J.M. Good, 1848; also translated by C.F. Johnson, 1872; H.A.J. Munro, 1907; Cyril Bailey, 1910; Robert Allison, 1919; R.C. Trevelyan, 1937; J.H. Maitland, 1965; Frank Copley, 1977; as The Way Things Are, translated by Rolfe Humphries, 1968; as The Poem on Nature, translated by C.H. Sisson, 1976; also translated in prose by Ronald Latham, 1951; R. Geer, 1965; M.F. Smith, 1969; Book I as De Rerum Natura, translated by J. Evelyn, 1656; Selections, translated by Henry, S. Salt, 1912; Selections, edited by G. Benfield and R.C. Reeves, 1967; Book IV translated by Robert D. Brown, in Lucretius on

Love and Sex, 1987; as The Nature of Things, edited and translated by Anthony M. Esolen, 1995; as Lucy Hutchinson's Translation of Lucretius De rerum natura, edited by Hugh de Quehen, 1996; as On the Nature of the Universe, with introduction and explanatory notes by Don and Peta Fowler, 1997; as Selections from De rerum natura, edited by Bonnie A. Catto, 1998.

*

Bibliography: A Bibliography of Lucretius by Cosmo A. Gordon, 1962, 2nd edition, revised by E.J. Kenney, 1985. Critical Studies: Three Philosophical Poets: Lucretius, Dante, and Goethe by George Santayana, 1910; Lucretius and His Influence by George D. Hadzsits, 1935; Lucretius by E.E. Sykes, 1936; Lucretius' Imagery by G.J. Sullwood, 1958; Philosophy of Poetry: The Genius of Lucretius by Henri Bergson, 1959; Lucretius and English Literature, 1680–1740 by Wolfgang B. Fleischmann, 1964; Lucretius edited by Donald R. Dudley, 1965; The Lyre of Science: Form and Meaning in Lucretius' De Rerum Natura by Richard Minadeo, 1969; The Imagery and Poetry of Lucretius by David A. West, 1969; Epicurean Political Philosophy: The De Rerum Natura of Lucretius by James Hunt Nichols, 1976; Lucretius and the Diatribe Against the Fear of Death: De Rerum Natura III, 830–1094 by Barbara Price Wallach, 1976; Lucretius by E.J. Kenney, 1977; Mode and Value in the De Rerum Natura: A Study in Lucretius' Metrical Language, 1978, and Lucretius and the Late Republic: An Essay in Roman Intellectual History, 1985, both by John Douglas Minyard; Lucretius and the Transpadanes by Louise Adams Holland, 1979; Puns and Poetry in Lucretius' De Rerum Natura by Jane McIntosh Snyder, 1980; Lucretius and Epicurus by Diskin Clay, 1983; Lucretius on Love and Sex: A Commentary on De Rerum Natura IV, 1030–1287 with Prolegomena, Text and Translation, 1987, and Lucretius on Love and Sex, 1989, both by Robert D. Brown; Lucretius on Death and Anxiety: Poetry and Philosophy in De Rerum Natura by Charles Segal, 1990; The Song of the Swan: Lucretius and the Influence of Callimachus by Harold Donohue, 1993; Myth and Poetry in Lucretius by Monica R. Gale, 1994; Philodemus and Poetry: Poetic Theory in Lucretius, Philodemus, and Horace, edited by Dirk Obbink, 1995; The Criticism of Didactic Poetry: Essays on Lucretius, Virgil, and Ovid by Alexander Dalzell, 1996; Lucretius and the Transformation of Greek Wisdom by David Sedley, 1998; Lucretius and the Modern World by W.R. Johnson, 2000; Lucretius and the Didactic Epic by Monica R. Gale, 2001.

* * *

Little is known about the Roman poet Lucretius apart from what may be inferred from his work and the probably apocryphal tale that he committed suicide after suffering the shattering effects of a love potion. Only De rerum natura (On the Nature of Things) survives, a long philosophical poem in six books of over 7,400 lines of Latin hexameters. The work itself proposes the modest task of liberating humankind from fear and superstition by explaining everything. Underlying this is the premise that fear derives from ignorance or uncertainty, especially in relation to the arbitrary actions of the gods and to the fate of the soul after death. By showing that the order of things is the result of orderly and predictable mechanical processes, Lucretius hoped to dissolve all mysteries, thereby eliminating all uncertainty and fear.

Lucretius saw his task as essentially didactic, expounding the ethical and mechanical theories of the Greco-Roman philosopher

Epicurus, “the first to break the close bars of nature’s portals” (1.71). In turn, Epicurus had adopted and developed the implications of the Atomists Leucippus and Democritus. Thus, for Lucretius, Epicurus, and the Atomists, all reality was composed of two basic elements, atoms or particles and void. They viewed reality as we know it as nothing more than elaborate configurations of atoms and void existing in a state of constant motion, a view that anticipates to some degree Galileo’s theory of atoms, Descartes’s corpuscles, and even some aspects of the modern atomic theory.

As Lucretius proceeds through his six books, he follows the basic metaphysical project of starting with the most fundamental, and showing how he can build on that to account for the cosmos as a whole. Thus he moves from the derivation of the basic elements to an account of life, mind, and reproduction, through larger structures and finally to an account of terrestrial and celestial phenomena. The observation of change in the world, of generation and decay, nutrition and growth, the cycles of the season, and even the larger cycles of the cosmos, is nothing more than the expression of the perpetual rearrangements of the basic constituent particles in the void. In this way, Lucretius attempts to account for the mutability of the world while defending the fundamental postulate that “nothing can be produced from nothing,” and its corollary, that “nothing is ever reduced to nothing.”

These postulates are crucial to Lucretius’ project of dispelling religious superstition, for they entail the principle that the gods are bound to the laws of nature, unable to act in an arbitrary, unreasonable, or unpredictable manner. Any fortune or disaster that might befall people is the result of predictable natural laws and not the caprice of Apollo or Jupiter. As such, Lucretius posits a responsibility for individuals to exercise reasonable caution, for within the limits of nature, their fates are in their own hands. Lucretius’ theory is most important, however, when applied to dispelling fear of death.

As with superstition and fear in general, Lucretius suggests that the fear of death is related to a fear of the unknown, and especially the prospect of some torment or retribution that the soul might encounter after death. In Book III, he argues why he believes such fears to be groundless. In effect, Lucretius argues that mental and vital processes, like any other natural phenomena, are a function of the motion of particles, in this case an especially fine grade of particles, but particles nonetheless. “It must therefore necessarily be the case,” he argues, “that the whole soul consists of extremely small seminal atoms, connected and diffused throughout the veins, and viscera, and nerves.” This being so, there is no substantive difference between the soul and the body. Accordingly, the death of the body also entails the death of the soul. In other words, insofar as death and decay of the body represent a dissociation and reconfiguration of the constituent particles, so they represent the same for the soul. The collection and configuration of atoms that combine to form one’s unique self and identity diffuse into the whole. Since the soul is inseparable from the body, the only way that a person might suffer after death is if all of the specific particles that formed the person were able to recombine in their original configuration. Since that is effectively impossible, Lucretius concludes that there is no after-life to anticipate.

We may be assured that in death there is nothing to be dreaded by us; that he who does not exist, cannot become miserable; and that it makes not the least difference to a man, when immortal death has ended his mortal life, that he was ever born at all.

Thus Lucretius offers the cold comfort that the life people live is the only life they have and may expect, and that since death is complete annihilation, they have nothing to fear.

On the Nature of Things proved an important vehicle for Epicurean thought, both in the Roman world and later with Voltaire and other figures of the Enlightenment who were drawn to his material vision of the cosmos and his ethics of the garden. At the same time, Lucretius' flights of lyricism made his poem widely read and appreciated among those influenced by Latin literature. However, the enduring quality stems from Lucretius' regard for the perennial problem of human mortality and the meaning of human existence: what philosopher George Santayana termed the "art of accepting and enjoying what the conditions of our being afford." Because of this, On the Nature of Things may be classed among the great philosophical poems in the Western tradition, comparable with Dante's Divine Comedy, Wordsworth's Prelude, or Goethe's Faust.

—Thomas L. Cooksey

LUTHER, Martin

Born: Eisleben, Thuringia, 10 November 1483. Education: Educated at the University of Erfurt, B.A. 1502, M.A. 1505. Family: Married Katherine von Bora in 1525; three sons and three daughters. Career: Entered Augustinian monastery, Erfurt, 1505; installed as professor of moral philosophy, University of Wittenberg, 1508; doctor of theology 1512; visited Rome, 1511; published 95 Theses against the sale of indulgences, 1517, and thereafter drawn into Reformation controversies: excommunicated, 1520, tried at Imperial Diet of Worms in 1521 and outlawed; kept in hiding at the Wartburg, 1521–22; spent most of the remainder of his life in Wittenberg, teaching, preaching, writing, and overseeing the emergence of reformed, Lutheran institutions. Died: 18 February 1546.

PUBLICATIONS

Werke [Weimar Edition], edited by J.C.F. Knaake and others, 110 vols., 1883–.

Works [American Edition], edited by Jaroslav Pelikan and Helmut T. Lehmann. 55 vols., 1955–.

Selections, edited by J. Dillenberger. 1961.

Selected Political Writings, edited by J.M. Porter. 1974.

Luther's Theological Testament: The Schmalkald Articles, translated by William R. Russell. 1995.

Sermons of Martin Luther: The House Postils, edited and translated by Eugene F.A. Klug. 1996.

The 1529 Holy Week and Easter Sermons of Dr. Martin Luther, translated by Irving L. Sandberg. 1999.

*

Bibliography: Annotated Bibliography of Luther Studies, 1967–1976 by John E. Bigane, 1977; by Mark U. Edwards, in Reformation Europe: A Guide to Research edited by Steven Ozment, 1982.

Critical Studies: Here I Stand: A Life of Martin Luther by Roland Bainton, 1950; Luther and His Times by E.C. Schwiebert, 1950; Martin Luther: Road to Reformation by Heinrich Boehmer, translated by W. Doberstein and Theodore G. Tappert, 1957; Martin Luther: A Biographical Study by John M. Todd, 1964; Martin Luther and the Reformation by A.G. Dickens, 1967; Luther: An Introduction to His Thought by Gerhard Ebeling, 1970; The German Nation and Martin Luther by A.G. Dickens, 1974; Martin Luther and the Drama by Thomas I. Bacon, 1976; "Luther and Literacy," in Publications of the Modern Language Association of America 91, 1976, and Luther: An Experiment in Biography, 1980, both by H.G. Haile; Martin Luther: An Illustrated Biography by Peter Manns, translated by Michael Shaw, 1982; Luther in Mid-Career 1521–30 by Heinrich Bornkamm, translated by Theodore Bachmann, 1983; Martin—God's Court Jester: Luther in Retrospect by Eric Walter Grilich, 1983; Martin Luther: The Man and the Image by Herbert David Rix, 1983; The Political Thought of Martin Luther by W.O.J. Cargil Thompson, 1984; Luther and Learning edited by Marilyn J. Harran, 1985; Martin Luther and the Modern Mind: Freedom, Conscience, Toleration, Rights edited by Manfred Hoffmann, 1985; Martin Luther: His Road to Reformation 1483–1521 by Martin Brecht, translated by James L. Schaaf, 1985; Luther the Reformer: A Story of the Man and His Career by James M. Kitelson, 1986; Luther in Context by David C. Steinmetz, 1986; Martin Luther: An Introduction to His Life and Works by Bernhard Lohse, translated by Robert C. Schultz, 1987; Martin Luther in the American Imagination by Hartmut Lehmann, 1988; Luther: Man between God and the Devil by Heiko A. Oberman, translated by Eileen Walliser-Schwarzbart, 1989; Martin Luther by Gerhard Brendler, 1992; The Assurance of Faith: Conscience in the Theology of Martin Luther and John Calvin by Randall C. Zachman, 1993; Martin Luther: Luther in the German Reform Movement, 1518–1521 by Leif Grane, 1994; Luther's Legacy: Salvation and English Reformers, 1525–1556 by Carl R. Trueman, 1994; Printing, Propaganda, and Martin Luther by Mark U. Edwards, Jr., 1994; Baptism in the Theology of Martin Luther by Jonathan D. Trigg, 1994; In Martin's Footsteps by Matthias Gretzschel and Toma Babovic, 1996; Luther and German Humanism by Lewis W. Spitz, 1996; True Faith in the True God: An Introduction to Luther's Life and Thought by Hans Schwarz, translated by Mark William Worthing, 1996; Luther by Hans-Peter Grosshans, 1997; Proverbs and Proverbial Expressions in the German Works of Martin Luther by James C. Cornette, Jr., 1997; Union with Christ: The New Finnish Interpretation of Luther, edited by Carl E. Braaten and Robert W. Jenson, 1998; The Trinity and Martin Luther: A Study on the Relationship between Genre, Language and the Trinity in Luther's Work (1523–1546) by Christine Helmer, 1999; Martin Luther's Theology: Its Historical and Systematic Development by Bernhard Lohse, translated and edited by Roy A. Harrisville, 1999; Martin Luther and John Wesley on the Sermon on the Mount by Tore Meistad, 1999; Martin Luther: The Christian between God and Death by Richard Marius, 1999; Martin Luther, German Saviour: German Evangelical Theological Factions and the Interpretation of Luther, 1917–1933 by James M. Stayer, 2000; Renaissance Humanism in Support of the Gospel in Luther's Early Correspondence: Taking All Things Captive by Timothy P. Dost, 2001; Luther's Lives: Two Contemporary Accounts of Martin Luther, translated and annotated by Elizabeth Vandiver, Ralph Keen, and Thomas D. Frazel, 2002.

* * *

At the centre of all Martin Luther's activities lay a profound faith in the redemptive personal experience of Christ, the Word of God to mankind, and he always regarded his writing and teaching as forms of preaching, in continuation of the saving work of God, the supreme poet. Trained in scholastic and humanistic studies alike, he used them merely as skills which aided his “preaching.” While not subscribing to the humanists’ literary aestheticization of spiritual matters, Luther none the less aspired to the fitting and effective use of language to give expression to truth as he saw it revealed. This is one reason why he embarked upon the composition of a liturgy and hymns in German, for the initial efforts of his arch rival, the radical Thomas Müntzer, seemed wooden and unsatisfactory. Equally fluent in Latin and German, he employed the vernacular increasingly after 1515 to impart his Reformation precepts to the people, setting clarity and simplicity as goals. He was no systematic theologian: his writings have the character of dialogue or polemic (often virulent) about them; most of his main ideas were formulated in response to an adversary. His thinking is strongly antithetical, he worked in terms of polar opposites: Letter and Spirit, Faith and Works, Freedom and Bondage, God and Man. His output was prolific: for 30 years after 1516 he published almost one title per fortnight. In numerous works on controversial matters of theology, church polity, and social order, he gave articulated theoretical foundation to traditional national grievances: his tract An den Christlichen Adel deutscher Nation [To the Christian Rulers of Germany] of 1520 ran to 13 editions within five months and quickened the pace of political debate and literary agitation in Germany.

Luther began his translation of the Bible in 1521 in order to promote his theological principle of the priesthood of all believers by making the Scriptures accessible in the vernacular to all estates of men, and revised the work constantly up to his death. Of this translation over half a million whole or part-bibles were sold (for a population of some 15 million). Luther’s oeuvre includes devotional works, prayers, and ars moriendi (books of comfort for the dying), tracts on catechism and sacraments, about 2,000 sermons, programmatic tracts on matters of ecclesiastical and social controversy, and exegesis; he also wrote fables, hymns, and hundreds of letters; moreover, his table talk was transcribed and recorded for posterity. The outer forms of his writings are usually simple, the language clear, occasionally crude. Frequently, however, as in Von der Freyheyt eyniss Christen menschen [The Freedom of a Christian], plain and direct language couches a profoundly logical dialectic argument in which the precepts of classical rhetoric are deployed. Literature, in the sense of the written word being read or listened to and taken seriously by a significant proportion of the population, was virtually brought into existence for Germany by Luther. Almost single-handed during the Reformation (and especially in the period 1520–25) he created public opinion as an effective power in the land, and the leaders of both movements which rose in rebellion and failed in these years—the Imperial Knights and the Peasants—adduced Luther’s writings in their cause.

Luther used to be solely credited with creating a national unified German language; it is acknowledged currently that he made few innovations of syntax or phonology, but did, however, succeed decisively in reinforcing existing trends in the language. His home territory—Saxony and Thuringia—was the dialect area of East Central German, which embraced features of diverse dialects from the old German “heartlands” in north, west, and south-west; moreover it straddled the linguistic boundary between Lower and Upper (north and south) German dialects. Luther employed the synthetic scribal language of the Saxon chancellory, an official language which was by assimilation comprehensible in most of the German lands. In his German Bible he imbued the stilted official language with the colour, idiom, flexibility—in short, life—of spoken German. His aim was to translate the matter of Scripture faithfully, but to do so in keeping with the inherent principles of the German language: in the Sendbrieff von Dolmetzschenn [Open Letter on Translation] he states his aim to write what he “heard,” from “the mother in the house, the child in the street, the man in the market place.” In particular, his striking innovations of vocabulary gave his German Bible a unifying cultural significance for the nation comparable to that of the King James Bible in England, and he was sometimes aware of his command of the German language claiming that even his adversaries had to learn from him.

Luther’s hymns are possibly the most powerful manifestation of his theology, and it is a major achievement of his Reformation that the vernacular hymn has so central a role in Church worship; Luther’s love of music—he composed several tunes himself—contrasts with the stance of other reformers (Zwingli, Calvin). He wrote hymns as part of his vernacular liturgy, in a 12-month creative outpouring in 1523–24 he completed 23, and out of his total of 36 some 30 survive in current hymnals. For Luther “the notes give life to the text,” and hymns lent unity, and—memorable for being set to music—implanted theological principles in the minds of the congregation. Luther drew heavily on traditions; most hymns are adaptations, of Biblical or sacramental material: “Christ unser Herr zum Jordan kam” [Christ Our Lord to Jordan Came], “Aus tieffer Not. De Profundis” [Out of the Depths, O Lord]. Others derive from Latin hymns: “Mitten wyr ym leben sind” [In the Midst of Life We Are in Death] from the antiphonal “Media vita in morte sumus,” while a few spring from German folksongs: “Vom himel hoch da kom ich her” [From Heaven Above] adapts an old traveller’s song as children’s Nativity story. The most famous, “Ein feste Burg” [A Mighty Fortress], portrays in pugnacious monosyllables and stark antitheses the cosmic battle between God and the devil in which impotent man is saved by alliance with Christ alone in faith and trust: truths central to Luther’s Reformation.

—Lewis Jillings

See the essay on “Ein feste Burg.”

M

MACHADO, (Ruiz) Antonio

---

Born: Seville, Spain, 1875. Family moved to Madrid, 1883. Educación: Educated at the Institución Libre de Enseñanza, Madrid, 1883–89; Instituto de San Isidro, Madrid, 1889; Instituto Cardenal Cisneros, Madrid, from 1890, degree 1900; Central University, Madrid, 1915–16, Ph.D, 1916. Family: Married Leonor Izquierdo Cuevas in 1909 (died 1912). Career: Regular collaborator, La Caricatura, 1892–93; translator, Garnier, publishers, Paris, 1899; contributed to various periodicals from 1903, including Helios, Alma Española, Blanco y Negro, Renacimiento Latino, and La República de las Letras; professor of French, 1907–08, deputy director, 1908–12, Instituto de Soria; undertook research on French philology and attended classes at Collège de France, Paris, 1911; professor of French, 1912–15, deputy director, 1915–19, Instituto de Baeza, Madrid; professor of French, Instituto de Segovia, 1919–31, and Instituto Calderón de la Barca, Madrid, 1932–36; contributor to La Pluma and Los Lunes de Imparcial, from 1920, La Revista de Occidente, from 1923, Diario de Madrid, from 1934, and El Sol; on the outbreak of the Spanish Civil War, supported the Republic through journalism and involvement in cultural events: contributor to La Hora de España, from 1937; lived in Rocafort, Valencia, 1936–38, and Barcelona, 1938–39; left Barcelona with his mother and younger brother Juan, and crossed into France, January 1939. Died: 22 February 1939.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

- Obras*. 1940.
Obras completas, with Manuel Machado. 1947; reprinted 1984.
Obras: Poesía y prosa, edited by Aurora de Albornoz and Guillermo de Torte. 1964.
Poesías completas, edited by M. Alvar. 1975.
Obra completa. 2 vols., 1988.
Obra completa. 4 vols., 1989.
Poesía y prosa, edited by Oreste Macrí and Gaetano Chiappini. 4 vols., 1989.
Verso y prosa, edited by Jesús Toboso. 1990.
Roads Dreamed Clear Afternoons: An Anthology of the Poetry of Antonio Machado, translated by Carl W. Cobb. 1994.

Verse

- Soledades*. 1903; edited by Rafael Ferreres, 1968.
Soledades, Galerías y otros poemas. 1907; revised edition, 1919; edited by Geoffrey Ribbans, 1973.
Campos de Castilla. 1912; revised and enlarged edition, 1917; edited by José Luis Cano, 1967, and by Rafael Ferreres, 1970; also translated by Robert Harvard, 1997; selection in Spanish Prose and Poetry, translated by Ida Farnell, 1920; as The Castilian Camp, translated by J.C.R. Green, 1982.
Páginas escogidas. 1917.

- Poesías completas*. 1917; revised and enlarged editions, 1928, 1933, 1936.
Nuevas canciones. 1924; edited by José María Valverde, with De un cancionero apócrifo, 1971; as Canciones, translated by Robert Bly, 1980.
De un cancionero apócrifo. 1926; edited by José María Valverde, with Nuevas canciones, 1971.
La guerra. 1937.
La tierra de Alvargonzález y Canciones del Alto Duero, illustrated by José Machado. 1938; La tierra de Alvargonzález as The Legend of Alvargonzález, translated by Denis Doyle, 1982.
Poesías completas. 1943.
La voz de Antonio Machado (selection). 1947.
Poesías escogidas, edited by Federico C. Sainz de Robles. 1947.
Zero (bilingual edition), translated by Eleanor L. Turnbull. 1947.
Sea of San Juan: A Contemplation, translated by Eleanor L. Turnbull. 1950.
Eighty Poems of Antonio Machado (bilingual edition), translated by Willis Barnstone. 1959.
Poesías de guerra, edited by Aurora de Albornoz. 1961.
Castilian Ilexes: Versions from Antonio Machado, 1875–1939, translated by Charles Tomlinson and Henry Gifford. 1963.
Poesías completas. 1964.
Antología poética, edited by José Hierro. 1968.
Poesía, edited by M.P. Palomo. 1971.
Sunlight and Scarlet: Selected Poems (bilingual edition), translated by Ivor Waters. 1973.
Poemas: Antología de urgencia, edited by L. Izquierdo. 1976.
Selected Poems, translated by Betty Jean Craige. 1978.
I Never Wanted Fame, translated by Robert Bly. 1979.
Poesías, edited by Jorge Campos. 1979.
The Dream below the Sun: Selected Poems, translated by Willis Barnstone. 1981.
Antología poética; Biografía, edited by José Luis Cano. 1982.
Selected Poems (bilingual edition), edited and translated by Alan S. Trueblood. 1982.
Times Alone: Selected Poems (bilingual edition), edited and translated by Robert Bly. 1983.
Poesía (selection), edited by Roque Esteban Scarpa. 1986.
Poesía de guerra y de postguerra (selection), edited by Miguel d'Ors. 1992.

Plays

- El condenado por desconfiado*, with J. López Pérez Hernández, from a play by Tirso de Molina (produced 1924). In La Farsa, 1924.
Hernani, with Manuel Machado and Francisco Villaespesa, from a play by Hugo (produced 1925). In La Farsa, 1924.
Hay verdades que en amor . . ., from a play by Lope de Vega (produced 1925).
La niña de plata, with Manuel Machado and J. López Pérez Hernández, from a play by Lope de Vega (produced 1926). In La Farsa, 1926.
Desdichas de la fortuna o Julianillo Valcárcel, with Manuel Machado (produced 1926). 1926.
Juan de Mañara, with Manuel Machado (produced 1927). 1927.

Las adelfas, with Manuel Machado (produced 1928). In Teatro completo, 1932.

La Lola se va a los puertos, with Manuel Machado (produced 1929). 1930.

El perro del hortelano, with Manuel Machado and José López Pérez Hernández, from a play by Lope de Vega (produced 1931).

La prima Fernanda, with Manuel Machado (produced 1931). In La duquesa de Benamejí, La prima Fernanda y Juan de Mañara, 1942.

Teatro completo (includes Desdichas de la fortuna; Juan de Mañara; Las adelfas), with Manuel Machado. 2 vols, 1932.

La duquesa de Benamejí, with Manuel Machado (produced 1932). 1932.

Desdichas de la fortuna o Julianillo Valcárcel; Las adelfas; La Lola se va a los puertos. 1940.

El hombre que murió en la guerra, with Manuel Machado (produced 1941). With Las adelfas, 1947.

La duquesa de Benamejí, La prima Fernanda y Juan de Mañara. 1942; revised edition, 1944.

Other

Juan de Mairena: Sentencias, donaires, apuntes y recuerdos de un profesor apócrifo (poetry, essays, and sketches). 1936; edited by José María Valverde, 1972, Pablo del Barco, 1981, and by Antonio Fernández Ferrer, 1986; as Juan de Mairena: Epigrams, Maxims, Memoranda, and Memoirs of an Apocryphal Professor, with an Appendix of Poems from the Apocryphal Songbooks, translated by Ben Belitt, 1963.

Abel Martín; Cancionero de Juan de Mairena; Prosas varias. 1943. Antología de guerra. 1944.

Cuaderno de Literatura, Baeza 1915, edited by Enrique Casamayor. 1952.

Los complementarios y otros prosas póstumas, edited by Guillermo de Torre. 1957; Los complementarios, edited by Domingo Ynduráin, 2 vols., 1972, and by Manuel Alvar, 1982.

Antología, edited by José Luis Cano. 1961.

Prosas y poesías olvidadas, edited by Ramón Martínez-López and Robert Marrast. 1964.

Antología de su prosa, edited by Aurora de Albornoz. 4 vols., 1970–72.

Cartas a M. de Unamuno; Seis poemas inéditos; Papeles póstumos; Ideario; Esbozo biográfico. 1975.

La guerra: Escritos 1936–1939, edited by Julio Rodríguez Puértolas and Gerardo Pérez Herrero. 1983.

Proyecto del discurso de ingreso en la Real Academia de la Lengua. 1986.

*

Critical Studies: Antonio Machado: Poeta y filósofo by Santiago Monserrat, 1940; Antonio Machado by Arturo Serrano Plain, 1944; Vida de Antonio Machado y Manuel by Miguel Pérez Ferrero, 1947; Antonio Machado by J.B. Trend, 1953; Antonio Machado: Su mundo y su obra by Segundo Serrano Poncela, 1954; La poesía de Antonio Machado by Ramón de Zubiría, 1955, 3rd edition, 1973; Las secretas galerías de Antonio Machado, 1958, and Una poética para Antonio Machado, 1970, both by Ricardo Gullón, and Antonio Machado edited by Gullón and Allen W. Phillips, 1973; Últimas soledades del poeta Antonio Machado by José Machado, 1958; Estudios sobre

Unamuno y Machado, 1959, Los poemas de Antonio Machado, 1967, revised 4th edition, 1981, and El pensamiento de Antonio Machado, 1974, all by Antonio Sánchez Barbudo; Antonio Machado: Poeta de Soria by María Concepción Pérez Zalabardo, 1960; Antonio Machado en el camino by Emilio Orozco Díaz, 1962; Humor y pensamiento de Antonio Machado en la metafísica poética by Pablo de A. Cobos, 1963; Antonio Machado y Guiomar by Justina Ruiz de Conde, 1964; The Victorious Expression: A Study of Four Contemporary Spanish Poets: Miguel de Unamuno, Antonio Machado, Juan Ramón Jiménez, Federico García Lorca by Howard T. Young, 1964; La Naturaleza y Antonio Machado by Adela Rodríguez Forteza, 1965; Antonio Machado by Alberto Gil Novales, 1966; Antonio Machado: Poeta del pueblo by Manuel Tuñón de Lara, 1967; La presencia de Miguel de Unamuno en Antonio Machado by Aurora de Albornoz, 1968; Poesía y prosa en Antonio Machado by Rafael Gutierrez-Girardot, 1969; Machado: A Dialogue with Time by Norma Louise Hutman, 1969; El pensamiento de Antonio Machado en Juan de Mairena by Pablo de A. Cohos, 1971; El intimismo en Antonio Machado by Marta Rodríguez, 1971; Antonio Machado: Poeta simbolista by J.M. Aguirre, 1973; Antonio Machado: Campos de Castilla (in English) by Arthur Terry, 1973; Palabra en el tiempo: Poesía y filosofía en Antonio Machado by P. Cerezo Galán, 1975; Ideas recurrentes en Antonio Machado by Domingo Ynduráin, 1975; Guía popular de Antonio Machado by Andreas Sorel, 1975; El simbolismo en la poesía de Antonio Machado by Frank Pino, 1976; Antonio Machado: Ejemplo y lección by Leopoldo de Luis, 1975; Antonio Machado, 1875–1939 by Antonio Campoamor González, 1976; Estudios sobre Antonio Machado edited by José Ángeles, 1977; Guerra de ideas y lucha social en Machado by D. Gomez Molleda, 1977; Guiomar, un amor imposible de Machado by José María Moreira, 1980, revised edition, 1982; El pensamiento religioso y filosófico de Antonio Machado by Armand F. Baker, 1985; La libra mecánica: En torno a la prosa de Antonio Machado by Edward Baker, 1986; La Naturaleza en la obra de Antonio Machado by Carlos López Bustos, 1989; Antonio Machado: El poeta y su doble (University of Barcelona symposium), 1989; Antonio Machado y la filosofía by José Luis de la Iglesia and others, 1989; Entorno a Antonio Machado edited by Francisco López, 1989; Antonio Machado: Soledad, infancia y sueño by Joaquín Verdu de Gregorio, 1990; Antonio Machado Hoy (proceedings of the international conference, on the 50th anniversary of Machado's death), 4 vols., 1990; Estelas en la mar: Essays on the Poetry of Antonio Machado (1875–1939) edited by D. Gareth Walters, 1992; Antonio Machado's Writings and the Spanish Civil War by James Whiston, 1996; Power of Paradox in the Work of Spanish Poet Antonio Machado: 1875–1939 by Philip G. Johnston, 2002.

* * *

Grandson of a governor of Seville and son of a noted folklorist, Antonio Machado was born ten months after his brother Manuel, his partner in numerous literary ventures. After youthful teamwork on a satiric series of caricatures, they translated for a French publisher, then became modernist poets. Later in life they collaborated on plays. Manuel, a pretentious aristocratic playboy, initially overshadowed Antonio, a sober democratic educator, who was unassuming, altruistic, quiet, and shy. Growing political divergences placed them on opposite sides during the Spanish Civil War.

Although Machado's literary production is small, its quality and density are unsurpassed. He began writing poetry in the 1890s, but destroyed his early post-romantic efforts. Soledades [Solitudes], employs modernist metrics, Parnassian plastic elements, and self-conscious aesthetics. But Machado's austere noble spirit found modernist sensibilities ultimately alien, and even this early poetry (expanded as Soledades, Galerías y otros poemas [Solitudes, Galleries and Other Poems]), evinces spiritual and ethical concerns uncommon in modernist writing. Compared with contemporaries of the Generation of 1898, Machado addresses the majority, while Jiménez writes for a limited minority. Unamuno's theatrical existential anguish waxes melodramatic, while Machado's art maximizes understatement. Jiménez influenced the Generation of 1927 while Unamuno, and especially Machado, influence post-war generations. Machado's humane fraternalism contrasts with his generation's rampant egomania.

Machado's lyrics comprise three distinct styles or manners, and three corresponding chronological periods. Poems written from 1897–1907 (Soledades and subsequent augmented editions), subjective and introspective, exhibit modified modernism, increasingly attenuated. Machado's admiration for Unamuno, who emphasized feeling and spiritual activity, exercises a deepening influence. Self-isolation while studying for oposiciones (competitive teachers' examinations) distanced Machado from his modernist associates. The second period (1907–17), more objective and outward-looking, comprises years in Soria expressing the Castilian spirit at its purest—Campos de Castilla (The Castilian Camp). Subsequently, Machado's preoccupations become increasingly metaphysical, although poems written in Baeza (1912–17) voice the concerns of the Generation of 1898: Spain's decline, national problems, "national character," and history.

Poesías completas closes the second period. Theatrical activity then partially fills a poetic hiatus (1919–31). The later poems (1924–36) are philosophical, ironic, pithy, aphoristic, and gnomic, sometimes deceptively prosaic. Machado also wrote love poetry ("Songs for Guiomar"), inspired by a late-life secret passion.

Soledades enjoyed moderate success but contained much that was imitative (Bécquer, Dario, and Verlaine are significant models), despite poems revealing Machado's own authentic voice. Personal themes include: the power of memory, time, reverie, death, loss of faith, dreams (with the related symbols of mirrors and galleries), temporal existence (symbolized by river, road, and fountain), nature (twilight, quiet countryside, and lonely roads), childhood in Seville, the evanescence of youth, a desperate seeking for love, the inseparability of passion and pain, melancholy, yearning disillusionment, hope, and remembrance.

The Castilian Camp contains several distinct thematic groups: Spain's decadence and destiny; poetic homages to admirable cultural figures; love for Leonor, her illness, and Machado's hope and despair; poems inspired by popular forms; and the "Proverbs and Songs" anticipating his philosophical period. Machado's masterpiece, The Castilian Camp, differs significantly from all his other works. Abandoning the modernist quest for ideal (and somewhat artificial) beauty, Machado discovered unadorned reality. Contemplating the arid, exhausted farmlands, stark plateaux, impoverished villages with their starving greyhounds and crumbling vestiges of former days, the poet harboured no illusions, yet looked with love to see beyond, to the flawless sky and endless horizon, the landscape flooded with moonlight. Where others saw emptiness and misery, Machado found tiny yellow flowers, wild herbs, a lone shepherd, distant mountains where eagles nest—not just a dun-coloured expanse, but shades of mauve and ochre, gold and tan. The Roman bridge across the timeless Duero, ruins of prehistoric Numancia, and remains of Soria's medieval castle compose a panorama where history is palpable, and time visible and tangible. Love and loss, time and death, faith and doubt—eternal, universal themes of all great poetry—were no poetic pretext: Machado lived them with maximum intensity, yet in absolutely unassuming fashion, and captured them in his lyrics.

The Machados' initial theatrical efforts, adaptations of 17th-century dramatists Lope de Vega and Tirso de Molina, updated the originals through compressing, deleting, and shifting scenes; and their first original play imitated Golden Age formulas. Desdichas de la fortuna o Julianillo Valcárcel [The Workings of Fate; or, Julianillo Valcárcel] re-creates 17th-century political intrigues of the Count-Duke of Olivares: his illegitimate son, Julianillo Valcárcel, forcibly separated from his lower-class lover and obliged to marry the Count-Duke's cousin, pines away romantically and dies. Juan de Mañara revivifies one historical antecedent for the legend of Don Juan. The Machados' version stresses ethical values: Don Juan loses his seductive essence, choosing charity and a severely religious life. Las adelfas [Bitter Oleander] attempts modern psychological drama, notwithstanding a soap-opera plot. The brothers' greatest dramatic success presents a Flamenco singer in La Lola se va a los puertos [Lola Goes to Sea]: Lola is courted by several men representing different ages and social classes, but elects to become a symbol of her art. La prima Fernanda [Cousin Fernanda], a modern satiric comedy, targets high finance and power politics. La duquesa de Benamejí [The Duchess of Benamejí], their last major play, resuscitates 19th-century romanticism with the Duchess and an upper-class officer in tangled love affairs involving a gypsy girl and a Robin-Hood-style bandit. El hombre que murió en la guerra [The Man Who Died in the War], written in 1928, was unknown until after Antonio's death, when Manuel (ignoring political implications) had it produced. The brothers' only play in prose, it presents Antonio's ideal contemporary man, young, intelligent, liberal, and progressive, devoted to creating a new world and social order.

Nuevas canciones [New Songs], De un cancionero apócrifo [From an Apocryphal Songbook], and Juan de Mairena contain Machado's ontological speculation. His heteronyms, Juan de Mairena and Abel Martín, poetic personae or masks, facilitate philosophical discussion and autocriticism. Antedating existentialism, Machado recognized the significance of his thought, pointing out that he had published certain concepts before Heidegger. The poet's final writings, Los complementarios [The Complementaries] (heterogeneous notebooks) and pro-Republican propaganda, cannot be considered as artistic work.

Machado's sensitivity, intensity, and emotional strength are transmitted—distilled and undiluted—through his poetry. His lyrics are neither rhetoric nor artifice; their power derives from the poet's absolute conviction, their self-evident reality and veracity, and condensation. Machado uncovers the beauty of small, humble things, but nothing he says is trivial. His death as a refugee en route to exile after the Civil War, and the silencing of his name by the Franco regime, failed to prevent homage by the poets who remained and those who came later. More than a decade after the dictator's death, the democratic government—belatedly, insufficiently—erected a statue honouring Machado as "one of the glories of Spain."

—Janet Pérez

MACHADO DE ASSIS, Joaquim Maria

Born: Rio de Janeiro, 21 June 1839. Family: Married Carolina de Novaes in 1869 (died 1904). Career: Journalist from age 15: proofreader, typesetter, writer, and editor; editor and columnist, Diário do Rio de Janeiro, and A Semana Ilustrada, 1860–75. Clerk, then director of accounting division, Ministry of Agriculture, Commerce, and Public Works, 1874–1908. Awards: Order of the Rose, 1888. Member: and censor, 1862–64, Conservatório Dramático Brasileiro; founding president, Academia Brasileira de Letras, 1897–1908. Died: 29 September 1908.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Obras completas. 31 vols., 1937–42.
Obra completa, edited by Afrânio Coutinho. 3 vols., 1959–62.

Fiction

Contos fluminenses. 1872.
Resurreição. 1872.
Histórias da Meia-Noite. 1873.
A mão e a luva. 1874; as The Hand and the Glove, translated by Albert I. Bagby, Jr., 1970.
Helena. 1876; as Helena, translated by Helen Caldwell, 1984.
Yayá Garcia. 1878; translated as Yayá Garcia, translated by Albert I. Bagby, Jr., 1977.
Memórias póstumas de Brás Cubas. 1881; as The Posthumous Memoirs of Brás Cubas, translated by William Grossman, 1951; as Epitaph of a Small Winner, translated by Grossman, 1952; as Posthumous Reminiscences of Brás Cubas, translated by E. Percy Ellis, 1955; translated by Gregory Rabassa, 1997.
Papéis avulsos. 1882.
Histórias sere data. 1884.
Quincas Borba. 1891; as The Heritage of Quincas Borba, translated by Clotilde Wilson, 1954; as Philosopher or Dog?, translated by Wilson, 1954; as Quincas Borba: A Novel, translated by Gregory Rabassa, 1998.
Várias histórias. 1896.
Páginas Recolhidas. 1899.
Dom Casmurro. 1899; as Dom Casmurro, translated by Helen Caldwell, 1953; translated by R.L. Scott Buccleuch, 1992; also translated by John Gledson, 1997.
Esau e Jacó. 1904; as Esau and Jacob, translated by Helen Caldwell, 1966.
Relíquias de Casa Velha. 1906.
Memorial de Ayres. 1908; as Counselor Ayres' Memorial, translated by Helen Caldwell, 1972; as The Wager: Aires' Journal, translated by R.L. Scott Buccleuch, 1990.
The Psychiatrist and Other Stories, translated by H.C. and William L. Grossman. 1963.
Casa Velha. 1968.
The Devil's Church and Other Stories, edited and translated by Jack Schmitt and Lorie Ishimatsu. 1977.

Plays

Pipelet, from the novel Los Mystères de Paris by Eugène Sue (produced 1859).
As bodas de Joaquina, with Luíz Olona, music by Martin Allu (produced 1861).
Desencantos: Phantasia dramática. 1861.
O caminho da porta (produced 1862). In Teatro, 1863.
O protocolo (produced 1862). In Teatro, 1863.
Gabriella (produced 1862).
Quase ministro (produced 1863). 1864(?).
Montjoye, from a play by Octave Feuillet (produced 1864).
Suplicio de uma mulher, from a play by Emile de Girardin and Dumas fils (produced 1865). In Teatro, 1937.
Os douses de casaca (produced 1865). 1866.
O barbeiro de Sevilha, from a play by Beaumarchais (produced 1866).
O anjo de Meia-Noite, from a play by Théodore Barrière and Edouard Plouvier (produced 1866).
A família Benoiton, from a play by Victorien Sardou (produced 1867).
Como elas são todas, from a play by Alfred de Musset (produced 1873).
Tu só, tu, puro amor (produced 1880). 1881.
Não consultes médico (produced 1896). In Teatro, 1910.

Verse

Chrysálidas. 1864.
Phalenes. 1870.
Americanas. 1875.
Poesies completas. 1901.

Other

Correspondência, edited by Fernando Nery. 1932.
Adelaide Ristori. 1955.
 Translator, Os trabalhadores do mar, by Victor Hugo. 1866.

*

Bibliography: Bibliografia de Machado de Assis by J. Galante de Sousa, 1955.

Critical Studies: The Brazilian Othello of Machado de Assis: A Study of Dom Casmurro, 1960, and Machado de Assis: The Brazilian Master and His Novels, 1970, both by Helen Caldwell; The Craft of an Absolute Winner: Characterization and Narratology in the Novels of Machado de Assis by Maris Luisa Nunes, 1983; The Deceptive Realism of Machado de Assis: A Dissenting Interpretation of "Dom Casmurro" by John Gledson, 1984; The Poetry of Machado de Assis by Lorie Chieko Ishimatsu, 1984; Machado de Assis: The Brazilian Pyrrhonian by José Raimundo Maia Neto, 1994; Machado de Assis and Feminism: Re-reading the Heart of the Companion by Maria Manuel Lisboa, 1996; Machado de Assis: Reflections on a Brazilian Master Writer, edited by Richard Graham, 1999.

* * *

Had Machado de Assis not written in the Portuguese language—so often described as “the cemetery of literature”—there is no doubt that he would today be universally regarded as one of the greatest 19th-century writers of prose fiction. Brazil did not possess a strong novelistic tradition—the genre developed there during Machado's own lifetime—and he therefore felt free to experiment with forms and techniques which seem far closer to Kafka or Borges than to Dickens or Flaubert. While the surface texture of Machado's novels and stories is carefully realistic, providing a Balzacian panorama of Brazilian society, the universe of his fiction is an artificial, created reality of improbabilities, of egregiously unreliable narrators who speculate at length about the process of writing, of texts layered within texts.

Machado's technically traditional early novels show his intense interest in the social and psychological effects of upward mobility. This preoccupation is understandable, for Machado's own biography—the poor and dependent mulatto who attained great prestige among a white élite that came to perceive him as equally white—represents the most extreme case of upward social mobility within the hierarchical rigidity of imperial Brazil.

With Memórias póstumas de Brás Cubas (The Posthumous Memoirs of Brás Cubas), Machado freed himself from all constraints of tradition, although his obsessive interest in social change continued. Brás Cubas's autobiographical narrative—not merely published after his death, but composed posthumously as well—is at once hilariously funny and pathetically moving. The evasive and unreliable omniscient third-person narrator of Quincas Borba (The Heritage of Quincas Borba) presents his text as the exemplification of a comprehensive theory of human behaviour—in fact a brilliant parody of Positivism and Social Darwinism—which both explains and justifies the vast network of mutual aggression and humiliation Machado saw in society; the story the narrator relates, as Machado structures it, forces us instead to reject that theory and to confront our common inhumanity.

The third of Machado's major novels, Dom Casmurro, is the most technically complex of all. The narrator recounts his marriage to Capitu and her infidelity, marshalling all the incriminating evidence. Half hidden within Dora Casmurro's narrative, however, is another story entirely, a mirror image of the explicit text—Capitu's story of innocence and fidelity betrayed by her husband's insane jealousy; we, as readers, must write this story for ourselves, discovering and ordering the hints and details Dora Casmurro lets slip. In the final analysis, both these absolutely irreconcilable narratives are equally valid; we cannot logically choose between them. And this is, perhaps, Machado's ultimate assault upon the traditional novel and its most basic postulate: that human experience can be arranged into meaningful and comprehensible patterns.

Machado's fiction implies two quite different possible theories: either human lives and emotions are simply too complex and illogical to be understood; or the reality of human existence is so blinding in its utter amorality and meaninglessness that we cannot bear to look upon it without the tinted lenses of our pitiable and improbable illusions—one of which is the form we call the novel.

—David T. Haberly

See the essays on Dom Casmurro and The Posthumous Memoirs of Brás Cubas.

MACHAUT, Guillaume de

See GUILLAUME DE MACHAUT

MACHIAVELLI, Niccolò (di Bernardo dei)

Born: Republic of Florence, 3 May 1469. Family: Married Marietta Corsini in 1501, five children. Career: Probably involved in overthrowing the Savonarolist government, 1498; appointed to head the new government's Second Chancery, 1498, and secretary of an agency concerned with warfare and diplomacy, 1498–1512: some 6,000 surviving documents record his unceasing activity, including trips to visit Caterina Sforza, 1499, Cesare Borgia, 1502, Rome, 1503 and 1506, France, 1504 and 1510, and Germany, 1507–08; helped to set up a standing army (which reconquered Pisa, 1509); the Florentine Republic ended with the return to power of the Medici family (under Piero dei Medici), 1512: Machiavelli was suspected of complicity in plotting against the Medici, and was jailed and exiled to Sant'Andrea in Percussina where he spent his remaining years in retirement, though he was given a few diplomatic or writing jobs. Died: 21 June 1527.

PUBLICATIONS

Collections

Tutte le opere. 1550(?). The Works of the Famous Nicolas Machiavel (includes History of Florence; The Prince; Guelfs and Ghibilins; Life of Castruccio Castracani; Murder of Vitelli; State of France; State of Germany; Discourses on Livy; Art of War; Marriage of Belphegor; Letter in Vindication of Himself and His Writings), translated by Henry Nevile. 1675.

Opere inedite, edited by Giovanni Maria Lampredi. 1760.

Opere inedite in prosa e in verso. 1763.

Opere, edited by Pietro Fanfani, Gaetano Milanese, and Luigi Passerini Orsini de Rilli. 6 vols., 1873–77.

Opere letterarie, edited by Luigi Blasucci. 1964.

The Chief Works and Others, translated by Allan H. Gilbert. 3 vols., 1965, reprinted 1989.

Opere, edited by Sergio Bertelli and others. 4 vols., 1968–89.

Tutte le opere, edited by Mario Martelli. 1971.

The Portable Machiavelli, edited and translated by Peter E. Bondanella and Mark Musa. 1979.

Selected Political Writings, edited and translated by David Wootton. 1994.

The Other Machiavelli: Republican Writings by the Author of "The Prince", edited by Quentin P. Taylor. 1998.

The Ruthless Leader: Three Classics of Strategy and Power, edited by Alistair McAlpine. 2000.

Prose

Discorso dell'ordinare lo stato di Firenze alle armi. 1507(?).

Dell'arte della guerra. 1521; as The Art of War, translated by Peter Whitehorne, 1560; also translated by Ellis Farnsworth, 1990.

Discorsi sulla prima deca di Tito Livio. 1531; as The Discourses on Livy, translated by Edward Dacres, 1636, translation edited by Bernard Crick, 1971; also translated by Christian E. Detmold, in The Historical, Political and Diplomatic Writings, 1882; as Ten Discourses of Livy, translated by Allan H. Gilbert, 1946; as Discourses on Livy, translated with introduction by Julia Conaway Bondanella and Peter Bondanella, 1997.

- Discorsi*. 1531; as The Discourses, translated by Leslie J. Walker, 2 vols., 1950, revised by Brian Richardson, 1971.
- Il principe*. 1532; edited by Luigi Firpo, 1974, and by Brian Richardson, 1979; translated as The Prince, 1560; numerous subsequent translations including, by Edward Dacres, 1640, reprinted 1968; Voltaire, 1741; J. Scott Byerley, 1810; Christian E. Detmold, in The Historical, Political and Diplomatic Writings, 1882; Ninian Hill Thomson, 1882; Luigi Ricci, 1903; W.K. Marriott, 1908, reprinted 1992; Allan H. Gilbert, 1946; George Bull, 1961; Daniel Donno, 1966; Peter E. Bondanella and Mark Musa, 1984; Harvey Claflin Mansfield, 1985; Russell Price, 1988; Robert M. Adams, 1977, revised edition, 1992; edited and translated by Bruce Penman, in The Prince and Other Political Writings, 1981; as The Ruler, translated by Peter Rodd, 1954; translated by David Wootton, 1995; translated by Paul Sonnino, 1996.
- Istorie fiorentine*. 1532; as Florentine History, translated by Thomas Bedingfield, 1595; also translated by "M.K.," 1674; and W.K. Marriott, 1909; as The History of Florence, translated by Henry Nevile, 1675; also translated by Christian E. Detmold, in The Historical, Political and Diplomatic Writings, 1882; and Ninian Hill Thomson, 2 vols., 1906; as The Florentine Histories, translated by C. Edwards Lester, 1845; as History of Florence and of the Affairs of Italy, translated anonymously, with The Prince, 1847; as Reform in Florence, translated by Allan H. Gilbert, 1946.
- La vita di Castruccio Castracani da Lucca*. 1532; edited by Riekie Brakkee, 1986; as The Life of Castruccio Castracani, translated by Henry Nevile, in The Works of the Famous Nicolas Machiavel, 1675; as Castruccio Castracani, translated by Allan H. Gilbert, 1946.
- Lettere*, edited by F. Fossi. 1767.
- Scritti inediti* (letters), edited by Giuseppe Canestrini. 1857.
- The Historical, Political and Diplomatic Writings* (includes The History of Florence; The Prince; Discourses on Livy; Thoughts of a Statesman; Missions; miscellaneous papers), translated by Christian E. Detmold. 4 vols., 1882.
- The Prince and Other Pieces*, edited by Henry Morley and translated by Henry Nevile. 1883.
- Lettere familiari*, edited by Edoardo Alvisi. 1883; as Familiar Letters, translated by Allan H. Gilbert, 1965.
- The Private Correspondence*, translated by Charles H. Moore. 1929.
- The Living Thoughts of Machiavelli* (includes Discourses on Livy; The Prince; Private Letters), edited by Count Carlo Sforza; translated by Sforza and Arthur Livingston. 1940.
- The Prince; Reform in Florence; Castruccio Castracani; On Fortune; Letters; Ten Discourses of Livy*, translated by Allan H. Gilbert. 1946.
- Letters*, translated by Allan H. Gilbert. 1946.
- Corrispondenza con Francesco Vettori (1513–1515)*, edited by Alfredo Moretti. 1948.
- Discorso o dialogo intorno a la nostra lingua*, as A Dialogue on Language, translated by John R. Hale, in The Literary Works. 1961.
- The Literary Works* (includes Mandragola; Clizia; Belfagor; A Dialogue on Language), translated by John R. Hale. 1961.
- Lettere*, edited by Franco Gaeta. 1961.
- Letters: A Selection*, edited and translated by Allan H. Gilbert. 1961.
- Legazioni, commissarie, scritti di governo*, edited by Fredi Chiappelli. 1971–.
- The Prince and Other Political Writings*, edited and translated by Bruce Penman. 1981.

Fiction

- Novella di Belfagor arcidiavolo*. 1545; as A Caveat for Wives to Love Their Husbands, or, Pleasant News from Hell, 1660; as The Marriage of Belphegor, translated by Henry Nevile, 1675; as The Marriage of Belfager, 1719; as Belfagor, translated by John R. Hale, in The Literary Works, 1961.

Plays

- La mandragola* (produced c. 1518–20). c. 1518–24; edited by Roberto Guicciardini, 1977, and by R. Raimondi, with Clizia, 1984; as Mandragola, translated by Stark Young, 1927; also translated by Ashley Dukes, 1940; John R. Hale, 1956; Bruce Penman, in Five Renaissance Comedies, 1978; as The Mandrake, translated by Frederick May and Eric Bentley, in Classic Theatre 1, 1958; also translated by David Sices and James B. Atkinson, in Comedies, 1985.
- La Clizia* (produced 1525). 1532; edited by Guido Davico Bonino, 1977, and by R. Raimondi, with Mandragola, 1984; as Clizia, translated by John R. Hale, in The Literary Works, 1961; and translated by David Sices and James B. Atkinson, in Comedies, 1985.
- Andria*, from the play by Terence. In Opere inedite in prosa e in verso, 1763; and in Teatro, 1979; as The Woman from Andros, translated by David Sices and James B. Atkinson, in Comedies, 1985.
- Tutto il teatro*, edited by Bruno Cagli. 1975.
- Teatro* (includes Andria; Mandragola; Clizia), edited by Guido Davico Bonino. 1979.
- The Comedies* (includes The Woman from Andros; The Mandrake; Clizia), edited and translated by David Sices and James B. Atkinson (bilingual edition). 1985.

Verse

- Decennale Primo*. 1504(?).
- Lust and Liberty*, translated by Joseph Tusiani. 1963.

*

Bibliography: Bibliografia machiavelliana by S. Bertelli and P. Innocenti, 1979.

Critical Studies: The Life and Times of Niccolò Machiavelli by Pasquale Villari, 1892, revised edition, 2 vols., 1982; Machiavelli and the Modern State by Louis Dyer, 1904; Machiavelli's Prince and Its Forerunners by Allan H. Gilbert, 1938; Machiavelli, 1947, and Discourses on Machiavelli, 1969, both by J.H. Whitfield; Machiavelli and the Renaissance by Frederick Chabod, translated by David Moore, 1958; Thoughts on Machiavelli by Leo Strauss, 1958; Machiavellism: The Doctrine of Raison d'État and Its Place in Modern History by Friedrich Meinecke, translated by Douglas Scott, 1959; Machiavelli and Renaissance Italy by J.R. Hale, 1961; The Life of Machiavelli by Roberto Ridolfi, 1963; The English Face of Machiavelli: A Changing Interpretation 1500–1700 by Felix Raab, 1964; Machiavelli and Guicciardini: Politics and History in Sixteenth-Century Florence by Felix Gilbert, 1965; Studies on Machiavelli edited by Myron P. Gilmore, 1965; Notes on Machiavelli's Prince by Luisa Vergani, 1967; Fortune's Circle: A Biographical Interpretation of Niccolò Machiavelli by C.D. Tarleton, 1970; The Political Calculus: Essays on Machiavelli's Philosophy, 1972, and The Machiavellian Cosmos, 1992, both by Anthony Parel; Machiavelli and the Art of Renaissance History by Peter E. Bondanella, 1974; The Machiavellian Moment: Florentine Political Thought and the Atlantic Republican Tradition by J.G.A. Pocock, 1975; Machiavelli to Marx: Modern Western Political Thought by Dante Germino, new edition, 1979; Machiavelli's New Modes and Orders: A Study of the Discourses on Livy by Harvey Claflin Mansfield, 1979; Machiavelli by Quentin Skinner, 1981; Politics and Ethics: Machiavelli to Niebuhr by Erwin A. Gaede, 1984; Machiavelli and the History of Prudence by Eugene Garver, 1987; Machiavelli and Mystery of State by Peter S. Donaldson, 1989; Machiavelli in Hell (biography) by Sebastian De Grazia, 1989; Niccolò Machiavelli by Sylvia Ruffo-Fiore, 1990; Machiavelli and Republicanism by Gisela Bock and others, 1991; Machiavelli and the Discourse of Literature, edited by Albert Russell Ascoli and Victoria Kahn, 1993; Between Friends: Discourses of Power and Desire in the Machiavelli-Vettori Letters of 1513–1515 by John M. Najemy, 1993; Hegemony and Power: On the Relation Between Gramsci and Machiavelli by Benedetto Fontana, 1993; Machiavellian Rhetoric: From the Counter-Reformation to Milton by Victoria Kahn, 1994; Niccolò Machiavelli's The Prince: New Interdisciplinary Essays, edited by Martin Coyle, 1995; Machiavelli's Three Romes: Religion, Human Liberty, and Politics Reformed by Vickie B. Sullivan, 1996; Machiavelli's Virtue by Harvey C. Mansfield, 1996; Machiavelli, Leonardo, and the Science of Power by Roger D. Masters, 1996; Hypocrisy and Integrity: Machiavelli, Rousseau, and the Ethics of Politics by Ruth W. Grant, 1997; A Case for Freedom: Machiavellian Humanism by Adam D. Danél, 1997; The Machiavellian Legacy: Essays in Italian Political Thought by Joseph V. Femia, 1998; Machiavelli by Maurizio Viroli, 1998; Machiavelli Redeemed: Retrieving His Humanist Perspectives on Equality, Power, and Glory by Robert A. Kocis, 1998; Machiavelli and Us by Louis Althusser, translated by Gregory Elliot, 1999; The Swarm of Heaven: A Renaissance Mystery Being Certain Incidents in the Life of Niccolò Machiavelli by Derek Wilson, 1999; The Machiavellian Enterprise: A Commentary on The Prince by Leo Paul S. de Alvarez, 1999; Niccolò's Smile: A Biography of Machiavelli by Maurizio Viroli, translated by Antony Shugaar, 2000; The Comedy and Tragedy of Machiavelli: Essays on the Literary Works, edited by Vickie B. Sullivan, 2000; Well-ordered License: On the Unity of Machiavelli's Thought by Markus Fischer, 2000.

* * *

