

SECOND EDITION

NEW DICTIONARY OF THEOLOGY

HISTORICAL AND SYSTEMATIC

EDITED BY MARTIN DAVIE,
TIM GRASS, STEPHEN R. HOLMES,
JOHN MCDOWELL AND T. A. NOBLE

SECOND EDITION

NEW DICTIONARY OF THEOLOGY

HISTORICAL AND SYSTEMATIC

EDITED BY MARTIN DAVIE,
TIM GRASS, STEPHEN R. HOLMES,
JOHN MCDOWELL AND T. A. NOBLE

 IVP Academic
An imprint of InterVarsity Press
Downers Grove, Illinois

NEW DICTIONARY OF THEOLOGY
HISTORICAL AND SYSTEMATIC
SECOND EDITION

Editors:

Martin Davie
Tutor in Doctrine at Wycliffe Hall, Oxford

Tim Grass
Senior Research Fellow at Spurgeon's College, London

Stephen R. Holmes
Senior Lecturer in Theology at the University of St Andrews, Scotland

John McDowell
Director of Research, University of Divinity, Australia

T. A. Noble
Senior Research Fellow in Theology at the Nazarene Theological College, Manchester, and Research Professor of Theology at the Nazarene
Theological Seminary, Kansas City, Missouri

Consulting editors:

Roland Chia
Chew Hock Hin Professor of Christian Doctrine and Dean of the School of Postgraduate Studies, Trinity Theological College, Singapore

David Emmanuel Singh
Research Tutor in Islamic Studies, Oxford Centre for Mission Studies

Kevin J. Vanhoozer
Research Professor of Systematic Theology at Trinity Evangelical Divinity School, Deerfield, Illinois

Inter-Varsity Press
London, England

InterVarsity Press
Downers Grove, Illinois, USA

InterVarsity Press, USA
P.O. Box 1400
Downers Grove, IL 60515-1426, USA
ivpress.com
email@ivpress.com

© Inter-Varsity Press, 2016

Published in the United States of America by InterVarsity Press, Downers Grove, Illinois, with permission from Inter-Varsity Press, England.

All rights reserved. No part of this book may be reproduced in any form without written permission from InterVarsity Press.

InterVarsity Press® is the book-publishing division of InterVarsity Christian Fellowship/USA®, a movement of students and faculty active on campus at hundreds of universities, colleges and schools of nursing in the United States of America, and a member movement of the International Fellowship of Evangelical Students. For information about local and regional activities, visit intervarsity.org.

All Scripture quotations, unless otherwise indicated, are taken from the Holy Bible, New International Version®, NIV®, Copyright ©1973, 1978, 1984 by International Bible Society. Used by permission of Zondervan Publishing House. All rights reserved.

Scripture quotations marked NRSV are from the New Revised Standard Version Bible, copyright © 1989 the Division of Christian Education of the National Council of Churches of Christ in the United States of America. Used by permission. All rights reserved.

Scripture quotations marked KJV are from the King James Version of the Bible.

Cover design: Cindy Kiple

Images: Church Interior, Emanuel de Witte, Private Collection, Courtesy of Thomas Brod and Patrick Pilkington, Bridgeman Images

ISBN 978-0-8308-7962-5 (digital)

ISBN 978-0-8308-2455-7 (print)

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Names: Davie, Martin, editor.

Title: New dictionary of theology : historical and systematic / editors,

Martin Davie, Tim Grass, Stephen R. Holmes, John McDowell, T.A. Noble ; consulting editors, Roland Chia, David Emmanuel Singh, Kevin J. Vanhoozer.

Description: 2nd Edition. | Downers Grove : InterVarsity Press, 2016. |

Includes bibliographical references and index.

Identifiers: LCCN 2015050762 | ISBN 9780830824557 (hardcover : alk. paper)

Subjects: LCSH: Theology—Dictionaries.

Classification: LCC BR95 .N39 2016 | DDC 230.03—dc23

LC record available at <http://lccn.loc.gov/2015050762>

Contents

Preface to the first edition	vii
Preface to the second edition	ix
How to use this Dictionary	xi
Abbreviations	xiii
List of contributors	xvii
Dictionary articles	1
Index of names	987
Index of subjects	997
Index of articles	1011
About the Editors	1017
More Titles from InterVarsity Press	1018
IVP Academic Textbook Selector	1019

Preface to the first edition

‘Everything a theologian does in the church,’ said Martin Luther, ‘contributes to the spread of the knowledge of God and the salvation of men.’ That may not sum up every Christian’s attitude to theologians and theology, but it strikes the right note. The root meaning of ‘theology’ is ‘speaking about God’. What Christian theology seeks to do is to spell out the significance of God’s revelation, supremely in Jesus Christ, of himself and his provision and purposes for his world and the men and women he has made. Theology does this in different ways, some of which are suggested by qualifying epithets such as ‘biblical’, ‘historical’ and ‘systematic’. Yet all the various methods and models of theology aim to set forth an ordered understanding of the revealed mind of God – about himself, about his creatures in this world, and about the way he plans us to live in fellowship with himself and one another. The Christian whose diet has no theological content is likely to suffer from stunted or unbalanced growth instead of developing maturity of mind and heart.

This Dictionary is intended to provide the enquiring reader with a basic introduction to the world of theology – its themes, both majestic and minor, its famous formulations and its important historical moments, its distinguished – and notorious – exponents, past as well as present, its sources, disciplines and styles, its technical vocabulary, its ebb and flow in movements, schools and traditions, and its interaction with other currents of thought and religion. While the common standpoint of the editors and contributors is allegiance to the supreme authority of the Scriptures, and their shared concern to set forth a biblical basis for theological knowledge and judgment, no attempt has been made to exclude or minimize diversity of interpretation within these boundary marks.

The production of a volume like this would never have been possible without the contributions of many individuals over many months. Special mention must be made of Richard Bauckham, who helped in the planning stages, and of successive theological editors of IVP, David Preston, Claire Evans and David Kingdon. The last-named has borne the heat and burden of the main part of the day. Their reward, and ours, in part will be the knowledge that this Dictionary fulfils its purpose – to promote an informed and biblically controlled approach to thinking and speaking about God and his works.

SINCLAIR B. FERGUSON
DAVID F. WRIGHT

Preface to the second edition

Many students and readers have expressed their appreciation for the New Dictionary of Theology (1988). As the second of the dictionaries produced by IVP (the first being the New Bible Dictionary in 1962), it has been a trustworthy and informative guide. After almost thirty years, however, there are many new writers, issues and themes on the agenda, for theology does not stand still, and this second edition therefore has over 400 new articles. Many of the existing articles have been expanded and amended, and almost all have additional bibliographical references.

The editors have tried to give more attention in this mainly British publication to theological writers and themes in North America and around the world. The excellent material on biblical theology has been (regretfully) deleted, since this subject is now covered at length in IVP's New Dictionary of Biblical Theology (2000). This book is therefore now more specifically a dictionary of systematic and historical theology, though we recognize that this cannot but take its rise from biblical theology.

Like the original editors, the revising editors share a commitment to the historic Christian faith and particularly to the evangelical tradition which acknowledges that our systematic theology is under the authority of Holy Scripture. This can be acknowledged without apology, since the false concept of objectivity as the stating of completely neutral facts, an activity incompatible with commitment to any position or viewpoint, is now regarded as an illusion. Nevertheless, the editors aspire to that degree of objectivity which begins with an acknowledgment of our own perspective, and therefore every care has been taken throughout the Dictionary to give a fair and accurate account not only of every tradition of evangelical theology, but of every Christian, and indeed every non-Christian, stance.

Thanks are due to all who have contributed, and particularly to the organizing editor, Steve Carter, whose work was completed by Dr Philip Duce. We acknowledge our debt to the original editors, Dr Sinclair Ferguson and Professor David Wright, and to the original consulting editor, Dr J. I. Packer. We dedicate this second edition to the late David F. Wright, Professor Emeritus of Patristic and Reformed Theology at the University of Edinburgh, in gratitude for his Christian witness and the painstaking scholarship which made him a guide and mentor to so many.

MARTIN DAVIE
TIM GRASS
STEPHEN HOLMES
JOHN MCDOWELL
T. A. NOBLE

How to use this Dictionary

Cross-references

It has been editorial policy in this Dictionary to group smaller topics together and treat them in a single longer article. For example, the various Reformation and post-Reformation ‘Confessions of Faith’ are collected under CONFESIONS OF FAITH, and many matters are subsumed under EUCHARIST. Cross-referencing is therefore important. Four methods are in use:

1. Numerous one-line entries refer the user to the title of the article or articles where the topic is treated: e.g. COMMON GRACE, see GRACE.
2. An asterisk before a word or phrase indicates that further relevant information will be found in the article under that title. Readers should note:
 - a. The form of the word asterisked will not always be precisely the same as that of the article to which the asterisk refers. For example, ‘*Trinitarianism’ directs the reader to the article on TRINITY.
 - b. The asterisk sometimes applies to two or three words rather than to the word asterisked. Thus, for example, ‘*covenant theology’ directs you to the article COVENANT THEOLOGY.
3. A reference in brackets in the body of an article such as ‘(see *Angels)’ speaks for itself.
4. A cross-reference at the end of an article is also self-explanatory: e.g. See also: ANA-BAPTIST THEOLOGY.

Abbreviations

A list of abbreviations used in the Dictionary is given on pp. xiii–xv.

Bibliographies

Guidance for further study has been provided for virtually every article, at the end. Writings by the subject of the article are placed first. The works listed in a Bibliography may include studies that take a different position from that of the contributor of the article.

Bible versions

Quotations from the Bible are from the New International Version (1984), unless otherwise indicated.

Abbreviations

1. Books and journals

- ACW Ancient Christian Writers (Westminster, MD, and London, etc., 1946–)
- ANCL Ante-Nicene Christian Library, 25 vols. (Edinburgh, 1866–97)
- ANF Ante-Nicene Fathers (re-edition of ANCL in 10 vols., Buffalo and New York, 1885–96, and Grand Rapids, MI, 1950–51)
- AV(ΚJV) Authorized Version (King James), 1611
- BDE Biographical Dictionary of Evangelicals (Leicester, 2003)
- BJRL Bulletin of the John Rylands Library (Manchester, 1903–)
- BS Bibliotheca Sacra (New York, etc., 1843–)
- BZNW Beiheft zur ZNW
- CCCM Corpus Christianorum, Continuatio Medievalis (Turnhout, 1966–)
- CCET Cambridge Companion to Evangelical Theology, ed. D. Treier and T. Larsen (Cambridge, 2007)
- CCL Corpus Christianorum, Series Latina (Turnhout, 1935–)
- CD Church Dogmatics, Karl Barth, 4 vols. in 13 + index vol. (ET, Edinburgh, 1936–81)
- CG Christian Graduate (London, etc., 1948–83)
- CH Church History (Scottsdale, PA, etc., 1932–)
- CHLGEMP Cambridge History of Later Greek and Early Medieval Philosophy, ed. A. H. Armstrong (Cambridge, 1967)
- CPG Clavis Patrum Graecorum, ed. M. Geerard (Turnhout, 1983–)
- CT Christianity Today (Washington, 1956–)
- CTJ Calvin Theological Journal (Grand Rapids, MI, 1966–)
- DBS Dictionnaire de la Bible, Supplement, ed. L. Pirot et al. (Paris, 1928–)
- DCB Dictionary of Christian Biography, ed. W. Smith and H. Wace, 4 vols. (London, 1877–87)
- DEM Dictionary of the Ecumenical Movement (Geneva, 1991)
- DHT Dictionary of Historical Theology, ed. T. A. Hart (Grand Rapids and Carlisle, 2000)
- DLNTD Dictionary of the Later New Testament and Its Developments, ed. R. P. Martin and P. H. Davids (Leicester, 1997)
- DNB Dictionary of National Biography, ed. L. Stephen and S. Lee et al. (London, 1885–)
- DSp Dictionnaire de Spiritualité, ed. M. Viller et al. (Paris, 1937–)
- DTC Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. Vacant et al., 15 vols. (Paris, 1903–50)
- EC Encyclopedia of Christianity, vols. 1–4 (no more published), eds. E. H. Palmer, G. G. Cohen and P. E. Hughes (Wilmington, DL, and Marshalton, DL, 1964–72)
- EP Encyclopedia of Philosophy, ed. P. Edwards, 8 vols. (New York, 1967)
- EQ Evangelical Quarterly (London, etc., 1929–)
- ERE Encyclopaedia of Religion and Ethics, ed. J. Hastings, 13 vols. (Edinburgh, 1908–26)
- FC Fathers of the Church (New York, etc., 1947–)
- HR History of Religions (Chicago, 1961–)
- HTR Harvard Theological Review (New York, etc., 1908–)
- IJT Indian Journal of Theology (Serampore, etc., 1952–)
- Institutes John Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion, tr. F. L. Battles, ed. J. T. McNeill, 2 vols. (London, 1961)
- JAAR Journal of the American Academy of Religion (Chambersburg, PA, 1967–)

Abbreviations

JEH	Journal of Ecclesiastical History (London, 1950–)
JETS	Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society (Wheaton, IL, 1969–)
JR	Journal of Religion (Chicago, 1921–)
JTS	Journal of Theological Studies (Oxford, 1899–)
LCC	Library of Christian Classics , 26 vols. (London and Philadelphia, 1953–70)
LCL	Loeb Classical Library (London and Cambridge, MA, 1912–)
LW	Luther's Works ('American edition'), ed. J. Pelikan and H. T. Lehmann (Philadelphia and St Louis, MO, 1955–)
MQR	Mennonite Quarterly Review (Goshen, IN, 1927–)
NCE	New Catholic Encyclopedia , ed. W. J. McDonald, 17 vols. (New York, 1967–79)
NIDNTT	The New International Dictionary of New Testament Theology , ed. C. Brown, 3 vols. (Exeter, 1975–8)
NPNF	A Select Library of Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers of the Christian Church , First Series, ed. P. Schaff, 14 vols. (New York, 1886–90); Second Series, ed. H. Wace and P. Schaff, 14 vols. (New York, 1890–1900); new edition (Grand Rapids, MI, 1980)
NRT	Nouvelle revue théologique (Tournai, etc., 1879–)
NTS	New Testament Studies (Cambridge, 1954–)
PG	Patrologia Graeca , ed. J. P. Migne, 162 vols. (Paris, 1857–66)
PL	Patrologia Latina , ed. J. P. Migne, 221 vols. (Paris, 1844–64)
PTR	Princeton Theological Review (Philadelphia, 1903–29)
RB	Revue Biblique (Paris, 1892–)
RBén	Revue Bénédictine (Maredsous, 1884–)
RGG	Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart , ed. K. Galling, 7 vols. (Tübingen, ³ 1957–65)
SJT	Scottish Journal of Theology (Edinburgh, etc., 1948–)
SL	Studia Liturgica (Rotterdam, 1962–)
SM	Sacramentum Mundi , ed. K. Rahner et al. , 5 vols. (New York, 1968–70)
SP	Studia Patristica (Berlin, etc., 1957–)
TDNT	Theological Dictionary of the New Testament , ed. G. W. Bromiley, 10 vols. (Grand Rapids, MI, 1964–76), ET of Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament , ed. G. Kittell and G. Friedrich (Stuttgart, 1932–74)
Th	Theology (London, 1920–)
Them	Themelios (Lausanne, 1962–74; new series, London, etc., 1975–)
Tr	Transformation (Exeter, 1984–)
TRE	Theologische Realenzyklopädie , ed. G. Krause et al. (Berlin, NY, 1977–)
TS	Theological Studies (Woodstock, MD, 1940–)
TynB	Tyndale Bulletin (London, etc., 1956–)
VC	Vigiliae Christianae (Amsterdam, 1947–)
VT	Vetus Testamentum (Leiden, 1951–)
USQR	Union Seminary Quarterly Review (New York, 1945–)
WTJ	Westminster Theological Journal (Philadelphia, 1938–)
ZKG	Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte (Gotha, etc., 1877–)
ZTK	Zeitschrift für Theologie und Kirche (Tübingen, 1891–)

Editions are indicated by small superior figures: ²2000.

2. Early Christian works

EH	Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History
Ep.	Polycarp, Epistles to the Philippians
Eph.	Ignatius, Ephesians
Strom.	Clement of Alexandria, Stromateis
Trall.	Ignatius, Trallians

3. Biblical books

Books of the Old Testament

Gen., Exod., Lev., Num., Deut., Josh., Judg., Ruth, 1, 2 Sam., 1, 2 Kgs, 1, 2 Chr., Neh., Esth., Job, Ps. (Pss), Prov., Eccl., Song, Isa., Jer., Lam., Ezek., Dan., Hos., Joel, Amos, Obad., Jon., Mic., Nah., Hab., Zeph., Hag., Zech., Mal.

Books of the New Testament

Matt., Mark, Luke, John, Acts, Rom., 1, 2 Cor., Gal., Eph., Phil., Col., 1, 2 Thess., 1, 2 Tim., Titus, Phlm., Heb., Jas, 1, 2 Pet., 1, 2, 3 John, Rev.

4. General abbreviations

b.	born
c.	circa. (Lat.), about, approximately
cf.	confer (Lat.), compare
ch. (chs.)	chapter(s)
col. (cols.)	column(s)
d.	died
Ecclus.	Ecclesiasticus (Apocrypha)
ed. (eds.)	edited by, edition, editor(s)
Eng.	English
ET	English translation
et al.	et alii (Lat.), and others
EVV	English versions
f. (ff.)	and the following (verse(s), etc.)
fl.	floruit (Lat.), flourished
Ger.	German
Gk	Greek
Heb.	Hebrew
ibid.	ibidem (Lat.), the same work
idem	idem (Lat.), the same author
Lat.	Latin
lit.	literally
loc. cit.	loco citato (Lat.), in the place already quoted
Macc.	Maccabees (Apocrypha)
n.s.	new series
NT	New Testament
OT	Old Testament
par.	and parallel(s)
repr.	reprinted
tr.	translated, translation
v. (vv.)	verse(s)
viz.	videlicet (Lat.), namely
vol. (vols.)	volume(s)

List of contributors

- Adams, N., Senior Lecturer in Theology and Philosophy, University of Edinburgh
- Albin, T. R., Minister, United Methodist Church
- Alsford, S. E., Senior Lecturer in Teaching and Learning, and Deputy Head of EDU, University of Greenwich
- Althaus-Reid, M. (d. 2009), formerly Professor of Contextual Theology, New College, University of Edinburgh
- Anderson, J. N., Associate Professor of Theology and Philosophy, Reformed Theological Seminary, Charlotte, USA
- Armerding, C. E., formerly Academic Director, Schloss Mittersill Study Centre, Austria
- Ashenden, G., Vicar, St Martin de Gouray, Jersey
- Asprey, C. J. R., formerly doctoral candidate, University of Aberdeen
- Atkinson, J. (d. 2011), Emeritus Professor of Biblical Studies, University of Sheffield
- Avis, P. D. L., Chaplain to HRH Queen Elizabeth II, Director of Centre for the Study of the Christian Church, University of Exeter, and Editor in Chief, Ecclesiology magazine
- Bacon, H. J., Senior Lecturer and Deputy Head, Department of Theology and Religious Studies, University of Chester
- Badcock, G. D., Professor of Divinity and Chair of Graduate Programme, Faculty of Theology, Huron University College, Canada
- Baker, J. P. (d.), formerly Rector of Newick, Lewes, East Sussex
- Barclay, O. R. (d. 2013), formerly General Secretary of UCCF and Honorary Vice-President, IFES
- Bartos, E., Dean of Theology, Emmanuel Bible Institute, Oradea, Romania
- Bauckham, R. J., Emeritus Professor of New Testament Studies, University of St Andrews, and Senior Scholar, Ridley Hall, Cambridge
- Baxter, C. A., formerly Principal, St John's College, Nottingham
- Bebbington, D. W., Professor of History, University of Stirling
- Bechtel, P. M. (d. 1998), formerly Chair, English Department, Wheaton College
- Beck, W. D., formerly Professor of Philosophy, Liberty Baptist College, Virginia, USA
- Beckwith, R. T., formerly Warden of Latimer House, Oxford
- Bediako, K. (d. 2008), Founder of Krofi Christaller Memorial Centre for Mission Studies, Ghana
- Beeke, J. R., President and Professor of Systematic Theology and Homiletics at Puritan Reformed Theological Seminary, and Pastor of the Heritage Netherlands Reformed Congregation in Grand Rapids, Michigan
- Berry, R. J., Professor Emeritus of Genetics, University College London
- Beyerhaus, P. P. J., formerly Professor of Missiology and Ecumenical Theology and Dean of the Theological Faculty, University of Tübingen, Germany
- Bierma, L. D., P. J. Zondervan Professor of the History of Christianity, Calvin Theological Seminary, Michigan, USA
- Billings, J. T., Gordon H. Girod Research Professor of Reformed Theology, Western Theological Seminary, Michigan, USA
- Bingaman, B., Assistant Professor of Religious Studies, Wesleyan College, Georgia, USA

List of contributors

Blackham, P. R., Minister, Soul Church,
Neath

Blocher, H. A. G., Gunther Knoedler
Professor of Systematic Theology, Wheaton College Graduate School, Illinois, USA, and Professor of Systematic Theology, Faculté
Libre de Théologie Évangélique, Vaux-sur-
Seine, France

Bong, R. R., Academic Dean, Evangel
Theological Seminary, Honolulu, USA

Bradshaw, T., Fellow and Tutor in Christian Doctrine, Senior Tutor and Tutor for Admissions, Regent's Park College, Oxford

Bray, G. L., Research Professor of Divinity,
History and Doctrine, Beeson Divinity School, Samford, USA

Bretherton, L., Professor of Theological Ethics and Senior Fellow, Kenan Institute for Ethics, Duke Divinity School, North Carolina, USA

Breward, I., Emeritus Professor, Department of Church History, Catholic Theological College, Melbourne, Australia

Briggs, J., Professor Emeritus, University of Birmingham and sometime Director, Baptist History and Heritage Centre, Regent's Park College, University of Oxford

Bromiley, G. W. (d. 2009), formerly Professor Emeritus, Fuller Theological Seminary,
California, USA

Brown, C., Senior Professor of Systematic Theology, Fuller Theological Seminary,
California, USA

Brown, H. O. J. (d. 2007), formerly Professor and Mentor, Trinity Evangelical Divinity School and Reformed Theological Seminary,
Illinois, USA

Brown, R., formerly Principal, Spurgeon's
College, London

Bruce, F. F. (d. 1990), formerly Rylands
Professor of Biblical Criticism and Exegesis, University of Manchester

Buchanan, C. O., formerly Bishop of Woolwich

Bunting, H., formerly Lecturer in Philosophy, University of Ulster, Northern Ireland

Burk, J. K., President, Interfaith CarePartners, Texas, USA

Cameron, N. M. de S., formerly Distinguished Professor of Theology and Culture, Trinity Evangelical Divinity School, and Provost, Trinity International University,
Illinois, USA

Chaplin, J. P., Director of the Kirby Laing Institute for Christian Ethics, Tyndale House, Cambridge

Chestnutt, G. A., Minister, Church of Scotland, St John's Parish, Gourcock

Chia, R., Chew Hock Hin Professor of Christian Doctrine, Trinity Theological College, Singapore

Chilcote, P. W., Academic Dean and Professor of Historical Theology and Wesleyan Studies,
Ashland Theological Seminary, Ohio, USA

Chow, W. W., President Emeritus, China
Graduate School of Theology, Hong Kong

Clark, A. C., Co-ordinator for the Philip Project, Friends International, Cambridge

Clark, D. K., formerly Associate Professor in Theology and Philosophy, Toccoa Falls College, Georgia, USA

Clark, K. J., Senior Research Fellow, Kaufman Interfaith Institute, Grand Valley State University, Michigan, USA

Clark, R. S., Professor of Church History and Historical Theology, Westminster Theological Seminary, California, USA

Clements, K., Co-ordinating Secretary for International Affairs, Council of Churches for Britain and Ireland

Clough, D. L., Professor of Theological Ethics, University of Chester

Clouse, R. G., Professor Emeritus,
Department of History, Indiana State University, Indiana, USA

Clowney, D. W., Professor of Philosophy and Religious Studies, Rowan University,
New Jersey, USA

Cole, G. A., Dean, Trinity Evangelical
Divinity School, Illinois, USA

Colwell, J. E., Senior Research Fellow,
Spurgeon's College, London

Colyer, E. M., Professor of Systematic Theology and Stanley Professor of Wesley Studies, University of Dubuque, Iowa,
USA

Cook, E. D., Clinical Associate Professor of Marriage and Family Therapy, Wheaton College, Illinois, USA

Cortez, M., Adjunct Professor, Western Seminary and Associate Professor of Theology, Wheaton College, Illinois, USA

Cosden, D. T., Professor of Theological Studies, Judson University, Illinois, USA

Cotterell, F. P., formerly Associate Senior Lecturer, Islamic Studies, London School of Theology

Cowley, R. W. (d. 1986), formerly Course
Leader of Non-Stipendiary Ministry Training Course, Oak Hill College, London

Crisp, O. D., Professor of Systematic Theology, Fuller Theological Seminary,
California, USA

Croft, W. S., Priest in Charge, Diocese of Peterborough, UK

Cross, A. R., Member, Faculty of Theology and Religion, University of Oxford

Dallimore, A. (d. 1998), formerly Baptist
Pastor and biographer

Daniel, C. D., Pastor, Faith Bible Church,
Springfield, USA

Davie, M., Tutor of Doctrine, Wycliffe Hall, Oxford, and Theological Consultant, House of Bishops

Davis, D. C., formerly Chaplain and President, Redeemer Seminary, Texas, USA

De Graaff, G., Director of Studies and Tutor of Christian Doctrine and Ethics, South East Institute for Theological Education, Canterbury

Deboys, D. G., Associate Vicar, Tewkesbury
Abbey

Demarest, B., formerly Senior Professor of Christian Theology and Spiritual Formation,
Denver Seminary, Colorado, USA

Donner, T. G., Professor of Biblical History and Theology, Seminario Biblico de Colombia, Colombia

Douglas, J. D. (d. 2003), formerly Librarian, Tyndale House, Cambridge, and Editor of the New Bible Dictionary

Dowling, M., Visiting Lecturer, Old Testament and World Religions, Irish Baptist College

Dragas, G. D., Professor of Patristics, Hellenic College Holy Cross Greek Orthodox School of Theology, Massachusetts, USA

Drane, J., Affiliate Professor of New Testament and Practical Theology, Fuller
Theological Seminary, California, USA,
Fellow of St John's College, Durham, Trustee and Director of Fresh Expressions and Chair of the Mission Shaped Ministry Board

Draycott, A. J., Associate Professor of Biblical and Theological Studies, Biola
University, California, USA

Duriez, C. P., writer of books and poetry

Elias, J. H. (d. 2011), formerly Senior Lecturer in Religious Studies, University of Glamorgan

Elliott, M. W., Professor of Historical and Biblical Theology, University of St Andrews

List of contributors

Ellis, B. E., Associate Publisher, Editorial for Lexham Press and Kirkdale Press

Ellis, K., Vicar of Holy Island, and Team Leader of the Bro Cybi Ministry Area

Escobar, S., Professor, Facultad Protestante de Teología UEBE, Madrid, Spain

Evans, E., Presbyterian Minister, Merthyr Tydfil

Faupel, D. W., Director of the Library and Professor of History of Christianity, Wesley Theological Seminary, Washington DC, USA

Feldmeth, N. P., Director of Faculty Development for Regional Campuses, and Assistant Professor of Church History, Fuller Theological Seminary, California, USA

Ferguson, E., Professor Emeritus of Church History, Abilene Christian University, Texas, USA

Ferguson, S. B., Professor of Systematic Theology, Redeemer Seminary, Texas, USA

Fields, B., Chair and Associate Professor of the Biblical and Systematic Theology Department, Trinity Evangelical Divinity School, South Chicago, USA

Flynn, G., Academic Leader for Research, Mater Dei Institute, Dublin

Forrester, D. B., Professor Emeritus, New College, University of Edinburgh

Forster, P. R., Bishop of Chester

Foster, B. E., formerly Pastor of Calvary Lutheran Church, Lemmon, South Dakota, USA

Frische, R. E., formerly Pastor at the Deaconesses' House, Bern, Switzerland, and Lecturer at the Preachers' College, St Crischona, Basel, Switzerland

Frost, R. N., Pastoral Care Consultant, Barnabas International, Illinois, USA

Gaffin, Jr, R. B., Emeritus Professor of Systematic Theology, Westminster Theological Seminary, Philadelphia, USA

Gasque, W. W., Executive Director, Pacific Association for Theological Studies, Canada

Gay, D., Lecturer in Theology and Religious Studies, University of Glasgow

Gazal, A. A., Member of the Religion Faculty, University of Northwestern Ohio, Ohio, USA

Geisler, N. L., Chancellor, Distinguished Professor of Theology and Apologetics and Occupant of the Norman L. Geisler Chair of Christian Apologetics, Veritas Evangelical Seminary, California, USA

Geivett, R. D., Professor of Philosophy, Talbot Department of Philosophy, Biola University, California, USA

Geldard, M. D., formerly Vicar of St John the Divine, Liverpool

Gerstner, J. H. (d. 1996), formerly Professor of Church History, Pittsburgh Theological Seminary, Pittsburgh, USA

Gilland, D. A., Senior Lecturer in Systematic Theology, University of Leuphana, Germany

Gladwin, J., formerly Bishop of Chelmsford and Chair of the Citizens Advice Bureau

Gleason, R., missionary, Nepal

Goddard, A., Senior Research Fellow, The Kirby Laing Institute for Christian Ethics, Cambridge

Goldingay, J., David Allan Hubbard Professor of Old Testament, Fuller Theological Seminary, California, USA

Goldsmith, M. F., international speaker, teacher and missiologist

Gordon, J., Principal, Scottish Baptist College, Scotland

Gordon, R. P., Emeritus Regius Professor of Hebrew, University of Cambridge

- Gouldbourne, R., Minister, Bloomsbury Central Baptist Church, London
- Graham, I., Parish Priest, The Greek Orthodox Community of the Holy Trinity, Oxford
- Grass, T., Senior Research Fellow, Spurgeon's College, London, and Assistant Editor, Ecclesiastical History Society
- Greaves, R. L. (d. 2004), formerly Robert O. Lawton Distinguished Professor of History, Florida State University, Florida, USA
- Griffiths, M. C., formerly Principal, London Bible College
- Hagner, D. A., George Eldon Ladd Professor Emeritus of New Testament and Senior Professor of New Testament, Fuller Theological Seminary, California, USA
- Hancock, C. D., formerly Chaplain, Magdalene College, Cambridge
- Hankins, Jr, J. D., formerly student at Trinity Evangelical Divinity School, PhD Theological Studies, Illinois, USA
- Hardy, D. S., Professor of Spiritual Formation, Nazarene Theological Seminary, Missouri, USA
- Harris, H., formerly Christian Scholar, Teversham, Cambridge
- Harris, M. J., Professor Emeritus of New Testament Exegesis and Theology, Trinity Evangelical Divinity School, Illinois, USA
- Harvey, T., Academic Dean, Oxford Centre for Mission Studies, Oxford
- Haykin, M. A. G., Professor of Church History and Biblical Spirituality, The Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, Kentucky, USA
- Heinze, R. W., Adjunct Professor, Wheaton College, Illinois, USA
- Helm, P., Teaching Fellow of Philosophical Theology and John Calvin, Regent College, Vancouver, Canada
- Hexham, I., Professor, Department of Religious Studies, University of Calgary, Alberta, Canada
- Hicks, P. A. (d. 2013), formerly Baptist Pastor and Lecturer in Philosophy and Pastoral Care, London School of Theology
- Higton, M., Professor, Department of Theology and Religion, University of Durham
- Hilborn, D. H. K., Principal, St John's School of Mission, Nottingham
- Hillyer, P. N., writer and editor
- Hollingsworth, A., Assistant Professor of Theology, Boston University, Massachusetts, USA
- Holmes, A. F. (d. 2011), formerly Professor of Philosophy, Wheaton College, Illinois, USA
- Holmes, S. R., Senior Lecturer of Theology, University of St Andrews
- Holtschneider, K. H., Senior Lecturer in Jewish Studies, School of Divinity, University of Edinburgh
- Hordern, J. W. S., Lecturer in Theology, Jesus College, Oxford
- Horrocks, D. G., Head of Public Affairs, Evangelical Alliance
- Howard, T., formerly Professor of English, St John's Seminary, Massachusetts, USA
- Hower, R. G., formerly Associate Professor of Church History, Evangelical Seminary, Myerstown, Pennsylvania, USA
- Hughes, D. A., formerly Regional Coordinator, Tearfund, Wales
- Ingersol, S., Denominational Archivist, Church of the Nazarene
- Jason, N., formerly Pastor of Christ Church, Madras, India
- Jensen, P. F., formerly Archbishop of Sydney, and Principal of Moore College, Sydney, Australia

List of contributors

Jenson, M., Associate Professor, Theology,
Biola University, California, USA

Jones, D. G., Emeritus Professor of Anatomy,
University of Otago, New Zealand

Jones, K., Senior Research Fellow, IBTS
Centre, Amsterdam, the Netherlands

Jones, R. T., formerly Principal, Coleg Bala-
Bangor, Bangor, Wales

Kanemoto, S. P., formerly Lecturer, Tokyo
Christian College, Japan, and Lecturer,
Kyoritsu Christian Institute, Japan

Kapic, K. M., Professor of Theological Studies, Covenant College, Georgia, USA

Kearsley, R., formerly Tutor, South Wales
Baptist College

Kee, A. (d. 2011), formerly Professor of Religious Studies, University of Edinburgh

Keen, C. S., Professor, Department of Theology, Azusa Pacific University,
California, USA

Keith, G. A., former school teacher, Ayr

Kelly, D. F., Richard Jordan Professor of Theology, Reformed Theological Seminary,
Florida, USA

Kessler, E., Founder and Director, Woolf
Institute, Cambridge

Kirby, G. W. (d. 2006), formerly Principal of London School of Theology

Kirk, J. A., Research Supervisor, London
School of Theology

Klauber, M. I., Affiliate Professor of Church History, Trinity Evangelical Divinity School,
Illinois, USA

Knight III, H. H., Donald and Pearl Wright
Professor of Wesleyan Studies, Saint Paul
School of Theology, Kansas, USA

Knight, J. A., Associate Professor of Religious Studies, Marist College, New York,
USA

Knowles, S., Senior Lecturer in Religion and Popular Culture, University of Chester

Knudsen, R. D. (d. 2000), formerly Professor,
Westminster Theological Seminary,
Pennsylvania, USA

Krishna, P. M., formerly Professor of Oriental Studies, University of Durban, South Africa

Kristensen, B., formerly Lecturer, College of Social Work, Ede, the Netherlands

Lane, A. N. S., Professor of Historical Theology, London School of Theology

Letham, R. W. A., Professor of Systematic and Historical Theology, Union School of Theology, Bridgend

Lieu, S. N., Professorial Research Associate, Department of Languages and Cultures of Near and Middle East and Research
Associate, Department of Religious Studies,
SOAS University of London

Lillback, P. A., President and Professor of Historical Theology and Church History,
Westminster Theological Seminary,
Pennsylvania, USA

Loewen, H. J., Dean Emeritus and Senior
Professor of Theology and Ethics, Fuller
Theological Seminary, California, USA

Longman III, T., Robert H. Gundy Professor of Religious Studies, Westmont College,
California, USA

Louth, A., Emeritus Professor of Patristic and Byzantine Studies, University of Durham

Lugioyo, B., Associate Professor, Department of Theology and Ethics, Azusa Pacific
University, California, USA

Lund, E., Professor of Religion, St Olaf
College, Minnesota, USA

Lundin, R., Arthur F. Holmes Professor of Faith and Learning, Wheaton College,
Illinois, USA

Lyall, F., Professor of Public Law, University of Aberdeen

- Macaskill, G., Senior Lecturer in New Testament, University of St Andrews
- MacKay, D. M. (d. 1987), formerly Professor of Communication, University of Keele
- Mackenzie, R., Postgraduate Research Programme Leader and Lecturer in Practical Theology and Buddhism, International Christian College, Glasgow
- Macleod, D., formerly Professor of Systematic Theology, and Principal, Free Church College, Edinburgh
- Maier, G., Professor of Institute of Evolutionary Ecology and Conservation Genomics, University of Ulm, Germany
- Manetsch, S. M., Professor of Church History, Trinity Evangelical Divinity School, Illinois, USA
- Mann, S., Senior Lecturer in Sociology, University of Greenwich
- Marsden, G. M., Emeritus Professor of History, University of Notre Dame, Indiana, USA
- Marshall, I. H. (d. 2015), formerly Professor Emeritus of New Testament Exegesis, University of Aberdeen
- Matheson, P. C., Professor, Department of Systematic Theology, Catholic Theological College, Melbourne, Australia
- McCall, T., Associate Professor of Biblical and Systematic Theology, and Director of the Carl F. H. Henry Centre for Theological Understanding, Trinity Evangelical Divinity School, Illinois, USA
- McCormick, K. S., Professor of Historical Theology, Nazarene Theological Seminary, Missouri, USA
- McDonald, H. D., formerly Vice-Principal and Senior Lecturer in Philosophy of Religion and Historical Theology, London Bible College
- McFarlane, A., IT Professional and Theology Researcher, University of Edinburgh
- McGowan, A. T. B., Minister, Inverness East Church of Scotland, and Lecturer in Systematic Theology, Highlands Theological College, Dingwall
- McGuckin, J., Nielson Professor of Early Church History, Union Theological Seminary, Professor of Byzantine Studies, Columbia University, New York, USA, and Orthodox Archpriest
- McIntosh, E., Lecturer in Religion, Philosophy and Ethics, Chair of Faculty Research Ethics Committee and Managing Editor, International Journal of Public Theology, York St John University
- McNair, P. M. J., formerly Serena Professor and Head of the Department of Italian, University of Birmingham
- McNutt, D. W., Associate Editor, IVP Academic, InterVarsity Press, Illinois, USA
- McNutt, J. P., Associate Professor of Theology and History of Christianity, Wheaton College, Illinois, USA
- McPake, J. L., Minister of Mossneuk Parish Church, East Kilbride
- McPhee, I., formerly Editor, Trinity Press, Ontario, Canada
- Meadows, P., Senior Research Fellow, Nazarene Theological College, Manchester
- Merrick, J. R. A., Rector, St Mary's Church, Aberdeen
- Miller, J. T., Overseer and Abbot of the Northumbria Community
- Mills, A. R., formerly PhD candidate, Fuller Theological Seminary, California, USA
- Mitchell, J. P., Professor of Communications, Arts and Religion, University of Edinburgh
- Moore, A. J., Professor, Faculty of Theology and Religion, University of Oxford

List of contributors

- Morden, P. J., Vice-Principal, Church History and Spirituality, Spurgeon's College, London
- Morehead, J. W., Director, Western Institute for Intercultural Studies, Utah, USA
- Morrow, T. W. J., Minister of Lucan Presbyterian Church, Co. Dublin, Republic of Ireland
- Moseley, C. A. E., Tutor in Theology and Ethics, Sarum College, Salisbury
- Mtukwa, G., Lecturer, Africa Nazarene University, Kenya
- Murray, I. H., formerly Minister, St Giles Presbyterian Church, Sydney, USA
- Murray Williams, S. W., Tutor in Mission and Director of the Centre for Anabaptist Studies, Bristol Baptist College
- Mursell, G., formerly Bishop of Stafford
- Nassif, B., Professor of Biblical and Theological Studies, North Park University, Illinois, USA
- Nazir-Ali, M. J., formerly Bishop of Rochester, and Bishop of Raiwind, Pakistan and President, Oxford Centre for Training, Research, Advocacy and Dialogue
- Needham, N. R., Lecturer Specialist in Church History, Highland Theological College, Dingwall
- Nettles, T. J., formerly Professor of Historical Theology, Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, Kentucky, USA
- Newman, D. J., Adjunct Professor, Washington Adventist University, Maryland, USA and former Editor of Ministry magazine
- Nicholls, B. J., Senior Advisor, Asia Theological Institution
- Nicole, R. (d. 2010), Founding Member of the International Council on Biblical Inerrancy and the Evangelical Theological Society
- Nimmo, P. T., Chair, Systematic Theology, University of Aberdeen
- Noble, T. A., Research Professor, Nazarene Theological Seminary, Missouri, and Senior Research Fellow, Nazarene Theological College, Manchester
- Noll, M. A., Francis A. McAnaney Professor of History, University of Notre Dame, Indiana, USA
- Noll, S. F., Professor Emeritus, Trinity School for Ministry, Pennsylvania, USA
- Null, J. A., German Research Council Fellow, Humboldt University of Berlin, and Visiting Fellow, Faculty of Divinity, University of Cambridge and St John's College, Durham
- O'Donovan, O. M. T., formerly Professor of Christian Ethics and Practical Theology, New College, Edinburgh
- Oliver, S. A., Associate Professor of Theology, University of Nottingham
- Ovey, M., Principal, Doctrine, Apologetics and Liturgy, Oak Hill College, London
- Packer, J. I., Board of Governors' Professor of Theology, Regent College, Vancouver, Canada
- Partridge, C., Professor, Department of Politics, Philosophy and Religion, University of Lancaster
- Parushev, P. R., Vice-Principal and Director, IBTS Centre, Amsterdam, the Netherlands
- Parvis, P., Honorary Fellow, School of Divinity, University of Edinburgh
- Parvis, S., Senior Lecturer, Patristics, University of Edinburgh
- Paul, I., Associate Minister, St Nic's, Nottingham, and Honorary Assistant Professor, University of Nottingham
- Peacore, L., Adjunct Assistant Professor of Theology, Fuller Theological Seminary, California, USA

- Penner, M. B., Professor, Philosophy, Dean, Faculty of Humanities and Social Sciences, Director, Master of Arts in Interdisciplinary Humanities, and Director, Anabaptist-Mennonite Centre for Faith and Learning, Trinity Western University, British Columbia, USA
- Percy, M., Principal of Ripon College, Cuddesdon and the Oxford Ministry Course, and Professor of Theological Education, King's College, London
- Perrin, N., Franklin S. Dyrness Professor of Biblical Studies and Dean of the Graduate School, Wheaton College, Illinois, USA
- Philip, J. (d. 2009), formerly Minister, Holyrood Abbey, Edinburgh
- Pinnock, C. H. (d. 2010), formerly Professor Emeritus of Systematic Theology, McMaster Divinity College, Ontario, Canada
- Pointer, S. R., Professor Emeritus in History, Trinity International University, Illinois, USA
- Powell, S. M., Professor of Philosophy and Religion, Point Loma Nazarene University, California, USA
- Preston, D. G., formerly Senior Lecturer in French, Ahmadu Bello University, Zaria, Nigeria
- Price, R. M., formerly Instructor, Montclair State University, New Jersey, USA
- Punshon, J. A., formerly Quaker Studies Tutor, Woodbrooke College, Birmingham
- Quicke, M. J., Emeritus Professor of Preaching, Northern Seminary, Illinois, USA
- Radner, E., Professor of Historical Theology, Wycliffe College, Toronto, Canada
- Rae, M. A., Professor, Theology Programme, University of Otago, New Zealand
- Rainey, D. L., Senior Lecturer in Theology, Nazarene Theological College, Manchester
- Randall, I. M., Senior Research Fellow, IBTS Centre, Amsterdam, the Netherlands
- Raser, H. E., Professor of History of Christianity, Nazarene Theological Seminary, Missouri, USA
- Rausser, R., Professor of Historical Theology, Taylor Seminary, Alberta, Canada
- Reichenbach, B. R., Professor Emeritus, Augsburg College, Minneapolis, USA
- Rentel, A., Assistant Professor of Canon Law and Byzantine Studies and The John and Paraskeva Skvir Lecturer in Practical Theology, St Vladimir's Orthodox Theological Seminary, New York, USA
- Rich, A. D., Director of In-Service Training and Tutor of Greek and Patristics, Spurgeon's College, London
- Riddell, P. G., Academic Vice-Principal, Melbourne School of Theology, Australia
- Rook, R., Founder and CEO, Chapel St, Surrey
- Root, J. B., Reverend, St James Church Centre, London
- Rosell, G. M., Senior Research Professor of Church History, Gordon Conwell Theological Seminary, Florida, USA
- Rowdon, H. H., formerly Senior Lecturer in Church History, London Bible College
- Roxborough, W. J., formerly Lecturer in Church History and New Testament, Seminari Theoloji, Malaysia
- Runia, K. (d. 2006), formerly Leader of the Protestant Church in the Netherlands
- Russell, C. A. (d. 2013), formerly Emeritus Professor of History of Science and Technology, Open University, and Research Scholar, History and Philosophy of Science Department, University of Cambridge
- Russell, S., formerly Lecturer in Theology, Northern College Congregational and United Reformed, Manchester
- Sagovsky, N., Sub-Dean, Westminster Abbey, London

List of contributors

Samuel, V. K., formerly General Secretary, Evangelical Fellowship in the Anglican Communion

Sceats, D. D., formerly Rector of Colton, Staffordshire

Scorgie, G. G., Professor of Theology, Bethel Seminary, San Diego, USA

Sebastian, J. J., Dean of the Lutheran Theological Seminary, Philadelphia, USA

Sellers, I., formerly Senior Lecturer, North Cheshire College, Warrington

Severson, E., Associate Professor of Philosophy, Eastern Nazarene College, Massachusetts, USA

Sexton, J. S., Lecturer, California State University, California, USA

Shehata, S. F., Dean, Pro-Cathedral, St Mark, Alexandria, Egypt

Sheir-Jones, A. (d. 2011), formerly author and editor

Simuț, C. C., Professor of Historical and Systematic Theology, Emanuel University of Oradea, Romania

Sizer, S., Incumbent, Christ Church, Surrey

Smail, T. A. (d. 2012), formerly Team Rector, All Saints, Sanderstead

Smalley, S. J., formerly Lecturer in Historical and Contemporary Theology, University of Manchester

Smart, H. W., freelance writer, Montrose, Scotland

Smith, N. J. (d. 2010), formerly Lecturer in Missiology, University of South Africa, and Minister of the Dutch Reformed Church in Africa, Mamelodi, Pretoria

Spence, A. J., Minister, Sandwich United Reformed Church, Kent

So, D. W. K., Research Tutor, Trinity and Chapel Coordinator, Oxford Centre for Mission Studies, Oxford

Song, R. J., Professor, Department of Theology and Religion, University of Durham

Steven, J. H. S., Academic Dean and Programme Leader for Christian Liturgy, Sarum College, Salisbury

Stevenson, P. K., Principal, South Wales Baptist College, Cardiff, and Honorary Senior Tutor, University of Cardiff

Stiver, D. R., Professor, School of Theology, Harden-Simmons University, Texas, USA

Stobart, A. J., Presbyterian, Methodist Church, Darlington

Storkey, A., formerly Director of Studies, Oak Hill College, London

Strange, D. S., Academic Vice-Principal and Lecturer in Culture, Religion and Public Theology, Oak Hill College, London

Stults, R., Online Workshop Coordinator, Voice of the Martyrs and Adjunct Professor, Religion and Philosophy, Oklahoma Wesleyan University, Oklahoma, USA

Sturch, R. L., formerly Rector of Islip, Oxfordshire

Sugden, C. M. N., Executive Secretary, Anglican Mainstream

Sung, E. Y., Associate Professor of Biblical and Systematic Theology, Trinity Evangelical Divinity School, Illinois, USA

Szurko, M. M., College Librarian, Oriol College, University of Oxford

Thacker, J., Lecturer, Practical and Public Theology, Cliff College, Sheffield

Thiselton, A. C., Emeritus Professor of Christian Theology, University of Nottingham, and Emeritus Canon Theologian of Leicester and of Southwell and Nottingham

- Thomas, D. W. H., Robert Strong
Professor of Systematic and Pastoral Theology, Reformed Theological Seminary,
Atlanta, USA
- Thompson, G. J., formerly Director of Studies in Systematic Theology, Trinity Theological College, Brisbane, Australia
- Thompson, P. E., Professor of Systematic Theology and Christian Heritage,
Sioux Falls Seminary, South Dakota,
USA
- Tidball, D. J., Visiting Scholar, Spurgeon's
College, London
- Tomlin, G., Principal, St Paul's Theological Centre and St Mellitus College, London
- Toon, P. (d. 2009), formerly Priest-in-Charge of Biddulph Moor and Brown Edge, Staffordshire
- Toth (Andronoviene), L., Lecturer in Practical Theology, Scottish Baptist College, Paisley
- Treier, D. J., Blanchard Professor of Theology, Wheaton College, Illinois, USA
- Truscott, J. A., Chaplain, Trinity Theological College, Singapore
- Uchida, K., Associate Professor, University of Tsukuba, Japan
- Van Asselt, W. J. (d. 2014), formerly
Professor of Historical Theology, Evangelical Theological Faculty, Leuven,
Belgium
- Vanhoozer, K. J., Research Professor of Systematic Theology, Trinity Evangelical
Divinity School, Illinois, USA
- Vermaat, J. A. E., Professor and Head of Earth Sciences and Economics, Amsterdam Global Change Institute, Amsterdam, the Netherlands
- Vidu, A., Associate Professor of Theology,
Gordon Conwell Theological Seminary,
Massachusetts, USA
- Vince, R. M., formerly Head Teacher,
St Mark's Day School, Louisiana, USA
- Vos, A., Emeritus Professor, Western Kentucky University, Kentucky, USA
- Wallace, R. S. (d. 2006), formerly
Professor Emeritus of Biblical Theology,
Columbia Theological Seminary, Georgia,
USA
- Walls, A. F., Honorary Professor, University of Edinburgh, Professor of History of Mission, Liverpool Hope University, and Professor, Akrofi-Christaller Institute of Theology, Mission and Culture, Akropong, Ghana
- Walters, P. M., formerly Research Director, Keston College (now the Keston Institute), York
- Ward, J. W., former Director of Studies and Dean of Students, Regents Theological College, Nantwich (now at West Malvern)
- Webster, J. B., Chair of Divinity, St Mary's College, University of St Andrews
- Weinandy, T. G., Adjunct Professor of Systematic Theology, Dominican House of Studies, Washington DC, USA
- Wellings, M., Superintendent Minister,
Oxford Methodist Circuit
- Wilkens, S., Professor, Department of Philosophy, Azusa Pacific University,
California, USA
- Williams, C. P., formerly Vice-Principal,
Trinity College, Bristol
- Williams, S. N., Professor of Systematic Theology and Church History, Union
Theological College, Belfast
- Wilson, J. R., Adjunct Instructor of Religious Studies, Virginia Commonwealth University,
Virginia, USA
- Wollaston, I., Senior Lecturer in Jewish and Holocaust Studies, University of Birmingham

List of contributors

Wood, A. S. (d. 1993), formerly Principal,
Cliff College, Derbyshire

Wood, D. P. (d.), formerly Lecturer in History and Philosophy, School of Divinity, University of Aberdeen

Woods, J. D., Pastor, Lancing Tabernacle, West Sussex

Wright, D. F. (d. 2008), formerly Professor Emeritus of Patristic and Reformed Theology, University of Edinburgh

Wright, J. S. (d. 1985), formerly Principal,
Tyndale Hall

Wright, M. J. (d. 2011), formerly Lecturer in Religious Studies, Open University

Wright, N. G., formerly Principal,
Spurgeon's College, London

Wright, N. T., Research Professor of
New Testament and Early Christianity,
University of St Andrews

Yamauchi, E. M., Professor Emeritus,
Department of History, Miami University,
Ohio, USA

Yarnell III, M. B., Professor of Systematic Theology, Director of the Oxford Study Programme, Director of the Centre for Theological Research and Chair of the Systematic Theology Department,
Southwestern Baptist Theological Seminary,
Texas, USA

Yri, N., formerly Professor of New Testament Studies, Lutheran Theological College, Tanzania

Yu, C. T., Abundant Grace Distinguished Professor of Theological Studies and President Emeritus, China Graduate School of Theology, Hong Kong

Ziegler, P., Senior Lecturer in History and Philosophy, School of Divinity, University of Aberdeen

Zuidervaart, L., Professor of Philosophy, Institute for Christian Studies, Toronto, Canada

ABELARD, PETER (1079–1142)

Peter Abelard (or more accurately, Abailard) was born near Nantes, of Breton parents. He was probably the most brilliant thinker of the twelfth century, but his life was repeatedly marred by tragedy.

Abelard studied first under Roscelin (d. c. 1125), a thoroughgoing *nominalist, then under William of Champeaux (c. 1070–1121), an equally thoroughgoing *realist. While Roscelin was accused of regarding universals as mere words with no reality of their own, William maintained that the universal is more real than the individuals and in fact exists independently of them. Abelard took a mediating position, seeing universals as mental concepts. They have no existence independent of particular individuals, but they are not arbitrary names. A universal, like ‘dog’, is real, but it is not something that exists independently of individual dogs. It precedes individual dogs in that, when God planned the creation of dogs, the universal idea of ‘dog’ was in his mind; it exists in individual dogs; and it exists in our minds when we have the concept of ‘dog’. This view came to be generally accepted and closed the debate until the time of *William of Ockham.

Abelard did not merely disagree with his teachers, he actively opposed them. He attacked Roscelin’s doctrine of the *Trinity, which verged on *tritheism. He opposed William’s realism and set himself up as a rival lecturer at Paris, forcing William to leave Paris and rethink his position on universals. Abelard later meted out the same treatment to Anselm of Laon (d. 1117), with whose exegetical methods he disagreed. After leaving Laon, Abelard returned to Paris where he committed his worst indiscretion. He lodged with Fulbert, a canon of Notre Dame, whose attractive and intelligent niece Héloïse he tutored. Héloïse gave birth to a baby boy. Fulbert later took revenge in a terrible incident in which Abelard was castrated.

In 1122 Abelard wrote Sic et Non (Yes and No). In this book he considers 158 different theological questions, juxtaposing apparently contradictory passages from the Bible, the Fathers and other authorities. His aim was not, as once was supposed, to discredit these authorities. He was rather commending reason as the arbiter to reconcile conflicting authorities and, if necessary, to choose between them. He did not invent this method. Gratian (died not later than 1179), an expert in *canon law, used this approach with great success in his Concord of Discordant Canons. Abelard’s novelty lay in its application to theology and the documents of revelation.

Behind Sic et Non lay Abelard’s basic approach to theology. *Anselm, like *Augustine, had followed the method of faith seeking understanding: ‘I believe in order that I may understand’ (see *Faith and reason). Abelard reversed this, introducing the method of doubt. The way to find the truth is to doubt, to ask questions. In the preface to Sic et Non Abelard stated that ‘by doubting we come to enquire and by enquiring we reach truth’. *Doubt he sees not so much as sin (the traditional view) as the necessary beginning of all knowledge. Theology had become a science instead of a meditation, as in the tradition of *monastic theology.

In his commentary on Rom. 3:19–26, Abelard applied this method to the doctrine of the *atonement. He questioned the meaning of the statement that we are redeemed by Christ’s death. He ridiculed the idea, already declining in popularity since Anselm, that the devil has any rights over mankind. If anything, Satan’s seduction of the human race gives us the right of redress over him. The death of Christ was not offered to Satan as a ransom for mankind. The ransom was paid to God, not to Satan.

But Abelard goes on to question the need for any ransom at all. How could God demand the death of an innocent man, much less the death of his own Son? How could God be reconciled to the world by such a death? Abelard looks elsewhere for the significance of the *cross. He sees it as a supreme example of God’s *love for us, which awakens a response of love in us. Abelard points here towards the ‘moral influence theory’ of the atonement, which sees its value in its effect upon us.

The idea that the cross awakens a loving response on our part is true as far as it goes, but manifestly fails to do full justice to Rom. 3:19–26. But was Abelard actually seeking to limit the atonement to merely an example of love? Elsewhere he continues to use traditional language of Christ bearing the punishment for our sins. Some hold that such passages cannot be taken seriously in the light of the commentary on Romans. Others see such passages as proof that Abelard did not wish to reduce the cross to merely an example of love. It may be significant that while he denies that a ransom was paid to Satan, he only asks why it was necessary for a ransom to be paid to God. Perhaps, as with Sic et Non, his aim is to stimulate rational enquiry rather than discredit scriptural teaching.

Abelard's innovative brilliance, combined with his contempt for those who were his elders but not his betters, launched him on a collision course with disaster. His On the Divine Unity and Trinity was condemned in his absence at the Council of Soissons in 1121 and burnt. This did not permanently affect his career. But he managed to incur the wrath of *Bernard of Clairvaux, who was appalled by his rationalistic approach and accused him of inventing a fifth gospel. Abelard was summoned before a council at Sens in 1140 and condemned. He appealed to Rome, but Bernard had already secured the ear of the pope with his treatise The Errors of Peter Abelard. Abelard became a monk at the abbey of Cluny and died in 1142.

Bibliography

Works: PL 178 and CCCM 11–12. Sic et Non, ed. B. B. Boyer and R. McKean (Chicago, 1976–77); A Dialogue of a Philosopher . . ., tr. P. J. Payer (Toronto, 1979); Ethics, tr. D. E. Luscombe (Oxford, 1971).

Studies: J. E. Brower and K. Guilfooy, The Cambridge Companion to Abelard (Cambridge, 2004); M. Clanchy, Abelard: A Medieval Life (Oxford, 1997); J. Marenbon, The Philosophy of Peter Abelard (Cambridge, 1997); R. E. Weingart, The Logic of Divine Love: A Critical Analysis of the Soteriology of Peter Abailard (Oxford, 1970).

A. N. S. LANE

ABSOLUTION, see GUILT AND FORGIVENESS

ACCOMMODATION

The theological importance of the question of accommodation is frequently overlooked. The term is normally used with reference to the way that *Scripture speaks of *God and his ways. God communicates with us not by directly describing himself as he is, but by 'accommodating' his speech to our understanding. To take a familiar example: God is represented in parts of Scripture as having eyes and hands, but this way of speaking is accommodated to our imaginative capacities. This is usually called 'anthropomorphism'; anthropomorphism is a form of accommodation.

Discussion of accommodation is complicated by at least two factors. The first is that while most commentators will agree that Scripture contains accommodated language, there is disagreement on the question of when it does so. When Scripture refers to God changing his mind, is that an accommodation to our ways of thinking and picturing God or a description of actual change? Or are the alternatives, as stated, too crude? The second is that in the history of theology 'accommodation' has not been used simply with reference to issues surrounding language. Thus, theologians have spoken of God's condescension to us in Jesus Christ as an 'accommodation', which refers more widely to God's activity and not simply to speech.

There was a wide and various use of the principle of accommodation amongst the Church Fathers, John *Chrysostom (c. 349–407) providing an outstanding example. They displayed exemplary sensitivity to the greatness of God and the limits of language, even if their approach was contentious at certain points (e.g. when the literal language of Scripture was read allegorically on the ground that the literal was an accommodation). But for Protestant theologians, 'accommodation' is particularly associated with the name of John *Calvin. He deploys it as a principle of biblical and theological interpretation both in the Institutes and, to a greater extent, in his commentaries. One indication of its complexity is Calvin's discussion of the accommodated nature of language that portrays the death of Christ as translating us from the sphere of divine wrath to the sphere of divine mercy (Institutes 2.16).

A theological grasp of the issue of accommodation is possible only when we are informed and sensitive about how the languages in which the Bible is written function. It may be that certain conventions in Hebrew narrative (in particular) will always remain unclear to us and to that extent we have an ongoing task. Quite generally, 'accommodation' is a reminder of our need to be humble in speech and thought, without weakening in our confidence that we can truly know and love God through Jesus Christ.

See also: HERMENEUTICS.

Bibliography

J. Balsarak, Divinity Compromised: A Study of Divine Accommodation in the Thought of John Calvin (Dordrecht, 2006); F. L. Battles, 'God Was Accommodating Himself to Human Capacity', Interpretation 31, 1977, pp. 19–38; idem, 'God Was Accommodating Himself to Human Capacity', in R. Benedetto (ed.), Interpreting John Calvin (Grand Rapids, 1997); P. Helm, 'Divine Accommodation', in John Calvin's Ideas (New York/Oxford, 2004), pp. 184–208.

S. N. WILLIAMS

ADAM

The first Adam

A historical and systematic treatment of Adam must at least begin with the biblical figure first mentioned in the primeval history in Genesis. The Hebrew word 'adam' is a collective noun meaning 'humankind' which comes to refer in the narrative to the specific man Adam. Accordingly we are to understand references to Adam in the two creation accounts (Gen. 1:1–2:3 and 2:4–25) as referring to the representative of humanity in general. Hence Karl Barth could emphasize that being made in the *image of God is to be made male and female.

In the case of Gen. 1:26–2:3 the generic understanding of 'adam' has always been accepted in the tradition, although many different interpretations of the 'let us make' and 'in our image' have been offered. Augustine interpreted the 'us' and 'our' in trinitarian terms as the Father speaking to the Son. Thomas Aquinas also saw this as indicating the plurality of divine persons, rebuking those who interpreted it as referring to the angels. Luther took this a step further by saying that humans are distinct from animals primarily in being created by a unique counsel of God.

Humanity being made in the image of God, of course, has been of greater concern. Exegetically this simply means that we are to be God's representatives to the other creatures on earth, especially the animals. Only since the rise of modern biblical criticism has this been regained in theology. The Church Fathers needed to avoid the anthropomorphic notion that the image has to do with being like God physically. Thus the consensus among them was that the imago Dei referred primarily to rationality, an idea which they borrowed from Greek philosophy. Augustine exemplified this view, asserting even that the erect form of the human body testifies that our minds should be raised to things that are above.

Luther articulated the image somewhat differently. For him, it meant to live a godly life without fear of death and content with God's favour. Like Augustine, Luther's conception also had a physiological component. Before sin Adam was stronger, more intelligent, and sensationally superior to all other creatures. Like the Fathers, Thomas understood the image with reference to the mind, but, unlike Luther, he articulated the functional inferiority of certain human features relative to other creatures in terms of adaptability to the soul. In other words, humans' physical traits were proportionate to their use and necessity. Since our greatest asset is our soul or mind, it does not make sense for us to have large claws, for instance.

With regard to Gen. 2:4–3:24, however, the majority of theologians have held that Adam was a historical person. The reason that Luther asserted what he did about human physicality had to do with his conviction, following the tradition, that Adam originally lived in supreme bliss, in a state of innocence, without sin or death. Exegetically this conclusion is now questioned, although in Israel's post-exilic and apocalyptic literature Adam was considered to be immortal before he sinned. Most of the Fathers held this later interpretation, along with the idea that Adam was perfect while at first in paradise (Eden). Thomas agreed with this, including the notion that Adam had full understanding of all things that humans can naturally know. This was both a result of his emphasis on rationality and of his assertion that Adam was to be the father and teacher of humanity.

But it has been questioned whether there is a biblical basis for the idea of a primeval paradisiac perfection in which the first humans lived. Irenaeus did not see the world as created with a final perfection, but rather as unfinished and moving toward becoming perfect. When in the modern period the Genesis creation accounts were understood as saga adapted from Ancient Near Eastern texts, the idea of a perfect state of origin was abandoned in much Protestant theology by the nineteenth century.

Similarly, the understanding of Adam as a historical person is often regarded as no longer tenable in light of contemporary science and biblical scholarship. Even Augustine and many of his contemporaries read the creation accounts allegorically (a fact which Luther laments). Kierkegaard and Schleiermacher did not take them as historical, and even Barth denies that there ever was a golden age of original perfection. For him 'Adam' is meant as the name given to world history and all of humanity. Contemporary science suggests, moreover, that human populations never existed in less than several thousand individuals and that death and suffering happened before the emergence of human beings. Theologically, Adam is then understood as a type or representative of our shared humanity. A minority view (e.g. R. J. Berry) tries to find a place for a historic Adam within the scientific story (see *Creation; Creation and evolution).

The sin of Adam

What, then, are we to make of *sin? The idea that a historical Adam is necessary for a doctrine of original sin was formulated by Augustine, who developed an argument for infant *baptism in response to both the *Manicheans and the *Pelagians. Since baptism was understood as the washing away of sin, sense needed to be made of why babies were baptized if they had not yet sinned by their will. The answer was that the penalty for original guilt inherited from Adam had to be remitted (see *Fall). The corruption of original sinfulness, physically passed on to every human being since Adam through the lust of the father, remained however until death. The Eastern Church never explicitly adopted this view of inherited guilt, although they do maintain the original immortality of Adam and the universal sinfulness of humanity.

We are primarily concerned here, though, with Adam's sin. If, as the tradition has assumed, Adam was a historical person who lived in a paradise of perfection where he was fully satisfied, why would he sin? As LeRon Shults observes, if God created the first humans perfectly righteous and set them in a paradise that met all their needs, it is incomprehensible that they would choose evil. A perfectly good will would by definition will the good. This is precisely why many in the tradition have qualified Adam's perfection.

According to Thomas, Adam was not perfectly blissful. For Luther, similarly, Adam was completely perfect except for his will, which would be made perfect in the later spiritual life. The early Fathers, borrowing from *Stoicism, conceived of Adam as naturally free in his original innocence. These concessions were made not only in order to understand why Adam could possibly have sinned, but to exonerate God from any responsibility for the coming of sin into the world. It needed to be the case that Adam had the free *will to choose between good and evil.

If, on the other hand, we say that Adam was not a historical first person who passed sin on to us through a 'generative impulse' (Thomas), but rather that 'adam is all of humankind as such, what do we make of original sin? Certainly Pannenberg is right that sin is simply inherent to the human predicament as we know it. If we affirm the evolutionary origin of our species, then sin can be considered primarily as the broken relationality into which all creatures have emerged and into which all humans continue to be born. Even Augustine could say that sin is not found in things themselves (material creation is good), but in their illegitimate use, in that they are desired disproportionately against love of God and his commandments (i.e. wrongly related to). Theologically, then, Adam would be a type of the human person who suffers the brokenness and frailties of life common to all. Some have held that the problem with this perspective is that 'any distinction between God's creation and the entrance of sin into the world is collapsed and God is made directly responsible for sin, while human responsibility is diminished' (T. E. Fretheim, God and the World, p. 31).

The last Adam

The only other significant mention of Adam in the Bible comes in Paul's typological contrasts of Adam and *Christ in Rom. 5:12–21 and 1 Cor. 15:20–23. These, in connection with the statement in Col. 1:15 that Christ is the image of God, have led Christian theology to interpret the imago Dei primarily with reference to Christ. It is only in and through Christ that the image of God is realized for humanity.

Irenaeus, as we saw, understood the world as moving toward perfection. For him, human nature is a copy of the original which is the Word of God disclosed in the incarnation. A person fulfils his or her destiny by becoming a copy of Christ by the power of the Spirit. Similarly, Barth interpreted Paul to mean that Jesus takes the first place of the original and Adam the second place. Paul knew Jesus first and then Adam. Barth can even say that as humanity is modelled on Jesus and Jesus is modelled on God, so humanity is made in the image of God.

Christ as the last Adam, then, can be seen as the human person in the fullness of eschatological glory. As the first fruits of *resurrection, Christ anticipates our true identity and destiny, our perfect 'adam. He is the revelation of God precisely because he is the true human and vice versa. In the context of his Hebrew tradition it only makes sense for Paul to use Adam as the first, or typological, human to demonstrate the universality of sin. Theologically, the point is that we are all in Adam, all sinners but made in the image of God as male and female, now eschatologically interpreted to mean becoming transformed by the Spirit (in)to the image who is Christ (Rom. 8:29). The Eastern tradition has preferred the term theosis for this.

Who is Adam? Whatever may be said about the historical Adam, it may be agreed that 'Adam' represents humanity as we are called out of relational patterns of sin and brokenness and toward ones of wholeness and peace by conforming to the image of God, the true and definitive human person which is Jesus Christ, by the power of the Spirit, to share perfect and immortal life with the Father.

Bibliography

Augustine, On Genesis (ET, Washington, 1991); K. Barth, CD; Henri Blocher, Original Sin: Illuminating the Riddle (Leicester, 1997); R. J. Berry and T. A. Noble (eds.), Darwin, Creation and the Fall (Nottingham, 2009); C. J. Collins, Did Adam and Eve Really Exist? (Wheaton, 2011); T. E. Fretheim, God and the World in the Old Testament (Nashville, 2005); R. Hess, 'Adam', in T. D. Alexander and D. W. Baker (eds.), Dictionary of Old Testament: Pentateuch (Leicester, 2003), pp. 18a–21b; L. J. Kreizer, 'Adam and Christ', in G. F. Hawthorne and R. P. Martin (eds.), Dictionary of Paul and His Letters (Leicester, 1993); M. Luther, Lectures on Genesis (ET, Saint Louis, 1958); E. Pagels, Adam, Eve and the Serpent (London, 1988); W. Pannenberg, Human Nature, Election, and History (Philadelphia, 1977); idem, Anthropology in Theological Perspective (ET, Philadelphia, 1985); idem, Systematic Theology, vol. 2 (ET, Grand Rapids, 1994); G. von Rad, Genesis (ET, Philadelphia, rev. edn 1973); R. Scroggs, The Last Adam (Philadelphia, 1966);

F. L. Shults, Reforming Theological Anthropology (Grand Rapids, 2003); Thomas Aquinas, Summa Theologiae (ET, New York, 1964).

A. R. MILLS

ADIAPHORA

This concept (from the Gk for 'things indifferent') was explored controversially particularly by *Lutheran theologians in the mid-sixteenth century at a time when the Protestant movement was threatened by Catholic power in Germany. The basic question related to the status of certain ceremonies and rites, both public and private, which are neither commanded nor forbidden by the word of God in Scripture, and which have been introduced, it was claimed, into the church for the sake of good order, decorum and discipline. One party, led by Philipp *Melancthon, held that in a period of persecution one may, with a clear conscience, at the insistence of the enemy, restore certain things such as the rite of *confirmation. The other party, led by Matthias Flacius (1520–75), contended that under no circumstances could this be done with a clear conscience. In the *Formula of Concord (1577), ch. X is entitled, 'The ecclesiastical rites that are called "Adiaphora" or things indifferent', where a middle way is proposed. In times of persecution, concessions are not to be offered, but at other times 'the community of God in every place and at every time has the right, authority and power to change, to reduce, or to increase ceremonies according to its circumstances, as long as it does so without frivolity and offence but in an orderly and appropriate way . . . for good order, evangelical decorum and the edification of the church'.

The issue of adiaphora was also contentious in England in the sixteenth century and in Lutheran *pietism in the seventeenth century, and in strong or weak forms has often arisen in churches which take the word of God as authoritative.

Bibliography

C. L. Manschreck, Melancthon, The Quiet Reformer (New York and Nashville, 1958); B. J. Verkamp, The Indifferent Mean: Adiaphorism in the English Reformation to 1554 (Athens, OH, 1977).

P. TOON

ADOPTION, see SONSHIP

ADOPTIONISM

The term is most commonly applied to the notion that Jesus was merely an ordinary man of unusual virtue or closeness to God whom God 'adopted' into divine sonship. This exceptional elevation, which in primitive adoptionism was usually associated with the event of Christ's baptism, involves nevertheless only a special divine activity upon or in Jesus, not the personal presence in him of a second member of the *Trinity bearing the proper name of Word (*Logos) or Son.

Although early material on adoptionism is scant, it seems clear that the movement first became prominent in the teachings of Theodotus, an erudite leather merchant active in Rome about 190. He taught that the 'Spirit' or 'Christ' descended upon Jesus at baptism, initiating miraculous powers in one who was, though supremely virtuous, just an ordinary man. Theodotus was an offence to his critics for defining Jesus as a 'mere man' (psilos anthrōpos – hence the label 'psilanthropism'), a term underlined by the adoptionist's own description of his previous lapse from faith as denial 'not of God but of a man'. According to *Hippolytus, Theodotus 'determined to deny the divinity of Christ'. Artemon, a convert in Rome to the teaching of Theodotus, sought to establish the historical pedigree of adoptionism; the significant response of one contemporary, held by some scholars to be Hippolytus, was to demonstrate that each of the early Christian *apologists 'proclaim Christ both God and man'.

The most famous heir to the early adoptionist tradition is Paul of *Samosata who, in most of the early witnesses, is firmly linked with the teaching of Artemon. Paul was finally condemned for his views at the Synod of Antioch (268). We have no contemporary record of his doctrine, but it is plain that he was understood to teach that Jesus was 'by nature an ordinary man' (koinou tēn physin anthrōpou). In the next century he was accused by the church historian *Eusebius of holding a demeaning view of Christ and thus denying both 'his God and his Lord'. It was his misdemeanour, alleged Eusebius, to draw back from acknowledging that the Son of God came down from heaven, confessing instead that Jesus was 'from below'.

Modern *Christologies sometimes defend themselves, with some justness, from the suspicion of adoptionism by consciously renouncing certain untenable features of the original movement, such as its impersonal interpretation of the divine presence with Jesus, its neglect of divine initiative over against human achievement and its blurring of the NT distinction between Christ's sonship and the adoptive counterpart in believers. These unsound traits, however, were, at least in the minds of the movement's critics, quite secondary to the inadequately expressed identity accorded in adoptionism to the Jesus borne by Mary. Its really characteristic error was to deny the divine origin and identity of Jesus, calling him a mere man, a failing combated by the later title Theotokos (God-bearer) for *Mary.

Adoptionism (or Adoptianism) is technically the title also for a less well-known movement in the Spanish church of the eighth century, condemned for making Christ's manhood participate in his dignity as Son only by adoption.

See also: MONARCHIANISM.

Bibliography

J. C. Cavadini, The Last Christology of the West: Adoptionism in Spain and Gaul, 785–820 (Philadelphia, 1993); A. Grillmeier, Christ in Christian Tradition, vol. 1: From the Apostolic Age to Chalcedon AD 451 (London, ²1975); J. N. D. Kelly, Early Christian Doctrines (London, ⁵1977); R. A. Norris, The Christological Controversy: Sources of Early Christian Thought (Philadelphia, 1980).

R. KEARSLEY

AESTHETICS

Aesthetics is the study of general features of the arts and aesthetic experience. 'The arts' include drama, music, painting, poetry and many other fields. Aesthetics has been a distinct branch of Western philosophy since the eighteenth century, when A. Baumgarten (1714–62) gave the subdiscipline its name. Important contributions have also come from other academic disciplines, as well as from artists, writers and cultural critics.

Modern philosophical aesthetics includes theory of the aesthetic dimension, philosophy of the arts and philosophy of arts criticism. For Christians in Western societies the most significant issues arising in these areas concern aesthetic responsibility, approaches to art, social frameworks and relationships between theology and philosophy. This article summarizes each of these issues, then suggests new directions for further work in aesthetics.

Aesthetic responsibility

To speak of ‘aesthetic responsibility’ is to challenge modern aesthetics. Since Immanuel Kant’s influential Critique of Judgment (1790), many philosophers have regarded aesthetic experience as a sanctuary from both natural necessity and moral obligation. Indeed, extreme positions have made the ‘aesthetic experience’ of ‘beauty’ or of ‘fine art’ a matter of enjoyment for enjoyment’s sake. One of the first provocative Christian challenges came from Leo Tolstoy in What Is Art? (Indianapolis, 1960 [1896]). When Tolstoy rejected ‘beauty’ as a defining feature of art, he also rejected ‘aesthetic experience’ as a poor excuse for irreligious and elitist hedonism.

N. Wolterstorff and C. Seerveld also challenge traditional notions of beauty, but without rejecting ‘aesthetic experience’ as such. These Christian philosophers in the Reformed tradition distinguish more carefully than Tolstoy did between aesthetic and artistic excellence. Both of them argue that all human beings have aesthetic responsibilities. Wolterstorff makes a case for aesthetic excellence in cities and churches. Seerveld urges Christians to lead an ‘obedient aesthetic life’ in their dwellings and social interactions. Although they have different definitions of aesthetic experience, both philosophers see the aesthetic dimension of life, culture and society as one in which human beings are created to give God praise and Christians are called to seek Christ’s renewal of all creation.

Approaches to art

Authors who retain pre-modern notions of beauty tend to view recent art with suspicion. This tendency shows up in writings on modern art by H. R. Rookmaaker (1922–77) and F. A. Schaeffer, and it continues in the approach their followers take to postmodern arts. Modern works by Picasso (1881–1974), Samuel Beckett (1906–89) and Ingmar Bergman (1918–2007) do not display the pleasurable proportion, integrity and brightness that Thomas Aquinas associated with beauty. Nor do postmodern experiments in performance art and site-specific installations pursue the aims of traditional craftsmanship and moral uplift that many Protestants have inherited from the Victorian era. Christian cultural conservatives often regard such features as artistic defects that signal cultural decay. By contrast, other Christians praise modern art for its power to unsettle comfortable Christianity (e.g. N. A. Scott [ed.], The New Orpheus, New York, 1964) or point to postmodern arts as imaginative training grounds for a democratic culture (e.g. L. Zuidervaart, Artistic Truth).

Such divergent assessments imply different theologies of culture. How Christians practise and view the arts depends in part on how they relate to their culture and society. Isolationists wish to ward off contemporary art as a threat to their faith. Synthetic and accommodating Christians tend to use Christian teachings to justify contemporary art. Transformational Christians usually aim to promote renewal within contemporary art.

Here two philosophical issues arise: What are the characteristic features of art, and what are its proper roles within human life? Specific decisions about which artistic practices to promote, or how to use the arts in worship, already assume responses to these issues. For example, when Tolstoy rejected Shakespeare and commended Charles Dickens, he assumed that art’s main task is to communicate feelings in a sincere fashion. We may distinguish three types of Western philosophies about the nature and purpose of art. Instrumental theories understand art as a means of improvement, indoctrination or emotional expression. Referential theories understand art as an imitation, reflection or projection of actual, ideal or imaginative realities. Formalist theories understand works of art as autonomous creations whose intrinsic worth lies in their formal and aesthetic qualities.

Each type of theory fails to do justice to wide ranges of artistic practice. A comprehensive Christian philosophy of the arts would try to correct and incorporate all three theories. It would note, for example, that instrumental theories underestimate the intrinsic worth of the arts; that referential theories ignore the non-cognitive functions of the arts; and that formalist theories treat works of art as if they were pure objects of secular devotion. One recent attempt at a comprehensive view proposes a new conception of artistic truth in which the production and use of art are just as crucial to art's importance as are its allusive import and internal form (Zuidervaart, Artistic Truth).

Social frameworks

Many art lovers do in fact treat artworks as objects of secular devotion. This fact has led Christians like Tolstoy to repudiate the 'religion' of art spawned by nineteenth-century *Romanticism. It would be more fruitful, however, to analyse the social frameworks within which contemporary arts operate. Wolterstorff has described salient features of Western society's 'institution of high art'. He says that this social framework for making and using art contributes directly to the isolation of high art and the aesthetic impoverishment of everyday life. Although helpful, Wolterstorff's approach largely ignores the institution of low art, and it does not address sufficiently the anti-aesthetic turn in recent high art. Yet some of our aesthetic impoverishment is prompted by 'low art' – by popular music, film and advertising – as these operate within a 'culture industry' (T. W. Adorno) dedicated to commercial success. Even high art in museums and concert halls has become locked into an international culture industry where celebrity trumps quality and the sensational stands out. Christian criticisms of the arts, and our involvement in them, will make little difference if we do not address the political, economic and technological basis for social frameworks to contemporary art, both high and low. Important steps in this direction occur in the work of J. de Gruchy, W. Romanowski and B. Spackman.

Theology and philosophy

Christian artists and art critics often turn to theology for guidance. By itself, however, theology may prove insufficient. For example, in Christian Letters to a Post-Christian World (Grand Rapids, 1969) Dorothy Sayers notes the lack of a 'Christian philosophy of the arts' and tries to derive her own aesthetics from a lay theology of creation. But her use of this theology relies heavily on a philosophy, namely, R. G. Collingwood's The Principles of Art (Oxford, 1938).

To be sure, theology should provide touchstones for reflections about the arts and aesthetic experience. To become serviceable for art and life, however, such reflections need philosophical refinement. Protestants have long been hampered by their lack of a cogent philosophical aesthetics. The requisite philosophical aesthetics will be informed by Scripture, theology and Christian traditions, yet remain genuine philosophy, in conversation with other philosophies. When conjoined with theological reflections, work in aesthetics by Christian philosophers can help free us to serve God and our neighbours more fully in matters artistic and aesthetic.

New directions

Fortunately, there has been an upsurge in both philosophical and theological reflections among Christian scholars since the 1960s. Three traditions have contributed the most in this regard: the evangelical, the sacramental and the reformational traditions. Nourished by correlative traditions in *liturgy, doctrine and church governance, these traditions of aesthetic reflection spill across contemporary denominational alignments. Whereas the evangelical tradition emphasizes the detection and expression of worldviews in high art and popular culture (e.g. A. Chaplin et al. and H. R. Rookmaaker), the sacramental tradition stresses the incarnational character of artistic symbols (e.g. J. Begbie and R. Viladesau), and the reformational tradition gives priority to the transformation of art and society (e.g. de Gruchy, Seerveld and Wolterstorff). Of the three traditions, reformational scholarship has been the most overtly philosophical. Stemming from the revitalization of Dutch Calvinism led by Abraham *Kuyper, the reformational tradition regards Christians as agents of renewal in culture and society. With this comes the challenge to criticize and change cultural practices, social institutions, and the very structure of society where these dishonour God's intentions for creation, resist Christ's redemptive work in human history, or violate the biblical promise of a new heaven and new earth.

Recently this reformational vision has given rise to new directions in Christian aesthetics. It has prompted a turn away from evangelical worldview approaches to fresh explorations of complex interactions in the public spaces that artistic efforts help generate and maintain. The reformational vision has also led a younger generation of artists and scholars to emphasize the cultural institutions that make artistic practices possible, rather than simply the discrete artworks that sacramentalists see as sacred symbols.

Together these two developments call for an inner reformation of philosophical aesthetics itself. The new aesthetics will not restrict its attention to the aesthetic dimension, philosophy of the arts and philosophy of arts criticism. Without abandoning these topics, it will incorporate them into a social philosophy of the arts and culture where questions of cultural pluralism, new media, political power and economic exploitation have prominence. Bringing philosophy into direct conversation with cultural studies and the social sciences, this intrinsically interdisciplinary effort will seek new ways to address a globalizing world. For those who are called to be agents of healing and renewal, and who hear the cries of the oppressed, the wounds of God's world require an ongoing transformation of Christian aesthetics.

See also: CULTURAL THEORY AND THEOLOGY; CULTURE; WORSHIP.

Bibliography

J. Begbie, Beholding the Glory: Incarnation through the Arts (Grand Rapids, 2000); idem, Sounding the Depths: Theology through the Arts (London, 2002); idem, Theology, Music, and Time (Cambridge, 2000); idem, Voicing Creation's Praise: Towards a Theology of the Arts (Edinburgh, 1991); A. Chaplin and H. Brand, Art and Soul: Signposts for Christians in the Arts (Carlisle and Downers Grove, 2001); J. W. de Gruchy, Christianity, Art and Transformation: Theological Aesthetics in the Struggle for Justice (Cambridge and New York, 2001); W. Dyrness, Reformed Theology and Visual Culture: The Protestant Imagination from Calvin to Edwards (Cambridge, 2004); idem, Poetic Theology: God and the Poetics of Everyday Life (Grand Rapids, 2011); idem, Senses of the Soul: Art and the Visual in Christian Worship (Eugene, 2008); idem, Visual Faith: Art, Theology, and Worship in Dialogue (Grand Rapids, 2001); P. Fiddes, The Novel, Spirituality, and Modern Culture (Cardiff, 2000); T. Gorringer, Furthering Humanity: A Theology of Culture (London, 2004); M. Hengelaar-Rookmaaker (ed.), The Complete Works of Hans R. Rookmaaker (Carlisle, 2002–2003); M. Kelly (ed.), Encyclopedia of Aesthetics (Oxford and New York, 1998); W. D. Romanowski, Eyes Wide Open: Looking for God in Popular Culture (Grand Rapids, 2001); B. Spackman, A Profound Weakness: Christians and Kitsch (Carlisle, 2005); D. J. Treier, M. Husbands and R. Lundin, The Beauty of God: Theology and the Arts (Downers Grove, 2007); R. Viladesau, Theological Aesthetics: God in Imagination, Beauty, and Art (Oxford and New York, 1999); N. Wolterstorff, Art in Action: Toward a Christian Aesthetic (Grand Rapids, 1980); L. Zuidervaart, Artistic Truth: Aesthetics, Discourse, and Imaginative Disclosure (Cambridge and New York, 2004); idem, 'Postmodern Arts and the Birth of a Democratic Culture', in L. Zuidervaart and H. Luttikhuisen (eds.), The Arts, Community, and Cultural Democracy (London and New York, 2000).

L. ZUIDERVAART

AFRICAN CHRISTIAN THEOLOGY

The rapid spread of Christianity in Africa in the twentieth century has been one of the notable features of modern Christian history. For some time now it has been acceptable even to speak of a shift in Christianity's geographical and cultural centre of gravity. The heartlands of the faith are no longer in the old Christendom of Western Europe and its extension in North America, but rather are to be found in the 'Southern' continents: Latin America, parts of Asia and the Pacific, and particularly tropical Africa.

This phenomenal rate of expansion of Christianity in Africa has led to an awareness that the Christian faith as professed by Africans ought to find expression in terms that arise out of African cultural values and life-experience. The effort to think through faith in Christ in terms which reflect authentically African perspectives has produced 'the quest for an African (Christian) theology' since the mid-1950s.

Admittedly, a certain amount of spontaneous 'theologizing' goes on in the life and witness of Africa's Christian communities, and this is probably most evident in the so-called 'African Independent Churches. However, African theology in its academic and literary form has emerged largely from the Departments of Religion in the various universities on the continent. It is worth noting that the vast majority of Africa's theological academics are also ordained churchmen who maintain an active association with their churches. Already one can discern some positive achievements of this first flowering of African theological reflection.

The agenda of African theology is quite startling. The historical roots of African Christianity lie in the modern missionary enterprise from the West. Given the generally negative Western evaluation of indigenous African religions, it has come as a surprise that virtually all of Africa's leading theologians, though trained in theology according to Western models, have concentrated their research and writing on those very religious traditions of the African 'past' which were considered to be theologically insignificant. This concern with the African pre-Christian religious heritage assumed such proportions that one observer of the African theological scene ventured to suggest that an effect of this concentration of interest was that 'areas of traditional Christian doctrine which are not reflected in the African past disappear or are marginalized' (Adrian Hastings). The titles of significant publications by some of the leading theologians of the continent confirm this emphasis. An important question raised by African theological writing to date is how to account for this high level of interest that Africa's Christian theologians have manifested in the pre-Christian religious traditions of Africa, and often of the particular writer's own people.

To the extent that the Western missionary picture of pre-Christian Africa was that of a religious tabula rasa, the writings of African theologians may be said to have consisted in 'demonstrating that the African religious experience and heritage were not illusory and that they should have formed the vehicle for conveying the Gospel verities to Africa' (Desmond Tutu). The central theme of this African theological literature has been the nature of African pre-Christian religious life and values and their 'relationship of continuity rather than discontinuity with Christian belief' (Hastings). This attempt at rehabilitating the African pre-Christian religious consciousness has been carried out as a self-consciously Christian and theological effort, and can thus be said to have also been an attempt to define the nature of African Christian identity. This is so since the kind of study that the African theologian makes of traditional religion differs significantly in outlook from that made by the anthropologist. Neither can it be compared with 'a clinical observation of the sort one might make about Babylonian religion; he is handling dynamite, his own past, his people's present' (A. F. Walls).

The viewpoints of the major protagonists of this theological interpretation of the African pre-Christian religious heritage are by no means identical in all respects. E. Bolaji Idowu (Nigeria) is most noted for the position that the African experience of God in the pre-Christian tradition is essentially the same as in Christian belief. Idowu arrives at this conclusion by drastically reducing all 'lesser divinities' in the Yoruba pantheon, for example, to the status of manifestations or refractions of the Supreme God. The African world of divinity becomes, according to Idowu, one of 'diffused monotheism' (Olódùmarè, p. 204), so that, in the final analysis, 'in Africa, the real cohesive factor of religion is the living God' (African Traditional Religion, p. 104). Idowu, therefore, not only insists that Africa's 'old' religions are a proper (though by no means the sole) source for African Christian theology; his approach also tends towards the conclusion that African Christian experience does little more than bring into sharper focus the sense of God which African tradition had all along.

The writings of John Mbiti (a Kenyan who was Director of the Ecumenical Institute of the World Council of Churches from 1972 to 1980) reflect a more settled Christian self-consciousness, though they are equally concerned with the theological interpretation of Africa's pre-Christian heritage in religion. Mbiti has written of himself, 'It is with a deep Christian faith that I feel conscious of myself, that I respond to the universe and that I try to make something out of life' (Preface to his Poems of Nature and Faith, Nairobi, 1969).

For Mbiti it is important not only to recognize that 'historically Christianity is very much an African religion' (African Religions and Philosophy, pp. 229f.), but also to distinguish between the phenomenon of Christianity, in its cultural embodiment as the missionary religion brought to Africa, and the Christian faith, which as religious faith is capable of being apprehended by Africans in African terms without undue difficulty. This means that the task of constructing an African theology on the basis of an African experience of the Christian faith can proceed without anxiety or self-justification. This outlook stamps Mbiti's writings with a feeling of freedom, which, in the context of the quest by African theologians for an appropriate sense of identity, is quite remarkable.

Like Idowu, Mbiti also places positive value on the African pre-Christian heritage of religion, but only as praeparatio evangelica, as indicative of the African preparedness for the gospel, 'that final and completing element that crowns their traditional religiosity and brings its flickering light to full brilliance'. Mbiti, therefore, achieves a more profound integration of 'old' and 'new' than Idowu, and the vindication of an African theological point of view reflecting African cultural sensitivities, which Idowu affirms largely as a concomitant of African religious self-consciousness, is defended by Mbiti on the basis of African Christian experience itself. No other major African theologian uses the expression 'Christian Africa' in speaking of twentieth-century Africa as freely as Mbiti.

The generally sympathetic interpretation of the pre-Christian religious tradition and its integration into African Christian experience indicated in the writings of Idowu and Mbiti are echoed by the majority of Africa's theologians. The only notable exception is the late General Secretary of the Association of Evangelicals of Africa and Madagascar, Byang Kato. Kato postulated a radical discontinuity between the pre-Christian tradition and Christian belief. However, the prospects for fruitful dialogue with those on the 'other side' were ended with his sudden death in 1975. No other African theologian has espoused quite as extreme a view as Kato.

African theology has overturned virtually every negative verdict passed on African tradition by the ethnocentric perspective of the earlier Western missionary estimate of Africa. Now there are indications that African Christian theology is ready to take up themes and subjects which belong within the mainstream of Christian debate and reflection, like *Christology, soteriology and biblical *hermeneutics. It is likely that this development would not have been possible without an effective treatment in the first instance of the question of identity.

See also: BLACK THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

K. Bediako, 'Biblical Christologies in the Context of African Traditional Religion', in V. Samuel and C. Sugden (eds.), Sharing Jesus in the Two-Thirds World (Bangalore, 1983), pp. 115–175; idem, Theology and Identity (Oxford, 1992); idem, Christianity in Africa (Edinburgh, 1995); idem, Jesus and the Gospel in Africa (Maryknoll, 2004); K. Dickson and

P. Ellingworth (eds.), Biblical Revelation and African Beliefs (London, 1969); A. Hastings, African Christianity: An Essay in Interpretation (London, 1976); S. de la Haye, Bynag Kato: Ambassador for Christ (Achimoto, Gahan, 1986); E. B. Idowu, Olódùmarè: God in Yoruba Belief (London, 1962); idem, African Traditional Religion: A Definition (London, 1973); B. H. Kato, Theological Pitfalls in Africa (Kisumu, 1975); J. H. O. Kombo, The Doctrine of God in African Christian Thought (Leiden, 2007); T. S. Maluleka, 'Half a Century of African Christian Theologies', Journal of Theology for Southern Africa 99, 1997, pp. 4–23; J. S. Mbiti, African Religions and Philosophy (London, 1969); idem, Concepts of God in Africa (London, 1970); idem, Bible and Theology in African Christianity (Nairobi, 1986); J. N. K. Mugambi and L. Magesa (eds.), Jesus in African Christianity (Nairobi, 1989); S. Ngewa, M. Shaw and T. Tiéno (eds.), Issues in African Christian Theology (Nairobi, 1998); C. Nyamiti, African Tradition and the Christian God (Eldoret, Kenya, n.d.); idem, Christ as Our Ancestor: Christology from an African Perspective (Gweru, 1984); L. Nyirongo, Gods of Africa or the God of the Bible (Potchefstroomse, 1997); J. S. Pobee, Toward an African Theology (Nashville, 1979); J. S. Pobee (ed.), Exploring Afro-Christology (Paris, 1992); T. Tiéno, 'Evangelical Theology in African Contexts', in The Cambridge Companion to Evangelical Theology (Cambridge, 2007); D. Tutu, 'Whither African Theology?', in E. W. Fashole-Luke et al. (eds.), Christianity in Independent Africa (London, 1978), pp. 364–369; A. F. Walls, 'Towards Understanding Africa's Place in Christian History', in J. S. Pobee, (ed.), Religion in a Pluralistic Society (Leiden, 1976), pp. 180–189.

K. BEDIAKO

AFRICAN INDEPENDENT CHURCHES, THEOLOGY OF

A notable feature of the phenomenal growth of Christianity in Africa in the twentieth century was the emergence of the so-called African Independent Churches. In 1968 a survey identified 6,000 such churches with a total membership of nearly 10 million spread over thirty-four countries on the continent and giving every indication that their numbers were still on the increase. A sign of their importance is the fact that these churches are now being considered as a fourth Christian strand alongside the Roman Catholic, Orthodox and Protestant traditions. They are in most cases the results of breakaways from mission churches. They testify to the vitality of an African genius in religion and a capacity to adapt a missionary faith to African needs and situations.

It is probably not the case that all the movements which are grouped under this general name qualify as genuinely Christian churches. It can be shown that some of them are non-Christian religious movements which use Christian symbols, or else teach heterodox forms of Christianity. However, it is undeniable that a large portion of them are properly Christian churches and reveal in their various ways an apprehension of the Christian faith in African terms.

When the 'quest for an African Christian theology' got under way in the mid-1960s, it was to the Independent Churches that some of Africa's academic theologians looked for signs of an authentically Africanized Christianity. Yet these churches have little, if any, explicit theology. Rather, they demonstrate the liveliness and power of Christian faith in which a theology is undoubtedly implicit.

While these churches display a tendency towards the use of ritual and symbolism reminiscent of the practice of African traditional religion, they also manifest a radical Bible-centredness which points to a consciousness of being in direct continuity with prophetic and apostolic times; hence their expectation that the power and *gifts of *prophets and *apostles must be available to them.

This radical biblicism needs to be distinguished from the *fundamentalism of other Christian groups. For the African Independents' approach does not stem from a rationally conceived 'doctrine' of the inspiration of Scripture; rather, the Bible in the vernacular is the living word of the living God who therefore is bound to demonstrate his living power in living experience. *Healing, prophetic guidance, protection against evil spirits, revelation through dreams – these are simply the demonstration that the God of Moses, of Elijah and of Paul is available today to all who call upon him. In this sense, the Independents have been compared to the *Radical Reformation in sixteenth-century Europe; they have been called modern Africa's *Anabaptists.

Since in these churches Christian faith is validated more in demonstration of power than in rational articulation of belief, some of them also tend to be imprecise on a doctrine such as the Trinity. A sense of the absolute lordship of Jesus may in one of them overshadow the Father, whereas in others, the intense awareness of the Spirit of power may appear to obscure the person of Christ. But even here it may be asked whether the 'distinction of persons' (see *Hypostasis) in Western Christian theology is closer to the biblical picture than the Independents' inclination to apprehend the activity of 'the three' in their unity and interchangeability.

The African Independent Churches may be said to be marked more by a *spirituality than by a theology, a spirituality which, though reflecting the sense of the spirituality of the whole of life in African traditional culture, yet transposes African life into a new 'key' by a radical faith in Christ.

One cannot assume that the Independents will remain content with an implicit theology. Some of them, like the important Kimbanguist Church in Zaire (a member of the World Council of Churches), have established their own theological faculties with curricula similar to those operated by the mission-related churches. Others welcome the assistance of the mission-related churches in the training of their leaders or participate in ecumenical training for the ministry. In the process, the peculiarly 'African' spirituality of these churches is already becoming their contribution to the emergence of an *African Christian theology which transcends denominational barriers.

Bibliography

A. Anderson, Zion and Pentecost: The Spirituality and Experience of Pentecostal and Zionist/Apostolic Churches in South Africa (Pretoria, 2000); D. B. Barrett, Schism and Renewal in Africa: An Analysis of Six Thousand Contemporary Religious Movements (Nairobi and London, 1968); M. L. Daneel, 'Towards a theologia africana? The Contribution of Independent Churches to African Theology', Missionalia 12 (1984), pp. 64–89; C. Pauw, 'African Independent Churches as a "People's Response" to the Christian Message', Journal for the Study of Religion 8 (1995), pp. 9–19; John S. Pobee and Gabriel Ositelu II, African Initiatives in Christianity (Geneva, 1998); G. M. Bengt Sundkler, Bantu Prophets in South Africa

(London, 2nd 1961); idem, Zulu Zion and Some Swazi Zionists (Uppsala and London, 1976); H. W. Turner, History of an African Independent Church, 2 vols. (Oxford, 1967); D. Venter (ed.), Engaging Modernity: Methods and Cases for Studying African Independent Churches in South Africa (Westport, 2004); F. B. Welbourn and B. A. Ogot, A Place to Feel at Home: A Study of Two Independent Churches in Western Kenya (London, 1966).

K. BEDIAKO

AFRICAN THEOLOGY: RECENT DEVELOPMENTS

Several years ago Dr Kwame Bediako saw 'indications that African Christian theology is ready to take themes and subjects which belong within the mainstream of Christian debate and reflection . . .' These indications have to a certain extent become reality, especially in the last twenty-five years. These developments are most articulated in the book African Theology Comes of Age, published by the Ecumenical Symposium of Eastern Africa Theologians (ESEAT) in 2010. Even though this book was written by mostly East African theologians, it captures the progress made in various parts of the continent. What is clear in this book and others is the fact that African theology has moved from a defence of the need for African theology to actual theologizing using African thought forms and idioms. 'African theology has come of age. The question whether or not there should be – or is – an African theology is now redundant, if not ludicrous' (Mugambi and Magesa, Jesus in African Christianity, p. 11). Areas of Christian theology that have seen developments include Christology, ecclesiology, *eschatology, Trinity, God, *sin and *salvation; and African theologians have also applied Christian theology to a myriad of problems that face Africa today, such as poverty, democracy, violence, HIV and AIDS.

The central theme of African Christian theology is *Christology. As a result, 'There is no doubt that Christology is the subject which has been most developed in today's African theology' (C. Nyamiti, in Mugambi and Magesa, Jesus in African Christianity, p. 70). Christology in Africa has sought to answer a key question, 'From the African Church, a clear and convincing answer is demanded to this question: Who is Jesus Christ for you, Africa? Who do you say that He is?' (Mugambi and Magesa, Jesus in African Christianity, p. xii). Diane Stinton has answered this question in her book Jesus of Africa, an extensive research of Christologies in Africa. She points out that key models from the African traditional setting have been used to talk about Jesus; these include Jesus as elder brother, traditional healer, head and master of initiation, healer, ancestor, the great ancestor, family friend, king/chief, etc. (pp. 72–240). It is understood these models will make Jesus palatable to the African. Christology is done with the understanding that, 'It cannot be separated from Africa's socio-political, religio-cultural and economical contexts – this is the real and concrete everyday experience within which we Christologize' (A. E. Akinade, Asian Journal of Theology 9, p. 184). Diane Stinton responds to those who would critique African Christologies when she says, ' . . . the fact that the African christologies have not yet gained adequate acknowledgement beyond the continent is more reflective of enduring ethnocentrism within the wider theological community than of the value of the christologies per se' (Jesus of Africa, p. 251).

The results of developments in the doctrine of the *church are seen due to the fact that, 'Today, the Christian church on the continent is recognizably African, not only in song, dance, worship, colour, etc., but also in mission, identity, structure, and theology' (A. Orobator, African Theology Comes of Age, p. 37). Models that have been used to form African ecclesiologies are the clan system of J. M. Waliggo, Charles Nyamiti's ancestral-koinonia model and Benezet Bujo's model based on Christ as our proto-ancestor.

The doctrine of *God was the first to experience *contextualization, and Western missionaries were able to make a connection between Yahweh and African concepts of God. The result was that Yahweh got several names from various African communities. Recently contextualization has come in the doctrine of the *Trinity, where the African three-stone stove has been effectively used to communicate it to African people.

African Christian theology is certainly work in progress. Even as we focus on written theology, it is important to bear in mind excellent theologies being done orally by Africans both young and old. The task of African theology should include writing this theology, which is often expressed in song, sermons, drama, prayers, etc. Yet African theology has to rid itself of what J. D. Gwamna calls 'expedient theology', or the 'theology of the market place' which often is spread by quacks or freelance preachers (Perspectives in African Theology, p. 196). This is the major threat to African Christian theology. To be credible and of use to the African continent, African Christian theology will have to have its primary source as the Bible.

Andrew Walls' words could not be more correct today: '... Africa may be the theatre in which some of the determinative new directions in Christian thought and activity are being taken' (The Cross-Cultural Process in Christian History, p. 119).

See also: AFRICAN CHRISTIAN THEOLOGY; AFRICAN INDEPENDENT CHURCHES, THEOLOGY OF.

Bibliography

A. E. Akinade, 'Who Do You Say That I Am?', Asia Journal of Theology 9, no. 1, 1995; J. Gwamna, Perspectives in African Theology (Bukuru, 2008); J. N. K. Mugambi and L. Magesa (eds.), Jesus in African Christianity: Experimentation and Diversity in African Christology (Nairobi, 1998); C. Nyamiti, 'African Christologies Today', in Mugambi and Magesa, Jesus in African Christianity, 1998; D. B. Stinton, Jesus of Africa: Voices of Contemporary African Christology (Maryknoll, 2004); idem, 'Africa's Contribution to Christology', in African Theology Comes of Age: Revisiting Twenty Years of the Theology of the Ecumenical Symposium of Eastern Africa Theologians (ESEAT) (Nairobi, 2010), pp. 13–34; A. F. Walls, The Cross-Cultural Process in Christian History: Studies in the Transmission and Appropriation of Faith (Maryknoll, 2002).

G. MTUKWA

AGAPE, see LOVE; NYGREN, ANDERS

AGNOSTICISM

A term coined by T. H. Huxley (1825–95) to express the view that since God's existence can neither be proved nor disproved the only rational position on the question is to suspend or withhold judgment or belief. Huxley added a negative prefix ('a') to the Greek term 'gnostic', referring to knowledge, to describe a person lacking knowledge. An agnostic refuses to make a judgment about God's non-existence. If an atheist holds the belief that God does not exist, then an agnostic, who neither affirms nor denies God's existence, is not an *atheist.

Agnosticism is often based on an *Enlightenment ethic of belief which requires that only those propositions should be believed for which there is sufficient evidence. However, William *James argued that it was rational to believe upon insufficient evidence when the choice involved was 'living, momentous and forced'. *Reformed epistemology holds that one can reasonably accept God's existence without the support of evidence or argument.

Bibliography

K. J. Clark, Return to Reason (Grand Rapids, 1990); T. H. Huxley, Agnosticism and Christianity and Other Essays (Loughton, 1992).

K. J. CLARK

ALBERTUS MAGNUS (c. 1193–1280)

A scholar, saint and bishop of the medieval church who was born in Bavaria sometime between 1193 and 1206. Albert entered the *Dominican order in 1223 and studied at the universities of Padua and Bologna. During 1228–40 he taught at convents in Germany where he composed a series of commentaries on the Sentences of Peter *Lombard. He attended the University of Paris, earning his doctorate there and becoming a master from 1245 to 1248. It was at this time that *Thomas Aquinas was one of his students and his assistant. In 1248 he was sent to Cologne to establish a new curriculum for his order. Later he became Bishop of Regensburg (1260–62). After leaving his administrative duties, he spent the remainder of his life in Cologne as a writer, teacher and controversialist.

Albert was one of the major leaders in the movement known as *scholasticism. Broadly defined, this is an intellectual product of the medieval universities that attempted to harmonize *faith and reason. There were mystical scholastics like *Bernard and *Bonaventura, empirical scholastics such as Robert Grosseteste (c. 1175–1253) and Roger Bacon (c. 1214–92), and there was the rational scholasticism of Albert and Aquinas. The rational scholastics, like contemporary Jewish and Arab scholars, sought by means of reason to reconcile their faith with the philosophy of ancient pagan writers, especially *Aristotle.

Albert was attracted by the scientific works of Aristotle which were being translated and studied in the European universities for the first time. He mastered this material in a series of works which have been republished in twenty-eight volumes (1890–99). He is credited with establishing the study of *nature as a legitimate concern for Western Christian intellectuals. The encyclopaedic approach of the times led him to deal with a wide range of subjects in the natural sciences, including geography, psychology, physics, botany, zoology and mineralogy. His major books on religious thought are commentaries on Lombard's work, explanations of the major and minor prophets and a book of theology (Summa Theologiae). His work differs from that of many other scholastics because he does not comment on each line of the text, but instead paraphrases the work and adds his own observations. He was not as successful at developing a synthesis between Christianity and Aristotelian thought as was his student, Thomas Aquinas, but he did insist on the integrity of both the area of *revelation and the realm of reason. He taught the importance of secular learning, but affirmed that such knowledge cannot ultimately contradict divine revelation.

In a sense Albert was unique, living during the 'golden age of scholasticism' and, despite an enormously busy and varied life, mastering the most advanced knowledge of his day. Impatient with others who lacked his understanding, he combined his reading of scientific works with observations of nature, constantly trying to fit the details into coherent schemes. His achievements were recognized by his contemporaries, many of whom believed that they were due to magic. He was canonized in 1931 and became the patron of those who study the natural sciences.

Bibliography

S. M. Albert, Albert the Great (Oxford, 1948); T. M. Schwertner, St Albert the Great (Milwaukee, 1932); J. A. Weisheipl (ed.), Albertus Magnus and the Sciences: Commemorative Essays (Toronto, 1979).

R. G. CLOUSE

ALBIGENSES

The Albigenses were a medieval *dualistic sect, ultimately heir to *Manichaean teaching, that spread along the trade routes from the Middle East and became popular in northern Italy and southern France during the eleventh and twelfth centuries. At times called the Cathars, the followers of this group were known as Albigenses because their greatest strength centred in the town of Albi. They taught that there was a god of light (spirit) and a god of darkness (matter). The perfect life, one devoid of material things, could be approached by a rigorous *asceticism, including abstaining from meats and sex, and condemning the medieval church. They also objected to the orthodox teaching about Christ because they did not believe that the Son of God could be incarnate as a man.

Albigenses were divided into the 'perfect' who closely followed the teaching of the group and the 'believers' who could continue to live normal lives until their deathbeds, at which time, if they repented, they could be assured of salvation. At first, the papacy tried to bring them back into the church through peaceful means such as sending special preachers into southern France to convert them. However, in 1208 a papal representative was murdered in Toulouse, provoking Innocent III (1160–1216) to call a crusade which crushed the movement.

Bibliography

M. Barber, The Cathars: Dualist Heretics in Languedoc in the High Middle Ages (Harlow, 2000); M. Lambert, The Cathars (Oxford, 1998); S. O'Shea, The Perfect Heresy (London, 2000); S. Runciman, The Medieval Manichee (Cambridge, 1961 [1947]); W. Wakefield and A. P. Evans, Heresies of the High Middle Ages (New York, 1991).

R. G. CLOUSE

ALEXANDRIAN SCHOOL

The great city of Alexandria, on the Mediterranean coast of Egypt just west of the Nile delta, had, since its foundation by Alexander the Great, been one of the leading intellectual centres of the Hellenic world, prominent especially in philosophical, literary, mathematical and scientific studies. The beginnings of Christianity in Alexandria are murky, though associated in tradition (since at least the time of Eusebius of Caesarea at the very beginning of the fourth century) with the evangelist, Mark. But the first theologians to emerge with any clarity in Alexandria were *Gnostic or gnosticizing in their teaching: men like Basilides, Heracleon and Valentinus on the edges of, or beyond the pale of, what would become recognized 'orthodoxy'. With the work of *Clement in the 190s it becomes possible to speak for the first time of a more mainline or mainstream theological tradition in Alexandria.

To describe that tradition the phrase 'Alexandrian School' can be used in either a looser or in a narrower and more precise sense. Loosely, it is possible to point to certain lines of continuity other than merely geographical that run through the Alexandrian tradition from Clement to the end of the ancient world. They would include, first, a wide-ranging engagement with *Platonic thought; secondly and correlative with that, what we might term a 'noetic' spirituality in the sense of seeing the goal of the Christian life to be a rising up with the eyes of the mind from the material world of time and space (the world of coming to be and passing away), to the stable, unchanging, eternal realm beyond; and finally, ways of interpreting Scripture that see it above all as a storehouse of mysterious meanings that both reveal and veil the story of the soul's ascent to God. But it must be noted that, on the one hand, none of these three characteristics is unique to the Alexandrian tradition and, secondly, there are in all of them significant discontinuities to be observed as well, above all with the emergence of a radically new incarnational theology in the fourth century. It is to the latter, shaped above all by the thought of *Athanasius (bishop of Alexandria 328–73) and *Cyril (bishop 412–44) that the term 'Alexandrian School' can be applied in a narrower and more precise sense.

In the wider sense of the phrase, the pinnacle of the Alexandrian School is in many ways the work of *Origen. He was the most towering intellectual figure of third-century theology and a writer whose influence, above all on exegesis and spirituality, remained a formative factor on subsequent Christian tradition. Origen lived in a thoroughly Platonic intellectual world. He believed in the pre-existence of *souls – or, to be precise, in the creation of rational spirits – all alike and all engaged in the contemplation of God, before the creation of the material world. But for some (as Origen admits, inexplicable) reason these rational spirits became bored and looked down. All but the one that eventually became the human soul of Christ fell. They fell to varying degrees, some becoming angels, some human souls and others demons. And they fell into materiality – a material world that was in fact designed to be both a means of giving expression to this new diversity and a hard school in which they could eventually be taught to turn their gaze back to God. Scripture is a roadmap for this journey, or rather a complex set of clues and hints and puzzles meant to encourage us and train us and lead us on. Allegory (see *Hermeneutics) is the exegetical tool for unlocking this quarry of hidden meaning. What seem on the surface to be, for example, simple accounts of historical battles and kings in fact tell a timeless story of the soul's rational ascent in the contemplation of God. And occasionally, Origen thinks, the literal, surface meaning is actually either false or nonsensical, just to remind the reader that he always needs to look beneath that surface for the deeper meaning of Scripture.

In his thought about God, Origen developed the idea that the Son is eternally begotten of the Father: it is an act always, timelessly, in process, since God always and simply 'is'. The Son who is thus begotten is also the *Logos or Word of God, and he is the *Wisdom of God in whom there is a sort of cosmic blueprint of all the things that are to be made. What proved in the history of subsequent theology to be the downside of that idea is that the Word has for Origen a strongly cosmological function. He is the principle of order and harmony in the world, and that means that he is a bridge or a link between the One and the many, between God and his world. And so the Son was subordinate to the Father; he was God, but, in the end, less so.

For that and other reasons, Origen proved a controversial figure even in his own lifetime and was eventually to be condemned as a heretic by the Fifth Ecumenical *Council in 553, some three centuries after his death. But his influence continued to be felt, above all in Alexandria in the work of men like Dionysius the Great (bishop of Alexandria 248–c. 64) and the lay theologian Didymus the Blind (died 398).

By the time of Didymus, however, the theological landscape had been radically altered by the new thinking associated with the *Arian controversy. The thought of both Athanasius and Cyril is dominated by a pattern given expression in John 1:14, 'The Word became flesh and made his dwelling among us.' For Athanasius, everything in the transient world of coming to be and passing away is subject to change and so to decay – to corruption, as he says, by which he means not primarily moral corruption (though that is itself a symptom of the problem), but, quite simply, falling apart and rotting away. All things – including human beings – that have come into being will in and of themselves cease to exist. Life, true life, is made possible only when the Word or Son of God, who is, as the Council of *Nicaea affirmed in 325, 'one in being' (homoousios) with the Father, takes flesh and breaks into our world of time and space, living a human life, dying a human death and rising again. The flesh he takes is our flesh, and he transforms it, making it incorruptible and bestowing on us the gift of adoption as sons and daughters of God – giving us by grace a sonship which is his by nature.

This very physical emphasis on the bodily reality of the incarnation and of our salvation is taken up and developed by Cyril. Cyril was an implacable opponent of what he labelled as the heresy of *Nestorius, which gave expression in an uncompromising and provocative form to the theological traditions of Alexandria's great rival, *Antioch. That meant that, against the Antiochene tendency to hold the divinity and humanity in Christ apart and to make the 'man' in Christ a distinct moral agent, Cyril stressed the life-giving unity of Word and flesh. In the Incarnate there is only one subject, only one centre of action, only one 'he'. The person of Christ is not a sort of pantomime horse (as an extreme form of Antiochene theology could sometimes seem to imply) with two separate acting subjects, the Word and a man, agreeing to act in common. And thus, for example, for Cyril, it is necessary for our salvation to say that the Word of God died on the cross. He died not in and of his divinity, which is unchangeable and impassable, but in and through the flesh which is truly his. It has to be God who died (in the flesh) for the simple reason that there is no other 'he' in Christ who could have. Otherwise, Cyril would say, one ends up professing no more than a sort of moral cooperation between the Word and a good man who was no more than a sort of super-prophet. And a good man or a super-prophet, Cyril would say, cannot save.

The Alexandrian vision in that later and narrower sense came to dominate virtually the whole of *Eastern theology and Eastern spirituality and, especially from the thirteenth century on, was formative in the development of classical Western Christology as well. In particular, it is the vision to which the *Monophysite (or Miaphysite, since 'Monophysite' is a label imposed by their opponents) movement sought to give articulation. This was a theology of the one nature of the Word made flesh, of the inseparable life-giving union of divinity and humanity in Christ which has in principle transformed our world and our flesh, though the final victory will not be seen until the end of all things and the day of resurrection. That became the theology of the vast bulk of the people of Egypt and is still the Christology of the *Coptic Orthodox Church today.

See also: ALEXANDRIAN CHRISTIANITY; CHRISTOLOGY.

Bibliography

C. Bigg, The Christian Platonists of Alexandria (Oxford, 21913); H. Chadwick, Early Christian Thought and the Classical Tradition: Studies in Justin, Clement, and Origen (Oxford, 1966); R. P. C. Hanson, The Search for the Christian Doctrine of God: The Arian Controversy 318–381 (Edinburgh, 1988); J. R. Lyman, Christology and Cosmology: Models of Divine Activity in Origen, Eusebius, and Athanasius (Oxford, 1993); J. A. McGuckin, St. Cyril of Alexandria, The Christological Controversy: Its History, Theology, and Texts (Leiden and New York, 1994; repr. Crestwood, 2004); R. V. Sellers, Two Ancient Christologies (London, 1940).

P. PARVIS

ALIENATION

Alienation is the experience of being a stranger, 'away from home', estranged from others and from oneself. In the NT the verb apallotrioō (to estrange or alienate) is found only in Eph. 2:12; 4:18; and Col. 1:21, and always in the passive (see J. R. W. Stott, The Message of Ephesians, p. 90). Paul refers both to humankind's alienation from God and from his fellow human being. These fundamental estrangements are overcome in the cross of Christ (see *Atonement).

Alienation is also a theme of the Scriptures as a whole. Adam's eviction from Eden, Cain's wandering as a fugitive, Israel's servitude in Egypt and later exile in Babylon, all symbolize an alienation that is the lot of mankind. In Luke 15 Jesus' parable of the prodigal son gives 'a microcosmic anatomy of estrangement' (G. V. Jones, The Art and Truth of the Parables, p. 176).

The word 'alienation' appears in English from 1388, and for centuries meant either transfer of ownership or insanity. Then, from the 1940s, the word was used increasingly to describe social and cultural estrangement. Influences include the vast disorientation caused by the Second World War, and the writings of *Weber, *Kierkegaard and *Tillich. A major source was the newly published Economic and Philosophical Manuscripts of *Marx.

*Hegel and *Feuerbach had seen alienation as part of man's developing self-consciousness, whereas Marx saw it as an urgent social and economic problem. For him, man was alienated in religion, under the state, but supremely in his labour. 'For Marx and Kierkegaard, the world in which Hegel felt "at home" had become alien' (K. Löwith, From Hegel to Nietzsche, p. 173). It would seem that we are inheritors of that world. Alienation, an important concept in social psychology, has its roots in a basic theological reality: that humankind is alienated from God, creation, fellow humans and self.

Bibliography

EB (1974 ed.), vol. 1, pp. 574–576; G. V. Jones, The Art and Truth of the Parables (London, 1964); K. Löwith, From Hegel to Nietzsche: The Revolution in Nineteenth-Century Thought (London, 1965); B. Ollman, Alienation: Marx's Conception of Man in Capitalist Society (Cambridge, 1976); J. R. W. Stott, The Message of Ephesians: God's New Society (Leicester, 1979); R. M. Vince, Alienated Man: The Theme of Alienation in the Writings of Karl Marx and Søren Kierkegaard (unpublished MTh dissertation, King's College, London, 1980).

R. M. VINCE

ALLEGORY, see HERMENEUTICS

ALLEN, ROLAND (1868–1947)

The mission theorist Roland Allen, son of a Bristol clergyman, studied at Oxford and Leeds

Clergy School, and was ordained priest in 1893. In 1895 the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel appointed him to Beijing to teach catechists. The Boxer Rising of 1900 and the subsequent siege of the foreign embassies catalysed his thinking. His book about the siege (1901) highlights Western aggression in China and Chinese perceptions of missionary involvement in it. Transferred to pastoral work, Allen concluded that the Chinese should soon replace missionary supervision, and draw on Chinese customary lore. Ill health ended his missionary service in 1903. As an English parish priest, he caused controversy by refusing to baptize without evidence of Christian commitment from the child's sponsors. He resigned in 1907, and for the rest of his life writing was his principal work. The Survey Application Trust and World Dominion, founded for research that forwarded mission, provided a forum.

The titles of his best-known books, Missionary Methods: St Paul's or Ours? (1927 [1912]) and The Spontaneous Expansion of the Church and the Causes That Hinder It (1927) reflect his concerns. Allen argued that apostolic practice, trusting the Holy Spirit, passed church leadership to local converts; 'spontaneous' growth of the church along indigenous lines followed. Standard modern mission practice maintained foreign control and produced a culturally inappropriate professional ministry. In Le Zoute (1927) Allen accused Protestant mission policy in Africa of subordinating evangelization to the colonial agenda of education.

Relentlessly combative, Allen had limited impact on mainstream missionary thinking in his lifetime, but has since been seen as prophetic. Though a High Church Anglican treasuring the sacraments and episcopal governance, he found favour among evangelical non-denominational 'faith missions', the first leaders of the Three Self Patriotic Movement in China, and those seeking to free missions from colonial leftovers.

See also: MISSIOLOGY.

Bibliography

D. M. Paton, Reform of the Ministry: A Study of the Work of Roland Allen (London 1968); idem (ed.), The Mission of the Spirit: Selected Writings of Roland Allen (London 1960).

A. F. WALLS

ALTHAUS, PAUL (1888–1966)

One of the most significant twentieth-century *Lutheran theologians, Althaus had a long teaching career at the University of Erlangen. Most of his work is characterized by profound engagement with the thought of *Luther. Along with contemporaries such as Werner Elert (1885–1954), under the influence of his teachers *Holl and Carl Stange (1870–1959), Althaus represents a shift from a purely historical interest in Luther to a use of Luther as a fertile theological stimulus. His reinstatement of Luther as a theologian corrects earlier *Ritschlian accounts, notably over the centrality of Luther's doctrine of justification and his theology of the cross, though Althaus is critical of what he sees as Luther's excessive pessimism over sin and of his eucharistic theology. Althaus' own dogmatics, Die christliche Wahrheit (Christian Truth), represents a major alternative to *Barth's Christocentric understanding of *revelation. Among his other writings are an eschatology, an ethics and a much-used commentary on Romans.

Bibliography

Works in ET: The Ethics of Martin Luther (Philadelphia, 1972), see Foreword, 'The Theology of Martin Luther' (Philadelphia, 1966).

Studies: H. Grass, in TRE 2, pp. 329–337; W. Lohff, in L. Reinisch (ed.), Theologians of Our Time (Notre Dame, 1964), pp. 48–64.

J. B. WEBSTER

AMBROSE (c. 339–97)

Ambrose had a Christian upbringing in an aristocratic Roman family. He followed an administrative career, and at the age of thirty was appointed governor of Liguria-Aemilia, with his residence in Milan. In 374 this city was thrown into turmoil over an episcopal election. By popular acclamation Ambrose was designated the new bishop.

In office, Ambrose proved a resolute opponent of *Arianism. Being proficient in Greek, he could render the best of Eastern Nicene theology into clear Latin. The fruits of this work were his On the Faith and On the Holy Spirit. He was also involved politically in the demise of Arianism from Illyricum; while in the 380s he was pressurized in Milan itself by the mother of the boy emperor, Valentinian II, to hand over a church to Arian adherents in the city. Ambrose, whose own life was threatened, succeeded in his resistance only because of the support of the Milanese population. He based his stance on the argument that 'a temple of God could not be surrendered by a bishop'.

This was not the only occasion when Ambrose asserted the independence of the church from imperial control. In the reign of Theodosius I, who had been responsible for an indiscriminate massacre at Thessalonica, Ambrose effectively excommunicated the emperor until he did public penance for his crime. Theodosius accepted ecclesiastical discipline. But on other occasions Ambrose's assertion of ecclesiastical authority was not so felicitous. The bishop of Callinicum had inspired some monks to burn down the local synagogue. Theodosius wanted the synagogue rebuilt by the bishop, but was restrained by Ambrose on the ground that a Christian emperor ought not to show favour to unbelieving Jews. Ambrose took this position because he did not distinguish between personal duties and the duties of public office. But in general Ambrose's contribution to ecclesiastical authority in the West was good. He established that there were separate spheres of authority for church and *state. In some areas too, the emperor was bound by the instruction of the church.

Ambrose was keenly concerned with the practical duties of episcopacy, among which he gave pre-eminence to scriptural instruction. He acquired considerable repute as a preacher (in which capacity he contributed significantly to the conversion of *Augustine), while his writings were well-suited to help ordinary believers. Ambrose did not originate much new theological thought, though he did adumbrate the doctrine of original sin, and in *eucharistic theology he was the first in the West to speak of a change in the nature of the elements. This quasi-creative act was brought about by the priest, acting in Christ's stead, when he repeated the words used by Christ at the Last Supper. Ambrose was a prominent pioneer in the West of allegorical exegesis (see *Hermeneutics), Christian Neoplatonism (see *Platonism) and *ascetic theology.

A set of commentaries on the Pauline epistles was included among most manuscripts of Ambrose. Their real author, called Ambrosiaster by Erasmus, was a rough contemporary of Ambrose. This commentary exercised an important influence on the developing doctrine of original *sin by interpreting Rom. 5:12 as involving the whole human race in *Adam's sin and a consequent legacy of corruption for all Adam's descendants.

See also: STOICISM.

Bibliography

F. H. Dudden, The Life and Times of St Ambrose, 2 vols. (Oxford, 1935); H. von Campenhausen, The Fathers of the Latin Church (London, 1964); N. B. McLynn, Ambrose of Milan: Church and Court in a Christian Capital (Berkeley, CA, 1994); A. Paredi, Saint Ambrose: His Life and Times (Notre Dame, IN, 1964).

G. A. KEITH

AMBROSIASTER, see AMBROSE

AMES, WILLIAM (1576–1633)

William Ames (Latinized as 'Amesius'), William *Perkins's most distinguished follower, was born in Ipswich, Suffolk, and reared by his maternal uncle, Robert Snelling. Snelling sent him in 1594 to Christ's College, Cambridge, known for its undiluted *Puritanism and *Ramist philosophy. Ames graduated with a Bachelor of Arts degree in 1598 and a master's degree in 1601. That same year he was elected to be a fellow at Christ's College and ordained to the ministry. While at Christ's College, he underwent a dramatic conversion experience under the rousing preaching of Perkins.

Ames quickly became the moral compass of the college, but left his position there in 1609 to avoid expulsion for his strong Puritan convictions. He escaped to the Netherlands, where he first spent time with John Robinson; he was then employed from 1611 to 1619 by Sir Horace Vere, commander of English forces in the Netherlands, to serve as military chaplain at The Hague. Here Ames presided over a small congregation, acted as spiritual counsellor to the Vere family, ministered to the troops during military campaigns, wrote four books against *Arminianism, and played a leading role in Calvinism's triumph over Arminianism at the *Synod of Dort.

To support his family, Ames gave lectures and tutored university students for three years. He then served as professor of theology at Franeker University in Friesland for eleven years (1622–33), where he became known as the 'Learned Doctor' who tried to 'Puritanize' the entire university. He maintained a strong anti-prelatical and anti-Arminian stance, but his greatest contribution was in theology and ethics, which he considered a unified system that promoted genuine piety. At Franeker, Ames wrote his two greatest works. Medulla theologiae (The Marrow of Theology, 1627) taught that theology was the science of living to God; it became known as the best succinct summary of Calvinistic theology (see *Reformed theology) ever written. He also wrote De conscientia (Conscience with the Power and Cases Thereof, 1630). Reprinted nearly twenty times in thirty years, De conscientia is a collection of five books explaining Puritan casuistry; it moves from a theoretical treatment of the nature of conscience to practical answers for 'cases of conscience'.

In 1633, Ames moved to Rotterdam to co-pastor a congregation of English refugees and to help the church develop a Puritan college in Rotterdam. Several months later, on 11 November, he died of pneumonia. Four years later, his wife and children went to live in the Puritan settlement of Salem, Massachusetts. They took Ames's library with them, which formed the nucleus of the original library for Harvard College.

Ames's influence proved to be greatest in New England (see *New England theology), where Marrow became the primary text at Harvard for a century. It was often read and quoted throughout the colonies. Ames's writings on church polity laid the groundwork for non-separating Congregationalism, which encouraged the Congregational churches of Massachusetts Bay Colony to support further reformation in the Church of England.

Bibliography

Works: The Marrow of Theology (Grand Rapids, 1997 [1627]); Conscience, with the Power and Cases Thereof (Norwood, 1975 [1630]); Technometry (Philadelphia, 1979 [1633]); The Substance of Christian Religion: Or, a Plain and Easie Draught of the Christian Catechisme, in LII Lectures (London, 1659); An Analytical Exposition of Both the Epistles of the Apostle Peter (London, 1641).

Studies: J. R. Beeke and J. Van Vliet, 'The Marrow of Theology by William Ames', in K. M. Kapic and R. C. Gleason (eds.), The Devoted Life: An Invitation to the Puritan Classics (Downers Grove, 2004); B. J. Boerkoel, Sr, William Ames (1576–1633): Primogenitor of the Theologia-Pietatis in English-Dutch Puritanism, ThM thesis (Calvin Theological Seminary, 1990); D. Horton (tr. and ed.), William Ames by Matthew Nethenus, Hugo Visscher, and Karl Reuter (Cambridge, 1965); K. L. Sprunger, The Learned Doctor William Ames: Dutch Backgrounds of English and American Puritanism (Chicago, 1972); J. Van Vliet, William Ames: Marrow of the Theology and Piety of the Reformed Tradition, PhD diss. (Westminster Theological Seminary, 2002).

J. R. BEEKE

AMYRALDISM

This word is derived from the Latin form of the name of Moise Amyraut (1596–1664), perhaps the most eminent and influential professor of the French Protestant Academy of Saumur. This was established in 1598 by a decision of the national synod of the French Reformed Churches. It enjoyed the special favour of Philippe Duplessis-Mornay (1549–1623), governor of Saumur and one of the noblest and most influential Protestant leaders at the turn of the century. Achieving wide acclaim in France and in foreign countries for the brilliance of its faculty, it attracted a very considerable number of students until it was abolished by order of King Louis XIV at the revocation of the Edict of Nantes in 1685.

The school was known also for its encouragement of progressive ideas and its special consideration to people of nobility or wealth. In philosophy this was made apparent by the vigorous advocacy of *Ramist over against *Aristotelian logic which remained the standard in more traditional institutions like Sedan, Geneva or Leiden. In theology, the influence of John Cameron (1579–1625) was a dominant feature, even though he taught there only between 1618 and 1621. During that time, however, he managed to exercise a very great influence on three of his students, Louis Cappel (1585–1658), Josué de la Place (Placaeus, 1596–1655) and Moise Amyraut mentioned above.

Each of these three was involved in controversy over teachings which tended to broaden the *Reformed orthodoxy represented for instance in the Synod of *Dort. Cappel was embroiled in a discussion relating to the presence of the vowel points in the original Hebrew text and contended against Johann Buxtorf of Basel that these were a later addition made by the Masoretes to facilitate the reading of Scripture by people who had little knowledge of Hebrew. Later scholarship has vindicated him in this, although it remains true that the text without vowel points constitutes a clear standard of truth. Placaeus promoted the theory of mediate imputation, according to which *Adam's descendants were not adjudged guilty of the first sin of Adam but were born corrupt as a result of that sin and incurred God's displeasure by virtue of this corruption. The National Synod of Charenton (1645) expressed reservations in this area, although theologians of Saumur insisted that it had not condemned Placaeus's view.

Moise Amyraut was undoubtedly the most celebrated theologian of this school and served from 1633 to the time of his death in 1664. He was involved in a severe controversy relating to the scope of divine grace, *predestination and the extent of Christ's *atonement. Amyraut intended to soften the edges of the traditional orthodox Reformed view and thus to relieve difficulties in the controversy with Roman Catholics and facilitate a reunion of Protestants in which Reformed and Lutheran could join ranks. In his Traité de la Prédestination (1634) he claimed that God, moved by his love for humankind, had appointed all human beings to salvation provided they repent and believe. He sent his Son, the Lord Jesus Christ, to die for the sins of all humankind in order to implement this purpose. However, since human beings would not on their own initiative repent and believe, God then chose to bestow a special measure of his Spirit to some only, who are the elect. Grace thus is seen as universal in the provision for salvation, but as particular in the application of it. In viewing matters in this fashion, Amyraut thought that he could continue to adhere to the Canons of Dort and at the same time provide a picture of God's benevolence that would be more faithful to Scripture and indeed to *Calvin than the thoroughly particularistic approach that characterized Reformed orthodoxy in the second quarter of the seventeenth century.

Amyraut's views were supported by his colleagues in Saumur and by the pastors of the influential Reformed Church of Charenton near Paris. He was strenuously opposed by Pierre du Moulin of Sedan (1568–1658), André Rivet of the Netherlands (1572–1651) and Friedrich Spanheim of Geneva and Leiden (1600–49). At the National Synod of Alençon (1637) he was admonished, but not condemned for heresy. The controversy raged until 1661, with three periods of special intensity: 1634–37, 1641–49 and 1655–61. In the last period Amyraut did not participate in the debates carried out by Jean Daillé (Dallaeus, 1594–1670) and Samuel Desmarets (Maresius, 1599–1673).

Various assessments of the impact of the Salmurian theology have been offered. It seems apparent that it tended to weaken the unity of Reformed thought and to open the door to increasing departures from Reformed orthodoxy. It may have influenced King Louis XIV and his counsellors into thinking that there was no intrinsic incompatibility between the Reformed faith and Roman Catholicism. He was thus led to believe erroneously that the revocation of the Edict of Nantes would not produce great turmoil in France. The three Saumur professors together produced the large work Theses Theologicae Salmurienses (4 parts in 2 vols., 1664 and again in 1665), which became a frequently used manual for the study of theology.

One of Amyraut's students and successors at Saumur, Claude Pajon (1625–85), carried the trend further by positing that the Spirit's work of *regeneration is merely an illumination of the mind which brings about, of necessity, a change in the direction of the human will (congruism; see *Merit). This stance, strenuously opposed by Pierre Jurieu (1637–1713), increased misgivings about Saumur's orthodoxy. In 1675 J. H. Heidegger, in concert with F. Turretin (1623–1687) and L. Gernler, issued the Formula Consensus Helvetica designed specifically as an anti-Salmurian document, but the influence of Saumur was felt in all the countries to which French Protestants fled after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes.

Bibliography

On Saumur the fullest treatment is still to be found in P. Daniel Bourchenin, Etude sur les Académies protestantes en France au XVIIe et au XVIIIe Siècles (Paris, 1882). The researches of Jean Paul Pittion at Trinity College, Dublin are very valuable but difficult to access.

Studies: B. Armstrong, Calvinism and the Amyraut Heresy (Madison, 1969); A. C. Clifford, Amyraut Affirmed, or Owenism, a Caricature of Calvinism (Norwich, 2004); François Laplanche, Orthodoxie et Prédication (Paris, 1965); J. Leith, Creeeds of the Churches (Richmond, 31982); R. Nicole, Moyse Amyraut: A Bibliography (New York and London, 1981); P. Schaff, Creeeds of Christendom, vol. 1 (London, 1877), pp. 477–489; B. B. Warfield, The Plan of Salvation (Grand Rapids, 1942). Note also the PhD theses by J. Moltmann (Göttingen, 1951) and L. Proctor (Leeds, 1952).

R. NICOLE

ANABAPTIST THEOLOGY

The Anabaptists, together with other groups known today as the revolutionaries, spiritualists and evangelical rationalists, belonged to the radical wing of the *Protestant Reformation. Contemporary scholarship makes a distinction between the 'revolutionary Anabaptists' who were associated with the Zwickau Prophets, Thomas *Müntzer and the later violent Münsterites, and the 'evangelical Anabaptists' who found their origin in Conrad Grebel (c. 1498–1526), Hans Hut (d. 1527), Pilgram Marpeck (d. 1556) and Menno *Simons. The latter had their beginnings in Zurich in Switzerland and spread to South Germany, Moravia and the Netherlands with considerable homogeneity between each region. More recent studies, however, have contended for the multiple origins and diversity of the Anabaptist movement in these various centres, rather than for the monogenesis of a normative movement in Switzerland. Accordingly, the theology of this movement cannot be characterized without allowing for exceptions and paradoxes. But its basic theological emphases are clearly discernible.

The Anabaptists did not consciously do theology in the classical sense, even though they accepted the substance of the Christian *creeds. Their theology was much more occasional in nature. It was largely an exposition of Bible doctrine as it applies to life. In this manner they developed a theological focus of their own alongside and in reaction to magisterial Protestantism.

One of the central points of difference between the Anabaptists and the mainline Reformers relates to the question of human nature and *salvation. Whereas the Reformers defined *sin as bondage of the *will, the Anabaptists, rejecting the *Augustinian interpretation of the sovereignty of God, viewed sin as a loss of capacity or a serious sickness. For them there is no real repentance and commitment without the freedom of the will. Consequently, Anabaptist theology is not regulated by the concept of sin as much as by the concept of wilful obedience. Salvation is not simply a certitude of being saved from damnation but a walking in newness of life. The emphasis is more on *regeneration of the new being in Christ than on *justification by faith (Rechtfertigung). God in effect makes us righteous (Gerechtmachung) in Christ and then accepts us on the basis of that *righteousness. In order to ensure a sinless Christ as a basis for a strong doctrine of salvation, Dutch and North German Anabaptism held to a questionable view of the celestial origin and nature of Christ's flesh. This view was later superseded by a more traditional *Christology.

The attendant theology of the *church as a visible fellowship of obedient disciples, exhibiting the way of suffering love, was another of the controlling features of Anabaptist theology which diverged from magisterial Protestantism most emphatically. Various concepts of the church prevailed among the Anabaptists: church as congregation, as inner spiritual reality, as intentional community and as *kingdom of God. However, at the centre was the idea of the church as a believers' fellowship (Gemeinde) versus the church as a state church (Volkskirche).

The practice of adult *baptism was essential to the Anabaptist view of the church. Their rejection of infant baptism was based on the lack of NT evidence for such a practice. For them believers' baptism was the consequence of understanding the church as a voluntary fellowship, consisting of those who had experienced conversion and who were baptized upon the confession of their faith. It was a distinguishing mark of separation from the world and of commitment to Christian discipleship.

The central aspects of Anabaptist ecclesiology were actual personal *conversion, holy living, suffering in the Spirit of Christ, practice of *love and non-resistance, separation from the *world, full community in the church, obedience to the great commission, maintenance of church *discipline, rejection of the use of power by Christians and of involvement in political office, and freedom of conscience. In contrast to the Reformers, the Anabaptists emphasized the fallenness of *Christendom and the restoration of the NT church.

The strong emphasis on separation from the world was balanced by a burning missionary zeal which took the Anabaptists into the world. Unbounded by national and racial lines, they were the first to make the great commission the responsibility of every church member. This represented a break with the territorial principle and with Protestant and Catholic doctrine. Moreover, the church's relationship to society was informed by a two-kingdom theology in which the conflict between the church and the *state was seen to be much greater in principle than for the other Reformers. The Anabaptists were emphatic about the fallenness of humanity and its potential for redemption, but not optimistic about changing the world system as such. Yet submission to governmental authority, ordered by God, was important, even though the state must not force the Christian community to compromise its allegiance to the way of the cross. For the most part Anabaptism was non-resistant in character. People who disagreed with the church should not be dealt with by the sword but by the process of church discipline governed by the way of Christ's suffering love. Thus, the non-resistance stance included more than a refusal to be involved in government, military service or war. It applied to personal, social and economic relationships.

Such a way of life reflected the empowering of the *Holy Spirit. The Anabaptists exhibited a frequent sense of reliance on the Spirit. Clearly the doctrine of the Spirit was central in relation to the walk of *faith. Moreover, the Spirit made the Bible a living word of God which must be obeyed and practised in daily life. The spiritual understanding of the *Scriptures was strongly linked to the believing community where one heard the word and discerned its meaning and will. The message of the Spirit was given in the community of believers gathered around the word. At times, however, subjectivistic and spiritualistic tendencies did emerge.

In their interpretation of Scripture the Anabaptists had much in common with their sixteenth-century contemporaries. However, some basic differences existed, especially on the relationship of the NT to the OT, the degree to which Scripture was the sole authority, and the extent to which biblical interpretation was dependent on obedience to Christ. For the Anabaptists a large part of interpreting the Bible was imitating it. Theirs was a *hermeneutic of obedience.

The centrality of the transformed life of discipleship resulted in severe persecutions. For many, suffering the way of the cross was essential to this kind of discipleship and profoundly shaped their *eschatology. *Suffering became a key to understanding the role of the believer in *history. The kingdom comes and is consummated through suffering for Christ. They generally agreed that they were living in the last days, in the tribulation preceding the second coming. Although chiliastic tendencies existed (see *Millennium) and eschatology was central to many Anabaptists, there was no agreement regarding the specific time of the end and their own stance towards it.

See also: MENNONITE THEOLOGY; REFORMATION, RADICAL.

Bibliography

H. S. Bender, 'The Anabaptist Vision', CH 13, 1944, pp. 3–24; H. S. Bender et al. (eds.), The Mennonite Encyclopedia, vols. I–IV (Scottdale, 1955–59); W. R. Estep, The Anabaptist Story (Grand Rapids, 1975); T. N. Finger, A Contemporary Anabaptist Theology (Downers Grove, 2004); R. Friedmann, The Theology of Anabaptism (Scottdale, 1973); H. Goertz, 'History and Theology: A Major Problem of Anabaptist Research Today', MQR 53, 1979, pp. 177–188; W. Klassen (ed.), Anabaptism in Outline (Scottdale, 1981); J. M. Stayer, W. O. Packull and K. Deppermann, 'From Monogenesis to Polygenesis: The Historical Discussion of Anabaptist Origins', MQR 49, 1975, pp. 83–121.

H. J. LOEWEN

ANALOGY

Analogy refers to the use of the same word to express a similarity of some sort between two different entities, without that word meaning either exactly the same thing in both cases (which would be univocity) or something completely different (which would be equivocity).

There are two principal types of analogy. The first type is the analogy of proportionality, in which the relation between one entity and one of its properties corresponds to the relation of a different entity to one of its properties, without any necessary connection being drawn. For example, both a pet and a design might be considered 'intelligent': a meaningful comparison is thereby offered, without any necessary relationship between the two entities being suggested. The second type is the analogy of attribution (or proportion), in which a word that applies most properly to one entity is, by derivative extension, applied to other entities. An example would be 'healthy', which is applied most properly to an individual and derivatively to things which contribute to health, for example, exercise and diet. The analogy of attribution can itself be used in two ways: first, extrinsically, where the property predicated is external to the second entity; and second, intrinsically, where the predication refers to an internal property of the second entity.

In the history of theology, these different types of analogy have figured prominently, if not without controversy, in the discussion of how human language can refer to *God. For *Thomas Aquinas, for example, if the statements 'God is wise' and 'that person is wise' were not only to be meaningful but also to preserve a sense of the difference between God and humanity, then analogous language alone was suitable. For *Duns Scotus, however, it was necessary to conceive of God in concepts that were not simply analogical but also (at least in part) univocal with reference to God and to the creature. This sort of debate about the necessity or otherwise of analogical language continues to the present day.

In the *Thomist tradition, a further debate arose over whether the more appropriate and useful type of analogy in theology was that of proportionality (e.g. Cajetan) or that of intrinsic attribution (e.g. Suárez). On both sides of this debate, however, there existed in Roman Catholic circles a fundamental presupposition that the use of analogy at all was only thinkable because God allowed the being of the creature to participate in some sense in the divine being. In other words, the use of analogy in language presupposed some sort of analogy of being, or analogia entis, between God and humanity. It was on this point that controversy arose in discussion between Protestant and Roman Catholic theologians in the twentieth century. While many significant Protestant theologians – such as Eberhard *Jüngel and Wolfhart *Pannenberg – advocated the importance of analogical language in speaking about God, there was greater reticence among Protestants to speak of an analogia entis. This reticence may, at least in part, have been influenced by Immanuel *Kant, who had previously undermined confidence in any concept of an analogous relation between God and humanity.

The strongest criticism of the analogia entis came from Karl *Barth, whose foremost concern was that the concept seemed to allow for a natural knowledge of God outside the event of divine revelation. By contrast, Barth saw the analogy between God and humanity not as a property possessed by the creature but as something which had always to be given and revealed and believed anew in an event of grace: the analogia relationis (analogy of relation) was given in the analogia fidei (analogy of faith). Roman Catholic responses to Barth from such figures as Hans Urs von *Balthasar made clear that Barth's criticism was directed at only one possible construal of the analogia entis, and that their own construal of the analogia entis was not beyond reconciliation with Barth's view. The question of the use of analogous language in theology remains a live one, and brings particularly into focus the relationships between nature and grace and between creation and reconciliation.

Bibliography

H. U. von Balthasar, The Theology of Karl Barth: Exposition and Interpretation (San Francisco, 1982); K. Barth, CD, vol. II/1 (Edinburgh, 1957); D. Bentley Hart, The Beauty of the Infinite: The Aesthetics of Christian Truth (Grand Rapids, 2003); J. Duns Scotus, 'Ordinatio' in Philosophical Writings (London, 1962); E. Jüngel, God as the Mystery of the World (Grand Rapids, 1983); W. Pannenberg, Basic Questions in Theology, vol. 1 (London, 1970); Thomas Aquinas, Summa Theologiae, vol. 3 (Cambridge, 2006).

P. T. NIMMO

ANALYTIC THEOLOGY

Analytic theology is a theological method that has its roots in twentieth-century analytic philosophy of religion. In the early 1980s, a number of those working in this field began to turn their attention to topics in philosophical theology. If questions in the *philosophy of religion are about generic philosophical issues raised by religious belief (e.g. the problem of evil, the justification of religious belief, etc.), philosophical theology concerns concrete matters pertaining to the theology of a particular religious tradition. The literature in philosophical theology gradually became more theologically informed, more sophisticated, and diversified to include a range of theological topics including central matters like the Trinity, incarnation, atonement, sin, eschatology, the nature of faith, and the like. It developed largely independently of contemporary *systematic theology, however, a matter that has been noted and lamented by people like R. R. Reno, who has written of 'theology's continental captivity', referring to the way in which theologians happily engage major continental philosophers as dialogue partners while ignoring analytics.

However, as this philosophical-theological literature matured into the 1990s, it became increasingly difficult for those outside the conversation to ignore. To all intents and purposes this was *theology being done by Christian philosophers independent of the theological schools and seminaries. By the early 2000s some rapprochement between the two sides was beginning to happen. Analytic theology was, as William Abraham has put it, 'an accident waiting to happen'. But what was new about it? In one respect, not very much. According to some pundits, it was merely *philosophical theology rebranded. Yet there were some important differences: theologians as well as philosophers were now working on theological topics using the sensibilities and literature of analytic philosophy to ask *dogmatic questions. Inevitably, this led to systematic theology done in the mode of analytic theology, as other theologians worked in the mode of *postliberalism, or *radical orthodoxy. Once there were practising theologians on board it became difficult to marginalize the movement within the study of *religion as the preserve of a few Christian philosophical trespassers. And, as the work of analytic theology has flourished since 2009, more collaboration has brought significant steps forward. Increasingly, this literature really engages with the theological tradition, with ancient and modern theologians, and with questions of theological method as well as constructive theology.

In many ways, analytic theology is a return to more classical analytical sensibilities that have governed Christian theology for much of its history in *scholasticism, as well as the work of key thinkers from St *Augustine and St

*Anselm of Canterbury to Jonathan *Edwards. Yet it is not just this; there is a real concern to engage in wider theological and religious discussion, and to foster dialogue between the Abrahamic faiths. There is also the beginnings of an awareness of the limits of analytic theology, and of worries it must take more seriously if it is to continue to flourish. These include concerns about ontotheology (roughly, the notion that the god of analytic theology is an *idol), criticisms from *feminist theology, the place of metaphor and tropes in *religious language (see also *Hermeneutics), and the relationship to other theological methodologies as well as allied disciplines such as biblical studies. There is much work to be done. But the fact that analytic theology has already made such headway indicates that it is meeting a theological need, and making a significant constructive contribution to twenty-first-century Christian theology.

Bibliography

The Journal of Analytic Theology, located at <<http://journalofanalytictheology.com>>; W. J. Abraham, Analytic Theology: A Bibliography (Dallas, 2012); O. D. Crisp, A Reader in Contemporary Philosophical Theology (London, 2009); idem, God Incarnate: Explorations in Christology (London, 2009); idem, 'Analytic Theology', Expository Times 122.10 (2011), pp. 1–9; idem, 'Reason, Style and Wisdom: More on Analytic Theology', Journal of the American Academy of Religion 81.3 (2013), pp. 609–613; O. D. Crisp and M. C. Rea, Analytic Theology: New Essays in the Philosophy of Theology (Oxford, 2009); K. Diller, Theology's Epistemological Dilemma: How Karl Barth and Alvin Plantinga Provide a Unified Response (Downers Grove, 2014); W. Hasker, Metaphysics and the Tri-Personal God, Oxford Studies in Analytic Theology (Oxford, 2013); P. A. Macdonald, 'Analytic Theology: A Summary, Evaluation, and Defence', Modern Theology 30.1 (2014), pp. 32–65; T. H. McCall, Which Trinity? Whose Monotheism? Philosophical and Systematic Theologians on the Metaphysics of Trinitarian Theology (Grand Rapids, 2010); T. H. McCall and M. C. Rea, Philosophical and Theological Essays on the Trinity (Oxford, 2010); R. Rauser, Theology in Search of Foundations (Oxford, 2009); M. C. Rea, Oxford Readings in Philosophical Theology, 2 vols. (Oxford, 2009); R. R. Reno, 'Theology's

Continental Captivity', First Things, April 2006, located at: <<http://www.firstthings.com/article/2006/04/theologys-continental-captivity>>; W. Wood, 'Analytic Theology as a Way of Life', Journal of Analytic Theology 2 (2014), pp. 43–60.

O. D. CRISP

ANAMNESIS, see EUCHARIST

ANGELS

The term 'angel' (Heb. mal'ak, Gk angelos) refers to the particular function of 'messenger', whether divine or human. It is necessary, however, to narrow the category to divine or spiritual beings, and to expand it to include God's heavenly host, the so-called principalities and powers, and the evil spirits, including Satan.

Divine beings, the gods, are found in all religions. Biblical monotheism sought in various ways to emphasize the 'incomparability' of the God of Israel and hence to minimize the role of other divine beings. Nevertheless, the Bible itself and the Christian tradition have always made room for lesser spiritual beings, good and evil.

The classical tradition, from *Philo through *Thomas Aquinas, has seen angels as a particular kind of being, as 'minds without bodies'. In the so-called 'Celestial Hierarchy' of *Pseudo-Dionysius (sixth century), nine choirs of angels represents different ranks of angelic spirituality. The elaborate Thomistic speculation about angels led to a reaction by *William of Ockham, John *Calvin and later John *Locke. While quite different theologically, the latter emphasized the unknowability of angels, apart from the bare biblical attestations.

The rationalism of the Enlightenment went one step further in questioning the existence of angels altogether. *Schleiermacher relegated angels to the realm of the aesthetic, to be found only in hymnody and stained glass. 'Angelology' has dropped out of the theological syllabus as a topic, with the sole exception of Karl *Barth, who devoted a major portion of his Church Dogmatics to 'the representatives of Heaven'. Barth has been joined by some neo-classicists like Mortimer Adler, C. S. Lewis and Peter Kreeft, and by the postmodernist Walter Wink, who has tried to revitalize the idea of ‘principalities and powers’ as the ‘actual spirituality of actual entities in the real world’. Among evangelicals, Wayne Grudem’s dogmatic theology includes a major section on angels.

The other major sources of contemporary angelology today come from *Pentecostal writers, for whom the activity of angels and demons is considered real and present. Some missiologists like C. Peter Wagner see spiritual warfare among the principalities to be present in the mission field.

For those who accept the authority of the Bible, it seems clear that angels exist as distinct personalities, even if we can know very little about their essence. It is also clear that there are good and evil angels. It is possible that ‘principalities and powers’ are corrupted spiritual offices of God’s governance of the fallen world.

All angels are creatures of God, but some have rebelled and are eternally damned. Other ‘elect’ angels serve God faithfully in heaven. Angels have a role to play in announcing salvation history, especially the coming of Jesus Christ. They also serve as a measure of the nature of Christ, who being in the form of God took on human nature, not angelic nature, and is now exalted above the angels (Hebrews 1–2).

Finally, angels remind us of the reality of heaven and hell. They represent the ‘whence’ of God’s dwelling place and the ‘whither’ of God’s final kingdom, where ‘with angels and archangels and all the company of heaven’ we cry ‘Holy, holy, holy is the Lord of Hosts’ (Book of Common Prayer).

See also: DEVIL AND DEMONS.

Bibliography

M. Adler, The Angels and Us (London, 1982); K. Barth, CD, vol. 3 (Edinburgh, 1960); The Catechism of the Catholic Church (London, 1994); W. Grudem, Systematic Theology: An Introduction to Biblical Doctrine (Leicester, 1994); P. Kreeft, Angels and Demons: What Do We Really Know about Them? (San Francisco, 1995); C. S. Lewis, Perelandra (London, 1944); S. F. Noll, Angels of Light, Powers of Darkness: Thinking Biblically about Angels, Satan and Principalities (Eugene, 1998); C. P. Wagner (ed.), Engaging the Enemy: How to Fight and Defeat Territorial Spirits (Ventura, 1991); W. Wink, Unmasking the Powers: The Invisible

Forces that Determine Human Existence (Philadelphia, 1986).

S. F. NOLL

ANGLICANISM

The Church of England regards itself as catholic, part of the one universal *church, but reformed in the sixteenth century. Anglican Christians are committed to what they see in *Scripture as the interplay of many local churches and members on the one hand, and the universal church on the other. The local church is the universal church in a particular place. This can only be so when any particular local church is in communion with other local churches that make up the universal church. The Anglican Communion is that expression of the universal church to which local Anglican churches belong.

What is it to be an Anglican Christian?

Anglican theologians defended their reformation (see *Reformers, English) against the criticisms of the Roman Catholic Church, by affirming that Scripture could interpret itself, but not in the light of rational speculation about invisible realities. Rather, the observed realities of God’s word in the Bible could be interpreted in the light of his observed handiwork in nature. This was the time of global exploration by sea, of founding new colonies in strange places such as America, and of discovering new species of plants and animals. So Anglican theologians argued that all truth was God’s truth and that Scripture, while primary, should be listened to consistent with both the drama of redemption and God’s work in the wider world.

The Reformers argued that all things necessary for salvation were clearly revealed in Scripture, and what was not clearly revealed was not necessary for salvation. How that salvation was to be proclaimed in different places and in different generations was to be decided appropriately by the people of that time and place, and not prescribed by Scripture. The Anglican distinctive is of doctrinal unity and acceptable diversity in how the Christian life is expressed.

For Anglicans the heart of Scripture was about salvation: saving truth is pastoral, and therefore has to be both conveyed in language that can be understood and in appropriate cultural forms. Anglican theology has therefore been engaged seriously with pastoral concerns and with culture.

As a result, the language of Scripture, worship, prayer and theology were to be in the mother tongue and culture of the people. So the Church of England produced Scripture in English and a book of prayer in the language of the common people. Liturgy has been very important for most Anglicans. The form of prayer book services teaches God's law, repentance, the basis of forgiveness, the need to hear God's word read and expounded, the creed, thanksgiving and intercessory prayer, the Lord's Prayer and the Lord's Supper or Eucharist (thanksgiving) focusing on the atoning death of Jesus. Evangelical Anglicans give priority to preaching as the principle medium for teaching the faith.

Anglicans also wished to demonstrate that in the Reformation they were not founding a new church, but were actually the legitimate continuation of the church that had been in the country through Augustine since the earliest times. They claimed to be restoring the relationship between the ancient biblical teaching and how the Fathers had been listening to that. So they were careful to demonstrate that their interpretations of Scripture were in line with the teaching of the early church and the Fathers of the church.

The focus on Scripture, interpreted in the light of culture and in conformity with the tradition of the church, has given rise to three particular emphases within the Anglican churches. The Anglo-Catholic* tradition emphasizes continuity with the ancient apostolic church. Its key idea was that the Anglican Church was not just a Protestant* denomination but a branch of the Church Catholic. It points out that the historical succession of bishops and priests has been preserved in the Church of England since apostolic times; thus the validity of the sacraments that they celebrate is by people who have been validly ordained in an unbroken succession from the apostles. The liberal* tradition developed a focus on reading Scripture in the light of culture. The Enlightenment made the rationality supreme in European thinking, and the liberal tradition refers to a way of reading the Bible as a collection of narratives of their time so as not to contradict current rational opinion, for example about miracles. The evangelical* tradition seeks its roots in the Reformation itself, and in particular emphasizes that Scripture is fundamental and not just one among three co-equal ways of hearing the truth of God. Because of the Reformation emphasis on justification by faith, the evangelical tradition draws on the believer's personal experience of forgiveness and the presence of Christ. This was found in the emphasis on the transformation of the affections of the heart by Cranmer*, on personal faith in Christ which was developed by the Wesleys* and the subsequent Methodist* revival, and in the twentieth century on the reality of the presence of the Holy Spirit in the believer's life associated with the Pentecostal revival of the twentieth century.

These three strands co-exist in the Anglican Church. Some hold that their co-existence is the essential feature of Anglicanism as a bridge church between the Protestant and Catholic* traditions. Their co-existence is based on principled comprehensiveness, where each tradition respects the others and lives within the overall framework of submission to Scripture. The current difficulties in the Anglican Communion are related to unprincipled comprehensiveness, where all opinions are given equal value.

Expansion

When the Church of England began to expand beyond the boundaries of England, it did so in a variety of ways. It expanded to the Americas as the Society of the Propagation of the Gospel sent 300 clergy to North America between 1701 and 1776.

The Church of England, like other churches in Europe at the time, was not just a denomination but a folk and national church. Membership of the nation automatically involved membership of the national religion. But after the American Revolution, no religion was given special status, and all expressions of the Christian faith became denominations. How could the link with the Church of England therefore be maintained? The office of bishop was one way of securing this relationship, as all bishops were held to be part of one college. However, the bishops of the Anglican Church in North America could not, as Church of England bishops did, swear allegiance to the English crown. So after the American War of Independence their first bishops were ordained by Scottish bishops.

Two developments in the Anglican Church were very significant in its expansion. One was the insistence in the nineteenth century that every pastor in the Church of England had to live in the boundaries of his parish. This had not always been the case. Many had only visited their parishes very occasionally. As a result of this ruling, educated people now lived in even the most remote and poor areas. And these learned men, often with their wives, set up schools. By the end of the nineteenth century the whole of the education system in England was being run by the church. And where the Anglican Church spread throughout the world, the pattern of church and school was repeated.

A second development is linked with the foundation of the United States. After 1776, England at first grew tired of colonization and empire. It was occupied increasingly with defending its own shores against the armies of Napoleon. But some Anglican laymen were particularly exercised about the *slave trade and its horrendous effects on both slaves and slave owners. Reverend John Barclay, who was pastor on St Kitts in the Caribbean, observed the terrible conditions of the slaves working around his small church of St John's. He wrote to a friend in England, William Wilberforce. This was one of the factors that led eventually to the campaign led by Wilberforce and other Anglicans which succeeded in passing the law in 1807 outlawing the slave trade. The British navy was deployed around the world to intercept and stop slave ships. Then in 1832 the law was passed to free all slaves in British dominions.

The result for the Anglican Church was that there was a great concern to repay the debt to the African peoples for the horrors of the slave trade. So began the nineteenth-century missionary movement. In the West Indies the Anglican Church set up a diocese in 1825 to prepare the slaves for freedom. Missionaries went especially to Africa to bring Christian faith, education and commerce to replace the economy based on slavery. Treaties were drawn up with local rulers. Trading posts were established. These had to be protected on occasion, and gradually these areas were taken over. So the mission movement actually triggered the second phase of the British Empire.

The Anglican version of the Christian faith became very acceptable in many countries precisely because it emphasized the expression of the faith in the language, culture and traditions of the people. After all, the Church of England came into being because English Christians did not want to be ruled by Christian leaders outside England. However, these churches never became part of the Church of England in England. They were from the start regarded as free and independent churches. They were called the Church of England in the country where they were founded.

Questions therefore arose about what churches could be regarded as in fellowship with the Church of England. Inspired by the work of William Reed Huntingdon, a statement was drawn up at the General Convention of the Episcopal Church in Chicago in 1886, was subsequently adopted by the Lambeth Conference of 1888 and called therefore the Chicago/Lambeth Quadrilateral. It focused on four elements: the primacy of Scripture, the two dominical sacraments, the historic creeds and the episcopacy. If those four were in place, this could form the basis for fellowship between the Church of England and a sister church.

Later, questions were raised about what were legitimate interpretations of Scripture, by Bishop Colenso of South Africa, who founded the African National Congress. To resolve these questions, the Archbishop of Canterbury called the first conference of bishops of churches in fellowship with the Church of England in 1867. They met at Lambeth Palace, the archbishop's home in London.

This conference now meets every ten years to build fellowship and engage together on issues facing the worldwide communion of Anglican churches.

Recent growth

The Anglican Communion has never been so extensive as it is now. Since the 1960s it has grown with extraordinary vigour. The East African Revival of the 1920s and 1930s spread a desire for evangelism through lay people, as opposed to a church focused on the work of the clergy. And the independence of former British colonies in the 1960s brought to prominence many indigenous leaders who brought powerful and continuing renewal to a church growing tired towards the end of the colonial era. They also brought a deep concern to prove the contribution of the church to the well-being of the new nations.

At the time of writing, in Nigeria alone the Anglican Church has 18 million members. In Africa and Asia it has about 45 million members. In the USA it has 2 million and in the United Kingdom about 2 million regular church-going Anglicans.

The Anglican Communion is a fellowship of people across the barriers of race, colour, class and economics, most of whom are poor. The average Anglican is under thirty, black, female, lives on two dollars a day, walks three kilometres to get water and is orthodox in her faith. The gift of the Anglican Communion is that poor people are able to express their understanding of the Scripture in the one global church and that people of different cultures are able to correct each other's interpretation, thus preventing Christian faith and practice being subverted by elites.

In the view of many Anglicans in the Majority World, subordination to their prevailing culture characterizes the desire of many Anglican leaders in Western nations to dilute the biblical focus on the unique and exclusive lordship of Jesus, to compromise the biblical teaching on confining sex to marriage and, most specifically, to accept into the church's membership and leadership people who engage in same-sex practice without changing their behaviour. This latter contradicts the current teaching of the Anglican Church as set out in the 1998 Lambeth Conference resolution 1.10 that 'homosexual practice is incompatible with Scripture'. This resolution is being consistently disregarded by bishops in the US, Canada, New Zealand and in the British Isles. So the communion is seeking to address the issue of how they can live as a worldwide communion of autonomous (self-governing) churches and remain united and in partnership in the service of the gospel. Archbishop Drexel Gomez of the West Indies writes: 'Based on the 2004 Windsor Report from the Lambeth Commission on Communion and increasingly focused on that Report's proposed Anglican covenant, the shape of the answers to these challenges is gradually becoming clearer. They are answers which hold out the hope of developing a distinctively Anglican vision of national churches in an international communion that responds to the challenges of mission in the face of globalization while resisting the dangers of either captivity to our varied national cultures or a new form of ecclesial imperialism.'

In July 2007 all Anglican bishops, including those who had consecrated a partnered openly homosexual bishop in the USA, were invited to attend the Lambeth Conference in August 2008. Many bishops felt unable to have spiritual and table fellowship and decision-making with those who had consecrated such a bishop. But as they still needed to take counsel on vital matters of mission, over 1,000 Anglican bishops and leaders representing 35 million of the 60 million churchgoing Anglicans met in Jerusalem in June 2008 at the Global Anglican Future Conference 'to chart a way forward together that promotes and protects the biblical gospel and mission to the world'. They issued the Jerusalem Statement and Declaration and formed the Fellowship of Confessing Anglicans. While acknowledging Canterbury as an historic see, they did not accept that Anglican identity was determined necessarily through recognition by the Archbishop of Canterbury. They published the Jerusalem Declaration as the basis of their fellowship, and called on their Primates Council to assist in establishing the Anglican Church in North America. The Lambeth Conference will not meet in 2018.

See also: THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES; CHURCH GOVERNMENT.

Bibliography

D. Gomez, On Being Anglican in the Twenty-First Century, <<http://www.anglican-mainstream.net/index.php/2007/03/30/anglicanism-one-of-the-most-vibrant-and-unstable-expressions-of-christianity-within-the-world-ab-drexel-gomez/>>; Lambeth Commission, The Windsor Report 2004 (London, 2004), <<http://www.anglicancommunion.org/windsor2004/index.cfm>>; H. R. McAdoo, The Spirit of Anglicanism: A Survey of Anglican Theological Method in the 17th Century (London, 1965); J. R. H. Moorman, A History of the Church in England (London, new edn, 1980); M. Nazir-Ali, From Everywhere to Everywhere (London, 1990); idem, Shapes of the Church to Come (Eastbourne, 2001); N. K. Okoh, V. Samuel and C. Sugden, Being Faithful: The Shape of Historic Anglicanism Today (Oxford, 2009); V. Samuel and C. Sugden, Lambeth: A View from the Two-Thirds World (London, 1989); A. Wingate, K. Ward, C. Pemberton and W. Sitshebo (eds.), Anglicanism: A Global Communion (London, 1998).

C. M. N. SUGDEN

ANGLO-CATHOLIC THEOLOGY

Anglo-Catholic theology is a style of theology within Anglicanism whose immediate historical origin is the Oxford Movement in the Church of England. Anglo-Catholic theologians would themselves understand their theology as a continuation of the broad stream of theological thinking stretching back behind the Reformation to the apostolic church and the patristic age.

The beginning of the Oxford Movement is traditionally seen in the preaching of the Assize Sermon by John Keble in the University Church of St Mary's Oxford in 1833. This sermon was a riposte to the government of the day's decision to reduce the number of bishoprics in Ireland from twenty-two to twelve. Keble saw this as the state meddling with the things of God and, as such, a symbol of national apostasy. Keble's sermon can be seen as both conservative, in that it was a clarion call for the church to rouse itself against state-initiated reforms, but also as radical, in that it rooted the authority of the Church of England, not on the legal status given to it by the state, but on the spiritual authority given to it by God.

The leaders of the Oxford Movement promoted their thinking in a series of tracts, earning them the name Tractarians. The first of these tracts concerned the apostolicity of the church, and this was a declaration of what was to become a persistent theme in Anglo-Catholic theology: the doctrine of church. There were ninety tracts in all, which attempted to show that the doctrines of the Church of England were founded on its being directly related to the church of the apostles. The last tract, Tract 90, was written by John Henry Newman and argued by a theological tour de force that there was nothing incompatible with Roman Catholic teaching in the Thirty-Nine Articles of Religion, which articles had been born out of the controversies of the Reformation in England. For many, even those sympathetic to Newman, this was going too far. Indeed, Newman was by now persuading himself that he could no longer with integrity remain within the Church of England, and he was received into the Roman Catholic Church on 9 October 1845.

In some respects the Tractarians were inheritors of the earlier High Church tradition which, since the arrival of the Whig government in 1830, had waned in power, the influential Hackney Phalanx falling into disarray. The apostolic succession so dear to the hearts of Tractarians had been the subject of many works by high churchmen from 1760 to 1820. The Tractarians' theological views, however, set them apart from their immediate High Church predecessors, and historians still debate the origins of the Oxford Movement, seeing links with the Non-Jurors and, somewhat paradoxically, with the evangelical revival of the mid-eighteenth century. Several prominent members of the Oxford Movement had been evangelicals, including Newman. The Tractarians themselves, however, saw the eighteenth century as a period of decay for the Church of England. Somewhat artificially, they claimed a special relationship with the Caroline Divines of the previous century. In Tract 90 Newman tried to ground his views in the thought of these men, but only by quoting them in a highly selective fashion.

The Oxford Movement was concerned with more than doctrine. Holiness of life was also of great concern, and this won admiration from those who were unconvinced by the movement's claims about the Church of England within the wider church. Edward Pusey, one of the movement's leaders, led a life of great austerity and was much sought after as a spiritual guide. Attention was given to how priests might best be trained, and the first independent theological college in England was set up by Charles Marriott at Chichester in 1839. Concern for establishing the apostolic credentials of the Church of England led to a revival of interest in the Church Fathers. Pusey, with others, started translating patristic works, beginning with the Confessions of St Augustine, in a series known as the Library of the Fathers.

The leaders of the movement taught the real presence of Christ in the Eucharist, and, as the thought of the movement disseminated more widely in the church, changes in the style and setting of worship manifested themselves. Candles on the altar, for example, began to make an appearance, and the surplice began to replace the customary black preaching gown. Some church architects were inspired to design churches whose interiors provided an elaborately beautiful setting for worship. Notable amongst their number was William Butterfield (1814–1900), a brilliant example of whose work can be seen at All Saints, Margaret Street, London. The style of worship flowing from the Oxford Movement is usually referred to as 'ritualism'. Great interest was shown in a court case (1889–90) brought by the Church Association against the saintly Bishop of Lincoln, Edward King, who was accused of a number of ritualistic offences. The liturgical and architectural changes introduced by the Oxford Movement were an attempt to make visible the continuity between the Church of England and the early and medieval church. These changes were controversial because they were seen as illegal departures from the Book of Common Prayer and as leading the Church of England towards the Roman Catholic Church.

In addition to these developments in worship, some priests saw the ideals of the Oxford Movement finding expression in social action. In the Anglo-Catholic tradition there are a number of priests whose memory is honoured for having devoted their lives to parish ministry in socially deprived contexts. Chief among these is Charles Lowder (1820–80), who worked in Wapping building a new parish church, St Peter's London Docks.

The influence and development of the Oxford Movement can be traced in a number of ways. Together with an increase in *liturgical scholarship it bore fruit in the Parish Communion movement. Liturgy and Society by A. G. Herbert was a seminal work, and British liturgical scholarship is forever indebted to the work of Gregory Dix, especially his work on the development of the Eucharist, The Shape of the Liturgy. In the face of German scholarship, Pusey had taken a conservative stance towards historical criticism as it applied to the Bible, but a shift towards the acceptance of modern biblical scholarship can be seen in the publication of Lux Mundi (1889) and Essays Catholic and Critical (1926).

The Oxford Movement thus found expression in a number of ways, including doctrine, personal holiness, the training of priests, scholarly research into the Fathers, worship and social action. Underlying these expressions are a number of theological concerns which motivated the leaders and thinkers of the Oxford Movement and continue to motivate those who would call themselves Anglo-Catholics today.

It is typical of Anglo-Catholic theology to reach for continuity rather than discontinuity, and integration rather than paradox. Searching for an underlying principle for the Anglo-Catholic doctrinal style, one might identify the analogia entis, associated particularly with the medieval theologian *Thomas Aquinas. This 'principle of *analogy' claims that there is continuity between God and the world, not because the world is identical in any sense with God, but because the world as God's creation can be a vehicle of divine expression. Anglo-Catholic theology therefore tends towards a sacramental view of the world as a whole, within which would be located a sacramental understanding of the church and its worship. The instinct for continuity also finds historical expression in the importance given to tradition. The tradition of the church is understood as that historical dynamic process, led by the Holy Spirit, which keeps the church faithful to its apostolic mission in each generation and guides the church through a process of development into the truth. A classic treatment of this dynamic concept of tradition is to be found in An Essay on the Development of Christian Doctrine by Newman.

The affirmation of the continuity between God and the created order undergirds the sacramentalism typical of Anglo-Catholicism. Anglo-Catholic theology has traditionally affirmed the seven *sacraments scheme of medieval Catholicism, but since the Second Vatican Council would now see the seven sacraments themselves as acts of the church, itself understood sacramentally. The claim of Lumen Gentium, Vatican II's Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, that the church 'is in the nature of sacrament – sign and instrument, that is, of communion with God and of unity among all men' (LG 1) would find ready acceptance in Anglo-Catholic circles. Seeing the whole church in sacramental terms lies behind the view that the church is integral to the mediation of grace. The mediatorial role is not seen as apart from Christ, let alone opposed to his unique mediatorial role, but as within Christ. The classic expression of this understanding of the church is found in the notion of the totus Christus, a favourite term of St Augustine of Hippo.

The sacramental understanding of the church is reflected in the Anglo-Catholic understanding of worship. The Eucharist is the supreme act of Christian worship and for that reason might well be celebrated not only every Sunday but also every day in some Anglo-Catholic parishes. Central to the understanding of the Eucharist is a strong belief in the presence of Christ in the consecrated elements, although not to the exclusion of Christ's presence in the whole of the eucharistic gathering. The environment and accoutrements of worship are typically ordered with great care, drawing on all the worshippers' senses to promote a sense of sacramental encounter with the living God in Christ. Vestments, coloured according to the sequence of the seasons of the church's year, are worn by the priest and other assistant ministers, incense is used and a bell or gong might be sounded at various points during the saying of the eucharistic prayer. Within such a setting, the ministry of the word is not ignored, but has its place within the Eucharist, interpreting what is enacted in the sacramental action.

The continuities typical of Anglo-Catholic theology in general are found in its theology of the church. The claim of the Church of England's canons that the 'the Church of England is part of the One, Holy, Catholic and Apostolic Church' (see Canon C15) is given full weight in Anglo-Catholic theology. On this view the Church in England exists in continuity with the ancient catholic church in England. It is not an invention of the Reformation nor a re-emergence of the church of the NT after centuries of error. The retention of the three-fold order of deacon, priest and bishop at the Reformation is seen as an important sign of the continuity of the Church in England during the upheavals of that period. An Anglo-Catholic theology of the church would demonstrate a strong sense of unity between the church militant and the church triumphant, and this would find a liturgical expression in the invocation of the saints, pre-eminent among whom would be the Virgin Mary.

The leaders of the Oxford Movement had developed a branch theory to account for the Church of England's apostolic origins in a divided church. Along with the Roman Catholic Church and the Orthodox Churches, according to this theory, Anglicanism was an authentic branch of the one true church. This historic account of the place of the Anglican Church within the one church is echoed in the *ecumenical movement of today in whose *faith and order agenda Anglo-Catholic concerns have a major role to play. For Anglo-Catholics the order of the church is not a matter of indifference, especially the ordering of the ministry. Typical of its concern for continuity, in this case historical continuity, the maintenance of the apostolic ministry in the church, including the historic episcopacy of the church, is of great importance. It was Michael Ramsay in The Gospel and the Catholic Church (1936), a classic statement of Anglo-Catholic ecclesiology, who argued for understanding church order as an integral part of the essential structure of the church. The church is an extension of the incarnation and as such has a visible structure which embodies the truth of the gospel of Jesus Christ. For Anglo-Catholics, ecumenical rapprochement with another church would be on the basis of a vision of a united church, including a ministry ordered in the apostolic succession. There is a natural sympathy with the work of the Anglican-Roman Catholic International Commission (ARCIC), including a largely positive reception of its work on authority in the church (The Gift of Authority, 1999) and the role of *Mary (Mary: Grace and Hope in Christ, 2004), work which has proved controversial in the wider Anglican Church.

For Anglo-Catholics, the ordination of women to the priesthood has proved controversial. For many within the Anglo-Catholic wing, this development is unacceptable without substantial ecumenical agreement. Typically, it is argued that the Church of England has no authority on its own to make this change since the priesthood belongs to the whole church, not merely to the Anglican Church. In practical terms, while the Roman Catholic Church remains unconvinced by the validity of this change, most Anglo-Catholics would find it unacceptable.

The concern for social action within Anglo-Catholicism can be understood within the sacramental perspective. The classic expression of this was by Frank Weston, Bishop of Zanzibar, who, presiding at the 1923 Anglo-Catholic Congress, said, 'You cannot claim to worship Jesus in the Tabernacle, if you do not pity Jesus in the slums . . . It is folly – it is madness – to suppose that you can worship Jesus in the Sacraments and Jesus on the throne of glory, when you are sweating him in the souls and bodies of his children.' Notable amongst contemporary Anglo-Catholic theologians who stand in this tradition is Kenneth Leech, author of several books, including The Social God. Kenneth Leech was a founder figure of the Jubilee Group which began in 1974 as a support group for politically left-wing priests, most of whom stood in the Catholic tradition of Anglicanism. It initiated the Jubilee 2000 campaign for the alleviation of Majority World debt.

Within all traditions in the church there are differences of emphasis and disagreements, and Anglo-Catholic theology is no exception. In the matter of the ordination of women to the priesthood, for example, there are those who would see themselves as Anglo-Catholic, or Anglican Catholics, who accept this development of ministry. The organization Affirming Catholicism provides a forum for such Anglicans to meet. On the other side of the debate, the organization Forward in Faith speaks for many Anglo-Catholics opposed to the ordination of women to the priesthood. Although there are some common deep-seated theological principles to be found in Anglo-Catholic theology it would be a mistake to think of this theology as monolithic.

See also: ANGLICANISM; CHURCH; LITURGY.

Bibliography

G. Dix, The Shape of the Liturgy (London, 1945); G. Guiver, Faith in Momentum (London, 1990); A. G. Herbert, Liturgy and Society (London, 1935); K. Leech, The Social God (London, 1981); J. H. Newman, An Essay on the Development of Christian Doctrine (Notre Dame, 1989 [1845]); P. B. Nockles, The Oxford Movement in Context: Anglican High Churchmanship 1760–1857 (Cambridge, 1994); M. Ramsey, The Gospel and the Catholic Church (London, 1936).

W. S. CROFT

ANHYPOSTASIA, see HYPOSTASIS

ANIMISM

A term introduced into the discussion about the origin and nature of religion by the anthropologist E. B. Tylor (1832–1917). He used it as a synonym for religion which he defined as ‘the belief in Spiritual Beings’. This belief arose when primitive humans, in attempting to explain phenomena such as sleep, death, dreams and visions, came to the conclusion that they possessed a detachable phantom or ghost soul. Their primitive imagination then led them to attribute a similar soul to animals, plants and even inanimate objects.

According to Tylor, from this primitive reasoning, by means of general cultural influence, all forms of religion developed. As a *positivist, he also believed that animism or ‘the spiritualistic philosophy’, based as it was on a false process of reasoning, was destined to disappear before the flood of ‘materialistic philosophy’. But, though very influential for half a century, the theory was eventually superseded since it was based on the presupposition that so-called ‘contemporary primitives’ are ‘survivals’ of an actual primitive stage of human evolution. However, its influence is apparent in that, for example, the theories of primitive *monotheism of Lang (1844–1912) and Schmidt (1868–1954), the pre-animism of Marett (1866–1943) and the social theory of Durkheim were all presented as alternatives to it. Despite the fact that the theory has been superseded, the term can be usefully retained to describe a religion which is characterized by a belief in a multiplicity of spirits. It continues to be used as an umbrella term covering tribal or primal religions, in contrast with the major world faiths.

Bibliography

K. W. Bolle, ‘Animism and Animatism’, in M. Chade (ed.), The Encyclopedia of Religion, vol. 1 (New York, 1987); E. Durkheim, The Elementary Forms of the Religious Life (London, 1915); E. E. Evans-Pritchard, Theories of Primitive Religion (Oxford, 1965); G. Harvey, Animism: Respecting the Living World (London, 2005); A. Lang, The Making of Religion (London, 1898); R. R. Marett, The Threshold of Religion (London, 1914); W. Schmidt, The Origin and Growth of Religion (London, 1931); E. B. Tylor, Primitive Culture (London, 1871); E. B. Tylor, Mind 2, 1877, pp. 141–156.

D. A. HUGHES

ANNIHILATIONISM

Annihilationism holds that those who go to hell will suffer final destruction rather than eternal conscious punishment. As such, it diverges from the traditional teaching of the church that hell entails endless torment for the unsaved. Until quite recently the greatest challenge to this traditional view came from *universalism. However, since the 1980s support has grown for annihilationism, particularly among evangelical Christians who reject universalism, but who question the traditional view on exegetical, moral and pastoral grounds.

In common with traditionalists, annihilationists affirm a decisive division of saved and condemned persons at the last judgment. Yet they argue that the suffering of those condemned must eventually cease, since the perpetuation of that suffering, and of hell itself, would be inconsistent with God’s plan to restore the cosmos to perfect peace and harmony (Eph. 1:9–10; Rev. 21:1–4). Whereas traditionalists characteristically stress that rejection of an eternal God deserves eternal reprobation, annihilationists highlight biblical indications that divine judgment might be graded in severity, and that this might correspond to varied lengths and degrees of finite punishment for the unsaved, rather than undifferentiated eternal punishment for them all (Luke 10:12; 12:47–48).

Annihilationism was espoused in the early fourth century by Arnobius of Sicca, but it was more generally anathematized by the Second Council of Constantinople in 553 and again by the Lateran Council in 1513. It resurfaced among sectarian groups like *Socinians and Christadelphians, but by the later 1800s had gained the support of more mainstream Christian theologians like Edward White and Henry Constable.

While evangelicals remain largely opposed to annihilationism, certain evangelical scholars have sympathized with or propounded it in more recent times, including Edward Fudge, John Wenham, Clark *Pinnock, Stephen Travis, David Powys and John Stott. Stott tentatively identified himself with the annihilationist position in 1988, and in doing so prompted a debate which is ongoing, and which has featured firm restatements of the traditionalist case from J. I. *Packer, D. A. Carson, Kendall Harmon and others. In 2000, the UK Evangelical Alliance published a report on the matter, which concluded that annihilationism was a 'significant minority evangelical view' whose divergence from the traditional position should be regarded as a secondary rather than primary doctrinal issue.

Although annihilationism technically concerns the nature of hell as such, in practice it is closely linked to the doctrine of 'conditional immortality'. This posits that the concept of the 'immortality of the soul', which typically underpins the traditional view of hell, owes more to Platonist thought than to biblical teaching. Indeed, rather than viewing the human soul as inherently immortal, conditionalists argue that it acquires immortality as a condition of *justification by grace through faith (see Immortality; Soul, origin of). Those not justified will thereby cease to exist, so manifesting their mortality apart from Christ. Romans 6:23 is often adduced here: 'The wages of sin is death, but the gift of God is eternal life.' While Socinians and Christadelphians equate 'death' in this context with the end of earthly life, mainline conditionalists relate it to the annihilation of the impenitent only after they have been resurrected, judged, and punished in hell for some time.

Annihilationists emphasize images of destruction and extinction in biblical eschatology, and interpret divine retribution in this context. In particular, they argue that the term apollumi ('destroy') in the NT commonly implies the end of existence rather than the perpetuation of torment. So the plain sense of Jesus' warning that God 'can destroy both soul and body in hell' (Matt. 10:28) is set against Greek notions of innate immortality, and against traditionalist claims that apollumi and its synonyms can connote a process of endless 'perishing'. Similarly, whereas traditionalists relate the 'unquenchable fire' and 'undying worm' of Mark 9:48 to the eternal punishment of individuals, annihilationists argue that while the worm and the fire themselves may be everlasting, the effect they have on particular sinners may yet be terminal. Moreover, whereas Jesus in Matt. 25:46 appears to draw a straight parallel between 'eternal life' and 'eternal punishment' by applying the same adjective (aionios) to both states, annihilationists suggest that if the punishment in question is a punishment of destruction, it would again be eternal in its overall effect rather than in the existence of every condemned sinner. Here, as in Rev. 14:11 and 20:10, annihilationists also argue that aionios and its variants might well be read qualitatively rather than quantitatively – that is, as defining the intensity of punishment rather than its specific duration.

While some continue to insist that annihilationism is *heresy, it is at least clear that Scripture depicts the fate of the unsaved in terms normally associated with destruction, as well as in terms of protracted punishment and irrevocable separation from God. Indeed, on occasion all three concepts coalesce in a single verse (e.g. 2 Thess. 1:9). Given the serious challenges involved in the reconciliation of these concepts, it seems likely that having established itself as a prominent alternative to the traditional view of hell, annihilationism will remain a significant feature of theological discourse on the 'last things' for some time to come.

See also: ESCHATOLOGY, JUDGMENT OF GOD.

Bibliography

N. M. de S. Cameron (ed.), Universalism and the Doctrine of Hell (Carlisle, 1992); D. L.

Edwards and J. R. W. Stott, Essentials: A Liberal-Evangelical Dialogue (London, 1988); E. W. Fudge, The Fire That Consumes: The Biblical Case for Conditional Immortality (Carlisle, rev. edn, 1994); D. Hilborn (ed.), The Nature of Hell: A Report by the Evangelical Alliance Commission on Unity and Truth among Evangelicals (ACUTE) (Carlisle, 2001); C. W. Morgan and R. A. Peterson (eds.), Hell under Fire: Modern Scholarship Reinvents Eternal Punishment (Grand Rapids, 2004); C. H. Pinnock and R. C. Brow, Unbounded Love: A Good News Theology for the 21st Century (Carlisle, 1994); D. J. Powys, 'Hell': A Hard Look at a Hard Question (Carlisle, 1997); G. Rowell, Hell and the Victorians (Oxford, 1974).

D. H. K. HILBORN

ANOMOEANS, see ARIANISM

ANONYMOUS CHRISTIANITY

A theological concept developed by Karl Rahner in order to explain the possibility of salvation without explicit Christian faith, which modern *Roman Catholic theology has widely acknowledged. As Rahner expounds it, the idea follows from some of the most basic themes of his theology. He holds that all human persons, in their pre-reflective experience, are orientated towards God, and that God gives himself in *grace to all humans, in the centre of their existence, as an offer which can be accepted or rejected. Thus God is always and everywhere present in human experience, and the possibility of a saving relationship with God is universal, corresponding to God's universal will for human salvation (see *Universalism). This universal revelation of God and the salvific experience of God which makes it possible are pre-reflective, implicit in human experience, before they are understood explicitly and conceptually. The religions of the world are more or less successful attempts to make this 'transcendental' experience of God explicit in reflective forms and social, historical embodiments. But salvation is possible not only within the non-Christian religions, but also for *atheists, who do not thematize their transcendental experience in religious terms at all.

For Rahner, the specifically Christian *revelation of God is his 'categorical' revelation: his revelation of himself in explicit, historical forms. It is the explicit form of his universal, transcendental revelation. Consequently, the salvation which is universally available is essentially the same as salvation within the Christian church. Explicit Christian faith is the explicit form of the implicit faith which is possible without any knowledge of the Christian revelation. Those who are saved through such implicit faith, Rahner calls 'anonymous Christians'. They are anonymous Christians because they do not have explicit Christian faith, but they are anonymous Christians, because Rahner retains the doctrine that there is no salvation apart from Christ. Their implicit faith must be related to Christ.

How is this possible? Jesus Christ is the complete and definitive expression of God's self-communication to humanity and the human acceptance of this. He is therefore the supreme and unique fulfilment of that possibility of salvific relationship with God which is everywhere present in the human spirit. As such, he is the goal towards which the faith even of the anonymous Christian is implicitly orientated. Rahner is able to claim that the anonymous Christian is saved because of Jesus Christ.

Rahner's concept of anonymous Christianity has been very influential in Roman Catholic thought, but it has also been strongly criticized by some other Roman Catholic theologians. Hans Urs von *Balthasar charged Rahner with relativizing the biblical revelation of God. Hans *Küng, while agreeing that non-Christians can be saved, thinks that the idea of 'anonymous Christianity' is offensive to non-Christians and evades the real challenge of the world religions by pre-empting the dialogue before it has begun.

A full appraisal of Rahner's proposal would need to examine the understanding of transcendental experience and Christian salvation on which it rests. It is arguable that Rahner's whole transcendental approach to theology gives insufficient weight to the historical nature of all human experience, and therefore to the historical character of the knowledge of God available through Jesus Christ.

See also: CHRISTIANITY AND OTHER RELIGIONS.

Bibliography

P. Conway and F. Ryan (eds.), Karl Rahner: Theologian for the Twenty-First Century (Oxford, 2010); K. Kilby, The SPCK Introduction to Karl Rahner (London, 2007); D. Marmian and M. E. Hines (eds.), The Cambridge Companion to Karl Rahner (Cambridge, 2005); K. Rahner, Theological Investigations (London, 1961–81), vol. V, ch. 6; vol. VI, ch. 23; vol. IX, ch. 9; vol. XII, ch. 9; vol. XV1, chs. 4, 13; vol. XVII, ch. 5; vol. XVIII, ch. 17; idem, Foundations of Christian Faith (London, 1978).

R. J. BAUCKHAM

ANSELM (c. 1033–1109)

Born in Aosta in Italy, at the age of twenty-six Anselm became a *Benedictine monk, entering the abbey of Bec in Normandy. In 1063 he was made prior, in succession to Lanfranc (c. 1005–89), and fifteen years later abbot, a post he held for a further fifteen years (1078–93). He then again succeeded Lanfranc, this time as Archbishop of Canterbury, for sixteen years, until his death in 1109. Anselm sought to uphold the pope's rights in England and to maintain the independence of the English church from the king. As a result, most of his time as archbishop was spent on the continent, in exile.

Anselm was the first truly great theologian of the medieval Western church and is seen by some as the founder of *scholasticism. He clearly held to the supreme authority of Scripture and was thoroughly *Augustinian in his theology. But whereas most theologians at that time relied heavily on citing traditional authorities (such as Augustine and the Bible), Anselm composed highly original works based on rational argument. It is in this respect that he was the forerunner of scholasticism. He allowed philosophy a significant, though limited, role in his theology, following Augustine's method of 'faith seeking understanding'. The content of the Christian faith is given by *revelation, not by philosophy. But believing theologians can then seek, by the use of reason, to understand more fully that which they believe. Reason can thus show the rationality and inner coherence of the Christian faith.

This method Anselm pursued in his three major works. In the Monologion (1077), originally called An Example of Meditation on the Grounds of Faith, he offers a 'proof' for the existence of God. The fact that we can discern degrees of goodness means that there is an absolute good, by which we measure it. This good is alone good of itself and is supremely good. Being supremely good, it is also supremely great. There is therefore a supremely good and supremely great being, the highest of all existing beings: God. Anselm's argument was not original, Augustine having argued similarly. It depends for its force on the 'realist' assumption that the universal is more real than particular manifestations of it (see *Nominalism). Thus the (*Platonic) idea of goodness is more real than the particular manifestation of it in the life of a good person. Anselm's apologetic would have had force in an age where Platonic realism was widely accepted, but carries little conviction today.

The following year Anselm broke new ground with the publication of his Proslogion, originally called Faith Seeking Understanding. Starting as a believer, he seeks to understand what he already believes. 'I am not seeking to understand in order to believe, but I believe in order to understand. For this too I believe: that unless I believe, I shall not understand.' In this work Anselm presents his famous ontological argument for the existence of God. God is defined as 'that, than which nothing greater can be conceived' or, to put it more simply, 'the greatest conceivable being'. This being must exist. Were he not to exist, he would be inferior to an identical being that did exist and thus would not be 'the greatest conceivable being'. Indeed, the 'greatest conceivable being' exists so certainly that it cannot even be conceived not to exist. For the mind can conceive of a being which cannot be conceived not to exist and such a being is greater than a being which can be conceived not to exist. Therefore there is a 'greatest conceivable being' that cannot even be conceived not to exist. Anselm identifies this being with the Christian God.

Anselm has, with some justice, been accused of attempting to define God into existence. His approach represents the supreme confidence of the eleventh-century West in the power of reason. Anselm considered that his argument should suffice to persuade even the 'fool' who denies God's existence (Ps. 14:1). But the validity of his argument was immediately questioned by a monk called Gaunilo, who wrote On Behalf of the Fool, to which Anselm wrote a Reply. The debate about the validity of the ontological argument continues to rage and shows no signs of abating.

Proslogion was of particular significance for one modern theologian: Karl *Barth. In his Fides Quaerens Intellectum (Faith Seeking Understanding, 1931), Barth analysed Anselm's method of 'faith seeking understanding' and found in it a precedent for his own approach to theology in the twentieth century.

Anselm's most ambitious work was his Cur Deus Homo (Why God Became Man), written in the 1090s. It is presented in the form of a dialogue between Anselm and Boso (one of his monks at Bec). Here Anselm, like the *apologists of the early church, faces the charge that it is unfitting and degrading for God to humble himself by becoming man and dying to save us. This charge was made by Jews and Muslims, and in Anselm's time there were regular debates between Jews and Christians. Anselm offers reasons why the *incarnation and *cross are in fact both necessary and fitting (see *Atonement). But this does not mean that he is offering a *natural theology, building theology purely on the basis of reason. Here, as in the Proslogion, his method is one of 'faith seeking understanding'. Having believed the doctrines of the incarnation and the cross, he uses reason to understand why they are true. He suspends not faith itself, but the appeal to faith. But this does not mean that Anselm is a *fideist, writing theology simply from the position of the believer and for believers. He does set out to convince the unbeliever, by arguing remoto Christo, as if we knew nothing about Christ. He starts, not with no presuppositions, but by assuming the existence of God as *Trinity, together with God's character, the nature of humanity and its sin against God. He then seeks to show, by necessary reasons, that given these presuppositions the incarnation and the cross are absolutely necessary, the only possible course of action open to God. Thus he seeks to show the unbeliever that the incarnation and the cross, far from being unfitting and degrading for God, are the only reasonable course of action open to him, granted a Christian view of God and humanity.

Anselm argues that *sin, understood as a failure to render due obedience to God, dishonours him. God, as the upholder of justice and law, cannot simply forgive, but must restore his lost honour. This can happen in one of only two ways: either a suitable satisfaction is offered to God, or he must restore his honour by punishing humanity. But the latter course is not open to God, as human beings are needed to replace the fallen angels. (This last point, taken from Augustine, does not carry much weight today, but there are other reasons why God cannot simply abandon the human race.) Therefore, sinful humanity must restore God's honour by offering him a suitable satisfaction. But here God faces a dilemma. It is man who owes the satisfaction, but only God is able to pay it (which Anselm argues by showing the seriousness of sin). The need is for a God-man, hence the incarnation. As man, Christ owes God the obedience of a perfect life. But as a perfect man, he need not die. His death earns him merit and serves as a suitable satisfaction for human sins, hence the cross.

Anselm's case is impressive, but not without its weaknesses. He has been criticized on a number of grounds, some of which amount to blaming him for addressing his own particular context, where, for instance, talk of honour and satisfaction was familiar both because of the *penitential system in the church and because of feudal concepts in society. He has with some justice been criticized for locating the salvific work of Christ exclusively in the cross, neglecting the life of Christ and his resurrection and ascension. But it must be remembered that his aim was precisely to give reasons why the cross, the great scandal to unbelievers, was necessary. Anselm also went beyond the usual Christian claim that the cross was necessary (i.e. God had to do something) to claim that it was absolutely necessary (i.e. God could not have done anything else, given the situation). Here again he reflects eleventh-century confidence in the power of reason. But the attractiveness of Anselm's case is that it is very flexible. His basic case, suitably modified, makes a powerful argument today that the incarnation and cross are indeed fitting and reasonable. A brief summary of his argument is found in his Meditation on Human Redemption.

Apart from these three, Anselm wrote a number of other significant works, including:

Truth: like the two following works, a dialogue written between 1080 and 1086. It explores the definition of truth, an unresolved issue from the Monologion, and defines it as 'a rectitude perceptible by mind alone'. Justice is 'rectitude of will preserved of its own sake'.

Freedom of Choice: a dialogue which explores how rational creatures are free to choose and defines freedom of choice as 'the power to preserve rectitude of will for its own sake'.

The Fall of the Devil: a dialogue concerning the origin of evil when Satan lost the righteousness in which he was created. Satan opted for his happiness above righteousness and so lost happiness; the good angels opted for righteousness above happiness and were rewarded with perfect happiness. Anselm follows Augustine in seeing evil as the absence of good, just as darkness is the absence of light.

The Procession of the Holy Spirit: a record of his contribution to the Council of Bari in 1098, where Latin and Greek theologians discussed the credal filioque clause. Anselm defended it on the ground of the symmetry in the relations of the three persons of the Trinity.

De Concordia: Anselm's last major work, in which he argues for the compatibility of God's foreknowledge, predestination and grace with human freedom. God's foreknowledge and predestination are not incompatible with human freedom when what he foreknows or predestines is that we shall freely will to do certain things.

Anselm's aim in his writings was to show how reasonable *faith is, rather than to offer a strict proof of it. The beauty of the inner harmony of the Christian faith gives joy to the believer, who sees the accord of faith and reason. Unbelievers' objections (e.g. that it is degrading for God to have become man) are met, and they are pointed to the truth of the Christian message. Anselm had considerable confidence in the power of reason to show the rationality of Christian beliefs, a confidence that was to be progressively eroded over the following four centuries.

See also: APOLOGETICS; FAITH AND REASON.

Bibliography

Works: F. S. Schmitt (ed.), PL 158–59 and Opera Omnia (Edinburgh, 1946–61); ET J. Hopkins and H. Richardson (eds.), Complete Works (London and Toronto & New York, 1974–76); B. Davies and G. R. Evans (eds.), Anselm of Canterbury: The Major Works (Oxford, 1998).

Studies: G. R. Evans, Anselm and Talking about God (Oxford, 1978); G. R. Evans, Anselm (London, 2005 [1989]); D. S. Hogg, Anselm of Canterbury: The Beauty of Theology (Aldershot and Burlington, 2004); J. Hopkins, A Companion to the Study of St Anselm (Minneapolis, 1972); J. McIntyre, St Anselm and his Critics: A Re-Interpretation of the Cur Deus Homo (Edinburgh and London, 1954); R. W. Southern, Saint Anselm: A Portrait in a Landscape (Cambridge, 1990).

A. N. S. LANE

ANTHROPOLOGY

The word 'anthropology' means, by derivation, the study (logos) of humanity (anthropos), and usually refers to the related sciences of physical or biological anthropology (belonging to the natural sciences) and cultural or social anthropology (belonging to the social sciences). But the term is also used to refer to an area of Christian theology which may be more strictly designated as theological anthropology, often referred to in the past as the 'doctrine of man' and now, with recent developments in usage, as the 'doctrine of humanity'. This study is an integral part of theology, but it cannot neglect the question of how the Christian understanding of humanity relates to the view of humanity taken in the natural and social sciences.

Humanity in the OT

OT scholarship over the last century has helped us to shake off the longstanding tendency among Christians to read the Hebrew Scriptures through the interpretative framework of our Hellenistic heritage. Whereas traditional Christian theology has worked with a Greek *dualism differentiating soul and body as two different substances, and has often been highly individualistic, a more authentic understanding of the Hebrew view has been recovered in which each human being is understood to be a psychosomatic unity and humanity is viewed as corporate and not simply a collection of individuals.

The corporate solidarity of the race is to be seen in the use of the word 'flesh' (basar). It is frequently used to refer to the human race as a whole, as for example in Isa. 40: 'And the glory of the LORD shall be revealed, and all flesh shall see it together' (v. 5, RSV). The whole human race is of a common stock so that, quite contrary to the individualism of modern Western thought, the basic unit of humanity is not the individual, but the family or tribe or nation. All humanity is a corporate whole, sharing the same flesh. Moreover, 'flesh' means humanity in its weakness; we are transient and subject to decay and mortality, perishing like the plants: 'All flesh is grass, and all its beauty is like the flower of the field. The grass withers, the flower fades when the breath of the LORD blows upon it; surely the people is grass' (vv. 6–7, RSV).

The antithesis between 'flesh' and 'spirit' is subtly different then from that in Hellenistic thought in which the realm of the flesh is the realm of constant change and activity, while the realm of the spirit is the transcendent realm of unchanging eternal calm, so that to be 'spirit' is to be in some sense divine. In OT thinking, the flesh is weak and inert, while the Spirit (ruach) of God is the source of life and movement (see Isa. 31:3). This weak and mortal condition of human flesh is linked with the breakdown in humanity's relationship with God recounted in the narrative of Gen. 2 and 3 (esp. 3:3). But while humanity as 'flesh' is weak and mortal, and indeed inert, without the breathing 'Spirit' (ruach) of God, it is not evil as in the extreme *Gnostic versions of Hellenism.

Within that context of humanity as corporate, we may understand the OT view of each human being as a psychosomatic unity. The adam was formed by the Lord God out of the adamah (dust) according to Gen. 2:7, and it was when God breathed the breath of life into his nostrils that he became a living soul (nephesh). Clearly, then, the nephesh is not a pre-existing eternal divine substance, and the translation 'soul' is somewhat misleading if interpreted in that Hellenistic way. Rather, the implication is that the body formed from the mud came alive, that is, became a living being. The human being is therefore 'not so much an embodied soul as an ensouled body'. Hebrew psychology thinks of the 'heart' (leb) not just as the centre of the emotions, but as the seat of the intellect and will, and human motivation is physically based in the liver and bowels and blood. With no concept of the immortal soul, there is little or no hope in the early parts of the OT for life after death except as shadowy figures half-existing in the pit or sheol (see Job 10:2–21; Pss 6:5; 88; 89:48; Isa. 14: 9–11).

Humanity in the NT

The NT writers inherit the hope of resurrection which appeared in the later books of the OT and became widespread in Second Temple Judaism. But the difference for them originated in their belief that 'the Word became flesh' in Jesus, who raised our corporate mortal humanity immortal in his *resurrection as the 'firstfruits' (1 Cor. 15:20). Their thinking about the doctrine of Christ (*Christology) as the Son of God who became truly human therefore began to influence their understanding of what it is to be human. While they also inherited from the OT the view of the human being as a psychosomatic unity, they nevertheless were part of the Greco-Roman culture with its Hellenistic belief in the immortality of the soul. Also, in the light of the resurrection of their Lord, they had to account for the continuity between the mortal body and the resurrection body. Paul does not call that continuing reality a 'soul' in his discussion of this in 2 Cor. 5: 1–10, but clearly there is a continuity of personal identity. And yet the body (soma) is not an appendage to an eternal *soul: a human being does not have, but is, his or her body. Body (soma) and soul (psyche) are two ways of referring to the essential person, one referring to the physical dimension, and the other to the intellectual, relational, personal dimension. Paul rejects the idea of existing as a disembodied spirit: his clear expectation is the resurrection of the body and the life to come as a whole human being in the new creation. While NT anthropology is less monistic than that in the OT, it still assumes the psychosomatic unity of the human being.

Theological development

The Christian theologians of the first five or six centuries did not develop 'anthropology' as a distinct doctrine, but their understanding of what it means to be human can be seen in their debates about Christology. In the *Apollinarian debate, both sides assumed the generally *Platonist anthropology of their culture. *Docetism (that Christ only appeared to have a body) had already been ruled out, but assuming that the soul was a distinct entity, they differentiated the psyche (Lat. anima), a principle which gave movement (animation) and which was also found in 'animals', from the nous (Lat. mens), that is, the mind or rational soul. The teaching of Apollinarius that the Son of God did not assume a human mind was rejected as *heresy.

The phrase which appears in Gen. 1:26–27, '*image of God', is ignored in the rest of the OT and refers to Christ in the NT (2 Cor. 4:4; Col. 1:15, but see also 1 Cor. 11:7 and Col. 3:10). But it became significant for the Fathers (see *Patristic theology). *Irenaeus distinguished between the 'image' (imago) which we cannot lose without ceasing to be human and the 'likeness' (similitudo) into which we are called to grow. *Athanasius speaks of Christ as the image of God; but as images of the Image, who is the *Logos of God, we were created to be rational. Only in the *knowledge of God, therefore, restored through his incarnation, can we truly reflect him.

*Augustine wrestled with anthropological questions – the *fall and original *sin, *grace, *predestination and the freedom of the *will. He developed a fuller analysis of human psychology on the basis of the view that it was the rational human soul (not the body) which was the imago dei, and that therefore we could gain some grasp of the doctrine of the Trinity by contemplating the interaction of memory, understanding and will within the unity of the human mind. He developed the doctrine of human sinfulness already common to the Fathers of East and West, by teaching that ‘original sin’ (peccatum originale), which all human beings inherited, included both a share in Adam’s original guilt (although that was washed away in baptism) and the ‘disease’ of original sin as a condition of sinful self-centred desire (concupiscentia) which remained in us as long as we were in the body.

Medieval theologians developed the notion derived from *Plato and *Aristotle that different ‘faculties’ could be differentiated within the soul; this survives today in popular speech which differentiates the activities of the mind or intellect, the will, the heart and the conscience. The *Reformers debated how far the imago dei had been destroyed by the fall. Calvin wrestled with the paradox that while in a wider sense, humanity mirrors the glory of God as all creation does, yet in a narrower sense, the imago dei is so totally perverted by sin that there is no true saving knowledge of God apart from the grace which has come to us in Christ. He emphasized that our only true knowledge of ourselves comes in the light of the knowledge of God which we have within the relationship which he has re-established in grace through Jesus Christ.

The modern era

The Catholic philosopher, René *Descartes, revitalized the ancient Platonist division between soul and body, making a fundamental distinction between the soul as res cogitans and the body as res extensa. Modern Christians have therefore tended to assume the Hellenistic distinction between the immortal soul and the mortal body, and often continued to think of the hereafter as the disembodied life of the soul in heaven. Some even debated whether one should think of a dichotomy (body and soul) or a trichotomy (spirit, soul and body; cf.

1 Thess. 5:23). But this whole dualistic anthropology was attacked by the philosopher Gilbert Ryle (1900–76) as ‘the ghost in the machine’ and seemed to be quite out of step with the development of modern psychology. At the same time, some biblical scholars took the view that dualism was not the anthropology of the OT nor even of the NT. Oscar *Cullmann, for example, put this starkly in Immortality of the Soul or Resurrection of the Dead? (1956).

Contemporary theological anthropology has to be aware of philosophical discussion, notably, for example, the highly individualistic approach of *existentialism with its suspicion of notions of a common human ‘nature’ as depersonalizing. But most of the challenges to develop new thinking come from the sciences (see *Science and theology). The establishing of some form of Darwinian evolution as the accepted position of biology and other life and earth sciences requires theologians and apologists to refute the popular notion that this invalidates the Christian understanding of the creation and nature of human beings (see *Adam). Current thinking among some biblical scholars and theologians tries to relate the biblical view of the human being with the psychosomatic view taken in modern experimental psychology and particularly with developments in neuroscience. There is still, however, a strong school of thought that the concept of the soul, and therefore some kind of dualism, is necessary (Richard Swinburne, John W. Cooper, William Hasker). In contrast, others argue for ‘emergent monism’ (Philip Clayton) or ‘nonreductive physicalism’ (Nancey Murphy and Warren Brown). Murphy and Brown accept that it is not necessary to postulate the existence of a distinct metaphysical entity such as the soul or spirit to account for human behaviour or to understand what it is to be human. But they oppose the ‘reductive materialism’ of scientists such as Francis Crick or B. F. Skinner, who allege that human life and personhood are ‘nothing but’ physical and chemical events.

Christian theology as a whole has vigorously opposed *racism. But the advent of *feminism prompted the question of whether theological anthropology is too male oriented, and led to more thought on the differentiation of the two sexes. At one level, this has prompted debate on the role of women in leadership in the church, but at a wider level the demand for equality has posed questions about the traditional understanding of the roles of men and women in marriage and society (see *Family). Theological anthropology today has to develop an understanding of what it is to be human which is not dominated by a merely male perspective.

The increasing cultural dominance of secular humanism in Western nations is a challenge to Christian theological anthropology today to show that the Christian faith is in fact the true *humanism. While the belief that the human race is merely the result of a fortuitous confluence of blind physical forces gives no strong basis for placing high value on humanity, the Christian belief that human beings were created in the image of God, and that the One who is the Image became human and shared in human death in order to bring us to the eternal life of the new creation, places the highest possible value on the human race.

Bibliography

K. Barth, CD, III, 2; J. Calvin, Institutes, 1, xv; II, i–v; W. S. Brown (ed.), Whatever Happened to the Soul? Scientific and Theological Portraits of Human Nature (Minneapolis, 1998); M. Cortez, Embodied Souls: Ensouled Bodies (London, 2008); M. Elliott (ed.), The Dynamics of Human Life (Carlisle, 2001); J. B. Green, What about the Soul? Neuroscience and Christian Anthropology (Nashville, 2004); idem, Body, Soul and Human Life: The Nature of Humanity in the Bible (Milton Keynes and Grand Rapids, 2008); W. Pannenberg, Anthropology in Theological Perspective (London, 1985); H. Schwarz, The Human Being: A Theological Anthropology (Grand Rapids, 2013); C. Sherlock, The Doctrine of Humanity (Downers Grove, 1996); H. W. Wolff, The Anthropology of the Old Testament (ET, Philadelphia, 1983).

T. A. NOBLE

ANTHROPOMORPHISM

Anthropomorphism refers to descriptions of *God's being, actions and emotions (more properly, anthropopathism) in human terms. God is invisible, infinite and without a body, but human characteristics are frequently ascribed to God in order to communicate information about his nature or acts.

Illustrations abound in Scripture. Though God is without a body, his acts are said to be the result of 'his mighty arm' (Exod. 15:16).

Though God is without gender, he is characterized in masculine (father, shepherd, king), and occasionally feminine (compassionate mother) terms. Besides an arm, God is pictured as having a face (Ps. 27:8), hand (Pss 10:12; 88:5), finger (Deut. 9:10) and back (Exod. 33:23). God talks, walks, laughs, weeps; he is jealous, furious and caring.

Anthropomorphisms are poetic symbols or, more particularly, metaphors for divine attributes which would otherwise be indescribable. The Scriptures utilize anthropomorphic language, condescending to the limited abilities of men and women to understand God's nature and ways.

Danger enters when anthropomorphisms are taken literally rather than metaphorically, and people attribute a body to the invisible Creator (e.g. the Audians of the fourth and fifth centuries). On the other hand, rejection of anthropomorphic language leads to scepticism and *agnosticism, since God cannot be otherwise discussed. Other misconceptions stem from the belief that biblical anthropomorphisms are an expression of a primitive religion or that biblical religion conceived of God in man's image (so *Feuerbach).

The Bible provides divine justification for anthropomorphic language. It is full of such language, though it recognizes the limitations of anthropomorphisms (Isa. 40:18; 57:15; John 1:8). The propriety of anthropomorphic language is supported further by the recognition that man (see *Anthropology) is made in the *image of God and that God himself took on human form in the person of Jesus Christ.

See also (and for bibliography): ACCOMMODATION; ANALOGY; RELIGIOUS LANGUAGE.

T. LONGMAN III

ANTICHRIST

The term (Gk Anti-christos) is found exclusively in the epistles of John in both singular and plural forms (1 John 2:18, 22; 4:3; 2 John 7) where he clearly assumes his readers will be familiar with the concept. Here it most likely refers to an opponent or opponents of Christ. The term can, however, also refer to one who falsely claims to be the Christ, and this view has become more popular, especially since the nineteenth century.

Within Jewish apocalyptic writings there is the anticipation of a personification of evil in a political ruler who would claim to be divine and lead the Gentile nations in opposition to God's people. Daniel's prophecy was most likely fulfilled by Antiochus Epiphanes in 168 BC who set up the 'abomination that causes desolation' in the temple and sparked the Maccabean Revolt (Dan. 8:9–12, 23–25; 11:21–45; cf. Mark 13:14). NT writers develop this apocalyptic expectation of an evil person under the control of Satan who will oppose Christ, deceive humanity and persecute Christians. He is seen as appearing in the final period of history, prior to the final defeat of evil and the establishment of God's universal *kingdom.

The concept of the Antichrist is multifaceted and has developed in three different if not mutually exclusive ways in Christian history.

In the patristic and medieval periods the idea of a personal and individual Antichrist was popular, and detailed accounts of his career emerged. Some saw this person as a political figure, while for others he would be a false religious leader. The Roman Emperor Nero was a popular candidate. After he committed suicide in AD 68, rumours developed that he had not died but escaped. *Chrysostom represented those who believed Nero would be resurrected (redivivus) and continue his evil reign. The Didache, on the other hand, predicted that the Deceiver would appear in the last days, performing miracles, persecuting believers and claiming to be the Son of God. Hippolytus, writing in the third century, combined both expectations, predicting the rise of a political tyrant who would also be the false Jewish Messiah.

While the Reformers rejected this idea, it nevertheless gained renewed popularity in the early nineteenth century, particularly through the writings of Edward *Irving and J. N. *Darby, and became an article of faith within *Dispensationalism. This view is known as 'futurist'. In the twentieth century, through the influence of the Scofield Reference Bible and apocalyptic writings of Hal Lindsey and Tim LaHaye especially, the idea of a personal Antichrist has become normative within *Pentecostalism and American Evangelicalism. Speculation as to the identity of the Antichrist has ranged from Napoleon III to Mussolini, Mikhail Gorbachev, Ronald Reagan and Saddam Hussein.

During the sixteenth century, Protestants developed the idea that the Antichrist represented a specific historical entity, not an individual. This is known as the 'ideal' or 'symbolic' view. Given its strong opposition to the Reformation, the Roman papacy came to be seen as the embodiment of the Antichrist by leaders like John *Wycliffe, Martin *Luther, John *Calvin, Thomas *Cranmer and John *Wesley, as well as the authors of the *Westminster Confession and 1689 Baptist Confession of Faith.

More generally, the Antichrist has been seen as an ageless principle of evil opposition to Christ existing throughout history which manifests itself in the form of individuals and movements which set themselves up against God and deceive or persecute his people. Polycarp, for example, in the second century, held that the Antichrist was the spirit of *heresy. He taught that those who denied the incarnation such as the *Docetists were of the Antichrist, as were those who denied the resurrection, whom he termed the firstborn of Satan. Irenaeus, also in the second century, instead equated the Antichrist with the Roman Empire (Lateinos). This view is not incompatible with a final embodiment or personification of evil in the future, but the emphasis is upon the spiritual reality of evil in the heavenly realms (Eph. 6:11–12).

See also: APOCALYPTIC; DEVIL AND DEMONS; EVIL.

Bibliography

C. Hill, Antichrist in Seventeenth-Century England (London, 1971); G. C. Jenks, The Origins and Early Development of the Antichrist Myth, BZNW 59 (Berlin, 1991); B. McGinn, Antichrist: Two Thousand Years of the Human Fascination with Evil (San Francisco, 1994); D. F. Watson, 'Antichrist', in DLNTD.

S. SIZER

ANTINOMIANISM

Martin *Luther used this term to criticize the teachings of Johannes Agricola, who was thought to have extended the doctrine of *justification by faith beyond the idea that good works do not contribute to salvation, to the notion that acts of disobedience cannot deprive one of salvation. It was feared that this changed legitimate Christian assurance of forgiveness to presumption. The word is often used pejoratively, and etymologically suggests an opposition ('anti') to law ('nomos'), so that an antinomian is one who opposes *law. However, since it is used in several contexts in relation to different theological topics, it is necessary to assess precisely what criticism is being made in a particular context. For this purpose, we may distinguish two ranges of question. An antinomian may be 'opposed' to 'law', but: what kind of opposition? and, what kind of law?

Kinds of opposition

One species of opposition argues against the idea that obeying biblical laws contributes to salvation. Legal obedience, the argument continues, is necessary as a matter of obedient discipleship (for a sovereign God has issued laws), but not for *salvation, which is by grace alone. This position is standard in *Reformed and other Protestant theologies. Since disobedience is not a matter of indifference in such systems, such Christians typically argue that if this position could be called antinomian, it is because Christian soteriology (salvation by grace alone) entails it, and is an innocent antinomianism. In fact, the argument runs, those castigating such antinomianism may be themselves in error in upholding synergistic accounts of salvation (such as *Semi-Pelagianism or even *Pelagianism).

A further issue in this specific area is what consequences are envisaged for disobedience. Traditional Reformed Christians would insist that true Christians persevere to final salvation in their calling (*perseverance of the saints), although they do commit sin after conversion (1 John 1:8). Disobedience may not therefore mean losing one's salvation, but may indeed signify one is not, and never has been, a true Christian. Other sanctions may continue to apply, such as church discipline, while the proper response to post-conversion sin is repentance (1 John 1:9). This would also be accepted by Christians who do not accept perseverance of the saints in the sense outlined above.

Other kinds of opposition to the Bible's laws may go further, suggesting that God applies no sanction or penalty to disobedience. Arguably, Henri Nouwen approaches this with his meditations on the prodigal son, to the effect that God does not punish sin, because disobedience carries its own punishment. Here, antinomianism relates to an issue in the doctrine of salvation, deliverance from God's penal *wrath.

Kinds of law

Different views are held over which laws currently bind Christians. Traditional distinctions have been drawn in the biblical material between moral, civil and ceremonial law (e.g. Article 7 of the *Thirty-Nine Articles), and most Christian theologies would hold that, for example, the OT laws of sacrifice (ceremonial) have been fulfilled in Christ (Heb. 10:12). Moral injunctions (e.g. do not bear false witness) continue to bind us, but differences arise over issues such as Sabbath observance. Different views of which biblical laws bind Christians today certainly can arise because one party is deeply antinomian, but may equally arise from different detailed interpretations within a framework where both parties accept that moral laws are binding. Antinomianism scarcely aptly describes this latter case.

Antinomianism may also pertain to laws of human origin, such as laws of state or church. For some, since state or church have a delegated authority from God (e.g. Rom. 13:1; 1 Thess. 5:12), they possess a general legislative competence and must be unconditionally obeyed, the alternative being antinomianism. Others maintain state and church possess only limited delegated authority, which certainly does not extend to, for example, forbidding prayer (see Dan. 6). This opposition to human law may be expressed in different ways. For instance, that no law may be passed which contradicts the Bible; that no law may be passed on which the Bible is silent; that a law with which one in conscience disagrees is not binding.

Antinomianism is theologically and culturally significant. Paul may have been accused of antinomianism in his teaching of salvation by grace (Rom. 6:1; Gal. 2:17); such antinomianism goes with being a Christian. However, the record of humanity from Gen. 3 speaks of a disposition which sets God's laws aside (see *Fall), and sin is called lawlessness (1 John 3:4). Intriguingly, humans may make void God's laws even while purporting to be observers of the law, as Jesus indicates of the Pharisees (Mark 7:8–13), so that we may be covertly antinomian while superficially looking like legalists. Moreover, our culture has a markedly anti-authoritarian strand which can include an antipathy to 'law', whether biblical or civil, and this makes it imperative to examine quite what content is being given to charges of antinomianism.

See also: LAW AND GOSPEL.

Bibliography

T. D. Bozeman, The Precisionist Strain: Disciplinary Religion and Antinomian Backlash in Puritanism to 1638 (Chapel Hill, 2003); J. Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion, III.7; D. R. Como, Blown by the Spirit: Puritanism and the Emergence of an Antinomian Underground in Pre-Civil-War England (Stanford, 2004); J. Hogg, The Private Memoirs and Confessions of a Justified Sinner (1824); J. K. Jue, 'The Active Obedience of Christ and the Theology of the Westminster Standards: A Historical Investigation', in K. S. Oliphint (ed.), Justified in Christ: God's Plan for Us in Justification (Fearn, 2007), pp. 99–130; H. Nouwen, The Return of the Prodigal Son (London, 1992); F. Schaeffer, 'A Christian Manifesto', in The Complete Works of Francis Schaeffer, vol. 5 (Wheaton, 1982); F. Turretin, Institutes of Elenctic Theology, Topic 11, Q23, 'The Abrogation of the Moral Law' (ET, Phillipsburg, 1977).

M. OVEY

ANTIOCHENE SCHOOL

The Antiochene School is in its *Christology generally opposed to the *Alexandrian School, but it is worth remembering that originally both schools reflected differing responses to the *Arian threat. Countering the Arian attribution of suffering to the divine Word, the Antiochenes insisted on a rigid separation between the two natures in Christ. It was the human nature which experienced suffering, whereas the divine nature remained untouched by this. Central to Antiochene theology was the great gulf between the immortality, incorruptibility and impassibility of God and the mortality, corruptibility and passibility of humanity.

Diodore of Tarsus (c. 330–94), often regarded as the pioneer of this school, was content to use the Alexandrian terminology of the 'Word becoming flesh'. He departed, however, from the Alexandrian tradition when he challenged Apollinarius' talk of one hypostasis (substance or person) in Christ. For Apollinarius this entailed a complete transfer of the properties (communicatio idiomatum; see *Christology) of the Word to the human side of Jesus' one nature; but for Diodore this inevitably involved the Word in suffering, and thereby compromised the divine nature. Diodore preferred to talk of two Sons and two natures, and to deny any sort of transfer of properties. Thus, it was only the human nature of Jesus which died on the cross, while the divine Word did not suffer. The denial of a transfer of properties remained the standard teaching of the Antiochene School.

It was Diodore's pupil, Theodore of Mopsuestia (c. 350–428), who first scrapped the Word-flesh framework in favour of the Word-man framework more commonly associated with the Antiochenes. He was motivated by a concern to do justice to Christ's human experiences. Since the weakness evident in these experiences could not be postulated of the divine nature, the divine Word must have assumed complete manhood, body and soul.

Theodore died shortly before the outbreak of the *Nestorian controversy, which focused on Nestorius, one of his pupils. Theodore may in some sense have paved the way for controversy, since his talk of Christ's humanity as 'the man assumed' did lead in the hands of more extreme exponents to the suspicion of *adoptionism. So clear was Theodore's differentiation between the two natures that he could treat Christ's humanity almost as a separate person, as at John 10:27–28, which he expounds as a conversation between Christ's two natures.

Theodore's opponents also pointed out that he failed to do justice to the interrelation of the two natures in Christ. He described this as a 'conjunction', a term which falls short of full union. He liked to illustrate this by the metaphor of indwelling. The human nature of Christ functions as a temple in which the Godhead dwells. But this indwelling, which is by God's own good pleasure, differs from God's indwelling in the prophets and other holy men by virtue of its permanence and completeness. Understandably, this theological construction was criticized as giving only the appearance of a union.

Though under fire in the Nestorian controversy, the Antiochene School was not completely identified with Nestorius, but produced more moderate exponents, of whom the monk-bishop, Theodoret of Cyrrhus (c. 393–458), was the most notable. In the aftermath of the Council of *Ephesus (431) they set forth a statement devoid of Nestorian excesses. In time, this document, which became known as the Formulary of Reunion, was accepted even by *Cyril of Alexandria, and brought fifteen years of relative peace in the Eastern church.

At the beginning of the Nestorian controversy, Theodoret had objected to Cyril's talk of a 'hypostatic' or natural union, because this signified to him a fusion of the deity and the humanity into a hybrid compound under the influence of some physical law of mechanical combination entirely opposed to any concept of the voluntary, gracious act which characterized the *incarnation. At this stage in his career Theodoret held that Christ had two natures and two hypostases, but later he was prepared to modify his terminology and distinguish between his one hypostasis and his two natures. In line with this, he saw orthodoxy as a middle path between the error of dividing Christ into two persons and the opposite error of confusing the two natures.

The Antiochenes held passionately by their Christology in order to safeguard their doctrine of *salvation. They would stress the perfection and distinctness of Christ's humanity, because sin and death which had been introduced into the world by a man could be undone only in human nature. Again, Christ had to demonstrate real moral progress because sin was essentially an act of wilful disobedience on the part of the soul and could be undone only by absolute obedience to the divine will. A divine initiative was required to secure human salvation. God had to intervene in human history by creating and uniting to himself a new Man if man was to be re-established in obedience to God's will. After its obedience on earth, Christ's human nature was elevated to heaven by virtue of its conjunction with the divine nature. By a parallel process, the believer, united to Christ at baptism, is granted intimacy with the divine nature – though it is never suggested that this intimacy is on the same scale as that enjoyed by Christ.

The moderate Antiochenes left their mark on the *Chalcedonian Definition (451; see also *Councils and *Creeds), which for many marked the dénouement of the Christological controversies of the fifth century. Its key phrase – one person 'made known in two natures' – reflects the Antiochene concern to preserve the integrity of the two natures in Christ. But the corresponding stress on the oneness of Christ represents a corrective to the Antiochene tendency not to give sufficient weight to the Word as the subject of the incarnation and to subordinate the concept of person to that of nature.

The Antiochenes gave biblical exegesis greater weight than systematic theology. Commentaries on Scripture were written by the leading members of the school, and the greatest expositor of the early church, John Chrysostom (c. 344/354–407), could be reckoned among them. The Antiochenes developed their own *hermeneutical principles in reaction to the unbridled allegorization of the Alexandrians. The Antiochenes insisted on the literal or historical interpretation, but were not averse to a further spiritual sense, provided this did not undermine the historicity of the passage and could form some reasonably obvious parallel to the literal sense. Insight (Gk theoria) was the name they gave to this additional sense. Diodore and Theodore, the theorists of the school, were also pioneers in a critical approach to the canon of *Scripture, but their work on this did not meet with much approval. Nor did it significantly undermine the school's excellent reputation in biblical exegesis.

Bibliography

A. Grillmeier, Christ in Christian Tradition, vol. 1 (London, ²1975); J. N. D. Kelly, Golden Mouth: The Story of John Chrysostom – Ascetic, Preacher, Bishop (Grand Rapids, 1995); R. V. Sellers, Two Ancient Christologies (London, 1940); D. S. Wallace-Hadrill, Christian Antioch: A Study of Eastern Christian Thought (Cambridge, 1982).

G. A. KEITH

ANTI-SEMITISM, see HOLOCAUST; JUDAISM AND CHRISTIANITY

APARTHEID, see DUTCH REFORMED THEOLOGY (SOUTH AFRICA); RACE

APOCALYPTIC

Apocalyptic is an adjective derived from the word 'apocalypse' (Gk apokalypsis), meaning 'revelation' or 'disclosure', and used primarily to describe a genre of literature. The word can also be used to define a type of *eschatology as well as religious movements associated with such revelations, as at Qumran and, more recently, millenarianism (see *Millennium).

Historically, biblical apocalyptic literature arose between the time of the Babylonian captivity (Ezekiel and Daniel) through the return of the exiles (Zechariah) to the Greek and Roman occupation of Palestine (Revelation), that is, from around 570 BC to AD 100. The writing of further apocalyptic literature continued within Judaism and Christianity until the late Middle Ages.

Extra-biblical Jewish apocalypses written between 200 BC and AD 200 include 1 Enoch, 2 Baruch, 4 Ezra (2 Edras), the Apocalypse of Abraham and the Apocalypse of Zephaniah. Early Christian apocalypses include the Shepherd of Hermas. More usually, Christian apocalypses were written anonymously, and under the names of OT figures or NT apostles.

Two main types of apocalyptic literature may be distinguished. Cosmological apocalyptic literature typically involves a heavenly journey with a celestial guide lifting the veil between heaven and earth. These revelations were communicated through visions, often using numerology, enigmatic symbolism and the vivid depictions of animals and of other living beings.

Historical-eschatological apocalypses reveal God's purposes in history between the 'now' and the 'not yet'. Predicting the future, and using symbolic language, they describe the rise and fall of empires as well as rulers who at various times tolerated or persecuted God's people. These visions end triumphantly with God intervening to bring *judgment on the wicked and vindicate the righteous and faithful remnant. They declare with certainty that the powers of the present evil age will finally be overthrown by God's *kingdom rule. Interpreters have differed on whether the imagery describing these 'Last Days' is intended to be understood figuratively, literally or symbolically. The Qumran War Scroll, for example, describes a series of seven battles that take place over a period of forty years between the Sons of Light and the Sons of Darkness. Only the decisive intervention of God in the final battle brings about the defeat of Belial and his army.

The Jewish apocalypses, including those written after the rise of Christianity, were largely preserved by Christian scribes and were influential in churches. 4 Ezra, for example, held almost canonical status during the Middle Ages. Christian apocalypses emulated both types of Jewish apocalypse. The cosmological type includes visionary descriptions of the torments of hell and the delights of paradise and were especially popular in the patristic and medieval periods. The most influential of these was the Apocalypse of Paul. Dante's Divine Comedy represents the literary culmination of this genre. The Apocalypse of Thomas is an example of the historical-eschatological type and was also influential in the Middle Ages.

During the patristic and medieval periods, apocalyptic speculation within Christianity gradually shifted from the writing of new apocalypses to the interpretation of the apocalyptic elements found in the canonical Scriptures, most notably Daniel and Revelation. The writings of *Joachim of Fiore (1135–1202), for example, became the basis of widespread eschatological expectations.

During the Reformation, both Catholic and Protestant commentators sought to interpret the social and political upheavals impacting Europe in apocalyptic terms. Thomas Brightman (1562–1607), for example, was the author of Apocalypsis Apocalypseos, meaning 'A Revelation of the Revelation'. He speculated that the seven vials or bowls of Rev. 16 began with Elizabeth's accession to the throne of England in 1558 and that the seventh trumpet of Rev. 10 had been sounded in 1588 with the destruction of the Spanish Armada. He argued that the Turkish Empire (the false prophet), having formed an unholy alliance with the Roman Church (the Antichrist), would be destroyed, followed by 'the calling of the Jews to be a Christian nation', leading to 'a most happy tranquillity from thence to the end of the world'.

The traumatic effects of the French Revolution (1789–99) and the Napoleonic Wars (1804–15) had a profound and lasting impact on the rise of apocalyptic movements right across Europe. George Stanley Faber (1773–1854) was one of the earliest to write speculative treaties on prophecy. In 1804, he wrote A Dissertation on the Prophecies that have been fulfilled, are now fulfilling or will hereafter be fulfilled relative to the Great Period of 1260 years, the Papal and Mohammedan (sic) Apostasies, the Tyranical Reign of the Antichrist or the Infidel Power and the Restoration of the Jews. Faber identified Napoleon, the head of the revived Roman Empire, as the *Antichrist. He predicted Napoleon would be destroyed in Palestine by an alliance of England and Russia. Faber's writings, along with those of Edward *Irving, Manuel Lacunza, John Nelson *Darby, and later, Cyrus Scofield, became the driving force behind the rise in popularity of futurist premillennialism and *Dispensationalism in the nineteenth century and Christian *Zionism in the twentieth.

Apocalyptic movements founded in the nineteenth century include the Catholic Apostolic Church, the Albury Circle, the Brethren, Millerites, Shakers, Adventists (see *Seventh-Day Adventism), Mormons and Jehovah Witnesses (see *New religions). Annual Bible prophecy conferences which began in Albury, Surrey in the 1820s, spread to Powerscourt in Ireland in the 1830s and then to the United States after the Civil War in the 1870s in locations such as Niagara and New York.

Through the writings of James Brookes, D. L. Moody, William Blackstone and Cyrus Scofield, apocalyptic speculation became mainstream in the USA, shaping and influencing fundamentalism, Pentecostalism and evangelicalism. The Scofield Reference Bible became the standard text for systematizing and legitimizing a futurist hermeneutic in which contemporary events were identified as the fulfilment of biblical prophecy. The founding of the state of Israel in 1948 and capture of Jerusalem in 1967 are two important examples. The Jewish people were increasingly seen as central to God's continuing purposes on earth separate from the church. American apocalyptic writings invariably have a polarized and dualistic worldview, in which God is blessing America because of its support for Israel. Communism and more recently Islam are identified with the enemies of God's people. Contemporary apocalypticism is also inherently mistrustful of institutions such as the European Community, the United Nations and with attempts to find a peaceful settlement of the Arab-Israeli conflict through international law.

Contemporary popular exponents of this tradition include John Hagee, Charles Dyer, Mike Evans, Hal Lindsey and Tim LaHaye. Lindsey, for example, in his book Planet Earth 2000, promises reassuringly: 'Hal will be your guide on a chilling tour of the world's future battlefields as the Great Tribulation, foretold more than two thousand years ago by Old and New Testament prophets, begins to unfold. You'll meet the world leaders who will bring man to the very edge of extinction and examine the causes of the current global situation – what it all means, what will shortly come to pass, and how it will all turn out.'

From the sixteenth century to the present day there has been an unbroken strand within evangelicalism that has interpreted Daniel and the book of Revelation in apocalyptic terms to explain contemporary events and link them to an imminent war of Armageddon, the return of Christ and climax of history. William Hendriksen warns: 'In emphasizing this basis of the Apocalyptic visions in the subsoil of the sacred Scriptures we must always bear in mind that it is wise to proceed from the clearer to the more obscure and never vice versa.' Christian history is littered with the wreckage of eccentric predictions uttered by those who have failed to heed that advice.

Bibliography

R. Bauckham, Tudor Apocalypse (Appleford, 1978); J. J. Collins, The Apocalyptic Imagination (Grand Rapids, 1998); W. Hendriksen, More than Conquerors: An Interpretation of the Book of Revelation (London, 1940); L. Morris, Apocalyptic (Leicester, 1972); C. Marvin Pate and C. B. Haines, Jr, Doomsday Delusions (Downers Grove, 1995); C. Rowland, The Open Heaven: A Study of Apocalyptic in Judaism and Early Christianity (London, 1982); D. S. Russell, The Method and Message of Jewish Apocalyptic (Philadelphia, 1964); S. Sizer, Christian Zionism: Road-map to Armageddon? (Leicester, 2004).

S. SIZER

APOCRYPHA, see SCRIPTURE

APOLLINARIANISM

The heresy which so stressed the unity of the person of Christ that it denied that he had a human mind, and spoke of the *Logos taking its place, was promoted by Apollinarius, Bishop of Laodicea in Syria (351–90). A friend of *Athanasius and a supporter of the homoousion (see *Trinity and Council of *Nicaea), Apollinarius wrote 'innumerable volumes on the holy Scriptures' (Jerome), and, on theological and apologetic subjects, 'filled the world with his books' (Basil). Most survive, however, only in fragments and quotations in other writers. Some appear under other names: a Detailed Confession of Faith attributed to Gregory Thaumaturgus; a sermon, That Christ is One, On the Incarnation of the Word of God, and a creed addressed to the emperor Jovian, attributed to Athanasius; On the Union of Body and Deity in Christ, On Faith and Incarnation, and a letter to Dionysius of Rome, attributed to Pope Julius I.

The context of the Apollinarian *Christology is that of the *Alexandrian School of Athanasius and *Cyril, which was strong in declaring for the deity of Christ and the union of the two natures in his incarnate person. From these presuppositions Apollinarius attacked the *Antiochene *dualistic Christology. Throughout his concern was soteriological. A Christ less than totally divine cannot save. The death of a mere man has no redeeming efficacy. But if Christ is totally divine, his human nature must somehow be 'taken up' into his divinity and so become a right object of worship. Salvation consists in man partaking of Christ's apotheosized flesh in the *Eucharist. By the deifying of the human element through union with the divine Logos, Christ was rendered morally unchangeable.

Negatively, therefore, Apollinarius rejects any mere juxtaposing of the two natures in Christ. To Jovian he writes, 'There are not two natures (in Christ), one to be worshipped and one not to be worshipped. There is one nature (mia physis) in the Word of God incarnate.' The Scriptures present Christ as one being, the embodiment of the one active principle, the divine Logos. Positively, he credited to Christ a 'new nature', with the result that in the constitution of his person he is 'a new creation and a marvellous mixture, God and man have constituted one flesh'. But how have the human and divine so coalesced into such an absolute oneness?

A powerful motive in Apollinarius was to exempt Christ from the possibility of sinning. In current psychology the human mind was conceived as self-determining, being impelled by its own volition and so the seat of evil choices. Apollinarius thus eliminated this element from his structure of Christ's person. 'If with the Godhead which is itself mind, there was in Christ also a human mind, the first purpose of the incarnation which is the overthrow of sin is not accomplished in him' (Apodeixis, fragment, 74). Christ's person is then the 'co-mixture' of the Logos and 'abridged human nature': 'a mean between God and man, neither wholly man nor wholly God, but a combination of God and man' (Syllogysmoi, fragment, 113). The denudation of the human in the incarnation is counterbalanced from the divine end by a kenosis (see *Kenoticism). For the Logos who pervades all existence in his limitlessness must undergo self-limitation in human flesh.

Apollinarius was criticized by *Gregory of Nyssa for repudiating Christ's full human experiences of which the Gospels and the epistle to the Hebrews give ample proof. The full salvation of man requires Christ's full identification with him in all the elements of his make-up. Apollinarianism was successively condemned by *councils at Rome (377), Alexandria (378), Antioch (379) and finally at Constantinople (381).

Bibliography

J. N. D. Kelly, Early Christian Doctrines (London, 1977); H. Lietzmann, Apollinarius von Laodicea und seine Schule (Tübingen, 1904); A. G. McGiffert, A History of Christian Thought (New York and London, 1932), vol. 1; J. Pelikan, The Christian Tradition, vol. 1: The Emergence of the Catholic Tradition (100–600) (Chicago, 1971); G. L. Prestige, Fathers and Heretics (London, 1940), pp. 193–246; C. E. Raven, Apollinarianism (Cambridge, 1923).

H. D. McDONALD

APOLOGETICS

The word 'apologetics' derives from a Greek term, apologia, and was used for a defence that a person like Socrates might make of his views and actions. The apostle Peter tells every Christian to be ready to give a reason (apologia) for the hope that is in him (1 Pet. 3:15). Apologetics, then, is an activity of the Christian mind which attempts to show that the gospel message is true in what it affirms. An apologist is one who is prepared to defend the message against criticism and distortion, and to give evidences of its credibility.

Unfortunately, today the term apologetics has unpleasant connotations for many people. On a superficial level it sounds as if we are being asked to apologize for having faith. At a deeper level it may suggest an aggressive or opportunistic kind of person who resorts to fair means or foul in order to get people to accept his point of view. Such misunderstandings of apologetics are regrettable in view of the importance of the subject. A sound defence of the faith was important in the NT as it also is today.

The book of Acts presents the apostles engaging non-Christians in debates and arguments concerning the truth of the gospel (Acts 17:2–4; 19:8–10), and it is no exaggeration to say that most of the NT documents were written for specific apologetic reasons. They were written to commend the faith to one group or another, and to clear up questions that had arisen about the gospel.

Apologetic activities were vigorously pursued during the period of the early church and indeed throughout most of the church's history. In the beginning it was necessary both to define what the church believed in the face of heretical tendencies, and to offer an explication of its basis in rationality to enquirers and critics of different kinds. Since many of the *apologists were converts themselves – men such as *Justin, *Clement and *Augustine – they knew what was needed to commend the faith to outsiders. Believers also needed to be strengthened against the impact of hostile criticisms. It would be true to say that apologetics stood proudly alongside *dogmatics as two indispensable responses to the challenges of the age. It cannot be otherwise in a period of missionary expansion.

Early apologetics were generally either political or religious. The political apologies were designed to win acceptance, as well as a measure of toleration and legitimacy for Christianity in society, while the religious apologies were intended to win converts from both Judaism and paganism. Of necessity, such writings had to be flexible and respond to specific issues just as they do today. Among the practitioners of the art of apologetics we may number some of the finest minds and personalities: Augustine, *Anselm, *Thomas Aquinas, *Pascal, *Butler, *Newman and C. S. *Lewis. Their work contains a great variety of approaches and styles of argument, but what characterizes it all is boldness and confidence in the truth of the biblical message and its relevance to human history and philosophy.

In the modern period, however, apologetics has suffered a severe setback. It encountered in the European *Enlightenment a spirit of scepticism towards theology and metaphysics and a wholesale assault upon Christian beliefs. The apologetic arguments of earlier centuries were subjected to withering critique by men like *Hume, and many came to feel that the whole of Christianity needed to be revised and reworked. *Kant declared that the human mind was incapable of knowledge beyond the phenomenal realm. In future, he said, theology would have to be content to function within the limits of reason and reduce its claims to knowledge. A gauntlet was thrown down in the path of apologetics. Religion can be practised in the realm of existence or morality, but it cannot be advanced, as previously, on supposedly rational grounds.

The Enlightenment created a severe crisis for Christianity. In its wake, religious *liberalism sought to operate within the limits Kant had indicated, accepting the implications which this would have for Christian thinking. This led to the kind of revisionism which is familiar from the work of Paul *Tillich, Rudolf *Bultmann and John A. T. *Robinson. Even among classical Christians, the effect of the Enlightenment critique was clearly seen in a new hesitancy towards apologetics. In *Kierkegaard and *Barth one sees a kind of orthodoxy which does not rely upon apologetic arguments at all, but seeks to rest the claim of Christianity solely upon the faith-commitment.

But there has also been a resurgence of apologetics. Most widely read have been the writings of C. S. Lewis, but others such as Francis A. Schaeffer and Timothy Keller have stimulated popular interest in defending the faith. Others who have contributed at a more technical level include E. J. Carnell (1919–1967), Basil Mitchell (1917–2011), Alvin Plantinga (b. 1932), Richard Swinburne (b. 1934) and Keith Ward (b. 1938). John Polkinghorne (b. 1930), Francis Collins (b. 1950) and Alister McGrath (b. 1953) are among those who have taken up the specialist area of Christian apologetics in the light of modern science.

Bibliography

C. Brown, Philosophy and the Christian Faith (London, 1969); idem, Miracles and the Critical Mind (Grand Rapids and Exeter, 1984); E. J. Carnell, An Introduction to Christian Apologetics (Grand Rapids, 1952); F. Collins, The Language of God: A Scientist Presents Evidence for Belief (New York, 2006); A. Dulles, A History of Apologetics (Philadelphia, 1971); C. Campbell-Jack and G. J. McGrath (eds.), New Dictionary of Christian Apologetics (Leicester, 2006); N. L. Geisler, Christian Apologetics (Grand Rapids, 1988); idem, Baker Encyclopedia of Christian Apologetics (Grand Rapids, 1999); T. Keller, The Reason for God (New York, 2008); P. Kreeft, Handbook of Christian Apologetics (Downers Grove, 1994); G. R. Lewis, Testing Christianity's Truth Claims: Approaches to Christian Apologetics (Chicago, 1976); A. McGrath, The Twilight of Atheism (New York, 2004); J. Polkinghorne, Faith, Science and Understanding (London, 2000); R. Swinburne, The Existence of God, 2nd edn (New York, 1991); C. van Til, The Defense of the Faith (Philadelphia, 1955); K. Ward, God and the Philosophers (Minneapolis, 2009).

C. H. PINNOCK

APOLOGISTS

A small group of Greek authors of the second century, who presented a defence of Christianity in the face of persecution, slander and intellectual attack (see *Apologetics). They sought to make Christianity understandable (and acceptable) to a Greco-Roman or Jewish audience, to bridge the gap between this 'barbarian' religion and the culture of their day. Yet they contain important insights into the development of Christian theology. In all of them we find a 'high' view of the transcendence of *God. God is the 'uncreated, eternal, invisible, impassible, incomprehensible, and infinite, who can be apprehended by mind and reason alone, who is encompassed by light, beauty, spirit, and indescribable power, and who created, adorned, and now rules the universe' (Athenagoras, Supplication 10:1). They expose the immorality and irrationality of pagan religion and they defend the truth of the *resurrection of the flesh. Because they also differ in their theology, we shall deal with each one separately.

Aristides wrote his Apology either c. 125 or c. 140. Textual problems make it difficult to be sure about the details of his thought (the less reliable text has the more explicit theological statements). God is understood as the 'prime mover', who created all things because of man. Jesus Christ is spoken of as Son of God and (perhaps) as God, who was incarnate through a virgin, died and rose again, and was preached by the twelve apostles in all the world. Christians live an exemplary life in the knowledge of a judgment after death. These doctrines can all be found in the Christian Scriptures.

*Justin Martyr, the most important of the apologists, wrote an Apology (I), some time after 151, to which he later added an Appendix (or Apology II). In his Dialogue with Trypho he seeks to persuade a Jew of the truth of Christianity. Unlike the other apologists, Justin focuses mainly on the nature and meaning of Christ. Christ was the *Logos who inspired the Greek philosophers and is present in all men as the Logos spermatikos (seminal reason or word; see *Stoicism). Through him, the best of the philosophers were able to grasp certain Christian truths (e.g. creation, the Trinity, final judgment, etc.). Those who lived according to the Logos, even before Christ, were Christians. In the OT theophanies it was the Logos who was revealed, because the transcendent God could not thus speak to men. Though Justin uses the trinitarian formula, his understanding of Christ is subordinationist (see *Trinity). The relation of the Son to the Father is compared to the relation of sunlight to the sun itself, but he also speaks of a fire kindled from a fire. At times the Logos and the Holy Spirit are apparently confused. Christ was incarnate for our salvation and healing, to teach us and to triumph over the demons (see *Devil) through the mystery of the cross. The demons were responsible for enslaving and deceiving men. They saw what was predicted in the OT about Christ and inspired the poets to say similar things about the Greek gods. They always instigate the persecution of just men. In order to be considered worthy of incorruption and of fellowship with God, it is necessary for men to believe these things and to do God's will.

The main evidence for Christianity consists in the fact that everything related to Christ's coming was foretold by the Hebrew prophets. Exegesis of the OT is important in the Apology and also in the Dialogue, where Justin argues that the Mosaic law has been abrogated, that the OT speaks of 'another besides God', who was manifest in the OT theophanies, and that the Christians are the true Israel. Justin is concerned to show the continuity between Greek philosophy and Christianity (see *Philosophy and theology; *Platonism), as well as the continuity between the OT and the NT. Christ is the culmination and completion of all the partial knowledge of truth in Greek philosophy and he is the culmination of the history of Israel. He himself is Israel and because of him the church now bears the name of Israel.

Tatian, a disciple of Justin, wrote a Discourse to the Greeks (c. 160). He maintains the divinity of the Logos (understood as 'light from light'). He speculates on the nature of man and on the nature and activity of the demons. He emphasizes free will and the necessity to obey God.

Athenagoras wrote a Supplication (c. 177). The treatise On the Resurrection, traditionally ascribed to him, may be the work of a later author. Athenagoras says that Father, Son and Holy Spirit are united in power, yet distinguished in rank. The Spirit is understood as an effluence, like light from a fire. Goodness is so much a part of God that, without it, he could not exist. *Evil exists because of the fall of (some of) the *angels, who had been entrusted with the administration of the world. Evil is associated with matter. The exemplary life of the Christians is strongly emphasized. The instructions for the Christian life, as well as all other knowledge about God, are found in the writings of the prophets.

The work On the Resurrection argues for the resurrection on almost purely rational grounds, showing that God is both able and willing to raise the dead and that this corresponds to the purpose of man's creation. The soul is *immortal. Both the righteous and the wicked are raised.

Theophilus of Antioch wrote three books To Autolytus (after 180), in which he speaks of God, the Logos and Sophia (*wisdom) as a 'triad'. The Logos was first innate (endiathetos) in God and was made external (prophorikos) before creation. Sometimes the distinction between Logos and Sophia (understood as the Holy Spirit) is blurred. God may be apprehended through his works in the universe, which he created out of nothing. Man was made to know God, with the capacity both for mortality and for immortality. Through disobedience he became mortal. Terms like faith, repentance, forgiveness and regeneration are used, and God is spoken of as healer. Yet man is to attain immortality primarily through obedience. All these doctrines may be found in the writings of the prophets, who were inspired by Sophia and whose authenticity is guaranteed by their antiquity and by the fact that their predictions have come true.

Bibliography

The Greek text of the Apologists may be found in E. J. Goodspeed, Die ältesten Apologeten (Göttingen, 1914); J. R. Harris, The Apology of Aristides (Cambridge, 21893); J. C. Th. Otto, Corpus Apologetarum Christianorum Saeculi Secundi (Jena, 1847–72). English translations can be found in ANCL (repr. ANF); R. M. Grant (ed.), Theophilus of Antioch: Ad Autolytus (Oxford, 1970); C. C. Richardson (ed.), The Early Christian Fathers (Philadelphia, 1953); W. R. Schoedel (ed.), Athenagoras:

Legatio and De Resurrectione (Oxford, 1972); A. Lukyn Williams (ed.), Justin Martyr: The Dialogue with Trypho (London, 1930).

T. G. DONNER

APOPHATIC THEOLOGY

Apophatic theology is a method of theological discourse that proceeds by way of negation (via negativa) using such language as 'God is incomprehensible' or 'God is non-material'. Unlike cataphatic theology (via positiva), which proceeds by way of affirmation ('God is good'), apophatic language reflects the utter limitations of human reason when it comes to describing the unknowable nature of *God.

Apophaticism became fully developed in the fourth century in the writings of the Cappadocian Fathers (see *Basil of Caesarea; *Gregory of Nazianzus; *Gregory of Nyssa) against Eunomius. Eunomius believed one could know the very essence of God and be fully united to it. The Cappadocians, however, corrected Eunomius by insisting upon the radical unknowability of the divine essence and thus moved apophaticism into the mainstream of the church. In the sixth century, apophaticism reached its classic expression through the work of *Pseudo-Dionysius the Aeropagite in his book Mystical Theology. Pseudo-Dionysius used the apophatic language of the Neoplatonists (see *Platonism) to articulate the mystery of God's being. In Neoplatonic thought, the negative way was an intellectual method of approaching the transcendence of God based on belief in an impersonal deity whose essence could be known and contemplated. Pseudo-Dionysius made massive use of apophatic theology throughout his writings and soon popularized the method throughout the Middle Ages in both the Eastern and Western halves of the church. It is still prominent in the *Eastern Orthodox Church today.

The apophatic emphasis on divine unknowability might at first seem to exclude any direct experience of God. But in fact, many who used the apophatic approach saw it not only as a tool for affirming God's transcendence, but also as a way to experience union with God through *prayer. By 'unknowing' God, the apophatic way did not lead to ignorance or the absence of knowledge. Rather, it was an active, positive experience of the living Lord. Negations became super-affirmations about God by saying and unsaying one's way into his presence, affirming and denying 'yes and no; this not that'. As one ascends to God, one discovers that God is beyond all human concepts. At that point, all speech, all thought and even all negations must be abandoned. Pseudo-Dionysius explains, 'And the more it climbs, the more language falters, and when it has passed up and beyond the ascent, it will turn silent completely, since it will finally be at one with him who is indescribable.'

Apophatic theology also shaped the doctrinal language of the church. The Church Fathers of the early ecumenical *councils (325–787) emphasized that doctrinal definitions are not ends in themselves, but are given chiefly in order to exclude wrong interpretations of the faith proposed by *heretics. The most important dogmatic definitions of the church were often couched in the language of apophaticism and antinomy in order to recognize the boundaries within which the mystery of God was to be understood. For example, the Chalcedonian Definition (451) (see *Creeds) – the church's classic statement of *Christology – used four negative adverbs to affirm the union of the human and divine natures in one person 'without confusion, without change, without division, without separation'. Vladimir *Lossky observes, 'Apophaticism teaches us to see above all a negative meaning in the dogmas of the Church: it forbids us to follow natural ways of thought and to form concepts which would usurp the place of spiritual realities. For Christianity is not a philosophical school for speculating about abstract concepts, but is essentially a communion with the living God.' To that end, apophatic theology underscores personal experience as an epistemological criterion of the faith. It tells us that we may apprehend God, but never comprehend him.

Bibliography

V. Lossky, The Mystical Theology of the Eastern Church (St Vladimir's, 1976); A. Louth, The Origins of the Christian Mystical Tradition: From Plato to Denys (Oxford, 1981); J. Pelikan, 'Who Do You Say That I Am – Not?: The Power of Negative Thinking in the Decrees of the Ecumenical Councils', in J. Cavadini (ed.), Who Do You Say That I Am?: Confessing the Mystery of Christ (University of Notre Dame, 2004); P. Rorem, The Dionysian Mystical Theology (Minneapolis, 2015); D. Turner, The Darkness of God: Negativity in Christian Mysticism (Cambridge, 1995); K. Ware, 'God Hidden and Revealed: The Apophatic Way and the Essence-Energies Distinction', Eastern Churches Review 7.2, 1975, pp. 125–136.

B. NASSIF

APOSTASY

Apostasy is a general falling away from religion or a denial of the faith by those who once held it. Paul prophesied serious apostasy before the end of the age (2 Thess. 2:3; see also *Antichrist). Erstwhile nominal believers can obviously cease from appearing even to profess *faith. But can a *regenerate believer cease to believe and so be finally lost? All agree that he may lapse temporarily from full faith and then repent. Calvinists hold that God's calling of the elect to faith prevents them from falling away; they point to texts which assert the eternal security of the believers: a faithful God will not allow any of his people to be overcome by unbelief and finally lost (see *Reformed theology; *Perseverance; *Predestination). Others point to the numerous warnings in the NT against the danger of apostasy and to specific references to apostate individuals. Calvinists insist that the warnings are hypothetical: their effect is to prevent people falling away (just as the sign 'Danger! Keep away from the edge!' prevents people from falling off a cliff). Those who fall away were never truly regenerate. The exegetical debate continues. While the Scriptures warn the deliberate sinner that he is in eternal danger, they also assure the worried believer that nothing can pluck him out of the Lord's hand.

In the early centuries of the church, the most famous (or infamous) apostate was Julian, who was Roman emperor from 355 to 263. He renounced his Christian faith, was influenced by Neoplatonism (see *Platonism) and attempted to restore the old religious practices of Rome, but his policies perished with his death in battle. Since the *Enlightenment, the church in Europe has seen a general movement of apostasy. Leading figures who renounced Christianity or at least gravitated towards unbelief include philosophers such as John Stuart Mill and Karl Marx, and scientists such as Charles Darwin. However, in very many cases, their previous religion was some form of *deism. The novelist Mary Anne Evans (George Eliot) was one of the few who renounced an evangelical faith.

Bibliography

G. C. Berkouwer, Faith and Perseverance (Grand Rapids, 1958); D. A. Carson, Divine Sovereignty and Human Responsibility (London, 1981); I. H. Marshall, Kept by the Power of God (Minneapolis, 1975); T. R. Schreiner and A. B. Caneday, The Race Set before Us: A Biblical Theology of Perseverance and Assurance (Downers Grove, 2001).

I. H. MARSHALL

APOSTLE

It is no exaggeration to say that different understandings of apostleship are of key significance for ecclesiology. To be 'apostolic' has frequently been seen as central to the nature of the universal church, as in the phrase 'one, holy, catholic and apostolic church' from the Nicene Creed. But in what sense or senses is the church apostolic? Because its leaders stand in a direct line of apostolic succession through the *laying on of hands? Because it is true to the gospel as proclaimed by the original apostles of Christ and now enshrined in the NT Scriptures? Or because local churches are established and receive guidance from apostles today who function with their teams to give guidance and equip churches for Spirit-empowered discipleship and mission?

The early church

The emphasis by Luke in Acts on the crucial significance of the Twelve as witnesses to Christ's resurrection and authoritative teachers, together with Paul's repeated insistence in his letters on his authority as an apostle of Christ, led to an acceptance of the Twelve and Paul as having special, non-repeatable offices. The wider NT use of the word 'apostle' for pioneer missionaries (e.g. Andronicus and Junia, Rom. 16:7), though reflected in the Didache (Syria, c. 95; the textual history is complex), was soon lost.

The need to combat growing *Gnostic influence in the latter part of the second century, with a stress on esoteric tradition secretly handed down, led to the compiling in the period 180–200 of 'succession lists' of bishops in the major cities. The main aim was to safeguard the apostolic message. The Apostles' *Creed, which in its full form stems from c. 700, is based on the Old Roman Creed of this period.

Gradually in the third century the emphasis changed from a stress on an open succession of teachers to the significance of a personal succession of bishops going back to the apostles.

Apostolic succession

Churches today which emphasize the importance of a personal episcopal apostolic succession of bishops hold that Christ entrusted the obligation to transmit and preserve the 'deposit of faith' (the experience of Christ and his teachings contained in the doctrinal 'tradition' handed down from the time of the apostles, the written portion of which is *Scripture) to the apostles, who passed on this role by ordaining bishops after them. Paul's letters to Timothy and Titus are seen as his passing on of *authority to them, his personally appointed delegates. This understanding is seen as being developed by the *Apostolic Fathers. 1 Clement (written to the church at Corinth) defends the authority and prerogatives of a group of leaders in the church deposed and replaced by the congregation on its own initiative. The letter argues that the apostles appointed 'bishops and deacons' as successors, expecting them to appoint their own successors in turn (cf. 2 Tim. 2:2). So such church leaders were not to be removed without cause and due process. Tony Lane comments that this emphasis on the importance of due order in the church reflects 'traditional Roman values as well as biblical influence' (A Concise History of Christian Thought, p. 8). In the letters of Ignatius of Antioch at the beginning of the second century, the bishop is seen as a focus of unity against both schism and heresy. In the early third century *Tertullian, the father of Latin theology, writes as follows: 'Let them produce the original records of their churches; let them unfold the roll of their bishops, running down in due succession from the beginning in such a manner that [that first bishop of theirs] shall be able to show for his ordainer and predecessor some one of the apostles or of apostolic men' (The Prescription against Heretics, ch. 32). *Cyprian, Bishop of Carthage, developed further the significance of the apostolic succession, which protected the belief and inter-communion of the churches through the early centuries of persecution and international expansion.

Churches of the Catholic tradition hold that bishops form the necessary link in an unbroken chain of successors to the office of the apostles. The outward sign by which this connection is both symbolized and effected is the laying on of hands by the bishop at ordination. *Roman Catholic and Orthodox theologians hold that the power and authority to administer the *sacraments, with the exception of baptism and matrimony, is passed on only through the sacrament of Holy Orders, and that an unbroken line of ordination of bishops to the apostles is necessary for the valid celebration of the sacraments today.

Roman Catholics, of course, see the *pope as the successor to Peter, providing apostolic jurisdiction and leadership for the whole church, while for *Anglicans the bishop (who for *Anglo-Catholics and others shares in authority because of the link with apostolic succession) provides a focus of unity within a diocese. Apostolic succession is also claimed by the Anglican communion and some *Lutheran churches. However, in his papal bull of 1896, Apostolicae Curae, Pope Leo XIII denounced Anglican consecrations as ‘absolutely invalid and utterly void’ because of changes made to the rite of consecration under Edward VI. The theory of sacramental grace still stands as a barrier to greater organizational church unity.

While the Roman Catholic Church asserts that Christ gave Peter a unique primacy among the apostles, which has been passed on in the office of the papacy, in *Eastern Orthodox belief and practice all bishops are equal, with even the ecumenical patriarch seen as first among equals. Orthodox theologians see this as continuing the ancient practice of the church, which considered the Roman pontiff to be first but not superior to the rest of the bishops.

Apostolic teaching

In *Reformed understanding, Christ gave a special gift of remembrance, understanding and teaching to the original apostles (see John 14:26; 16:12–15). This gift enabled them to write or to oversee the NT Scriptures, which provide the doctrinal foundation for the whole church of subsequent history (see *Scripture, doctrine of). (Peter is seen, for example, as standing behind Mark’s Gospel, and Paul behind Luke-Acts.) It is difficult to understate the importance of this stress on apostolic teaching for evangelical theology. Apostolic succession for them, as for most Protestants, is the faithful succession of apostolic teaching. There have, however, been different understandings of the apostolic authority ‘to bind and to loose’ (Matt. 16:19) or to forgive sins (John 20:23–23).

Most *Protestant churches would deny that the apostolicity of the church rests on an unbroken episcopacy.

Apostles today

The twentieth century saw the development of the idea of a continuing apostleship. The Apostolic Church, a *Pentecostal denomination tracing its origins to the Welsh Revival of 1904–5, now has over 6 million members in more than seventy nations. It is not a part of oneness Pentecostalism (denying the Trinity), which also terms itself apostolic. Many other churches of widely varying churchmanship also include the adjective ‘apostolic’ in their name, with varying significance. This is especially common with some Black majority church denominations. There is a sociological link here with the role of the leader or prophet in African traditional religion and life.

For Restorationism, a branch of the *charismatic movement, the fivefold ministries of apostle, prophet, evangelist, pastor and teacher (see Eph. 4:11) are of major significance. It is argued that there are apostles today in the sense of foundation-laying ministries, continuing *gifts of the ascended Christ. Often these are seen as being essential to the well-being of churches, providing links between local congregations and enabling them to benefit from the training and international links which apostolic ministries and teams provide. There is an emphasis on networking and building relationships, with church planting and social concern being seen as key activities. While in many Western countries such apostles with their teams may seem to be of marginal significance, in areas of the world where the church is growing rapidly they are frequently widely influential.

Since the Second *Vatican Council many in the Roman Catholic Church have placed greater emphasis on the apostolate of the whole church, including the laity. The ‘one, holy, catholic and apostolic church’ is seen as a communion of churches whose validity is derived from the apostolic message it professes and the apostolic witness it lives out as much as through any personal apostolic succession of duly ordained bishops.

Sent on a mission

For many, the term ‘apostolic’ speaks primarily either of office and tradition, or of a body of doctrine to be defended. But the original meaning of ‘apostle’, based on the Jewish shaliah concept, is of one chosen and sent with a specific commission as the fully authorized delegate of the sender, to teach and act in his name and by his authority. Just as the original apostles were commissioned by the risen Lord to proclaim the *gospel to all nations, so today Christ continues to send his people into all the world to make disciples and establish churches (see *Evangelism, theology of). For the apostle Paul, as Jimmy Dunn has emphasized (The Theology of the New Testament, pp. 571–580), apostolic authority is always subservient to the gospel, exercised to build churches up rather than to dominate them, willing to contextualize, accepting of a particular sphere of ministry, and ready to suffer as Christ did. Such perspectives are greatly needed in cross-cultural mission today, so that empire building may give way to humble, Spirit-dependent ministry that truly builds up the church.

See also: CHURCH; CHURCH GOVERNMENT.

Bibliography

P. Brown, The Rise of Western Christendom: Triumph and Diversity, AD 200–1000 (Cambridge, 1996); A. C. Clark, ‘The Role of the Apostles’, in I. H. Marshall and D. Petersen (eds.), Witness to the Gospel: The Theology of Acts (Cambridge, 1998); J. D. G. Dunn, The Theology of the New Testament (London, 1998); N. Geldenhuys, Supreme Authority: The Authority of the Lord, His Apostles and the New Testament (Grand Rapids, 1953); F. J. A. Hort, The Christian Ecclesia (London, 1902); W. K. Kay, Apostolic Networks in Britain: New Ways of Being Church (Milton Keynes, 2007); J. N. D. Kelly, Early Christian Creeds (London, 1952); idem, Early Christian Doctrines (London, ⁵1978); K. E. Kirk (ed.), The Apostolic Ministry (London, 1946); H. Küng, Structures of the Church (London, 1965); A. N. S. Lane, A Concise History of Christian Thought (London, ³2006); J. Orr, Progress of Dogma (Old Tappan, n.d.; preface, 1901); W. Pannenburg, The Apostles’ Creed in the Light of Today’s Questions (London, 1982); J. Pelikan, The Christian Tradition: A History of the Development of Doctrine, Vol. 1. The Emergence of the Catholic Tradition (100–600) (Chicago, 1971); C. H. Turner, ‘Apostolic Succession’, in H. B. Swete (ed.), Essays on the Early History of the Church (London, 1921); A. Walker, Restoring the Kingdom: The Radical Christianity of the House Church Movement (London, ³1998).

A. C. CLARK

APOSTLES’ CREED, see CREEDS

APOSTOLIC FATHERS

Although used in the seventh century by Anastasius of Sinai, modern use of this term to designate the collection of extant post-apostolic (c. 70–150) writings dates from 1672. By 1873, with addition of the Didache, the traditional (if rather arbitrary) corpus was established. The Apostolic Fathers sought to continue faithfully the teaching of the apostles, applying it to new situations, thus providing a crucial witness to the early development of Christianity.

The corpus is not a homogeneous collection. Although generally practical and pastoral in nature, the genres are varied: some letters (1 Clement to the Corinthian church, Polycarp to the Philippian church, and Ignatius’ seven more personal letters); a manual of Christian conduct (the Didache of the Twelve Apostles); a pseudonymous sermon (2 Clement) and treatise (Epistle of Barnabas); a book of apocalyptic visions (the Shepherd of Hermas); an account of the martyrdom of Polycarp; fragments of exegesis of sayings of Jesus by Papias; and apologetic writing (the Epistle to Diognetus and a fragment of Quadratus).

The Apostolic Fathers wrote to settle disputes and establish doctrine and practice as different understandings of Christianity arose, clarifying the theological boundaries surrounding traditional central apostolic beliefs primarily to establish viable Christian communities free from division; in the process proto-orthodox Christianity began to emerge. In response to the challenge of *docetism, Ignatius insists on the two natures of Christ, and Polycarp anathematizes denial of Christ’s humanity, the resurrection and the judgment. Ignatius also addresses pressures to Judaize Christianity (see *Ebionism), though it has been suggested that this may be an expression of docetism. It is partly in reaction to such challenges that *Christological orthodoxy became established as the church sought to establish its distinctive identity. The parousia, resurrection, judgment, end of the world and a belief that Christians were living in the last times dominate the theology of the second century (see *Eschatology), but the Apostolic Fathers also provide evidence of how the doctrine of the *Trinity was developing. Trinitarian language is used, and Christ is understood to be pre-existent, incarnate, human and divine, though the doctrine is not formally explored.

The practical orientation of these documents, which has sometimes given the mistaken impression that the doctrine of *grace was lost by the early second century, is a response to the changes and challenges of the period. As a result, attention is given to church governance and the theology of *martyrdom. The growing community called for more central administration in larger cities, and Ignatius promotes a hierarchical monepiscopal structure of bishop, presbyters and deacons (see *Church government). Martyrdom is seen as a work of supererogation rather than obligation in Hermas, and Ignatius, whose letters are shaped by reflection upon his impending death in Rome, sees it as a perfect *imitation of Christ, a means of freedom and a sacrifice that all believers should be ready to make. The Martyrdom of Polycarp is the earliest narrative of an individual martyrdom and evidence of the cult of martyrs.

The appeal of Clement of Rome (fl. c. 96) for the restoration of unity in the Corinthian church and submission to the authority of bishops and elders is based mainly on the OT and apostolic tradition. This is supported by a high Christology, emphasis on the resurrection of Christ and *atonement by his blood. Polycarp's letter to the Philippian church draws extensively on the Septuagint and NT epistles as he exhorts and instructs his readers in Christian behaviour and submission to church leaders. He stresses righteousness and salvation by *grace, and calls for imitation of Christ's endurance on the basis of his sacrificial death. Ignatius, in addition to the concerns already noted, makes use of early *confessions of faith and sees the *Eucharist as central to worship, closely associating the elements with the physical body of Christ. The Didache is primarily a practical manual of the Christian life, explaining the 'two ways' of life and death and providing instructions on such matters as pre-baptismal catechesis and baptismal practice (the earliest evidence of *baptism other than by immersion), the Eucharist (including the earliest eucharistic prayers), the proper treatment of missionaries, the role of bishops and deacons, fasting and hospitality. The Epistle of Barnabas explores the relationship between Christianity and *Judaism, which is viewed negatively, and, using allegorical exegesis of the OT, seeks to demonstrate that Christians are the true heirs of God's covenant. The Shepherd of Hermas relates and interprets a series of visions, thereby exploring the issues of post-baptismal sin and repentance, righteousness and forgiveness and the nature of the church and its members.

The Apostolic Fathers demonstrate how the early post-NT church addressed the problems of the day, using Scripture, the sayings of Jesus and the apostolic tradition in their attempt to consolidate the faith and practice of the church. Their writings are therefore significant for the study of the emerging canon of *Scripture as well as the early Christian understanding and use of it. Although their use of Scripture and tradition reflects the Jewish heritage of Christianity, the influence of *Hellenistic thought and philosophical language is also evident, not least because of the growing distance between Judaism and Christianity, the increasing number of converts with a Greco-Roman background and the search for a distinctive identity.

Although *Eusebius refers to the Apostolic Fathers, there is little use of them in the doctrinal controversies of the fourth and fifth centuries. Following the publication of the writings of the Apostolic Fathers in the seventeenth century, they were used in the doctrinal and largely denominational disputes of the period primarily to support existing positions. During the nineteenth century the date and authorship of the writings were debated and their authenticity finally established, since which they have made a significant contribution to the study of early Christian literature and history. The writings of the Apostolic Fathers bridge the gap between the NT and later Christian writers and allow the former to be read in a wider context.

Bibliography

P. Foster (ed.), The Writings of the Apostolic Fathers (London and New York, 2007); M. D. Goulder, 'Ignatius' "Docetists"', Vigiliae Christianae 53, 1999, pp. 16–30; R. M. Grant (ed.), The Apostolic Fathers: A New Translation and Commentary, 6 vols. (New York, 1964–8); M. W. Holmes (ed.), The Apostolic Fathers: Greek Texts and English Translations (Grand Rapids, ³2007); J. B. Lightfoot, The Apostolic Fathers, 5 vols. (London, 1885–90).

A. D. RICH AND D. A. HAGNER

APOSTOLIC SUCCESSION, see MINISTRY

ARAB CHRISTIAN THOUGHT

Arab Christians offered a great contribution to Christianity in Syria, Iraq and the Arab peninsula before the rise of Islam, and to a later stage in the Islamic era. Arab culture was influenced by Arab Christians during the pre-Islamic era. Christian poets contributed to the development of the language through the tribes of Rabiea, Twghlub, abd-Al-Qis and Tamim who lived in Najd, north-east of the Arabian peninsula. The development of the Arabic script is credited to three poets from the Christian tribe of Tai.

The rise of Islam influenced Arab Christians, especially in the three Arab centres of Christianity: Hira, al-Jabia and Najran. Hira remained a Christian city for two centuries after the Islamic occupation of 633. Its inhabitants were from the tribe of al-'Ibad, and they continued to influence the new Islamic culture. Al-Jabia was the capital for the Ghassanids and continued as a political and military centre during the period of Umayyad rule. Arab Muslim armies advanced to both Syria and Iraq, defeated the Byzantines and Persians, and brought to an end the Christian Arab Kingdoms of the Ghassanids and Montherits, Tadmur in Syria and the Nabatiens in Petra, Jordan.

The development of Arab Christian thought and its influence in the Arab cultures is represented by different Christian groups. The church of the Jacobites was persecuted in Syria under the Byzantine Empire and under the Persians. However, Jacobites translated Greek thought into Syriac and Arabic. Takrit was a great centre of learning, writing and translating. Nestorians* contributed to the Christian Arab literary heritage. The Copts* started the process of transformation by using Arabic instead of the Coptic language. During the time of the Fatimids, Christians used Arabic in writing, daily conversation and liturgy. Their contribution to Arab Christian literature began with the great figure of Bishop Severus Ibn Al-Muqaffa (d. 987).

Arab Christians lived under pressure during the different eras of Islamic rule: the Umayyads

(661–750), Abbasids (750–1258), Tulunids (868–905), Ikhshids (935–69), Fatimids (969–1171), Ayybids (1171–1250), Mamluks (1250–1517), and the Ottoman Empire from 1517. A new era for Arab Christians began with the end of the Ottoman Empire in 1920. Arab Christians called for independence from the Ottoman Empire and were pioneers in journalism; they translated much material in science, literature and philosophy.

The role of Christians in the early period of the spread of Islam was similar to modern times. Christians addressed the role of religion in their societies. Islamic umma (community of the faith) estranged Christians and made them feel like second-class citizens. They advocated an Arab identity based on language, history and destiny, and not on religion. The identity of Arab Christians is in full unity with Muslims and yet they are more reserved towards Arab Muslims in the identification between Arab and Islamic identity. When Christians feel accepted in society, they participate fully in any new movement and support it. But when they feel that they are not participating in the full sense, unity with Arabs or any other movement is seen as a threat of more marginalization. The question becomes: How far are Christians allowed to participate?

See also: ISLAM AND CHRISTIANITY; SYRIAN CHRISTIANITY.

Bibliography

T. Al-Bishry, Muslims and Copts (ET, Cairo, ⁴2004); A. Atiya, A History of Eastern Christianity (ET, Cairo, 2005); K. Cragg, The Arab Christians: A History in the Middle East (London, 1992); S. I. Saka, Syrian Churches Heritage: History of Christianity in the East (ET, Beirut ²2002); E. Shaheed, Christian Arabic Heritage: History of Christianity in the East (ET, Beirut ²2002); B. Suru, Syrian (Assyrians) Churches Heritage, History of Christianity in the East (ET, Beirut ²2002).

S. F. SHEHATA

ARIANISM

Arianism is, theologically speaking, the view that the Son is 'God but not true God': Christ is divine, God in an attenuated sense, but of a different nature and essence from God the Father. It derives its name from the Egyptian presbyter Arius of Alexandria, who expressed these views, and who was condemned by the Council of *Nicaea (the first Ecumenical Council) in 325.

Arius

The logic of Arius' position was that, as the only unbegotten being and origin of all that is, God the Father is completely different from everything else in existence, including the Son. Everything else, including the Son, belongs to the realm of coming to be and passing away, the realm of inherent instability; only God the Father simply is, and is eternally. The Son, since he is begotten by the Father, cannot be eternal, but must have come to be, whether in time or before time. The uniqueness of God the Father (Arius often simply calls him 'God') must be protected at all theological cost, because anything else is blasphemy.

Arius was not the only theologian to hold these views, in his own day or afterwards. It is now generally accepted that he was not the leader of a movement as such, merely the spark that ignited a theological disagreement that had been smouldering for some time, and the ill-favoured name that would best allow his opponents to attack his supporters in the wake of his theologically embarrassing death in a public lavatory in 336. Those of his contemporaries who shared his views felt that they were his guarantors rather than his followers, and later theologians who shared some of his views, which included the Gothic and Vandal churches of the fifth century and beyond, often claimed never to have heard of him. For this reason, most scholars in the field now prefer not to use the term 'Arianism' at all, except for the views of Arius himself and perhaps his immediate circle of Alexandrian associates. The controversy usually given Arius' name nonetheless remains one of the key disputes of doctrinal history.

One possible view of the controversy is that it was a debate within the Origenist tradition over different interpretations of *Origen's thought on the relationship between Father and Son, which came to draw in also theologians who were self-consciously opposed to this tradition. Origen had believed that the Son was eternal, but also that created things in general were eternal. There was agreement on both sides in the fourth century that created things were not eternal, but not on whether the Son, as 'first-born of all creation' was part of creation or not.

The initial dispute between Arius and Bishop Alexander of Alexandria over whether the Son was, in fact, eternal quickly spread beyond Egypt, not least because Arius was supported by some of the most powerful bishops of the day across the Eastern Roman Empire. These included the impeccably well-connected Eusebius, bishop of the then imperial capital of Nicomedia, to whom Arius appealed for help, and the renowned Scripture scholar and church historian *Eusebius of Caesarea. Alexander marshalled his allies in reply, and may even have planned a large council at Ancyra (Ankara) to solve the affair, but ecclesiastical councils were banned at around this time by Licinius, emperor of the Eastern empire. When *Constantine, emperor of the West, conquered Licinius near Nicomedia in late 324 and took over the East as well, the churches were in turmoil. Constantine set about trying to calm things down, moving the Ancyran synod to the imperial palace at Nicaea, and urging peace on all the bishops there.

The Council of Nicaea

The Council, which met in June 325, exonerated Eusebius of Caesarea (who had been provisionally excommunicated at an earlier synod), but condemned Arius, and Constantine sent Eusebius of Nicomedia into exile as well three months later, apparently for trying to plead Arius' cause after the Council ended. The Council also issued a *creed which makes some key theological moves. The creed, according to *Athanasius' later account in On the Decrees of Nicaea, was deliberately constructed by his own party to make it impossible for Arius or his allies to sign it, but most of the latter did so anyway, in the face of persuasion from Constantine, as Eusebius of Caesarea explains in an embarrassed and theologically somewhat tortuous letter to his church at home.

The key anti-Arian points of the creed of Nicaea and the anathemas (condemnations) attached to it are as follows. The Son is described as being 'begotten from the Father as Only-begotten, that is, from the Father's essence (ousia)', 'true God from true God' and 'begotten not made'. He is 'of the same essence (homoousios) with the Father'. 'And those who say "there was when he was not", and "Before he came to be he was not", and that he came to be out of nothing or from another hypostasis or essence, or that the Son of God is variable or changeable, these the catholic and apostolic church anathematizes.’

‘Begotten from the Father as Only-begotten’ is used to draw a distinction between the way in which created things are begotten and the way in which the Son is begotten. Arius and his allies had used Isa. 1:2, ‘I reared children and brought them up, but they have rebelled against me’, to show that ‘begotten’ did not necessarily imply anything special about the relationships between Father and Son, since it could also be used of human beings. But if John calls the Son ‘only begotten’ (John 1:18, KJV and NIV footnote), the creed implies that this must mean his mode of begetting is unique, and therefore different from that of the creatures. The same point is implied by ‘Begotten not made’: this demands that the two words mean different things (Arius had used them as equivalents).

‘From the Father’s essence’ was a key and controversial statement: Athanasius shows how it was employed to rule out the possibility that the Son could be ‘from the Father’ in the way that all things are. It also rules out the possibility that the Son might be from nothing (as Arius had earlier asserted). ‘True God from true God’ echoes the form of two preceding phrases that had probably been borrowed from Eusebius of Caesarea’s creed (God from God, Light from Light) but was meant to exclude the view (expressed by Eusebius himself) that the Son was God but not true God (in exegesis of John 17:3, ‘That they know you, the only true God’). Arius had also expressed the view the Father was ‘alone true’.

The expression ‘homoousios with the Father’ (consubstantial/of the same essence) is the creed’s most famous phrase. It spawned the analogous homoiousios (of like essence) as an attempted compromise in 358 (though the breadth of the appeal of this term should not be overestimated – it was on the table only for about three years, and only ever had a handful of supporters). The word was extremely controversial, not only because it was non-scriptural, but also because of its *Gnostic overtones (which Arius had already noted). It also worried a later generation of potential supporters of Nicaea, including Basil the Great, though they came to see Nicaea as the only chance of reuniting the church after so many decades of conflict. Whoever introduced it, its great defender was Athanasius, who saw it as guaranteeing the Son’s true divinity.

The Nicene anathemas are also interesting, partly because they serve as a useful test of the intentions of those compiling their own creeds later in the controversy, who vary between exactly reproducing each Nicene anathema, using a subtly different version of it, or leaving it off altogether. The one which was most quickly agreed on was ‘out of nothing’ (ex ouk ontôn), which even Arius himself came to reject (though it was revived in the later stages of the controversy). The assertion that the Son of God is variable or changeable (the words could also mean ‘varying’ and ‘changing’) was also ruled out in the Second Creed of Antioch in 341, but this is less significant as it was widely agreed that the Son did not alter in fact: the question was whether he was alterable in principle. ‘There was when he was not’, and ‘Before he came to be he was not’, meanwhile, were never anathematized in this form again by any of the opponents of Nicaea, and, indeed, not even by the Council of Constantinople of 381.

From Nicaea to 357

The debates and the politics continued in the years after Nicaea. Eusebius of Caesarea and Eustathius, anti-Arian bishop of Antioch, debated the word homoousios; Eustathius was deposed in the late 320s for murky reasons, and Arius and Eusebius of Nicomedia were recalled by Constantine from exile, for reasons that are equally unclear. Athanasius, Marcellus of Ancyra and others were deposed in their turn in the mid-330s by some sharp political manoeuvring; they were allowed to return to their sees after the death of Constantine in 337, only to be deposed again two years later.

Athanasius and Marcellus fled to Rome at the invitation of Julius, the bishop there, who invited the Eastern bishops to an ecumenical council in Rome to discuss the cases. The Easterners declined and held their own large council, the Dedication Council of Antioch, in 341 instead, which ratified three creeds, all avoiding the characteristic language of Nicaea. The so-called Fourth Creed of Antioch, issued a few months later, became the basis for a series of creeds over the next fifteen years, with more and more detailed anathemas being added. Events of the 340s were partly shaped by the rivalry between Constantine’s two surviving sons, Constantius and Constans, emperors of the Eastern and Western Empires respectively. Constans insisted on an ecumenical council, which was this time called to the frontier capital of Serdica (modern Sofia) in 343, but the leaders of the Eastern party used wrecking tactics to ensure the full council never met. Constans continued to insist that Athanasius and a further exiled bishop, Paul of Constantinople, be restored to their sees, finally threatening war. This was achieved in 345–6, but at a price: Paul was executed on Constans' death in 350, and Athanasius, who, having played his hand with greater skill, managed to hold on until 356, then had to flee for his life.

By 357, the defeat of the pro-Nicene party seemed secure. Athanasius was in hiding, Marcellus, who had become a lightning-rod for anti-Nicene sentiment, had withdrawn from the controversy, and his pupil and deacon Photinus of Sirmium was finally condemned in 351. A number of sympathetic Westerners had also been deposed. Meanwhile, the aged Ossius of Corduba, who had presided at Nicaea, had been kidnapped, held under house arrest and finally persuaded to sign a creed (the so-called 'blasphemy of Sirmium') which forbade the use of any ousia language as unscriptural, and particularly the expression homoousios. It was the symbolic death of Nicaea.

From Sirmium to Constantinople 381

It was also, however, the beginning of a new stage in the controversy. The opposing party, which like the pro-Nicene party had been in considerable tension ever since Serdica, at this point broke into open disagreement. Three parties are traditionally described as being formed at this point: the 'Semi-Arians' (as older treatments called them), or homoiousians, who held the Son to be homoiousios (like in substance) to the Father; the homoians (those using the formula that the Son is 'like', homoios, the Father); and the anomoians (or anomoians), also sometimes called Neo-Arians or, more properly, heterousians, who held that the Son is unlike, or of a different substance than, the Father.

In practice, matters are not quite so neat. The 'homoiousians' were in reality a small coterie around Basil of Ancyra, Marcellus' replacement, who dropped out of the picture fairly quickly after Basil's deposition at Constantinople in 360. Nonetheless, they attracted some fairly widespread support at the Council of Seleucia in 359 from bishops who were unhappy with the room the 'homoian' position left for heterousian theology. Homoios, meanwhile, was something of a flag of convenience based on insistence on not going beyond the Scriptures for those whose positions were themselves fairly heterousian, such as Ursacius of Singidunum and Valens of Mursa in the West and Acacius of Caesarea in the East. But the heterousians nonetheless differed from the homoians in important ways, as much political as theological. They were a small band of intellectual rigorists, led by the scholars Aetius and Eunomius, who were more interested in pursuing the truth than in compromising their views to make them more generally palatable. But they had some success at the very end of Constantius' reign: Eunomius was appointed bishop of Cyzicus, near Constantinople, in 360, to replace one of the deposed homoiousians, while the sees of Constantinople and Antioch ended the reign in the hands of Eudoxius and Euzoios, intermittent supporters of Aetius.

Constantius died in 361, to be replaced by his co-emperor Julian, who quickly declared himself a pagan and caused chaos by allowing all the exiled bishops of every theological hue to return to their sees. Julian himself died in 363, to be replaced briefly by Jovian and then by the brothers Valentinian and Valens in West and East respectively; Valens continued to favour the homoians, but with less vigour than Constantius had done. Aetius, Eunomius and their associates set up a series of what became parallel churches – joining the three churches many cities now already had since the days of Julian: homoian, Nicene and 'homoiousian'.

The homoians in this period sent a highly successful missionary to the Goths, Wulfila, who converted them to homoian Christianity, more or less at the same time as homoianism was losing ground in the East to a new pro-Nicene tradition. In 378, when Valens died fighting the Goths in one of the most disastrous military campaigns in centuries, the homoians lost their Eastern imperial support for good. Theodosius, the new emperor, proclaimed that orthodoxy lay with those who were in communion with Damasus of Rome and Peter of Alexandria, Athanasius' pro-Nicene successor. A council, called to *Constantinople in 381, while almost entirely Eastern and dominated by internal squabbles, ratified the Nicene creed, though it also composed one of its own, the one most often described today as the 'Nicene Creed'. The Eastern homoians and heterousians retired for good to small churches outside the walls of the major cities, and to monastic communities on their country estates.

But the Gothic and Vandal kingdoms in the West would continue to be homoian for centuries to come.

See also: COUNCILS; CHRISTOLOGY; GOD; TRINITY.

Bibliography

L. Ayres, Nicaea and Its Legacy: An Approach to Fourth-Century Trinitarian Theology (Oxford and New York, 2004); R. C. Gregg and D. E. Groh, Early Arianism: A View of Salvation (London, 1981); R. P. C. Hanson, The Search for the Christian Doctrine of God (Edinburgh, 1993); R. Lyman, 'A Topography of Heresy: Mapping the Rhetorical Creation of Arianism', in M. R. Barnes and D. H. Williams (eds.), Arianism after Arius; Essays in the Development of the Fourth Century Trinitarian Conflicts (Edinburgh, 1993); R. P. Vaggione, Eunomius of Cyzicus and the Nicene Revolution (Oxford, 2000); Maurice Wiles, Archetypal Heresy: Arianism through the Centuries (Oxford, 1996); R. D. Williams, Arius: Heresy and Tradition (London, 2001).

S. PARVIS

ARISTOTELIANISM

Aristotelianism is a philosophical tradition which finds its principal source and inspiration in the works of the ancient Greek philosopher Aristotle (384–322 BC). This article will first examine briefly some of Aristotle's key ideas before assessing the history of Aristotelianism and the influence of Aristotle's work within Christian theology.

Key ideas

Ethics

Aristotle was a pupil of Plato, and the extent to which Aristotle developed or departed from his master's teachings is much contested (see L. Gerson, Aristotle and Other Platonists). Aristotle followed Plato closely in his understanding of the good life and the importance of the virtues (see Nicomachean Ethics, I.x–xiii; II). For Aristotle, a virtue (aretē) is an excellence in the fulfilment of a certain function or task (ergon). These functions or tasks will be particular to certain creatures such as human beings, and in the virtuous performance of such tasks we will find our 'happiness' or 'fulfilment' (eudaimonia). Such happiness is not merely 'cheerfulness', but rather a state of spiritual and physical well-being or fulfilment which can be more or less intense. Virtue and happiness are not states but activities: in being happy, one displays excellence in the performance of a certain activity such as generosity (a moral virtue) or learning (an intellectual virtue). The virtues are to be practised and honed over a whole lifetime in pursuit of the 'happiness' which is humanity's goal and fulfilment. Aristotle's ethics, like the whole of his philosophy, is therefore profoundly teleological.

Metaphysics and physics

Aristotle's *metaphysics includes three key distinctions. The first is between potency and act (see Metaphysics IX). This refers to the distinction between the qualities or states that something has potentially, and the qualities or states which something has actually. For example, a bowl of cold water is potentially hot, and by the application of heat it might become actually hot.

Secondly, Aristotle distinguishes between *substance (the essence or particularity of something; not, as the English term might suggest, simply its material qualities) and accident (the variable characteristics which a substance might possess 'accidentally', such as height in a human being) (see Metaphysics VII). This allows Aristotle to distinguish between substantial change and accidental change. For example, if a person were to dye their hair a different colour, they would still remain a person; this would be an accidental change, or a change to one of the person's variable qualities known as 'accidents'. A substantial change involves an alteration in what something is, for example, the turning of a tree into a desk.

Finally, Aristotle supports so-called 'hylomorphism', which can be found in the teachings of Plato. This is the view that substance can be analysed in terms of 'form' and 'matter' (see Physics II). Matter is the underlying material element of any substance and, of itself, is purely potential. All matter is qualified as a certain kind of thing (e.g. a bird or a desk) by possessing a 'form' (say the form of a bird or a desk). The 'form' is what makes something a particular kind of thing (e.g. a man rather than a tree). For Plato, the Forms exist more truly in a realm independent of the physical, visible reality we inhabit. For Aristotle, 'form' is immanent within particular things.

Regarding the concept of ‘cause’ in metaphysics and physics, Aristotle makes the important distinction between material, formal, efficient and final causes (see Metaphysics I.3). The most important of these is the final cause, namely the goal of an effect, or the reason why something happens. For example, we might ask what causes someone to go shopping for food. Aristotle would say that the most important causal explanation for someone shopping for food is the desire for food and the need to satiate hunger. This is the ‘goal’, or final cause of, and the reason for, the shopping trip.

Sciences and logic

Aristotle wrote a number of treatises on logic and the relationship between the increasingly independent subject areas included within the broad pursuit of philosophy (see esp. Prior Analytics and Posterior Analytics). This was an attempt to delineate more clearly the relative certainty of different subject matters such as physics and metaphysics, their appropriate methodologies, the way in which less certain areas of knowledge require the support of more certain areas of knowledge, and the rules of logic, including syllogism.

Reception and influence

The early church was deeply influenced by ancient Greek philosophy. The notion that this constitutes an ‘infection’ of a ‘pure’ biblical theology cannot be maintained; there never was a time when Christian theologians were not influenced positively and negatively by the philosophy of ancient Greece. The teachings of Platonism were much more influential than Aristotelianism in the early church. It was thought that Plato, in speaking more readily of the transcendent nature of the Good and the Forms, was more conducive to Christian theology than the supposedly more materialistic teachings of the Aristotelians.

Despite the deployment of Aristotle’s thought by prominent theologians such as *Boethius, Aristotelianism’s influence was not considerable until the recovery of Aristotle’s writings, beginning in the ninth century with his teaching on logic. Certain of Aristotle’s writings in natural philosophy were well known in the Islamic East (particularly in the work of Avicenna [980–1037] and *Averroes) and later transmitted to the Latin West. It was not until the twelfth century that Aristotelianism began to have significant impact on Christian theology. The first known Latin commentary on a work by Aristotle since Boethius, on the Posterior Analytics, was written in the 1220s by Robert Grosseteste (c. 1170–1253). Aristotelian philosophy reached the height of its influence in the thirteenth-century work of *Albertus Magnus and *Thomas Aquinas. Aquinas wrote many commentaries on Aristotle’s works and deployed his metaphysical categories extensively in his writings on the existence of God, grace and sacramental theology. However, Aquinas often deploys these categories in quite un-Aristotelian ways (e.g. in his use of substance and accident in the discussion of transubstantiation), so the extent to which Aquinas can be termed ‘an Aristotelian’ is much contested. It is clear that in the thirteenth century Aristotelianism is introduced into Christian theology in the context of Neoplatonism’s continued prevalence.

In the late thirteenth century certain Aristotelian teachings became suspect and were condemned as heretical by the Bishop of Paris, Stephen Tempier. Of particular concern was Aristotle’s view that the universe is of endless time. While Aquinas thought this a rationally defensible claim, it nevertheless appeared to contradict the Christian teaching that God created the universe ex nihilo.

Aristotelian teachings were particularly conducive to Christian theology in three areas. First, the categories of act, form, substance and final cause could be applied to the doctrine of *God. In being distinct from creation, God was to be understood as pure act (having no potentiality), pure form (having no matter), a substance with no accidents, and the final cause of motion by being the object of creation’s desire (see Metaphysics XII). Secondly, the Aristotelian understanding of virtue aided the exposition of what would constitute the good Christian life within the polis of the church. To Aristotle’s ethical teachings were added the theological virtues of faith, hope and love and the Christian understanding of the final goal of human life (eudaimonia), namely the beatific vision (see *Vision of God). This aspect of Aristotelianism has recently been very influential in Christian ethics, particularly in the work of Alasdair *MacIntyre, Stanley *Hauerwas and John *Milbank. Finally, Aristotelian teaching on the relation of the different spheres of human knowledge (the so-called ‘subalternation of the sciences’) influenced Boethius and Aquinas in their attempts to articulate the distinctive nature of Christian theology or 'holy teaching' (sacra doctrina) in relation to other disciplines, particularly metaphysics.

The extensive use of Aristotle's texts in the schools and universities of Europe alongside the proliferation of commentaries on his works ensured that Aristotelianism was the predominant philosophy of the Renaissance. Of particular importance were Aristotle's logic and natural philosophy. However, the direct influence of Aristotelianism on Christian theology waned during the Reformation, indicating the extent to which philosophical learning was increasingly divorced from theology. Aristotelian natural philosophy was to remain dominant until the late sixteenth and seventeenth centuries when the advent of modern science and philosophy, particularly Newtonian mechanics and Cartesian philosophy, recast the intellectual landscape of Europe.

The commendation of Thomistic Aristotelianism in Pope Leo XIII's 1879 encyclical Aeterni Patris ensured that the influence of Aristotelianism as expounded by Aquinas would be considerable in late nineteenth- and early twentieth-century *Roman Catholic theology. More recently, the Aristotelian influence on the doctrine of God, particularly the notion of the 'unmoved mover' from Metaphysics XII, has been widely and very controversially criticized by those of the *process and *open schools of theology. These schools argue that Aristotelianism renders God 'static' and 'apathetic' in contrast to the personal God of the Bible. It has been suggested that this is, in fact, a misunderstanding of the Aristotelian view of divine causation. To refer to God as the 'unmoved mover' is to suggest that God is beyond movement and rest, and most fully 'dynamic'.

While the exact nature of Aristotle's influence on key theologians such as Thomas Aquinas remains contested, the importance of neo-Aristotelian virtue ethics in contemporary Christian theology cannot be denied.

See also: PLATONISM; PLATONISM, CHRISTIAN.

Bibliography

Works: Aristotle's works are available in many editions and translations. The following are the best recent single-edition translations of those works mentioned in this article: Metaphysics, tr. Hugh Lawson-Tancred (London, 1998); Nicomachean Ethics, tr. R. Crisp (Cambridge, 2000); Physics, tr. R. Waterfield (Oxford and New York, 2008); Posterior Analytics, tr. J. Barnes (Oxford, ²1994); Prior Analytics, tr. R. Smith (Indianapolis, 1989).

Studies: H.-G. Gadamer, The Idea of the Good in Platonic-Aristotelian Philosophy, tr. P. C. Smith (Yale, 1988); L. Gerson, Aristotle and Other Platonists (Ithaca, new edn 2006); S. Hauerwas and C. Pinches, Christians among the Virtues: Theological Conversations with Ancient and Modern Ethics (Notre Dame, 1997), esp. part I; M. Jordan, Ordering Wisdom: Hierarchy of Philosophical Discourses in Aquinas (Notre Dame, 1987); idem, Rewritten Theology: Aquinas after His Readers (Oxford and Malden, 2006); D. Knowles, The Evolution of Medieval Thought (London and New York, ²1988), esp. parts 3 and 4; J. Lear, Aristotle: The Desire to Understand (Cambridge, 1988); D. A. D. Liscia, Method and Order in Renaissance Philosophy of Nature: The Aristotle Commentary Tradition (Aldershot, 1998); A. MacIntyre, After Virtue: A Study in Moral Theory (London, ³2007); J. Milbank, Theology and Social Theory: Beyond Secular Reason (Oxford, ²2006); S. Oliver, Philosophy, God and Motion (London and New York, 2005), chs. 2 and 4; C. Pinnock, Most Moved Mover: A Theology of God's Openness (Grand Rapids, 2001).

S. A. OLIVER

ARMINIANISM

Jacobus Arminius (1560–1609) was a Dutch theologian educated at Leiden, Basel and Geneva, at which latter place he studied under *Beza. Upon returning to the Netherlands, he served as pastor in Amsterdam before becoming professor at Leiden in 1603. He questioned some basic assumptions of *Reformed theology, arousing a bitter and vituperative controversy.

Central to Arminius' theology was his radical view of *predestination. He attacked the speculative supralapsarianism of Beza on the grounds of its lack of Christocentricity, Christ being not the foundation of election but only the subordinate cause of an already foreordained salvation, resulting in a split between the decree of election and the decree concerning salvation through the incarnate Christ. This Christocentric concern led Arminius to invert the order of election and *grace. For Reformed orthodoxy, the historical manifestation of God's grace was dependent on election. For Arminius, election was subsequent to grace. God decrees to save all who repent, believe and persevere. Election is conditional on man's response, dependent on God's foreknowledge of his faith and *perseverance. The possibility of a true believer totally or finally falling from grace and perishing is not denied. Consequently, there could be no *assurance of ultimate salvation. Moreover, God gives sufficient grace so that man may believe on Christ if he will. His *will is free. He can believe or he can resist God's grace. Redemptive grace is universal not particular, sufficient not irresistible; man's will is free not bound, and cooperates with God's grace rather than being vivified by it. Effectively, Arminius was saying that God does not choose anyone, but instead foresees that some will choose him. This was a position with *Pelagian and Greek patristic roots.

Arminius' views were developed by his followers in the five theses of the Remonstrant Articles (1610): (1) Predestination is conditional on a person's response, being grounded in God's foreknowledge; (2) Christ died for each and every person but only believers are saved; (3) a person is unable to believe and needs the grace of God; but (4) this grace is resistible; (5) whether all the regenerate will persevere requires further investigation. The resultant controversy assumed convulsive national importance, culminating in the Synod of *Dort (1618–19) which condemned the Remonstrant Articles (see *Dort, Canons of) and removed and exiled the Remonstrant ministers. To the Contra-Remonstrants it appeared that the followers of Arminius had adopted a *Semi-Pelagian view of grace, had destroyed the doctrine of assurance by questioning perseverance and, through their inversion of predestination, were introducing a conditional gospel which threatened the *atonement and *justification.

Some of the fears of the Contra-Remonstrants appear soon to have been fulfilled. Simon Episcopius (1583–1643), Remonstrant leader at Dort, a prominent figure behind the Remonstrant Articles and professor at Leiden, made further developments in his own theology. Reiterating a conditional doctrine of predestination, he held that only the Father had deity of himself, the Son and the Holy Spirit being subordinate not simply in terms of generation and spiration but also in essence (see *Trinity). His stress was on Christ as exemplar, with doctrine subordinated to ethics.

The commitment to universal atonement (see *Atonement, extent of) led followers of Arminius to oppose the penal *substitutionary view of the atonement held by Reformed orthodoxy whereby Christ actually paid the penalty of all the sins of all his people and thus made effective atonement. For Arminianism, since Christ was held to have suffered for everyone, he could not have paid the penalty for their sins, since all are not saved. His death simply permits the Father to forgive all who repent and believe. It makes salvation possible, but does not intrinsically atone for anyone in particular. In fact, the atoning death of Christ was not essential for salvation by virtue of God's own nature as both loving and righteous, but was rather the means God chose to save us for prudential administrative reasons. Hugo *Grotius, an Arminian, was the first clearly to expound the governmental theory of the atonement.

Despite initial suppression in the Netherlands, Arminianism spread pervasively throughout the world, eventually permeating all Protestant churches. In particular, its growth was facilitated by the impact of John *Wesley. Wesleyan Arminianism allowed that depravity was total, affecting every facet of man's being, thus highlighting the need for grace. However, synergism (see *Will) was retained, for the work of Christ was related to all men, delivering all from the guilt of Adam's first sin and granting sufficient grace for repentance and faith, providing people 'improve' or appropriate it. Hence, the stress falls on human appropriation of grace. Additionally, the possibility of a true believer falling from grace was expressly accepted with the consequence that while one could have assurance of present salvation, there could be no present assurance of ultimate salvation. The leading Wesleyan theologian, Richard Watson (1781–1833), in his Theological Institutes (1823), did not even include election in his table of contents, regarding it as a temporal act subsequent to the administration of the means of salvation.

In recent years, Arminianism has become intermingled with *Baptist and *dispensationalist ideas, particularly in its contact with American *fundamentalism. However, strictly speaking, it should be disentangled from such extraneous accretions so as to focus on its own intrinsic tenets: election based on foreknowledge, partial depravity, universal non-efficacious atonement, universal resistible grace, a voluntaristic view of faith, a Semi-Pelagian co-operation of a person with God's grace and the possibility of a true believer falling from grace with concomitant undermining of assurance.

Bibliography

Works: J. Arminius, Works, 3 vols. (London, 1825, 1828, 1875).

Studies: C. Bangs, Arminius (Grand Rapids, 2nd 1985); A. H. W. Harrison, Arminianism (London, 1937); P. K. Jewett, Election and Predestination (Grand Rapids, 1985); R. Olson, Arminian Theology: Myths and Realities (Downers Grove, 2006); J. Owen, Works, vol. 10 (repr. London, 1967); R. E. Picirilli, Grace, Faith, Free Will (Nashville, 2002); C. H. Pinnock (ed.), Grace Unlimited (Minneapolis, 1975); P. Schaff, The Creeds of Christendom (New York, 1919 edn); C. W. Williams, John Wesley's Theology Today (London, 1969).

R. W. A. LETHAM

ART, see AESTHETICS

ASBURY, FRANCIS (1745–1816)

Francis Asbury, though English, was the principal architect of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the USA. He was born in Handsworth, Staffordshire, and as a teenage apprentice was drawn to evangelical preaching and then to Wesleyan *Methodism. He became a class leader in the Methodist society at West Bromwich Heath in 1762 and a local preacher the following year. In 1767 Asbury was appointed an itinerant preacher by the Wesleyan Conference, and after four years' travelling in English circuits he volunteered to go to America. From 1771 until his death in 1816, Asbury played a crucial role in shaping American Methodism. He navigated the tense years of the War of Independence, and secured the formal establishment of the Methodist Episcopal Church as a separate body from the British Wesleyan Connexion at the 'Christmas Conference' of 1784. Ordained deacon, elder and superintendent on the authority of John *Wesley, Asbury acquiesced in the adoption of the title 'bishop' (to Wesley's dismay), but set an example of frugality, discipline and ceaseless itinerancy which saw American Methodism grow by 1816 to 214,000 members.

Bibliography

F. Baker, From Wesley to Asbury: Studies in Early American Methodism (Durham, NC, 1976); D. Salter, America's Bishop: The Life of Francis Asbury (Nappanee, 2003); J. A. Vickers, Francis Asbury (Peterborough, 1993); J. Wigger, American Saint: Francis Asbury and the Methodists (New York, 2009).

M. WELLINGS

ASCENSION [AND HEAVENLY SESSION OF CHRIST]

The ascension helps Christians address an obvious but central question: how should we understand *Jesus' physical absence? His physical absence might suggest his indifference to, desertion of, or impotence towards, this present world, or even that his incarnation is now over. All this would leave Jesus less central to Christians' lives now.

Traditional theology has seen the ascension as the transition from Jesus' state of humiliation to his exaltation (Dan. 7:13 arguably depicts this). It is the precursor to his session (being seated) at the right hand of God the Father. Omitting the ascension therefore risks overemphasizing his state of humiliation, while understating the benefits of his exaltation. Yet equally, the ascension does not simply reverse the humiliation, for the Son's *incarnation, which is central to his humiliation (Phil. 2:7), continues in the ascension: it is the God-Man Jesus who ascends, and his incarnation continues.

Biblical material

Both Nicene and Apostles' Creeds contain the ascension, suggesting its importance. Although extensive biblical material is relatively scant, the *creeds' emphasis is warranted. Acts 1:9–11 recounts the event, where a cloud, readily associated with God's glory, hides the risen Jesus from his disciples (cf. Luke 24:51). Ascension motifs are not exclusively Lucan, but occur throughout the NT, notably in John (e.g. 14:2), Ephesians (1:20–22; 4:8–10) and Hebrews.

Discussion of the ascension's significance can usefully begin with the ascension as the fulfilment of three psalms. Further fulfilment themes can be drawn, for example, from Dan. 7.

Psalm 110

In Eph. 1:19–21, Christ's resurrection and ascension are associated with power and fulfillment. God the Father is powerful enough to establish his Son as raised, ascended and seated with him, so fulfilling the enthronement promises of Ps. 110. This matters since Ps. 110 is so pervasive in NT understandings of Jesus (especially in Heb.). If Ps. 110, as interpreted by the NT, includes the ascension, then adequate understandings of Jesus must include it too. Jesus' ascension relates to God's plan for the cosmos to be united under Jesus' headship (Eph. 1:10), and demonstrates his ability to execute his promises and his faithfulness to them.

Ps. 110 speaks of one who is both king and priest, and Hebrews develops this extensively, applying Ps. 110's priestly language to Jesus who, having ascended into the heavens (Heb. 4:14), intercedes now for his people (Heb. 7:25–26).

Psalm 68

In Eph. 4:8–10, Paul envisages fulfilment of the promises of Ps. 68:18 that Yahweh, or his anointed, will ascend in victory. This victory element clarifies the enthronement of Eph. 1:20–21: enthronement occurs despite opposition (cf. Ps. 110 and Ps. 2) and relates not to mere attempts at power, but to victory won. Finally, Eph. 4:8–10 asserts that 'the ascender' is identical with 'the descender': the one who ascends in victory is he who visited humanity in humility. This identification of ascender with descender allays fears that the ascension is merely victorious power: it is the victorious power of the humble, servant Son. Theologies of exaltation and humiliation are joined.

Psalm 8

Arguably Heb. 2:5–9 sees Ps. 8 fulfilled in Jesus as ascended: he is the human in whom God's creation plan for a sovereign humanity is fulfilled. This indicates the importance of Jesus' continuing incarnation. Without him, there would be no 'last Adam' now to be the head of the new, re-created race, and the cosmos would continue to lack its perfected human head.

Consequences

This ascension theology has profound and glorious consequences. First, God's faithfulness to his promises is confirmed, but, vitally, since what Pss 2 and 110 promise to the Son is so vast (cosmic kingship), if God can keep this promise, we are assured he will keep others. In particular, Jesus' ascension is linked to a promise of his return (Acts 1:11). Paradoxically, the ascension, properly understood, underscores the certainty of Jesus' return, not his absence.

Secondly, the ascension speaks of victory won: the decisive battle is past (the nations conspire 'in vain', Ps. 2:1). Jesus' 'absence' is not weakness or desertion, tempting us perhaps to see Christian life in the present as something to do on our own, whose outcome even depends fundamentally on us. Instead, the ascension as victory focuses the Christian on the Jesus who reigns now. This challenges how much we trust, for clearly Jesus' rule is still contested, and gives theodicy questions a Christological dimension.

As victory, the ascension relativizes human power and legitimacy. It underlines Jesus' rule as universal, over all people for all time, not simply of Jews in the first century. Resistance to Jesus thus appears both illegitimate (Jesus' cosmic kingship is God's eternal plan) and ultimately futile (Jesus is already decisive victor). The ascension has current political applications, necessarily subverting human claims to autonomous power, whether totalitarian oligarchy or tyranny of the majority, and including claims to power within the church (see *State).

This subversive aspect is heightened when we remember that believers are currently united by faith with the ascended, reigning Jesus. To the world, believers may seem simply oppressed, but they are also united to the ascended Christ and sit with him (Eph. 2:6). Christian experiences of oppression remain real and agonizing, but this renders them less absolute and final.

Thirdly, the Hebrews material implies the ascended Jesus' priestly work is necessary and sufficient. This should allow us to approach God with confidence (Heb. 4:16) and suggests that constructing further priesthoods offering saving sacrifices or saving intercession fail to grasp the ascended Jesus' priestly work; they imply his work is unnecessary or insufficient.

Fourthly, the ascension relates to Jesus' gifts to the current church. The *Holy Spirit is sent by the Father at Jesus' behest after he has ascended. Jesus comments (John 16:7) that it is to our advantage that he departs, so that the Spirit may come. This indicates how precious he considers the gift of the Spirit, and that his ascension is the necessary precursor to Pentecost. The victorious Jesus also sends *gifts on his church (Eph. 4:7, 11), to build her common life under his headship. An ascension-less church therefore risks being a church that has not properly understood or accepted Jesus' gifts for her life now.

See also: ESCHATOLOGY; KINGDOM OF GOD.

Bibliography

D. Farrow, Ascension and Ecclesia (Edinburgh, 1999).

M. OVEY

ASCETICISM AND MONASTICISM

Asceticism and monasticism are almost synonymous terms, since the origins of the ascetical life are the origins of monasticism. Asceticism (from Gk askesis = practice, training or exercise) describes a system of spiritual practices designed to encourage interior vigilance so as to combat vices and develop virtues by means of self-discipline and self-knowledge in the context of seeking God. Its chief preoccupation is the desire to master the lower nature and gain freedom from the disordered passions through renunciation of the world and the flesh as part of the great struggle against the devil. The religious practice of renouncing worldly pursuits in order to fully devote one's life to spiritual work also describes monasticism (from Gk monachos = solitary, alone) and is found in many religions.

Asceticism was practised in biblical times, and events like the temptations of Jesus in the wilderness and the lifestyle of John the Baptist in the desert were later regarded as helpful models when monasticism became the leading representation of asceticism.

As an example of early asceticism, *Eusebius of Caesarea (d. 339) refers to the first successors to the apostles as following the Lord's counsel to distribute their possessions to the poor and become travelling preachers of the gospel. These preachers were often celibates who by the mid-second century constituted a clearly distinguishable group in the church, alongside those who were to marry. By the third century, ecclesiastical writers such as *Clement of Alexandria and *Origen were providing spiritual guidance for celibates and virgins, with voluntary poverty, self-denial and obedience to the local bishop seen as the normal Christian life.

The practice of seeking seclusion from the world in order to better practise ascetic ideals was not unknown in the third century, but it was not until the conversion of *Constantine that it became general. By the beginning of the fourth century a new expression of the ascetical life was introduced to the church in two forms: eremitical and cenobitic monasticism.

Christian monasticism first emerged as a distinct movement in the early fourth century, but it was not so much an innovation as a fresh expression of the ascetic spirit present in Christianity from the start (K. Ware, The Oxford History of Christianity, Oxford 1990, p. 139).

The rise of monasticism at this time is attributed to the huge changes in the church brought about by the Emperor Constantine's conversion. These included the acceptance of Christianity as the main Roman religion and the subsequent laxity following the realignment of the church along more material and political lines. The end of persecution also meant that *martyrdom by blood was no longer an option to prove one's piety, and instead the long-term 'martyrdom' of the ascetic became common.

Monastic development

The history of monasticism begins with Antony of Egypt (251–356) as he was the first monk about whom anything was written. He was the pioneer of anchorite monasticism, the solitary life of the hermit. After years of solitary existence in lower Egypt, he formed a colony of hermits and undertook to organize the monks who had sought him out for spiritual guidance and had become his disciples.

Monasticism soon adopted a more communal form, and the two great founders of this form of monastic life are Pachomius of Egypt (286–346) and Basil the Great of Caesarea (330–79). The 'common life' form of monasticism became widespread primarily in Egypt and Asia Minor. Pachomius's communities were found around Tabbennisi in Thebaid, near the Nile and in areas of Egypt less remote than that of Antony. A gifted organizer, his idea was an ascetic koinonia based on the primitive Jerusalem community where monasteries were self-sufficient colonies developed along military lines. Chastity and poverty were presupposed, and to these Pachomius added obedience as a necessary condition for life in community. Organization required obedience, and so a rule of life was introduced.

In Asia Minor, Basil also strongly encouraged the cenobitic form of monasticism as being more suitable for most people than the eremitic style. His model of a monastic community as a brotherhood of love and service counteracted his fear that the eremitic life could lead to a neglect of the gospel call to charity, philanthropy and issues of social justice. He also insisted on monastic obedience as a check on those given to excessive display of extreme ascetical practices that were bringing the monastic movement into disrepute. His more informal counsels became the ascetic rule, or Ascetica, the rule still used today by the Eastern Orthodox Church of which he was the patriarch.

While Pachomius and Basil set the pattern for monasticism, the most important figure in its development was *Benedict of Nursia, who created his famous rule at his monastery in Monte Cassino, Italy (529). Largely influenced by the contemporary but anonymous Rule of the Master as well as the writings of Basil and Pachomius, Benedict softened the severity of the primitive ascetic practices of earlier monasticism and made it a more practical life-choice. The Benedictine asceticism of silence, obedience, solitude, humility, manual labour and liturgical prayer were designed to unite people with Christ and with one another. His desire to make monasteries 'a family, a home for those seeking God' proved more suitable to the peoples and conditions of the West.

Less than half a century after Benedict's death, Augustine (of Canterbury) and his fellow monks in 597 brought the Benedictine Rule to England. However, they found a system of monasticism already established bearing the characteristics of the main features of the Egyptian model: namely, Irish Celtic monasticism.

Characteristic of the rigorous asceticism of this system was an emphasis on missionary work – a voluntary exile of wandering for the love of God (peregrinati). For example, Columbanus (540–615) was a native of Ireland, but his voluntary exile took him to Gaul, Burgundy, and finally to northern Italy. He founded the monasteries of Luxeuil in Gaul, St Gall in present-day Switzerland, then Bobbio in northern Italy. Monks like Columbanus took with them their rule and their culture, establishing monasteries under the sole direction of the abbot. Columbanus wrote a more austere rule which existed side by side with Benedict's at Luxeuil and Bobbio, but by the mid-seventh century it had ceased to exist as a separate rule.

Spread to the West

Those who shaped the monastic movement and its eventual spread to the West are many, but include *Athanasius whose Life of Antony was a classic in his lifetime, and Evagrius Ponticus (d. 399) who taught ascetic life in Nitria, numbering among his pupils Palladius and Rufinus. It also includes such luminaries as Ambrose in Milan (d. 397), who as bishop planted monasteries, and the scholar *Jerome in Rome, who championed the ascetical life and translated the rule of Pachomius into Latin. *Augustine of Hippo in North Africa founded a monastery at Hippo; when he became bishop in 396 he turned the episcopal house into a monastic community, thus propagating the monastic life. Martin of Tours, a pioneer in Gaul, founded a monastery at Liguge (c. 361), and in 371 at Marmoutier, near Tours, where he became bishop. John Cassian (d. 435), who founded a monastery at Marseilles, was an expert on Egyptian asceticism and (drawing from Evagrius) wrote his Institutes and Conferences (c. 415–30) which influenced the Benedictine Rule. Along with the recorded counsel known as the 'sayings of the desert fathers' on the ascetical life, the works of Cassian were regarded as classics for centuries.

Over the next three centuries the Benedictine monasteries became centres of learning and culture in Europe, and their missionary work was the principal reason why Christianity spread throughout Europe. Until the eleventh century nearly all monks in the West were Benedictines, but the institutionalization of the monastic tradition had by that time led to a serious relaxation of the primitive ideals of poverty, chastity and obedience. The growing pressure of nation states and monarchies also threatened the wealth and power of the orders. The system broke down in the eleventh and twelfth centuries as religion became far less a preserve of the religious elite.

The eleventh to the thirteenth centuries saw a number of reforms being initiated, with the result that about this time new monastic orders sprang up, most of which originated in France or Italy. These included the Cistercians who began in Citeaux (Latin = Cistercium), France, in 1098 and set about 'interpreting the rule in the spirit of the desert fathers'. They expanded under *Bernard of Clairvaux, who organized sixty-five monastic houses in France alone. The *Franciscans began in 1209, setting an example in simplicity and poverty at a time of great clerical wealth. The *Dominicans were founded in 1216 as a teaching and preaching order following the Augustinian Rule.

After the Black Death (1346–49) the depopulation of Western Europe was too great to support monasticism on a large scale, and the orders began to decrease. By the time of the Reformation many monasteries were in decline, and their lands and assets were seized with little resistance. At the same time, many of the leading Reformers, notably Martin Luther, were monks who had left the cloister. They abandoned the traditional forms of monastic piety, but sought to recover the underlying spiritual ideals in a way which was not overtly ascetic.

New expressions of the monastic heart

In the next centuries, religious orders for both men and women (combining aspects of the contemplative orders and the active orders) had spread across the world. By the mid-twentieth century, in a deviation from the traditional orders, many different expressions of the monastic 'common life' appeared. In 1938 George McLeod founded the Iona Community in Scotland. In 1946 Roger Schutz, known as Brother Roger, founded the Taizé Community in France as an independent religious order. In 1947 Mother Basilea Schlink founded the Lutheran Evangelical Sisterhood of Mary, in Darmstadt, Germany. The popularity of the writings of the Trappist monk Thomas *Merton brought monasticism to the wider church and the wider world. Monastic spirituality lived outside the cloister as a community of the heart. This was continued in the United States by the Cistercian monks Thomas Keating and Basil Pennington and Benedictine monk John Main (d. 1982). Along with others, they initiated a monastic renewal touching the contemporary secular world. As a result of this new interest in monasticism, the late twentieth century spawned a movement often referred to as 'a new monasticism'. Citing Dietrich *Bonhoeffer's Life Together (1938), a written account of his experimental Christian community in Finkenwalde at that time and his earlier statement that 'the renewal of the church will come from a new type of monasticism', the movement saw asceticism in terms of the daily spiritual disciplines needed to fulfil the 'one thing necessary' of seeking God in the midst of life.

It seems no coincidence that these monastic expressions started during a time of enormous social upheaval as the church is experiencing exile within society and there is a growing dissatisfaction with the pervading popular culture. This is the context in which new monasticism is flourishing, as Christians seek an alternative way of being together in the world, much like the first founders of monasticism.

See also: MONASTIC THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

D. J. Chitty, The Desert a City (Oxford, 1966); M. de Dreuille, Seeking the Absolute Love (Leominster and New York, 1999); D. Knowles, Christian Monasticism (London, 1969); C. H. Lawrence, Medieval Monasticism (London and New York, 1984).

J. T. MILLER

ASIAN CHRISTIAN THEOLOGY

Asian Christians share a common concern to relate their Christian faith to real life in various Asian contexts. Reflecting on the nature and content of theology, Asian theologians have come to believe that every form of theological production is culturally conditioned. As a result, on the one hand there has been a critical evaluation of traditional theology developed in the West and imported to Asia, and, on the other, an enthusiastic pursuit of contextual theology that speaks to the actual questions people in Asia are asking today in the midst of changing social and political situations. Asian theology has started the growing process, and is already bearing fruits of different kinds. This article attempts to point out some observable trends and salient features of Asian theology, at the risk of overgeneralizing a complex development.

From c. 1970 there has been a shift of emphasis in Asian theology from 'indigenization' to '*contextualization'. The former tends to be 'past-orientated' and remains a static concept, with its stress on the relation of the gospel to traditional cultures; the latter is 'future-orientated' and dynamic, concerned also with the gospel in relation to social change. On the whole, most evangelicals are slow in responding to this change, and have not really gone beyond the 'indigenization' stage.

Theology serves to articulate one's understanding of the eternal truth in terms of one's given locale and context. The Bible, being the foundation and the source, provides the content of any Christian theology. With the Christian gospel as the God-given answer to human problems, it is the task of indigenous theology to discover what the real questions are, in order that Asian theology may assume a systematic form dictated by the salient emphases of Asian culture. The issue involves *gospel and *culture, and centres on the presentation of the gospel in different contexts, such as *Hindu, *Buddhist, *Islamic and totalitarian contexts. In theology, this means that particular contexts help to decide what particular area of faith should receive special emphasis. Raimon Pannikar utilized the Hindu concept of the avatar for his doctrine of the cosmic Christ; Aloysius in Sri Lanka tried to relate the gospel to Buddhism; and Lee Jung-Young has tried to use the Daoist concept of yin and yang in trinitarian theology. Discussions on the relationship between *evangelism and social responsibility (see *Missiology and *Society, theology of) have prompted evangelicals to face seriously some of the important issues in Asia (see *Lausanne Covenant). These include communism (see *Marxism and Christianity), *poverty, overpopulation, hunger, suffering, war (see *Pacifism and peace), bribery and *secularism.

Bong Rin Ro categorizes Asian theologies into four models: *syncretism, accommodation, situational theology and biblically orientated theology. His analysis reflects a common evangelical caution against contemporary Asian theology: fear of syncretism and accommodation whereby the gospel is diluted and biblical truth compromised. The key issue in the whole argument of contextual theology, as he sees it, is 'whether the biblical and historical doctrines of the Christian Church can be preserved without compromise in the process of contextualization'. The strength of evangelical theology lies in its insistence on the *uniqueness of the Christian gospel, the *revelatory nature of biblical truth and the necessity of *salvation. Its weakness may be described as a self-imposed limitation which does not adequately appreciate the richness of Asian religions and cultures, or urgently recognize the gravity of the demonizing effects of social and political evils.

Theological reflection in ecumenical circles often takes a different point of departure. *Ecumenical theologians have reacted against the merely conceptual, abstract and confessional nature of traditional theology. To them theology is more than an articulation of beliefs or a formulation of Christian doctrines (see *Confessions and *Creeds). Its task is rather to reflect on the contemporary situation in the light of the Christian faith. Therefore, the totality of life is the raw material of a living and confessing theology.

This approach to Asian theology, in terms of methodology and content, is very much determined by the context. Asian distinctives are used as a frame of reference in the theological task. These include plurality and diversity; colonial experience in the past; present nation-building, modernization and the resurgence of traditional religions. Asian theology is committed to address such issues as social injustice, poverty, violation of human rights, oppression and exploitation of the poor.

High on the Asian theological agenda is the theme of *suffering. In *Japan, Kazoh Kitamori (1916–98) brings out the centrality of suffering in the gospel and the reality of human suffering. The divine and the human are thus joined together in suffering, through which one comes to realize the love of God. Choan-Seng Song (b. 1929) further develops this theme by emphasizing that God commits himself totally to the suffering of this world. His theology of the *cross depicts the crucified God (see *Moltmann) not so much as the God who vicariously suffers and dies for the world (see *Atonement) as the God who suffers and dies with the world. Vicariousness is in fact replaced by identification.

Concern for humanity and *freedom is another important theme. From South *Korea we have Minjung theology, using a political concept (minjung) denoting people who are ruled and dominated (different from the Marxist proletariat which is defined socio-economically), and applying Christian themes of messianic *kingdom and *resurrection to interpret *history and give meaning to its vision. History is the process in which the minjung realize their own destiny to be free subjects through sufferings and struggles against oppressive powers. It may not be inaccurate to label this as a Korean version of *liberation theology. In *India, dalit theology spoke to the disadvantages experienced by the dalit people, the outcasts and untouchables under the Hindu caste system.

What about the long history of Asian peoples and the significance of their cultures? In what ways can we perceive the work of God among them? C. S. Song suggests that the frontiers of Asian theology must move from the history of Israel and the history of Christianity in the West to the history of Asia, in order to gain insights into God's ways with the nations, and to discover what place history beyond the Jewish-Christian traditions plays in God's saving purposes in the world. Probing in such a direction may present a challenge to some and a problem to others.

The creative efforts and insights of ecumenical theologians offer contributions to Asian theology that cannot be ignored. Their strength lies in their relevance to contexts, openness to new ideas and boldness to search into the dark. Yet these may also turn out to be disastrous if basic biblical foundations are forsaken in favour of other assumptions.

See also: CHINESE CHRISTIAN THEOLOGY; CONFUCIANISM AND CHRISTIANITY.

Bibliography

D. Aikman, Jesus in Beijing (Washington DC, 2003); S. Chan, Grassroots Asian Theology: Thinking the Faith from the Ground Up (Downers Grove, 2014); J. Elwood (ed.), Asian Christian Theology (Philadelphia, 1980), esp. essays by S. Coe, S. Athyal and E. P. Nacpil; J. C. England (ed.), Living Theology in Asia (London, 1981); K. Gnanakan (ed.), Salvation: Some Asian Perspectives (Bangalore, 1992); Hwa Yung, Mangoes or Bananas? The Quest for an Authentic Asian Christian Theology (Oxford, 1997); Kazoh Kitamori, Theology of the Pain of God (London, 1958); A. P. Nirmal (ed.), A Reader in Dalit Theology (Madras, 1991); V. Ramachandra, The Recovery of Mission: Beyond the Pluralist Paradigm (Grand Rapids, 1996); idem, Faiths in Conflict: Christian Integrity in a Multi-cultural World (Downers Grove, 1999); Bong Rin Ro, 'Contextualization: Asian Theology', in Bong Rin Ro and R. Eshenaur (eds.), The Bible and Theology in Asian Contexts (Taichung, Taiwan, 1984), pp. 68–75; Choan-Seng Song, Third-Eye Theology: Theology in Formation in Asian Settings (Maryknoll, 1979); idem, 'New Frontiers of Theology in Asia', in D. T. Niles and T. K. Thomas (eds.), Varieties of Witness (Singapore, 1980); Kim Yong-Bok (ed.), Minjung Theology (Singapore, 1981).

W. W. CHOW

ASSURANCE

Assurance of *salvation can be defined as someone's personal conviction that they have been eternally saved by God's *grace in Christ. Historically, such assurance has been a particular issue for Protestant and evangelical Christians. Other traditions have tended to view claims to absolute certainty of salvation as presumption: it is at the final judgment when the verdict will be given. Until then we wait, hope, and seek to live faithfully. But this has not satisfied *Protestants, who have grappled with two linked questions regarding assurance. First, can someone really be sure, in this life, that they are saved and that this salvation cannot be lost? Secondly, if such security is possible (or indeed normative for a Christian believer), then how is this assurance to be known?

These questions came to the fore at the time of the European Reformation. The Magisterial Reformers (see *Reformation theology) reacted against the doctrine of *penance and the close linkage of assurance with ecclesial authority as taught by the medieval Roman Catholic Church. Against this, Martin *Luther stated: 'I have been baptized and I have the Word, and so I have no doubt about my salvation as long as I cling to the Word' (Works, vol. 54, p. 57), and John *Calvin asserted that assurance and 'security' were to be found by looking to Christ and especially his cross (Institutes, 2.16.6, 2.16.19). Assurance of salvation was possible, indeed it was part of normal Christian experience. The guarantees of such assurance were found in the *atonement and the gracious promises of God to his people, appropriated by *faith.

Later *Reformed theologians, for example many sixteenth- and seventeenth-century English *Puritans, continued to focus on the objective work of Christ as grounds for assurance, but also stressed a need for believers to reflect on their own growth in practical holiness. The doctrine of 'temporary faith', developed by William *Perkins, was important here. A profession of faith might be made by someone who was not, in fact, truly regenerate. The sign that a 'professor' had really exercised saving faith was significant progress in holy living. Without such progress any assurance a 'believer' possessed would likely be proved false. In practice this led to significant doubts concerning assurance and a stress on rigorous 'self-examination'. Those who had professed faith were to search their experience for signs that they were truly part of the elect. In this tradition assurance was often achieved only after a long struggle and was, according to the Puritan Thomas Brooks, 'a pearl that most want, (but) a crown that few wear' (Heaven on Earth, p. 15).

In eighteenth-century evangelicalism there was a shift of emphasis again. According to David Bebbington, evangelicals such as Jonathan *Edwards believed that assurance was 'normally given at *conversion' and was 'the result of simple acceptance' of God's gift of salvation (Evangelicalism in Modern Britain, pp. 42–50). Assurance was of the essence of faith and normative for believers, although it was still expected that there would be significant changes in the way Christians lived subsequent to conversion. Nevertheless, this more confident view of assurance could have a significant impact on the life of a believer. The Baptist theologian Andrew *Fuller had been reared in a religious atmosphere dominated by High Calvinists who practised a heightened form of self-examination with a strong tendency towards introspective soul-searching and doubt. Fuller's conversion, in the years following 1780, to a more evangelical, moderate Calvinism led him away from the despondency which had characterized his earlier spiritual life towards what, by his own testimony, was a deeper joy and trust in God.

John *Wesley certainly believed that assurance was of the essence of faith, stressing a 'felt' assurance, the classic description of which was Wesley's own account of his conversion and his heart being 'strangely warmed'. Wesleyan Methodists differed from Calvinistic evangelicals, however, in believing salvation could still be lost. A Christian could 'fall away' by rejecting Christ or failing to live as a believer. Thus Wesley refused to affirm the Calvinistic teaching regarding 'the final perseverance of the saints'. But Reformed evangelicals who were committed to final *perseverance have also spoken of a 'felt' assurance in terms reminiscent of Wesley. Sometimes this has been described as a 'baptism' or 'filling' of the Spirit subsequent to conversion. One of the sermons printed in Martyn *Lloyd-Jones's Joy Unspeakable: The Baptism of the Holy Spirit is entitled 'Blessed Assurance' (Eastbourne, new edn, 1995, pp. 33–48). However, it has been conceived, assurance has always been an important feature of evangelical spirituality.

Significant work has been done on the doctrine of assurance by twentieth-century theologians such as *Berkouwer, *Barth and *Moltmann, as questions of eternal security have continued to exercise the minds of Protestant thinkers. The fundamental point at issue is whether assurance is a confidence in Christ alone or the result of an additional work of the Spirit or a period of self-reflection. Barth speaks of the vain search for a 'guarantee of the guarantee' (CD 1/1, p. 465). But others have sought to insist that all true, regenerate believers will show some signs of growth in holiness, and that some evidence of the work of the Spirit is an important part of a biblical doctrine of assurance. What is certain is that the way questions of assurance are answered has deep implications for the way the Christian life is conceived and lived.

Bibliography

K. Barth, CD; D. W. Bebbington, Evangelicalism in Modern Britain: A History from the 1730s to the 1980s (London, 1989); M. C. Bell, Calvin and Scottish Theology: The Doctrine of Assurance (Edinburgh, 1985); G. C. Berkouwer, Faith and Perseverance (ET, Grand Rapids, 1958); T. Brooks, Heaven on Earth (London, 1961 [1654]); J. Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion (ET, London, 1961); M. Luther, Works and Table Talk (ET, Philadelphia, 1967 [1532]); J. Moltmann, Theology of Hope (ET, London, 1967).

P. J. MORDEN

ATHANSIAN CREED, see ATHANASIUS; CREEDS

ATHANASIUS (300–73)

One of the greatest of all Christian theologians, Athanasius of Alexandria is particularly revered by the Orthodox churches, but also has a central place in the thought as well as the affections of many Protestant and Catholic theologians past and present. His tenacity and rhetorical brilliance were key to the eventual acceptance of the *Creed of Nicaea as normative for subsequent generations, and his theology of the *incarnation has been inspirational to those attempting to move beyond the classical Western forensic approach to soteriology. His implication in the violence of the times (from which he himself also suffered considerably) nonetheless remains something of a blot on his character.

Athanasius was an Egyptian of humble origins, possibly a native Coptic speaker, but his abilities and Christian devotion attracted the notice of Bishop Alexander of Alexandria, who seems to have been responsible for his education. As a deacon he accompanied Alexander to *Nicaea, and on Alexander's death in 328 was consecrated bishop, at slightly under the legal age of twenty-nine. He was bishop for nearly forty-six years, seventeen of them spent in exile (he was exiled five times in all). Athanasius' many works include major contributions to some of theology's most important topics – the *Trinity, the incarnation, soteriology (see *Salvation), the *Holy Spirit – and he also evidences great pastoral concern in his annual Festal Letters, and a prolonged interest in monasticism (see *Asceticism and monasticism) in his Life of Antony.

Athanasius, as deacon and secretary to Alexander, may have been the author of an early encyclical letter condemning Arius, but his earliest lengthy work is usually held to be the double treatise Against the Greeks and On the Incarnation. Since it contains no explicit reference to the *Arian controversy, the theological dispute which dominated most of his life and works, the work is sometimes dated as early as 318, though others have suggested 325 (on Athanasius' return from Nicaea), 335–7 (during his first exile), or even later.

Athanasius assails the pagan religious system in fairly conventional terms, largely on the basis of Rom. 1:18–32 (one of his favourite texts). His own account of salvation history is a mixture of two traditions. The first is a noetic, *Origenist picture. Here human beings turn their minds away from intelligible reality and from contemplation, becoming fixated instead in their own desires. This demands a revelation which will turn them back towards the true God. Athanasius' treatment of the subject, however, is vivid and original, for he has a strong sense of the seriousness of the problem: human beings are recalcitrant and ignorant and not inclined to take any of the necessary steps to fix their minds on God or to learn about God from creation. For Athanasius, the Son is like an infinitely patient teacher, ready to try anything, no matter how undignified, to help his unpromising pupils to understand the true nature of God. So he becomes incarnate to show what God is like by the clearest, simplest and most inescapable means, the inappropriateness of the action for a divine being merely underlining the boundlessness of God's love.

The second strand of Athanasius' incarnational thought is an *Irenaeus-influenced doctrine of the importance of the flesh in making human beings what they are. According to this strand, human flesh is the weak point in creation, being inherently unstable, and now subject once again because of the *fall to the corruption and decay from which God had earlier preserved it. Only the original Creator could restore it (it is very important for Athanasius that the Son as well as the Father is Creator), doing so by himself assuming flesh. The very presence of the Word transforms human flesh simply by being joined to it, burning out its corruption and decay like sparks in a stubble field. The Word, life itself, undergoes anguish and tastes death in the flesh to break the hold of suffering and death over it, fulfilling and bringing to an end the death sentence given for Adam's disobedience, freeing humanity from slavery to the devil, and making human beings adopted children of God through their new kinship with the one who is Son of God by nature.

Probably while in Rome during his second exile, during the years 339–41, Athanasius wrote his three Orations against the Arians (the so-called Fourth Oration is now thought to be by another hand). These are the fullest expression of his mature trinitarian thought. They represent an extensive engagement with the Scripture exegesis of Arius and his early supporters, Eusebius of Nicomedia and Asterius the Sophist. These had argued on the basis of Phil. 2:9 ('Therefore God exalted him to the highest place'), the Septuagint text of Prov. 8:22 ('The LORD brought me forth as the first of his works') and various Johannine texts that the Word was in principle mutable, having been promoted by God; that the Word was not eternal, being created rather than uncreated; and that the Word received power from God rather than having it of himself. Athanasius, devoting essentially one oration to each of these texts, together with others used by his opponents in the same way, insisted that the Word, being true Son of God by nature, image of the Father and proper to the Father's essence, must be eternal (John 1:1), equal to God (John 5:18), creator (Col. 1:16) rather than created, immutable (Mal. 3.6), and the true wisdom and power of God (1 Cor. 1:24). Scripture texts that imply otherwise are speaking about the created human flesh assumed by the Word, not about the Word per se.

The Arian controversy forced Athanasius to think through the inner relations of Father and Word or Son, as well as their relation to the world. *God exists eternally as Father, Son and Holy Spirit, quite independently of the created order, the persons of the Trinity being one in both substance (homoousios) and in action. Any *dualism excluding God from acting in his true being in his own world, such as was implicit in Arianism, was radically rejected. In the Orations against the Arians Athanasius developed further his sense of the wonderful harmony and order or created rationality within the world, a rationality not to be confused with, yet connected to and indicative of, God's rationality or Word. God is known, however, not through creation alone but primarily through *Scripture, and Athanasius evidences a profound grasp of Scripture and *hermeneutics.

Considerable differences lie between Athanasius' earlier and later thought in his understanding of the human being who is God. His soteriology was completely rethought and deepened. Prominent, as before, is the necessity, for the sake of our salvation, of the incarnation of the Word of God, and the inseparability of incarnation and atonement is reinforced. Reconciliation occurs in the first place within Christ himself, between God and the human being he assumed, this being the ground for human salvation, knowledge and receiving of the Spirit, for humankind is incorporated into Christ. The Word of God and the human being in Christ must be thought of according to their respective natures, never divorced yet not mixed either, with the centre of the Word-human always being the Word. The very awareness of the difference in being between God and human beings rests ultimately on the incarnation. In recent study of Athanasius, the question has been raised whether Athanasius was an early *Apollinarian. While many eminent theologians argue that he was, convincing reasons can be adduced to the contrary.

Concerning human knowledge of God, in the Orations against the Arians Athanasius moves again more in a trinitarian perspective, the incarnation again being central. All knowledge of God as Father and Creator occurs only in and through the Son. Human knowledge of God is always creaturely but not therefore false, for God has *accommodated himself to our way of knowing. Words used of God must be understood in the light of his being and nature, but certain words used of him, such as 'father' and 'son', apply properly only within the Trinity and only by participation to humankind.

In his four Letters to Serapion Concerning the Holy Spirit, written during his third exile in the late 350s, Athanasius, faced now with a denial of the Godhead of the Spirit, developed further his trinitarian thought, integrating the Spirit much more fully into his theology. Whereas his previous references to the Spirit tended to the more formal (apart from the third Oration against the Arians, where his mature understanding of the person and work of the Spirit is clearly emerging), in his Letters a rich understanding of God as Father, Son and Holy Spirit is evident, not only in intra-trinitarian relations, but also in relation to the world.

The key to Athanasius' theology is the Nicene word homoousios – the Son is 'one in substance' with the Father, which means that it is truly God who becomes incarnate. The term, though not occurring in Scripture, was for Athanasius a vital declaration safeguarding what Scripture affirms against the mis-readings of his opponents (as he argues in On the Decrees of Nicaea). The eternal and true Word, truly God in substance, really did become incarnate in order to save us, both joining our flesh to his divine nature forever and bringing to light the whole work and being of the triune God.

Bibliography

Works: A. Robertson (ed.), Athanasius: Select Works and Letters, tr. J. H. Newman (Massachusetts, 1994); R. W. Thompson (ed. & tr.), Contra Gentes and De Incarnatione (Oxford, 1971).

Studies: K. Anatolios, Athanasius: The Coherence of His Thought (London, 1998); T. D. Barnes, Athanasius and Constantius: Theology and Politics in the Constantinian Empire (Cambridge, 1993); J. D. Ernest, The Bible in Athanasius of Alexandria (Leiden, 2004); R. P. C. Hanson, The Search for the Christian Doctrine of God (Edinburgh, 1988); C. Kannengiesser, Arius and Athanasius: Two Alexandrian Theologians (Brookfield, 1991); E. P. Meijering, Orthodoxy and Platonism in Athanasius: Synthesis or Antithesis? (Leiden, 1968).

ATHEISM

At its simplest, atheism is the belief that no God exists. This statement, however, needs to be qualified in two ways. First, it is complicated by the fact that there are various concepts of *God. For example, *pantheism is, strictly speaking, the belief that God is identical with nature, a position that has sometimes, though not always, been regarded as a species of atheism. Atheism certainly denies both the existence of any transcendent divine reality apart from the world and that the world is 'in God' (a position that can be described as 'pantheism' on some interpretations of that phrase). Secondly, the term 'atheism' is often used to describe a specific phenomenon in Western culture, namely, the rejection of all theisms (Judaism, Christianity and Islam) or beliefs in any 'gods'. Thus, although classical *Buddhism holds no belief in the existence of God and its philosophy entails the virtual denial of God's existence, it originated in a non-Western cultural environment, and to call it 'atheistic', while not inaccurate, risks subsuming it under an alien framework.

In Western thought, a materialist philosophy which rejected belief in the existence of any gods was present in the Greco-Roman world before the advent of Christianity. The long domination of Christianity in Europe marginalized anything that we might call 'atheism', but forms of *materialism began to make their appearance in the post-Reformation world and to flower on a culturally significant if still relatively small scale in eighteenth-century France, sometimes under the influence of English thought. Materialism took the view that humanity should not be explained in terms of an immaterial soul shaped by a non-embodied Creator.

In the nineteenth century, atheism made a big impact on Europe. Ludwig Feuerbach (1804–72) is sometimes regarded as the father of modern atheism; he argued that the notion of God was a projection of human self-consciousness. Various proposals were then made both to explain the human, material and social world atheistically and to offer some account of the origin and existence of religious belief. Marx (1818–83), *Nietzsche and Freud (1856–1939) were three of the most influential proponents of these views. Atheism spread widely in the twentieth century. It is currently popular in the English-speaking world under the rubric

'The New Atheism', associated with a number of thinkers, including Richard Dawkins, Daniel Dennett, Christopher Hitchens and Sam Harris.

It is sometimes denied that true atheism exists, on the ground that Paul teaches a universal natural knowledge of God, albeit distorted and suppressed (Rom. 1:19–21). But it is doubtful whether Paul means to affirm categorically that no time, space, culture or person can ever be properly atheistic; he does not appear to set theoretical limits to the degeneration of cultures. Christian converts from atheism sometimes affirm the profound and thoroughgoing nature of their former intellectual disbelief. However, this is not to deny that much of what passes for atheism is a conscious or subconscious suppression of the awareness of God.

Atheism is a wide-ranging and complex phenomenon which defies easy description and simplistic engagement. We can apply to atheism at the range of social and educational levels some words by Paul Holmer: 'Just what religious unbelief is among the educated today is . . . difficult to say. Exactly what the breakdown of concepts has to do with it is a very complicated matter' (The Grammar of Faith, New York, 1978, p. 125). Concepts of God and the self are at issue in the conflict between atheistic and Christian (or more broadly religious) worldviews, and arguments over the existence of God, evil and suffering, life after death and the nature of human freedom are staple fare in the classic debates. The nature and credibility of Scripture is obviously another crucial issue. Yet what Nietzsche wrote in the nineteenth century helpfully puts these disagreements in context: 'What decides against Christianity now is our taste, not our reasons' (The Gay Science, section 132).

If we accept the force of this remark, this does not entail denying the importance of reasons and the discussion of reasons; probably nothing is more pressing on this score than the problem of *evil and suffering, even if we believe that Christianity offers no 'rational' resolution of the problem. But Nietzsche's words alert us to the presence of a significant dimension in the conflict of worldviews, to a phenomenon that is sometimes elusive and intellectually rather intractable, but exceedingly important to recognize and address. Jesus Christ must be apprehended as the one who integrates our human lives in all their dimensions. This should enable people to see that

Christian faith is, first, meaningful; then, salutary; then, true.

If Western atheism or the atheism of the English-speaking world is riveted to one particular worldview (and it may not be), perhaps we should single out a naturalistic evolutionary worldview. Human origins, rather than cosmic origins, are in question here. It is important that Christians try to get clear on the relationship of Christian faith to evolution and rigorously present the grounds for their beliefs about human origins, nature and destiny. There is a variety of types of belief in evolution, and the phrase 'evolutionary worldview' can mean more than one thing, but it is widely believed popularly that evolution entails naturalism, which is disbelief in any supernatural agency. In fact, naturalism is not entailed in evolution, but evolutionary naturalism is a bulwark of much atheism. The supposedly anti-rationalist culture of postmodernity has apparently done little to diminish the urgency of the questions that arise in the public square in this connection.

The phrase 'practical atheism' is sometimes used, as opposed to 'theoretical atheism'. It signifies the fact that belief or disbelief is suspended on the intellectual plane, but that lives are lived as though there were no God. Practical atheism is more widespread than theoretical atheism, and the issues surrounding it can be different, though no less urgent, requiring attention to matters of will and motivation as much as to mind in the narrower intellectual sense. Here, the question of taste kicks in again. The presence of practical atheism shows how the atheistic claim that God is a projection of the human will and desire to believe can be turned on its head. That is, it shows how denial of God might be a projection of the human will and desire to disbelieve and how *agnosticism (which often undergirds practical atheism) may be a strategy of evasion. It is certainly not claimed here that all atheism or agnosticism is to be explained in this way. But the psychological causes of practical atheism are just as important for us to investigate as are the intellectual causes of theoretical atheism, just as we must admit that religious belief also often has psychological causes that must be uncovered. *Pascal's thought is important here, for he emphasized that, in practice, we all decide to live as though there were God or no God, even if we say that the issue is theoretically open, and he pressed opponents of Christianity to explain and justify their practice, if they maintain that the existence of God is a genuinely open question. It is crucial that we keep in mind, in any consideration of, and discussion with, atheism, that the issue at stake is existentially deep and that the Christian idea of God is the idea of a living and acting subject, not an object of dispassionate contemplation.

See also: MARXISM AND CHRISTIANITY; SCIENCE AND FAITH.

Bibliography

M. Buckley, At the Origins of Modern Atheism (New Haven, 1990); H. Küng, Does God Exist? (New York and London, 1980); A. MacIntyre and P. Ricœur, The Religious Significance of Modern Atheism (New York, 1969); M. Martin (ed.), The Cambridge Companion to Atheism (Cambridge, 2007); A. McGrath, The Twilight of Atheism (New York and London, 2004); J. J. C. Smart and J. J. Haldane, Atheism and Theism (Oxford, 2003); J. Thrower, A Short History of Western Atheism (London, 1971); M. Westphal, Suspicion and Faith: The Religious Uses of Modern Atheism (New York, 1998).

S. N. WILLIAMS

ATONEMENT

The biblical basis

The traditional symbol of Christian faith (like the crescent in Islam) is the cross. The use of the symbol of the *cross has been central to Christianity, especially in the Western church, with the crucifix used as the focus of devotion from the eleventh century onwards, and with 'crucicentrism' being an acknowledged hallmark of evangelical Protestantism. The reason is obvious enough: the apostolic message contained in the NT sees the death of Jesus Christ on the cross as the source whence the benefits of salvation (divine forgiveness, fellowship with God and eternal life) flow for believers.

'At-one-ment' is the main word used in English-speaking Christendom for this cross-centred understanding of *salvation (whereas in languages of the Latin family, one finds '*redemption' as the first-rank term). Together with the verb 'atone', it corresponds fairly closely to the key OT root kpr which combines the meaning of 'reconciliation', the restoration of positive relationships between estranged parties (e.g. Gen. 32:21), and ‘expiation’, the removal of sin and its stain (cf. the link between Versöhnung and Sühnung in German).

In the NT there is a partial correspondence with the noun katallagē, ‘reconciliation’ and its cognates (taken from the vocabulary of inter-personal and political relationships), which are used in a small number of Pauline passages (Rom. 5:10–11; 2 Cor. 5:18–20; Eph. 2:16; Col. 1:20–22) and are implicit in others, for example, those that speak of peace being made between God and humankind (Rom 5:1; Col 1:20). There is also a partial correspondence with the noun hilasmos and its cognates (1 John 2:2; 4:10; but also found in Rom. 3:25; Heb. 2:17), whose primary focus is the idea of placating divine wrath (‘propitiation’), but whose meaning also involves the idea of ‘expiation’ since, in the biblical view of God, *sin is the object that arouses his holy anger and this subsides if sin is done away with. However, biblical passages that are relevant for the doctrine of the atonement are not restricted to the ones where the foregoing terms occur; they also include passages which refer to forgiveness, acceptance, renewal, purification (sacrifice), fellowship, life-giving union, liberation, etc.

The Fathers and schoolmen

The ancient (orthodox) church bowed before the authority of Scripture, but lacked the tools and interest to explain with systematic clarity the how of Christ’s atonement. Almost all the *Fathers were pastors and preachers, with little or no knowledge of Hebrew; they mixed several schemes for understanding the saving efficacy of Christ’s work, with more or less literal import, while their main focus was on defending the truth of the incarnation against attack from various heresies.

One can disentangle three main types of thinking about atonement in the Fathers. First, there was an ‘Isaiah 53’ emphasis on the Righteous One bearing the sins of sinners, undergoing in their stead the punishment of *death they had deserved, so that legal justice is satisfied. The Epistle to Diognetus (IX.2) wonders at the ‘sweet exchange’ and, although many of the Fathers lack precision, statements by *Eusebius (Demonstratio evangelica, X.1), John *Chrysostom (In I ad Timotheum, hom. VII.3) and *Athanasius (De Incarnatione Verbi, 6, 9–10) are unequivocal and forceful. However, even with them, this first approach was not central and determinative for the rest of their theology.

A second type of thinking was also popular (though it does not deserve the tendentious epithet ‘classic’ that Aulén introduced for it). This focused on the supreme battle that was fought on the cross between God (in Christ) and the evil powers, and the freedom that was won for humankind through Christ’s victory in this battle. Beyond the bare proclamation of Christ’s liberating victory over Satan, many Fathers imagined that a ransom had been paid to the *devil. The wisdom of God trapped Satan, in that while the death of Christ was the price he received in exchange for humankind, he was not able to hold on to it. On the third day Christ rose triumphant (see *Resurrection), and Satan was left with neither his original prisoners nor the ransom. *Gregory of Nyssa develops this idea further. Christ’s humanity was the bait, which the devil thought he could swallow, but his deity was the hook, and the Evil One was caught (Oratio catechetica, 22–24, 26).

The third type is often called ‘mystical’ or ‘physical’, because it is interested in what happens to the divine and human natures. The at-one-ment is the effect of the union in the person of Jesus Christ of the divine and human natures. The infusion of divine energies into our weak and corrupt ‘flesh’ transforms it, divinizes it – God became man that we might become gods. Although his theology focuses on universal ‘recapitulation’ rather than simply human divinization, *Irenaeus introduced this type of thinking into Christian theology (Adversus haereses, III.9.1; III.18.7, etc.). It is central with Athanasius (e.g. Contra arianos, III.33) and it became dominant among theologians, especially in the *Eastern church. Whereas the first two approaches presuppose the incarnation but do not see it as in itself the atoning event, the third approach makes it so, with the cross and resurrection expressing what has already taken place through the union of the two natures.

Fearing that the divine-human distinction might be blurred, Western theology exercised a little more restraint on divinization and kept closer to juridical categories. ‘Merit’ and ‘satisfaction’ played an important role in this regard, but with a weak sense of substitution: the emphasis fell on adding human merits and works of satisfaction to those of Christ.

*Anselm of Canterbury made the first great step forward in producing a more satisfactory approach. As he tried to understand what he believed, he put forward a limpid scheme that related incarnation to redemption and achieved a coherent theory of atonement. His starting-point was human helplessness: he dismisses earlier theories (including the idea of a ransom paid to the devil) with the refrain: 'You have not yet considered how heavy a weight sin is.' Sin is lèse majesté. Crime is measured by the dignity of the one offended. God's honour demands a compensation of infinite value, which humans are utterly unable to provide. Yet, God does not wish to send all humans to hell (he wishes to restore the perfect number of heavenly citizens); he is able to provide the satisfaction that humans cannot provide. Man ought to, God can. God became man to pay the price for our salvation (Cur Deus homo, II.6), in the form of the gift of perfect obedience offered to God by Christ on our behalf, the merit for which is credited to us since Christ does not need it for himself. Anselm's concern is not retributive justice: his logic contrasts the two alternatives: either satisfaction or penalty (ibid., I.15).

Soon after Anselm, Pierre *Abélard introduced the so-called 'subjective' theory, in which the main function of the cross is to touch our hearts through the demonstration of divine love (Expositio in Epistulam ad Romanos, II.3). A fuller synthesis came with *Thomas Aquinas (Summa theologica, IIIa, q.48, a.1–4), whose understanding of atonement includes the idea of the payment of the penalty owed to divine justice, but focuses on the sacrifice of loving devotion jointly offered to God by Christ and his church.

The Reformers and their successors

The major Reformers (see *Reformation theology) followed a path parallel to Anselm's, but they substituted justice and *law for his concept of feudal honour. For them sin is the breaking of divine law, and the essence of the atonement is that Christ paid the penalty for our law-breaking. He stood in the place of sinners, and since he bore their punishment on the cross, it no longer falls on them; hence the message of *justification by faith alone, without works. *Luther preached Christ's victory over Satan, but saw it as grounded on the satisfaction of justice (the penalty is the satisfaction); in his paradoxical manner, in strongest terms, he stressed the 'joyful exchange' by which Christ becomes our sin and we become his righteousness (e.g. his Commentary on Galatians, supremely on 3:13). Calvin's treatment (see *Reformed theology) is noteworthy for clarity, balance and exegetical groundwork. It sets the atonement in the wider context of Christ's threefold office, with his death on Calvary as the antitype of all OT atoning sacrifices and the main work of the priestly office (followed by his heavenly intercession), but also the paradoxical way in which he establishes his kingdom, and a prophetic testimony to God's holy love and human sinfulness (Institutes, II.15–17).

Already in the sixteenth century, the *Socinians (followers of Fausto Sozzini) bitterly attacked the idea of vicarious punishment: sin is not something that can be transferred from one person to another. If God forgives, he does not exact the penalty; it is abhorrent to think of the Father's beloved under the curse. The 'orthodox', such as John *Owen and Francis Turretin, fought back, and *Arminians, such as Hugo Grotius, softened the classical Protestant doctrine, but two centuries later Socinian arguments prevailed among *liberal theologians, who then fell back on Abelard's 'subjective' theory.

Contemporary *liberalism, especially among feminists, has cried out against the penal view, using the term 'divine child abuse' to describe it. Meanwhile, evangelicals such as Leon Morris, J. I. *Packer and John Stott have continued to defend the penal approach of the Reformers.

Recent attempts at reinterpretation

With the waning of older forms of liberalism, theologians have attempted new constructions. At times Karl *Barth sounds close to Protestant orthodoxy, writing about the Judge judged in our stead undergoing the punishment we had deserved; yet, on closer inspection, there are important differences. Barth repudiates the idea of satisfaction and expressly distances himself from the Anselmian line (CD, IV.1, p. 253). Rather than a transfer of guilt which is then paid for, he affirms a dialectical event in which the old humanity is annihilated in Christ and a new being of righteousness, including all human beings, the only real man, is established in him instead.

The views of the French anthropologist René Girard have influenced theologians, even though fellow anthropologists have been reticent about them. He sees the origin of *sacrifice, religion, and, indeed, of all human institutions, in the crisis of mimetic violence, in the murder of an innocent person subsequently declared to be guilty and divinized. Only in the Bible is this lie uncovered (partially in the OT and fully in the NT) with the consequent rejection of the sacrificial idea. Girard's views, together with the ascendancy of pacifism among intellectuals, have resulted in an emphasis on the theme of a non-violent atonement; one looks to Jesus, first of all, as a model of non-violent devotion.

Many writers, among whom Jürgen Moltmann stands out as widely influential (although his views have shown a degree of variation through the diverse periods of his career), have interpreted the atonement in view of theodicy. The following traits are common: (1) the 'scandal' is no longer so much sin towards God as it is human suffering, especially when it has political origins; God is no longer the judge on the bench but the accused in the dock! (2) God's powerlessness relieves him from sharing in the guilt for evil. This is preached as 'good news' and as the true 'theology of the cross', and is further buttressed by the reference to the divine 'self-emptying' (kenōsis, Phil. 2:7) (see *Kenoticism); (3) Christ's suffering on the cross is construed as God's, and it is the divine sympathy or solidarity which is the heart of atonement. It comforts us, it remedies our estrangement from God and it teaches us like attitudes. In his most Hegelian book, The Crucified God, Moltmann attempts to resolve the problem of the distinction between God and Christ by making the cross the foundation for the Trinity, with the man Jesus and human suffering being introduced into the life of the Godhead. The fact that suffering is taken up into God is what is seen as overcoming evil.

In the maze of theories about the atonement and arguments for or against 'vicarious punishment' (with or without additions from other perspectives), decisions depend first of all on the authority ascribed to Scripture and, to a lesser degree, on hermeneutical choices concerning biblical metaphors and their cognitive import. The next issue is the validity of retributive justice, which many people today now question. The final issue, which is raised by approaches to the atonement that are influenced by Hegelian dialectics, is the importance of upholding the framework of orthodox (Chalcedonian) *Christology, which cannot be rejected without serious consequences.

The central, crucial truth of Christian preaching being at stake, the most rigorous and consistent use of one's faith-criteria is called for – indeed!

See also: JESUS; JUDGMENT OF GOD.

Bibliography

K. Barth, CD; R. T. Beckwith and M. J. Selman, Sacrifice in the Bible (Grand Rapids and Carlisle, 1995); H. Blocher, 'The Sacrifice of Jesus Christ: The Current Theological Situation', European Journal of Theology 8, 1999, pp. 23–36; idem, 'Biblical Metaphors and the Doctrine of Atonement', JETS 47, 2004, pp. 629–645; H. Boersma, Violence, Hospitality, and the Cross: Reappropriating the Atonement Tradition (Grand Rapids, 2004); J. Denney, The Death of Christ (London, 1951); S. Gathercole, Where Is Boasting? Early Jewish Soteriology and Paul's Response in Romans 1–5 (Grand Rapids and Cambridge, 2002); J. Goldingay (ed.), Atonement Today (London, 1995); C. E. Hill and F. A. James (eds.), The Glory of Atonement (Downers Grove, 2004); I. H. Marshall, Aspects of the Atonement (Milton Keynes, 2007); A. T. B. McGowan, 'The Atonement as Penal Substitution', in McGowan (ed.), Always Reforming: Explorations in Systematic Theology (Leicester, 2006); J. Moltmann, The Cross in the New Testament (Grand Rapids, 1965); idem, The Crucified God (ET, London, 1974); L. Morris, The Apostolic Preaching of the Cross (London, 1965); J. I. Packer, 'What Did the Cross Achieve? The Logic of Penal Substitution', TynB 25, 1974, pp. 3–45; J. G. Stackhouse, Jr, What Does It Mean to Be Saved? (Grand Rapids, 2002); J. R. W. Stott, The Cross of Christ (Leicester and Downers Grove, 1986).

H. A. G. BLOCHER

ATONEMENT, EXTENT OF

For whom did Christ die? In the history of the church there have been two basic answers to that question. Most Christians have taught that Christ's death is of saving significance for every individual, whilst others have contended that its benefits extend only to the elect. The former are spoken of as holding to a universal understanding of the *atonement, whilst the latter teach that it is limited, definite or particular in extent.

While a small minority have believed that all humans will be saved because of the work of Christ (*universalism), most Christians have believed that though the atonement makes *salvation possible for all, its saving effect is realized only when some further factor is present, i.e. *faith, or faith and godly works. This has been the view of the Eastern churches, and very much the majority position in those of the West.

Those who have believed in the limited intention of the atonement have flourished only amongst those who hold that human salvation ultimately depends upon divine *predestination, a topic which came to the fore in Christian theology in the West through the work of *Augustine. However, it was a minority amongst those who held to the general Augustinian position who also thought it to imply that the work of Christ atoned only for the sins of the elect. Amongst these were Prosper of Aquitaine, Thomas *Bradwardine and John Staupitz. The general late-medieval consensus was summed up by Peter *Lombard in his Sentences, to the effect that while the death of Christ was sufficient to cover the sins of the human race, it was efficacious only for the elect.

This definition was accepted by *Calvin in his Commentary on 1 John as being formally true, but not applicable to the writer's intention in the passage on which he was commenting (1 John 2:2). In Calvin's other writings there are passages which suggest he held to the view that the saving benefits of atonement were intended only for the elect, whilst others seem to imply a more universal view of its extent. This fluid position seems to have been general in the Reformed churches until the outbreak of the *Arminian controversy, when those of that persuasion, in their Remonstrance of 1610, the second article, expressed the view that Christ died for all people, though only believers benefited. If this were accepted, it would imply that divine predestination was not the sole, primary cause of salvation, but that human faith led to its actualization. The mainline Reformed churches and theologians resisted this, and in the second article of the Canons of *Dort (1619) affirmed that Christ died for his people, thus the benefits of the atonement extended only to the elect. This for the following century and a half was the mainline position of the Reformed churches.

Gradually, however, under the growth of the practice of the general offer of the gospel which marked the evangelical revival, it came under critical scrutiny on the grounds that this understanding undermined the integrity of the practice of offering Christ to all people, and also that the doctrine had serious negative effects on developing appropriate Christian *assurance in believers, leading to a withdrawal into inwardness and moralism in the hope of gaining certainty of one's election.

Both sides in the controversy could appeal to certain texts in the Bible. Defenders of a universal atonement would appeal to such passages as John 3:16, Rom. 5:18 and 1 John 2:2, whilst those in favour of the limited understanding would quote Matt. 1:21, 20:28 and John 17:9. Taking into account the nuances of the language and the idiom of the writer, it is doubtful whether any of these support decisively the contention of either side (cf. John 6:44 with 12:32). So in the last resort it seems that it is theological consistency and the evaluation of the practical consequences of a particular stance in the church which are decisive.

See also: HYPER-CALVINISM; REFORMED THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

M. C. Bell, Calvin and Scottish Theology: The Doctrine of Assurance (Edinburgh 1985); W. R. Godfrey, 'Reformed Thought on the Extent of the Atonement to 1618', WTJ 37, 1974–5, pp. 133–171; P. Helm, 'The Logic of Limited Atonement', SBET 3, 1985, pp. 47–54; J. B. Torrance, 'The Incarnation and "Limited Atonement"', EQ 55, 1983, pp. 83–94.

S. RUSSELL

AUGSBURG CONFESSION

The Augsburg Confession is a *Lutheran symbol, written by Philipp *Melanchthon in 1530. Emperor Charles V had demanded that a statement of faith be presented at the planned Diet of Augsburg by those German princes who had sided with Luther, and so Melanchthon wrote the Confession between April and June 1530; it was signed by seven rulers on 23 August. It is included in the Book of Concord (1580), which is accepted as the doctrinal standard of many Lutheran churches. The Confession, however, has wider acceptance as a standard, and a place of prominence amongst the other distinctively Lutheran texts in the Book of Concord (which also includes the three ecumenical creeds), and so it can be regarded as the definitive Lutheran symbol.

It is composed of two parts, one positive, stating doctrines, or 'chief articles of faith', and one apologetic, rejecting various perceived 'abuses' common within the Roman Church. The positive doctrine of the Confession is carefully arranged to begin by locating the Lutheran churches within classical (Catholic) Christianity, noting agreement with the *Nicene Creed, condemning by name various classical and contemporary heretics (*Arians, *Pelagians, *Donatists, *Anabaptists, etc.), and generally offering a careful and unobjectionable statement of received ecumenical doctrine. Even on the points which would become the crucial issues in *Reformation polemics, the Confession is notably restrained (e.g. Article IV on *justification). This might be because, this early in the Reformation, disputes still centred on practices, and had not yet become doctrinal. Certainly, the seven issues treated in the more *polemical second part (which include priestly celibacy, auricular confession and monastic vows) would tend to support such an interpretation.

The Confession visibly takes its stand on Scripture, repeatedly citing texts in support of positions, and including quotations where a position might be regarded as controversial. Church Fathers are also quoted from time to time (e.g. Ambrose in Art. VI, defending the claim that salvation is by faith alone).

The Confession in fact exists in two distinct versions: the invariata (Melancthon's original text of 1530) and the variata (a revised version published by Melancthon in 1540). (In fact, Melancthon had been continually tinkering with the text between these dates, but the 1540 edition differs on matters of substance, not merely on phrasing, being more accommodating to *Calvinistic views on the presence of Christ in the Eucharist, for instance.) The Book of Concord preserves the invariata, the edited edition being condemned remarkably strongly by some later Lutheran theologians.

See also: CREEDS; CONFESSIONS OF FAITH.

Bibliography

Latin text with English translation may conveniently be found in P. Schaff, Creeds of Christendom, 3 vols. (rev. edn, Grand Rapids, 1994).

Studies: J. A. Burgess (ed.), The Role of the Augsburg Confession (Philadelphia, 1980); B. W.

Teigen, I Believe: A Study of the Augsburg Confession and the Apology of the Augsburg Confession (Mancato, 1980).

S. R. HOLMES

AUGUSTINE (354–430)

An African from present-day Algeria, Augustine was the greatest of the Latin theologians of the early church, and one of the greatest Christian thinkers of all time. His influence dominated medieval Christianity in the West (where he became one of the four Doctors of the Church), and provided the most powerful non-biblical stimulus to the Reformation. For both Catholics and Protestants he remains a major theological resource.

Life

He was born in Tagaste in Roman North Africa (modern Souk Ahras in Algeria) to Patricius and his wife, the devout Christian Monica, who enrolled Augustine as a catechumen from infancy. (Patricius himself became a Christian only later in life.) His Confessions (a kind of spiritual and intellectual biography full of profound reflections on the call of God in childhood, adolescence and adult life) are the main source for tracing his early development. During his education, locally and at Carthage, his connection with Christianity became tenuous, for which he partly blames his parents' decision to give him the good pagan education necessary at the time for social success. He excelled in literature and rhetoric (he was particularly touched by the Dido and Aeneas story as told in Virgil's Aeneid), though he never mastered Greek. During this period he formed a long-term relationship with a woman who was not his social equal (and therefore whom he was not expected, even by his mother, to marry), with whom he had a child, the much-loved Adeodatus (372–c. 389).

His reading of Cicero's lost Hortensius (373) kindled in him a consuming love of divine wisdom (philosophy), on the grounds that its goal was to seek the truth (in contrast to rhetoric, which countenanced lies as long as they were beautifully told). The Scriptures struck him as puerile at this period, and he turned instead to *Manichaeism, remaining on the fringes of the movement as his career as a teacher of rhetoric progressed, and he moved from Africa to Rome (383) and then Milan (384).

But his growing disenchantment with Manichaeism's intellectual pretensions coincided with a rediscovery of the merits of Christianity, helped by his mother's prayers and the preaching of Ambrose, the bishop of Milan, who introduced Augustine to allegorical readings of the OT, and whose eloquent wisdom deeply impressed him. He was at this period persuaded (probably by his mother) to send his concubine away so that he could marry a girl of good family, but the girl was below the normal marriageable age of twelve (he was now thirty), and he took another concubine in the meantime.

The Neoplatonic writings of Plotinus and Porphyry convinced him that the *materialist Manichaean view of God was wrong. The impact of the *ascetic movement from the East spoke to his growing distaste for his own career as a teacher of rhetoric (teaching the forensic lawyers of the future how to speak well so they could argue that innocent men and women should be executed), as well as for his future marriage and present disordered domestic arrangements. Augustine was converted in 386 to Christianity, celibacy and, initially, monasticism, forming a contemplative community for sacred conversation and writing with his mother, son and various friends. He was baptized in Easter 387, alongside his son Adeodatus, and returned to Tagaste to form an ascetic community there, though his mother died in the Roman port of Ostia on the way.

His writings from this period, partly directed against Manichaeism, show how profoundly Neoplatonism (see *Platonism) had influenced him. Several are dialogues in the Platonic mould. He confidently expected that Platonic philosophy would unlock the treasures of the faith of the Catholic Church (cf. True Religion, 389–91). To vindicate the roles of faith and authority in religion against Manichaean objections, he argued that faith must precede understanding (cf. Isa. 7:9, LXX), but that faith has its own grounds – which he found in the moral and numerical achievements of the worldwide church (cf. The Usefulness of Believing, 391–92). Against Manichaean *determinism, he insisted that culpable sin proceeds only from the abuse of free will (cf. Free Will, 391–95). Against Manichaean *dualism he stressed the goodness of creation and adapted the Neoplatonic approach to evil by viewing it as the absence of good, lacking substantial reality. His Christian Platonism entertained a high estimate of human moral and spiritual potential.

In 391 Augustine was press-ganged into the church's ministry at Hippo (modern Annaba), and was soon bishop of its Catholic congregation (396), turning the bishop's house into an ascetic seminary-cum-chapter. The needs of the church increasingly determined his theological output. He gave himself more solidly to the study of Scripture, especially Paul, under the stimulus of Tyconius (fl. c. 370–90), a non-conformist Donatist from whom Augustine learned at several significant points. Exposure to pastoral realities also steadily eroded his earlier more humanist optimism, encouraging a deeper awareness of human frailty and perversity. This shift in perspective is put to good use in the searching analysis of his own sinfulness and the generosity of God's grace of the brilliant Confessions (397–401), which takes the story of the prodigal son as its overarching narrative. Augustine's emotional, intellectual and spiritual honesty in this work made it one of the classics of Christian literature of all time. Another fruit of this shift was To Simplician, on Various Questions (396), in which Rom. 9:10–21 convinced him of the basic inter-relationships between election, grace, faith and free will that he would later defend against the *Pelagians. Not until that subsequent controversy did he conclude that Rom. 7:7–25 must refer to the Christian, not a person under law prior to grace, as he argues in To Simplician.

At Hippo, Augustine continued to refute Manichaean errors. In defending the OT against their criticisms, he presented the most substantial Christian case to date for the just war (in Against Faustus, 397–98). But the counter-church of Donatism, far stronger in North Africa than the Catholic communion, now became his main preoccupation, evoking important contributions to Western doctrines of *church and *sacraments (especially Against the Letter of Parmenian, 400; Baptism, Against the Donatists, 400–01; Against the Letters of Petilian, 401–05; The Unity of the Catholic Church, 405). Augustine's teachings built on Tyconius and Optatus of Milevis (fl. c. 365–85), Catholic Africa's sole prior critic of Donatism of any theological substance.

Donatism

To *Donatism's exclusive claims Augustine opposed both the universality (or *catholicity) of the church as foretold in Scripture and its mixed character, embracing both tares and wheat until the judgment. The quest for a pure community was doomed to failure (for only God knows who are his) and contrary to Scripture. The church's holiness is not that of its members, but of Christ its head, to be realized only eschatologically. Augustine so emphasized the bond between Christ and his body that he could even speak of them as 'one Christ loving himself', even 'one person' compacted by love or the Spirit (which Augustine closely identified – see below).

Since *schism is supremely an offence against love, Augustine argues, schismatics are bereft of the Spirit of love. Although they profess the catholic faith and administer the catholic sacraments, these remain profitless to them until they enter the catholic fold which is the sole sphere of the Spirit. Reinforcing the fourth century's abandonment of the original African position (see *Cyprian), Augustine argued that schismatic or heretical sacraments are valid (but not regular), for their validity hinges not on the worthiness of the human minister, but on Christ, who is the true minister of the sacraments. So Augustine could accept Donatists into the church without requiring their rebaptism or re-ordination.

Augustine also provided a theological justification for the coercion of heretics and schismatics (Epistle 93 [408]; Epistle 185 [417]). Threats and sanctions were essentially corrective (and so could never include the death penalty), which was the special service to religion of Christians holding secular office. Augustine originally assented to this policy for pragmatic reasons, but defended it by a rather adventurous use of Scripture (including texts like Luke 14:23), and in terms of how God dealt with recalcitrant humanity – by the harsh discipline of his 'benevolent severity'. It was in this context that Augustine uttered his widely quoted dictum, 'Love, and do what you will', as a defence of paternal chastisement.

Pelagianism

Augustine's most influential legacy to Protestantism per se was his anti-Pelagian corpus (411–30). From the first of his many writings (The Merits and Remission of Sins and Infant Baptism, 411–12), he wove the Pelagians' diverse emphases into a single '*heresy'. The controversy unfolded in three stages: against Celestius and Pelagius (411–18; The Spirit and the Letter, Nature and Grace, The Perfection of Human Righteousness, The Grace of Christ and Original Sin, Epistle 194); against Julian (419–30; Marriage and Concupiscence, Against Two Letters of the Pelagians, Against Julian, Unfinished Work against Julian); and against the misnamed semi-Pelagian monks of Africa and Gaul (427–30; Grace and Free Will, Correction and Grace, Epistle 217, The Predestination of the Saints, The Gift of Perseverance).

The long conflict witnessed Augustine's construction of an evermore impregnable and forbidding theological fortress. Its building blocks included the following: an exalted view of the perfections of Adam and Eve, and hence of the disastrous consequences of the fall; the insistence that, because all sinned 'in Adam' (on which Augustine appealed to Ambrosiaster's biological reading of Rom. 5:12), all are bound by the penalties for that *sin – spiritual death, guilt and the diseased disordering of human nature; 'concupiscence', from which no sexual acts of fallen humanity are free (even within Christian marriage), as the locus of transmission of original sin from parents to children; the impossibility of even 'the beginning of faith' without the gift of prevenient *grace by whose power 'the will is prepared' to turn to God; the restriction of this grace to the baptized, so that infants dying unbaptized are condemned to hell, if perhaps to its milder reaches, and to the 'fixed number' of the elect, who receive it by God's sovereign free mercy alone, with the rest of humankind left to their just deserts (Augustine rarely speaks of a divine *predestination to condemnation parallel to predestination to salvation); the denial that God 'will have all persons to be saved', and the disjunction of election and baptism, for not all the baptized belong to the elect; the infallibility of the eternal redemption of the elect, in whom God's grace works irresistibly (but not coercively) and who receive the 'gift of perseverance'; and the conclusive appeal to the inscrutability of God's judgments when mere human beings dared to question them.

The church in both East and West repudiated basic Pelagian beliefs, but did not canonize the full scope of Augustine's refutation, either then or at the Second Council of Orange (529). Within Augustine's own thinking, undoubted development is identifiable at important points, especially on the nature and transmission of original sin when compared with the voluntarist approach to sin of Free Will (391–95). Questions have often been raised (e.g. by Harnack) whether the institutional doctrine of the church and baptism in the anti-Donatist writings can survive the heavy anti-Pelagian stress on the certus numerus of the elect. Dogmatically, one might question the disjunction between the loving God who elects some and the just God who condemns the rest. But at its least controversial (e.g. in The Spirit and the Letter), Augustine's theology provides an impressive exposition of the Pauline gospel.

The Trinity

The Trinity (399–419) is one of Augustine's most influential works: it controlled the terms of Western *trinitarian thought until very recently. He had been concerned about what he would have called "Arian" views (modern scholars would call them 'homoian' views) from the time of his baptism, for homoianism (the view that the Son is 'like' the Father [homoios], rather than consubstantial with the Father [homoousios]) remained a strong tradition in Milan from the time of Ambrose's predecessor as bishop there, Auxentius, one of the stars of the movement. Such debates were given a new urgency after the occupation of the Western half of the Roman Empire by Germanic and other invaders, themselves largely homoian, began in 405.

Augustine pays his respects to the great Greek-speaking trinitarian theologians, but himself articulates a theology which is much more emphatic in its insistence on the unity of God and the equality of the Three than, say, the Council of *Constantinople of 381. He starts not with the Father as the fount of Godhead, but with God himself, whom he speaks of as 'essence' rather than 'substance' (the more traditional Latin term since the days of *Tertullian), to avoid implications derived from Aristotelian categories.

Augustine's theology breathes new life into the familiar notion that the difference between the persons of the Trinity is best described as a difference of relations, grounding his trinitarian thought in the love of the Father for the Son and the Son for the Father. That love (caritas) is the *Spirit, which is also the Trinity's gift to us, uniting God's people: Augustine thus links Trinity and church. The Spirit is unambiguously the Spirit of both Father and Son, so that Augustine is a clear witness to the filioque (see *Creeds).

The later chapters turn to analogies of the human mind to make further sense of the way in which God is Three in One. Since human beings are made in the image of God, they must in some way bear the stamp of the Trinity within. (Augustine plumps firmly for the mind as image of God, ignoring the tradition of *Irenaeus that it is rather the flesh that would be taken on by Christ which is made in the image of the God who would wear it.) He suggested the threeness of memory, understanding and will, or mind, mind as known and mind as loved, as appropriate analogies. Closer still was the model of the mind remembering, knowing and loving God. Contemplating the image of the Trinity in human beings leads them to strive to conform ever further to the divine image. Theology, worship and holiness have here a fruitful meeting point.

The City of God

The City of God also occupied Augustine over many years (413–26). It provides a wide-ranging crystallization of his thinking on *history and society. Its catalyst was the three-day sack of Rome by a Gothic army in 410, and the consequent pagan charge that Christianity had destroyed the Roman Empire by undermining its traditional mores. Augustine responds by deconstructing the whole of Roman history and religion, and replacing the mystique of the city of Rome with the spiritual reality of the two cities of the afterlife, the city of God and the city of Babylon, the fruits of the two loves on earth, of God or of self, that make all human beings citizens of either the one or the other.

Roman history is replaced by salvation history, based on the common Christian conception of the seven day-ages of the world. The church era is the sixth day, prior to the eternal Sabbath, the millennium of Rev. 20. Decisively abandoning the chiliasm (*millennarianism) of earlier Christianity (which he had once held himself), Augustine views the whole period between incarnation and parousia as homogeneous. He rejects the *Eusebian theology of the Christian Roman Empire as a new stage in God's purposes: the City of God consistently plays down the significance of secular history, even of Rome under Christian rulers. The pilgrimage of the city of God on earth is ultimately independent of *state or society. Augustine's notion of the role of government is minimalist; it exists to curb the excesses of sin, although Christian rulers have, as Christians, duties to promote the church. He is far from implying any kind of theocratic church power.

Like a good Christian Platonist and biblical theologian, Augustine projects solid reality beyond this world, to heaven and the future. In doing so, he gave Christians of the post-Roman world a way of making sense of what had happened, and the tools with which to face the chaotic times ahead.

Bibliography

Works: J. E. Rotelle (ed.), The Works of Saint Augustine: A Translation for the 21st Century (New York, 1990 – in progress).

Studies: G. Bonner, St Augustine of Hippo: Life and Controversies (London, rev. edn, 1986); P. Brown, Augustine of Hippo: A Biography (London, 1967); H. Chadwick, Augustine: A Very Short Introduction (Oxford, 1986); A. D. Fitzgerald (ed.), Augustine through the Ages: An Encyclopedia (Grand Rapids, 1999); E. Hill, The Mystery of the Trinity (London, 1985); R. A. Markus, Saeculum: History and Society in the Theology of St Augustine (Cambridge, 1970); Revue des études augustiniennes; J. M. Rist, Augustine: Ancient Thought Baptized (Cambridge, 1994); E. TeSelle, Augustine the Theologian (New York, 1970); F. Van der Meer, Augustine the Bishop, tr. B. Battershaw and G. R. Lamb (London, 1961).

S. PARVIS

AUGUSTINIANISM

The influence of Augustine has been so pervasive in Western Christianity that this survey can only be selective, concentrating chiefly on his (anti-Pelagian) ‘doctrines of *grace’, to which Augustinianism as a theological system most commonly refers.

Critical reactions against Augustine’s writings began in his lifetime with the *Pelagians and *Semi-Pelagians. The outcome of these controversies was the canonizing of the heart of Augustine’s teaching in the fifth and sixth centuries. In 531 Pope Boniface II confirmed the decrees of the Second Council of Orange.

Legacy

Already Augustine enjoyed high esteem. Caesarius of Arles (d. 542) often seems little more than an adapter of Augustine, and other late Fathers, like Gregory the Great and Isidore of Seville (c. 560–636), treated him with deferential appreciation. Many digests and florilegia of his writings were produced, for example by Prosper of Aquitaine (d. 463), Eugippius, an abbot near Naples (d. 535), Bede (d. 735) and Florus of Lyons (d. c. 860). In the Carolingian renaissance, of which one inspiration was Augustine’s charter for Christian education and culture, On Christian Doctrine, the homiliaries of Paul Deacon (d. c. 800) and others, and the biblical commentaries and theological compilations of Alcuin (d. 804), Walafrid Strabo (d. 849), Rabanus Maurus (d. 856) and many more made heavy use of Augustine.

In the ninth century, Gottschalk was a controversial exponent of Augustinianism, in particular of double *predestination and supralapsarianism. Among his opponents was the Neoplatonist Eriugena, who owed much to another side of Augustine, while among his supporters was Ratramnus, whose more spiritual view of the *Eucharist was directed against the more ‘realist’ teaching of Paschasius Radbertus. Both were able to appeal to Augustine – a regular feature of later eucharistic disputes.

Both *Anselm, the pioneer of the new scholastic approach to theology, and *Bernard of Clairvaux, one of its keenest critics, were indebted to Augustine. Augustine’s correlation of *faith and reason appeared a ready-made justification for scholasticism, while Bernard’s spirituality and his teaching on grace and free will used him to quite different effect. Although *scholasticism substituted *Aristotle for Plato as the philosophical handmaid of theology, Augustine remained a dominant authority, not least in Peter *Lombard and *Thomas Aquinas, but the schoolmen increasingly inclined towards explanations of the relation between human free will and merit and divine grace that were in effect Semi-Pelagian.

The Franciscans in particular accorded a prominent place to Augustine in their theological study. *Bonaventura, for example, was more of a *Platonist than an Aristotelian, with a theory of illumination not unlike Augustine’s. *Duns Scotus also picked up Augustinian motifs in his emphasis on God’s freedom and on will and love.

Augustine’s legacy was also acknowledged by the monastic movements (see *Asceticism and monasticism) named after the Rule of Augustine. (The Rule became influential only in the eleventh century. The authenticity of its different versions is still disputed.) The Augustinian (Austin) Canons (‘canons regular’) were organized during the eleventh-century Gregorian reform, not in a single order but in separate 'congregations'. Among these were the Victorines at Paris who constituted a leading school of Augustinian thought and spirituality. The Windesheim congregation in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries included the chief monastic representatives of the renewal movement known as the Devotio Moderna, whose ranks embraced Geert de Grootte (1340–84), the founder of the Brethren of the Common Life, and Thomas à Kempis (see *Spirituality). Erasmus, much influenced by those stirrings which fed into the Reformation at several points, was also an Augustinian Canon for a time.

The Augustinian Hermits or Friars were formed as an order in the thirteenth century. They were originally hermitic but soon became mendicant. Gregory of Rimini, a general of the order, was a thoroughly Augustinian theologian. Scholars debate the strength and significance of a renewed Augustinianism among the Augustinians in the pre-Reformation centuries. Later some of the Friars' congregations became Reformed (i.e. strict 'Observants' of the Rule), including the German one which Luther joined at Erfurt in 1505. Its vicar-general was John Staupitz (1460/69–1529), Luther's predecessor as professor of the Bible at Wittenberg. He was an uncompromising exponent of Augustine's doctrine of election, with which he correlated a unilateral covenant whereby God appointed Christ to be the mediator of *justification for the elect. He stressed the praise of God, fostered by humanity's total dependence upon divine election and justification and by his assurance of the personal presence of the risen Christ. Staupitz's influence on Luther was significant at a critical time, pointing him to God's love in the cross, and interpreting his temptations as signs of God's election. *Karlstadt, Luther's colleague and radical critic, dedicated his commentary on Augustine's The Spirit and the Letter to Staupitz, although it was Luther who drove him to study Augustine afresh.

The Protestant Reformers

All the Magisterial Reformers sat at Augustine's feet. They benefited from the Renaissance rediscovery of Christian antiquity. Several new editions of Augustine were printed, notably by Erasmus. The Reformation protest was directed against the prevalence in late medieval theology, for all its professed allegiance to Augustine, of one equivalent or other of Semi-Pelagianism. The *nominalists, such as *William of Ockham and Gabriel *Biel, taught that doing what was within one's natural power (facere quod in se est) merited the first infusion of grace from God (meritum de congruo). The Englishman Thomas *Bradwardine strongly opposed Ockham's Semi-Pelagianism with a somewhat extreme Augustinianism.

The Reformers highlighted different notes in Augustine. *Calvin more thoroughly systematized his predestinarianism, while *Luther was drawn to his grim portrayal of fallen humanity, probably going beyond Augustine's account of the bondage of the will. On some elements, such as free will and original sin, other Reformers too favoured divergent formulations, but the kernel of Augustinianism was everywhere the heart of the Protestant gospel (see *Reformation theology).

Roman Catholicism

But Rome could not concede the Protestants' claims to be the true interpreters of Augustine. The two centuries after the Reformation were marked by controversies within Catholicism about the import of Augustine's teachings. In undiluted form they repeatedly raised the spectre of crypto-Protestantism infiltrating the fold. Michel Baius (de Bay, 1513–89) was a Louvain theologian who claimed to have read the anti-Pelagian works seventy times! In 1567 a papal bull condemned many propositions from his writings. He undoubtedly espoused a sharper version of Augustinianism than counter-reform Catholicism could tolerate. This became evident in the new Jesuit Order's official adoption of Molinist opinions which were in substance Semi-Pelagian. Dominicans who accused the Jesuits of Pelagianism were themselves accused of Calvinism. A papal ruling in 1607 allowed both main currents of teaching. Renewed controversy broke out a century later over Henri Noris (1631–1704), an Augustinian hermit and author of a learned history of Pelagianism and defence of Augustinianism against Molinism. The outcome was another authorization of different systems of thought within the church. In practice, the Jesuits' Semi-Pelagian Molinism widely prevailed (see *Jesuit theology).

1640 saw the publication of a posthumous work called Augustinus by Cornelius Jansen (1585–1638), a Dutchman who taught at Louvain. It sparked off a far more intense conflict, especially in France, where the Cistercian convent of Port-Royal, with two houses in and near Paris, became the headquarters of *Jansenism, under the lead of St Cyran (Jean Duvergier de Hauranne, 1581–1643, the abbot of St Cyran), Antoine Arnauld (1612–94) and his sister Jacqueline Angélique (1591–1661), the abbess of Port-Royal. Support came from Dominicans, *Pascal and others sympathetic to a movement standing also for renewal of piety and devotion. The Jansenists' main target was Jesuit theology, especially Molinism. In 1653 Pope Innocent X condemned five propositions, allegedly extracted from Jansen's book, which affirmed that God's commands cannot be fulfilled without grace; grace is irresistible; fallen man is free from coercion, not from necessity; the Semi-Pelagians' error was denial of the irresistibility of grace; it is Semi-Pelagian to say that Christ died for all mankind. Jansenists contested this presentation of Jansen's teaching, and dispute persisted. In 1713 a more comprehensive papal condemnation was given of a work by the French Oratorian, Pasquier Quesnel (1634–1719). Port-Royal was closed in 1709, but Dutch Jansenists formed an independent bishopric which has survived as part of the Old Catholic Church. This long controversy stimulated extensive study of Augustine and the Pelagian episodes. One fruit was the edition of his works, still the best complete one, by the Maurist Benedictines (1679–1700). Jansenist sympathies had been observed among the Maurists.

Since the eighteenth century, Augustinian theology has been a less controversial subject for Catholics. Study of his works has continued to grow, with several periodicals and research centres, especially the Institut des Etudes Augustiniennes in Paris. In constructive theology, other aspects of his thought have increasingly kindled keener interest than the anti-Pelagian corpus.

Protestantism

Within Protestantism, the legacy of (anti-Pelagian) Augustinianism has been largely subsumed within the Lutheran and *Reformed traditions. Platonic dualism has been held to be a major structural fault in Augustine's teaching by theologians in the Barthian tradition, which also blames him for the Western preoccupation with anthropology rather than Christology. Reinhold *Niebuhr's 'Christian realism' was explicitly indebted to Augustine, and his Nature and Destiny of Man has been seen as a modern-day City of God.

In much of modern theology across different traditions, Augustine's creativity attracts continuing attention, from his teaching on the just war and his spiritual theology to his ideas on language and culture more generally. His emphasis on the relation between sexual disorder and human sinfulness is viewed as a still damaging legacy, while his role in the development of Western notions of the individual inner self is variously assessed.

See also: AUGUSTINE.

Bibliography

P. Cary, Augustine's Invention of the Inner Self: The Legacy of a Christian Platonist (Oxford, 2000); H.-U. Delius, Augustin als Quelle Luthers (Berlin, 1984); A. Hamel, Der Junge Luther und Augustin (Gütersloh, 1934–35); L. Kolakowski, God Owes Us Nothing: A Brief Remark on Pascal's Religion and on the Spirit of Jansenism (Chicago and London, 1995); H. de Lubac, Augustinianism and Modern Theology (London, 1969); H. Marrou, St. Augustine and His Influence Through the Ages (London, 1957); H. A. Oberman, 'The Augustine Renaissance in the Later Middle Ages', in H. A. Oberman (ed.), Masters of the Reformation (Cambridge, 1981); H. A. Oberman and F. A. James (eds.), Via Augustini: Augustine in the Later Middle Ages, Renaissance, and Reformation: Essays in Honor of Damasus Trapp (Leiden and New York, 1991); J. M. J. L. van Ravenswaay, Augustinus Totus Noster: das Augustinverständnis bei Johannes Calvin (Göttingen, 1990); A. Sedgwick, Jansenism in Seventeenth-Century France (Charlottesville, 1977); L. Smits, S. Augustin dans l'oeuvre de Jean Calvin (Assen, 1957–8); D. C. Steinmetz, Misericordia Dei: The Theology of Johannes von Staupitz in Its Late Medieval Setting (Leiden, 1968); D. Trapp, 'Augustinian Theology of the Fourteenth Century', Augustiniana 6, 1956, pp. 146–274.

D. F. WRIGHT

AULÉN, GUSTAF (1879–1977)

Professor of systematic theology in Lund and Bishop of Strängnäs in the Swedish Lutheran Church, Aulén was (with *Nygren and *Wingren) one of the foremost Scandinavian theologians of the modern era. A student of Nathan Söderblom (1866–1931) at Uppsala, his contributions to *ecumenism and to the revival of Lutheran theology and church life in Sweden were many and various.

Much of his theological writing is characterized by a high appreciation of *Luther's dramatic presentation of the realities of sin, grace and redemption, and by a correspondingly low view of *scholasticism, whether medieval or Lutheran.

He is chiefly known for his short work on the *atonement, Christus Victor, which attempts to reinstate the so-called 'classic' view of the atonement. This interpretation, traced by Aulén in the NT, and also in *Irenaeus and Luther, envisages the cross as God's mighty act of triumph over powers of evil hostile to his will, and distinguishes itself from Latin ideas of *satisfaction and from 'subjective' or 'exemplarist' accounts. His work draws not only on some of the central preoccupations of *Reformation theologies of the cross and of grace, but also on the techniques of 'motif-research' of which Anders Nygren is the chief exponent.

Aulén was also the author of a systematic theology, The Faith of the Christian Church, and of books on ecclesiology and sacramental theology. Towards the end of his life he published Jesus in Contemporary Historical Research, arguing forcefully against historical scepticism applied to the Gospels. He was also a noted musician and composer.

Bibliography

Main works in ET: Christus Victor (London, 1931); The Drama and the Symbols (London, 1970); Eucharist and Sacrifice (Edinburgh, 1958); The Faith of the Christian Church (London, 1954); Jesus in Contemporary Historical Research (London, 1976); Reformation and Catholicity (Edinburgh, 1961).

J. B. WEBSTER

AUSCHWITZ, see HOLOCAUST

AUTHORITY

Christian theology makes the simple claim that *God, the author of all created reality, is the source of true authority in creation. The creative Word or Wisdom of God has given his creation forms of authority reflecting divine right and justice, as for example the authority of just law is attributed by the apostle Paul to God (Rom. 13) for the order and protection of society. Authority in this sense is mediated in the created order in many ways (e.g. J. Calvin, Institutes, I. iii. 1–3; II. ii.17), including human reason and sensitivity to beauty in the cosmos: great works of art are said to have an authority, which some theologians attribute to the 'mind of the Maker', as Dorothy Sayers entitled one of her books. Moral authority, likewise, is acknowledged in people and systems of government which reflect integrity, truth and justice, all ultimately having their source in God. All forms of human authority are, however, corruptible, as is evident, for example, in the biblical narratives of kingship; and even church authorities can fall into the direst of sin. Sociology of authority points to charismatic authority, and to institutional authority, a description not incompatible with theological analysis; in fact, *Weber took his inspiration from charismatic prophetic authority becoming 'routinized' into institutional authority in the early church.

Christian theology understands divine authority as self-defined by *Jesus Christ, his life, death and resurrection. Therefore the criticism of *theism, that it presents an authoritarian deity of pure power evoking a terrified submission, cannot be true of the God who was in Christ reconciling the world to himself by the *cross. Divine authority cannot be separated from divine love, which seeks to evoke covenant or communion by responsive love; this is truly 'the omnipotence of love' (J. Oman). The reconciling death of Jesus unites *love with justice in revealing and upholding divine authority and holiness in human history. Here God speaks his final authoritative word to humankind – indeed to the cosmos – the saving act of the divine Word renewing creation and all authorities. The authority of God is revealed as Christlike rather than domineering. The authority of God is also an eschatological reality, breaking into sinful and idolatrous history, conquering the false gods of brutal authoritarian power, propaganda and deception by the *kingdom of God, revealed in Jesus and still to be wholly fulfilled, the church being the beloved, if fallible, covenant partner of Christ in history.

The *Spirit of God brings home the divine authority in human hearts, working through human will and consent, a theme expounded by *Calvin in terms of ‘the internal testimony of the Spirit’. Divine authority is therefore no dry objective reality facing us only with challenge and summons, but a life-giving movement in which we participate: ‘God sent the Spirit of his Son into our hearts, the Spirit who calls out, “Abba, Father!”’ (Gal. 4:6). Worship of God the Father is the ultimate expression of our acknowledgment of divine authority, a matter of joy and love, of being caught up into the life of God. There is no need therefore to overbalance in the direction of lifeless objectivity nor of disordered subjectivity in seeking to know divine authority.

The risen Christ is Lord of the church, the canonical Scriptures informing the church and the world of this Lord, his historical and theological significance; these *Scriptures themselves being guided and inspired by the Spirit in such a way as to reflect the divine patience with human historical character and circumstance, charting the history of the covenant as like a river rather than an artificial canal blasted through rock with mathematical and mechanical force (J. Oman). The authority of God works with human creaturely resources rather than by pure external power. The Scriptures are authoritative over the church as well as in a sense being products of the people of God, inspired for particular purposes, acknowledged by the community as such and recorded faithfully. The Scriptures give the church direct access to the preaching and teaching of the apostles and prophets, whose voices therefore can and do speak now in the church, mediating the authority of Christ with clarity and power, teaching the ‘apostolic’ message to the church today. Karl *Barth spoke of the ‘threefold form of the Word’ – Christ as the ‘revealed Word’, the proclamation of the church as the ‘preached Word’ and the Scriptures the ‘written Word’ – arguing that these three coalesce in the Spirit again and again in the church. Few would disagree with this, but might wish to add that the truth of the written word stands as true and authoritative in a way that avoids the charge of ‘occasionalism’ or a Kantian epistemological dualism of faith and unfaith, that is to say, the text seems to become true in the moment of faithful reading. For Barth, that is the moment of inspiration when the Spirit brings the words to life as revelation.

Debates about the categories most apt to describe the inspired and authoritative Scriptures (‘inerrant’, ‘infallible’, ‘reliable’, for example)

have served to underline the key importance of the Bible in the church, and theology as the basic authority in terms of the ‘order of knowing’, always pointing beyond itself to God, the role of Scripture. Scripture mediates the authority of God to the church and the world, a fundamentally ‘personal’ authority, wholly reliable and inexhaustibly rich, as witnessed by its challenge and interest from generation to generation; the Scriptures are never summarized so as to become redundant. The wide and deep range of literature, inspired and forged by the Spirit in human crises and triumphs, speaks of God’s nature and purposes for the human race. This authoritative teaching is public *truth, not just for a special elite of initiates, and so all are called to attend to the message, bringing all their questions with them.

Church tradition, seeking to clarify and serve scriptural teaching about God’s self-revelation, remains subject to the authority of Scripture and is not an extended mode of the canon bearing equal status. Likewise, the authority claimed by some theologians for contemporary cultural experience must be carefully discerned in terms of the witness of Scripture, especially in terms of ethical questions. The authority of individual desires or drives, for example in debates over sexual *ethics, must be related to the gospel summons of true humanity being defined in Christ. The church will never be free from debates concerning the interaction of contemporary questions and scriptural principles.

Politically, too, claims to absolute authority by the *state represent a form of false authority equating to idolatry and in need of the clarity of the criterion of the scriptural witness to Christ as Lord. The authority of God relates to creation as well as church. It is therefore to be seen as applicable to issues of culture and politics; indeed it was the realization of God’s authority over political authority that led reformers such as Wilberforce in Britain to campaign for the abolition of the slave trade.

The church will never be free of contested questions arising from clashes of Christian authority with problems of *culture, and must be constantly aware of the danger of being blinkered by traditions to the radical claims of Christ mediated through Scripture and stimulated by the Spirit. In this regard the challenge of *postmodernism to authority in the form of text with a given meaning always requiring ‘deconstruction’, or established institutional authority needing to be regarded with suspicion as disguised power play, is interesting to Christianity. On the one hand, postmodern deconstruction brings down Enlightenment ‘idols’ such as rationality and morality (Nietzsche) or ‘sexuality’ (Foucault), but on the other hand, it has no place for the authority of God nor a final purpose to the endless ‘text’ of human existence. Christian theologians influenced by postmodernism have rejected ‘onto theology’, that is, a doctrine of a dominating deity over against the world and not participating in it, representing power rather than Christlike authority.

The authority of God mediated in Christ and the Spirit is a personal kind of authority rather than a mode of rigid rules and regulations, the issue over which Jesus clashed with the Pharisees. This is not to say that divine authority is unclear or relativist, but rather that its manner accommodates graciously to human conditions and characteristics, speaking to us through Jesus and drawing us into the life of God by the Spirit. This authority is ultimately purposive: to bring us to the glory of the kingdom and fulfil the goal of the cosmos in all respects.

Bibliography

H. Arendt, ‘What Is Authority?’ in P. Baehr (ed.), The Portable Hannah Arendt (London, 2003); P. T. Forsyth, The Principle of Authority (London, 1952); C. Gunton, Enlightenment and Alienation (Basingstoke, 1985); O. O’Donovan, Resurrection and Moral Order, pt. 2 (Leicester and Grand Rapids, 1994); H. E. W. Turner, The Pattern of Christian Truth (London, 1954); J. B. Webster, Word and Church (Edinburgh, 2001).

T. BRADSHAW

AUTONOMY

Autonomy refers generally to the capacity to set one’s own laws and administer one’s own affairs, and to one’s right to do so. The term originated in ancient Greece to describe the political and legal status of city-states, but came in the *Enlightenment to be predicated of human persons. It thus extended its sphere of reference from political and legal domains to the realms of philosophy, theology and ethics, where it had previously been subsumed under the concept of freedom. For Immanuel *Kant, autonomy referred to the property of the human will to be a moral law for itself independently of any external sources. Relying for authoritative principles on other sources, whether material inclinations or desires, human institutions or conventions, or the will of God, would by contrast constitute heteronomy.

Importantly for Kant, human autonomy was neither arbitrary nor idiosyncratic, but was rather bound to the universal law of reason. In certain later Enlightenment traditions, however, autonomy was construed in a more radical way such that its goal was posited as an absolute self-determination in which every external point of reference is relativized or eliminated. These latter construals of autonomy in particular represented a view of human freedom which stood in some tension with traditional Christian views of human freedom in which a relationship with God was a central feature. In the course of responding to such Enlightenment conceptions of autonomy, Christian theology has offered a number of different approaches.

In the nineteenth century, theologians sympathetic to the Enlightenment – such as *Schleiermacher, *Hegel, and *Ritschl – sought in their different ways to correlate the idea of human autonomy, at least in its milder, Kantian formulation, with the idea of Christian *freedom in the context of theonomy, the condition of being ruled or governed by God. In the twentieth century, this theological task continued in diverse ways, as the importance of the concept of autonomy and the complexity of its relation to Christian freedom were increasingly recognized. The Roman Catholic Church at the Second Vatican Council affirmed human autonomy for the first time, with the proviso that all created things depended on God, and no created thing could be used by humanity without any reference to God as Creator. For Karl *Barth, meanwhile, there was no contradiction between autonomy and theonomy, because it was precisely the theonomy of God which willed the autonomy of the individual. Thus, human autonomy is simultaneously graciously affirmed and divinely circumscribed. For Paul *Tillich, autonomy was the obedience of the individual to the law of reason, but this autonomy was in perpetual conflict with heteronomy. Reconciliation of the two was to be found in theonomy, for God was the law for both the structure and the ground of reason. As autonomy continues to be a significant, if contested, concept in contemporary political thought and ethical theory, so the theological task of appropriately conceptualizing human autonomy – in relation both to God and neighbour and to the concept of Christian freedom – continues to be a pressing task.

Bibliography

K. Barth, CD, vol. II/2 (Edinburgh, 1957); I. Kant, Groundwork of the Metaphysics of Morals (Cambridge, 1998); P. Tillich, Systematic Theology, vol. 1 (Welwyn, 1953); Vatican Council, ‘Gaudium et Spes’, in Vatican Council II: Constitutions, Decrees, Declarations (New York, 1996).

P. T. NIMMO

AVERROISM

Averroism is a branch of the *Aristotelian philosophical tradition inspired by the Arab philosopher Averroes (Lat. for Ibn-Rushd, 1126–98), the most influential commentator on the writings of Aristotle. Although Averroes was the greatest Islamic philosopher, his influence was felt primarily in the Latin West (he came from Cordoba in Spain), at the University of Paris in the thirteenth and early fourteenth centuries and at the Universities of Bologna and Padua from the thirteenth to the middle of the seventeenth centuries. More recently, this movement has been called ‘radical or heterodox Aristotelianism’. This name is appropriate because the primary aim of its masters was to teach the philosophy of Aristotle. Their goal was not to follow Averroes, but simply to present Aristotle’s thought. Most famous among these masters at the University of Paris are Siger of Brabant (c. 1235–c. 1282) and Boetius of Dacia (fl. mid-thirteenth century). Among Italian Averroists, the best known is Caesar Cremoninus (c. 1550–1631), who is supposed to have been the friend of Galileo who refused to look through a telescope because this might compel him to abandon Aristotelian astronomy.

There are three areas in which Aristotle’s thought presented a direct challenge to Christian teaching. Aristotle asserted that the world is eternal and this is opposed to the doctrine of *creation. He also seems to have held that there is one immaterial soul for all men, and this calls into question the teaching of personal *immortality and the possibility of reward or punishment after death. Finally, he supposed that man can achieve perfection following reason alone, and this opposes the Christian teaching that faith is necessary for salvation (see *Faith and reason). Because of these problems, the assimilation of Aristotle into the Christian West was difficult. Some wished to reject Aristotle entirely; others like *Thomas Aquinas used Aristotle, but only after criticizing and modifying his thought. The Averroists tended to adopt Aristotle without reservation and so appeared to be maintaining teachings contrary to the faith. Averroism was opposed by Aquinas and others, and the Christian Averroists were condemned by the church in the 1270s.

For a long time the double-truth theory was attributed to Averroists. According to this theory, a thesis could be true in philosophy and its contradictory thesis could be true for faith (see *Duns Scotus). For example, according to philosophy the world has existed eternally, but according to faith the world has had a beginning. In fact, neither Siger nor anyone else claims that such contradictory truths are compatible; rather, in cases where philosophy and faith are in conflict, truth is always held to be on the side of faith. However, even while these masters say that truth is on the side of faith, they give the impression that they remain attached to the conclusions of philosophy. This gives the impression that they hold two contradictory propositions to be true, and indeed their opponents tried to attribute the double-truth thesis to them to show the untenability of their position.

In the Averroists’ concern for reason, there was not an interest in freedom of thought, as one might suppose, but rather an excessive regard for the philosophical tradition. Siger of Brabant states that to treat matters philosophically is to be concerned with determining the thought of the philosophers rather than discovering the truth. This same attachment to the philosophers, especially Aristotle, seems also to have dominated Cremoninus. Averroism was the most conservative and sterile form of Aristotelianism.

Bibliography

E. Gilson, History of Christian Philosophy in the Middle Ages (London, 1955); L. Sonneborn, Averroes (Ibn Rushd): Muslim Scholar, Philosopher, and Physician of the Twelfth Century (New York, 2006); F. van Steenberghen, Thomas Aquinas and Radical Aristotelianism (Washington, DC, 1980).

A. Vos

BAILLIE, DONALD MACPHERSON (1887–1954)

Donald Baillie was born at Gairloch, Ross-shire, where his father was a minister of the Free Church of Scotland; he was the younger brother of John *Baillie. He graduated in philosophy at Edinburgh, before studying for the ministry of the United Free Church of Scotland at New College, Edinburgh, under Hugh Ross *Mackintosh. Thereafter, he studied at Marburg under Wilhelm *Herrmann and at Heidelberg under Ernst *Troeltsch. He was ordained to the ministry in 1918 and served at Inverbervie, Cupar and Kilmacolm, before becoming Professor of Systematic Theology at St Andrews in 1934. In common with a majority of the United Free Church, he entered into the Church of Scotland in the Union of 1929.

His earliest significant work, Faith in God and Its Christian Consummation (1927), seeks to provide an apologetic ground for the reality of faith. Here we see Baillie developing his position within the theological parameters set by Albrecht *Ritschl, as interpreted by Herrmann; the influence of Ritschl, and German theology in general, was particularly marked in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries in Scotland. Nevertheless, Faith in God may be said to typify the end of an era within Scottish theology, and in Baillie's most significant work, God Was in Christ (1948), we see him engaged with 'the central problem of *Christology . . . What do we mean by saying that God was incarnate in Jesus?' (pp. 106ff.). Baillie seeks to present an essentially *Chalcedonian understanding of the incarnation and to do so through 'the paradox of Grace'. The concept of "paradox" is already evident in Faith in God, but assumes a central place in God Was in Christ, where Baillie identifies it as 'characteristic of Christianity' as evidenced in Paul (1 Cor. 15:10) and elsewhere (p. 114). Thus, beginning with 'the paradox of Grace', Baillie seeks to develop an analogy which will more fully disclose 'the paradox of the Incarnation'. He contends that if the life of Christ can be 'regarded as in some sense the prototype of the Christian life, may we not find a feeble analogue of the incarnate life in the experience of those who are His "many brethren", and particularly in the central paradox of their experience: "Not I, but the grace of God"?' He further asks, 'If this confession is true . . . is it not the same type of paradox, taken at the absolute degree . . . of which we say that it was the life of a man and yet also, in a deeper and prior sense, the very life of God incarnate?' (p. 129).

The posthumously published The Theology of the Sacraments (1957) seeks to rediscover the significance of the *sacraments, particularly from the perspective of the Reformed tradition. This concern reflects Baillie's wider ecumenical outlook; he was actively involved in the *Faith and Order conferences in Edinburgh (1937) and in Lund (1952), as well as being joint editor of the volume Intercommunion (1952).

Bibliography

Works: Faith in God and Its Christian Consummation (Edinburgh, 1927); God Was in Christ: An Essay on Incarnation and Atonement (London, ²1956 [1948]); To Whom Shall We Go? (Edinburgh, 1955); The Theology of the Sacraments (London, 1957); Out of Nazareth (Edinburgh, 1958). Ed. with J. Marsh, Intercommunion (London, 1952).

Studies: J. Baillie, 'Some Comments on Professor Hick's Article on "The Christology of D. M. Baillie"', Scottish Journal of Theology 11, 1958, pp. 265–270; D. A. S. Fergusson (ed.), Christ, Church and Society: Essays on John Baillie and Donald Baillie (Edinburgh, 1993); D. A. S. Fergusson (ed.), John and Donald Baillie: Selected Writings (Edinburgh, 1997); J. Hick, 'The Christology of D. M. Baillie', Scottish Journal of Theology 11, 1958, pp. 1–12; G. Newlands, John and Donald Baillie: Transatlantic Theology (Oxford, 2002); D. W. D. Shaw (ed.), In Divers Manners (St Andrews, 1990).

J. L. McPAKE

BAILLIE, JOHN (1886–1960)

Baillie was a Scottish churchman and theologian brother of Donald *Baillie. His life mirrored Presbyterian reunion in Scotland – son of a Free Church manse, student in the United Free Church's New College, Edinburgh, Moderator of the Church of Scotland's General Assembly (1943), as well as wider ecumenism – steward at the 1910 Edinburgh Conference, president of the WCC, signatory of the Bishops Report commending Anglican episcopacy to the Church of Scotland (1957). He was the distinguished helmsman of the Church's Commission for the Interpretation of God's Will in the Present Crisis, 1940–45 (God's Will for Church and Nation, 1946; cf. his What Is Christian Civilization?, 1945).

Baillie taught philosophy in Edinburgh, and then theology in the USA and Canada (1919–34), before becoming professor of divinity at Edinburgh (1934–56), and latterly also dean of the faculty and principal of New College (1950–56). Perhaps at his best as an apologist (cf. Invitation to Pilgrimage, 1942), he has been called ‘a mediating theologian’ (W. L. Power, USQR 24, 1968, pp. 47–68). A decided *liberalism followed the undermining of his father’s Calvinism. It earned *Bonhoeffer’s critical judgment in New York, and is reflected in writings like The Roots of Religion in the Human Soul (1926). About 1930 he shifted towards a ‘liberal *neo-orthodoxy’ (cf. And the Life Everlasting, 1933; Our Knowledge of God, 1939), but subsequently a greater confidence in reason reasserted itself, as he predicted a strong reaction against Barthianism. The Belief in Progress (1950) was followed by The Idea of Revelation in Recent Thought (1956), an influential survey of anti-propositional positions, and his posthumous (undelivered) *Gifford Lectures, The Sense of the Presence of God (1962). His best-known work was the frequently translated A Diary of Private Prayer (1936). Baillie combined a contemplative devotion with a humane Christian liberalism, which discriminated between competing theological tendencies.

Bibliography

Works: Collected essays in Christian Devotion (London, 1962), with a memoir by I. M. Forrester; and A Reasoned Faith (1963). Unpublished papers in New College Library, Edinburgh. Appreciations by D. S. Klinefelter, SJT 22 (1969), pp. 419–436; John A. Mackay, ibid. 9 (1956), pp. 225–235.

Studies: D. A. S. Fergusson, John and Donald Baillie: Selected Writings (Edinburgh, 1996); P. B. O’Leary, Revelation and Faith in Our Knowledge of God According to the Theology of John Baillie (Rome, 1968); T. F. Torrance, Religion in Life 30 (1961), pp. 329–333.

D. F. WRIGHT

BALTHASAR, HANS URS VON (1905–88)

Hans von Balthasar was a leading Swiss Roman Catholic theologian and spiritual writer. After studies in philosophy and literature, he became a member of the Society of Jesus before founding a secular institute (the Johannes-gemeinschaft) and engaging in wide-ranging literary and publishing activities. He published voluminously, producing works of Christian theology and philosophy and interpretative studies in the history of culture and spirituality, as well as editing and translating the work of others.

His magnum opus, destined to become one of the classic pieces of twentieth-century theological writing, is a multi-volume work in three parts, synthesizing theology, philosophy and literature in a massive study of the beautiful, the good and the true. The first part, Herrlichkeit (appearing in English as The Glory of the Lord), examines revelation from the vantage point of theological *aesthetics. In the seven volumes of the first part of his trilogy, von Balthasar urges his readers to look at Christian theology under the sign of beauty, which is made manifest in the ‘luminous form’ (Gestalt) of Jesus Christ, the Word of God become flesh, making his view of the Christian faith irreducibly *incarnational. Divine beauty, which is glory, is profoundly different from natural or worldly beauty, because it embraces the cross and the disfigurement of Christ as its manifestations.

Von Balthasar is careful to distinguish a ‘theological aesthetics’ from an ‘aesthetic theology’ which disassociates beauty from the other transcendentals – truth and goodness – thereby rendering aesthetics a secular discipline. Through what he calls the ‘circuminsession’ of the transcendentals, von Balthasar was able to treat aesthetics as integral to reasoning and ethics: beauty is also truth and goodness, and all three are Being, ‘the first of the Transcendentals’. Furthermore, the principle of *analogy postulates a peculiar relationality between divine and worldly beauty which allows von Balthasar to commandeer the science of aesthetics as a conceptual framework for his theology.

If Herrlichkeit treats Christian theology primarily under the rubric of ‘contemplation’, Theodramatik deals with divine and human action. For von Balthasar, the goal of the theology is not the contemplation of God in blissful stasis in which the created world is left behind. Contemplation should result in obedient response to God’s revelation, that is, it should lead to lives lived for the sake of goodness, truth and love. Contemplation flows into action, and the five volumes of Theodramatik seek to describe Christian existence in light of the dramatic *revelation of God. Although von Balthasar begins with the metaphor of the theatre and devotes much time to playwrights and dramatists in volume 1, he makes very little reference to actual plays in subsequent volumes. The literary dramatic form with which he began Theodramatik merely offers a new perspective to the divine revelation. Von Balthasar's main concern is to present a profound meditation on the love of God in Christ and the church's response as the basis of the relationship between God and man.

In the third part of the trilogy, Theologik, von Balthasar deals with the intelligible structure of *salvation. Here von Balthasar completes the conceptual building blocks he has put in place in Herrlichkeit and Theodramatik by reflecting on the nature of *truth. According to von Balthasar, an infinite truth has taken on finite form in the incarnation, and this event has enabled human beings to participate in the mystery of the trinitarian life, where truth sets them free. Theological logic is therefore *christologic, the revelation of the incarnate Logos which invites human beings into the fullest possible participation of being, which is everlasting life. This truth is appropriated only by the Spirit, whose work is co-extensive with that of the Son: the Spirit interprets the Son as Son of the Father.

The virtually unrestricted range of von Balthasar's knowledge and interests testifies to the catholicity of his thought, which was directed by a vision of the universality of God's self-manifestation in Christ: here his debt to some of the Fathers (see *Patristic theology) is evident. The breadth of his vision is intrinsically related, however, to a firm adherence to the particularity of Christ who is the form of God, the divine *glory concentrated and focused in an unsurpassable way.

Von Balthasar's work was much influenced by that of *Barth, upon whom he wrote with great perceptiveness and to whom he was particularly indebted for his vigorous Christocentrism (especially in constructing the doctrine of God on a Christological base) and for an understanding of the theological task as directed by the givenness of revelation. Von Balthasar's use of the category of 'beauty' to describe the nature of God in his self-manifestation to creation is a means of recovering a sense of self-evidence, authority and necessity of revelation in a way closely similar to Barth's own understanding of God's self-manifestation as irreducible and needing no authentication beyond itself.

The gracious character of God's relation to man is a central preoccupation in von Balthasar's theology, and some of his emphases here owe much to the work of E. Przywara, whose account of analogy laid greater stress on the distinction between God and the world than the 'Transcendental Thomism' later made famous by Karl *Rahner.

But perhaps, most of all, von Balthasar's work was deeply impressed by his close relationship to the mystic Adrienne von Speyr (1902–67). From her experiences he developed a remarkable theology of the Holy Saturday, in which Christ's descent into hell becomes a leading motif in Christology, soteriology and *trinitarian theology. As the ultimate act of self-emptying by the Son of God, Holy Saturday furnishes a theology of reconciliation as Christ's solidarity with the damned. It also provides the basis for a theology of the trinitarian relations centred, like other contemporary trinitarian theories, on Calvary.

Von Balthasar is increasingly recognized as a thinker who made a potent restatement of the persistent themes of classical Christian theology, notably in the area of incarnational and trinitarian doctrine. His interweaving of theological and cultural references, however, along with the integrative and speculative tone of much of his writing, may not commend him to strands of contemporary theology more concerned with the critical grounding and appraisal of Christian truth-claims and less confident about the objectivity of revelation.

Bibliography

Works: Elucidations (London, 1965); Love Alone, The Way of Revelation (London, 1968); Prayer (London, 1971); Engagement with God (London, 1975); The Glory of the Lord: A Theological Aesthetics, 7 vols. (Edinburgh and New York, 1983–90); Theo-drama, 5 vols. (New York, 1988–98); Theo-logic, 3 vols. (New York, 2001–05).

Studies: R. Chia, Revelation and Theology: The Knowledge of God in Balthasar and Barth (Bern, 1999); M. Kehl and W. Löser (eds.), A Von Balthasar Reader (Edinburgh, 1983); A. Nichols, The Word Has Been Abroad: A Guide Through Balthasar's Aesthetics (Washington DC, 1998); idem, No Bloodless Myth: A Guide Through Balthasar's Dramatics (Washington DC, 2000); idem, Say It Is Pentecost: A Guide Through Balthasar's Logic (Washington DC, 2001).

J. B. WEBSTER AND R. CHIA

BANGS, NATHAN (1778–1862)

A participant in the second great awakening in Canada and the United States, Bangs was the first major American Methodist theologian. Born in Connecticut and largely self-educated, he worked as a teacher and a surveyor before moving to Canada in 1799. There, through the ministry of Methodist itinerants, he underwent a spiritual struggle that culminated in his profession of conversion in 1800 and entire sanctification in 1801. By 1802 he was preaching to large crowds, and spent the next seven years fanning the flames of the awakening in Upper Canada.

Moving to New York, Bangs became enormously influential in the Methodist Episcopal Church. A prolific author, he edited three periodicals, led the publishing house, and was chief architect of the Methodist Missionary Society.

He defended *Arminianism in The Errors of Hopkinsianism (1815) and Predestination Examined (1817), arguing that while Methodists share with Calvinists a belief in total depravity, they teach that prevenient grace enables sinners to respond freely to God.

A proponent of entire *sanctification, Bangs supported Phoebe *Palmer's ministry and frequently attended her Tuesday Meetings. However, in 1857 he criticized her belief that receiving entire sanctification required no further evidence than its promise in Scripture, and defended the necessity of both a witness and fruit of the Spirit as taught by John *Wesley and John Fletcher.

See also: METHODISM.

Bibliography

T. A. Langford, Practical Divinity: Theology in the Wesleyan Tradition (Nashville, 1998); idem, Practical Divinity: Readings in Wesleyan Theology (Nashville, 1999); G. A. Rawlyk, The Canada Fire (Kingston and Montreal, 1994); A. Stevens, Life and Times of Nathan Bangs, D.D. (New York, 1863); A. H. Tuttle, Nathan Bangs (New York, 1909).

H. H. KNIGHT III

BAPTISM

Baptism in the patristic period

In the primitive church, baptism was an integral part of the kerygma (e.g. Acts 2:38) and an essential part of the process of becoming a Christian (*conversion-initiation), so much so that the NT knows no unbaptized believers (1 Cor. 12:13). While baptism was clearly symbolic, it was also an effective *symbol (Gal. 3:26–27; Col. 2:12; see A. R. Cross, Recovering the Evangelical Sacrament, pp. 51–83, who shows that all the benefits attributed to faith are also attributed to baptism; and also D. F. Wright, What Has Infant Baptism Done? who uses the term 'baptismal realism', p. 93).

While the NT theology of baptism as the occasion of the reception of the Spirit and forgiveness of sins (Acts 2:38), union with Christ in his death and resurrection (Rom. 6:2–11), incorporation into the church (1 Cor. 12:13) and salvation (1 Pet. 3:21) is repeated in the early Christian writings (e.g. Barn. 11; Hermas, Vis. 3.3.1; Mand. 4.3.3; Sim. 9.13.3–6; Theophilus, Autol. 2.16; Irenaeus, Dem. 3 and 42; Clement of Alexandria, Paed. 1.6.25–32), there were, nevertheless, developments. Where scholars differ is on the legitimacy of these.

In the apostolic church, instruction followed baptism on acceptance of the gospel (Acts 2:41; 8:35–39; 16:30–33; cf. Matt. 28:19), but this pattern changed by the turn of the second century (cf. Did. 7, and Justin's 1 Apol. 61, where, e.g. moral teaching, prayer and fasting precede baptism). The reason for the abandonment of immediate baptism most plausibly occurred when Christianity moved from a predominantly Jewish milieu, where converts were familiar with monotheism and the ethical instruction of the OT, to a Gentile one in which converts needed purifying and releasing from the defilements of paganism.

From the turn of the second century, then, we find a developing catechumenate, which varied regionally and could last up to three years, with baptism taking place at Easter. By the fourth and fifth centuries, catechetical classes involved regular attendance at daily meetings during Lent, during which the *creed was expounded (see *Catechisms). The baptismal rite included invocation of the Spirit, various exorcisms, the disrobing of the candidate, renunciation of Satan, anointing with oil, a threefold baptismal interrogation and either a single (e.g. Gregory the Great, Ep. 43) or threefold (as in the Eastern churches) immersion in the name of the Trinity. This was followed by further anointings, reclothing and the laying on of hands, at which point the candidate would share in the Eucharist and enter into a period of post-baptismal teaching known as mystagogy. The various components of the service varied from region to region – West and East Syria, Egypt, North Africa, Italy, Gaul – and extensive examples of catechetical instruction, mystagogical catecheses and sermons survive (in e.g. Cyril of Jerusalem, John Chrysostom, Theodore of Mopsuestia, Ambrose of Milan and Augustine).

While the NT church practised immersion (however, I. H. Marshall, in Dimensions of Baptism, pp. 8–24, argues also for sprinkling and pouring), alternative modes developed in time. The Didache 7 allowed for the threefold pouring of water on the head when sufficient water was lacking, while Cyprian of Carthage permitted its adoption for those bedridden (Ep. 75).

In the NT period, ‘baptism upon personal profession of faith is the most clearly attested pattern in the New Testament documents’ (Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry, p. 4), and many continue to maintain that paedobaptism is present either in the accounts of household baptisms or implicitly in the correspondence of the two covenants (see e.g. G. W. Bromiley, Children of Promise, Grand Rapids, 1979, and G. Strawbridge [ed.], The Case for Covenantal Infant Baptism, Phillipsburg, 2003). However, paedobaptism is not explicit until c. 200 when Tertullian acknowledges it, though disapprovingly, as, for him, people are made, not born Christians (On Baptism 18). Paedobaptism here appears to be relatively new, for it is absent from the *Apostolic Fathers, though this silence is variously interpreted. In less than a generation, though, Origen claimed it to be apostolic (Comm. Rom. 5.9).

The most cogent argument for paedobaptism’s origins is that it grew out of child believer’s baptism, and many paedobaptist scholars argue for the legitimacy of the development of infant baptism after the NT era solely and adequately on the grounds of the practice of the church (e.g. N. P. Williams, The Ideas of the Fall and of Original Sin, London, 1929, pp. 550–554). According to *Tertullian, children were in ‘an age of innocency’ (On Baptism 18; cf. also Hermas, Sim. 9.29.1–3; Barn. 6), but the intimate association of baptism with original sin and guilt developed by *Cyprian (Ep. 64) was developed by *Augustine (e.g. Sermon 174) and became the almost universal practice till the Reformation.

In the third century, Cyprian rejected baptism administered by anyone outside the church, while Stephen I regarded the use of water and the trinitarian name as valid irrespective of the standing of the administrator. In the fourth century, the *Donatist controversy raised the issue again when they claimed that those who had compromised their faith during persecution, or were guilty of moral laxity, negated the efficacy of baptism. This position was countered by Augustine (Ep. 98), thereby establishing that baptism is effective ex opere operato.

Due to the frequency of persecution some were *martyred before receiving baptism, giving rise to the doctrine of the baptism of blood (e.g. Cyprian, Ep. 73.22).

Baptism in the medieval period

With the establishment of Christendom, paedobaptism soon became first the norm, then the only form of baptism. The once-lengthy catechumenate was reduced to the first part of the baptismal rite. In the missionary expansion following Constantine’s conversion, adult baptism continued as mission baptism, though within Christian Europe itself paedobaptism alone was practised. Anyone who reinstated believer’s baptism was condemned by the Justinian Code and treated as a heretic (e.g. the Paulicians). Mass conversions were marked by mass baptisms and necessary for salvation, unless there was the baptism of desire in those who died before they could be baptized. In the rite, the promise once made by the candidates was now made by godparents, and the faith necessary was that of the church. Paedobaptism cleansed from original sin, whilst *penance cleansed from actual sin.

The term ‘*sacrament’ first arose as the Latin translation of the NT ‘mystery’, and was widely used in the Fathers. However, it was not until the medieval period that its definition became more precise, definitively by Peter *Lombard (Four Books of the Sentences 4.1.4: ‘it is a sign of the grace of God and a form of invisible grace, so that it bears its image and exists as its cause'), who also established it among the seven sacraments of the Catholic Church (see *Roman Catholic theology). This medieval theology was defended against the sixteenth-century Reformations by the Council of Trent, which reasserted that infant baptism is effective ex opere operato and condemned its rejection.

Baptism in the sixteenth-century Reformations

The Reformers rejected the Catholic Church's seven sacraments in favour of the two of dominical origin, though their theologies of baptism differed as they related it to their new understandings of grace, faith, salvation and the church (see *Reformation theology).

For Martin *Luther, there is no sacrament without faith, but he justified the continuation of infant baptism – which, though lacking NT support, was validated by the ancient practice of the church – by positing infant faith. He also believed that baptism conveys God's promise of salvation.

For a while Huldrych Zwingli looked as though he would reject paedobaptism, but once some of his disciples became *Anabaptists (lit. re-baptizers), he backtracked, developing his argument for paedobaptism on the basis of the correspondence of the two covenants and their respective initiatory rites (circumcision and baptism), and that the faith of the parents and church sufficed for the efficacy of infant baptism. In this he was followed by the likes of Heinrich Bullinger and John Calvin, the latter of whom developed the link between baptism and the doctrine of predestination (see *Reformed theology). However, while Zwingli drove a wedge between spirit and matter, Calvin maintained the sacramental connection between the sign and the thing signified.

While the Church of England steered its via media between Catholicism and the continental Reformers, understanding paedobaptism as regenerative and bringing the elect into salvation, the *Puritans moved in a more Reformed direction, seeing baptism as the seal of the covenant and a badge identifying the baptized with the church.

The *radical Reformers, however, parted company with the Magisterial Reformers. The Anabaptists rejected paedobaptism for a restored believer's baptism, rejecting the argument from the covenants and circumcision, maintaining baptism followed repentance and faith, i.e. conversion (e.g. the *Schleitheim Confession, art. 1). While those like Melchior Hoffmann were prepared to accept the temporary suspension of baptism, some radicals, such as David Joris and Sebastian Franck, were spiritualists and dispensed altogether with outward rites. As to the mode, many adopted pouring, though others practised immersion.

Though many radicals suffered imprisonment, exile or martyrdom from both Catholics and Protestants, under such leaders as Menno Simons, Anabaptist communities survived, finding havens in Holland and Eastern Europe, where baptism symbolized personal conversion and discipleship, and entrance into a separatist fellowship of believers.

Baptism to the present day

There were few developments in baptismal theology or practice between the sixteenth and eighteenth centuries, but one of the most significant was the emergence of the *Baptist movement in the early seventeenth century. Its significance lies in its contemporary numbers worldwide and the fact that they represent the tip of a baptistic iceberg – a tradition that includes Disciples/Churches of Christ, many Pentecostals, charismatics, Restorationists and other independent evangelical churches.

In 1609 a group of English Separatist exiles baptized one another by affusion, and through their covenanting to 'walk together' the first Baptist church was founded, returning to London in 1612. The practice of immersion does not appear to have been adopted till around the 1630s.

Another important development is represented by the Society of Friends, whose rejection of the outward sacraments continues the separation of spirit and matter encountered at various stages in church history. *Quaker views probably influenced The *Salvation Army, who rejected the traditional rites as obstacles to true holiness, seeking instead the true baptism of the Spirit. However, they replaced them with quasi-sacraments, the dedication of children, the swearing-in of soldiers and the presenting of the flag. The separation of Spirit- from water-baptism also emerges with the rise of the *Pentecostal movement in the early twentieth century and later charismatic and Restorationist movements.

The modern systematic study of baptism was sparked by the work of Emil *Brunner, who coined the phrase ‘the divine–human encounter’ (The Divine–Human Encounter, ET, London, 1944), and Karl *Barth (The Teaching of the Church Regarding Baptism, London, 1948), though he later abandoned any notion of baptismal sacramentalism. While both dismantled the theological basis for paedobaptism, they nevertheless retained it. This revived interest tied in with the earlier work of the Faith and Order conferences which later produced Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry in 1982. BEM marked the change from earlier comparative studies to seeking theological convergence, proposing that different traditions accept infant and believer’s baptism as equivalent alternatives (common baptism or dual practice), and asserting that anything resembling re-baptism should be avoided.

Ecumenical discussions have continued to provide productive contexts for the study of baptism. Among many dialogues at national and international levels are those between the Anglican Communion and the Baptist World Alliance, and the BWA and the Roman Catholic Church, with the former suggesting recognition of different stories of initiation. Such discussions have built on the work on baptism within various traditions, perhaps the best known of which is the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults which arose out of Vatican II, which has inspired and informed the examination of baptism within the wider context of initiation.

Finally, baptism has not held a prominent place in *evangelical thought, either in its paedobaptist or credobaptist expressions. Many evangelicals hold a merely symbolic view of baptism (but see S. K. Fowler, More Than a Symbol, Milton Keynes, 2002), and this was fuelled by antipathy towards the reassertion of the ex opere operato doctrine propounded by the Oxford Movement (see *Anglo-Catholic theology) in the mid-nineteenth century. Under the influence of Enlightenment individualism and Gnosticism, evangelicals have often maintained a spirit-matter dualism and, despite Calvin’s influence on so much evangelical theology, evangelicals have adopted a more Zwinglian than Calvinist baptismal theology. However, through increasing ecumenical involvement, renewed biblical studies, rediscovery of the doctrine of the Spirit and growing openness to and awareness of the traditions of the church, an increasing number of evangelicals have argued for a renewed biblical and sacramental theology of baptism (both infant and believers’ baptists), recognizing the realism of the NT language of baptism and arguing for the renewal not just of baptismal theology but also baptismal practice.

Bibliography

R. Armour, Anabaptist Baptism (Scottsdale, 1966); J. E. Colwell, Promise and Presence (Milton Keynes, 2005); P. Cramer, Baptism and Change in the Early Middle Ages c. 200–c. 1150 (Cambridge, 1993); A. R. Cross, Recovering the Evangelical Sacrament (Eugene, 2013); Faith and Order, Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry (Geneva, 1982); J. D. C. Fisher, Christian Initiation: Baptism in the Medieval West (London, 1965); idem, Christian Initiation: The Reformation Period (London, 1970); P. J. Jagger, Christian Initiation 1552–1969 (London, 1970); M. E. Johnson, The Rites of Christian Initiation (Collegeville, 1999); K. McDonnell and G. T. Montague, Christian Initiation and Baptism in the Holy Spirit (Collegeville, ²1994); Murphy Center for Liturgical Research, Made, Not Born (Notre Dame, 1976); J. Pelikan, The Christian Tradition: A History of the Development of Doctrine, 5 vols. (Chicago and London, 1971–89); S. E. Porter and A. R. Cross (eds.), Baptism, the New Testament and the Church (Sheffield, 1999); idem, Dimensions of Baptism (Sheffield, 2002); J. W. Riggs, Baptism in the Reformed Tradition (Louisville, 2002); B. D. Spinks, Early and Medieval Rituals and Theologies of Baptism (Aldershot, 2006); idem, Reformation and Modern Rituals and Theologies of Baptism (Aldershot, 2006); E. C. Whitaker and M. E. Johnson, Documents of the Baptismal Liturgy (London, ³2003); D. F. Wright, Infant Baptism in Historical Perspective (Milton Keynes, 2007); D. F. Wright, What Has Infant Baptism Done to Baptism? (Milton Keynes, 2005); L. J. Vander Zee, Christ, Baptism and the Lord’s Supper (Downers Grove, 2004); E. Yarnold, The Awe-Inspiring Rites of Initiation (Edinburgh, ¹1994).

A. R. CROSS

BAPTISM IN THE SPIRIT

Three assertions generated this phrase: John the Baptist’s, that whereas he baptized with water, his successor would baptize in (en) the *Holy Spirit (Mark 1:8; cf. Matt. 3:11; Luke 3:16; John 1:33); Jesus’, that his disciples would soon be baptized in the Holy Spirit (Acts 1:5; cf. 11:16); and Paul's, that Christians have been baptized in one Spirit into one body (1 Cor. 12:13). The idea of Spirit-baptism became theologically and devotionally important when it was taken to signify a post-conversion blessing of life-transforming significance. This occurred occasionally in *Wesleyanism, widely in nineteenth-century evangelical *pietism, and universally in twentieth-century *Pentecostalism with its worldwide charismatic offshoots.

Biblical

In these three assertions, Spirit-baptism appears not as a technical term with normative force, but as a theological image denoting the spiritual reality that water-*baptism signifies: namely, unitive, regenerative, purificatory and purgative initiation into the death and risen life of the now glorified Lord Jesus Christ, the divine Saviour (see Rom. 6:1–11; Col. 2:11–14; 1 Pet. 3:21–22; *Salvation). Baptism as such is a symbolic washing, and the conceptual parallel is that both baptisms carry the thought of dirt being washed off the begrimed, thus fitting them for *fellowship with God, water-baptism signifying the inner cleansing that Spirit-baptism actually imparts. At and after Pentecost this Spirit-baptism was constantly accompanied by tongues and prophecy celebrating Christ (Acts 2:4; 10:44–47), and absence of this accompaniment among groups was thought anomalous (Acts 8:12–17; 19:1–6), though whether every single Christian received these charismata is not made clear. Though water-baptism and the gift of the Spirit were held to belong together as aspects of initiation into Christ (Acts 2:38; 10:47), they did not always go together in time (8:12–17).

Historical

In ancient and medieval theology, baptism in the Spirit was not a subject of focused discussion. Prevailing *sacramental realism assimilated Spirit-baptism into water-baptism and proclaimed baptismal regeneration. Later, Protestant pietism developed in various ways the idea that the apostolic experience of Acts 2 is a paradigmatic model and a personal necessity for all Christians, thus:

(1) John Fletcher (1729–85), Wesley's designated successor, and some later Reformed teachers also, spoke of repeatable baptisms in the Spirit, meaning intensifyings of *assurance and enhanced enablings for holy living and powerful witness.

(2) Charles *Finney, D. L. Moody (1837–99), R. A. Torrey (1856–1928), Andrew *Murray, A. B. Simpson (1844–1919) and others, echoing this, adjusted it in different ways to the *Wesleyan idea of a single 'second-blessing' experience that raises one's life to a permanently new level (see *Holiness movements).

(3) Pentecostals and *charismatics generally see Spirit-baptism in this essentially Wesleyan way, but broaden the concept, relating it to full reception, recognition and/or release of the Spirit within one, in assurance, emotional exuberance, glossolalia, uninhibited liberty in speaking for Christ, and the blossoming of all kinds of gifts of *ministry, including in some cases (so it is claimed) prophetic and healing gifts. Tongues are often made the touchstone of Spirit-baptism (see *Gifts of the Spirit).

Theological

Guidelines for theologizing baptism in the Holy Spirit would seem to include the following:

(1) Since, biblically, the concept is initiatory, it is not proper to view Spirit-baptism as essentially a post-conversion blessing, however much particular post-conversion experiences may match initiatory experiences recorded in Acts.

(2) Since the reason why the apostles had a two-stage Christian experience was that they became believers before the Spirit's full new-covenant ministry, which Jesus promised (John 14:16–17; 15:26; 16:7–15), actually began; and since they themselves expected others to enjoy that ministry from conversion on (Acts 2:38; 5:32; cf. 9:17–18), it is not proper to make the two-stage experience a universal norm.

(3) Since the characteristic core of all so-called Spirit-baptism experiences is the intensifying of assurance as the Spirit witnesses to God's saving love in our reconciliation and adoption, and to our security in that love, it is best to theologize these experiences in just those terms, as Paul does in Rom. 5:5; 8:15–17, 31–39 (cf. John 14:16–23).

(4) Since believers receive the Holy Spirit to indwell them simultaneously with, indeed as part of, their life-giving *union with Christ through *faith, it is not proper to construe any post-conversion experiences of and in the Spirit as receiving him, on the supposition he had not been within us before; and Luke's narrative reference to the Spirit falling on and being given to and received by the Samaritans should be understood simply of charismatic manifestations (Acts 8:14–17).

(5) Since deep experience of intensified assurance (the 'seal' or 'witness' of the Spirit, as the Puritans called it) is rare and desirable, it will be proper to ask God constantly to lead us into it, by whatever name we call it and in whatever theological frame we set it. All Christians always need to enter more deeply, through the communion and commitment that penitent faith in Christ brings, into the experienced reality of Christ's resurrection life, which is what the image of Spirit-baptism is ultimately about.

Bibliography

C. O. Brand (ed.), Perspectives on Spirit Baptism: Five Views (Nashville, 2004); F. D. Bruner, A Theology of the Holy Spirit (Grand Rapids, 1970); J. D. G. Dunn, Baptism in the Holy Spirit (London, 1970); K. McDonnell and G. T. Montague, Christian Initiation and Baptism in the Holy Spirit: Evidence from the First Eight Centuries (Collegeville, 1991); J. I. Packer, Keep in Step with the Spirit (Grand Rapids and Leicester UK, 2005); T. Smail, Reflected Glory (London, 1976); K. D. Yun, Baptism in the Holy Spirit: An Ecumenical Theology of Spirit Baptism (Lanham, 2003).

J. I. PACKER

BAPTIST THEOLOGY

Baptists share certain characteristics of belief and practice generally, despite variation across various Baptist bodies. First, Baptists have held that the church must be regenerated anew each generation, so insisting upon personal confession of Christ as Lord (see *conversion) and believers' *baptism upon this confession. Discipleship, understood as following Jesus, and concomitant growth in holiness have been likewise important convictions. They have in the third place shown a concern to ground faith and practice in scriptural teaching and patterns, a conviction that has led to elements of their diversity in the absence of a normative interpretive tradition. Finally, Baptists have valued freedom, as demonstrated by their congregational polity and historic commitment to religious freedom in the civil realm. One would be justified in saying freedom has been the core of Baptist theological identity.

As important as these broad commonalities are on a basic level, Baptists are at least as diverse as they are united. 'From their beginnings . . . Baptists have demonstrated beliefs and practices so diverse as to make it difficult to compile a consistent list of distinctives applicable to all segments of the movement at all times' (B. J. Leonard, Baptist Ways, Valley Forge, 2003, p. 1). Adequate grasp of Baptist theology must take account of this diversity. Baptists can point to no single founding figure or event emerging and growing strong in various milieus. This is but one of several factors that have produced great diversity among Baptists throughout the world. A comprehensive and universally acknowledged theological tradition is impossible. Thus, while various Baptist bodies have produced confessions and catechisms, there is no normative Baptist theology from which the challenges of particular settings may be addressed.

Because Baptists have no touchstone by which doctrine may be stated and judged even in dissent, history emerges as a crucial factor in their theological identity, both historically and currently. There are two principal consequences. First, Baptists have shown greater pliability of identity as they define themselves either within or against their social, political, intellectual and religious contexts. These contexts include most notably Calvinism, Arminianism, various millenarianisms, revivalism, Pietism, Tractarianism, liberalism, modernism and fundamentalism; but also Jeffersonian republicanism, Jacksonian anti-elitism, laissez-faire capitalism, Communism and consumerism. Second, arguments about Baptists' theological identity tend to be arguments about their *history. Mercer University historian Walter Shurden has observed, '[T]heological identity for [Baptists] is inevitably related to historical origins and subsequent history' ('The Baptist Identity and the Baptist Manifesto', PRS 25, 1998, p. 321). Ironically, while claims for Baptist theological identity purport to be the outworking of Baptist history, quite often one finds interpretations of Baptist history guided by uncritical theological presuppositions.

One may see both of these consequences in Baptist understanding of *freedom throughout their history. Baptists appeared in the English-speaking world first in the seventeenth century, emerging from *Puritanism. Their beliefs and practices evinced a passion for freedom, above all the freedom of God. Sharing the Reformed impulse against idolatry, they believed that God was to be free from all forms of human encroachment upon divine prerogative. On this basis, they rejected the union of church and state. In such union, the state arrogated to itself that which is God's due alone: to bring persons into the community of the redeemed. Likewise, on this basis they rejected infant baptism by both established and dissenting churches, which they saw as similar usurpation of divine right. Indeed, they refused all claims of ex opere operato sacramentalism and claims that any church and its rites are necessary for salvation. Yet they also affirmed that God is free to bring persons to salvation through the word and Holy Spirit, embodied in and mediated through the life of the community of faith. From this affirmation, they affirmed the ecumenical creeds, sacraments of baptism and the Lord's Supper, and the church where the word was truly preached and sacraments duly administered were all necessary to salvation. Human and divine freedom are incommensurate, and so human beings cannot cast aside that which God has ordained.

Particularly in the United States, following the Revolution and informed by the liberal democracy of the new republic, Baptists underwent a shift in thinking. Freedom was still crucial, but throughout the nineteenth century and beyond, human freedom was emphasized. They still rejected the church-state union and infant baptism, but on the basis of their infringement on free human conscience. More significantly, they rejected sacraments as such and creeds on the same basis, something earlier Baptists had explicitly warned against. Sharing in the American impulse against tradition's authority and resulting loss of historical awareness, Baptists came soon to project the pre-eminence of human freedom onto their forebears, claiming that Baptists had always held this view. The decisive expression of this came in 1908 when E. Y. Mullins declared that the historical significance of Baptists was their consistent championing of the competency of the soul in religion. This perspective has informed much Baptist theology through the twentieth century. It is unable, however, to offer a consistent interpretation of the earliest Baptists who affirmed certain ecclesial practices that more recent Baptists have rejected in the name of being Baptist. Yet because tradition is dismissed, heritage is more often invoked than interrogated.

The past two decades have seen the emergence of considerable vitality in Baptist theology. The past is being more carefully interrogated by a growing number of scholars, with the result of less parochial, more ecumenically engaged and aware, Baptist theologies. Signal among these efforts has been the three-volume theology of James Wm. McClendon, Jr, written from a more inclusive 'baptist' orientation. Also significant has been work by historians David Bebbington and Bill J. Leonard and theologians Stephen R. Holmes and Curtis W. Freeman; monographs in the Studies in Baptist History and Thought (SBHT) series by Paul S. Fiddes and Steven R. Harmon; the collected volumes Baptist Sacramentalism and Recycling the Past or Researching History? in SBHT; and Chris Ellis's Gathering, the first Baptist liturgical theology. Emerging as significant in recent years have been non-Anglo-American Baptists Puerto-Rican Orlando Costas, Latvian Valdis Teraudkalns, Estonian Tarmo Toom and Nigerian Osadolor Imasogie.

See also: CHURCH; CHURCH GOVERNMENT.

Bibliography

D. W. Bebbington, Baptists Through the Centuries (Waco, 2004); A. R. Cross and P. E. Thompson (eds.), Baptist Sacramentalism, SBHT 5 (Carlisle and Waynesboro, 2003); C. J. Ellis, Gathering: A Theology and Spirituality of Worship in the Free Church Tradition (London, 2004); P. S. Fiddes, Tracks and Traces: Baptist Identity in Church and Theology, SBHT 13 (Carlisle and Waynesboro, 2003); C. W. Freeman, Contesting Catholicity: Theology for Other Baptists (Waco, 2014); S. R. Harmon, Towards Baptist Catholicity: Essays on Tradition and the Baptist Vision, SBHT 27 (Carlisle and Waynesboro, 2006); B. A. Harvey, Can These Bones Live? A Catholic Baptist Engagement with Ecclesiology, Hermeneutics, and Social Theory (Grand Rapids, 2008); S. R. Holmes, Baptist Theology (London, 2012); W. L. Lumpkin and B. J. Leonard, Baptist Confessions of Faith, 2nd revd edn (Valley Forge, 1959, 2011); J. W. McClendon, Jr, Systematic Theology, 3 vols. (Waco, 2012).

P. E. THOMPSON

BARCLAY, ROBERT, see QUAKER THEOLOGY

BARCLAY, WILLIAM (1907–78)

A Scottish biblical scholar, Barclay was born in Wick, and educated at Glasgow and Marburg.

He ministered on industrial Clydeside before his appointment in 1947 as lecturer in New Testament (professor from 1964) at Glasgow University. He combined classical scholarship with an ability to communicate with all classes, whether in shipyard, lecture room, print, or through television. His Daily Study Bible (NT) series sold some 1.5 million copies, was translated into numerous languages including Burmese and Estonian, and brought him a further ministry through correspondence worldwide. Theologically, he called himself a ‘*liberal evangelical’. He claimed to be the only member of his divinity faculty who believed Matthew, Luke and John wrote the Gospels attributed to them. Nonetheless, he was a *universalist, reticent about the inspiration of *Scripture, critical of the doctrine of substitutionary *atonement, and given to views about the *virgin birth and *miracles which conservatives would find either heretical or imprecise. He once described *Bultmann as the most evangelical preacher he had ever heard, because all his writings aimed at confronting the individual with Christ. In the context of marked decline in Church of Scotland membership, he deplored the virtual disappearance of *church discipline and suggested a two-tier category of membership: those ‘deeply attracted to Jesus Christ’, and those prepared to make total commitment.

Bibliography

Selected works: Testament of Faith (London, 1975), also published as A Spiritual Autobiography (Grand Rapids, 1975).

Studies: R. D. Kernohan (ed.), William Barclay: The Plain Uncommon Man (London, 1980); J. Martin, William Barclay (Edinburgh, 1984); C. L. Rawlins, William Barclay: The Authorized Biography (London, 1998).

J. D. DOUGLAS

BARMEN DECLARATION

The Barmen Declaration (1934) comprised six articles issued by German Protestant representatives in opposition to the Nazi-supported ‘German-Christian’ movement. When it became increasingly clear that the latter was adding extreme nationalism and anti-Semitism to a theologically liberal stance, Martin Niemöller (1892–1984) and other pastors, including Dietrich *Bonhoeffer, organized the first synod of the *Confessing Church at Barmen in the Ruhr. German-Christians had gained ascendancy in some regional churches and probably intimidated others, but to Barmen came representatives from Lutheran, Reformed and United churches. The declaration did not purport to be a comprehensive statement, but against contemporary deviations it stressed the headship and finality of Christ, and the pre-eminence of Scripture for belief and as the guide to practical action for Christians. There was pointed repudiation of the German-Christian subordination of Christ’s church to the state. Written mainly by Karl *Barth, the Barmen Declaration was very much a document born out of political developments of the age, and pointed out the fatal fallacy of any compromise with National Socialism under Hitler.

Bibliography

Text in J. H. Leith, Creeds of the Churches (Richmond, ²1973) and, with discussion, in W. Niesel, Reformed Symbolics (Edinburgh and London, 1962).

J. D. DOUGLAS

BARTH, KARL (1886–1968)

Karl Barth was the most significant theologian of the twentieth century. His multi-volume Church Dogmatics (CD) constitutes the weightiest contribution to Protestant theology since *Schleiermacher.

Life

Born into a Swiss theological family, Barth studied in Berne, Berlin, Tübingen and Marburg under some of the leading teachers of the day, notably *Harnack and *Herrmann, and after a brief period working for the journal Die christliche Welt (The Christian World) and as an assistant pastor in Geneva, he became a village pastor at Safenwil in the Aargau (1911–21). Over the course of his ministry there Barth became increasingly dismayed with the resources of his *liberal theological education, and his gradual rediscovery of Scripture as revelation eventually led to his explosive commentary on Romans. From 1921 to 1930 he taught in Göttingen and Münster, played a leading role in the co-called ‘*dialectical theology’ movement, and published very widely, including an abortive prolegomena volume Christian Dogmatics. After moving to Bonn, Barth began the CD, and became increasingly involved in opposition to Hitler, giving substantial theological weight to the *Confessing Church, notably at the *Barmen Synod in 1934. This led to his dismissal, and appointment to a chair in his native Basel, where he remained for the rest of his career and retirement, and where the several volumes of the (finally unfinished) CD were written.

Decisive for an understanding of his earlier thought is his eventual rejection of the liberal heritage of his theological mentors. Along with his fellow-pastor, Eduard Thurneysen (1888–1974), Barth became increasingly dissatisfied with the historico-critical method as a way of handling Scripture. Combined with a reading of *Kierkegaard, *Nietzsche, *Dostoevsky and Franz Overbeck (1837–1905), Barth's rejection of liberal constructions of the Christian faith led to a renewed emphasis on the eschatological, supernatural element of Christianity. His refusal of any synthesis between the church and culture was given a further decisive twist under the influence of Christoph Blumhardt's (1842–1919) radical Christian socialism, and of thinkers such as Hermann Kütter (1863–1931) and Leonhard Ragaz (1868–1945). The fruits of these profound mutations in theological outlook are to be found in Barth's sermons and occasional writings during the First World War, but above all in The Epistle to the Romans.

Commentary on Romans

First published in 1919 and then completely rewritten for a second edition in 1922, the commentary is not so much an exegesis as a sustained and intense reflection on what Barth would later call 'the Godness of God'. Into the book Barth poured all his discontent with the synthesis of God and man which he found in the liberal religious ideal, and emphasized the radical disjunction between God and man in which God became man's interrogator, the one who initiates a crisis in the continuity of human history. Both the content and the style of the book are at times *apocalyptic, and it attracted heavy criticism from the academic establishment. Nevertheless, Barth, now a professor, continued his assault on the heartlands of liberalism. He followed his work on Romans with expositions of 1 Corinthians 15 (1924) and of Philipians (1927), and in a famous published debate with Harnack in 1923 criticized the historico-critical method (which for Harnack was the expression of disciplined inquiry into objective truth) for its failure to treat Scripture as a revelation which disturbs. An early collection of essays, The Word of God and the Word of Man, develops Barth's hostility to human *religion, and similarly his published lectures from the 1920s demonstrate how radical was his confrontation with what he understood as the theology of subjectivity, as in his Göttingen lectures on Schleiermacher (1923–4) and in the slightly later Münster lectures on ethics (1928–9).

Dogmatics

Towards the end of the 1920s Barth began serious work on dogmatics, and his Christian Dogmatics in Outline was published in 1927. Barth later came to see this volume as a halfway house between the writings of the earlier 1920s and the CD. Whilst more constructive than the earlier ground-clearing writings, it retained vestiges of liberal Protestant theological method, which Barth finally corrected only through intensive study of *Anselm. It was through his reading of Anselm, partly in debate with the philosopher Heinrich Scholz (1884–1956), that Barth left behind the 'dialectical theology' of his earlier period, and was able to expand a more solid basis for dogmatics than had been afforded either by the theologians of the religious consciousness or by his own eschatological and frequently aggressive rejection of their work. Barth's work on Anselm's theological procedure (which bore fruit as Fides Quaerens Intellectum [Faith Seeking Understanding] in 1931) enabled him to clarify the relationship between faith and rational inquiry (see *Faith and reason) in a more sophisticated way than the earlier debate with Harnack, and so furnished the methodological underpinnings for the CD. In particular, Barth came to envisage theology as an inquiry moulded by the object into which it inquires; the theologian's task is not to establish the object of inquiry (by, for example, naturally available 'proof' of God) but to be guided by the inherent rationality of the object itself. Theology presupposes an objective order of being, apprehended in the church's Credo, which alone provides the basis for rational discourse about God. Associated with this work on *theological method is Barth's polemical rejection of *natural theology in debate with an earlier fellow traveller, Emil *Brunner, and a series of expositions of creeds and Reformation confessions.

In Bonn and then in Basel, in the midst of a host of controversial political and theological concerns, Barth began work on the CD. Originally delivered as lectures and then revised for publication, the CD is, for all its inner consistency, the record of a process of growth and change over thirty years: Barth is not simply mapping out a system. Perhaps the most remarkable feature of the work is Barth's ceaseless capacity for astonishment: at one level, the CD is the record of Barth's captivation by the sheer weight, beauty and variety of Christian truth.

The heart of the enterprise, both methodologically and substantively, is *Christology. For Barth, Christology is not simply one doctrine alongside others, but the centre from which all other Christian doctrines radiate. Because of this, Barth's theological procedure takes a distinctive form: Christian doctrine is constructed by inference from the person of Jesus Christ, who is the locus of all truth about God and man. This leads not only to Barth's resolute *realism and his hostility to all abstract metaphysical or anthropological foundations for theology, but also to his distinctive handling of *analogy. In effect, Barth reverses the usual direction of analogy: instead of moving by analogy from the known realities of creation towards knowledge of the divine, Barth moves from God in Christ as the fundamental given towards affirmations concerning creation and humanity. It is the profundity of Barth's exploration of this theocentricity which makes the CD one of the most important pieces of Protestant theology.

The CD as it stands comprises four volumes, on the doctrine of the word of God, the doctrine of God, the doctrine of creation, and an unfinished volume on the doctrine of reconciliation. A fifth volume on the doctrine of redemption was projected but never begun before Barth's death. Each volume is subdivided into part-volumes, expounding and meditating on a series of theses, and includes a great wealth of detailed historical and exegetical discussion, as well as treatment of the ethical consequences of the main dogmatic discussion. Volume one weaves together the doctrines of *revelation and the Trinity, proposing that theology takes its rise from the self-positing of the divine subject. Revelation, as God's gracious self-repetition, creates the experience of faith in the church, and constitutes man as a recipient of God's word, which is God's self-disclosure. The theological task is that of the self-scrutiny of the church against its objective referent, from which theology receives its status as a science.

From the outset, Barth's consistent theological realism is evident: his starting point, quite different either from his liberal heritage or from his contemporary *existentialist peers, is the given actuality of the self-revealing God. This surfaces in volume two in the discussion of the *knowledge of God, the capacity for which resides not in man's readiness for God, but in God's readiness to share his own knowledge of himself with man: God's self-knowledge is graciously reduplicated in the receiver of revelation. Accordingly, Barth expounds a severely negative evaluation of natural theology and of what he understood to be traditional doctrines of analogy. The discussion of the being of God in volume two is one of the most important treatments of the theme since *Calvin. God's being is described as his being-in-act, that is to say, God is himself or becomes himself in the loving act of creating fellowship with man in Jesus Christ. In effect, Barth radically recasts the doctrine of God by making the person of Christ central for theology proper. God's absoluteness is therefore nothing other than his freedom for loving action. And similarly, the doctrine of election is a statement about God's choice to be himself in Jesus Christ, and so to choose humankind as his covenant partner, who is given the task of obedience to the divine command.

The reality of man as God's partner is treated at length in volume three. Barth refuses to handle the doctrine of *creation as a truth that is naturally available. Instead, he links creation to covenant: man's creatureliness derives from his adoption into the covenant of God with humankind made actual in Jesus Christ, who is both electing God and elected man. Thus history and human being as such are what they are because of God's own assumption of historical, creaturely existence in the incarnation. Barth expounds the theme in particularly significant discussions of human temporality and human sin, again rigorously deploying the method of analogy from Christology, which comes to assume an increasingly large role in the argument.

When Barth turns to Christology in volume four, his style and thinking become increasingly concrete. At the time when Barth was working on volume four, he published an important essay on 'The Humanity of God', in which he corrected some of his earlier 'dialectical' thinking, and focused with even greater concentration on the man *Jesus as the beginning and end of the ways of God with man. In this late stage of the growth of the CD, his writing becomes increasingly narrative in its handling of the Christological theme of abasement and exaltation. The ethical section of volume four, which was never finished (parts were published as a last fragment, CD IV.4, and parts as the posthumous The Christian Life), contains an increasingly realistic account of human ethical agency. This is expounded in Barth's handling of water-baptism, whose sacramental status Barth denies in order to affirm its proper character as a human act of obedient response. Volume four is the maturest expression of Barth's convictions about Jesus Christ the God-man, who furnishes a character-description of God and the origin of human participation in the covenant of God and creation. These writings also contain many suggestions for revision of aspects of his earlier theology, notably in their increasingly interactive account of the relationship of God and the natural order.

After retirement, Barth worked a little more on the CD, took a lively interest in the work of Vatican II, and published some smaller pieces, including his final lectures at Basel, Evangelical Theology. A full appraisal of his work would need to take note of his published sermons in Basel prison, Deliverance to the Captives and Call for God, his collections of essays such as Against the Stream and Theology and Church, and his reflections on past theologians and philosophers in Protestant Theology in the Nineteenth Century.

Interpretations

Barth's work substantially affected the course of Protestant theology in Europe and beyond; although Barth resisted pressure to become the centre of a school, his work has been interpreted and extended by many, notably H. Gollwitzer (1908–93), O. Weber (1902–66) and E. *Jüngel in Germany, and T. F. *Torrance in Britain. Critical appraisal of Barth often focuses on his account of the relation of God to his creation, asking whether his method and his fundamental theological convictions lead him into offering only an ambiguous affirmation of the value and reality of the natural order. In terms of his account of the knowledge of God, *Pannenberg, for example, argues that Barth's confidence in the self-evidence of the object of theology leads him into a *fideism which refuses to offer any sort of bridges between the knowledge of revelation and knowledge of the human world. Something of the same set of issues emerge in discussions of Barth's doctrine of man. Some critics suggest that by grounding the reality of man so completely in the humanity of God in Christ, Barth fails to give real weight to the natural order. Hence in his account of human freedom, sin and rejection of God, some find a lack of a real sense of man over against God. Or again, in the ethical sections of CD, particularly before volume four, he is interpreted as having so grounded man's agency in Christ that the impetus for human obedience is removed, and sanctification is not recognizable as a human process. Catholic theologians in particular sense an 'actualism' or 'occasionalism' in Barth's *anthropology, in that he does not appear to lay sufficient emphasis on the continuity of man as the recipient of divine grace. The effect of Barth's concentration on Christology upon his doctrine of the Trinity forms another area of discussion. By envisaging the Spirit as essentially the 'applicatory' or 'subjective' dimension of the work of Christ, Barth seems to lack a fully personalist account of the Spirit as a distinct divine agent. This is bound up with more general questions about the apparent 'modalism' (see *Monarchianism), in that his preference for the term 'mode of being' rather than 'person' suggests a high evaluation of the divine unity at the expense of a proper sense of plurality within God.

Many critiques of Barth are flawed by treating his theology too systematically, without sensing the checks and balances within the corpus of his work. Barth's great strength perhaps above all was his ability to keep starting again. The several changes of course within his work were far from fickle; much more were they part of his restless reappraisal of his own thinking, and they bear witness to his ruthlessly interrogative and constantly fresh engagement with the matter of theology. Barth never settled down, and his readings of Scripture as well as of classical theologians from the past – Calvin and Schleiermacher above all – were constantly submitted to reappraisal and critique. Barth's work is not simply a persuasive restatement of the main lines of the Christian faith; it also constitutes one of the major critical responses to the *Enlightenment, with a significant place in the intellectual history of Europe.

Bibliography

Works: Collected Works: Gesamtausgabe (Zurich, 1971–). Academic Writings: for a useful chronological bibliography see E. Busch, Karl Barth (London, 1976). Chief Works: The Christian Life (Edinburgh, 1981); CD, I:1–IV:4; Credo (London, 1936); Dogmatics in Outline (London, 1949); The Epistle to the Romans (Oxford, 1935); Ethics (Edinburgh, 1981); Evangelical Theology (London, 1963); Fides Quaerens Intellectum (London, 1960); The Göttingen Dogmatics, 2 vols. (Grand Rapids, 1990–93); The Humanity of God (London, 1961); The Knowledge of God and the Service of God (London, 1938); Prolegomena zur christlichen Dogmatik (Munich, 1928); Protestant Theology in the Nineteenth Century (London, 1972); The Resurrection of the Dead (London, 1933); Theology and Church (London, 1962); The Theology of Schleiermacher (Edinburgh, 1982); The Word of God and the Word of Man (London, 1928).

Studies: See bibliography in M. Kwiran, An Index of Literature on Barth, Bonhoeffer and Bultmann (Sonderheft to Theologische Zeitschrift, 1977). See especially: H. U. von Balthasar, The Theology of Karl Barth (New York, 1971); G. C. Berkouwer, The Triumph of Grace in the Theology of Karl Barth (London and Grand Rapids, 1956); G. W. Bromiley, An Introduction to the Theology of Karl Barth (Edinburgh, 1980); C. Brown, Karl Barth and the Christian Message (London, 1967); Sung Wook Chung, Karl Barth and Evangelical Theology (Milton Keynes/Grand Rapids, 2006); C. Gunton, Becoming and Being (Oxford, 1978); idem, The Barth Lectures (London, 2007); T. Hart, Regarding Karl Barth (Carlisle, 1999); E. Jüngel, Barth-Studien (Gütersloh, 1982); idem, The Doctrine of the Trinity (Edinburgh, 1976); idem, Karl Barth: A Theological Legacy (Edinburgh, 1987); H. Küng, Justification (London, 1964); B. L. McCormack, Karl Barth's Critically Realistic Dialectic Theology (Oxford, 1997); idem, Orthodox and Modern: Studies in the Theology of Karl Barth (Grand Rapids, 2008); K. Runia, Karl Barth's Doctrine of Holy Scripture (Grand Rapids, 1962); S. W. Sykes (ed.), Karl Barth (Oxford, 1979); J. Thompson, Christ in Perspective (Edinburgh, 1978); T. F. Torrance, Karl Barth (London, 1962); J. Webster, Barth (London/New York, 2000); J. Webster (ed.), The Cambridge Companion to Karl Barth

(Cambridge, 2000); R. E. Willis, The Ethics of Karl Barth (Leiden, 1971).

J. B. WEBSTER

BASIL OF CAESAREA (c. 329–379)

Basil of Caesarea, also called Basil the Great, was the leading figure of the group of three Cappadocian Fathers who championed Nicene orthodoxy against the *Arians in the later fourth century. *Gregory of Nazianzus, the second of the group, formed a close friendship with Basil while they were students in Athens. The third member of the group, Basil's younger brother, *Gregory of Nyssa, was educated at home. On returning to Cappadocia, Basil devoted himself to an *ascetic and devotional life and became a pioneer of coenobitic monasticism. He and Gregory of Nazianzus compiled an influential selection from the writings of *Origen, the Philocalia. Basil's intellectual and administrative gifts led to his election as metropolitan bishop of Caesarea, the Cappadocian capital, in 372. After the death of *Athanasius the following year, he was the chief pillar of orthodoxy in the East, defending the deity of the Son and Spirit against Arians and Pneumatomachi. He thus became the chief architect of the Cappadocian doctrine of the *Trinity, which became definitive for East and West. He was also a noted liturgist.

Basil's two most important works are Against Eunomius, a reply to extreme Arianism, and On the Holy Spirit. Eunomius argued that since only creatures were begotten, the Son, being begotten, could not be God. Basil denies that 'unbegottenness' is an adequate definition of the essence of God, and defends the doctrine (inherited from Origen and Athanasius) of the eternal generation of the Son (see *Christology). The generation of creatures is physical and temporal. The generation of the Son is ineffable and eternal.

Basil's second main treatise, On the Holy Spirit, written to defend the glorifying of the Spirit in his doxology, must be set against the emergence of the so-called Macedonians and Pneumatomachi, who denied the deity of the *Spirit. Basil clearly accepts the deity of the Spirit in his letters, but stops short in this treatise of declaring in so many words that the Spirit is God and consubstantial (homoousion) with the Father. This was politic, not giving his enemies an opportunity to dethrone him, and diplomatic. Without offending those hesitant to make an explicit confession of the Spirit's deity, he argued that the Spirit cannot be a creature (the only alternative to being creator) and is to be worshipped.

Here Basil makes his distinctive contribution to trinitarian doctrine. Athanasius and the older Nicenes had defended the deity of the Son by insisting that he was consubstantial (homoousios) with, of the same essence or *substance (ousia) as, the Father. Basil made a distinction between ousia and hypostasis* (which, confusingly, may also be literally translated as 'substance'), hitherto used interchangeably. He spoke of one ousia of God, but three hypostaseis, the hypostasis of the Father, the hypostasis of the Son, and the hypostasis of the Holy Spirit. This became the definitive doctrine of the Trinity in the East. Cappadocian doctrine greatly influenced the West through *Ambrose, although the West began from the oneness of God and spoke of three 'persons'.

Bibliography

Selected Works in ET in NPNF, 2nd series, vol. 8, and in FC series.

Studies: L. Ayers, Nicaea and Its Legacy (Oxford, 2004), pp. 187–221; P. J. Fedwick, The Church and the Charisma of Leadership in Basil of Caesarea (Toronto, 1979); idem (ed.), Basil of Caesarea: Christian, Humanist, Ascetic, 2 vols. (Toronto, 1981); J. N. D. Kelly, Early Christian Doctrines (London, 1977); G. L. Prestige, God in Patristic Thought (London, 1952); idem, St Basil the Great and Apollinaris of Laodicea (London, 1956); P. Rousseau, Basil of Caesarea (Berkeley, 1994); I. P. Sheldon-Williams in CHLGEMP, pp. 432–438; E. Venables in DCB 1, pp. 282–297.

T. A. NOBLE

BAUR, F. C., see TÜBINGEN SCHOOL

BAVINCK, HERMAN (1854–1921)

In 1882 Herman Bavinck was appointed professor of dogmatic theology in the Reformed Seminary at Kampen, Netherlands. In 1902 he took the same chair in the Free University, Amsterdam, as the successor to Dr Abraham *Kuyper who had become prime minister. Bavinck was an outstanding theologian, deeply rooted in the Reformed tradition. Although he had a thorough knowledge and deep appreciation of post-Calvinian theology, he preferred to go back to *Calvin himself. At the same time he wanted to develop *Reformed theology in constant interaction with the theological and philosophical thinking of his own day. His major work is his four-volume Reformed Dogmatics (Gereformeerde Dogmatiek, 1928–30). Characteristic of his method is his firm foundation in biblical theology, his thorough grasp of historical theology and his synthetic approach. He always tried to incorporate all elements of truth which he found in other theological systems. Within Reformed theology itself, he tried to bring various strands of thought together in a new synthesis (e.g. infra- and supralapsarianism – see *Predestination; creationism and traducianism – see *Soul, Origin of). In the Netherlands his Reformed Dogmatics is still regarded as a standard work.

Bibliography

Works in ET: The Philosophy of Revelation (Grand Rapids, 1953); The Doctrine of God, vol. 2 of Gereformeerde Dogmatiek (Grand Rapids, 1955); Our Reasonable Faith, a popularized version of Gereformeerde Dogmatiek (Grand Rapids, 1956).

Studies: E. P. Heideman, The Relation of Revelation and Reason in E. Brunner and H. Bavinck (Assert, 1959); C. Jaarsma, The Educational Philosophy of H. Bavinck (Grand Rapids, 1935); B. Kruithof, The Relation of Christianity and Culture in the Teaching of Herman Bavinck (Edinburgh, 1955); Scottish Bulletin of Evangelical Theology 29:1 (Bavinck Issue, Spring 2011).

K. RUNIA

BAVINCK, JOHAN HERMAN (1859–1964)

A nephew of Herman *Bavinck, Johan Bavinck studied theology in Amsterdam and Erlangen. His doctoral dissertation (1919) dealt with the medieval mystic Henry Suso (c. 1295–1366). He served as a minister in the Dutch East Indies and then in Holland at Heemstede, where he studied and wrote on psychology. On his return to the East Indies to Java, his knowledge of religious psychology and mysticism enabled him to communicate the gospel effectively to Javanese mystics. In 1934 he published a book on the confrontation between the gospel and Eastern *mysticism.

He spent over fifteen years as a missionary, including a few years teaching theology in Jokja, and in 1939 became the first professor of *missiology in the Kampen seminary of the Reformed Churches of the Netherlands, and also professor extraordinary of missiology at the Free University of Amsterdam. From 1955 he combined the latter position with the chair of homiletics, liturgy and pastoralia at the Free University.

Although very well-versed in mysticism, psychology and non-Christian religions, and hence sensitive to the demands of the missionary approach, Bavinck was an ardent opponent of *syncretism and compromise of the gospel. Salvation in Jesus Christ was quite different from the salvation offered by the (mystical) religions, he explained in a book on religious awareness and the Christian faith in 1949. His major work, translated as An Introduction to the Science of Missions (Philadelphia, 1960), emphasized both the missionary's call to share the life and culture of the community around him and the vast gap between the Christian faith and non-Christian religions. Superficial similarities when investigated become profound differences. One of his last books, on religions and worldviews in 1961, stressed the uniqueness of the gospel over against attempts to harmonize the world's religions into a common front.

See also: CHRISTIANITY AND OTHER RELIGIONS.

Bibliography

Works in ET: The Impact of Christianity on the Non-Christian World (Grand Rapids, 1948); The Riddle of Life (Grand Rapids, 1958); Faith and its Difficulties (Grand Rapids, 1959); The Church between Temple and Mosque (Grand Rapids, 1966).

Studies: J. du Preez, 'Johan Herman Bavinck on the Relation between Divine Revelation and the Religions', Missionalia 13, 1985, pp. 111–120; J. Verkuyl, Contemporary Missiology (Grand Rapids, 1978); P. J. Visser, Heart for the Gospel, Heart for the World: The Life and Thought of a Reformed Pioneer Missiologist, Johan Herman Bavinck (1895–1964) (Eugene, 2003).

BAXTER, RICHARD (1615–91)

Baxter was a leading *Puritan clergyman. In 1641–42 and 1647–61 (he was a parliamentary army chaplain, 1642–47) he exercised at Kidderminster, Worcestershire, the most fruitful Puritan pastorate anywhere recorded, converting almost the whole town. Under Cromwell's church settlement (establishing Independency) he formed the interdenominational Worcestershire Association of pastors, pledged to practise congregational evangelism by catechizing families and to maintain parochial *church discipline, with member ministers as the informal consistory court. At the Restoration, Baxter was offered the bishopric of Hereford, but declined it. At the 1661 Savoy Conference he pleaded fruitlessly for the non-prelatical, synodical form of episcopacy devised by his deceased friend Archbishop Ussher (1581–1656), and for a Puritan revision of the Prayer Book. After the 1662 ejections he lived in the London area, an acknowledged leader among the ejected, and wrote constantly, becoming the most voluminous of all British theologians.

His output included three folios. A Christian Directory (1673) summarizes in a million words all Puritan 'practical', 'experimental', '*casuistical' divinity (i.e. ethical and devotional teaching); Catholick Theology (1675), 'Plain, Pure, Peaceable: for the Pacification of the Dogmatical Word-Warriours', as the title proclaimed, embraces Calvinist, Arminian, Lutheran and Roman Catholic (Dominican and Jesuit) views about *grace in a tour de force of ecumenical accommodation; and Methodus Theologiae Christianae (1681) is a Ramist-style analysis of Christian truth in Latin, trichotomizing instead of dichotomizing as *Ramus and other Puritans did. Three more landmark books were The Saints' Everlasting Rest (1650), an 800-page classic that established Baxter as Puritanism's supreme devotional author; the passionate Reformed Pastor (1656; 'Reformed' means not just 'Calvinistic' but 'revived'), a volume which the Broad Church bishop Hensley Henson described in 1925 as 'the best manual of the clergyman's duty in the language'; and the electrifying Call to the Unconverted (1658), a pioneer evangelistic pocketbook that sold by tens of thousands. Also, Baxter's elaborate chronicle of his life and times, Reliquiae Baxterianae (1696), is a primary and trusted source for seventeenth-century church history.

J. A. E. VERMAAT

Miscalled a Presbyterian, Baxter was a reluctant nonconformist who favoured monarchy, national churches, liturgy and episcopacy, and could accept the unsympathetically revised 1662 Prayer Book. But the 1662 Act of Uniformity required renunciation on oath of Puritan ideals of reformation as a condition of incumbency in the restored Church of England, and Baxter balked at that.

Baxter's gospel presents Christ's death as an act of universal *redemption, penal and vicarious though not strictly substitutionary, in virtue of which God has made a new law offering amnesty to penitent breakers of the old law. As obedience to the new law, repentance and faith are one's personal saving righteousness, which effectual calling induces and preserving grace sustains. Called 'Neonomianism', this scheme is substantially *Amyraldian, with *Arminian 'new law' teaching added. Its obvious legalistic tendency, unrecognized by Baxter, was much criticized in his own day. Baxter also argued the reasonableness of Christianity on the basis of its coherence with *natural theology, a method that boomeranged by producing *unitarianism among his English Presbyterian followers after his death.

Bibliography

Works: Practical Works, ed. W. Orme, 23 vols. (London, 1830).

Studies: C. F. Allison, The Rise of Moralism (London, 1966); W. M. Lamont, Richard Baxter and the Millennium (London, 1979); Hugh Martin, Puritanism and Richard Baxter (London, 1946); G. F. Nuttall, Richard Baxter (London, 1965); F. J. Powicke, A Life of the Reverend Richard Baxter (London, 1924); idem, The Reverend Richard Baxter under the Cross (London, 1927).

J. I. PACKER

BECK, JOHANN TOBIAS (1804–78)

A German biblical theologian, Beck was a professor in Basel (1836–43) and Tübingen (1843–78). Often a lonely campaigner against rationalism and historical criticism, he was influenced by the *pietism of Württemberg, although he was occasionally at variance with individual pietists. While identified with 'biblicism', he cannot be squeezed into any particular mould. Among his pupils were C. A. Auberlen (1824–64) and Martin *Kähler.

A 'Society for the Promotion of Christian-theological Knowledge and Christian Life' took Beck to Basel to create a balance to the criticism of Wilhelm De Wette (1780–1849).

Beck demanded a 'pneumatic exegesis of Scripture'. Without faith it is impossible to arrive at 'an understanding with the spirit of Christianity'. The Bible is a unified system of teaching, 'the faithful image (Abbild) of the revelation of which it is the transmitted presentation'. We should be determined by neither the confessions of the church nor dogmatic pre-suppositions, but by Scripture alone.

The 'divine plan for the world' is expressed in the kingdom of God. The latter is already present but not yet visible. Only God can bring it to pass. Beck believed in the *millennial reign of Christ. Prophecy is a fundamental pillar of the Bible.

Beck presses for 'moral separation' from the world, 'personal appropriation' of the truth, and 'moral purification'. Here *sanctification lives on as the central concern of pietism.

Bibliography

Major work: Die Christliche Lehr-Wissenschaft nach den Biblischen Urkunden ('Christian Science of Education according to the Biblical Sources', Stuttgart, 1841); in ET only: Outlines of Biblical Psychology (Edinburgh, 1877); Outlines of Christian Doctrine (Madras, 1879); Pastoral Theology of the New Testament (Edinburgh, 1885).

Studies: K. Barth, Protestant Theology in the Nineteenth Century (London, 1972), ch. 25; German life in B. Riegenbach, Johann Tobias Beck (Basel, 1888); H. M. Wolf in TRE 5, pp. 393–394.

G. MAIER

BEING

Being, or *ontology (what there is), is a very difficult term to pin down, and different thinkers have meant quite different things by it. Rather than give a survey of different ways in which this term has been used in the philosophical literature, fascinating though that is, what follows is restricted to consideration of several important ways in which this notion has been discussed by theologians, or by those with a theological context in mind. Of particular interest here is what is meant by the use of the term 'being' with respect to God, and with respect to creatures.

In contemporary philosophical theology, *God is often spoken of as a being. This idea has its roots in classical theology, particularly the work of St *Anselm of Canterbury, from whom many contemporary ‘perfect-being theologians’ take their cue. According to modern Anselmians, God is an entity in the class ‘divine’, which necessarily has just one instance. He fulfils all the requirements for belonging to such a class (having all great-making properties that are compossible), and is, therefore, God. Much here depends on intuitions about what counts as a great-making property, which is both the strength and Achilles’ heel of this way of conceiving the divine being. But, that aside, some think it rather odd to place God in a class of entities called ‘divine’. Surely God is sui generis and belongs to no class of entity whatsoever. Certain medieval theologians thought like this, and came up with a concept of God according to which he is a being like no other: he is, in fact, pure act (actus purus). This view of God, which owes much to *Pseudo-Dionysius and *Thomas Aquinas, states that God is without any passivity, or unrealized possibility, because he is without parts. He is a simple, single, timeless act, which has numerous temporal effects in the world. Not only is this classical conception of the divine nature difficult to get one’s mind around, it also has the consequence that there is no distinction to be made between God’s essence (his ‘being’) and existence, as there is in all other created entities. If this is true, then God is not at all like the sort of created beings we are used to encountering, if he is a being at all (in anything more than an analogous sense of the word ‘being’).

Nicholas Wolterstorff has very helpfully distinguished the medieval ontology (doctrine of being) from more modern conceptions. He says medieval ontology was a ‘constituent’ ontology, according to which objects are composed of various parts (God excepted), which constitute a concrete particular, or given object. A fundamental object in this ontology is a suppositum. Yet in the incarnation, we have one entity – the second person of the *Trinity – that assumes a human nature that is not a suppositum independent of the Word. Unlike other human beings who are also human persons (you and I included), the relevant ‘suppositum’ in the case of the incarnation is the Son of God. He is a divine person with a human nature. So this medieval ontology, with its careful metaphysical distinctions about ‘being’ had at least one important theological application. But many contemporary metaphysicians speak instead of what Wolterstorff calls a ‘relational’ ontology whereby entities exemplify properties in relation to other things (e.g. ‘being discussed by Crisp’, where the referent is Wolterstorff). This also has theological application, but application of a different sort. To return to the example of the *incarnation, in becoming incarnate, God the Son takes upon himself the property of human nature, just as all other humans have the property of human nature. In this respect, *Christ has a relation to all other human beings in virtue of sharing with them the property of human nature.

Modern theologians have thought of the being of God in different ways. *Process theologians, influenced by the work of the Cambridge mathematician-turned-metaphysician, Alfred North Whitehead, think of all reality as composed of events, and construe the divine nature in very untraditional ways as a limited being with the world as his body (*panentheism). But this view is no longer as popular as it once was. Others, like Paul *Tillich, have claimed that God is so exalted that he is beyond being, as such. The idea motivating much of Tillich’s concern seems to be that to number God amongst other (created) beings, as one amongst many – even one exalted being amongst many – is to diminish God in some fashion. He is above and beyond our petty conceptualizations of him. But not only that, it turns out on Tillich’s theology that God is literally not a being at all. He is supra-being, rather as, in *Kant’s transcendental *idealism, the Noumenal is a realm beyond our comprehension or access. This realm exists (just as for Tillich, God ‘exists’, at least in some attenuated sense of that term), but is forever beyond our grasp.

The British philosophical theologian John *Hick has taken Kantian thought in another direction. He thinks of the Real – the being the *theistic faiths understand as ‘God’ – as the Kantian noumenal reality. The Real is not a being either, according to Hick, if we mean by that an entity like other entities in some way. For Hick’s Real is beyond all conceptualization of it/her/him. We cannot predicate personal or impersonal pronouns of it/her/him because none have purchase in this exalted ‘thing’ that (somehow) reveals it-/her-/himself to us, or, perhaps, is gropingly conceptualized by us in our partial, incomplete religious traditions. All salvific religions on Hick's way of thinking are strictly speaking false, but approximate attempts at a phenomenological account of that which is noumenal, and therefore beyond our understanding.

Tillich's concept of God (if it is a concept of God) has not found many adherents. Hick's account of the Real has been much discussed of late, but few are willing to follow his lead. It seems that most Christian theologians want to hold on to the notion of 'being' when applied to God, even if it is an analogous notion of being, rather than one which has a univocal, or one-to-one correspondence with other, created beings. But even if that is the case, the being of God is surely very different from my being. Here we may touch upon the matter of divine necessity. Created beings are said to be contingent in some way – you or I might not have existed, and may cease to exist, if God does not conserve us in being. But the same cannot be said of God. Anselmians argue that the relevant difference here has to do with the fact that God is a necessary being, whereas creatures are not. God cannot not exist, we can not exist, and might not have existed had circumstances been different. But there are no circumstances, no states of affairs and no possible worlds in which God does not exist.

According to one much discussed argument in defence of something like this Anselmian claim, Alvin *Plantinga reasons that God possesses maximal greatness (entailing the possession of maximal excellence, that is, possession of all compossible great-making properties). He then reasons that if God possibly exists (if there is one possible world in which a divine being possessing maximal greatness exists), he necessarily exists. His argument for this conclusion relies on the S5 system of modal logic, and, in particular, the axiom 'if possibly P, then necessarily possibly P' ($\Diamond P \rightarrow \Box \Diamond P$). Perhaps unsurprisingly, not everyone has been convinced by Plantinga's reasoning, and there have been other attempts to make sense of divine necessity that do not rely upon the semantics of possible worlds (even another such attempt by Plantinga himself). But such thinking has opened up important new avenues for discussion of the necessity of God.

Finally, there are rich theological resources for speaking of the being of creatures. One issue here has to do with what human persons are composed of, and there is a considerable literature devoted to questions of whether or not humans are made up of bodies and *souls, or are some sort of purely material being – this latter being a modern development for which there is no real orthodox precedent in the tradition. Most contemporary philosophers of mind scoff at the notion of humans possessing souls, although argument against such substance dualism is rather thin. Amongst contemporary Christian thinkers several have been at pains to explain how it might be that humans are ensouled creatures, while an increasing number of Christian thinkers believe that, on biblical and philosophical grounds, humans are purely physical animals, or that human personhood supervenes on a certain sort of material composition (i.e. a body).

Thomas Aquinas and Karl *Barth both spend considerable time parsing out the difference between angelic and non-angelic creaturely existence, on the roles angelic beings play in the divine economy, and the relation between such exalted entities and other created beings. Strange to say, few contemporary theologians have made much of this work, although there have been one or two theologians willing to speculate about the being of ghosts. This is theologically interesting, because ghosts seem to be immaterial entities like souls (*angels are, one might think, souls of a particular kind), and yet are often reported as manifesting themselves visibly. There are, of course, many biblical references to the physical manifestations of spiritual beings (e.g. Gen. 19; 32; Josh. 5:13–15; Judg. 13; Luke 2, and so on). Are such entities capable of temporarily manifesting themselves via some sort of 'exotic matter', as has been recently suggested by philosophers Hoffman and Rosenkranz? It is difficult to say. Here we are at the outer limits of theological speculation concerning different orders of created beings, and perhaps, with the Deuteronomist, we must simply confess 'the secret things belong to the LORD our God' (Deut. 29:29).

Bibliography

K. Barth, CD, esp. CD III/1; Dionysius the Areopagite, 'The Complete Works', in C. Luibheid (ed.), Classics of Western Spirituality (New York, 1988); J. B. Green and S. L. Palmer, In Search of The Soul: Four Views on the Mind-Body Problem (Downers Grove, 2006); J. Hick, An Interpretation of Religion (London, 1989); M. Higton and S. Holmes, 'Meeting Scotus: On Scholasticism and Its Ghosts', in IJST 4 (2002), pp. 67–81; J. Hoffman and G. S. Rosenkrantz, The Divine Attributes (Oxford, 2002); A. Plantinga, The Nature of Necessity (Oxford, 1974); Thomas Aquinas, Summa Contra Gentiles, Books I & II, tr. A. C. Pegis and J. F. Anderson (Notre Dame, 1975 [1956]); P. Tillich, Systematic Theology, vol. 1 (Chicago, 1965); N. Wolterstorff, 'Divine Simplicity', in J. E. Tomberlin (ed.), Philosophical Perspectives 5: Philosophy of Religion (Atascadero, 1991), pp. 531–552.

O. D. CRISP

BELGIC CONFESSION, see CONFESSIONS OF FAITH

BELLARMINE, ROBERT (1542–1621)

Roberto Francesco Romolo Bellarmino was born at Monte Pulciano, in Tuscany. His mother was the sister of the future pope, Marcellus II. In 1560 he joined the *Jesuits and in 1569 was sent to Louvain, to help in the struggle against a militant Protestantism. The following year he became the first Jesuit professor of theology at Louvain University. He served there for six years before returning to Rome to become professor of controversial theology at the Collegium Romanum. From 1576 to 1588 he taught English and German missionary students at Rome. He went on to become spiritual director (1588), then rector (1592), of the college, provincial of the Jesuits' Neapolitan province (1594) and theologian to Pope Clement VIII (1597). In 1599 he was appointed a cardinal. He served for a time as Archbishop of Capua (1602–5), but was recalled to Rome for a wider ministry.

Bellarmino devoted himself to the controversy with *Protestantism. He never met Protestant leaders personally, but took care to represent their positions fairly. He was prepared to acknowledge strengths as well as weaknesses in their theology. His aim was to answer Protestantism by reasoned argument, rather than abuse or naked appeal to authority. He devoted himself to the study of the Bible, the Fathers and church history, to equip himself for his task. He was a formidable opponent, and chairs of theology were founded in some Protestant universities for the purpose of refuting him. His lectures at the Collegium Romanum formed the basis of his greatest work, a three-volume Disputations on Controversies about the Christian Faith against the Heretics of this Time (1586–93). This was generally reckoned to be one of the best statements of Tridentine Roman Catholic theology.

Bellarmino became embroiled in some of the controversies of his time. His views of the *papacy caused him trouble. He took the papal side in a controversy with Venice over clerical immunities (1606–7). But in 1610, in refuting a work by W. Barclay of Aberdeen (1546–1608), which denied that the pope had any temporal (as opposed to spiritual) authority, Bellarmino denied that the pope has any direct temporal authority. Rulers receive their authority from God. The pope has only an indirect temporal jurisdiction. If a ruler prejudices the eternal salvation of his subjects, the pope may intervene, even to the extent of deposing the ruler and releasing his subjects from their obligation to obey him. This might appear to grant the pope considerable power, but it was not good enough for Pope Sixtus V. In 1590 he put the first volume of Bellarmino's Controversies (where the pope's direct temporal power is denied) on the Index of Forbidden Books.

Bellarmino was also involved in the early stages of the affair of Galileo, who was condemned for teaching that the earth rotates about the sun. The Inquisition declared in 1616 that it is the earth, not the sun, that is at the centre of the universe and that the sun moves round the earth. Bellarmino was entrusted with the task of communicating this to Galileo.

Bellarmino was also active in other ways. He was a member of the commission that produced the revised 'Sixto-Clementine' edition of the Vulgate in 1592. He wrote a Hebrew grammar and, late in life, a number of ascetic works. Soon after his death there were moves towards his canonization, but this was delayed until 1930, because of his views on papal authority.

See also: REFORMATION, CATHOLIC COUNTER-; ROMAN CATHOLIC THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

Works: Collected editions published in Cologne (1617–21), Naples (1856–62), Paris (1870–74).

Studies: R. J. Blackwell, Galileo, Bellarmine, and the Bible (Notre Dame, IN, 1991); J. Brodrick, The Life and Work of Blessed Robert Francis Cardinal Bellarmine, S. J.

1542–1621, 2 vols. (London, New York and Toronto, 1950 [1928]).

A. N. S. LANE

BENEDICT AND THE BENEDICTINE TRADITION

The pattern of monastic life set down by Benedict of Nursia (c. 480–c. 550) in the Rule for his community at Monte Cassino became in time the norm throughout Western monasticism, especially from c. 800. Monastic reforms regularly centred on a return to strict observance of the Rule, as in the widely influential Cluniac movement of the tenth to twelfth centuries. In the same era other orders, notably the Carthusians and the Cistercians, based themselves on Benedict's Rule while demanding a discipline of greater austerity. The Rule was therefore a text of extraordinary importance throughout the 'monastic centuries' of European Christianity (see *Monastic theology).

Benedict made no provision for scholarly study as such. According to *Gregory the Great, he turned his back on higher education, taking up the ascetic life 'knowingly ignorant and wisely untaught' (scienter nescius et sapienter indoctus). Nevertheless, he was well-read in the great Latin Fathers, and his monks spent up to four hours a day in lectio divina, the contemplative spiritual reading of the Scriptures and the Fathers, especially monastic writers like *Basil and John Cassian (c. 360–435). The school (to teach youngsters vowed to the monastic life), the library and the scriptorium (where manuscripts were copied) became standard features of a Benedictine community. There developed a distinctive monastic culture, with its own style of theology, which has been brilliantly analysed by an eminent modern Cistercian scholar, Jean Leclercq (1911–93), of the abbey of Clervaux in Luxemburg.

The theology of the Rule itself is unremarkable, except in its sensitive ordering of the *ascetic life in community. Benedictine theology stood in deliberate continuity with *patristic theology, and derived both its literary forms and its content very largely from the Fathers. (The Latin classics, which were taught in the monastic schools in accordance with the educational programme of the Institutions of Cassiodorus (c. 485–c. 580), also provided some genres.) It was therefore orientated towards tradition. Taking the auctoritas of the Bible and the Fathers as its basis represented, in theology, the humility so strongly inculcated by the Rule. As one writer put it, they merely gleaned after the great reapers – *Augustine, *Jerome, Gregory the Great – had done their work. They approached the Bible in a spirit of meditation, and frequently interpreted it allegorically (see *Hermeneutics).

Not surprisingly, little creative originality is evident in the luminaries of the early Middle Ages, such as Bede (c. 673–735), who was first and foremost a biblical scholar, heavily dependent on the Fathers in his commentaries and homilies. Benedictines were prominent in the Carolingian renaissance, but in theology their contribution lay chiefly in harvesting the biblical and doctrinal wisdom of the Fathers, and applying it to contemporary needs. Writers like Alcuin from York (c. 735–804), Rhabanus Maurus of Fulda (c. 776–856) and Walafrid Strabo of Reichenau (c. 808–49) were enormously prolific, while others, like *Paschasius Radbertus and *Ratramnus, both monks at Corbie, engaged in controversies on the Eucharist and predestination that hinged on the true interpretation of the Fathers.

Theology in the Benedictine tradition came to full flower in the eleventh and twelfth centuries, supremely in *Bernard of Clairvaux. Controversy with emergent scholasticism depicted its distinctiveness in sharper colours. Theology for monks was determined by the goal of monastic life – the knowledge of God – and studied in relation to monastic experience, whose heart lay in worship and prayer. It preserved a respect for mystery, and distrusted too heavy an emphasis on the technique of dialectic.

At the same time, monastic-trained theologians like *Anselm, William of St Thierry (c. 1085–c. 1148) and Ailred of Rievaulx (1109–67), 'the English Bernard', fruitfully combined an ascetic orientation with more speculative methods. Anselm's disciple, Eadmer of Canterbury (c. 1055–1124), was a pioneer expositor of *Mary's immaculate conception, and other important teachers were the reformer Peter Damian (1007–72), Peter the Venerable (c. 1092–1156), abbot of Cluny, and Rupert (c. 1070–1129), abbot of Deutz near Cologne.

In the later Middle Ages, the monasteries lost their pre-eminence as centres of Christian theological reflection. The emergence of the universities, the predominance of *scholasticism, the success of new movements such as the *Franciscans and the *Dominicans and the appeal of *humanism all eclipsed the Benedictine tradition of theology. Later the Reformation and subsequent political upheavals drastically reduced the number of communities following the Rule.

For a century before the French Revolution, the houses of the congregation of St Maur (near Cluny), especially St Germain-des-Prés at Paris, accomplished monumental feats of scholarship, including a superb edition of Augustine (with a marvellous index) which exposed them to charges of *Jansenism. Jean Mabillon (1632–1707) edited Bernard's works, and Bernard de Montfaucon (1655–1741) those of *Athanasius and *Chrysostom. Not all churchmen approved of such wholehearted dedication to learning on the part of monks.

With the resurgence of Benedictine life in the nineteenth century, the Maurists' tradition of theological scholarship has also been revived. Important abbeys are found in Belgium at Maredsous (home of the Revue bénédictine) and Steenbrugge (where the Corpus Christianorum collections of the Fathers and the mediaevals are edited), in Germany at Beuron and Maria Laach and in France at Solesmes. These last three have devoted themselves to the study and renewal of the liturgy, the core of Benedictine Christianity, which is called in the Rule 'the work of God' (opus Dei).

Bibliography

P. Barry, St. Benedict and Christianity in England (Leominster, 1995); C. Butler, Benedictine Monachism (London, 2nd 1924); L. J. Daly, Benedictine Monasticism (New York, 1965); D. H. Farmer (ed.), Benedict's Disciples (Leominster, 1980); A. Grün, OSB, Benedict of Nursia: His Message for Today (Collegeville, MN, 2006); D. Knowles, The Benedictines (London, 1929); J. Leclercq, The Love of Learning and the Desire for God (New York, 1961); C. Stewart, OSB, Prayer and Community: The Benedictine Tradition (Maryknoll, 1998).

D. F. WRIGHT

BENDEL, JOHANN ALBRECHT (1687–1752)

Bengel was a German Lutheran, distinguished as a NT scholar. He was a pioneer of modern textual criticism, who produced an edition of the Gk NT (1734) and formulated the canon

'The more difficult reading is to be preferred.' He is chiefly remembered for his Gnomon Novi Testamenti (1742), a delightful, sharply focused contextual commentary. John *Wesley wrote, 'I know of no commentator on the Bible to equal Bengel', and he abridged the Gnomon (which here means something like 'pointer to') as the basis of his Explanatory Notes upon the New Testament. The Gnomon has been translated into English more than once (by A. R. Fausset, 5 vols., Edinburgh, 1857–58; C. T. Lewis and M. R. Vincent, 2 vols., Philadelphia, 1860–62), and it is still being reprinted.

Bengel was a Württemberg *pietist, 'who in his biblicism approximated to the attitude of orthodoxy and in his moralism to that of the Christian Enlightenment' (Barth). An heir of Johannes *Cocceius (see *Covenant) as well as an opponent of the 'neology' of the *Enlightenment, he also espoused a prophetic chiliasm (see *Millennium) in an exposition of the Apocalypse (partial ET, London, 1757) and some chronological works which fixed the start of the millennium in 1836.

Bibliography

M. Brecht in TRE 5, pp. 583–589 (with bibliography); J. C. F. Burk, A Memoir of the Life and Writings of John Albert Bengel (London, 1837); C. J. Weborg, 'Bengel, J(ohann) A(lbrecht)' in D. K. McKim, Dictionary of Major Biblical Interpreters, 2nd edn (Downers Grove, 2007).

D. G. DEBOYS

BERDYAEV, see RUSSION ORTHODOX THEOLOGY

BERENGAR (c. 999–1088)

Berengar was the last important opponent of transubstantiation before *Wyclif. He was rector of the schools of St Martin at Tours and archdeacon of Angers. In 1049 he addressed a letter to Lanfranc (c. 1005–89), then prior of Bec, and a firm upholder of the *eucharistic teaching of *Paschasius Radbertus, in which he declared himself a disciple of John Scotus *Eriugena (to whom he may also have attributed the treatise of Ratramnus) and an opponent of Paschasius. As a result of these opinions, and his persistence in them, he was condemned at a series of synods and for a time excommunicated. He was also forced to make several recantations, including the notorious 'Ego Berengarius . . .' (1059), stating that the body and blood of Christ are 'perceptibly, and not only symbolically but truly, touched and broken by the hands of the priests and ground by the teeth of the faithful'. His chief work, De Sacra Coena (On the Holy Supper), written in reply to a treatise of Lanfranc about 1068–70, was lost until 1770. The positive teaching it gives is a form of *symbolism, though Berengar devotes much of the work to vindicating his own conduct and advancing logical objections to transubstantiation.

Bibliography

Critical edition of De Sacra Coena in W. H. Deekenkamp (ed.), Kerkhistorische Studien 2 (The Hague, 1941); N. Dimock, The 'Ego Berengarius' (London, 1895); A. J. Macdonald, Berengar and the Reform of Sacramental Doctrine (London, 1930); G. Macy, The Theologies of the Eucharist in the Early Scholastic Period (Oxford, 1984); C. M. Radding and F. Newton, Theology, Rhetoric and Politics in the Eucharistic Controversy, 1078–1079 (New York, 2003).

R. T. BECKWITH

BERKELEY, GEORGE (1685–1753)

Berkeley was an Irish philosopher and *apologist. Born in Kilkenny and educated at Trinity College, Dublin, he was ordained in the Anglican Church in 1707, and from 1728 to 1731 was engaged in efforts to found a college in Bermuda for missionary work. From 1734 to his death he was Bishop of Cloyne.

Although his writings on the philosophy of science are also of interest, Berkeley is best known for the 'immaterialism' developed in his Principles of Human Knowledge and Three Dialogues between Hylas and Philonous. The colours, sounds and sensations ('ideas' in Berkeley's terminology) of which we are directly aware – these are real enough; so are the minds which perceive them. But there is no need to suppose any inert 'material substance' underlying ideas in some indefinable way yet unknowable except through them; indeed, such a concept is meaningless. Physical objects consist of 'ideas', and their esse is percipi, their existence consists in being perceived; a wholly unperceived object is impossible. Since, however, no-one doubts that objects exist when we ourselves do not perceive them, there must be another mind which is always aware of them all: the infinite mind of God. Furthermore, since 'ideas' do not cause one another, and there is no 'material substance' to cause them, their sources must be minds or spirits. (Scientific laws express patterns of events among things, but do not explain their existence.) We ourselves cause some 'ideas', those of memory and imagination, but most have to be ascribed to another spirit – God.

In Alciphron, his only purely apologetic work, Berkeley added a further argument, not dependent on immaterialism, to the traditional argument from design (see *Natural theology). The best indication of personhood is language, that is, signs used to convey meaning but having no intrinsic connection with the thing signified. And this is precisely the relationship our visual experiences have to the things they inform us about: thus, small size and faintness indicate distance, although they neither entail nor resemble it. Visual impressions are thus analogous to human language, 'the universal language of the Author of nature', whereby he instructs and guides us, and proof of his reality and personhood.

Berkeley was a philosopher and apologist, not a theologian, and somewhat doubtful of the value of theology. 'The Christian religion', he said in a sermon, 'was calculated for the Bulk of Mankind, and therefore cannot consist in subtle and nice Notions.' Its mysteries were to be accepted in humility and faith, not measured by reason. But reason could defend them against *atheist or *deist critics, show the reasonableness of religion generally, and support the idea of revelation.

Bibliography

Works: ed. by A. A. Luce and T. E. Jessup, 7 vols. (London, 1948–56); selections in Principles of Human Knowledge (London, 1962) and Philosophical Works (London, 1910).

Studies: S. H. Daniel (ed.), Re-examining Berkeley's Philosophy (Toronto, 2007); idem (ed.), New Interpretations of Berkeley's Thought (Amherst, 2008); G. Dicker, Berkeley's Idealism: A Critical Examination (Cambridge, 2011); A. A. Luce, Life of George Berkeley (London, 1949); E. A. Sillem, George Berkeley and the Proofs for the Existence of God (London, 1957); G. Warnock, Berkeley (Harmondsworth, 1953); K. P.

Winkler, The Cambridge Companion to Berkeley (Cambridge, 2005).

R. L. STURCH

BERKHOF, HENDRIKUS (1914–95)

Hendrikus Berkhof was Professor of Systematic Theology at the University of Leiden, and one of the most significant *Reformed dogmaticians of the twentieth century. His work combines a thorough familiarity with, and appreciation of, the traditions of classical Reformed *dogmatics with a sensitivity towards developments in contemporary theology and philosophy. His main work, Christian Faith, was one of the most persuasive attempts to write a *systematic theology in the later twentieth century, not least because of its lively use of biblical criticism, and because of its sympathetic but not uncritical relationship to classical orthodoxy. Berkhof also wrote on the theology of history in Christ the Meaning of History, which contains valuable discussions of *existentialist and *salvation-history treatments of the theme. His work on The Doctrine of the Holy Spirit is one of the best surveys of the territory by a recent Protestant theologian. Berkhof was also much involved in ecumenical affairs.

Bibliography

Works: in ET Christ and the Powers (London, 1962); Christ the Meaning of History (London, 1966); Christian Faith: An Introduction to the Study of the Faith (Grand Rapids, 2nd 1986 [1979]); The Doctrine of the Holy Spirit (London, 1964); Well-founded Hope (London, 1969); Introduction to the Study of Dogmatics (Grand Rapids, 1985); Two Hundred Years of Theology: Report of a Personal Journey (Grand Rapids, 1989).

Studies: E. P. Meijering, Hendrikus Berkhof: Een Theologische Biografie (Kampen, 1997).

J. B. WEBSTER

BERKHOF, LOUIS (1873–1957)

*Reformed theologian, influential chiefly through the use in seminaries, colleges and churches of his frequently reprinted Systematic Theology (1941, first published in 1932 under the title Reformed Dogmatics).

Born in the Netherlands, Berkhof went to the USA in 1882. He graduated from the Christian Reformed Church's Calvin College and Seminary before taking further studies at Princeton Seminary (1902–4) under B. B. *Warfield and G. *Vos. From 1906–44 he served in various capacities at Calvin Seminary, including that of president from 1931.

Berkhof was heavily dependent on the *Dutch Reformed tradition (and especially H. *Bavinck). The strength of his magnum opus lay in its presentation of that tradition in English dress and in a clear textbook format with updated discussions (e.g. of the earlier *Barth) rather than in any theological creativity.

Less well known is his earlier work which displayed considerable interest in the development of a coherent Reformed world-and-life-view (e.g. The Church and Social Problems, Grand Rapids, 1913; The Christian Laborer in the Industrial Struggle, Grand Rapids, 1916). In 1920–21 he delivered the Stone Lectures at Princeton Seminary on 'The Kingdom of God in Modern Life and Thought' (published under that title in 1951). His Systematic Theology has continued to enjoy widespread circulation.

Bibliography

J. D. Bratt, Dutch Calvinism in Modern America: A History of a Conservative Subculture (Grand Rapids, 1984); H. Zwaanstra, 'Louis Berkhof', in D. F. Wells (ed.), Reformed Theology in America (Grand Rapids, 1985).

S. B. FERGUSON

BERKOUWER, GERRIT CORNELIS (1903–96)

A Dutch *Reformed theologian, Berkouwer served as a part-time lecturer in the Free University of Amsterdam from 1940. In 1945 he was appointed to the chair of *dogmatics, a chair which had formerly been held by A. *Kuyper, H. *Bavinck and V. Hepp (1879–1950). Undoubtedly, he felt attracted to the biblical-historical approach of Bavinck, rather than to the more speculative approach of Kuyper and the strongly scholastic method of Hepp.

Berkouwer's doctoral thesis of 1932 dealt with the relationship between *faith and *revelation in recent German theology. This relationship held his attention throughout his entire theological career. In his early years there were two main loci of interest, the first being the theology of Karl *Barth. In his first major work, Karl Barth (1936), he proved to be very critical. In his second major work (The Triumph of Grace in the Theology of Karl Barth, 1954; ET, Grand Rapids and London, 1956) he showed a more sympathetic understanding of Barth's intentions, although incisive criticism was by no means lacking.

Berkouwer's second focus of interest was *Roman Catholic theology. In his first major volume on Roman Catholic dogma, Barthianisme en Katholicisme (1940), criticism again prevailed. This was still true of the second (Conflict with Rome, 1948; ET, Philadelphia, 1958), although the general approach was more conciliatory. In 1961 he was invited to be an official observer at the Second *Vatican Council. Following this, he published two other volumes on Catholic theology: The Second Vatican Council and the New Theology (Grand Rapids, 1965) and Nabetrachting op het Concilie (Reflection after the Council, Kampen, 1968), in which he offered a penetrating analysis of both the council and recent Catholic theological thinking.

Berkouwer's main achievement, however, was his series of Studies in Dogmatics, in which he treated several loci of dogmatics (Dutch edn, 18 vols., most of which are available in ET, Grand Rapids, 1952–75).

He never wrote a formal introduction to theology (prolegomena), but it is quite evident that the guiding idea in all his theologizing is the correlation between faith and revelation (cf. the titles of his first Studies in Dogmatics: Faith and Justification, 1954; Faith and Sanctification, 1952; and Faith and Perseverance, 1958). God's revelation is never a communication of revealed truths, but it is God's coming in Jesus Christ to the sinner. This revelation can be accepted only in faith. No salvation without faith! Faith, however, is not a constitutive factor in the process of revelation, but is totally dependent upon and directed towards its object: God's salvation in Christ. This correlation makes Berkouwer's theology strongly anti-speculative and antischolastic. All theology has to be 'preachable'. Increasingly, he also turned against all causal-deterministic ways of thinking (cf. his volume on Divine Election, 1960). The sola Scriptura of the Reformers deeply appealed to him and increasingly determined his own theology. The question has been raised whether his correlation method and the return to the 'pre-scientific' sola Scriptura – sola fide approach of the Reformers does not lead to a limitation of the possibilities of theology and to too easy a retreat to the notion of 'mystery'.

Bibliography

Works: A Half Century of Theology (Grand Rapids, 1977).

Studies: A. Baker, A Critical Evaluation of G. C. Berkouwer's Doctrine of Election (Dallas, 1976); C. M. Cameron, The Problem of Polarization: An Approach Based on the Writings of G. C. Berkouwer (Lewiston, 1992); P. D. Collord, The Problem of Authority for Dogmatics in G. C. Berkouwer (PhD diss., University of Iowa, 1964); J. C. de Moor, Towards a Biblically Theological Method: A Structural Analysis and a Further Elaboration of Dr. G. C. Berkouwer's Hermeneuticdogmatic Method (Kampen, 1980); L. B. Smedes, 'G. C. Berkouwer', in P. E. Hughes (ed.), Creative Minds in Contemporary Theology (Grand Rapids, 1966).

K. RUNIA

BERLIN DECLARATION

The 'Berlin Declaration on Ecumenism' (BDE), entitled Freedom and Fellowship in Christ (1974), was a radical critique of the theological direction of the World Council of Churches (WCC). It also affirmed the theological convictions on which its criticism was based, and called for a return towards a biblically based concern for Christian unity.

It was produced by the same Theological Convention of Confessing Fellowships which issued the *Frankfurt Declaration, in co-operation with others all over the world who had responded positively to the Frankfurt Declaration. It was intended as a critical but constructive contribution to the forthcoming Fifth Assembly of the WCC which was to take place in 1975 in Nairobi under the theme 'Christ Frees and Unites'. The text was adopted at the first European Confession Congress in Berlin in May 1974, exactly forty years after the historic first Confessing Synod of the Evangelical Church in Germany which had issued the *Barmen Declaration. In 1975, prior to the Nairobi Assembly, a volume documenting the Declaration in detail (listed below) was presented to leaders of the WCC and the Lutheran World Federation as well as to the Vatican Secretariat on Christian Unity.

In twelve affirmations and refutations recent *ecumenical pronouncements on the Christological, soteriological and ecclesiological aspects of the Nairobi theme were analysed and condemned for their politicizing and *syncretizing tendencies, while the authentic biblical content of these terms was expounded. The Declaration's call for a coming together of concerned Christian groups worldwide was partly fulfilled in the formation of the *Lausanne Movement for World Evangelization later the same year.

The BDE has been used as a model for similar declarations, e.g. the Seoul Declaration on Christian Missions (1975).

Bibliography

H. Berkhof, 'Berlin versus Geneva: Our Relationship with the "Evangelicals"', Ecumenical Review 28 (1976), pp. 80–86; W. Künneth/P. Beyerhaus (eds.), Reich Gottes oder Weltgemeinschaft? Die Berliner Ökumene-Erklärung zur utopischen Vision des Weltkirchenrats (Bad Liebenzell, 1975).

P. P. J. BEYERHAUS

BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX (1090–1153)

Bernard was born at Fontaines (near Dijon) of noble parents. At the age of twenty-one he entered the recently founded abbey of Cîteaux, at that stage the only abbey of the new and strict Cistercian order. Three years later Bernard was appointed abbot of a new monastery, at Clairvaux. Under Bernard it grew rapidly and during his lifetime became parent to some seventy new Cistercian abbeys.

Bernard went to Cîteaux to flee the world, but in time he became one of the most active and widely travelled leaders of the twelfth-century church. During the 1130s he campaigned for Pope Innocent II against the rival pope, Anacletus. Eventually he secured Innocent's victory, which gained many favours for the Cistercians. Later he opposed the teaching of Peter *Abelard, securing his condemnation at the Council of Sens in 1140 and thereafter by the pope. His authority was further enhanced when one of his own monks, Bernard Paganelli, became Pope Eugenius III in 1145. In the next two years, at Eugenius' request, Bernard preached round Europe, raising support for the Second Crusade. This was launched in 1148 but failed dismally, a severe blow for Bernard. But his reputation was great enough to survive such a setback, and his popularity has never really waned.

Bernard has been called 'the last of the Fathers'. He was the last great representative of the early medieval tradition of *monastic theology. He was a brilliant writer, earning himself the title 'mellifluous' (sweet as honey). He preached regularly and many of his sermons survive. Some are unpolished, probably much as originally preached. Others are in a highly polished literary form, designed for reading. These are mostly based on various Sundays and saints' days throughout the church year. Bernard corresponded widely and more than 500 of his letters survive, ranging from the personal and devotional to the official and political. Some are virtually treatises, on *baptism, on the office of bishop and against the errors of Abelard.

Bernard wrote a number of treatises. Three of these are on monasticism: his Apology for the Cistercians against the Cluniacs, Precept and Dispensation on the correct interpretation of the Rule of St *Benedict and a treatise In Praise of the New Knighthood on the new order of Templars. He also wrote a biography of Archbishop Malachy of Armagh (1094–1148), who helped to bring the Irish church into line with Roman practices.

In his early years Bernard wrote a masterly treatise on Grace and Freewill. In this he relates the work of *grace and of the human *will, along *Augustinian lines. He argues that our good works are at the same time entirely the work of God's grace (thus leaving no room for boasting) and entirely the work of our freewill in that it is we who perform them (thus providing a basis for *merit and reward).

Towards the end of his life Bernard wrote on Consideration for his former disciple, Pope Eugenius III. Bernard urges him to find time for reflection or meditation in his busy life. He sees the pope as 'the unique vicar of Christ who presides not over a single people but over all' and has fullness of power. But he is equally emphatic in his opposition to papal tyranny (see *Papacy).

Bernard is best known as a spiritual writer. His book on Loving God has been called 'one of the most outstanding of all medieval books on *mysticism'. His Steps of Humility and Pride is based on the twelve steps of humility described in the Rule of St Benedict. But his best-known spiritual work is his eighty-six Sermons on the Song of Solomon, allegedly commenting on Song of Solomon 1:1–3:1, but in reality a treatise in sermon form on the spiritual life of the monk.

Bibliography

Works in PL 182–185. Critical edition: J. Leclercq, H. Rochais, et al. (eds.), Sancti Bernardi Opera, 8 vols. (Rome, 1957–77). ET of works in the Cistercian Fathers series (Kalamazoo, MI, 1970ff.).

Studies: A. H. Bredero, Bernard of Clairvaux: Between Cult and History (Edinburgh, 1996); G. R. Evans, The Mind of St Bernard of Clairvaux (Oxford, 1983); idem, Bernard of Clairvaux: Selected Works (New York, 1987); idem, Bernard of Clairvaux (Oxford, 2000); E. Gilson, The Mystical Theology of Saint Bernard (London, 1940); J. Leclercq, Bernard of Clairvaux and the Cistercian Spirit (Kalamazoo, 1976); E. Vacandard, Vie de Saint Bernard, 2 vols. (Paris, 1895).

A. N. S. LANE

BEZA, THEODORE (1519–1605)

As *Calvin's successor Beza was the acknowledged champion of Genevan orthodoxy and chief spokesman for *Reformed Protestantism. In Geneva he served as moderator of the clergy (1564–80), rector of the Academy (1559–63) and professor of theology (1559–99). In addition, through generations of students, pastors, men and women of state and merchants who knew him personally, and through correspondence, Beza's influence was felt in France, Britain, the Netherlands, Poland and Germany. It was principally through his writings, however, that Beza became established as the skilful polemicist and man of letters, indeed the authoritative guide for defining the doctrinal integrity of the Reformed faith. He wrote close to 100 treatises, mostly polemical writings on the *Eucharist, *Christology and the *church. His magnum opus, the Novum Testamentum, was dedicated to Queen Elizabeth in 1565.

The interpretation of Beza's thought and his role in the development of Calvinism have caused considerable controversy. His fidelity to Calvin was accepted by contemporaries, but by the middle of the seventeenth century Peter Heylyn (1600–62) in England and Amyraut (see *Amyraldism) in France found Beza responsible for hardening Calvin's theology. Such protests were largely ignored until Heinrich Heppe (1820–79) articulated this thesis in his nineteenth-century study of Beza's role in the development of the rational element in Calvinism. This challenge won few converts within nineteenth-century Calvinism, which cherished the very rational coherence of the Calvinist system that Heppe deplored. By the middle of the twentieth century the tide had turned in the historiography. By then *Barth's revolutionary theology had created a more favourable climate for a new interpretation of Calvin which celebrated the dynamic, Christological and biblical centre of his theology over against the more metaphysical and systematic structure of the Calvinism attributed to Beza.

Certainly, one finds in Beza's writings a greater openness to *Aristotelian *metaphysics and dialectic, more reliance on *patristic authority and more insistence on systematic coherence: all of which served to reshape Calvin's theology into a more tightly argued, logically unassailable body of truth. But this does not mean that he produced a rational synthesis based on a metaphysic of God's decree, or that there is a direct line from Beza to seventeenth-century Reformed scholasticism, as the German school of interpretation has insisted.

Evidence from recent studies calls for a revision of this thesis. Beza's education within French *humanism had a lasting impact on both the style and content of his theology. Using the literary models of Greek and Roman literature, humanism was drawn into the rhetorical and ethical style and concerns of the classics. Moreover, the logic and philosophy which Beza absorbed in Paris was a more broadly based Aristotelianism than the technical, impersonal and increasingly abstruse nature of medieval *scholasticism. It is this literary culture of French humanism which separates Beza from any easy identification with scholasticism and which binds him closely to the religious and biblical centre of his mentor's theology.

Bibliography

Works: Many theological treatises in Tractationes Theologicae, 3 vols. (1570–82); Correspondance de Théodore de Bèze, 20 vols. (Geneva, 1960–98).

Studies: W. Kickel, Vernunft und Offenbarung bei Theodor Beza (Neukirchen-Vluyn, 1967); R. Letham, 'Theodore Beza: A Reassessment', SJT 40, 1987, pp. 25–40; T. Maruyama, The Ecclesiology of Theodore Beza (Geneva, 1978); S. M. Manetsch, Theodore Beza and the Quest for Peace in France, 1572–1598 (Leiden, 2000); J. Raitt, The Eucharistic Theology of Theodore Beza (Chambersburg, PA, 1972); S. D. Wright, Our Sovereign Refuge: The Pastoral Theology of Theodore Beza (Milton Keynes, 2005).

Gabriel Biel and Late Medieval Nominalism (Grand Rapids, 2nd 1967).

D. F. WRIGHT

I. MCPHEE

BIEL, GABRIEL (c. 1415–95)

The German Gabriel Biel was one of the last great *scholastic theologians. After a lengthy university career at Heidelberg (arts) and Erfurt and Cologne (theology), during which he was exposed to both the via antiqua ('old way') of *Thomas Aquinas and *Albertus Magnus at Cologne and the via moderna of *Duns Scotus and *William of Ockham at Erfurt, he became in middle life a pastor and preacher. He was cathedral preacher at Mainz, and from the 1460s onwards a leading figure in the Brethren of the Common Life, especially as the first provost of their new house at Butzbach. From 1479 he was provost at Urach in Württemberg, combining his responsibilities with the professorship of theology at the new university at Wittenberg from 1484 to c. 1490.

Biel was a true disciple of Ockham's *nominalism, but was able to be critical of all schools of thought. Though 'a faithful preserver of the impressively coherent structure of the Occamistic system' (H. A. Oberman), his teaching was more explicitly theological than Ockham's, demonstrating nominalism's potential for pastoral application (as did his friend and follower, the famous Strasbourg preacher John Geiler of Kaysersberg, 1445–1510; see the study by E. J. Dempsey Douglass, Justification in Late Medieval Preaching, Leiden, 1966). Biel's thought is increasingly appreciated both for its thorough grounding in earlier medieval tradition and for its influence on Catholic responses to the Reformation. He was prominent among the nominalist writers with whom *Luther's early theology critically engaged.

Bibliography

J. L. Farthing, Thomas Aquinas and Gabriel Biel: Interpretations of St Thomas Aquinas in German Nominalism on the Eve of the Reformation (Durham, NC, 1988); H. A. Oberman, Forerunners of the Reformation: The Shape of Late Medieval Thought, (London, 1967); idem, The Harvest of Medieval Theology:

BLACK CONSCIOUSNESS

Black consciousness arose to counter the blackness that whiteness created. Being black is a social construct foisted upon blacks by whites, creating confusion about their identity. It is seen in the policy of assimilation practised by the French upon their colonial subjects. Thus Léopold Sédar Senghor, later president of Senegal, suffered a crisis of identity when as a student he travelled to Paris in 1928. He had been told he was French, but in France he was treated as an African. Aimé Césaire similarly arrived in Paris from Martinique to begin his studies. In Return to My Native Land he had to construct an identity for himself. This was the experience of Franz Fanon, also from Martinique, when he went on to work as a psychiatrist in Algeria during the war of liberation. Identity can be withheld but it cannot be given or received as a gift: it has to be won. His therapy of violence was influential throughout Africa and America, wherever blackness sought to determine its own identity without the permission of white people.

Black consciousness defined its identity, declaring itself to be African. As whites looked back to the old country of origin, so blacks had to be able to return to Africa – at least in principle. The most famous black to have done this in practice was Edward Blyden. Originally from St Thomas, he had gone to college in the USA but soon left because of discrimination, and set sail for Liberia in 1851. He was to become a classical scholar, educator, ambassador and international statesman. He urged the black diaspora of North and South America to return to their own continent.

Marcus Garvey was the most influential figure in the development of black consciousness in two respects. First, white was still the colour of value and preference when he was born in Jamaica in 1887. But Garvey, a maroon, declared his preference for blackness. He advocated self-help and in 1914 set up UNIA (the Universal Negro Improvement Association). Blacks must be responsible for themselves, socially, politically and especially economically. Secondly, in his Pan-Africanism, he believed that Africa should be for Africans, that Africa should be able to exercise power in the world, to help and to protect blacks wherever they might live. These themes were taken up by the Black Power movement in America in the 1960s, initially inspired by Stokely Carmichael.

Edward Blyden, himself a Presbyterian minister, saw that Islam had related better than Christianity to the peoples of West Africa. Within America the Honourable Elijah Muhammad created the Nation of Islam, a non-orthodox form of Islam which called for black people to unite as a nation within a nation. This black religious consciousness declared Christianity to be the religion of slaves and enslavement. Its most famous exponent was Malcolm X, who accepted the Yacub myth about the origins of the white race and declared white people to be of the devil. His successor, Louis Farrakhan, led the Million Man March on Washington in 1995, calling on black men to pledge themselves to high moral values, respect towards women and kindness towards children. Affluent black consciousness now explores the rich variety of African-American culture, but is in danger of forgetting the poorest section of the black community, who were the special concern of Marcus Garvey.

The Black Consciousness Movement in South Africa was created by Bantu Stephen Biko. It was the genius of Steve Biko to create a movement which transformed the consciousness of ordinary black people. It was not dependent on the fate of its leaders: Mandela was imprisoned in 1964 and Biko was beaten to death in police custody in 1977, but the movement in hearts and minds could not be defeated.

See also: BLACK THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

S. Biko, I Write What I Like (London, 1978); F. Fanon, The Wretched of the Earth (London, 1961); A. J. Garvey, The Philosophy and Opinions of Marcus Garvey (New York, 1923).

A. KEE

BLACK THEOLOGY

Black theology arose as a response by advocates steeped in black church tradition to the pervasive presence of *racism in the United States during the climactic emergence of both the civil rights and Black Power movements (see *Black consciousness) during the 1960s. Though echoes of sociocultural, economic and political liberation sounded long before through diverse voices, the monumental work that started what has become known as the Black Theology Project is James H. Cone's Black Theology and Black Power (1969). Since that time the project has grown, embraced some developments and acquired determinative dialogue partners. A sign of maturing formulations is the fact that the movement has drawn critics from those identifying with this theological community and those considered sympathetic observers. In addition, black theology must face various challenges demanding response if it seeks to be a viable contributor to the black church and those seeking models of liberatory theological reflection in the global community.

Cone, black church historian Gayraud Wilmore, and philosophical theologian J. Deotis Roberts, along with other African-American theologians and philosophers, were burdened to show that the gospel of Jesus Christ was consistent with the movement toward liberation, i.e. confronting the pervasive effects of racism. Black theology was understood as:

a theology of 'blackness'. It is the affirmation of black humanity that emancipates black people from white racism, thus providing authentic freedom for both white and black people . . . The demand that Christ the Liberator imposes on all men requires all blacks to affirm their full dignity as persons and all whites to surrender their presumptions of superiority and abuses of power. (Statement by the National Committee of Black Churchmen, 13 June, 1969)

Theological formulation of this sort must draw from some traditional sources and from sources unique to the black perspective. Scripture and church tradition remain foundational, but they must be engaged with a critical eye. Critical distancing was essential because much of the oppressed community's knowledge of Christianity was channelled through exposure to a dominant white culture which often used such instruction to further the subordination of black people. The multifaceted realm of the 'black experience' was another foundational source for doing theology. This experience inculcated the history, stories, songs, poems and music arising from the black community as it struggled to make sense of an existence radically affected by widespread racial oppression in a country where ostensibly 'all men are created equal'.

Within black theology, liberatory models have been identified, focusing on the model's devotion to Scripture and church tradition, but also revealing a devotion to concrete strategies and demonstrations of behaviour resulting in freedom for themselves and for others. Thus slave insurrectionists such as Gabriel Prosser (1800), Denmark Vesey (1822), and Nat Turner (1831), whom Wilmore refers to as 'Three Generals in the Lord's Army', can be considered appropriate liberatory models because of a conviction common to all of them, namely, that God through Scripture and other experiences had called them to armed rebellion to free those enslaved. Others such as Harriet Tubman (1819–1913), who was known as 'Moses' because she was a leader on the underground railroad conducting slaves to freedom in Canada, along with Sojourner Truth (born Isabella Baumfree, 1797–1883), who travelled in various parts of the United States speaking against slavery, were models combining religious conviction with concrete acts of liberation.

Many other voices contributed to the emergence of black theology during the 1960s. The contributors shared a life oriented toward the conviction that God was ultimately against slavery, against the biblical and theological justifications offered by some advocating this institution, against the perpetual dehumanization and marginalization of people of African descent even beyond the official end of slavery. Black churchmen began to reformulate theology in such a way to encourage black people and give them a sense of dignity, propagating a view that this was what God desired for them now. An example of this early reformulation was Henry McNeal Turner (1834–1915), a bishop in the African Methodist Episcopal Church in the USA, who as early as 1894 declared that in view of the racial discrimination practised by white Christians against black people, 'God is a Negro'.

The impetus of the civil rights movement, in conjunction with the Black Power wing of the movement, provided a consummatory time for the formulation of black theology. The event, often cited as the beginnings of the modern civil rights movement, was the Montgomery (Alabama) bus boycott, beginning in 1955 precipitated by Rosa Park's refusal to give up her bus seat to a white man, whereby she was then arrested. The subsequent boycott helped galvanize the civil rights movement and catapulted Dr Martin Luther King, Jr into national attention. Related to the civil rights movement in general was the situation arousing the Black Power presence in particular. Black Power had different emphases to different people in the movement. For some it was more of a socio-cultural liberatory perspective: a perspective governed by black racial dignity, self definition, self-reliance and self-expression. It was a rejection of white attempts to maintain control of black consciousness. For others Black Power had a more definitive political, economic orientation.

Black theology thus emerged as the theological expression of a number of foundational factors to black existence and what could be identified as the 'black experience'. It attempted to explicate that through the gospel of Jesus Christ, God demonstrated concern for the effects of *slavery and racism on people of African descent. He was concerned about their pain, their anger and their demands for self-determination. God was an advocate in their struggle for freedom in all spheres of existence. Cone, Wilmore and Roberts did much to set this black theological agenda.

Black theology has undergone a number of crucial developments. Among them are the reformulation of 'blackness', the emergence of a second generation of black theologians, the thought of womanist theologians and ethicists.

Cone had also addressed 'blackness' as a symbol of dehumanization, suffering and marginalization. Blackness could also symbolize hope and the inspiration to achieve liberation. This symbolic perspective facilitated much in terms of interaction and evaluation with other liberation-oriented theologies such as Latin American *liberation theology. Much comparative study had been done between black theology and *African theology. The relationship between the two in terms of similarities and dissimilarities has been debated by members in both camps. African theologians such as John Mbiti, E. W. Fashole-Luke and Harry Sawyer had little use for the theme of liberation and saw little hope for an alliance between black and African theologies. On the other hand, Cone, Desmond Tutu and Burgess Carr stressed foundational similarities in terms of the common experience of a shared contempt of blackness by many whites, the 'motherhood' of Africa, and the unity that comes through baptism and membership in the body of Christ.

The Black Theology Project has produced a second generation of theologians who facilitated further depth of study in the discipline and who are prolific writers. This group would include people like Dwight N. Hopkins, George C. L. Cummings and Will Coleman. They have contributed to developments in black theology through investigations in the nature and function of slave religion. In addition, they have aided in the consultation with other disciplines, such as sociology, economic theory and the effects of *globalization to enhance the relevance and impact of black theology.

Cone affirms that *womanist theology 'is the most creative development to emerge out of the Black theology movement during the 1980s and 1990s'. The term 'womanist' comes from Alice Walker's In Search of Our Mother's Garden (1983). Womanist theologians share with their black brothers a burden to confront racism in all its effects, but concurrently recognize shortcomings in black theology in light of the unique experience of African-American women. Sympathies are shared with white feminists who confront sexism, but distancing occurs, nevertheless, because white, middle-class feminists do not confront racism. Womanist theological reflection is multi-dimensional because it must address not only racial and gender oppression, but also classism and heterosexism. Leading formulators are Delores S. Williams, Jacquelyn Grant, Katie G. Cannon, Cheryl J. Sanders, M. Shawn Copeland and Emilie M. Townes.

Black theology has been criticized by voices sympathetic to the movement as well as those occupying a more distant evaluative position. As early as 1975 Cecil W. Cone criticized his brother, James, for his initial 'Barthian' tendencies in explicating the meaning and significance of black theology. A more recent sympathetic voice comes from Victor Anderson, who raises concerns about black theology's 'alienated consciousness'. This *alienation is multifaceted in terms of its perceived alienation from the traditions of the black church, its reliance to a problematic degree upon theological methodologies derived from white European theologians and philosophers and its attempts to negotiate a commitment to black radicalism and yet build morality upon Christian foundations. British theologian, Alistair Kee, from outside the Black Theology project, contributes the call for more critical attention to be given to the analysis of class and its effects. Cone began such deliberations in 1984 (For My People) by introducing Marxism as a possible tool of analysis for black theologians. Kee, however, argues that more must be done.

Black theology faces a number of challenges in the present and in the future. What is its relationship to be with the black church and the church's immediate needs in various urban communities? Will the project maintain a uniquely Christian identity? Here Jesus Christ and the meaning of the cross remain foundational points of reflection. What will be its relationship to other liberatory theologies? How will it relate to other global religions in general? To what degree are the reflections of black theologians affected by the academy and the seeking of prestigious positions in predominantly white academic institutions? These and many other questions must continually be addressed if black theology is to be faithful to its initial vision and purpose.

Bibliography

J. H. Cone, Black Theology and Black Power (New York, 1969); idem, For My People: Black Theology and the Black Church (Maryknoll, 1984); D. N. Hopkins, Cut Loose Your Stammering Tongue: Black Theology in the Slave Narratives (Maryknoll, 1992); idem, Introducing Black Theology of Liberation (Maryknoll, 1999); D. N. Hopkins et al., Black Faith and Public Talk (Maryknoll, 1999); J. S. Mbiti, 'An African Views American Black Theology', Worldview 17, 1974, pp. 41–44; J. D. Roberts, Black Theology in Dialogue (Philadelphia, 1987); E. M. Townes, Womanist Justice, Womanist Hope, AAR Series 79, 1993; D. S. Williams, Sisters in the Wilderness (Maryknoll, 1993); G. S. Wilmore, Black Religion and Black Radicalism (Maryknoll, 1984); G. S. Wilmore and J. H. Cone, Black Theology: A Documentary History 1966–1979 (New York, 1979); idem, Black Theology: A Documentary History, Volume Two: 1980–1992 (Maryknoll, 1993); J. U. Young, Black and African Theologies: Siblings or Distant Cousins? (Maryknoll, 1986).

B. FIELDS

BLASPHEMY

Blasphemy (Gk blaptein, 'to injure', and pheme, 'reputation') denotes evil, slanderous or defamatory speech about God. It draws on the Hebrew verbs nakob and qillel, which mean to pronounce a curse on God (Lev. 24:10–23). In its non-trivial sense, it involves the active and conscious overthrow of the third commandment (Exod. 20:7; Deut. 5:11) and is an inversion of praise. Thomas Aquinas saw it as the opposite of the confession of faith and a mortal sin.

Blasphemy is to be distinguished from its close cousins – heresy, *idolatry, profanation, *apostasy and sacrilege – by its political dimension. Blasphemy is a form of sedition: it undermines the very basis of social and political life by calling into question the foundation of that life. In the Jewish Talmud, blasphemy is an act of treason against the King of kings. The pagan philosopher Porphyry (c. 300) draws out the political implications of early Christians' blasphemy against the pagan gods. As he puts it in Against the Christians: '[The Christians] would bring us a society without law. They would teach us to have no fear of the gods.' This political dimension was obscured for much of the medieval period in the West as ecclesial and political authorities jointly ordered society. During this period blasphemy became a sub-species of *heresy. In England, however, by the seventeenth century, the charge of heresy was seen as only an ecclesiastical offence punishable by excommunication, yet blasphemy was a common law offence against the state (as it still is to this day both in Britain and a number of other European countries). Thus, when *Nietzsche made the blasphemous declaration that 'God is dead', he intended not simply to call into question Christian belief and practice, but to challenge the very basis of Western civilization. To blaspheme is not only to reject God, but also to set oneself against the order of human life that God commands and sustains.

The trials and condemnations of Jesus (Mark 14:53–65; John 10:22–33), Stephen (Acts 6:11–14), Martin Luther, George Fox and William Penn suggest that one man's blasphemy is another's orthodoxy. The boundaries between legitimate and illegitimate dissent, deviancy and criticism shift according to changing historical situations – at different times and in different places blasphemy can mean different things. Yet blasphemy is not simply a term of abuse that gives expression to that which a society most abhors and can prosecute. There is a difference between dissent from and criticism of particular religious authorities and patterns of belief and practice, and the wilful and hostile rejection of God that blasphemy entails.

In the contemporary Western context, the theological moorings of blasphemy are lost, and it has morphed into the crime of religious hatred: the crime of intolerance against a particular sociological group rather than a crime against God and the foundations of the social and political order.

Bibliography

A. Cabantous, Blasphemy: Impious Speech in the West from the Seventeenth to the Nineteenth Century (ET, New York, 2002); D. Lawton, Blasphemy (New York, 1993); G. Nokes, A History of the Crime of Blasphemy (London, 1928); Thomas Aquinas, Summa Theologica (ET, Notre Dame, 1981).

L. BREThERTON

BLOESCH, DONALD G. (1928–2010)

Donald Bloesch's grandfathers and father were pastors in the Evangelical Synod of North America that later became part of the United Church of Christ where Bloesch was a member. Bloesch was educated at Chicago Theological Seminary and the University of Chicago. He taught at the University of Dubuque Theological Seminary for thirty-five years.

Bloesch's many ecumenical encounters help explain his self-designation as a 'catholic evangelical'. Drawing on Karl *Barth, among many other theologians, Bloesch developed a historically rich confessional 'theology of Word and Spirit' as an alternative to *fundamentalism and *liberalism.

Bloesch's theological method combined the truth of the word of God and the power of the Holy Spirit for renewing the church and converting the world. His theology focused on themes crucial to evangelicalism, such as God's sovereignty, the primacy of Scripture, total depravity, Christ's deity, substitutionary atonement, salvation by grace and faith, the new birth, Christ's bodily resurrection and personal return, and heaven and hell. Yet Bloesch reworked these themes, particularly in light of what he had learned from Barth and his family heritage in *Pietism.

See also: EVANGELICAL THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

Works: Essentials of Evangelical Theology, 2 vols. (San Francisco, 1978–79); Christian Foundations, 7 vols. (Downers Grove, 1992–2004).

Studies: E. M. Colyer (ed.), Evangelical Theology in Transition: Theologians in Dialogue with Donald Bloesch (Downers Grove, 1999).

E. M. COLYER

BLOOD, see SACRIFICE

BODY, see ANTHROPOLOGY

BODY OF CHRIST, see CHURCH

BOEHME, JACOB (1575–1624)

Boehme was a German shoemaker and mystic of Görlitz who combined a concern for personal *religious experience, in reaction to Lutheran scholasticism (see *Orthodoxy/Scholasticism, Lutheran), with speculation about the nature of God and his relation to creation.

Most of Boehme's writings from 1612 to 1622, prompted by mystical experiences in 1600 and 1619, used language and ideas from his long study of Neoplatonism (see *Platonism), Jewish cabalism and alchemy. Later writings, including the treatises collected in The Way to Christ (1624), were more clearly expressed in traditional Christian themes and images, but the thought remained complex and speculative. Boehme's writings were banned in his lifetime and subsequently often ignored, although they strongly influenced The Spirit of Love (1752, 1754) and other later writings of William *Law, causing a rift between Law and John *Wesley, who described Boehme's writings as 'most sublime nonsense'.

While Boehme's ideas cannot be fitted into any system, his influence can be traced in *pietism, *quietism and *idealism. The 'dazzling chaos' (Boutroux) of his thought also appealed to the imagination of artists and poets, including John Milton (1608–74), William Blake (1757–1827) and S. T. *Coleridge.

Bibliography

P. Erb (tr.), Jacob Boehme: The Way to Christ (London and New York, 1978); B. Nicolescu, Science, Meaning, and Evolution: The Cosmology of Jacob Boehme, tr. R. Baker (New York, 1991); J. J. Stoudt, Jacob Boehme: His Life and Thought (New York, 1968).

P. N. HILLYER

BOETHIUS (c. 480–524)

Despite his noble Roman birth and senatorial rank, the statesman and Christian philosopher Boethius gained real political power at the court of the Gothic ruler of Rome, Theodoric. His prominence, however, did not last. Accused of treasonable dealings with the emperor in Constantinople, he was imprisoned in Pavia, where he was eventually executed.

Boethius was a transitional figure between the classical and the medieval world. He laid the foundation of the quadrivium ('the four ways'), the standard introduction to serious study of philosophy (see *Philosophy and theology). More important, he was a major influence in the virtually universal acceptance by Western *Christendom of a marriage between Christian theology and the best of Greek philosophy, effectively *Aristotle and the Neoplatonists (see *Platonism). Boethius' translation of and commentary on Porphyry's Introduction proved particularly influential in the medieval period.

Boethius also wrote on Christian doctrines, notably the Trinity and the person of Christ. But his most influential work has been The Consolation of Philosophy, written in prison as a vindication of the divine *providence behind the painful demise of his own political career. The work has been criticized because of its lack of explicit reference to Scripture and its reliance on logical reasoning. Indeed, Boethius actually identifies the 'highest good' of philosophers with the Christian God. But alongside this, deliberate parallels to the wisdom literature of the OT, particularly Ecclesiastes, must be recognized.

Bibliography

Works in PL 64–64.

Studies: H. Chadwick, Boethius: The Consolations of Music, Logic, Theology and Philosophy (Oxford, 1981); M. Gibson (ed.), Boethius: His Life, Writings and Influence (Oxford, 1981); N. H. Kaylor, Jr and P. E. Phillips (eds.), A Companion to Boethius in the Middle Ages (Leiden, 2012); H. Liebeschütz in CHLGEMP, pp. 538–555; J. Marenbon, Boethius (Oxford, 2003); J. Marenbon (ed.), The Cambridge Companion to Boethius (Cambridge, 2009).

G. A. KEITH

BOFF, LEONARDO (b. 1938)

Boff is a Brazilian liberation theologian, social activist and ecologist. Born in Concordia, Santa Catarina, he joined the order of the Franciscan Minors in 1959 and later earned a doctorate in Germany under Karl *Rahner. He taught theology at the Franciscan Theological Institute in Petropolis, Brazil and became well known through his book Jesus Christ the Liberator, published in Portuguese in 1971, the first systematic Christology written by a Catholic theologian from Latin America, in dialogue with European theology. With his brother Clodovis he became an important protagonist of the *liberation theology movement, both through his support of the struggles for human rights in Brazil, and through his extensive writing in an effort to systematize the main themes of classic theology from a liberation perspective, including a reinterpretation of *Franciscan spirituality. Within the Catholic Church in Brazil, which was challenged by lack of clergy and the growth of Protestantism, Boff took part in the search for renewal of pastoral work and the effort to mobilize the laity that produced the Base Ecclesial Communities.

Theological reflection about this experience was summarized in 1981 in his book The Church: Charisma and Power, with a strong NT component, in an effort to develop a critical ecclesiology from the liberation perspective. Translated into several languages, the book became the subject of a process by the Sacred Congregation of the Doctrine of the Faith, which could not tolerate an open challenge to traditional Roman ecclesiology. Boff was sanctioned by the Vatican with censorship and restrictions to his teaching and priestly activity, though the sanction was lifted in 1986. His theology evolved as he became an activist in the issues of *ecology and *poverty, and he could not tolerate new restrictions imposed by the Vatican. In 1993 he abandoned the priesthood, got married and was appointed as a professor at the Rio de Janeiro State University. He currently lives in Jardim Araras, Brazil and is a Professor Emeritus of Ethics, Philosophy of Religion and Ecology.

Bibliography

Works: Jesus Christ Liberator: A Critical Christology for Our Time (Maryknoll, 1978); Liberating Grace (Maryknoll, 1979); Church, Charism and Power: Liberation Theology and the Institutional Church (New York, 1985); EcclesioGenesis: The Base Communities Reinvent the Church (Maryknoll, 1986); Cry of the Earth, Cry of the Poor (Maryknoll, 1997).

With Clodovis Boff: Salvation and Liberation: In Search for a Balance between Faith and Politics (Maryknoll, 1984); Liberation Theology: From Confrontation to Dialogue (San Francisco, 1986); Introducing Liberation Theology (Maryknoll and London, 1987).

Studies: D. W. Ferm, Profiles in Liberation: 36 Portraits of Third World Theologians (Mystic, 1988); A. T. Hennelly (ed.), Liberation Theology: A Documentary History (Maryknoll, 1990).

S. ESCOBAR

BONAVENTURA (1221–74)

Bonaventura was a *scholastic theologian, born in Tuscany, who became the greatest *Franciscan mystic after St Francis himself. Earning the MA degree at Paris, he joined the order (1243) and studied under some of its most renowned scholars, including Alexander of Hales (c. 1170–1245). In 1248 he began lecturing on the Scriptures and theology, but he was not formally received into the masters' guild at Paris until 1257 because of a dispute between the friars and the secular teachers. However, by that time he was no longer actively teaching, because he had been elected minister-general of the Franciscans (1257) and had resigned his position so that he could spend time on his administrative duties. Despite many other responsibilities he continued to encourage Franciscan involvement in academic life. Although often absent on business for the order and the church, whenever possible he preached at the university on matters of philosophical and theological importance to the faculty and students. Declining the position of Archbishop of York (1265), he was persuaded to become Bishop of Albano (1273) and was also made a cardinal. He attended the Council of Lyons (1274) and contributed to an agreement to reunite the Western and Eastern churches.

Bonaventura was a mystic scholastic, as distinct from other Franciscans who were scientific scholastics and the *Dominicans such as *Thomas Aquinas who were rational scholastics. His leadership of the Franciscans temporarily saved the order from division by achieving a compromise between the two opposing factions. His most original thought, expressed in books including The Seven Journeys of Eternity and The Journey of the Mind to God, centres on mysticism, and this caused him to be remembered as 'the Seraphic Doctor'. The works are profoundly influenced by *Augustine, whom he regarded as a balance to the emphasis on *Aristotle and the Arabic commentaries which were so popular in his time.

The knowledge of God, according to Bonaventura, comes not through formulating propositions but by experience with him in the soul (see *Religious experience). Rational *knowledge of God is actually impossible because he is different from humans in a qualitative sense. Information about the divine is hazy, equivocal and analogous. An understanding of God comes through a long and arduous struggle of the spirit, rather than by means of a series of logical progressions. Preparation for an encounter with God requires separation from material concern. Then a person must look for God through shadows or reflections of the divine in things of the world. After one perceives God's presence in the world, one can see God through one's own being. For example, the human will demonstrates his goodness and the intellect shows his truth. This leads to an appreciation of the grace and transcendence of God, but another leap of faith is required to accept the mystery of the Trinity. At this stage in the mystical quest, Bonaventura warns, a period of testing, monotony and spiritual fatigue often sets in; but then, like the light of dawn, comes the gift of the Spirit consisting of an experience of the ineffable joy of the divine presence.

Bonaventura influenced and foreshadowed the great period of mysticism during the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, which produced such individuals as Meister Eckhart, John Tauler and Thomas à Kempis (see *Imitation of Christ). The *Augustinianism and individual devotion that he emphasized helped to prepare the way for the Protestant Reformation.

Bibliography

E. Bettoni, Saint Bonaventure (Notre Dame, 1964); J. G. Bougerol, Introduction to the Works of Bonaventure (New York, 1964); L. Costello, Saint Bonaventure (New York, London, etc., 1911); E. Gilson, The Philosophy of St Bonaventure (New York, 1965); G. F. LaNave, 'Bonaventure', in P. L. Gavriluk and S. Oakley (eds.), The Spiritual Senses: Perceiving God in Western Christianity (Cambridge, 2011), pp. 159–173; J. F. Quinn, The Historical Constitution of St. Bonaventure's Philosophy (Toronto, 1973).

R. G. CLOUSE

BONHOEFFER, DIETRICH (1906–45)

Theologian and leader of the Confessing Church in Germany until his *martyrdom by the Nazis, Bonhoeffer remains one of the most provocative voices in contemporary Christianity, despite the fragmentary and occasional character of much of his writing.

Bonhoeffer was born into a leading German family and educated in Berlin, Tübingen and Rome, and his earliest theological work, Sanctorum Communio, attempted to bridge the theology of *revelation and philosophical sociology by describing the way in which the transcendent is encountered in corporate life. This early work contains many seeds of his more famous later writings, as does another early study on the place of ontology in systematic theology, Act and Being.

A spell in New York at Union Theological Seminary led Bonhoeffer into a strong reaction against *liberal theology and confirmed his nascent attraction to *Barth, at that time beginning work on the Church Dogmatics. On his return to Germany, Bonhoeffer taught in Berlin. His published lectures Creation and Fall (a highly charged interpretation of Gen. 1–3) and Christology are much under Barth's influence.

At the same time, Bonhoeffer became increasingly involved in the young ecumenical movement and in opposition to Hitler, and in the mid-1930s he emerged as a leader of the *Confessing Church which refused any alliance between Christianity and Nazism. Until its enforced closure, he ran a seminary for the Confessing Church at Finkenwalde.

From this period of his work come some of his well-known writings on spirituality, notably Life Together and The Cost of Discipleship. Until his arrest in 1943, he was at work on his posthumously published Ethics. His prison writings, collected as Letters and Papers from Prison, became one of the most influential theological documents of the century, notably for their attempts to phrase questions about the relationship between Christianity and the apparatus of human religion.

Proponents of the so-called ‘theology of secularity’ sought an antecedent in Bonhoeffer, but generally missed the nuances of his work. Behind the Letters and Papers is not so much a confidence about human powers as Bonhoeffer’s eventual departure from Barth’s account of the relation of revelation to human history. It is this, rather than denials of the possibility of all objective language about God, which should provide the starting point for appraisal of Bonhoeffer’s fragmentary assertions about ‘religionless Christianity’ or man’s ‘coming of age’. In effect, Bonhoeffer seeks to correct Barth by reintroducing an emphasis on the relative autonomy of the natural order as the sphere of God’s presence and action. In this way, Bonhoeffer moves towards a theological account of human responsibility, a theme which was to occupy Barth himself in his later years. Bonhoeffer’s own biography, from which his theology is inseparable, shows a parallel growth into consciousness of responsibility for history. He lived through a critical phase of European political and intellectual history, and condenses many of its tragedies in his own life.

Bibliography

Works: Life Together (London, 1954); Gesammelte Schriften, 6 vols. (Munich, 1958–74); The Cost of Discipleship (London, 1959); Creation and Fall (London, 1959); Act and Being (London, 1962); Sanctorum Communio (London, 1963); No Rusty Swords (London, 1965); The Way to Freedom (London, 1966); Letters and Papers from Prison (London, 1971); True Patriotism (London, 1973); Christology (London, 1978); Ethics (London, 1978).

Studies: E. Bethge, Dietrich Bonhoeffer (London, 1970); A. Dumas, Dietrich Bonhoeffer, Theologian of Reality (London, 1971); J. D. Godsey, The Theology of Dietrich Bonhoeffer (London, 1960); K. L. Johnson and T. Larsen (eds.), Bonhoeffer, Christ and Culture (Downers Grove/Nottingham, 2013);

E. Metaxas, Bonhoeffer: Pastor, Martyr, Prophet, Spy (London, 2011); H. Ott, Reality and Faith (London, 1971); J. A. Phillips, The Form of Christ in the World (London, 1967); R. Gregor Smith (ed.), World Come of Age (London, 1967).

J. B. WEBSTER

BOOK OF CONCORD, see CONFESSIONS OF FAITH

BOSSUET, JACQUES-BÉNIGNE (1627–1704)

Educated by Jesuits (Dijon) and mentored by Nicolas Cornet (Paris), Bossuet served as Archdeacon of Metz (1652), Bishop of Condom (1669) and Bishop of Meaux (1681). He was a gifted speaker, gaining a considerable reputation from his sermons and orations. Many of these in fact were delivered to the French court, with which Bossuet built important connections: in 1670 serving as tutor to the dauphin, and becoming Louis XIV’s spiritual counsellor in 1675. Bossuet supported the ‘Gallican thesis’ – claiming that the French king’s authority was derived directly from God, and not subordinated to the Pope’s.

Bossuet entered into debates with contemporaries such as Hobbes, *Leibniz, Simon, Malebranche and Fénelon. Against Malebranche, who reduced divine governance to a ‘general will’, Bossuet insisted on God’s particular *providence (to which, among other things, kings owed their absolute sovereignty). In the clamorous *quietism debate of the late 1690s Bossuet criticized Archbishop Fénelon’s ideal of ‘disinterested’ love of God. Apart from deeming it alarmingly elitist, Bossuet saw in it a threat to the very foundations of Christianity – the knowledge and enjoyment of God’s goodness. Finally, Bossuet felt much challenged by the Protestants, whom he encountered especially during his days in Metz. While attacking the Protestants in his writings, he nevertheless made attempts towards reconciliation between them and the Catholic Church.

Bibliography

Works: Discourse on Universal History, ed. O. Ranum (Chicago, 1976); Politics Drawn from the Very Words of Holy Scripture, ed. P. Riley (Cambridge, 1990).

Studies: H. L. S. Lear, Bossuet and His Contemporaries (London, 1880); E. K. Sanders, Jacques-Bénigne Bossuet (London, 1921); W. J. S. Simpson, A Study of Bossuet (London, 1937).

G. DE GRAAFF

BOSTON, THOMAS (1676–1732)

Boston was a Church of Scotland minister (see *Presbyterianism) and an accomplished theologian. Born in Berwickshire, Scotland, he graduated MA from Edinburgh University and studied theology there for one term, later completing his course under presbyterial supervision. He was minister, successively, at Simprin and Ettrick in the Scottish borders.

Boston published several books during his lifetime, the most famous being Human Nature in Its Fourfold State, which later ranked alongside Pilgrim's Progress in its popularity among Scottish Christians. Boston's treatises on the covenant of works and the covenant of grace rival even Herman Witsius (1636–1708) and Johannes *Cocceius (1603–69) in their cogent presentation of *covenant theology.

Boston was also an accomplished Hebraist, and his Tractatus Stigmologicus Hebraicus on the divine inspiration of the Hebrew accents (published posthumously in Lat. in 1738) earned him high praise from Hebrew scholars all over the world, albeit that later scholarship has demonstrated its main thesis to be untenable.

Boston's name is best known through his involvement in the Marrow Controversy. In the early eighteenth century there was a legalistic strain in Scottish theology. This came to the surface in a dispute between the Presbytery of Auchterarder and a student whom they refused to license because of his understanding of the doctrine of *repentance. The Presbytery had asked the student to subscribe to the following proposition: 'I believe that it is not sound and orthodox to teach that we forsake sin in order to our coming to Christ.' The student refused and the General Assembly of 1717 supported him, censuring the Presbytery. Boston agreed with the intention of the so-called 'Auchterarder Creed', although he had some reservations about the precision of its formulation.

In the context of this dispute, Boston began to recommend Edward Fisher's The Marrow of Modern Divinity (1645). It was a compilation of Reformed writing including passages from *Luther, *Calvin and English *Puritan divines, set in the form of a debate. Boston asserted that it had helped him to understand and preach the doctrines of *grace. James Hog of Carnock republished the book in 1718.

At this stage the two schools of thought within the church became apparent. Principal James Hadow (c. 1670–1747) of St Mary's College, St Andrews, opposed the book, which was ultimately banned by the General Assembly. Boston and eleven others (the 'Marrow Men') made unsuccessful representations to have this ban lifted. Both sides claimed to represent the position of the church's subordinate standard, the *Westminster Confession of Faith.

In retrospect, we can say that Hadow and those who supported him were guilty of a legalistic adaptation of covenant theology. They made repentance a condition of salvation and restricted the gospel offer in the belief that a universal offer required as its basis a universal redemption. Boston and the others represented covenant theology as a theology of grace. As for Hadow's view that the Marrow and the Marrow Men were opposed to the Westminster Confession, it is significant that the 1645 edition of the Marrow appeared with a preface by Joseph Caryl (1602–73), who had been specifically appointed by the Westminster Assembly to 'revise and approve theological works for the press' (D. Beaton, Records of the Scottish Church History Society I).

Boston later re-issued the Marrow with his own notes (in Works, vol. 7). This is the edition which is most significant for a proper understanding of the debate.

Bibliography

Works: Memoirs, ed. G. H. Morrison (Edinburgh, 1899); Works, ed. S. McMillan, 12 vols. (Edinburgh, 1853).

Studies: D. Beaton, 'The "Marrow of Modern Divinity" and the Marrow Controversy', Records of the Scottish Church History Society I, 1926, pp. 112–134; J. P. Mackenzie, 'The Reformed Doctrine of the Will of God in the Theology and Pastoral Practice of Thomas Boston', PhD thesis (Aberdeen, 2011); A. T. B. McGowan, The Federal Theology of Thomas Boston (Carlisle, 1997); P. Ryken, Thomas Boston as Preacher of the Fourfold State (Carlisle, 1995).

A. T. B. MCGOWAN

BRADWARDINE, THOMAS (c. 1290–1349)

Sometimes called ‘Doctor profundus’, Bradwardine was a member of Merton College, Oxford, and a student of mathematics and theology. He was chosen Archbishop of Canterbury a few weeks before he died of the Black Death.

Bradwardine’s chief work, De Causa Dei Contra Pelagium, is a massive and profound metaphysical polemic against both the characteristic doctrines of *Pelagianism and the Pelagian temper. The work was edited in 1618 by Sir Henry Savile, with the help of William Twisse (1575–1646), who later became the prolocutor of the Westminster Assembly. In that work the *Augustinian (and biblical) themes of the bondage of the *will, *predestination and the need for prevenient *grace are developed with an unrivalled subtlety and precision, from a dominantly theocentric standpoint: that of a God who in timeless eternity unchangeably wills and controls all that comes to pass, without being the author of sin. The extent to which this represents a hardening of Augustine’s position is a matter of continuing debate.

Bradwardine is regarded (with, for example, *Wyclif) as an important influence preparing the way for the *Reformation in England, and thus as an important element of continuity between the medieval church and the *Lutheran Reformation and its effects.

Bibliography

Works: De Causa Dei Contra Pelagium, ed. H. Savile (repr. Frankfurt, 1964 [1618]).

Studies: E. W. Dolnikowski, Thomas Bradwardine: A View of Time and a Vision of Eternity in Fourteenth-Century Thought (Leiden, 1995); G. Leff, Bradwardine and the Pelagians (Cambridge, 1957); H. A. Oberman, Archbishop Thomas Bradwardine (Utrecht, 1965).

P. HELM

BRIGGS, CHARLES AUGUSTUS (1841–1913)

Born in New York City, the son of Alanson Briggs and Sarah Mead Berrian, Briggs attended the University of Virginia. Converted during the 1858 revival, he decided to prepare for pastoral ministry. The Civil War temporarily diverted his plans, and he served in the Union Army before entering Union Theological Seminary in 1861.

Ordained a Presbyterian in 1866, he pursued doctoral studies at the University of Berlin. Returning in 1869, he pastored in Roselle, New Jersey before accepting a teaching position at Union in 1874. Introducing the higher critical method in biblical studies to a US audience, Briggs became a lightning rod between conservatives and liberals in the waning years of the nineteenth century. His problems with *Presbyterianism were exacerbated when he published Whither? A Theological Question for the Times (1889) in which he advocated changes in the *Westminster Confession. The controversy led to charges of heresy. In a show of solidarity, the faculty of Union voted to disaffiliate with the Presbyterian Church. Briggs was ordained in the Episcopal Church and continued teaching at Union until 1904.

See also: LIBERALISM AND CONSERVATISM IN THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

R. L. Christensen, The Ecumenical Orthodoxy of Charles Augustus Briggs: 1841–1913 (Lewiston, 1995); M. S. Massa, Charles Augustus Briggs and the Crisis of Historical Criticism (Minneapolis, 1990).

D. W. FAUPEL

BROWN, WILLIAM ADAMS (1863–1943)

Brown was a *Presbyterian minister and theologian, born in New York and educated first at Yale, then Union Theological Seminary, with which his family had strong associations. Following further study in Germany under *Harnack, he taught at Union from 1898 to 1936, beginning his career as the controversy surrounding C. *Briggs and biblical authority was reaching its height, and being appointed Professor of Systematic Theology in 1897. He was accused of *heresy at his own denominational Assembly in 1913 following a speech on ‘The Old Theology and the New’, delivered at Harvard two years earlier. Union Seminary Principal Francis Brown rallied support and averted formal charges.

Early in his career, Brown became engaged in home mission work with poorer and immigrant communities. Later he was active in opposition to commercialized vice and political corruption in the city, and was a key activist in Union Settlement Involved at East Harlem, a seminary initiative that provided education, health and social support services. Further ecumenical work included war-time chaplaincy coordination, and interest in ministerial training. Following retirement in 1930, he became Research Professor of Applied Christianity until 1936. Brunner published fifteen books, including Christian Theology in Outline; his reminiscences are in A Teacher and His Times.

See also: LIBERALISM AND CONSERVATISM IN THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

Works: A Teacher and His Times: A Story of Two Worlds (New York, 1940).

Studies: G. Dorrien, The Making of American Liberal Theology: Idealism, Realism and Modernity (Louisville, 2003); R. Handy, A History of Union Theological Seminary in New York (New York, 1987).

J. GORDON

BRUNNER, EMIL (1889–1966)

A Swiss Reformed theologian, Brunner was initially a pastor before becoming a professor of systematic and practical theology in Zurich from 1924 to 1955. He travelled widely, having a lifelong interest in ecumenism and mission, and spent the concluding two years of his teaching career in Japan.

In reacting against *Schleiermacher's theology, and that of the *liberal Protestant school, Brunner has been identified with *Barth and others as part of the *neo-orthodox movement, whose theology, couched in dialectical terms, was influenced by *Kierkegaard and *Buber.

Brunner considered that the *revelation on which Christianity was based consisted of a person-to-person encounter. Thus God's revelation, occurring uniquely in the life, death and resurrection of Jesus, is completed only when the individual acknowledges that Jesus is Lord. *Scripture itself is not revelation, for it is not verbally inspired and infallible, but it may be the bridge used by the Spirit to bring a person to faith. Brunner admitted that there was historical uncertainty about the gospel events, but affirmed that the divine and human natures were united in Jesus Christ. Thus he embodies and accomplishes mediation between God and man; hence Brunner's *Christology is entitled The Mediator (London, 1934).

It was Brunner's conviction that belief in Christ necessitated universal revelation of God in creation, history and human conscience. This brought him into sharp conflict in 1934 with Barth, who completely rejected any notion of general revelation. (See Brunner's 'Nature and Grace' to which Barth replied with 'No!' Both are printed in Natural Theology, with an introduction by John *Baillie, London, 1946.) However, Brunner was not suggesting that general revelation offered the first reliable step into knowledge of God which special revelation completed. Rather, fallen man retains something of the *image of God which enables him to perceive distorted truth about God. Special revelation brings this truth into focus, confirming what is right, and reforming what is wrong.

Brunner's major exposition of doctrine is to be found in his three-volume Dogmatics (London: vol. 1, 1949; vol. 2, 1952; vol. 3, 1962).

Brunner inherited from his family an interest in social issues, which was kept alive by the questions arising from two world wars and the advance of Communism. Although man's revolt against God has led to despair and guilt, nevertheless the unbeliever is still related to and responsible to God. This theme, developed in Man in Revolt (London, 1939), lies behind his *ethics found in The Divine Imperative (London, 1937). God gives man the opportunity to obey his command to love both God and man. Love for humanity is appropriately expressed as one recognizes the different orders of society: family; the community, understood economically, legally (the state) or culturally; and the church. Both books opposed the totalitarianism found in Hitler's National Socialism and in the Communist bloc on the grounds that they promoted the godless dehumanization of society and were to be identified with Antichrist. Consequently, both were banned in Hitler's Germany.

Brunner made a positive contribution to post-war reconstruction through his book Justice and the Social Order (London, 1945), which discussed both the principles and the practice of justice at different levels of society. That this dogmatic theologian also concerned himself with practical issues sprang from his conviction that dogmatics and ethics are inextricably linked both in the NT and in proclamation and in Christian experience.

Bibliography

J. E. Humphrey, Emil Brunner (Peabody, 1991); C. W. Kegley (ed.), The Theology of Emil Brunner (New York, 1962).

C. A. BAXTER

BUBER, MARTIN (1878–1965)

Grandson of the famous Midrash scholar Solomon Buber, philosopher, theologian, Zionist and lover of the pietistic, messianic Hasidim, Buber's influence on *Judaism and Christianity is enormous.

Jews will think of Buber in three areas:

Hasidism. This movement of ultra-orthodox and mystical Judaism was founded in the eighteenth century and had its base in Eastern Europe. Buber's youthful contact with Hasidic communities led, in his adult years, to his editing the Tales of the Hasidim and other works telling the legends and beliefs of the Hasidim. His love for Hasidic communities brought him to see the importance of community witness whereby the life of Israel should permeate the Gentile world. He noted the formative Jewish influence on Christianity, Islam and Marxism. He saw Israel as the 'gateway of the nations', fusing the spirit of the East and West in fruitful reciprocity.

Zionism. Buber became a Zionist at university and later edited the paper Die Welt (The World). During both World Wars he laboured tirelessly for Jews under German occupation. Having supported Jewish colonies in Palestine all his life, he migrated to Israel in 1938, where he was Professor of Social Philosophy in Jerusalem. As a *Zionist, he advocated 'peace and brotherhood with the Arab people'.

The Bible. Buber dedicated himself to the translation of the Hebrew Scriptures into German for German-speaking Jews. Ironically, his translation is now mainly used by Gentile Christians, the community for which it was intended having been largely exterminated. His biblical studies led also to a significant work on The Kingship of God as well as the books Moses and The Prophetic Faith.

Christians will know Buber best for his book I and Thou and for his work on dialogue. Both spring from the influence of *existentialism in the 1920s. Supported by Hasidic teaching that there is good in all things, Buber stressed the need for 'education', which unfolds what is in man, rather than 'propaganda'. He taught the need for an I-Thou relationship of love and appreciative understanding, not the proselytizing I-It confrontation which uses the other approach. But in his Writings on the Dialogue Principle, he also maintains that 'dialogue does not mean a mutual relativization of convictions, but the acceptance of the other as a person'.

The influence of Buber's I-Thou thought spread through Emil *Brunner to such 'Christian presence' thinkers as Max Warren (1904–77) and John V. Taylor (1914–2001). He also played a formative part in the unfolding of Christian thought on dialogue and proselytization. But in this context it should be noted that Buber steadily upheld the calling of Israel to bring salvation to the nations.

Bibliography

Works: Tales of the Hasidim (New York, 1947); On Judaism (New York, 1967); I and Thou (New York, 1970).

Studies: M. L. Diamond, Martin Buber, Jewish Existentialist (New York, 1968); M. Friedman, Martin Buber: The Life of Dialogue (Chicago, 1955); idem, Martin Buber's Life and Work, 3 vols. (New York, 1981–8); D. J. Moore, Martin Buber: Prophet of Religious Secularism (New York, 1996); M. Zank (ed.), New Perspectives on Martin Buber (Tübingen, 2006).

M. F. GOLDSMITH

BUCER (BUTZER), MARTIN (1491–1551)

A native of Sélestat in Alsace, Bucer (or Butzer) became a Dominican (1506), but Alsatian *humanism prepared him first for *Erasmus and then *Luther, who captivated him at the Heidelberg disputation in 1518. He left the cloister, was married in 1522 and excommunicated, and took refuge in Strasbourg (1523), where he soon became the leader of reform.

Bucer was prominently involved in the Protestant Supper-strife (see *Eucharist). After supporting the approach of *Zwingli and *Oecolampadius, he formulated a mediating (South German) position from c. 1528, insisting that Luther and Zwingli were fighting merely about words. Strasbourg did not at first subscribe to the *Augsburg Confession (1530), submitting instead, in the interests of Protestant concord, the Tetrapolitan Confession. Eventually Bucer and *Melanchthon reached agreement on the Eucharist in the Wittenberg Concord (1536). While unhappy with some Lutheran formulae, Bucer stressed that even unworthy believers (but not rank unbelievers) partake by faith of the true (real) presence of Christ's body and blood, presented and conveyed (exhibere) by and with the elements in a 'sacramental union'. Not all applauded Bucer's almost scholastic facility in formulating agreed statements. This applied also to his efforts with Melanchthon to negotiate doctrinal accord with Catholics in Germany (c. 1540). Provisional agreement on justification was reached at Regensburg in 1541. In pursuit of consensus, Bucer made much of the pure unity of the early church.

The strength of Bucer's theology lay in his ecclesiology. He was more deeply committed than Luther to the ordered life of a community renewed according to the biblical pattern and marked by mutual love and service in the Spirit. The civil authorities had, in his view, an important role in religious reform. His insistence on church *discipline reflected in part his responsiveness to some of the demands of Strasbourg's numerous Radical Reformers (see *Reformation, Radical). On this and other issues (e.g. the four orders of ministry, the ordering of worship, congregational singing, education), *Calvin learned much at Strasbourg (1538–41), and Bucer's vision of a reformed *church and a Christian society found fuller realization in Geneva and elsewhere than proved possible in Strasbourg.

So strong was Bucer's emphasis on spiritual renewal that he could acknowledge a twofold *justification. True faith, which he defined as a sure persuasion, was always 'active through love' (Gal. 5:6). He was more disposed than Luther and Calvin to speak of free will in the unregenerate.

Bucer's last years (1548–51) were spent in exile, chiefly as regius professor in Cambridge. There he influenced the Book of Common Prayer (1552), and *English Reformers such as John Bradford (c. 1510–55), Matthew Parker (1504–75) and John Whitgift (c. 1530–1604). He produced for Edward VI a remarkable blueprint for a Christian England, The Kingdom of Christ, and, as one of the Reformation's ablest expositors, contributed to the shaping of the English exegetical tradition.

See also: REFORMATION THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

Works: Collected edition in progress: German (Gutersloh, 1960–); Latin (Paris, 1954–5; Leiden, 1982–); Correspondence (Leiden, 1979–). In ET, selections in: D. F. Wright, Common Places of Martin Bucer (Appleford, 1972); W. Pauck (ed.), Melanchthon and Bucer, LCC 19 (London, 1970).

Studies: H. Eells, Martin Bucer (New Haven, 1931); W. P. Stephens, The Holy Spirit in the Theology of Martin Bucer (London, 1970); D. F. Wright, Martin Bucer: Reforming Church and Community (Cambridge, 1994).

D. F. WRIGHT

BUDDHISM AND CHRISTIANITY

'The Buddha' is not a name but a Sanskrit word meaning 'enlightened one', or 'one who is awake to everything that is going on around him'. This title is used for Siddhattha (personal name) Gotama (clan name) after his alleged enlightenment at the age of thirty-five. Each world and period of time has a Buddha, a being who discovers the Dharma (true nature of all things) by himself and reaches out to help humankind toward liberation from *suffering. The way of liberation taught by Siddhattha, the Buddha of our time, will one day become overgrown as humankind abandons appropriate living. A new Buddha will then emerge and rediscover the Dharma. This next Buddha is referred to as Metteyya, and Siddhattha (sometimes referred to as the historical Buddha) predicted he would come 5,000 years after his passing away.

Siddhattha Gotama was born around 480 BC in Lumbini, in present-day Nepal. His father, Shuddhodhana, often referred to in Mahayama Buddhism as Shakyamunit, was a leading nobleman of the Shakya tribe. His mother, Maya, died seven days after his birth, and his mother's sister later married Shuddhodhana and brought up Siddhattha.

An astrologer called Asita went to visit his father five days after the child's birth. Observing physical marks of a future Buddha on Siddhattha, he said that the child would become either a great monarch or an enlightened being. He added that if Siddhattha saw what life was really like for ordinary people, then he would forsake palace life and seek spiritual enlightenment. The father kept his son within the palace, surrounded him with luxury and pleasure and hoped that he would become a great warrior. Siddhattha did, however, have exposure to the outside world and saw the sufferings of ordinary people. This led him at the age of twenty-nine to leave his wife (Yashodhara) and young son (Rahula) in order to become a mendicant. His quest was to strive after truth, in particular the cause and cure of suffering, through the traditional mendicant's disciplines of thinking, exchanging ideas, meditation, asceticism and the practice of yoga.

After five years Siddhattha went through an intense and extended experience when he allegedly became enlightened and able to recall his previous existences and the reincarnations of world systems. He gained insight into what is known as the Four Noble Truths:

- Suffering (dukkha), a reality for all sentient beings, is unhappiness, a lack of satisfaction due to the changing nature of existence.
- The cause of suffering is our craving and thirst (tanha).
- Suffering can be reduced and eradicated by stopping our craving and striving.
- The way leading to the cessation of suffering, or enlightenment, nirvana, is following the Middle Way, also known as the Eight-Fold Path.

The initial response of the Buddha (as he should now be referred to) was not to teach the Dharma, since it would be difficult for people to understand and accept it. Yet out of compassion he began to teach. His first sermon, The Discourse of Setting the Wheel [of the Dharma] in Motion, was in the Deer Park, near Benares, to the five ascetics he had trained with prior to his enlightenment. The Buddha and the five ascetics, who one by one became enlightened, travelled around as monks (bhikkhus) teaching the Dharma and the extinguishing of suffering, and modelling good behaviour. They were offered food, basic medicines and robes by lay supporters, who viewed this as part of their spiritual practice. The community of monks were referred to as the sangha, and in time developed rules for monastic behaviour (vinaya). Five years after the monastic order was established, an order of nuns (bhikkhunis) began. The Buddha passed away (parinirvana) at the age of eighty without appointing a successor, since he expected the monks to be instructed by the Dharma and to adhere to monastic discipline.

What does a Buddhist believe?

An essential feature of Buddhism is taking refuge in the 'Triple Gem': that is, respect/devotion for the Buddha, appreciation for the Dharma, the ultimate truth of everything, and respect for the sangha, the community of practising Buddhists (sometimes the monks alone).

A Buddhist will keep the Five Precepts. Viewed positively, these are important rules for character development. Indeed, each precept begins with 'I undertake the rule of training to abstain from (I) harming living beings; (II) "taking what is not given"; (III) misconduct concerning sense pleasures [generally understood to mean no illicit sex]; (IV) false speech and (V) unmindful states due to alcoholic drink or drugs' (P. Harvey, An Introduction to Buddhism, p. 199). Buddhists may well attend temples on holy days; these occur on the new, full and the two quarter phases of the moon. On these occasions, and at retreats, the Five Precepts are often increased to Eight Precepts.

The Eight-Fold Path is central to the Buddhist belief system. When the Middle Way is followed at the higher level, then it will ultimately lead to nirvana, the cessation of suffering. The path is first followed at the ordinary or mundane level. This generates merit and leads to good rebirths; this is sometimes described as karmic Buddhism. The Buddhist may then experience the true nature of things, entering the Dharma stream, and follow the Path at the supra-mundane level. The Path is then referred to as the Noble Eight-Fold Path. There are eight interconnected aspects to the Path regardless of whether it is followed at the ordinary or the higher level. They are as follows: (1) right view or understanding of the nature of reality; (2) right intention to follow the teachings of the Buddha for one's own eventual liberation but also for the benefit of others; (3) right speech – to be truthful, accurate and gentle with one's words; (4) right action – keeping the rules of training, e.g. the Five Precepts; (5) right livelihood – an occupation which brings suffering is an unskilful way of making a living; (6) right effort – working hard to purify the mind as this determines who we become; (7) right mindfulness – being aware of how we cause ourselves and others to suffer, and working with mindfulness as this leads to a safer and more efficient working environment; (8) right concentration – achieved through meditation which expands the mind, enabling it to move beyond its conditioning, bringing insight into reality.

Karma is a key Buddhist doctrine; it is moral cause and effect – action and reaction. It is viewed by Buddhists as a natural law like the law of gravity. Actions have to be intentional if they are to generate karmic fruit. Bad karmic fruit, for example, is not generated if one accidentally hurts someone else. Karma should not be thought of as a reward or punishment by a deity, as there is no god in Buddhism; it is simply the working out of a principle, or law.

A moment passes away and does not leave anything but an impression which is picked up by the next moment. Within this ‘impression’ is a trace of all that has gone before in terms of karmic action. This trace may be seen as determining our next moment. The rebirth process (transfer from one life to the next) is similar to the transfer of an impression from moment to moment. Karmic seed (intentional action whether skilful or unskilful) is passed on and becomes karmic fruit in the future. Karma, then, determines the location/state of our rebirth. Thus, we continue to be reborn until the fires of greed, hatred and delusion are extinguished and we become enlightened, entering the state of nirvana. A person who reaches this stage will not be reborn.

Two major schools of Buddhism may be distinguished. Theravada Buddhism emphasizes the solitary life of religious discipline, but Mahayana Buddhism, founded by the philosopher Nagarjuna, puts more emphasis on the life of compassion and reveres the bodhisattva, the sage who delays nirvana until all are saved from suffering and rebirth.

Four basic dissonances between Buddhism and Christianity

First, in Buddhism, salvation (defined as liberation from suffering) is achieved through attending to the Eight-Fold Path. While some confidence and faith are placed in one’s teachers, the ability to liberate one’s self lies within. When Christians attempt to show Buddhists that *salvation is all of God, it can create the impression that spiritual discipline and good deeds are unnecessary.

Secondly, Christians define *sin as lack of conformity to God’s moral will. In Buddhism, there is no god or law giver. The Buddha showed people an overgrown path, which, if followed, will lead to liberation. Buddhists view ‘sin’ as unskilful action based on a misunderstanding of reality (ignorance). This unenlightened behaviour causes suffering.

Thirdly, many Buddhists believe that this world of suffering is the effect of a bad cause. If a god created it, he may have had great power but was not a compassionate and wise being. Ignorance could only be responsible for this world of suffering from which we must all escape. Christians attest that a loving and powerful God devolves genuine moral choice to humankind. Suffering is a corollary of selfish choices.

Fourthly, knowledge of ultimate reality for a Buddhist is gained from living a morally upright life and listening to Buddhist teachers. Primarily, however, meditation, the developing and purifying of the mind which leads to knowing truth, is the key to advancement. For the Christian, what we need to know is revealed by God in our prayerful engagement with the Christian Scriptures.

See also: CHRISTIANITY AND OTHER RELIGIONS.

Bibliography

D. Cush, Buddhism (London, 1993), a highly accessible introduction; J. R. Davis, The Path to Enlightenment: Introducing Buddhism (London, Sydney and Auckland, 1977), contains some Christian perspectives on and responses to Buddhism; P. Harvey, An Introduction to Buddhism (Cambridge and New York, 1990); C. Prebish and D. Keown, Introducing Buddhism (New York and Abingdon, 2006).

R. MACKENZIE

BULGAKOV, SERGEI (1871–1944)

Sergei Bulgakov was born in 1871, the son of a Russian priest. As a young man, he lost his faith and graduated from Moscow University with a doctorate in economics, having become a convinced Marxist. After the failure of the 1905 revolution, he, along with other members of the intelligentsia, gradually found his way back to the Russian Orthodox Church, and was a lay member of the 1917–18 synod, or Sobor, that restored the patriarchate and sought to reform the church, but was cut short by the Communist Revolution of 1918. In that year he accepted ordination as a priest. In 1922, as one of the intellectuals deemed of no use to the new Communist state, he was expelled from Russia, and after a short time in Prague, arrived in Paris in 1925. He became Professor of Dogmatic Theology, and then Dean, of the newly founded Institut St-Serge, where he remained until his death in 1944.

Bulgakov's earliest writings were on economics, though gradually economics became for him an understanding of the way the human shared in God's care for his creation, and so exercised both a divine role in relation to the created order and also as human became a kind of priest of nature. This interest in what one might call the 'interface' between God and his creation Bulgakov came to pursue through the notion of the divine wisdom or sophia, a notion based on the wisdom literature in the Bible (Proverbs and the Wisdom of Solomon), developed by the Church Fathers (see *Patristic theology; *Wisdom in early Christology), celebrated in Christian liturgy, especially in relation to the virgin Mother of God, and given modern form in the works of Vladimir Solov'ev, an enormous influence on the Russian Christian intelligentsia. This 'sophiology', as he called it, was controversial, especially among conservative elements reacting against the Russian revolution, and he was condemned in the early 1930s, though exonerated by the Russian jurisdiction to which he belonged.

In Paris, he became one of the most articulate voices of the Russian diaspora and sought to communicate the insights of *Russian Orthodoxy to the Western Christian world that had welcomed him. He was deeply committed to Christian ecumenism. In exile, he wrote voluminously, including two great theological trilogies: a smaller one between 1927 and 1929, and a larger one, On Godmanhood, begun in 1933 and still incomplete at his death.

Bibliography

Works: The small trilogy: The Burning Bush (1927), The Friend of the Bridegroom (1927; ET, Grand Rapids, 2003), Jacob's Ladder (1929); The great trilogy: The Lamb of God (1933, ET, 2008), The Comforter (1936; ET, Grand Rapids, 2004), The Bride of the Lamb (1945; ET, Grand Rapids, 2002).

Studies: A. Nichols, Wisdom from Above: A Primer in the Theology of Father Sergei Bulgakov (Leominster, 2005); R. Williams, Sergii Bulgakov: Towards a Russian Political Theology (Edinburgh, 1999).

BULLINGER, JOHANN HEINRICH (1504–75)

Born at Bremgarten, Switzerland, the son of the parish priest, Bullinger was educated at Emmerich, then Cologne, where he studied the Fathers, felt the impact of *Erasmus, *Luther and *Melancthon, and commenced a direct investigation of the NT. Back in Switzerland in 1522, he lived in Bremgarten, lectured at Kappel, and took courses at Zurich, where he supported *Zwingli and was elected a delegate to the Berne Disputation. Ordained in 1528, he ministered at Bremgarten, marrying a former nun in 1529.

The defeat at Kappel (1531) forced him into refuge at Zurich, and here, rejecting offers from Berne and Basel, he succeeded Zwingli as virtual leader of church life in both city and canton. He remained in this post until his death, exercising a quietly effective pastoral ministry, strengthening fellowship with other churches, and entertaining refugees, especially Anglican exiles under Mary, such as John *Jewel (1522–71).

In addition to his regular duties, Bullinger carried through an extensive literary programme; he himself collected his chief writings into ten volumes. Prominent among his works are commentaries, polemical treatises against the *Anabaptists and Lutherans, doctrinal writings on the *Eucharist and Scripture, sermons on the Christian sacrifice and the Lord's Supper, a diary, and a history of the Reformation. Of special interest to *Anglicans are the Decades, five books of ten sermons each on the heads of Christian doctrine which, by Archbishop Whitgift's order in 1586, became prescribed reading for the English clergy in an effort to meet Puritan protests against scholarly inadequacy.

More important, perhaps, than the academic labours were Bullinger's confessional contributions, which began in 1536 when, with *Bucer and Leo Jud (1482–1542), he drew up the First Helvetic Confession (see *Confessions of Faith) in a futile attempt to reach agreement with the Lutherans. Irenically disposed, Bullinger achieved greater ecumenical success in 1549, for in that year, after discussions with Calvin, the Consensus Tigurinus (Zurich Consensus), consisting of twenty-six articles on the sacraments, united Zurich and other German-speaking Swiss churches with Geneva and Neuchâtel. Bullinger's crowning confessional achievement came in 1566 when, at the request of the elector Palatine, he issued a statement of beliefs which, commonly known as the Second Helvetic Confession, found wide acceptance in Switzerland, France, Scotland, Hungary, Poland and the Netherlands as well as Germany.

Noteworthy among Bullinger's emphases in both his writings and his confessions are his commitment to the *creeds, his regard for the Fathers, and his conviction that the Reformation was restoration, not innovation. In the tradition of Zwingli, creeds and Fathers remain subordinate to the word of God in its threefold form as incarnate, spoken and written. The Spirit's role in the interpretation as well as the inspiration of Scripture receives attention, although not at the expense of scholarly, if prayerful, exegesis. Bullinger maintained Zwingli's position on the baptismal *covenant, but added positive insights to the more negative eucharistic teaching. His presentation of election had an interesting Christological focus. He shared common *Reformation views on such matters as *justification, *atonement, church and papacy. His position on *adiaphora and on church-state relations brought him into sympathy with early Elizabethan Anglican church leaders against their Puritan critics.

Bibliography

Works: F. Büsler et al. (eds.), Works (Zurich, 1972–c. 92); ET selections in G. W. Bromiley (ed.), Zwingli and Bullinger (London, 1953); T. Harding (ed.), The Decades of Henry Bullinger, 5 vols. (Cambridge, 1849–52);

Studies: J. W. Baker, Heinrich Bullinger and the Covenant (Athens, 1981); E. Campi and P. Opitz (eds.), Heinrich Bullinger: Life, Thought, Influence (Zurich, 2007); B. Gordon and E. Campi (eds.), Architect of Reformation: An Introduction to Heinrich Bullinger, 1504–1575 (Grand Rapids, 2004); D. J. Keep, Henry Bullinger and the Elizabethan Church, unpub. diss. (University of Sheffield, 1970); C. P. Venema, Heinrich Bullinger and the Doctrine of Predestination (Grand Rapids, 2002).

G. W. BROMILEY

BULTMANN, RUDOLF (1884–1976)

NT scholar and theologian, influential most especially through his work on the existentialist interpretation of the Christian faith. After studying at Tübingen, Berlin and Marburg, Bultmann taught at Breslau, and from 1921 to 1951 was professor of NT at Marburg. His theology is expounded in his Theology of the New Testament, in a variety of studies of NT and theological issues, in his various collections of essays, and in his large-scale commentary The Gospel of John.

Bultmann's basic proposals about existentialist interpretation were conceived early in his theological development, although the terminology of '*kerygma' and '*myth' did not emerge until late in the 1930s. For Bultmann, the interpretation of the NT involves 'demythologizing', i.e. a proper interpretation of the mythological language in which its kerygma or message about human existence is couched. 'Myth' is a flexible term in Bultmann's usage, but most commonly denotes 'objectifying' language. Such language projects reality 'out there', speaking of it as an object essentially unrelated to human self-understanding and existence. To 'demythologize' the biblical writings is not to eliminate their mythology while retaining some non-mythological material: such selectivity Bultmann criticized in the attempts of some nineteenth-century liberal theologians to disentangle Jesus' moral teaching from his eschatology, for example. Demythologizing is rather a process of interpreting mythology consistently, in terms of the understanding of human existence which it articulates. Thus, for example, to demythologize creation myths is not to repudiate them as untrue, but to interpret them as objectified expressions of man's understanding of himself as *contingent.

To some extent, demythologizing is an *apologetic exercise, seeking to distinguish between the Christian faith and an obsolete supernatural worldview in which it finds expression and which is no longer available to us. But philosophical and theological factors are more determinative upon Bultmann's programme than such considerations. Bultmann drew heavily on the work of his Marburg colleague Martin *Heidegger, whose book Being and Time (1927) is one of the fundamental texts of German *existentialism. Heidegger's analysis of human existence in that book was especially influential over the question of man as a subject within *history, whose selfhood is not the expression of a pre-given nature but rather created in historical acts of decision and choice. This sense of man as 'history' rather than 'nature', which surfaces in Bultmann's treatment of theological *anthropology in his Theology of the New Testament, was bound up with the further influence of the Marburg Neo-Kantian philosophy of Hermann Cohen (1842–1918) and Paul Natorp (1854–1924), with its radical dualism of ‘fact’ and ‘value’. These philosophical influences are, however, absorbed within what is essentially a theological project. Behind the programme of demythologizing lies a tradition within nineteenth-century Lutheranism according to which knowledge of objective facts constitutes human ‘works’, that is, the attempt to secure the self against encounter with God by a codified account of the divine being and acts. In effect, demythologizing is for Bultmann the *epistemological equivalent of *justification by faith: both meritorious works and objectified knowledge of God are attempts to guarantee the self over against God. Here Bultmann owes a great deal to the turn-of-the-century Lutheran theologian Wilhelm *Herrmann, who laid emphasis on faith as encounter with God in the present rather than as mere assent to objective realities doctrinally described. From this perspective, it should be added, Bultmann’s early attraction to the *dialectical theology of the early *Barth and Friedrich *Gogarten is readily comprehensible, in so far as he, like Barth in The Epistle to the Romans (1919), is rejecting any ground for human security against interruption by God.

This account of demythologizing or ‘de-objectification’ helps account for Bultmann’s radical scepticism about the historicity of the NT records. Along with other early form-critics such as Martin Dibelius (1883–1947), Bultmann concluded in The History of the Synoptic Tradition (1921) that the Gospels contain almost no authentic historical information about Jesus, but rather material shaped and frequently created by the early Christian communities. Bultmann’s theology can support such scepticism, however, precisely because objective historical facts simply constitute ‘knowledge after the flesh’. Real knowledge of Christ is encounter with him in the word of the kerygma as one who summons man now to meaningful existence. Bultmann thus excises the ‘Jesus of history’ (see *Historical Jesus, quest for) from *Christology; historical interest in the personality and deeds of Jesus both cannot and should not be satisfied, since it merely furnishes the occasion for human evasion of the claim of God by adhering to objective realities. Like Martin *Kähler, whose book The So-Called Historical Jesus and the Historic, Biblical Christ deeply influenced him, Bultmann envisages the concern of Christology to be the ‘Christ of faith’, Christ encountered in believing existence (or, as earlier Protestants would state it, in his benefits), rather than in abstract historical observation.

While Bultmann’s influence on the course of twentieth-century theology and biblical interpretation was immense, subsequent critical scholarship has qualified much of his historical scepticism. Many pupils of Bultmann associated with the so-called ‘New Quest of the Historical Jesus’ (such as E. *Käsemann, E. Fuchs, 1903–83, and G. *Ebeling) have found a stronger historical anchor for the kerygma in the history of Jesus than Bultmann allowed; others have radically criticized his reading of the influence of *Gnosticism and *Hellenism on primitive Christianity.

In systematic theology and philosophy, Bultmann acutely rephrased some fundamental questions concerning the relation of faith to history and the nature of divine presence and action in a way which remains fundamentally determinative for some contemporary theological reflection. Bultmann consistently attempted to construct a theology in which the question of God and the question of human existence would be inseparable. But because of his theological roots in Lutheranism and the influence of both *dualist and existentialist philosophy, he found acute difficulty in talking of God’s transcendence and his action in history, since he always suspected such talk to be objectifying. Bultmann’s theology is thought by many to lack any ontological reference in its interpretation of the Christian faith, and thus to be radically subjective, translating statements about God into statements about man. However, while this may be true of some followers of Bultmann such as F. Buri (1907–95), Bultmann himself always strove to retain the necessity of talking of God, if only paradoxically: ‘The fact that God cannot be seen or apprehended apart from faith does not mean that he does not exist apart from faith’ (Jesus Christ and Mythology, p. 72).

Along with his close contemporary, Karl Barth, Bultmann decisively reshaped the landscape of Protestant theology in Germany and beyond, and his work continues to set the terms of reference for some theological traditions.

Bibliography

Works: Essays (London, 1955); Existence and Faith (London, 1964); Faith and Understanding (London, 1969); The Gospel of John (Oxford, 1971); History and Eschatology (Edinburgh, 1957); The History of the Synoptic Tradition (London, 1963); Jesus and the Word (London, 1958); Jesus Christ and Mythology (London, 1960); Primitive Christianity (London, 1960); Theology of the New Testament, 2 vols. (London, 1952, 1955).

Studies: H. W. Bartsch (ed.), Kerygma and Myth, 2 vols. (London, 1962, 1964); G. Ebeling, Theology and Proclamation (London, 1966); D. Fergusson, Bultmann (London, 1992); R. A. Johnson, The Origins of Demythologizing (Leiden, 1974); C. W. Kegley (ed.), The Theology of Rudolf Bultmann (London, 1966); J. Macquarrie, An Existentialist Theology (London, 1955); idem, The Scope of Demythologizing (London, 1960); S. M. Ogden, Christ without Myth (London, 1962); H. P. Owen, Revelation and Existence (Cardiff, 1957); R. C. Roberts, Rudolf Bultmann's Theology (London, 1977); J. M. Robinson, A New Quest of the Historical Jesus (London, 1963); W. Schmithals, An Introduction to the Theology of Rudolf Bultmann (London, 1968); A. C. Thiselton, The Two Horizons (Exeter, 1980).

J. B. WEBSTER

BUNYAN, JOHN (1628–88)

A Baptist pastor and author, Bunyan's fame has been chiefly the result of one of his more than sixty books: his masterpiece The Pilgrim's Progress (1678/1684), which had appeared in around 1,300 editions by the late 1930s and has been translated into more than 200 languages.

Bunyan's early years were spent in the village of Elstow, Bedfordshire. After leaving school in the late 1630s with the rudiments of reading and writing, he learned his father's trade of a brazier. At sixteen he joined the New Model Army, in which he served until being discharged in 1647. To what extent Bunyan actually saw action in the English Civil War is disputed. No significant battles were fought near Newport Pagnell, where he was stationed, but the realism of the battle scenes in his later allegory The Holy War (1682) has led some scholars to think that he did see fighting.

Bunyan returned home to Elstow, where his reading of *Puritan literature encouraged him to become religious. During the early 1650s, however, he came to the conviction that religiosity is of no salvific value if Christ is absent from the heart. After a lengthy period of profound spiritual torment, recorded in his spiritual autobiography Grace Abounding to the Chief of Sinners (1666), he arrived at a place of spiritual rest in late 1657 or early 1658.

By that time he had been baptized and joined what is probably best described as an open-membership Calvinistic *Baptist church in Bedford, pastored by an ex-Royalist officer named John Gifford (d. 1655). He was soon being asked to speak in front of small groups, to share his testimony and to expand the Scriptures. While preaching in Bedfordshire, he encountered various Quaker missionaries, including George Fox (1624–91). These encounters, in turn, led to his earliest attempts as an author, a series of rebuttals of *Quaker theology.

After the restoration of the monarchy in 1660, Puritan preachers like Bunyan found themselves in trouble with a state that was determined to destroy the political power of the Puritans. On 12 November 1660, Bunyan was arrested as he was about to preach in Lower Samsell, a hamlet near Harlington, Bedfordshire. Tried and convicted under the Elizabethan Conventicle Act of 1593, Bunyan spent the next twelve years in prison. But his imprisonment proved to be the catalyst for developing his gifts as an author. Here he wrote his powerful apology for his nonconformity, I Will Pray with the Spirit (1662), as well as a rebuttal of *antinomianism, Christian Behaviour (1663), and his classic Grace Abounding to the Chief of Sinners, which went through six editions in his lifetime.

Before his release from prison in the spring of 1672, Bunyan had been called as pastor of the Bedford congregation. Almost immediately he plunged into controversy with the publication of A Confession of My Faith (1672), largely a response to closed-communion Baptist critics of his ecclesial practice of allowing Christians who had not been baptized as believers to participate fully in the life of his congregation. This controversy was continued by Bunyan in two further books in 1673–4 and is surely the reason Bunyan was not an influential figure among the Calvinistic Baptists of that era.

Generally speaking, Bunyan embraced the Calvinistic *covenant theology (see *Reformed theology) typical of the Puritan movement. In one key particular, though, the relationship between *faith and *justification, he came to reverse the traditional Puritan perspective and argued that faith is a sign of justification and not its cause (see his Discourse upon the Pharisee and the Publican, 1685). Bunyan's indebtedness to the Reformation, particularly Martin *Luther, is seen in his emphasis that acceptance with God is utterly dependent on God's free grace. Bunyan has sometimes been accused of fostering an unbiblical individualism, for example, in the first part of The Pilgrim's Progress. Although none of his writings elaborates a formal doctrine of the church, his writings frequently reveal his rich sense of the vital importance of communal experience for the Christian's growth (see The Pilgrim's Progress, Part II).

Bunyan's ability to preach out of his spiritual experience made him an extremely popular preacher – his preaching was known to the king, Charles II (r. 1660–85), for example. On a preaching trip to London in August of 1688 Bunyan was soaked to the skin in a heavy rainstorm and subsequently developed a fever from which he died on 31 August, 1688. He was buried in the famous nonconformist cemetery in London, Bunhill Fields.

Bibliography

Works: The Works of John Bunyan, 3 vols., ed. George Offor (Glasgow, 1853–4); The Miscellaneous Works of John Bunyan, 13 vols., eds. R. Sharrock et al. (Oxford, 1976–94); Grace Abounding to the Chief of Sinners, ed. W. R. Owens (Harmondsworth, 1987); The Pilgrim's Progress, ed. W. R. Owens (Oxford and New York, 2003).

Studies: J. Brown, John Bunyan (1628–1688): His Life, Times, and Work, rev. F. M. Harrison (London, 1928); R. L. Greaves, John Bunyan (Abingdon, 1969); idem, Glimpses of Glory: John Bunyan and English Dissent (2001); C. Hill, A Turbulent, Seditious and Factious People: John Bunyan and His Church (Oxford, 1988); N. H. Keeble (ed.), John Bunyan: Conventicle and Parnassus: Tercentenary Essays (Oxford, 1988); G. Wakefield, Bunyan the Christian (London, 1992).

M. A. G. HAYKIN

BUSHNELL, HORACE (1802–76)

Horace Bushnell, graduate of Yale College and Divinity School, was a *New England theologian and the pastor of North Congregational Church in Hartford, Connecticut (1833–59). Though converted in a revival, his most influential work, Christian Nurture (1861), ran counter to America's predominant evangelical ethos. Bushnell argued that children raised in the nurture of a Christian church and family should be taught from an early age to regard themselves as God's children and as part of the church, and should never be taught differently. The thesis provoked controversy from Protestants, who regarded Christian *conversion as the only reliable path to salvation. Bushnell advanced a version of the moral influence theory in his trilogy on the *atonement: God in Christ (1849), The Vicarious Sacrifice (1866), and Forgiveness and Law (1874). He also explored the relationship between faith and *doubt in Nature and the Supernatural (1858). He accepted Jesus' divinity, but held that the Trinity reflected a human way of apprehending God, not God's essential nature. An attempt to try him for heresy on this point was thwarted. Bushnell was a transitional theologian in the mid-nineteenth-century shift toward a more liberal American Protestantism. His collected works first appeared in eleven volumes published from 1876 to 1881.

Bibliography

R. B. Mullin, The Puritan as Yankee: A Life of Horace Bushnell (Grand Rapids, 2002); D. L. Smith, Symbolism and Growth: The Religious Thought of Horace Bushnell (Chico, 1981); H. S. Smith (ed.), Horace Bushnell (New York, 1965).

S. INGERSOL

BUTLER, JOSEPH (1692–1752)

Bishop Butler, 'the philosopher of Anglicanism', was outstanding in his century as a religious *apologist and moral philosopher. His Analogy of Religion constituted the most successful published refutation of *deism. In it, Butler argued that, granted that God is the author of nature, the veracity of Christian revealed religion attains a significant probability. This is because features are contained in it which are analogous to those found in natural religion, as we see when we properly interpret *miracle, prophecy and messianic mediation. Rational probability provides an adequate ground for practical assent to Christianity.

Butler's moral philosophy (see *Moral theology), contained mainly in his sermons, analyses the empirical actualities of human nature and psychology. It contains elements of intuitionism (where something is presented in moral experience as self-evidently right or true), utilitarianism (where moral obligation is directed or related to what produces happiness) and naturalism (where, in this case, behaviour in accordance with one's nature is morally advocated). Theologically, Butler ascribed importance to the role of *conscience in the moral sphere.

While the contemporary climate of discussion in the relevant areas is largely uncongenial to Butler's approach, *Hume's respect for him and the huge acclaim of the following century signal something of his stature as a religious thinker.

Bibliography

J. H. Bernard (ed.), The Works of Bishop Butler, 2 vols. (London, 1900); C. Cunliffe (ed.), Joseph Butler's Moral and Religious Thought: Tercentenary Essays (Oxford, 1992); A. Duncan-Jones, Butler's Moral Philosophy (Harmondsworth, 1952); A. Jeffner, Butler and Hume on Religion: A Comparative Analysis (Stockholm, 1966); D. M. Mackinnon, A Study in Ethical Theory (London, 1957), ch. 5; E. C. Mossner, Bishop Butler and the Age of Reason (New York, 1936); T. Penelhum, Butler (London, 1985).

S. N. WILLIAMS

CALLING

The term translated 'calling' in the NT is used in more than one sense there, and in the history of Christian theology has come to have a great variety of usage. A basic distinction may be drawn between the outward call of the *gospel, through preaching or some other means (e.g. Matt. 22:14), and an inner, personal call, when that message is willingly answered by an individual person (1 Cor. 1:26). That God calls through preaching is hardly a matter of controversy, but the reception of that call, a personal 'calling', has been variously understood. These understandings are largely determined by a set of considerations having to do with the doctrine of *grace.

In *Augustinianism (endorsed by a major tradition of the church and significantly by the Magisterial Reformers [see *Reformation theology], with the possible exception of Melancthon), the inner call is understood to be the result of divine mercy and the energizing work of the *Holy Spirit in illumination and regeneration. It accomplishes God's saving purpose for that person. In this sense the call is 'effectual'. In the account that Augustine provides of his conversion in the Confessions, he puts up enormous resistance to this inner call; nevertheless, God's grace proves invincible. The connection between such an effectual call and bondage to *sin, and then to election, *predestination, the gift of faith and *perseverance in grace can easily be seen. It is part of a monergistic understanding of the teaching of the NT, especially of Rom. 8 and 9, Eph. 1 and John 6.

However, where it is held that the human will has the power freely to cooperate or not with the outward 'call', then the 'inner call' correspondingly weakens in force. It is not unconditionally effectual, but its efficacy is conditioned by a person's freely willed compliance. The response may be aided by divinely provided helps of various kinds, but its independent, unilateral activity is indispensable. Such an understanding is characteristic of *Pelagian, *Semi-Pelagian and *Arminian theologies. A distinction between an outward and an inward call is still preserved, yet the inwardness of the latter is understood in terms of preparing and alluring the person, not energizing her; persuading the living, rather than bringing life to the dead. At the extreme, the call is indistinguishable from the idea that through God's goodness everyone has the same opportunity and innate power to respond. In less extreme versions, God is said to give the grace of faith to those who make good use of some prior grace, and who therefore in some sense 'merit' it. A fundamental principle here is that 'ought implies can'. If a person ought to heed God's call, then he must have the innate power to do so. Such views of calling are synergistic, ineffectual without human cooperation, a case of the divine power in synthesis with human power.

Less centrally, the NT also refers to 'calling' as synonymous with a job or profession or 'place in life' (1 Cor. 7:17-24) (see *Work). In the history of the Christian church such *vocations have been variously estimated. A deepening contrast between the secular and the sacred, and especially the valuing of celibacy, led by the time of the later Middle Ages to the assumption that the priestly vocation and the monastic life were different in kind from any lay activity. The Reformers, with *Luther in the lead, reversed that trend. It was recognized that a worldly calling is legitimate in itself for, though principally concerned with ‘things below’, and not with the ‘things above’ of the kingdom of God, it could nevertheless be undertaken with godly consecration and to the good of human society. In *Calvin such callings – in literature, philosophy, law, science and commerce, for example – are the expression of God’s gifts of ‘general grace’, and arise from his conviction that God’s gifts are not only to be used but also to be enjoyed. It is argued (e.g. by *Weber and Tawney) that such convictions, undergirded by honesty in business and frugality, lie at the heart of the rise of *capitalism.

In *pietism and *fundamentalism, a much sharper, ethical separation is made between the Christian life and the pursuit of an earthly calling, indicating almost a reversion to medieval categories, in which only what is ‘spiritual’ is worthwhile.

Bibliography

P. Helm, The Callings (Edinburgh, 1987); H. R. Niebuhr, Christ and Culture (New York, 1951); R. H. Tawney, Religion and the Rise of Capitalism (Harmondsworth, 1938 [1926]); M. Weber, The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism (London, 1976 [1904]).

P. HELM

CALVIN, JOHN (1509–64)

Calvin was born at Noyon in Picardy, France. He spent much of his youth at school in Paris, being trained for the priesthood. His study of medieval scholastic theology was followed by a period of training for the legal profession, which brought him into touch with the Christian humanism current in France at the time, through teachers such as Lefèvre d’Étaples (1455–1529) and Guillaume Budé (1468–1540). He was greatly attracted by such learning and wrote, as his first work, a commentary on Seneca’s De Clementia. He underwent, however, a ‘sudden conversion’, the date of which is uncertain. The effect of this was to detach his mind from his former studies, as he became more committed to the study of Scripture and the *Reformation teaching. In 1536 he published in Basel the first edition of his Institutes of the Christian Religion. Thereafter, a short and unsuccessful ministry in Geneva was followed by an enriching experience of teaching and pastoral work in Strassburg from 1538 to 1541. Calvin then allowed himself to be recalled to Geneva. There he patiently worked and struggled for many years, seeking to put into practice his beliefs about the gospel, church and society.

When he began his theological work, the Reformation was entering an important second phase in its development. The word of God, under *Luther and others, had powerfully broken through the old forms which had for centuries restricted the *Spirit and obscured the truth. The movement had inspired innumerable sermons, writings, conferences and controversies, and had brought about important changes in social and political life. People had been introduced to new experiences, ideals and hopes. The removal of old restraints, however, had given rise to wild speculations which threatened the dissolution of moral standards and social order.

In the midst of the confusion, Calvin took the lead in defining the new forms of Christian life and *work, of church and community life, which under the newly discovered teaching of the Bible, and the power of the Spirit, were relevant to conditions in Europe in his day. Moreover, he was able to help his contemporaries to attain a clarity of vision and an orderliness in theological thought and expression, which gave them a firmer grasp of the *gospel in its fullness. At the same time, by the power of his preaching, the convincing clarity and simplicity of his teaching, and his practical ability and moral integrity which gave him finally an undisputed leadership in his community, he was conspicuously successful in achieving his aims in his own city-parish. His work in Geneva added greatly to the widespread fame which his writings had already brought him. His whole life-work, therefore, is an important and challenging illustration of how our *theology, if it is healthy, should be related to our life-situation.

Calvin’s theology is a theology of the word of God. He held that the *revelation given to us through Scripture is the only reliable source of our *knowledge of God. Though *nature also reveals God, and all men and women have a natural instinct for *religion, yet our human perversity prevents us from being able to profit from what nature presents to us. We must therefore turn to the witness to revelation given by God to his prophets and servants in the OT, and to the apostolic witness to Christ in the NT. The Scriptures themselves were inspired, and indeed 'dictated' by God. Their statements, stories and truths must be regarded as having infallible *authority.

Calvin believed that there is a basic unity in the teaching of Scripture, and that the theologian must seek to clarify and give expression to this unity in the orderly setting out of its doctrines. As a theologian, he sought to do justice to the whole content of the written word of God.

He also recognized, however, that *Scripture was given to us by God not simply to present us today with truths and doctrines, but also to introduce us to the living revelation to which the written word bears witness. At the heart of this revelation which the apostles and prophets wrote about, there was for them a personal encounter with the Word of God himself, the second person of the *Trinity. Even though they may have been the recipients of truths and doctrines, the biblical witnesses also knew themselves as men before God himself in personal love and majesty. Calvin believed that the theologian, in his approach to Scripture, must seek to find himself, and must regard himself, in this position too. He must therefore seek through the Scripture to be brought into communion and confrontation with the Lord himself, and in giving shape to his theology must take account of all the original events in and through which God revealed himself to his people. Calvin at times uses the language of *mysticism to describe how faith enables us through the word and Spirit to grasp in vision much more than can be comprehended immediately by the understanding. In his approach to Scripture and his theological task, therefore, the prayerful quest for a fuller understanding of what he had already to some extent grasped, and for a closer communion with the living God, also played an important part.

Calvin did not therefore attempt to create a *systematic theology by subjecting the truths of Scripture to any controlling principles of human thought or logic. He tried rather to allow his thinking to be controlled by the whole word which God had spoken in Christ. The order in which he was able to cast his thought was an order which he found in the revelation which impressed itself upon his mind.

Calvin wrote commentaries on nearly all the books of the Bible. These had a vast circulation and are still of great use. He applied the methods of humanistic scholarship to the Bible to find out the exact meaning of the words of a text, and the circumstances of the history involved (see *Hermeneutics). His belief in the authority and integrity of the word meant that while he read the text critically in the sense of discerningly, he never read it critically in the sense of rejecting its teaching. Though he allowed for a text to have various senses, he was sparing in his use of the allegorical method of interpretation. He believed that Christ was present to the people of God in the OT, though the *revelation then given took different forms from that in the NT. He gave a lead in recognizing the use of typology as a clue to understanding the unity of the two testaments. His belief in this unity enabled him to interpret one text by the whole of Scripture. In his exegesis and theological work he always put himself into debt to other scholars. He was especially influenced by *Augustine, and he was a careful student of the Greek as well as of the Latin Fathers. He gave final expression to his theology in the last edition of the Institutes in 1559 (French, 1560). The work is in four parts, following to some extent the order suggested by the Apostles' Creed: Book I, God the Creator; Book II, God the Redeemer; Book III, The Way We Receive the Grace of Christ; Book IV, The Church.

On the doctrine of *God, Calvin avoids discussion of the hidden essence of God (what God is) and confines himself to the biblical teaching on the nature of God (of what kind he is). God himself proclaimed his 'eternity and self-existence' when he uttered his name, 'I am that I am'. Calvin's stress was always on the moral attributes or 'powers' of God. He finds such qualities adequately listed in two specific texts: Exod. 34:6-7 and Jer. 9:24, which dwell especially on his mercy and justice. In his practice, too, in church and civil administration, Calvin tried always to show that God was both 'a just God and a saviour', without one aspect of his goodness cancelling out the other. In discussing the doctrine of God, he does not mention the '*sovereignty of God', which was not always (as some think) a dominating principle in his theology. For him, *glory was a special attribute of God, revealed everywhere in the world, shining out in all his redemptive works, but most fully displayed in the humiliation and *love revealed in the cross. Calvin brings the *Trinity into the centre of his discussion on the nature of God, since revelation admits us into the heart of the mystery of the divine Being himself. Often in his theology Calvin reminds us that God has revealed himself fully in Christ, and that we must turn to no other source than the gospel for our *knowledge of him.

When he discusses how God acts in *providence, we find ourselves often being spoken to pastorally (a characteristic of much of Calvin's theology). He assures us that God is always at work sustaining and guiding the whole of his *creation, and directing the whole course of human history with gracious fatherly concern. The *church and the Christian, however, are under especial care in the hands of God, as Christ was in the hands of God. We are never in the hands of 'fate' or 'chance'. Calvin's discussion of providence presents us with difficulty, however, when he suggests that by a decree of God from the remotest eternity, the plans and wills of people are so governed as to move exactly on the course which he has destined. When he discusses *predestination, he traces the rejection of the non-elect back to this decree of God, which he describes in the Lat. word horribile, 'fearful, awesome'. It is at this point that many today would raise questions, and ask whether Calvin was himself being faithful to the central thrust of his own teaching on God, and whether he was doing justice to the *freedom with which in the Bible God seems to act and react within developing situations. We have to remember that Calvin several times revised his Institutes as he wrote his commentaries, and did not regard his theology as having attained ultimate finality.

In his discussion of the person and work of Christ, Calvin repeated concisely and accurately the teaching of the Church Fathers and councils (see *Christology). He emphasized the mystery concealed in the person of the *mediator, affirming that 'the Son of God descended from heaven in such a way that, without leaving heaven, he willed to be born in the virgin's womb, to go about the earth, to hang upon the cross; yet continuously filled the world even as he had done from the beginning'. Yet he so emphasized at times the limitations and frailty of *Jesus' humanity that he was suspected by some of not believing in his divinity. He realized that we have to try to understand the person of Jesus in terms of the functions he fulfilled rather than in terms of the essence he concealed. He was the first theologian systematically to interpret Christ's work in terms of the threefold office of prophet, priest and king. He stressed the penal element in Christ's sufferings on the *cross, yet he also emphasized the value placed by God on his lifelong obedience, both active and passive, and his sympathetic self-identification with us in our humanity. The *incarnation created a 'holy brotherhood' between him and ourselves so that he might 'swallow up death and replace it with life, conquer sin and replace it with righteousness'.

Discussing how the *fall has affected humanity (see *Anthropology), originally made in the *image of God, Calvin will allow us to use the phrase 'total depravity' only in the sense that no aspect of man's original being or activity has been left unaffected by his *sin. In all our dealings with others, we ourselves must still regard each person as being still in that image, no matter how low he seems to have sunk. There are two spheres in which human life is set by God – the spiritual and the temporal. With regard to spiritual or heavenly matters, humankind has been wholly deprived of all true knowledge and ability. With regard to temporal or earthly activities, the natural man still retains admirable qualities and abilities by which to conduct his manifold human affairs. Calvin admired, for example, the divine light which shone on the ancient heathen lawgivers in forming their legal codes, and he recognized that man has been endowed by God even in his fallen estate with brilliant gifts to adorn his existence, to allow him comfort, a measure of enjoyment and artistic self-expression in his earthly life. Calvin reminded his readers that in creation God has provided for our use not only the things that are necessary to sustain our life, but also many precious and beautiful things which are designed to give us pleasure and enjoyment. In Geneva one of his final achievements was to found an academy where the 'liberal arts and sciences' were taught by teachers trained in humanistic studies. Calvin was, however, concerned that the development and use of such arts and *sciences should be in accordance with the law of God, and that they should be especially used in the service of the word of God and in the furtherance of a stable Christian community.

Calvin sought to continue and complete the work begun by Luther and other Reformers. He frequently re-echoed his predecessors' criticisms of *Rome for denying the common man any place of personal security before a gracious God. Nine chapters of the Institutes were devoted to the doctrine of *justification by *grace alone, and the Christian liberty this involved. Yet Calvin felt called upon by the situation prevailing around him to insist more firmly than had been already done on the importance of *sanctification or repentance, and to define more clearly for his own day the new pattern of Christian living which alone could form a fitting and worthy response to God's grace and call in Christ. Therefore, in the final edition (1559) of his Institutes, he preceded his nine chapters on justification with nine on sanctification or repentance. He thus stressed the fact that there can be no forgiveness without repentance, since both graces flow from our *union with Christ and neither can be prior to the other. He insisted that nothing which Christ suffered or did for us in his redeeming work is of any use if we are not united to him by faith, in order to receive personally from him the grace which he seeks to give us. He taught that this 'mystical union' between us and Christ is a work of the Holy Spirit.

The Christian must not only be united to Christ, but must live in conformity to Christ in his *death and *resurrection. He listens to the imperative command of God: 'Be holy for I am holy', and to the call of the Lord to deny self, take up the cross and follow. Calvin attacks the root of human sin in self-love, and shows that self-denial can alone be the basis of outgoing love to all people. He urges the triumphal acceptance of every form of *suffering to conform us to the image of Christ. Each of us gives obedient expression to our Christian faith as we pursue our earthly *vocation. We are meant to enjoy and use the earthly benefits which God often showers upon us as we pursue our path in life, yet even in such enjoyment we must remain detached, aspiring always towards the life to come, of which even now we enjoy some foretaste.

Calvin's desire to help the individual to live the *Christian life with full assurance led him to give due place to the doctrine of predestination in his discussion. He believed that no Christian could be finally victorious and confident unless he had some sense of his election to salvation. He believed that while Scripture taught this doctrine, it also pointed out that those who refused to believe must be predestined to damnation (see *Judgment). Attacks on his writing on this matter forced him to defend himself in several treatises on the subject. We must not imagine, however, that this was the central doctrine in his theology. It is significant that next to his chapters on predestination in the Institutes Calvin places his magnificent chapter on *prayer, in which we are urged to exercise our free *will in intercession before God and in seeking answers to the prayers we make.

A large section of the Institutes deals with the *church and its *ministry. Calvin was concerned that the form of ministry within the church, especially by the pastor, should reflect Christ's own ministry of utter humility, concern for each individual and faithfulness to the truth exercised in the power of the Spirit. He was concerned with instruction, *discipline and poor-relief. Therefore, along with the pastor in the ministry, he believed God had placed teachers or 'doctors' (experts in Scripture and theology), elders and deacons. He found such offices indicated in Scripture, but he did not insist that every detail of the church's ordered life required explicit scriptural warrant. He admired the *development of doctrine and *liturgy during the first six centuries of the church's life and had no hesitation in reproducing features of this development. He believed that the 'bishop' of the NT and the early church corresponded to the pastor of a congregation in a truly reformed church. All ceremonies in the church must be simple and clearly intelligible and justifiable in the light of Scripture. He believed that the second commandment forbade not only the use of images in worship, but also the invention of ceremonies merely to stimulate religious emotion. He encouraged congregational singing, but felt that musical instruments gave too uncertain a sound to be the accompaniment of rational *worship.

Calvin followed Augustine in regarding a *sacrament as a visible sign of an invisible grace. Only *baptism and the Lord's Supper (see *Eucharist) were sacraments with dominical authority. He denounced the doctrine of transubstantiation and the idea that a sacrament was efficacious by virtue of its merely being performed as a ritual. He also rejected the view that the bread and wine were given by Christ as mere symbols representing his body and blood, meant simply to stimulate our memory, devotion and faith. The sacraments give what they represent, he insisted. We are not asked by the Lord merely to look, but to eat and drink. This is a sign that between him and us there is a life-giving union (in relation to which Calvin even uses the word ‘substantial’). This union is given and created when the word is preached and responded to by faith; it is also increased and strengthened when the sacrament is received by faith. Calvin rejected current *Lutheran explanations of this mystery of the efficacy of the sacrament. He often stated that the body of Christ, on which we feed, remains in heaven, and our souls are raised there by the wonderful power of the Spirit to feed upon him. Calvin insisted that a sacrament was inefficacious apart from the faith of the recipient. He justified the *baptism of infants by his view of the unity of the old and new covenants, and by urging that the efficacy of a sacrament need not be tied to the moment of its administration.

The relationship between church and *state was an acute issue in Calvin’s lifetime. His struggle in Geneva involved him in a determined stand against attempts by the civil authority to interfere in matters relating to church discipline, which he felt should be entirely under the control of a specifically ecclesiastical court. He had a high view of the state, and stressed the duty of citizens to obey the law and to give honour to their rulers. He also stressed the duty of rulers to care, like shepherds, for each of their subjects. He advised obedience even to tyrants, and the acceptance of unjust suffering rather than the resort to revolutionary plotting. Yet he believed that a tyrant could be overthrown by the deliberate action of a justly constituted lower authority within a state, or by an ‘avenger’ from elsewhere raised up and elected by God.

See also: REFORMED THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

Works: Institutes of the Christian Religion, tr. F. L. Battles, ed. J. T. McNeill, 2 vols. (London, 1961); Commentaries on the NT, tr. and ed. by D. W. Torrance and T. F. Torrance, 12 vols. (Edinburgh, 1959–72); H. Beveridge and J. Bonnet (eds.), Selected Works of John Calvin: Tracts and Letters (Grand Rapids, 1983 reprint).

Studies: F. L. Battles, Analysis of the Institutes of the Christian Religion of John Calvin

(Grand Rapids, 1980); B. Gordon, Calvin (New Haven, 2009); A. N. S. Lane, A Reader’s Guide to Calvin’s Institutes (Grand Rapids, 2009); D. K. McKim (ed.), The Cambridge Companion to John Calvin (Cambridge, 2004); R. A. Muller, Calvin and the Reformed Tradition: On the Work of Christ and the Order of Salvation (Grand Rapids, 2012); M. A. Mullett, John Calvin (London, 2011); T. H. L. Parker, Calvin’s New Testament Commentaries (Edinburgh, 1993); C. Partee, The Theology of John Calvin (Louisville, 2008); H. J. Selderhuis (ed.), The Calvin Handbook (Cambridge, 2009); F. Wendel, Calvin: The Origins and Development of His Religious Thought (London, 1963).

R. S. WALLACE

CALVINISM, see REFORMED THEOLOGY

CALVINISTIC METHODISM

Calvinistic Methodism was the product of the eighteenth-century evangelical awakening in England and Wales. Its chief representatives were George *Whitefield and Daniel Rowland (1713–90). Its theology found expression in their sermons, in the prose and poetical works of William Williams of Pant-y-celyn (1717–91), and in the *Confession of Faith which appeared in 1823 from the Welsh Calvinistic Methodists.

It can be described as theology for the heart, giving expression to a mainline Calvinism within an experimental and practical framework. It drew heavily and heartily on earlier *Puritanism, and yet shared unashamedly the individual pietism of contemporary (*Arminian) *Methodism. As such, it confessed a biblical authority for matters of faith and conduct, and a trinitarian, *Protestant and *evangelical faith.

The distinctives of Calvinistic Methodism lie in the prominence given to the *Holy Spirit’s influences in man’s salvation, and in the experimental ethos of its soul culture. Light and life, holiness and love, submission to the divine will and the realization of human dignity, were to be held in biblical balance. They were also to be enjoyed and nurtured in the disciplined context of warm but heart-searching fellowship or ‘society’ meetings.

In England, Calvinistic Methodism waned after the passing of Whitefield, but in Wales it remained vigorous for another century. It did so for two main reasons: able leadership from men like Thomas Charles ('of Bala', 1755–1814) and John Elias ('of Anglesey', 1774–1841), and repeated, powerful revivals. The Calvinistic passion for order later spilled over into church polity as well, determining for Welsh Calvinistic Methodism a place among the *Presbyterian family. *Liberalism and *ecumenism in the twentieth century contributed to the decline of Calvinistic Methodist theology.

Bibliography

E. Evans, Daniel Rowland and the Great Evangelical Awakening in Wales (Edinburgh, 1985); idem, Howel Harris (Cardiff, 1974); idem, 'The Confession of Faith of the Welsh Calvinistic Methodists', Journal of the Hist. Soc. of the Presb. Church of Wales 59, 1974, pp. 2–11; G. T. Hughes, Williams Pantycelyn (Cardiff, 1983); D. M. Lloyd-Jones, 'William Williams and Welsh Calvinistic Methodism', The Manifold Grace of God (The Puritan and Reformed Studies Conference) (London, 1968); W. Williams, Welsh Calvinistic Methodism (Bridgend, 1998 [1884]).

E. EVANS

CAMBRIDGE PLATONISTS

At the beginning of the seventeenth century, much Protestant theology was closely interwoven with *Aristotelian philosophy. *Puritan commitment to a reasoned faith and a liveable theology, English interest in the Fathers and dissatisfaction with the aridity of theological systems led a group of scholars in Cambridge to restate theology in a *Platonic mode which emphasized the *deification of the believer.

While cherishing many previous insights, the Cambridge Platonists sought the fundamentals of authentic Christianity outside the *Augustinian tradition. Their reading of Plato, Plotinus and Fathers such as *Origen gave them new perspectives and optimism about the role of reason. 'Our reason is not confounded by our Religion, but awakened, excited, employed, directed and improved' (Benjamin Whichcote, 1609–83). Whichcote, Henry More (1614–87), Ralph Cudworth (1617–88) and John Smith (1618–52) were the leaders of this movement. They rejected the dominant *Reformed theology of the Church of England. At times they were accused of *Socinianism because of their critique of Protestant orthodoxy, their commitment to *toleration, their plea for essentials and their insistence on the inseparable connection between truth and holiness. They were not, however, interested in theological reductionism, but sought to ground faith securely in a more adequate *metaphysic, which safeguarded the heart of Christianity from the fanaticism of enthusiasts and the misunderstanding of materialist philosophers such as Thomas Hobbes (1588–1679). Their optimism about an alliance between revelation and reason was not uncritical. More was initially an admirer of *Descartes, but he saw Descartes less and less as an ally and had rejected him by 1671.

In books such as Cudworth's The True Intellectual System of the Universe (1678) they sought to uphold a spiritual account of reality against *determinism and *materialism. The complexity of their thought limited their influence to this field, but their theology of *creation provided the context for their account of Christ as the one who enlivened the divine seed within us and moulded us into the divine likeness. Their striking aphorisms were more easily remembered than their subtle and detailed arguments about the spiritual and rational.

While they gave an impressive account of the reality of the soul, they did not always do justice to human sinfulness and the insights of Protestant soteriology. They provided an important alternative to Puritan denigration of natural reason and virtue. The letters between Whichcote and Anthony Tuckney (1599–1670) brought out sharply the extent of the differences between Platonist and Puritan. The group's academic and religious stature provided important ingredients for the restatement of English theology after 1660, helping to create a more generous and tolerant spirit. Unfortunately, some of their admirers lacked the depth of their mentors. The resulting *latitudinarianism could sometimes pass readily into *deism. Nevertheless, they shared the creative power of partnership between revelation and reason. Their emphasis on God's love and rationality provided a vital alternative to the doctrine of God in the *Westminster Confession. They made lasting contributions to ethical reflection, as well as exploring contemporary philosophical and scientific issues with an authority and insight that is all too rare among theologians.

Their style of writing often makes them difficult for modern readers, but they represent one of the high points of the English theological tradition.

Bibliography

G. R. Cragg, The Cambridge Platonists (Oxford, 1968); C. A. Patrides, The Cambridge Platonists (London, 1969); J. D. Roberts, From Puritanism to Platonism in Seventeenth Century England (The Hague, 1968).

2004), pp. 112–134; D. E. Harrell, Quest for a Christian America (Nashville, 1966); R. T. Hughes, Reviving the Ancient Faith (Grand Rapids, 1996); S. C. Pearson, 'Alexander Campbell', in M. G. Toulouse and J. O. Duke (eds.), Makers of Christian Theology in America (Nashville, 1977), pp. 222–227; R. Richardson, Memoirs of Alexander Campbell, 2 vols. (Philadelphia, 1868).

S. INGERSOL

I. BREWARD

CAMPBELL, ALEXANDER (1788–1866)

Alexander Campbell led a movement to restore primitive Christianity. Born in County Antrim, Ireland, he studied at the University of Glasgow, but grew disenchanted with Calvinist doctrine and Presbyterian sectarianism. He emigrated to Pennsylvania in 1809, joining the Christian Association of Washington, a free church founded by his father, Thomas. In 1812 the Campbells were rebaptized by immersion and forged Baptist ties, but by 1830, wary of Baptist confessions, Alexander headed an anti-creedal movement whose adherents simply called themselves 'Disciples'. He held that Christian unity through the disappearance of *sects and creeds would precede Christ's postmillennial advent (see *Millennium) and that believers' *baptism by immersion was essential for salvation. He edited the monthly Christian Baptist and later The Millennial Harbinger. His systematic theology, The Christian System, appeared in 1839. A bold, logical thinker, he engaged in notable debates, including one in Cincinnati, Ohio, in 1829 with Robert Owen, utopian free-thinker, over Christian evidences. In 1832 the 'Disciples' united with a similar group of 'Christians' led by Barton W. Stone of Kentucky. Despite its anti-sect stance, the 'Stone-Campbell movement' eventually gave rise to three distinct denominations: Disciples of Christ, Churches of Christ, and the independent Christian Church.

Bibliography

'Alexander Campbell', Dictionary of American Biography, vol. 3 (New York, 1929), pp. 446–448; L. Garrett, 'Alexander Campbell', in D. A. Foster et al. (eds.), The Encyclopedia of the Stone-Campbell Movement (Grand Rapids,

CAMPBELL, JOHN MCLEOD (1800–72)

The theology of John McLeod Campbell provokes contrasting reactions. Central to the debate is his soteriology, outlined in The Nature of the Atonement, which must be interpreted within the wider context of his life and theology.

John McLeod Campbell was born in May 1800, the eldest son of Rev. Donald Campbell, minister of the united parish of Kilninner and Kilmelford. He went to Glasgow to begin studies at the university in November 1811, entering the Divinity Hall in 1817. Licensed to preach the gospel in 1820, he spent several years awaiting the call to his first church. In May 1825 he was presented to the parish of Row (Rhu) by the Duke of Argyll and was ordained minister of the parish later that year.

Campbell's contacts with his parishioners made him aware of a problem, which he described as 'the want of living religion'. He concluded that this lack of assurance was the legacy of federal Calvinism (see *Reformed theology), which was the prevailing theological orthodoxy. Having been taught that Christ died only for the elect, church members had no *assurance that they belonged to God's elect. Looking into their own lives for 'evidences of election', people found that their fluctuating feelings offered no firm basis for Christian assurance.

Campbell became convinced that the only foundation for genuine assurance was in believing that Christ died for the sins of all. Preaching this message led to accusations of *heresy, and his case was referred to the disciplinary courts of the Church of Scotland. Debate centred on three main themes: the extent of atonement, universal pardon and the doctrine that assurance is of the essence of faith.

Campbell believed that his teaching about the universal extent of the atonement and universal pardon did not lead to *universalism. However, his contemporaries, who assessed everything in the light of the *Westminster Confession, concluded that his teaching tended towards universalism. The ecclesiastical courts decided that his doctrines contradicted the teaching of the Westminster Confession of Faith, the Church of Scotland's principal 'Subordinate Standard of Faith'. In May 1831 the Kirk's General Assembly voted to depose Campbell from its ministry.

Campbell became pastor of an independent congregation in Glasgow. In 1856 he published an influential book, The Nature of Atonement, which explored what the atonement was intended to accomplish. For Campbell, the traditional emphasis upon what he termed the 'retrospective' aspect of atonement (what Christ had saved people from) had to be seen alongside an equal concern for the 'prospective' aspect of God's redemptive work (what Christ saves people for).

He described his approach as 'moral and spiritual', in contrast to prevailing penal approaches to the *cross. Not surprisingly, some conclude that he advocated a moral influence model of atonement. George Carey asserts that 'Campbell evacuates the atonement of any "objective" content', so that we encounter only 'a variation of the "moral influence" theory' (The Gate of Glory, London, 1986, p. 125).

The most controversial aspect of Campbell's theology was the idea of Christ offering a perfect confession of sin. In 1856, writing in the National Review, James Martineau asked, 'Is vicarious contrition at all more conceivable than vicarious retribution?' However, the controversial terms 'vicarious confession' or 'vicarious repentance' are not actually used by Campbell. Leanne Van Dyk suggests that these terms 'can be usefully employed in a description of Campbell's own atonement theology in a representative sense rather than a substitutionary sense. Provided one understands that the vicarious aspect of Christ's confession is that Christ confessed on our behalf so that we too can confess, the term is legitimate' (The Desire of Divine Love, p. 113). Campbell's idea has sometimes been described as 'vicarious penitence'. This does not appear to be a term which he used, but is rather the terminology used later by R. W. Moberly (Atonement and Personality, London, 1901).

James B. Torrance suggested that the OT symbolism associated with the work of the high priest on the Day of Atonement provides the background for Campbell's thinking. When the high priest entered God's presence, 'all Israel entered in his person . . . Conversely, when he vicariously confessed their sins, and interceded for them before God, God accepted them as his forgiven people in the person of their high priest.' ('The Vicarious Humanity of Christ', in T. F. Torrance (ed.), The Incarnation, Edinburgh, 1981, p. 139.)

In his earlier sermons Campbell had claimed that Christ had identified himself fully with fallen human nature, arguing that 'the flesh of Christ differed not in one particle from mine; but Christ did present his flesh, which was even my flesh, without spot to God through the eternal Spirit' (J. McLeod Campbell, Notes of Sermons, Paisley, 1831, p. 7).

Seen against this background, it is possible to interpret Campbell's language in terms of Christ confessing to the Father that human nature is so riddled with sin, that the only way to deal with such fallen flesh is to put it to death and recreate it. If Christ assumed sinful human nature, then whilst he is not personally guilty of sin, he would be able to confess that human flesh needs more than just the verdict of 'not guilty'. Such fallen flesh needs to be redeemed and recreated, and this is accomplished in Christ's representative death and resurrection.

If the idea of 'vicarious repentance' is deemed inadequate, it seems logical to conclude that Campbell's version of exemplarism is theologically deficient. However, his proposal about Christ's confession on the cross is only one part of a more complex soteriology outlined in The Nature of the Atonement. Taken in isolation, the notion of Christ's 'perfect confession' clearly does not provide an adequate way of understanding Christian atonement. When it is read alongside the other elements at the heart of his high priestly, incarnational understanding of the nature of atonement, a more objective assessment becomes possible.

Trevor Hart suggests that in spite of differences in emphasis, there are significant areas of theological convergence between *Anselm and Campbell. He argues that both theologians have a strong sense that atonement is the objective accomplishment of God. For, 'the atonement is something that God does, and not something that we do. It is the product of his prevenient love for sinful man, and not something which man brings to placate an angry and otherwise unforgiving deity' (T. A. Hart, EQ 62, p. 322).

Earlier assessments have not paid sufficient attention to sermon transcripts from Campbell's ministry, which supply vital insights into his theology. His sermons proclaim that the Son of God assumed fallen human nature, presenting it spotless to God in the power of the Holy Spirit. Such a *Christology, which he may have derived from his friend Edward *Irving, sheds fresh light on The Nature of Atonement. For if Christ assumed sinful fallen nature, then it may be more plausible to talk about Christ making a perfect confession of sins. Acknowledgment of Campbell's Christology does not remove all the difficulties associated with his soteriology, but enables a more accurate view of it to emerge.

See also: ATONEMENT; SALVATION.

Bibliography

Works: Christ the Bread of Life: An Attempt to Give a Profitable Direction to the Present Occupation of Thought with Romanism (London, 21869); The Nature of the Atonement (Grand Rapids and Carberry, 1996).

Studies: J. C. Goodloe, John McLeod Campbell: The Extent and Nature of the Atonement, Studies in Reformed Theology and History (Princeton, 1997); T. A. Hart, 'Anselm of Canterbury and John McLeod Campbell: Where Opposites Meet?', EQ 62, 1990, pp. 311–333; P. K. Stevenson, God in Our Nature: The Incarnational Theology of John McLeod Campbell (Carlisle, 2004); T. F. Torrance, Scottish Theology from John Knox to John McLeod Campbell (Edinburgh, 1996); G. M. Tuttle, John McLeod Campbell on Christian Atonement: So Rich a Soil (Edinburgh, 1986); L. Van Dyk, The Desire of Divine Love: John McLeod Campbell's Doctrine of the Atonement (New York, 1995).

P. K. STEVENSON

CANON, see SCRIPTURE

CANON LAW

The Greek word kanōn means a rule, and canon law comprises the disciplinary regulations of the church. These began to be formulated in the early centuries by local and ecumenical *councils, and are distinct from the decisions which the ancient councils made on matters of belief. However, they are likewise expressions of a NT concern for order and moral discipline in the church. The common law of the Eastern church still consists essentially of the canons of the early councils (in which they include the so-called Apostolic Canons, appended to the fourth-century Apostolic Constitutions, and the numerous canons of the 692 Quinisext Council, not recognized in the West).

Influential individual bishops also issued decrees which became embodied in canon law, and this was especially the case with the decrees of *popes, which continued to be added through the Middle Ages. The ninth-century False Decretals were also drawn upon. The twelfth-century Decretum of Gratian of Bologna gained its fame as being a much-needed systematic and annotated arrangement of Western canon law, and was taken bodily into the official corpus (Luris Cononici) of Roman canon law. The Corpus was codified in 1917, has several times been modified, and was fully revised in 1983. A separate code for Eastern-rite Catholic churches was promulgated in 1990.

Whether Roman canon law was binding in England during the Middle Ages has been disputed, perhaps wrongly, but since the Reformation the only parts considered by the courts to retain their force are those which have long been incorporated in the statute or common law of the realm and do not conflict with post-Reformation statute or custom. The Reformers proposed a new code of canon law entitled the Reformation of the Ecclesiastical Laws but, owing to the death of Edward VI, it was never enacted, though it was published by John Foxe in 1571. However, in 1603–04 a brief new code of canons was drawn up and approved by Convocation and received the royal assent. They became binding on the clergy of the Church of England (but not the laity, not having been submitted to Parliament). They were clearly Reformed in character, though with an anti-Puritan tendency, and remained in force until a fresh and less stringent code replaced them in 1969. This has since been revised by the General Synod on several occasions.

See also: CHURCH GOVERNMENT.

Bibliography

J. A. Brundage, Medieval Canon Law (Harlow, 1995); The Canons of the Church of England (London, 1969); New Code of Canon Law (London, 1983); Earl of Halsbury, Ecclesiastical Law, ed. R. P. Moore (London, 1957); E. W. Kemp, An Introduction to Canon Law in the Church of England (London, 1957); R. C. Mortimer, Western Canon Law (London, 1953).

R. T. BECKWITH

CANONIZATION, see SAINT

CAPITALISM

An economic system is a structure for organizing the production and distribution of provisions. In the modern era there have been only two basic economic systems: capitalism and command economies. The key feature of capitalism is the private ownership of the means of production combined with reliance on a free-market system to order production and distribution. Command economies, such as communism in the former Soviet Union, take public ownership of the means of production and centralize decision-making about how to produce and distribute goods.

Capitalism has been astonishingly successful in the production of goods: even its sternest critics, Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels, stated that it had assembled more colossal forces of production than all previous generations together (The Communist Manifesto). Following the collapse of the Soviet Union and the increasing development of private enterprise and a market economy in China, modern economic discussion is focused on the relative merits of different capitalist systems, rather than alternatives to them.

While aspects of capitalist economy have antecedents in the ancient world, the development of it as a system originates in England between the sixteenth and eighteenth centuries, as the producers of cloth and then other industries invested their profits in expanded and more efficient production. The peerless theorist of capitalism is Adam Smith, whose 1776 work The Wealth of Nations began the modern discipline of economics. Smith argued that the key difference between wealthy nations and others was how they ordered production. He observed how developments in the division of labour – workers becoming more specialist in a particular task – could lead to huge advances in the efficiency of production, and if the surplus generated in this way could then be traded in freely operating markets, the wealth generated could be raised by several orders of magnitude. He also argued that the needs of society for goods could be best satisfied by allowing each individual to pursue their own advantage, as the ‘invisible hand’ of the free market would ensure that there was an economic incentive to produce the goods people wanted in an efficient way. While Smith’s analysis continues to be foundational, there have been very significant developments in capitalism since the eighteenth century, not least the expansion of the public provision of social services in many Western nations in the mid-twentieth century and, towards the end of the century, the acceleration towards a globalized economy and the rapid expansion of international financial markets, the value of which now far exceeds trade in goods and services.

At the beginning of the twentieth century Max *Weber argued that one of the major causal factors in the development of capitalism was the Protestant Reformation. Martin *Luther’s doctrine of *vocation gave Christians confidence that they could serve God through secular employment, and John *Calvin’s doctrine of *predestination left them anxious about whether they were part of the elect who would be saved. The combination, Weber argued, was a powerful contribution to the diligent production and reinvestment of wealth required for a capitalist economy to be successful, though the significance of Weber’s thesis has since been a matter of dispute.

While there can be little doubt over the success of capitalism in enabling production, there have been many critics who have been concerned about the nature and consequences of capitalist production of goods together with defects in the way it distributes the fruits of production. A century after The Wealth of Nations Karl Marx argued in Das Kapital (vol. 1, 1867) that capitalism was fundamentally unjust in exploiting the labour of workers to enrich the capitalist owners of the means of production, and that markets were unfair in allowing the economically powerful to take advantage of the poor. He objected to the way capitalism functioned to *alienate, or separate and distance, workers from the products of their labour, which then became fetishized as commodities with a value independent of the process of their production. Marx also argued that capitalism was fundamentally unstable: when investment opportunities become apparent it creates an economic boom, but this is followed by recession when the boom comes to an end. He noted that the impact of successful companies buying out the assets of less successful ones concentrates financial power into bigger and bigger firms.

While Marx believed that this cycle would end finally with the collapse of capitalism and the birth of a socialist economy, others have argued that the worst effects of the features of the capitalist system Marx diagnosed can be avoided through appropriate government regulation. John Maynard Keynes's work in the mid-twentieth century was influential in arguing for a significant government role to compensate for the inherent instabilities of capitalist systems. Keynesian economics has since been challenged by economists such as Milton Friedman who have argued for laissez-faire policies of state non-intervention in economic affairs.

Theological critiques of capitalist economic systems date back to the nineteenth century in the work of F. D. Maurice and Charles Kingsley, and in the papal encyclical Rerum novarum published by Pope Leo XIII in 1891, which expressed concern for the exploitation of workers. In the twentieth century it is notable that major figures of diverse theological opinions expressed moral concern about the workings of capitalism: Karl *Barth, Paul *Tillich and Reinhold *Niebuhr all displayed a preference for *Christian Socialism. Towards the end of the century the critique of capitalism was a significant aspect of South American *liberation theology. Many liberation theologians have found Marxist economic analysis a useful tool in their attempt to understand and respond to the oppression of the poor and they have come to doubt whether a capitalist economy can adequately serve the interests of the poor, though their association with Marxist thought has led to critique from ecclesial authorities.

Timothy Gorringer and Ulrich Duchrow are prominent recent theological critics of capitalism. Other theologians have come to the theological defence of capitalism in reaction to what they see as theological naïveté. Michael Novak, for example, claims that socialist critics of capitalism forget the significance of the economic problem of production in their concern about the issues of distribution, and suggests that capitalism, democracy and Christianity are ideally suited to define the economic, political and religious spheres of modern democracy. Between these two extremes, thinkers such as Ronald Preston have sought a middle way that takes a clear-sighted view of the defects of capitalism while appreciating both its merits and the lack of viable alternatives.

See also: MARXISM AND CHRISTIANITY; POVERTY AND WEALTH; WORK.

Bibliography

M. Friedman, Capitalism and Freedom (Chicago, 1962); T. Gorringer, Theological Ethics and Economic Order (London and Maryknoll, 1994); J. M. Keynes, The General Theory of Employment, Interest and Money (London, 1936); K. Marx, Capital (ET, London, 1970); K. Marx and F. Engels, The Communist Manifesto, ed. D. McLennan (Oxford, 1992); J. Miranda, Marx and the Bible: A Critique of the Philosophy of Oppression (London, 1982); M. Novak, The Spirit of Democratic Capitalism (New York, 1982); R. H. Preston, Religion and the Ambiguities of Capitalism (London, 1991); A. Smith, The Wealth of Nations, eds. R. H. Campbell et al. (Oxford, 1976); M. Weber, The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism (ET, London, 1992).

D. L. CLOUGH

CAPPADOCIAN FATHERS, see BASIL OF CAESAREA; GREGORY OF NAZIANZUS; GREGORY OF NYSSA

CARNELL, EDWARD JOHN (1919–67)

An American evangelical apologist, theologian and president of Fuller Theological Seminary (1954–9), Carnell was a major figure in the mid-twentieth-century development of an intelligent and articulate exposition of *evangelicalism in the USA. He was the author of books on *Kierkegaard (The Burden of Søren Kierkegaard, Grand Rapids, 1965) and Reinhold *Niebuhr (The Theology of Reinhold Niebuhr, Grand Rapids, 1951), and of three influential *apologies. In the first of these, An Introduction to Christian Apologetics (Grand Rapids, 1948), Carnell proposes 'systematic consistency' (that is, 'obedience to the law of non-contradiction' and conformity with 'the totality of our experiences') as the test of truth. He attempts to show that the Christian worldview passes this test, while other religions and worldviews cannot.

A Philosophy of the Christian Religion (Grand Rapids, 1952) adds to the author's earlier work an apologetic based on values (axiologies). Carnell surveys 'a set of typical value options' for which an individual might live and die. In each case he gives reason why 'one must move on from the lower to the higher'. The 'lower immediacies' of material goods and pleasures, the 'higher immediacies' of the pursuit of knowledge, and the 'threshold options' of devotion to man and to sub-Christian gods, are all unable to provide ultimate satisfaction, which can be found only through faith in the person of Christ.

The argument of Christian Commitment (New York, 1957) is moral rather than axiological or rational. Carnell proposes 'a third way of knowing', in addition to knowledge by acquaintance and knowledge by inference. 'Knowledge by moral self-acceptance', or knowledge of truth as rectitude, is intimately involved in knowing persons, including oneself and God. But one cannot have this kind of knowledge without being 'morally transformed by the realities that already hold one'. Carnell's third apology is both an argument from 'the judicial sentiment' to God who is its source, and a call to humble ourselves in order to know the person of God.

Bibliography

K. D. Boa and R. M. Bowman, Faith Has Its Reasons (Colorado Springs, 2001); M. Erickson, The New Evangelical Theology (Westwood, 1968); R. Nelson, The Making and Unmaking of an Evangelical Mind (Cambridge, 1987); B. Ramm, Types of Apologetic Systems (Wheaton, 1953); J. A. Sims, Edward John Carnell: Defender of the Faith (Washington DC, 1979).

D. W. CLOWNEY

CAROLINE DIVINES

During the first half of the seventeenth century there were three main parties in the English church: the *Puritans, critical of the Elizabethan settlement and its spirituality as but half a reformation; the school of Richard *Hooker, appealing to the God-given principle of human reason as a guide to the Christian in 'things indifferent', and questioning the Puritan appeal to an exclusively biblical regulative authority; and what came eventually to be known as the 'High Church Party', led successively by Richard Bancroft (1544–1610) and William Laud (1573–1645), Archbishops of Canterbury. Among this group emerged a number of able moral and controversial theologians, most of whom held high office in the church during the reigns of Charles I and Charles II. They were known collectively as the Caroline Divines, and included such churchmen as Jeremy Taylor (1613–67), Herbert Thorndike (1598–1672), Gilbert Sheldon (1598–1677) and Henry Hammond (1605–60).

Although they gave a high place in their theology to the authority of the Bible, their main theological inspiration was the writings of the Fathers of the early church: probably no other group in English church history has been so skilled in *patristics. As a consequence, their spirituality reveals an openness to mystery and the more subliminal and less verbal aspects of relationship to God which was at odds with the Puritan preoccupation with the word. One practical effect of this was the 'beauty of holiness' programme conducted by Laud in the 1630s, restoring colour, music and beauty to the worship of the church. In this, as in other things, their instinct was to emphasize those features of the Church of England which reflected its continuity with the pre-Reformation church. They were, however, keen supporters of the Elizabethan settlement as a via media between the extremes of papacy and sectarianism, and had no hesitation in rejecting papal claims to supremacy. At the same time, however, they accepted (as others did not) that the Church of Rome was a genuine Christian church.

Their attitude towards other Protestant churches was more ambivalent. Increasingly they tended to question their right to be regarded as authentic churches unless they were episcopally ordered (see *Ministry). Indeed, they regarded the bishop as the sine qua non of the true church, and saw it as the peculiar glory of the Church of England that it had both bishops and a history of reformation. But in order to protect this insistence on episcopacy against the attacks of Puritans, they forged an alliance with the monarch, thus attaching episcopacy as a theory to the doctrine of the divine right of kings which they did much to promote.

During the Interregnum the majority of the Caroline Divines went into exile with the king, and it was in this context that their apologia for the Church of England was finally formulated in dialogue with Catholic and Protestant critics, both of whom regarded the via media as an experiment that had failed. Not surprisingly, the sufferings of this time led to an intransigence towards the Puritan party once the Restoration had occurred. The few who remained in England seem to have adopted more irenic attitudes: Richard *Baxter deeply regretted the death of Henry Hammond, formerly canon of Christ Church, Oxford, in 1660, because of his known willingness to seek grounds for the comprehension of dissenters within the church.

Theologically, the Caroline Divines were usually regarded as *Arminian, but this reflects more their antipathy to Puritanism than their views on salvation. They shared with the Puritans, however, the seventeenth-century preoccupation with the study of cases of conscience (see *Casuistry); Robert Sanderson (1587–1663), Bishop of Lincoln, was probably the leading English *moral theologian of the century. They were deeply committed to the Book of Common Prayer, and their corporate and private piety was focused on the Holy Communion. Their influence declined during the closing decades of the century, but was revived with the rise of the Oxford Movement in the nineteenth century (see *Anglo-Catholic theology), which held them to be the authentic tradition of *Anglicanism after the Reformation.

Bibliography

R. S. Bosher, The Making of the Restoration Settlement (London, 1951); I. M. Green, The Re-Establishment of the Church of England, 1660–1663 (Oxford, 1979); B. Guyer (ed.), The Beauty of Holiness: The Caroline Divines and Their Writings (Norwich, 2012); H. R. McAdoo, The Structure of Caroline Moral Theology (London and New York, 1949); J. Sears McGee, The Godly Man in Stuart England (New Haven, 1976); P. E. Moore and F. L. Cross, Anglicanism (London, 1935); J. W. Packer, The Transformation of Anglicanism, 1643–1660 (Manchester, 1969); N. Sykes, From Sheldon to Secker (Cambridge, 1959); H. R. Trevor-Roper, Laud (London, 1962).

D. D. SCEATS

CASUISTRY

The application of moral principles and the determination of right and wrong in particular cases (Lat. casus) in light of the peculiar circumstances and situation. The need for casuistry arises because it is not possible to frame or express general moral rules relevant to every situation and case without exception. Casuistry seeks to make the general rule more specific, and apply it directly to the actual moral situation. This may be seen positively as making the law more specific and removing obscurity and doubt as to its application. In *Puritanism it accompanied a scrupulousness over 'cases of *conscience'. Unfortunately, however, casuistry in Christian history has been seen negatively as providing excuses and permitting exceptions where there ought to be none, particularly among *Jesuits in the seventeenth century. The term often suggests a debater able to justify even what is wrong by a process of reasoning based on exceptions. Casuistry thus bears some resemblance to 'situation' *ethics. Theologically, casuistry takes seriously the fallen nature of the world and of humankind and recognizes the complexity of moral decisions. Therefore, to cope with the ambiguity and finitude of human existence, people require moral guidance given in a detailed way.

Bibliography

J. C. Ford and G. Kelly, Contemporary Moral Theology, 2 vols. (Westminster, 1958–63); K. E. Kirk, Conscience and Its Problems: An Introduction to Casuistry (London, 1927); P. Lehmann, Ethics in a Christian Context (London, 1963).

E. D. COOK

CATECHISMS

From its earliest days, the church was concerned to instruct its converts and nurture its members. Before being baptized and admitted to communion, new Christians were generally enrolled in beginners' classes for a programme of instruction known as catechesis. Manuals for their instruction were written by a number of leading theologians, most notably Cyril of Jerusalem (fourth century) and *John of Damascus (675–749). By the latter date, however, widespread conversion had apparently made this kind of activity unnecessary in the eyes of many. In any case, the decline of learning in Western Europe following the collapse of the Roman Empire made it practically impossible. The only reminder of it to survive was 'the departure of the catechumens', a ritual exercise between the ministry of the word and the sacrament during public worship which lost all real meaning as there were no catechumens to depart!

The need for theological instruction remained acute, of course, and in the twelfth century, Peter *Lombard, the Archbishop of Paris (d. 1160), devised a question-and-answer method of teaching which became standard in the medieval schools and survived up to and beyond the Reformation. What Lombard intended for theological students was simplified and extended to parish clergy by men like John Peckham, Archbishop of Canterbury (1279–92), who shortly after taking office issued a famous canon, Ignorantia sacerdotum ('the ignorance of priests') in which he ordered all ordination candidates to demonstrate their competence in expounding the Apostles' *Creed and other subjects, like the seven deadly sins and the seven sacraments as originally expounded by Lombard. By the early fourteenth century it was usual for them to have to show adequate knowledge of the creed, the Ten Commandments and the Lord's Prayer, which represented the pillars of Christian doctrine, discipline and devotion.

The extension of this form of training to lay people was slow and greatly hindered by the difficulty of producing texts in sufficient numbers and the prevailing illiteracy. With the invention of printing and the gradual revival of primary education in the late fifteenth century, it became feasible to produce such documents in large quantities, and the need to spread the teachings of the Reformation made it imperative to do so. The Lutherans seized the initiative, and by 1529 *Luther himself had produced a Long Catechism (mainly for students and priests) and a Short Catechism (mainly for children and lay people). Luther put the Ten Commandments first and followed them with the Apostles' Creed, which reflected his own understanding of the *gospel. The *law came first, in order to reveal the nature of *sin. *Faith then appeared as the cure for sin, and the Lord's Prayer, followed by the *sacraments, illustrated the Christian life of *grace. Luther also subdivided the Creed into its *trinitarian parts and linked them to the divine works of *creation, *redemption and *sanctification.

A more traditional approach was followed by John *Calvin in his Genevan catechism of 1541, where the primacy of faith over law was restored. This catechism is noteworthy for the way in which it deals at some length with such topics as the descent of Christ into hell, and for its *Reformed emphasis on the Lord's Supper (see *Eucharist). Calvin also stressed the importance of the union of the believer with Christ (see *Union with Christ), which can be found right through the catechism. The most famous Reformed catechism is that of *Heidelberg (1563), composed by Zacharias *Ursinus (1534–83) and Caspar *Olevianus (1536–87). It is structured in three parts, to correspond with each of the persons of the Trinity, and places considerable emphasis on the doctrine of Christian *assurance. Overall it is an attempt to mediate between Lutheran and Reformed sacramental teaching and has remained in use among Dutch and French Protestants in particular.

The first English catechism appeared in 1549 and was the work of Alexander Nowell, dean of St Paul's (d. 1602). Its theology generally followed Calvin's, but the emphasis on union with Christ was toned down to some extent. Nowell's work was clearly designed to prepare candidates for *confirmation, though it did not contain any reference to the sacraments. That was not added until 1604 and is generally thought to have been the work of John Overall, Nowell's successor as dean of St Paul's. In 1662 the catechism was separated from the order of confirmation in the Book of Common Prayer and given an independent place, which may have unintentionally contributed to the relative neglect which it suffered in later years.

The Puritans were great believers in catechisms, and even in the sixteenth century, William *Perkins (1558–1602) composed one which he regarded as supplementary to that which was found in the Book of Common Prayer. The main difficulty with the official form was that it presupposed belief on the part of the student, whereas Perkins aimed his work at the need to convert his pupils as much as to instruct them. The famous products of the Puritan tradition were undoubtedly the Larger and Shorter Catechisms of the Westminster Assembly, which first appeared in 1648 after having been ratified for use by parliament. The Larger Catechism has never been widely used, but the Shorter one became and long remained a mainstay of *Presbyterian instruction.

The Westminster divines kept the traditional order, but replaced the Apostles' Creed with their own confession of faith (see *Westminster Confession), which they regarded as more complete and satisfactory, even though it was too long to be committed to memory. The brilliance of the Shorter Catechism lay in its brevity and depth of theological insight, which made it ideal for use in homes, schools and churches. The aim was to produce a well-instructed congregation which would be able to use the knowledge thus gained as a basis for appreciating sermons and Christian literature. It was an attempt to create a perceptive response to the teaching of the Bible, which it endeavoured to structure in a way that corresponded to the development of the Christian life – a motivation strikingly reminiscent of John Peckham's canon, even if the authors of the Catechism were scarcely aware of it.

How successful catechisms were in inculcating the Reformed faith is a matter of some debate. There were certainly a great many of them composed and distributed, and the method was soon copied by the Roman Catholic Church. As early as 1555 the Jesuit Peter Canisius (1521–97) had produced one for the laity, and this was soon followed (1563) by one for priests authorized by the Council of Trent. Non-Christian groups also produced catechisms, of which the most famous was the *Socinian Racovian Catechism of 1605. That in itself is testimony to their effectiveness, at least for a time, and as long as rote learning was the accepted norm, it seems that catechisms found a logical place in the pattern of religious instruction adopted by most Christian churches. As that declined, however, and as other books became more widely available, catechisms receded into the background, and by the twentieth century were no longer being widely used. They have survived to some extent as witnesses of the Reformation and may even be recognized as subordinate standards of faith, but intimate knowledge of them is now quite rare.

From time to time there have been attempts either to revive the traditional catechisms or to compose new ones, but it cannot be said that a widespread movement to this effect has so far developed in the Protestant world. The Roman Catholic Church, on the other hand, presents an interesting contrast to this neglect. After many years of consultation following the Second Vatican Council, an official Catechism of the Catholic Church was eventually published (1992), which has now been translated into most of the world's major languages. Drafted in French (though technically it is the Latin version which is 'official'), this Catechism is a major statement of current *Roman Catholic theology and is more like a university textbook than anything else. It is certainly far beyond anything that could be used for the instruction of children. Its extensive notes provide a ready guide to the sources of Catholic doctrine and to the way in which they have been officially interpreted since Vatican II, so much so that it is now common to quote the Catechism as the most accessible authoritative source of Catholic teaching. It is organized along traditional lines, but each section is a vastly expanded version of anything found in earlier catechisms. Thus, part one is a lengthy exposition of Christian theology using the Apostles' Creed as its basis, part two examines the sacraments, part three covers the moral dimension of the Christian faith (including the Ten Commandments) and part four deals with the Christian's devotional life, which culminates in an exposition of the Lord's Prayer.

The Catechism was a major publishing event at the time and has been widely used in the Roman Catholic Church, occasionally leading to calls from some Protestants that similar ones should be produced, but to date very little has materialized, and it remains to be seen how influential the Catholic Catechism will turn out to be in the longer term. The Eastern Orthodox churches have not produced any official catechisms, though there have been occasional suggestions that they should try to do so. Several Orthodox writers have published introductions to their faith which have a catechetical character to them. On the whole, though, it must be said that in most churches the catechetical tradition is moribund at the present time. An interesting exception to this general tendency is the Evangelical Lutheran Church of Finland, which has recently published a new catechism with considerable success, but whether (or to what extent) that will be imitated elsewhere remains to be seen.

Bibliography

H. Bonar, Catechisms of the Scottish Reformation (London, 1866); Catechism of the Catholic Church (London, 1995); D. Janz, Three Reformation Catechisms: Catholic, Anabaptist, Lutheran (New York, 1982);

E. Norman, An Anglican Catechism (London, 2003); G. Strauss, Luther's House of Learning (Baltimore, 1978); G. I. Williamson, The Westminster Shorter Catechism (Philadelphia, 2003).

G. L. BRAY

CATHOLICITY

Catholicity is an aspect of the *church, applied to her in the historic *creeds ('I believe one holy, catholic, apostolic Church . . .'). It is fundamentally an ecclesiological category, often viewed as one of the church's essential 'marks'. In popular usage, it can refer simply to formal styles of theology and worship that draw on practices and interests associated (either now or in the past) with: the Roman Catholic Church; the undivided church of the early Christian centuries; the pre-Reformation Western church; or finally, the broader ecumenical community of contemporary churches. In this broader way, 'catholic' can be a term of liturgical, historical, or ecumenical reference.

The term itself comes from the (non-Scriptural) Greek phrase denoting wholeness or comprehensiveness. Ignatius of Antioch (Letter to the Smyrneans, 8.2) early applied it to the whole church of Christ as represented in the bishop, and it soon came to designate the true Christian church as distinguished from the idiosyncratic bodies of *heretics and *schismatics. Confession of 'the catholic church' entered the common creeds of East and West by the mid-fourth century.

A key to its meaning is given in the early description of certain NT letters as 'Catholic Epistles' (e.g. of James, Peter, John and Jude, by Eusebius and Jerome), addressed not to particular local congregations but to the breadth of the church. 'Catholic' here pointed to the word of God spoken to 'all'. It implied a common reception of God's call as it goes out to the world. This notion of commonality of life, teaching and subjection to God's extending word (cf. Acts 2:42–47; Eph. 4:4–6) stands at the root of catholicity and of the early belief that the bishop is its natural living embodiment. The development that saw communion with the Bishop of Rome in particular (cf. *Irenaeus) as a mark of catholicity derives from this.

There are problems in the use of the term when the church divides over time, and when various groups out of communion with one another and without mutually recognized ministries of oversight confess the creed simultaneously. What could commonality mean in this case? One possibility is that the term refers to a visible church that alone is catholic in a 'full sense', and to others only partially if at all. Roman Catholics, for instance, have articulated a vision of ordered inclusivity over time, through which separated churches in 'imperfect communion' with Rome through baptism may be moving through history towards gradual fullness, along with the human race as a whole, as they are finally embraced by the Roman Church (see *Roman Catholic theology). That there are levels of catholicity among churches, however, is difficult to demonstrate quantitatively, and 'fullness' here is reduced to a providential hope.

Another possibility is to identify catholicity with an invisible reality, generally of a personal nature, that is tied to the desire and faith that binds an individual or group to Christ, and only through Christ to others. Protestants like Barth and even Roman Catholics like de Lubac, from very different perspectives, have adopted this view, which is based on a rejection of 'extrinsic' measures of divine action – material, institutional and visibly evaluated – that might somehow rest within human control apart from God's gracious initiative. If catholicity is here reflected in ecclesial structures (as clearly it is for someone like de Lubac), these represent a history of changing ecclesial relations that manifest Christ. There is, in this perspective, little historical verifiability to claims of catholicity in this world, and the word itself risks becoming a confusedly broad synonym for the indwelling presence of the Holy Spirit in its trinitarian life.

More recently, following the Second Vatican Council, catholicity has been reconnected to its divine missionary roots. As the accountable receipt in time and space of God's word, catholicity refers to the church's own conversion within history to God's love for the whole world (1 Tim. 2:4). To be catholic, in this renewed understanding of the term, is to subject oneself to the mandated movement of the church through the Holy Spirit to embrace all people in the formal life of 'all things in common' as willed and embodied by the Father through his self-offering of love in his Son. Hence, there is a moral basis to catholicity, located in the embodied charity of heart and will, that extends to the world's corners. The church, as a whole or as divided churches, is thereby judged according to her catholicity – that is, her enacted communion – and not the reverse. This, finally, coheres with part of the definition given by Cyril of Jerusalem in his eighteenth catechetical lecture, that, in addition to its extent and comprehensive doctrine, the church ‘is called Catholic . . . because it brings into subjection to godliness the whole race of mankind, governors and governed, learned and unlearned; and because it universally treats and heals the whole class of sins . . . and possesses in itself every form of virtue which is named, both in deeds and words, and in every kind of spiritual gifts’ (18.23, tr. E. H. Gifford).

Bibliography

K. Barth, CD, Vol. 4: The Doctrine of Reconciliation (ET, Edinburgh, 1969); Catechism of the Catholic Church (New York, 2003); H. de Lubac, The Christian Faith: An Essay on the Structure of the Apostles’ Creed (ET, San Francisco, 1986); J. Pearson, An Exposition of the Creed (1659), rev. and ed. T. Chevallier and R. Sinker (Cambridge, 1899); R. Williams, ‘Catholicity’, in A. Hastings (ed.), The Oxford Companion to Christian Thought (Oxford, 2000); J. Zizioulas, Being as Communion: Studies in Personhood and the Church (ET, Crestwood, ²1997).

E. RADNER

CELIBACY, see SEXUALITY

CELTIC CHRISTIANITY

Christianity appeared in the ancient Roman province of Britannia in the second century, mainly among the Romano-British population, but also apparently spreading to the Celtic tribes to the north and west. A delegation of British bishops participated in the Council of Arles in 314, and later in the century, Ninian, the first missionary to the southern Picts beyond the empire in Caledonia, established his candida casa (white house) at Whithorn in Galloway. Roman rule finally ceased in Britain in 410, and in 429, Germanus, the bishop of Auxerre near Paris, sent a mission to the British church to counter the influence of the doctrines of *Pelagius, a Celtic monk who had travelled throughout the Roman Empire. After the collapse of Roman rule, the immigration into southern and eastern Britain of the pagan tribes of Angles, Saxons and Jutes from Germany led to the isolation of the Celtic churches of the north and west. But in the fifth century, the Romano-British missionary, Patrick, completed the evangelization of Ireland, and in the sixth century, David emerged as the leading bishop and saint in Wales. In 563, Columba crossed from Ireland to establish a monastery on the island of Iona off the west coast of the Scottish kingdom of Dalriada, which had been settled by Gaels from Ireland.

Iona became the centre from which the Picts of north-eastern Scotland were evangelized. From there too Aidan went to the Angles of the kingdom of Northumbria in 635 at the invitation of its king, Oswald, establishing a monastery on Lindisfarne. By this time, Pope Gregory the Great had sent Augustine to England, leading first to the conversion of King Ethelbert of Kent and the establishing of a church in Canterbury in 597. From there, the mission from the Roman church spread to the other southern Saxon kingdoms, and in fact in Northumbria, Oswald’s predecessor had already been influenced by them. The long years of the isolation of the Celtic church were coming to an end, and the Synod of Whitby in 664 established the practices of the Roman church in Northumbria.

For about 200 years, therefore, the church in the Celtic lands of Wales, Ireland and Scotland developed practices which distinguished it from the rest of Western Christianity, centred in Rome. In Ireland particularly it became more dominated by its monasteries than elsewhere, and the abbot could be more powerful than the bishop. The monasteries were centres of learning, conserving Christian culture and civilization when most of Continental Europe had succumbed to the barbarian invasions. The Book of Kells, dating from the late eighth century, is one outstanding example of an illuminated manuscript of the four Gospels in Latin, thought to have been produced by Columban monks, possibly in Iona. Celtic art, with conventions such as the circular representation of eternity, is also to be seen in the large stone Celtic crosses which still survive. The monasteries were also bases for missionary work; missionaries not only evangelized in the Celtic countries, but established the great monasteries of the Alpine region, re-establishing the Christian church there.

Celtic spirituality has attracted much interest in the last few decades, but too often a contemporary agenda has been read into a romanticized version of the life and thought of the Celtic saints. Their spirituality was certainly marked by a strong sense of God's presence in *creation and also by a strong focus on the *Trinity. Both of these features are represented in the hymn known as 'St Patrick's Breastplate': 'I bind unto myself today the strong name of the Trinity,' Patrick certainly gave priority to the role of the bishop as a teacher, and his Confessio includes an exposition of the faith which is clearly related closely to the Nicene *Creed. There was also a strong *asceticism and a fierce penitential discipline in Celtic Christianity. A movement to return to earlier austerity developed in the Irish church in the late eighth century: their Gaelic title, 'Servants of God', came into English as the 'Culdees'. The Synod of Whitby, which marked the increasing integration of the Celtic churches into the wider Western church, did not have to address any outstanding theological differences, but only practical issues such as the date of Easter, the shape of the monks' tonsure and the procedure for the consecration of bishops.

Bibliography

I. Bradley, Celtic Christianity: Making Myths and Chasing Dreams (Edinburgh, 1999); T. Cahill, How the Irish Saved Civilization (New York, 1995); B. Lehane, Early Celtic Christianity (London, 2005); D. Meek, The Quest for Celtic Christianity (Edinburgh, 2000); T. O'Loughlin, Celtic Theology: Humanity, World and God in Early Irish Writings (London, 2000).

T. A. NOBLE

CHALCEDON, COUNCIL OF

On 8 October 451 the Council of Chalcedon opened with over 500 bishops in attendance, the pope being represented by his legates. The issue confronting the Council was how to conceive and express the truth that *Jesus is the Son of God incarnate. The majority of bishops did not want to promulgate a new creed, but rather simply to ratify again the *Nicene-*Constantinopolitan *Creed, Cyril's Second Letter to Nestorius (see *Cyril of Alexandria), and Pope Leo's Tome to Flavian. However, the emperor realized the need for a new definition, one to which all could agree. This new definition included the following important points.

First, the Fathers three times used the phrase 'one and the same' and five times used the phrase 'the same'. Who is the 'one and the same' and 'the same'? It is the eternally only-begotten Son/Word. There are not two 'sons' (contra *Nestorius). There is only one subject or person – the Son/Word.

Second, the one and the same – the Son/Word – is perfect in Godhead and perfect in manhood. The same is consubstantial with the Father (contra *Arius), and the same is consubstantial with us with a human soul and body (contra *Apollinarius). Because Jesus is the one and the same Son existing as God and man, *Mary can truly be called Mother of God, for the Son of God was born of her as a man (contra Nestorius). Moreover, because the Son of God actually existed as a man, he is 'made known in two natures' (contra Eutyches).

Third, the act of *incarnation – the 'becoming' – establishes a union whereby the natures are not confused or changed, nor are they divided or separated. The reason the natures are not confused or changed is because the incarnational union – the 'becoming' – is not the compositional union of natures which would give rise to a new third kind of being. Yet, the natures are not divided or separated, because they are united to the one person or subject of the Son/Word.

Fourth, because the Council established a proper understanding of the incarnation, it equally confirmed the proper use of the communication of idioms, that is, because it is one and the same Son who exists as God and as man then both divine and human attributes (idioms) can be predicated of one and the same Son. The Son can truly be said to be born, thirst, hunger, suffer, die and rise, because the Son actually lived an authentic human life as a man.

The Council of Chalcedon did not bring about complete unity and peace. Some Antiochenes believed that it relied too heavily on the theology of Cyril and so tended to *Monophysitism. (The Coptic Church in Egypt is still Monophysite.) Some Alexandrians believed that the stress on the two natures after the union was a profession of Nestorianism. (There are still Nestorians in Iraq today.) Nonetheless, the Council of Chalcedon is a Christological landmark, and its creed continues to be the doctrinal basis for most Christian denominations.

See also: CHRISTOLOGY; COUNCILS.

Bibliography

M. Forlin Patrucco and M. Simonetti, 'Chalcedon', in EEC Church; P. T. Camelot, in NCE 3, pp. 363–366; J. McGuckin, Saint Cyril of Alexandria and the Christological Controversy (Crest Wood, 2004); R. V. Sellers, The Council of Chalcedon (London, 1953); T. G. Weinandy, Does God Change?: The Word's Becoming in the Incarnation (Petersham, 1985).

T. G. WEINANDY

CHALMERS, THOMAS (1780–1847)

A professor of divinity at Edinburgh from 1828 until his death, Chalmers was famous as a preacher, parish minister and leader of the *evangelical party in the Church of Scotland, and of the Free Church of Scotland after the Disruption of 1843. Although his reputation rests here, and his disdain for theological systems was well known if not well remembered, his influence on generations of Scottish students of theology was profound. He retained many of the finer values of the moderate tradition which he had embraced prior to his conversion in 1811, and came to represent the evangelical tradition which finds its major concerns in the proclamation and application of the gospel, rather than in overprecise formulation of its content. The *atonement was central to the mission of the church in personal and social transformation, but he told his students not to preach *predestination; that was God's business, not theirs. The liberalization of *Presbyterian adherence to the harsher aspects of the *Westminster Confession of Faith which took place some thirty years after his death reflects many of the theological values of his preaching and lectures. His sermon, 'The fullness and freeness of the gospel offer', summarizes in title and content his basic understanding of the Christian message. His Theological Institutes are volumes 7 and 8 of his Posthumous Works (1847–9), and other relevant writings can be found in his Works (1836–42).

Bibliography

S. J. Brown, Thomas Chalmers and the Godly Commonwealth (Oxford, 1982); A. C. Cheyne (ed.), The Practical and the Pious: Essays on Thomas Chalmers (1780–1847) (Edinburgh, 1985); W. Hanna, The Life and Writings of the Rev. Thomas Chalmers, 4 vols. (Edinburgh, 1849–52); S. Piggan and J. Roxborough, The St Andrews Seven (Edinburgh, 1985); J. Roxborough, Thomas Chalmers: Enthusiast for Mission (Edinburgh, 1999).

W. J. ROXBOROUGH

CHARISMATIC MOVEMENT/ THEOLOGY

The Charismatic Movement, which many of its adherents prefer to describe as the Charismatic Renewal, exercised great influence in the thinking, worship and expectations of all the historic Christian denominations in both First and Majority World contexts during the second half of the twentieth century.

To insist on calling it a renewal rather than a movement is not without significance, because it has for the most part sought to be not a movement alongside or even outside the churches, but a renewal or rediscovery within the life of the church of the charismatic dimension of the work of the *Holy Spirit. The characteristic emphasis has been on the recovery of the charismatic gifts listed in such NT passages as 1 Cor. 12, and often with a particular insistence on the exercise of the gift of tongues as the validating sign of the so-called *baptism in the Holy Spirit.

The renewal from one point of view was a spillover of the *Pentecostalism of the first half of the twentieth century, but it was integrative rather than sectarian in its intention. It found an often controversial place in all the mainline Protestant denominations, and from the sixties onwards in the Roman Catholic Church, whose authorities both welcomed and at the same time supervised it to make sure that its spontaneity was contained within the sacramental and liturgical practices of the church.

It has been said, with considerable insight, that the charismatic renewal which was penetrating the churches in this powerful way in the second half of the twentieth century was a movement looking for a theology. One might argue with equal plausibility that, at least in its early stages, theological reflection was one of the lowest of its priorities. Charismatics were much more concerned to experience the Holy Spirit and his gifts than they were to think about them. In fact, the whole movement could be seen as a mighty swing of the religious pendulum from the cerebral to the experiential, from a faith for the mind to a faith for the heart. If you had a direct contact with God, what need had you for theological theories and defined doctrine, especially if the theories were seen as liberal subversions of the given gospel and the doctrines seemed to require intellectual assent more than a personal engagement with a living God?

However, as the movement matured, it soon became obvious that the way it presented itself implied a theological framework which was therefore open to assessment and revision. Its teaching about a baptism in the Holy Spirit that was distinct from and subsequent to new birth and *conversion and that evidenced itself in the exercise of spiritual gifts (see *Gifts of the Spirit), notably the gift of tongues, made it clear that it had often unreflectingly inherited a Pentecostal theology that was distinct from, and in considerable tension with, the doctrinal traditions in which the mainline charismatics had come to Christian faith and understanding. Such teaching exposed them to theological criticism from people in their own tradition who read the biblical evidence differently and interpreted the gospel in less Pentecostal ways. Furthermore, they themselves remained faithful to the traditions in which they had been nurtured in faith and so had to face questions about how the new experience of the Spirit could be integrated with the understanding of the gospel that they had inherited and still wanted to affirm.

The charismatic renewal has, after the initial excitement in which many rediscovered the power of the Spirit and his gifts, given rise to a theological debate in which its proponents have both corrected and been corrected by the more established theologies of their churches.

In terms of biblical theology, writers like James Dunn have argued convincingly that in the NT being baptized in the Holy Spirit is integral to Christian conversion rather than a second blessing subsequent to it. Tongues as the invariable evidence of Spirit baptism has very little support in Scripture, and many charismatics accept that conclusion. On the other hand, the typical Protestant teaching that the charismata of 1 Cor. 12 were withdrawn when the canon of Scripture was established has also been shown to lack credible biblical authentication and has been practically refuted by the credible, if still contested, claims of charismatics to exercise these very gifts today.

Theologians both inside and outside the charismatic constituency have attempted to integrate charismatic experience with inherited theology in terms of sacramental theology (L. J. Suenens), Lutheran teaching on justification (F. D. Bruner), Barthian Christocentrism (T. A. Smail), Puritan teaching about assurance (J. I. Packer) and liberation theology of peace and justice (M. Welker).

More widely there has been concern to relate the resurrection spirituality of the charismatics, with its dangers of a superficial triumphalism, to a continued insistence of the centrality of the cross to all authentic Christian experience. The whole discussion has been given theological depth by the more recent trinitarian emphasis that the chief work of the Spirit is not the distribution of dramatic gifts, but the relating of people to the Father and the Son, with a view to their enlistment in the triune God's mission of reconciliation to his whole creation.

Bibliography

A. Anderson, An Introduction to Pentecostalism (Cambridge, 2004); S. M. Burgess and E. van der Maas (eds.), New International Dictionary of Pentecostal and Charismatic Movements (Grand Rapids, rev. edn, 2002); J. D. G. Dunn, Baptism in the Holy Spirit (London, 1970); P. Hocken, Streams of Renewal: The Origins and Development of the Charismatic Movement (Carlisle, rev. edn, 1997); S. Hunt, M. Hamilton and T. Walter (eds.), Charismatic Christianity: Sociological Perspectives (Basingstoke, 1999); T. A. Smail (ed.), Charismatic Renewal: The Search for a Theology (London, 1993).

T. A. SMAIL

CHEMNITZ, MARTIN (1522–86)

Martin Chemnitz was a *Lutheran theological conciliator. After university study at Frankfurt an der Oder and Wittenberg (1543–7), service with Albrecht Duke of Prussia at Königsberg (1547–53) and a brief time teaching at Wittenberg, he was called to Braunschweig (Brunswick) in 1554, joining his long-time friend Joachim Mörlin in church ministry, teaching and wider reform, and contributing to several territorial statements of church doctrine.

Chemnitz was the leading drafter of the *Formula of Concord (1577, published in the Book of Concord, 1580), intended to reconcile the disputing parties of 'True-Lutherans' (Gnesio-Lutherans), represented by Mörlin and Flacius Illyricus, co-ordinator of the Protestant church history known as the Magdeburg Centuries, and the 'Philippists', adherents of *Melanchthon widely suspected as revisionists. Chemnitz sought to do justice to both *Luther and Melanchthon, on whose Common Places he had long lectured. His own Common Places, published posthumously, were a commentary on Melanchthon's. In substance, Chemnitz sided with the Gnesio-Lutherans, following Melanchthon chiefly only in method and style, despite their early friendship.

A considerable scholar, Chemnitz wrote a massive Examination of the Council of Trent, and a work rich in patristic learning on The Two Natures in Christ. Other works, especially on the Lord's Supper (see *Eucharist), helped to stabilize mainstream Lutheran doctrine amid challenge and dispute (e.g. on *justification by faith against *Osiander). His modification of the traditional notion of the omnipresence of Christ's human nature (which Melanchthon rejected) was known as multivolipresence: a presence in as many places as Christ wished. Chemnitz's importance for Lutheran orthodoxy is reflected in the common dictum: 'If the second Martin had not come, the first Martin [Luther] would not have survived.'

Bibliography

Works: Examination of the Council of Trent, tr. F. Kramer (St Louis, 1971–86); The Two Natures in Christ, tr. J. A. O. Preus (St Louis, 1971); Common Places, tr. J. A. O. Preus, 2 vols. (St Louis, 1989).

Studies: E. F. A. Klug, From Luther to Chemnitz: On Scripture and the Word (Grand Rapids, 1971); J. A. O. Preus, The Second Martin: The Life and Theology of Martin Chemnitz (St Louis, 1994); B. W. Teigen, The Lord's Supper in the Theology of Martin Chemnitz (Brewster, 1986).

D. F. WRIGHT

CHICAGO SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY

The leading proponent of theological modernism and the radical wing of the *liberal movement in American Protestantism, the Chicago School of Theology is associated largely with the Divinity School of the University of Chicago during the half century from 1890 to 1940. Reaching its summit while Shailer Mathews (1863–1941) was dean (1908–33), other prominent members of the Chicago School included George Burman Foster (1858–1918), Shirley Jackson Case (1872–1947), Gerald Birney Smith (1868–1929), Edward Scribner Ames (1870–1958) and Henry Nelson Wieman (1884–1975). Incorporating a wide variety of perspectives, the Chicago modernists championed an *empirical and pragmatic approach to religion which stressed its functional values and betrayed an indebtedness to the philosophies of William James (1842–1910), John Dewey (1859–1952), George Herbert Mead (1863–1931) and Charles Peirce (1839–1914).

Chicago modernism celebrated the 'spirit of the age' in both its scientific and democratic dimensions. Theologically, this entailed a rejection of special *revelation as the basis for theological authority in favour of an appeal to experience as the criterion of truth in religion. However, their emphasis on experience was not in the *Schleiermacheran tradition of using personal *religious experience, but the more radical approach of securing scientific legitimacy for religion by appealing to experience in the public domain – that is, that which is accessible to and verifiable by all enquirers. A socio-historical method for studying religious phenomena as human behaviour, and not divine, was urged, since all theological traditions were thought to evolve with time. Thus an openness to radical questioning of theological forms, a willingness to experiment with new conceptions of God, and an affirmation of human ideals and values – with an accompanying drift toward *humanism – all characterized the school.

Culturally, the Chicago modernists were also virtually apostles for a 'religion of democracy'. Exuding optimism about altruistic human nature and an evolutionary ascent that boded well for man's future, they combined and con-founded Christianity and democracy. This liberal belief in an immanent and democratic deity was sorely tested by the new spirit of pessimism and cynicism emerging from the First World War and the economic depression which followed it.

Bibliography

C. H. Arnold, Near the Edge of Battle: A Short History of the Divinity School and the Chicago School of Theology 1866–1966 (Chicago, 1966);

W. J. Hynes, Shirley Jackson Case and the Chicago School: The Socio-Historical Method (Chico, 1981).

S. R. POINTER

CHICAGO STATEMENT

The Chicago Statement on Biblical Inerrancy came from the first 'summit' conference (1978) of the International Council on Biblical Inerrancy. ICBI was a coalition of conservative scholars who over ten years sponsored conferences and books to vindicate the full truth and trustworthiness of the Bible as a basic and necessary Christian certainty, so countering liberal Protestant opinion and also revisionist advocacy of 'limited inerrancy' and 'non-inerrantist evangelicalism' in their own ranks. (The latter factor prompted ICBI's formation.) Against all forms of the thesis that biblical authority and integrity of faith were compatible with disbelieving at least some assertions and assumptions in both Testaments, ICBI urged that methodological and epistemological coherence in theology depends on treating all canonical *Scripture as trustworthy instruction from God, a view learned from the explicit attitude of the NT writers and the historical Jesus himself to their Scriptures, that is, our OT. ICBI thus revitalized the polemic maintained in scholarly form by such as B. B. *Warfield at the turn of the twentieth century, and by *fundamentalism throughout that century, and with growing academic strength by evangelicals (see *Evangelical theology) for some decades before ICBI was born.

The Statement is defensive, not adventurous, pursuing no new paths but clarifying a consensus. Its three parts are: a summary of ICBI's view, nineteen 'articles of affirmation and denial' elaborating it, and an extended exposition of it. The Bible's divine origin and full humanness; its consistent Christ-centredness; its total reliability as a guide, both informationally and imperatively; the ministry of the Holy Spirit as its inspirer, authenticator and interpreter; and its final authority for the church and every Christian, are the points emphasized.

ICBI's second consensus document, the Chicago Statement on Biblical Hermeneutics (1982), complements the first by exploring principles of interpretation in twenty-five further affirmations and denials. The two together have become a reference point for many American evangelicals and evangelical institutions.

See also: INFALLIBILITY AND INERRANCY OF THE BIBLE; LIBERALISM AND CONSERVATISM IN THEOLOGY; SCRIPTURE, DOCTRINE OF.

Bibliography

N. L. Geisler (ed.), Inerrancy (Grand Rapids, 1979) – contains the text of the statement; J. Hannah (ed.), Inerrancy and the Church (Chicago, 1984); G. R. Lewis and B. Demarest (eds.), Challenges to Inerrancy: A Theological Response (Chicago, 1984).

J. I. PACKER

CHINESE THEOLOGY

Since Robert Morrison (1782–1834) baptized the first Chinese converts almost 200 years ago, Chinese theology has gone through several phases of development. The first phase was dominated by concerns for indigenization. Morrison's colleague, William Milne, blazed the trail with just a handful of Chinese converts. His Zhang Yuan Liang You Xianglun (Dialogues Between Two Friends, Zhang and Yuan) remains one of the most inspiring indigenous attempts. The Confucian vision of humanity is affirmed, but regarded as less than comprehensive, and can only be realized in Jesus Christ, the manifestation of God's love in the overcoming of sin. Jing Shi Liangyan (The Word for Awakening the Age), written by Liang Fa (1789–1855), represents the first genuine Chinese indigenous attempt. Integrating Confucian ethics with the *kingdom ethics of righteousness and equality, the book inspired Hong Xiuquan, the leader of the Taiping Rebellion (1851–65).

This signalled the coming of the second phase, which was marked by socio-political turmoil, with the Qing Dynasty crumbling, and the imperial expansion of the West encroaching. A deep sense of crisis sent China into a feverish quest for cultural transformation and national salvation. Modernization, scientism, iconoclastic rejection of Confucianism and religions, carried the day. Christianity was seen not only as irrelevant, but also as an accomplice for Western imperialism.

Leading Chinese Christian thinkers like Zhao Zichen and Wu Leichuan formed the Apologetic Group in 1920 in Beijing, aiming to regenerate Chinese society through the Christian faith. To do so, Zhao believed, Christianity had to be radically reinterpreted in the light of the modern scientific worldview. The essence of the gospel had to be uncovered from the rubble of unscientific dogmas and outdated traditions. Denominationalism had to be abandoned. The centre of the Christian faith was the person of *Jesus, a man who became the Son of God through radical consciousness of being one with God, thus becoming the embodiment of God's personality, at the heart of which is *love. God's love was manifested in the self-giving sacrifice of Jesus, which reveals what authentic personhood should be. The regeneration of Chinese society hinged on the widespread acceptance of Jesus as the model of an authentic person. Wu saw Jesus as a revolutionary, attempting to bring in a radically new socio-political order, where private property would be abolished, and all goods equally shared, with equal rights for everybody.

In the same vein, Wu Yaozong regarded Jesus' gospel as a *social gospel, pointing to a social order based on communal labour and communal ownership. The communist ideal was evident as a shaping force in theology even before 1949. But Wang Mingdao attacked the idea of building an ideal society on earth, since all social evils come from corrupt human nature. The key to social transformation is personal repentance and regeneration through faith in Jesus Christ.

After 1949, the church faced a different sort of challenge. Under communist rule, the church was under pressure to provide a positive interpretation of the communist revolution, which claimed to be liberation accomplished, dwarfing all forms of social gospel or *liberation theology, making pietistic theology totally irrelevant. How was the church to assess the revolution theologically? What were the implications?

From the 1950s onward, theology in China entered into its third phase. Shen Yifan rejected the duality between revelation and history, creation and redemption, the sacred and the profane. He proposed an incarnational-sacramental theology. The glory of God and his redemptive act can find expression in profane history such as the communist revolution. Ding Guangxun saw history as progression in God's continual creation. The 'Cosmic Christ' was the omega point where creation comes to its fullness, with love permeating all things, reconciling all contradictions. Even among atheists or unbelievers, we can see the love of Christ at work. The doctrine of 'justification by faith' was deemed exclusivist and should be replaced by 'justification by love'.

Outside mainland China, socio-cultural context remains a vital concern. C. S. Song sees indigenous cultural identity, religious pluralism, political oppression and suffering as the main issues. His 'transpositional theology' weaves biblical stories into stories of Asian people. Transposition is incarnation in action. When the crucified Jesus is transposed from Jerusalem to Asia, Jesus means the crucified people in Asia. Highly critical of Western imperialism, he nevertheless was mute about oppression in China, in particular the immense suffering during the Cultural Revolution. He even suggested that the new China undergoing cultural revolution was a secularized version of salvation history.

Since the 1980s, theologians in Hong Kong have emerged as a significant force in public discourse, as Christians were actively involved in shaping the future of Hong Kong. Jonathan Chao, Carver Yu and a few others drafted the Christian Declaration of Faith in the Face of Socio-political Uncertainty in Hong Kong in 1984, acknowledging God as the Lord of history, affirming Christian solidarity with the people of Hong Kong, and calling the people to become the subject of history, both for Hong Kong and China.

Chao subsequently developed a kingdom theology, with Christian transformation of Chinese culture as part of the kingdom mission. Yu believes that current contextual theologies merely touch the surface of the present cultural context. The breakdown of personhood, the uprooting of spiritual values by market-driven functional rationality, is the heart of the matter. *Covenant is the answer to the postmodern culture of narcissism shaped by market *capitalism.

Phee Seng Kang actively promotes theology as public discourse. To him, the real challenge for Chinese theology lies in communicating the Christian faith and its rationality in the public forum and the academy, rejecting privatization and marginalization, refusing to allow public values shaped only by the secular market place. Theology should prophetically expose the poverty of scientific naturalism and secular *humanism, setting a new paradigm for interdisciplinary, cross-cultural and multi-perspectival quest for truth.

See also: SCIENCE AND THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

D. H. Bays, Christianity in China: From the Eighteenth Century to the Present (Stanford, 1996); T. C. Chao, 'The Basis of Social Reconstruction', Chinese Recorder 53, 1922, pp. 312–318; A. Hunter and K. K. Chan, Protestantism in Contemporary China (Cambridge, 1993); Kang Phee Seng, 'From Believing to Professing: Maintaining Distinctiveness in a Pluralistic Culture in Asia', Quest: An Interdisciplinary Journal for Asian Christian Scholars 1, 2002, pp. 35–47; idem, 'Religious Discourse in the Public Forum', in S. Chan (ed.), Truth to Proclaim (Singapore, 2002); Lam Wing-hung, Chinese Theology in Construction (Pasadena, 1983); Lutheran World Federation/Pro Mundi Vita, Christianity and the New China (South Pasadena, 1976); Yi-fan Shen, 'Theological Reflections in the Chinese Church', Chinese Theological Review, Vol. 4, 1988, pp. 22–31; C. S. Song, The Compassionate God (New York, 1982); idem, Jesus, The Crucified People (New York, 1990); B. Whyte, Unfinished Encounter: China and Christianity (London, 1988); C. Yu, Being and Relation: A Theological Critique of Western Individualism and Dualism (Edinburgh, 1987).

C. T. YU

CHRIST, JESUS, see CHRISTOLOGY; JESUS

CHRISTENDOM

The word 'Christendom' in English has had a peculiar history that partially distinguishes it from related words in other languages: the German Christentum, for example. But that peculiar history serves to highlight a problem that is important – and ambiguous – theologically. The word is first found in Old English at the end of the ninth century. The suffix, '-dom', was originally a noun that meant 'jurisdiction', and -dom words were coined to describe a certain state in either a concrete or an abstract sense. Thus, one could speak of a 'kingdom' as a concrete thing, a state, a polity, or of 'wisdom' as the abstract condition of being wise. 'Christendom' had both those senses (and Christentum [-tum is cognate with '-dom'] retains something of both). It was used in Old English to mean the Christian faith, Christianity as a system. But it was also used to mean the whole body of Christians and the society (or one of the polities) in which they lived.

In the post-Reformation world the abstract senses tended to be hived off onto other words (such as 'Christianity'), while 'Christendom' came almost exclusively to mean the place, the social and political sphere in which 'Christianity' was found and, ideally, embodied. And over the last fifty years or so the word has inevitably lost some of its currency: both theologians and politicians are increasingly unlikely to use it without either explanation or apology.

The idea of a society embodying Christian values only really became thinkable at all in the aftermath of the conversion of *Constantine in the early fourth century, and it was probably only around the year 350 that Christians achieved numerical parity with non-Christians in the Roman Empire. But the late Empire never really became coextensive with Christianity as a system of belief, for two reasons. On the one hand, in both the Eastern and Western halves of the Roman and post-Roman world there were for centuries large clusters of 'pagans' living under Christian overlordship. And on the other, there was always an awareness of large numbers of Christians living beyond Christian political dominion – in the Persian Empire, for example.

Four things radically altered this situation: the rise of Islam and the consequent fragmentation of the Mediterranean world; the evolution of a new and distinctively, or at least self-consciously, Christian civilization in the high Middle Ages (partly in response to Islam); the collapse of the short-lived Crusader states in the East; and, finally, the expansion of Ottoman power into the heartland of Europe. There gradually emerged an increasing sense of living in a sphere – social, political and intellectual as well as religious – that was uniquely shaped and defined by Christian belief – in other words, a Christiandom formed by Christianity. So 'Christendom' in this sense (the sense in which the word passed into the modern world) was in part a product of cultural isolation and in part a product of conflict – a painful awareness of standing over against a non-Christian 'other'. In that sense the existence of Islam as at once a social and political structure and a faith to be affirmed helped shape the counter-notion of 'Christendom'.

But the vision of a Christianized society and the idea that the levers of secular power should be used to bring that about entered Christian discourse much earlier, indeed as soon as the political possibility began to exist. Constantine, for example – the first Christian emperor – issued a long series of laws which he at least regarded as promoting Christian values and Christian moral teaching. For example, in 316, he prohibited the branding of criminals on the face because the face expressed the image of God (but they could be branded anywhere else). Other laws drastically restricted legal grounds for divorce, and in theory at least put an end to the cruelty of gladiatorial shows (though the latter was never really enforced). Other measures under Constantine and his successors used the means of the state to further the interests of the church. Clergy received substantial tax privileges, for example, and various civil penalties were imposed on an ever-expanding catalogue of heretics – though the latter were at best only spasmodically enforced. That vision survived the political break-up of the Empire. In both Byzantine East and Latin West (after the coronation of Charlemagne by Pope Leo III on Christmas Day 800) there remained an ideal of a universal empire supporting and supported by a universal church. Their particular interests and their means of operation might be different, but in theory at least the harmonious union of church and state was the unquestioned precondition and ideal of Christian civilization. And that vision was not undermined, in either East or West, by the frequent reality of bitter conflict between the two orders. Indeed, it was precisely that vision of harmonious union that made such conflict inevitable when either the sacred or the secular power seemed to the other to be getting out of step.

Even the fragmentation of ‘Christendom’ at the Reformation did not destroy the notion of a uniform society of church and state. It undid the universal power of the papacy over the church in Western Europe, but in different ways theologians such as *Luther, *Calvin and *Hooker continued to believe in and work for a united form of Christian social order with complementary roles for church and state.

Profound changes were wrought in the early modern period by massive intellectual shifts, such as the *Enlightenment and the development of a pluralistic social order. There were, nonetheless, thinkers in the twentieth century who believed it right to try to recover a Christian form of society. The Christendom movement, which had some influence in England in the 1920s and 1930s, supported and enabled by men such as V. A. Demant (1893–1983) and Maurice B. Reckitt (1888–1980), was an example of such thought. T. S. Eliot, in his book The Idea of a Christian Society (1939), is a further example of commitment to a Christian social order. And in America thinkers in the *Social Gospel tradition, such as Walter *Rauschenbusch and – in a more nuanced and ultimately more radical form – Reinhold *Niebuhr were passionate in their affirmation of the need for the Christian message to take its place in the public arena.

What, in the end, are we to make of the ideal of ‘Christendom’? It can be – and often is – argued that it is an idea past its sell-by date. On the one hand, internally as it were, there is the fact that Western society has entered a so-called post-Christian phase. It is not just a failure of Christian nerve here that leads to a rethink. Rather, it is the fact that Christian values – at least explicitly Christian values – may no longer command the measure of public consensus that can in and of itself be appealed to in order to justify their deployment in the framing of social policy. And on the other hand, there is an increasing awareness of the ever-growing importance theologically and ecclesially of various forms of Christianity in the non-Western world. Indeed, at the beginning of the twenty-first century the most vigorous centres of Christian growth are in Africa and Asia. Where and what, then, is ‘Christendom’?

So those two facts together subvert any lingering sense that ‘Christendom’ is something that can be located on a map. But the dream of trying to realize – in some measure at least – Christian values in the here and now of social and political life will not, and should not, go away. A model for trying to understand what the concept of Christendom might mean for the twenty-first century is perhaps provided by a theologian who was himself living on the cusp between two ages. *Augustine began his City of God (it was to occupy him on and off for nearly fifteen years) in the aftermath of the sack of Rome by Alaric’s Goths in 410. The invaders were themselves Christian – though, like most of the Germanic tribes, they had been converted to a form of *Arianism – but those three days of destruction brought the self-confidence of a society that had increasingly come to define itself as Christian crashing to the ground.

Augustine's response was a profound rethinking of the real though hidden ways in which God's purposes are worked out in history. This meant, first, an unwavering conviction that all of human history is somehow in God's hands. Second, the whole of human history is structured by a tension between two 'cities', the city of God and the city opposed to it, distinguished and defined by two 'loves' – two patterns of response to and relationship with God. Third, the city of God, though partially manifested and partially realized in time and space, can never be identified with any concrete, earthly polity. The purposes and policies of even the greatest of human rulers have been at least partially compromised by pride and self-aggrandizement. And therefore, finally, the city of God is and must remain an eschatological reality. It is something towards which we – as individuals, as a Christian people, as the whole of humankind – are ineluctably moving, but which will only become a reality at the end of all things, when all the redeemed stand in the presence of God, united in their love for him and for each other (see *Eschatology; *Kingdom of God).

The peculiar way in which the usage of the word has developed in English can perhaps help us retrace something of Augustine's journey. Christendom as a polity is distinct from Christianity as a system of belief. It cannot neatly be located on a map – as many in late medieval, or even the nineteenth, centuries were often tempted to do. But the public sphere does lie open to Christian influence and is one of the arenas in which Christian life is to be lived out. Christendom remains a task, a goal and a dream.

See also: SOCIETY, THEOLOGY OF; STATE.

Bibliography

C. Gore et al., The Return of Christendom (London, 1922); R. A. Markus, Saeculum: History and Society in the Theology of St Augustine (Cambridge, 1989); R. Niebuhr, The Nature and Destiny of Man, 2 vols. (Hitchin, 1941–3); O. O'Donovan and J. L. O'Donovan (eds.), From Irenaeus to Grotius: A Sourcebook in Christian Political Thought 100–1625 (Grand Rapids, 1999); W. Rauschenbusch, Christianity and the Social Crisis (London, 1907); M. B. Reckitt (ed.), Prospect for Christendom (London, 1945).

P. PARVIS

CHRISTIAN LIFE

While sanctification, spirituality and the Christian life each concern Christian transformation, the Christian life particularly concerns the character human life takes under the determination of God's grace. It has to do with how Christians are claimed by the *gospel, the spiritual postures and practices that rightly relate to God's *salvation.

As a subset of *sanctification, a theology of the Christian life will derive from soteriology. Different accounts, then, will diverge according to their respective accent upon salvation, that is, their different understandings of the nature of God's *grace and how such is received. And because the diversity is due to variations on a common root, making it impossible to categorize them in any straightforward way, the following will classify different versions according to emphasis. But these designations are primarily pedagogical and need not be mutually exclusive.

Ethical

Conceptions of the Christian life which locate obedience at its heart attempt to account for the moral claim God's salvation places upon its recipients and are influenced by the role discipleship played in Christ's ministry. One of the earliest of these was the dilemma of the 'two ways' in which Christians faced a constant choice between 'the way of light' and the 'way of darkness'. The former typically consisted of obedience to the Bible's moral imperatives (see The Epistle of Barnabas, chs. 19–20).

Desiderius *Erasmus proffered his philosophia Christi (philosophy of Christ), a less mystical, more humanist version of Thomas à Kempis' Imitatio Christi (*imitation of Christ). This urged learning the mind of Christ through obedience to the ethics of the Sermon on the Mount.

Dietrich *Bonhoeffer, while in accord with what is here labelled the 'relational' view, emphasized obedience and discipleship for Christian living and thus deserves mention. Bonhoeffer loathed 'cheap grace', 'grace without discipleship, grace without the cross, grace without the living, incarnate Jesus Christ' (Discipleship, Minneapolis, 2001, p. 44). He thus intertwined faith and obedience, arguing for the equal truth of the two statements: 'only the believers obey, and only the obedient believe' (ibid., p. 63). His explanation shows his sensitivity to and care in trying to avoid transgressing the Protestant doctrine of *justification: 'Because we are justified by faith, faith and obedience have to be distinguished. But their division must never destroy their unity, which lies in the reality that faith exists only in obedience, is never without obedience. Faith is only faith in deeds of obedience' (ibid., p. 64). Here again, the Sermon on the Mount was central.

The potential pitfalls concern the role assigned to good works. There are the pastoral perils of legalism which can both give the impression that the success of one's Christianity depends upon oneself and make for grudging obedience. There are also the theological errors of *Pelagianism and *Semi-Pelagianism. These underestimate both the extent of human depravity (see *Sin) and the priority of God's grace. While Bonhoeffer avoids these, Roman Catholic moralism was subject to the ire of Martin *Luther who was certain of violation on both counts. By making discipleship part of the believer's relationship with God, Catholics changed salvation into law. Law turned obedience into slavish duty and therefore made it superficial, whereas the gospel, in freeing Christians from law through justification, enables genuine obedience rendered out of love, not fear (see his On Christian Liberty). Luther specifically targeted Erasmus' Diatribes on the Freedom of the Will which said there were two causes of salvation: grace and human will. Luther's The Bondage of the Will replied that the human will is enslaved to sin, unable to cooperate with God's grace. Moreover, since God's salvation is a gift, human cooperation is inappropriate.

Mystical

Medieval *mysticism, prompted by the beatitude, 'the pure in heart will see God', saw salvation as mystical/spiritual communion with God. Accordingly, the Christian life is cultivating intense experiences of God by contemplating the incomprehensible divine essence. *Augustine outlined three stages of spiritual ascent: purgation, illumination and union (the beatific *vision). Most mystical works delineate degrees of knowledge through which the mystic must progress. Experiencing the transforming love of God is a frequent theme, as the writings of *Bernard of Clairvaux and Richard of St Victor show. Recently, mystical practices have seen Protestant attention on the 'spiritual disciplines' which urge fasting, lectio divina (meditative Bible reading) and divine hours (see Richard Foster, The Celebration of Discipline, New York, 1988).

Karl *Barth's rejection of Christianity as a 'religion' is an example of a critique. Since the doctrine of justification means that a believer's relationship with God is perfectly established in the finished work of Christ, Barth argued that the Christian life cannot concern sinful humans anxiously attempting to deepen or develop through religious activities what is already fully present (see CD I/2, 17).

Relational

The Reformers followed the Renaissance return to simple biblical morality, though they set it within the context of God's prior justification of the Christian. Their approach is 'relational', because it emphasizes above all the relationship forged by God in Christ and understands any act of moral obedience as the fruit of this relationship, not something constitutive of it.

Luther distinguished between two types of *righteousness: righteousness coram Deo (before God) and righteousness coram homine (before humanity). Coram Deo, good works of discipleship, have no place, for only Christ's righteousness is adequate. Coram homine, however, they are necessary and pleasing to God, though without faith they are insincere and therefore presuppose a relationship with Christ. Discipleship is thus communio cum Christo (communion with Christ) not imitatio Christi; it is Christ's character shining through the believer united to him in justification.

John Calvin and the *Reformed tradition developed Luther's notion of union with Christ, argued that obedience stemmed from gratitude for God's grace, and spoke of law more positively as instructive and motivating for Christian obedience. The Reformed tradition also emphasized the close relationship between word and Spirit, holding that the justifying word is never without the sanctifying Spirit. While John *Wesley had a more progressive and optimistic understanding of sanctification, he still believed it was a gift of God's love, not something earned. The Christian life was being perfected by God's love and sharing that love with the world through evangelism and charity (see bibliography).

Despite its best intentions to preserve both grace and obedience, this view of the Reformers is charged with *antinomianism by Roman Catholics and some Protestants. It is alleged that if good works have no material role in salvation, then obedience is optional. God's grace appears to make his commands ring hollow, and grace should never become an excuse for inaction.

Ecclesial

Because Christ is head of the church, Christians can grow in Christ only as members of his corporate body. Thus, Bonhoeffer claimed the Christian life is 'life together'. In his classic book bearing that title he described how, because of the *incarnation, Christian existence is physical, and therefore being present with other believers is a comfort. He also discussed how believers hear Scripture together, receive sacraments together, confess sins to each other and have both ministries to fulfil and gifts to exercise in the church.

Another ecclesial view is found in the so-called 'cultural-linguistic' or postliberal school of theology. Following the insights of recent sociology which show how humans develop through social conventions, proponents argue that the practices of the church – sacraments, fellowship, corporate prayer and public Scripture reading – give meaning to the Christian life. The church is not just one space in which the Christian life can be practised, but the primary locus for spiritual formation. From an ethicist's perspective, Stanley *Hauerwas has similarly stressed that the church forms Christian character (see bibliography).

Kevin Vanhoozer, without diminishing the church's role in spiritual formation, has sought to restore the authority of the word in this schema. He argues that what gives meaning and power to these 'ecclesial practices' are the prior 'canonical practices', activities commanded by and instituted in the Bible. For Vanhoozer, the Christian life is first hermeneutical, a matter of interpreting and fittingly performing one's role within God's drama of redemption as relayed in Scripture (see his The Drama of Doctrine: A Canonical-Linguistic Approach to Christian Theology, Louisville, 2005).

Sacramental

In *Roman Catholicism and *Eastern Orthodoxy, salvation includes being ontologically transformed. While differing in the specifics, both consider the *sacraments integral to this process. They thus become the focus of the Christian life. Christians begin with regeneration in baptism which gives them power over sin. They mature in confirmation (Catholic only), are continually renewed in penance and nourished by the Eucharist. Disagreements about the nature and function of the sacraments become important for the success of this version.

Political

Christ announced the *kingdom of God – a message with political overtones – and the NT speaks variously of Christians in political terms (e.g. believers are 'citizens of heaven'). Accordingly, some promote a political account of the Christian life. Here, God's grace is socially liberating, and his salvation is more about the optimization of human society through Christian ethics than personal betterment or individual rescue from sin and eternal damnation.

These sentiments lie behind the *Social Gospel movement in America in which the Christian life consisted of being politically and publicly active, assisting the transformation of society through advocating for the disenfranchised, serving the poor and combatting inequality. Similarly, *liberation and *Black theologies stress Christian praxis, the work of Christians in revealing and opposing oppressive societal forces. John Howard *Yoder proffered yet another political view of the Christian life where being a Christian is being political. He believed the integrity of the Christian political vision should never be dulled by complicity with the state. Instead, Christians must have a prophetic voice in culture and practise a radical ethics of nonviolence. As with the sacramental view, most objections concern the interpretation of the political dimensions of the gospel. At the very least, critics contend the social benefits of the gospel should not come at the expense of classical theories of salvation.

Bibliography

K. Barth, Church Dogmatics IV/4 (ET, Edinburgh, 1969); S. Ferguson, The Christian Life: A Doctrinal Introduction (Edinburgh, 1981); S. Hauerwas, A Community of Character: Toward a Constructive Christian Social Ethic (Notre Dame, 1981); D. H. Knight, The Eschatological Economy: Time and the Hospitality of God (Grand Rapids, 2006); J. Webster, 'Discipleship and Obedience', Scottish Bulletin of Evangelical Theology 24.1 (Spring 2006), pp. 4–18; J. Wesley, A Plain Account of Christian Perfection (Peabody, 2007); D. Willard, The Divine Conspiracy: Rediscovering Our Hidden Life in God (New York, 1998); J. H. Yoder, Discipleship as Political Responsibility (Scottsdale, 2003); P. F. M. Zahl, Grace in Practice: A Theology of Everyday Life (Grand Rapids, 2007).

J. R. A. MERRICK

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE, see SECTS

CHRISTIAN SOCIALISM

The Christian Socialist movement is usually thought to have begun in the nineteenth century. The interest of Christian thinkers and practitioners in the ideals of common ownership and of a universal society of human brotherhood is much older. It has often been said that the experiment in Acts 2:44–45 of holding all things in common is the first Christian socialist experiment. The commitment to such themes can be found in the early Fathers and in the development of the *monastic movement. Nevertheless, the name ‘Christian Socialist’ came to be used in relation to British nineteenth-century developments, many of which had their roots in the Church of England (see *Anglicanism).

Robert Owen’s (1771–1858) social experiments at New Lanark, Scotland, marked the first nineteenth-century attempt at a form of socialist organization. There were some clergy who took an interest in it. A few clergy were also to be found sympathizing with the working-class political reform movement, Chartism, in the 1840s. However, the beginnings of an organized movement of Christian leaders sympathetic to socialism came with the joining of J. M. F. Ludlow (1821–1911) with F. D. Maurice (1805–72). It was Ludlow’s experience of socialism in Paris that provoked him to see the need for socialism to come under the influence of Christian thought. It was they, together with Charles Kingsley (1819–75) and Thomas Hughes (1822–96) for a time, who began to respond to the failure of the Chartist movement by experimenting in thought and action and who called their work ‘Christian Socialism’.

F. D. Maurice stressed the universal character of the *kingdom of Christ. The Christian gospel reveals the true state of man. The starting point for Christian thought and the perspective from which we should view human life in the world is the kingship of Christ and the fact that God has both created and redeemed humankind in Christ. Maurice’s theology is inclusive and *universalist. It was this fact of faith which Maurice brought to bear in his political interests in an age of social unrest as Britain moved into its industrial age and class-structured social order. Following the failure of the Chartist movement in 1848, Maurice and his friends sought to experiment in co-operative workshops, in the development of the Working Men’s College and in journalism and tracts such as ‘Politics for the People’ and ‘Tracts on Christian Socialism’.

The development of Christian Socialism took on a number of forms in the nineteenth century. In the 1870s a group of *Anglo-Catholics began to organize themselves and in 1877 formed the Guild of St Matthew. Stewart Headlam (1847–1924) was the founder priest of the guild. It was more radical and activist in kind than Maurice’s group had been at an earlier stage. The Guild attacked social injustice wherever it found it and made many public statements as to what needed to be done. It pressed for action by Parliament on housing, education and working conditions. It produced the magazine The Church Reformer. Many dedicated Anglo-Catholic priests who worked hard in the slums of east and south London saw their commitment to the working classes as the proper expression of an incarnational understanding of Christian faith. Their commitment to action and radical reform was for them a direct consequence of a truly *incarnational theology.

The Christian Social Union, founded in 1889, was much more respectable (‘wishywashy’ was Headlam’s judgment of it!). It was less concerned with direct action than with establishing social principles from Christian faith. It was more given to organizing study groups and encouraging writing. B. F. *Westcott, Bishop of Durham in the last years of the nineteenth century, was one of the most distinguished presidents of the Christian Social Union. His socialism, like that of Maurice, took its form from his conviction of our union and unity in Jesus Christ. ‘Men are “one man” in Christ, sons of God and brethren’ (quoted in A. R. Vidler, F. D. Maurice and Company, London, 1966, p. 26). Westcott took a leading role in the settlement of the 1893 Durham miners’ strike.

It was in the twentieth century that the Christian Socialist movement began to have an increasing influence on public life in Britain, and on theology and church life. People such as R. H. Tawney, J. H. Oldham and William *Temple began to organize conferences and gatherings to address the growing challenge of the market economy. R. H. Tawney helped draft Labour Party manifesto material and wrote a seminal work, Religion and the Rise of Capitalism in 1948. George Lansbury, Labour leader following Ramsay MacDonald, was an active Christian and a pacifist. In the post-war Labour Government of 1945, Sir Stafford Cripps, who became Chancellor of the Exchequer, was a deeply committed Anglican in the Catholic tradition.

In the wider world facing huge levels of *poverty, oppression and inequality, the developing world gave birth to the movement of *liberation theology which, in different ways, sought to respond to the *Marxist agenda and the demand for revolutionary change. This movement was especially powerful in the 1970s in South America and was driven by the work of theologians such as Gustavo *Gutiérrez and Jon *Sobrinho. Their commitment to a theology and praxis arising from the communities of the poor and excluded held a vision of a revolutionary future fed by gospel imperatives.

In more recent times when the language of both Marxism and socialism has become increasingly difficult, the Christian Socialist Movement has changed its name to 'Christians on the Left'. The increasing inequalities of our age bring the historic agenda of the socialist movement to the fore in our own time. It will be interesting to see how thoughtful Christians respond to these challenges and whether they will link to this history of radical thought.

Bibliography

T. Christensen, Origin and History of Christian Socialism, 1848–54 (Aarhus, 1962); D. Hay, A Christian Critique of Capitalism (Bramcote, Nottingham, 1975); K. Leech, The Social God (London, 1981); F. D. Maurice, The Kingdom of Christ (1838; several edns); E. R. Norman, The Victorian Christian Socialists (Cambridge, 1987); R. H. Tawney, Religion and the Rise of Capitalism (Penguin, 1948); idem, Equality (Open University, 1964).

For general background history: C. Bryant, Possible Dreams: A Personal History of British Christian Socialists (London, 1996); idem, Stafford Cripps (London, 1997); G. Gutiérrez, The Liberation of Theology (Maryknoll, 1976); E. Hobsbawm, 4 vol. history, from Age of Revolution (1962) to Age of Extremes (1994)

(London); J. Sobrinho, The True Church and the Poor (London, 1985); E. P. Thompson, The Making of the English Working Class (London, 1968).

J. GLADWIN

CHRISTIANITY AND OTHER RELIGIONS

Although Christianity has always existed in a world of religious diversity, the reality of our post-Christendom, post-colonial, post-holocaust, post-9/11 and 7/7, multi-ethnic and multicultural context has meant that more than ever Christians are acutely aware of systematic, pastoral and *missiological issues posed by other religions. The missiologist Gerald Anderson has stated that 'No issue in missiology is more important, more difficult, more controversial, or more divisive for the days ahead than the theology of religions . . . This is the theological issue for mission in . . . the twenty-first century' ('Theology of Religions and Missiology: A Time of Testing', in A. F. Glassner, C. E. Van Engen, D. S. Gilliland and P. E. Pierson (eds.), The Good News of the Kingdom: Mission Theology for the Third Millennium, Maryknoll, 1993, p. 201).

As a discipline, the 'theology of religions' has had a meteoric rise to fame and quickly become its own distinct category in theological studies. The 'theology of religions' must be distinguished from the allegedly 'neutral' discipline of academic 'religious studies', for although being sibling rivals striving to occupy the same space, the 'theology of religions' locates itself in the tradition of fides quaerens intellectum ('faith seeking understanding'): 'The theology of religion asks what religion is and seeks, in the light of Christian faith, to interpret the universal religious experience of humankind; it further studies the relationship between revelation and faith, faith and religion, and faith and salvation' (J. Dupuis, Toward a Christian Theology of Religious Pluralism, Orbis, 1997, p. 7). Although the focus of the 'theology of religions' has often concentrated on the issue of salvation, a truly comprehensive Christian theology of religions includes not only questions pertaining to salvation, but questions pertaining to truth in other religions, and questions pertaining to the phenomena of human religiosity.

In 1983, Alan Race, an Anglican priest and theologian, developed a threefold typology that has largely set the terms of debate over the last twenty years within the 'theology of religions' (Christians and Religious Pluralism, London, 1983). Netland (Dissonant Voices, p. 9f.) neatly summarizes these positions:

Exclusivism maintains that the central claims of Christianity are true, and that where the claims of Christianity conflict with those of other religions the latter are to be rejected as false. Christian exclusivists also characteristically hold that Jesus Christ is the unique incarnation of God, the only Lord and Saviour. Salvation is not to be found in the structures of other religious traditions . . . Inclusivism . . . holds that [although] God has revealed himself definitively in Jesus Christ and that Jesus is somehow central to God's provision of salvation for humankind, they are willing to allow that God's salvation is available through non-Christian religions . . . Pluralism parts company with both exclusivism and inclusivism by rejecting the premise that God has revealed himself in any unique or definitive sense in Jesus Christ. On the contrary, God is said to be actively revealing himself in all religious traditions . . . Christian faith is merely one of many equally legitimate human responses to the same divine reality.

Historical context

Historically, the dominant theme regarding Christian approaches to other religions has been exclusivistic. While philosophical and socio-cultural factors have played their part, the foundational authoritative basis for historical affirmations of exclusivism has been the strongly exclusivistic tenor of the Bible (both OT and NT) which Christians have understood to be a true and unified revelation of God's works and words in history. The constant theme throughout the history of Israel and in the founding of the Christian church is both the incomparability (none like him) and transcendent uniqueness (no other God) of YHWH, and Jesus Christ who is God incarnate (cf. C. J. H. Wright, The Mission of God, Nottingham, 2006, p. 82).

As a consequence of the nature and activity of God comes a secondary affirmation of the incomparability and uniqueness of both Israel and the church. There is no other covenant community like them, and there is no other community with a history like theirs, because the incomparable and unique God has covenanted with them alone and intervened salvifically on their behalf alone (see *Covenant; Salvation). However, with this theme of particularity also come complementary themes of universality, inclusion, diversity and tolerance (e.g. attitudes towards the alien and stranger; attitudes towards ethnic diversity, including the eschatological hope of Christians being drawn from all nations and languages; God's universal care and sustenance of creation; the universal scope of the gospel and the universal mandate to take the gospel to the nations, etc.). Such exclusivity should never lead to vain glory or malice, for both Israel and the church are chosen by the sheer grace of God to display his glory, and have a unique responsibility and calling to be a light for the nations in both word and deed.

Although the exclusivist mood of the biblical testimony continued into the early church, the writings of some of the early Fathers, such as Justin, Irenaeus, Origen and Clement of Alexandria, indicate a willingness to speculate on the relationship between Christianity and other philosophies in matters of truth and salvation. However, it is *Cyprian in The Unity of the Catholic Church who is responsible for the slogan most often associated with exclusivism, 'extra ecclesiam nulla salus' ('outside the church there is no salvation'), remembering his focus was that of schismatics and heretics rather than other religions per se. With Augustine, this axiom was strengthened. *Augustine's teaching on original guilt, predestination, God's sovereignty and efficacious grace gave a far more substantial theological and philosophical basis and reinforced Christian particularity. Within Roman Catholic teaching, exclusivistic interpretations of extra ecclesium nulla salus (albeit with some modifications) continued until the Second Vatican Council, when many acknowledge that in terms of the three-fold typology, Roman Catholic teaching shifted from the exclusivist paradigm into the inclusivist paradigm (see F. A. Sullivan, Salvation Outside the Church? Tracing the History of the Catholic Response, London, 1992).

The Protestant Reformers largely continued the exclusivist heritage, not so much under the banner of extra ecclesiam nulla salus, but rather under their five solas of the *Reformation: sola Scriptura, solus Christus, sola fide, sola gratia, soli Deo Gloria. Calvin affirmed a universal natural revelation of God in all humanity, a sensus divinitatis or semen religionis, but claimed that because of the sinfulness of man, such knowledge was always twisted and distorted away from God (Institutes, 1.3.1–2) (see *Reformed theology).

For those coming under its sway, the *Enlightenment, with its own ultimate commitment to autonomous human reason, signalled a paradigm shift in the theology of religions: the death knell for exclusivism, but the breeding ground for what would become inclusivism, pluralism and the scientific study of religion (religious studies). Changes in fundamental doctrinal loci would mean changes in the Christian attitude towards the religious other. However, not all were influenced by Enlightenment presuppositions, and the early modern missionary movement continued to be propelled by an exclusivist engine fuelled on the uniqueness of Christ and the uniqueness of the Christian message. This culminated in intense debate at the first three world missionary conferences of Edinburgh (1910), Jerusalem (1928) and Tambaram (1938), where a wide range of missiological issues were discussed, underlying which was the relationship of Christianity to the world religions. One exclusivist scholar inextricably linked to and towering over these conferences, in particular Tambaram, was the Dutch missiologist Hendrik *Kraemer, whose multi-disciplinary approach combined theological, missiological, linguistic and phenomenological insights. Kraemer's main works, The Christian Message in a Non-Christian World (1938), Religion and the Christian Faith (1956), and World Cultures and World Religions (1960), remain some of the most detailed, nuanced and sophisticated statements within the exclusivist paradigm, and have influenced (though not without criticism) subsequent generations of exclusivist missiologists from the 'Reformed' tradition, most importantly J. H. *Bavinck, Johannes Verkuyl and Lesslie *Newbiggin.

Within the contemporary scene, different versions of exclusivism, inclusivism and pluralism can be found at both popular and academic levels, together with the emerging voices of post-liberalism (with its social and political emphasis) and comparative theology (which, in fact, argues against an all-encompassing a priori theology of religions, focusing more on a posteriori engagement between living religious traditions).

Rethinking the terms of the debate

As the 'theology of religions' continues to mature as a discipline, an important debate concerns the 'terms' on which the debate has been conducted. Increasingly, many scholars are dissatisfied with the threefold typology. First, as a classificatory system, the tradition-specific nature of all theology means that the theology of religions is a parasitic discipline dependent on other a priori theological commitments. Whilst recognizing the pedagogical usefulness of all typologies and taxonomies, there is no real 'generic' exclusivism, inclusivism or pluralism, and if such generalizations are made, they must be recognized as a rather blunt analytical tool. At the very least, exclusivism, inclusivism and pluralism must be seen as points along a spectrum, rather than hermetically sealed positions. For example, 'exclusivism' is a broad enough category to posit a number of different configurations and interpretations concerning issues pertaining to salvation and truth and human religiosity. Exclusivism certainly does not necessarily entail a parsimony regarding salvation.

Second, a number of scholars have argued that there is an inbuilt prescriptive bias in the way the threefold typology has been construed, a bias against exclusivism often portrayed in overly emotive and 'sensationalistic' terms, and for pluralism (and to a lesser extent inclusivism) portrayed not only as more enlightened and tolerant than the other positions but more significantly religiously and epistemologically 'neutral'. D'Costa has argued that 'pluralism' is itself a 'myth' and in reality a covert form of hardline exclusivism: "pluralism" represents a tradition-specific approach that bears all the features of exclusivism – except that it is liberal modernity's exclusivism' (The Meeting of Religions and the Trinity, p. 22). Far from enabling tolerance and diversity, pluralism does the opposite, for it 'privileges liberal modernity as a mastercode within which all the religions are positioned and neutered' (Religions and the Trinity, p. 91). His conclusion is that 'pluralism' becomes something other than Christian, a worshipping of the god of modernity rather than the triune God.

The debate within evangelicalism

Despite there being scholarly disagreement amongst evangelicals regarding a plethora of issues regarding soteriological, truth and missiological questions, *evangelicalism is still largely a confessionally exclusivistic movement, stressing the authority of the Bible, the uniqueness of Christ and the necessity of faith in Christ. Three important international symposia have articulated exclusivist themes in their official statements: the *Frankfurt Declaration (1970), the *Lausanne Covenant (1974) and the Manila Manifesto (1992), and several evangelical theologians and missiologists have articulated nuanced and constructive exclusivist positions: e.g. Harold Netland, Don Carson, Chris Wright, Vinoth Ramachandra, Gerald McDermott and Terrance Tiessen. More controversially, there are also a handful of evangelical theologians like Clark *Pinnock and John Sanders who can be located more comfortably within inclusivism than exclusivism. Generally speaking, and compared to other traditions, evangelicals have a lot more thinking to do in this area of theology.

Any evangelical 'theology of religions' must recognize at one and the same time both continuity and discontinuity between the quest for God in other faiths and the fullness and finality of the knowledge of God 'in the face of Jesus Christ'. Non-Christian religion, alike in its most debated and most elevated manifestations, always bears the dual impress of God's gracious *revelation of himself to all humankind in creation and humankind's universal exchange of the truth of God for a lie. So long as these twin biblical perspectives are maintained, there may be scope for legitimate differences in the way Christian theology balances and correlates them in its evaluation of other religions. The two perspectives are tellingly presented in Paul's address at Athens. Despite the universality of God's providential care and presence (Acts 17:24–28), the Athenians' religiosity suppressed the knowledge of the true God. Their abundant images and idols attested their ignorance of him (17:16, 22–23, 29–30), and even their awareness of that ignorance (17:23). Paul's message came to hearers whose refusal to know the living God had left its mark upon their religion. Because idols are distortions and perversions of truth and so 'related' to truth, like Kraemer one might cautiously say that Christianity is the 'contradictive or subversive fulfilment' of the human religious quest (Kraemer, 'Continuity or Discontinuity', in W. Paton (ed.), The Authority of Faith, London, 1939, p. 5).

See also: BUDDHISM AND CHRISTIANITY; CONFUCIANISM AND CHRISTIANITY; HINDUISM AND CHRISTIANITY; ISLAM AND CHRISTIANITY; JUDAISM AND CHRISTIANITY; RELIGION; RELIGIONS, THEOLOGY OF; SHINTOISM AND CHRISTIANITY; TAOISM AND CHRISTIANITY; ZOROASTRIANISM AND CHRISTIANITY.

Bibliography

J. H. Bavinck, The Church Between Temple and Mosque (Grand Rapids, 1966); J. Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion, tr. F. L. Battles (London and Philadelphia, 1961); D. A. Carson, The Gaggling of God: Christianity Confronts Pluralism (Leicester and Grand Rapids, 1996); G. D'Costa, The Meeting of Religions and the Trinity (New York, 2000); V. Kärkäinen, An Introduction to the Theology of Religions: Biblical, Historical and Contemporary Perspectives (Downers Grove, 2003); H. Kraemer, The Christian Message in a Non-Christian World (New York, 1938); G. McDermott, God's Rivals (Downers Grove, 2007); H. Netland, Dissonant Voices (Grand Rapids and Leicester, 1991); idem, Encountering World Religions: The Challenge to Christian Faith and Mission (Leicester and Grand Rapids, 2001); T. Perry, Radical Difference: A Defence of Hendrik Kraemer's Theology of Religions (Ontario, 2001); A. Plantinga, 'Pluralism: A Defense of Religious Exclusivism', in T. D. Senior (ed.), The Rationality of Belief and the Plurality of Faith (London and New York, 1995); D. Strange, The Possibility of Salvation Among the Unevangelised (Carlisle, 2002); T. L. Tiessen, Who Can Be Saved? Reassessing Salvation in Christ and World Religions (Leicester and Downers Grove, 2004).

D. S. STRANGE

CHRISTOLOGY

An account of the identity of *Jesus of Nazareth, especially of his humanity and divinity or of his relation to *God. It tends now to be distinguished from the closely related topic of soteriology (see *Salvation), which treats Jesus' saving work.

NT Christology

Jesus was a first-century Jewish man who attracted a considerable following as he travelled Palestine healing, exorcizing and proclaiming a message of repentance as preparation for God's coming *judgment. Christology began as, during his ministry, this man presented himself, and was understood by others, in terms adapted very largely from the Judaism of his day (particularly Jewish apocalypticism). After his execution as a trouble-maker, his followers proclaimed that his tomb had been found empty, that he was risen from the dead, and that he had appeared to many of them. Christology developed as they made sense of Jesus as the crucified and risen one, drawing on a wide variety of Jewish and Hellenistic sources (and it is important to recognize that Judaism and Hellenism were already interacting in complex ways in this context). Who was this man? they asked. What part did he play in God's plans? They sought adequate terms to express their sense that God had spoken to them, laid hold of them, and saved them through the life, death and resurrection of Jesus Christ (see *Cross: Resurrection of Christ).

Older discussions of early Christology tended to focus on the titles which Jesus used of himself or which were used by others: Rabbi, Prophet, King, Christ, Son of Man, Son of God, Saviour, Lamb of God, Logos, etc. More recent discussions have tended to explore more complex ways in which existing Jewish and Hellenistic ideas and narratives were drawn into the process by which Jesus made sense of himself and was made sense of by others. Such ideas were transformed as they were given a new context in early Christian community life, evangelistic endeavours, and above all devotion. After all, 'a noteworthy devotion to Jesus emerges phenomenally early in circles of his followers' and it 'was exhibited in an unparalleled intensity and diversity of expression, for which we have no true analogy in the religious environment of the time' (L. W. Hurtado, Lord Jesus Christ, p. 2). Yet Jesus appears to have been the recipient of devotion by Christians who nevertheless regarded themselves still as monotheists, worshipping the one God now as the Father of Jesus Christ, and Jesus as that Father's Son and viceroy, and as the exemplar and enabler of human life acceptable to God.

The NT writings are the primary evidence for early Christological developments. In Paul's letters, for instance, we see Jesus identified as the supremely obedient Son, the embodiment of divine wisdom, the Lord of Christian life; in John's Gospel he is God's Word made flesh, sent to show God's character and enact God's saving purposes; in the book of Revelation, he is the conquering, slaughtered Lamb of God who receives the worship of the saints.

Patristic Christology

The second and third centuries saw many different attempts to make sense of the relationship of Jesus to the one he called 'Father' (see *Fatherhood of God). There were those who interpreted Jesus either as an angel who had come down to earth and been clothed with human flesh, or as a human being who had at some point been appointed to angelic power and status or adopted as God's Son and representative – a view sometimes called *adoptionism. The result of both views was a Jesus who was not quite divine and not quite human, and theologians like Ignatius of Antioch and *Tertullian demurred, stressing (against *Docetism) Jesus' full humanity and the reality of his suffering, and insisting (against *adoptionism) that he had been fully divine from the very moment of his conception, so that divinity was not a matter of his achievement and God's response, but simply of God's gracious gift.

*Gnostic Christologies, while having much in common with some angel Christologies, tended to claim that the God revealed in Jesus Christ was not the Creator God of the OT, convinced as they were that Christ saved people from the disastrous mess that was the created world. They were opposed by such theologians as *Irenaeus of Lyons, who presented Christ's incarnation as the summation of a salvation history of cosmic scope, bringing God's work in creation and in the covenant with Israel to its proper completion. According to Irenaeus and others, Christ's advent initiates the salvation of the world, rather than being a catalyst for salvation from the world.

At the start of the fourth century, a controversy erupted around an Alexandrian presbyter named *Arius, who stated more clearly than others before him the idea that the divine Son who had become incarnate in Jesus was a creature, albeit the first and greatest of all creatures. The Father's relation to the Son was therefore the result of a specific action on the Father's part, rather than being eternally characteristic of him. Arius's created and originate Son is of a fundamentally different order of reality from the creating and unoriginate Father. Arius was condemned at the Council of *Nicaea in 325, which asserted (without clarifying exactly what the term meant) that the Son was homoousios ('of one substance') with the Father. Arius's views later became a foil for the theology of *Athanasius of Alexandria, who argued that to know God as the Father of the Son is to know him truly, for he is eternally and essentially a Father-who-has-a-Son. For Athanasius, there is no foreign God hidden behind the familiar face that God turns to the world in Jesus Christ.

There were debates in the fourth and fifth centuries amongst those working with the Johannine idea that Jesus is the incarnation of God's Word or *Logos. The divine Logos is the expression of God's wisdom and the template for creation, and came to be seen as a distinct *hypostasis (often translated '*person', but meaning here 'distinguishable reality'), eternally united with the Father in the Godhead. Some theologians, who tend to be identified with the city of *Alexandria, insisted that this divine Logos was in the incarnation united to human flesh in such a way as to produce a single resultant reality (and fifth-century Alexandrians could insist that Christ had one physis or 'nature' in order to speak about the unity of this reality). This emphasis cohered with a stress in their theologies on the union of all humanity with God which God has made possible through Christ. The difficulty lay in defining 'flesh', a word that could refer to the fullness of human life, but that was sometimes taken simply to refer to Jesus' physical body, as with the version of this thinking promoted by *Apollinarius, who argued that in place of a human soul Christ had the divine Logos. Other theologians, who tend to be identified with *Antioch, insisted against this tendency that the incarnate Lord consisted of the divine Logos united not just to 'flesh' but to a distinct, complete human individual. The strong version of this thinking, attributed (probably unfairly) to *Nestorius, suggested that Christ consisted of two distinct realities (two hypostases), one divine and one human.

Rejecting the extremes associated with Apollinarius and Nestorius, and drawing on vocabulary developed in the 'Tome' of Pope *Leo I, the Council of *Chalcedon in 451 offered a formula intended to unite Alexandria and Antioch. It claimed that Christ was one person in two natures: the former reflecting the Alexandrian insistence, associated with men like *Cyril of Alexandria (a theologian whose thinking was particularly formative for Chalcedon), the latter reflecting the Antiochene insistence, associated with theologians like Theodore of Mopsuestia. That is, one should never so speak of the humanity and of the divinity of Christ as to suggest that he consists of two distinct realities, artificially joined together; Christ is one distinct reality (one hypostasis or 'person') 'without division, without separation'. Equally, one should never so speak of the unity of this reality that one fails to distinguish between the unqualifiedly complete human life (or 'nature') and the unqualifiedly complete divine life (or 'nature') that this one reality bears ('the distinction of natures being in no way annulled by the union'). Chalcedon did not offer a coherent metaphysical theory of how this unity-in-distinction was possible, but rather laid down a set of parameters and provided a language that allows the emphases of both sides to be articulated. This attempted settlement was rejected by a significant number of more '*monophysite' ('one-nature') Alexandrian theologians, who believed that its insistence on attributing two distinguishable natures to Christ underplayed his unity, and who insisted that Christ could only be one person if he had a single, divine-human nature. For much of the church, however, the Chalcedonian formula became the chief foundation of classical Christology.

An attempt to spell out a fuller conceptual articulation of the Chalcedonian settlement was hammered out in Byzantine Christological controversy in the period after Chalcedon (451–787). One way of approaching that explanation is to recognize that a constant problem for theologians before this period had been the presence in the Gospels of witness on the one hand to Jesus' miracles, and on the other to moments in which he displayed weakness and ignorance. The former made it seem to many as if Jesus' human flesh had been 'divinized' by the indwelling presence of the Logos (for how otherwise would he have been able to walk on water, and how else could people have been cured simply by touching him?). The latter seemed to show aspects of Christ's humanity that were antithetical to his divine nature, for if Jesus' humanity was empowered or enhanced, receiving the properties of the divine nature with which it was united, how could there be room for human weaknesses? Athanasius and others were reduced to saying that Jesus had only pretended to be ignorant or weak as a way of teaching his disciples. Later Byzantine theology insisted that the unqualifiedly complete human life of Christ, bearing all the limitations that are essential to human being, and consisting of an entirely human body, mind, soul and will, was brought into being (that is, given distinct 'hypostatic' reality) as the human life belonging to the person (the 'hypostasis') of the divine Word. That human life has no distinct reality of its own, outside of this union (it is 'anhypostatic'); it is given its distinct reality (its 'hypostatic' existence) only in and by this union ('enhypostasis'). The Word remains fully divine in the process (with fully divine nature and will), but assumes in addition this new, creaturely way of being itself. Any communication of attributes (communicatio idiomatum) from the divine nature to the human nature (any partial 'divinizing' of the flesh) is an important but secondary matter, providing God-given signs of the deeper, 'anhypostatic' unity that truly constitutes Christ's divinity.

Modern Christology

Theologians in the medieval and Reformation periods made many significant contributions to Christology proper – whether it was *Anselm of Canterbury's examination of the soteriological grounds for the *incarnation in Cur Deus Homo, or the debate between the Magisterial Reformers (see *Reformation theology) on the ubiquity of Christ's risen humanity. More dramatic developments in discussions of the doctrine emerged, however, in the modern West. Traditional Christological doctrine came under fire during the European *Enlightenment thanks to (1) the rise of historical criticism of the NT and of the development of doctrine, (2) an increasing tendency to reject the possibility of miracle and the growth of a *deistic theology that posited a Creator God who did not interfere with the well-ordered running of the world, and (3) the development of *pietistic forms of Christianity that regarded Christological discussion as useless speculation, divorced from the life of faith. In more recent years a fourth line of fire has been established: scepticism about the claim that one individual Jewish male human being can be God's ultimate word to a world of multiple races, religions, cultures and genders.

Many modern theologians and historians argued that incarnational doctrine arose as a late development only marginally connected to the real life of Jesus and the proper concerns of his followers. In particular, it was often claimed (e.g. by David Friedrich *Strauss) that incarnational doctrine took its rise from a misunderstanding of the *mythic nature of early Christian testimony, with the formulators of doctrine taking too literally the pictorial and metaphorical ways in which early believers had conveyed the deep impact that Jesus of Nazareth had had upon them.

Even amongst those who retain a commitment to incarnational theology, the tendency has been for Jesus' full humanity to be accepted readily and unequivocally, and for most of the conceptual labour to be expended on justifying the claim that this fully human being could nevertheless also have been divine. In the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, various *'kenotic' theories were suggested (e.g. those of Gottfried Thomasius [1802–75] or A. M. Fairbairn [1838–1912]), seeing the 'self-emptying' of the divine Son as a process in which he divested himself of, or suppressed, divine attributes so as to be capable of union with a finite human life. In the twentieth century, there were enquiries that owed much to analytical philosophy, and which argued about the coherence and appropriateness of a number of models for the relationship of humanity and divinity in Christ, such as Thomas V. Morris's 'two minds' model, which tries to understand how Christ could have had a fully divine and a fully human mind, interrelated as fully as the nature of the two minds allows.

On the more doctrinal or systematic theological side there has also been a great deal of debate. For instance, there is a theological tradition, particularly associated with the nineteenth-century German theologian Friedrich *Schleiermacher and followers of his such as Wilhelm *Herrmann, but also seen in many other theologians, which holds that there is a potential for awareness of, and even union with, God built in to human nature, discoverable with the right philosophical and psychological analysis. In this tradition the idea that divine revelation takes place in history tends to be interpreted as meaning that the religious consciousness common to all human beings has been activated or energized, and given a distinct shape and direction, by particular historical circumstances. Such revelation is a fulfilment of inherent human possibilities at the very same time that it is a gracious gift from God. In this tradition, the incarnation consists in Jesus' (God-given) perfect realization of this universal human religious potential, and this realization is seen as the supreme catalyst for all other human beings who are realizing the same religious potential in themselves.

There is a counter-tradition, particularly associated with the Swiss Reformed theologian Karl *Barth, which regards the potentiality that is actualized in the incarnation not as a potentiality in human nature, but as a possibility open to God. Barth held that the doctrines of incarnation and Trinity speak primarily of an openness in God towards the sharing of God's life with human beings. What that sharing actually looks like in human lives is not the actualization of some potential buried deep in human inwardness, but human lives caught up into Christ-like patterns of life and thought – patterns that from a human perspective must look entirely contingent, but which from a divine perspective are the human form of the life of God. This tradition tends to go along with a deep suspicion of all attempts to analyse a deep religious structure universal in human consciousness, or of any focus on human inwardness as the site of union with God. The incarnation, in this perspective, consists in the fact that God gives the whole life of Jesus to the world as a divine word spoken in a creaturely medium. Jesus' life, by the specific and particular shape that God gives to it, both communicates and makes possible godly life within history.

In more recent debates, the full humanity of Jesus has come to the fore in new ways, with stress laid by *feminist theologians and others on the recognition that Jesus was fully bodily, that he gained his identity in relationship with others, that he was nurtured in a particular (Jewish) culture – and that the salvation that he brings cannot therefore be thought of as a release from bodiliness, socialization and culture, but must be seen as the redemption of those things. (A similar idea has been promoted by some theologians with environmentalist concerns who have stressed that, if Jesus is the Word of God the Creator, then he is a Word calling all humanity to full life in the world, rather than to escape from it.)

This stress has, however, gone with a renewed questioning of incarnational claims as theologians ask how one who is so temporally, bodily and culturally specific can be of universal significance. In particular, some feminist theologians have asked whether the claim that a male human being was God inevitably gives maleness a theological privilege. Other theologians have sought for ways to argue afresh that Jesus is God's Word addressed to all humanity, male and female, regardless of race or culture, by arguing that this Word does not call all human beings to become identical to Jesus, but rather to become fulfilled in relation to him as the unique gendered, bodily, culture-bound people that they are.

This debate is bound up with the claim that Jesus is not simply 'fully human' in the sense that he is unrestrictedly bodily, finite and creaturely, but that he reveals the fullness of human life to which all people are called. This theme has been taken up by some theologians who, whilst seeking to avoid the pitfalls just mentioned, wish to stress that to be fully human is to be fully caught up, as Jesus was, in God's mission of love for the freedom, healing and flourishing of the whole world, and that therefore full humanity is not simply a static nature possessed by Christ, but a dynamic form of life marked by active, relational, even political engagement.

See also: TRINITY.

Bibliography

C. Allen, The Human Christ (London and New York, 1998); K. Barth, CD, esp. vols I/2 and IV; D. F. Ford and M. A. Higon, Jesus (Oxford, 2002); J. Behr, The Way to Nicaea (Crestwood, 2001); A. Grillmeier, Christ in Christian Tradition, vol. 1 (Atlanta and London, 1975); L. W. Hurtado, Lord Jesus Christ (Grand Rapids, 2003); T. V. Morris, The Logic of God Incarnate (Oxford and Ithaca, 1986); F. D. E. Schleiermacher, The Christian Faith (Edinburgh, 1928); C. Tuckett, Christology and the New Testament (Edinburgh, 2001); R. Williams, Arius (London, 2001).

M. HIGTON

CHRYSOSTOM, JOHN (c. 345–407)

John Chrysostom, theologian and bishop, was born to a wealthy family in Antioch. He trained in rhetoric, but gave up practising law in 368 when he was baptized, and joined the followers of Diodore (a future bishop of Tarsus). He then retreated to the desert, where he lived for four years under a Syrian monk, and then alone in a cave for two years where he committed much of Scripture to memory. Bad health forced him to return to the city, where he spent twelve years as presbyter of the Church of Antioch. He was consecrated Bishop of Constantinople in 398, but his exhortations against the abuse of power and wealth earned him powerful enemies, such as the Empress Eudoxia and Theophilus, the patriarch of Alexandria. In 404 he was exiled to Armenia, and he eventually died in a forced march to Pontus, 407. Though his eloquence as a preacher was well known even after his death, it appears that it was not until the sixth century that he was described as Chrysostom, which means 'Golden Mouth'.

Chrysostom's work presents an excellent example of the *Antioch school of exegesis, which involved an extremely close reading of biblical texts. His works tend to fall into three categories: sermon, diatribe and *apologetic treatise. Most of his sermons begin with an exposition of Scripture, and then continue into exhortation against a vice or towards a virtue. He preached to the wealthy, but also made a point of venturing out among outlying villages, as well as slums within the city.

Chrysostom's work is marked by his personal desire to achieve a holy and ascetic life, with the recognition of the difficulties encountered by most of his flock attempting to live a Christian life in a wealthy and decadent society. Chrysostom wrote apologia for *asceticism, such as Against the Opponents of the Monastic Life. His acknowledgment of the gap between the ideal and the reality of most citizens' lives in Antioch and Constantinople is recognized in On Compunction. He also wrote a few, now controversial, treatises against Judaizing Christians, which demonstrate the still-prominent connection between Jewish and Christian groups at this time; Chrysostom, however, strongly denounced those who refused to choose between Judaism and Christianity.

His enemies, however, objected less to his discourses on monasticism or Judaism, than to his opposition to the abuse of wealth (see *Poverty and wealth) and power that was common among the aristocracy of Constantinople. He railed against high taxation, and a desire to indulge in opulence rather than show charity and help to one's neighbour. For Chrysostom faith ought to inspire deeds of kindness and generosity; he felt that the rich were stewards of wealth, saying, 'the rich man who keeps all his wealth for himself is committing a form of robbery'. He placed emphasis upon on a Pauline doctrine of self-giving love, rather than self-aggrandizement. It is this defence of the helpless that earned him the love of so many, as well as the enmity of some of those in power.

Bibliography

Works: The Early Church Fathers: Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers, vols. IX-XIV, <<http://www.ccel.org/fathers2/>>; John Chrysostom: The Golden Voice of Protest, ed. R. Van de Weyer (Evesham, 1996); PG, vol. 47-64.

Studies: J. N. D. Kelly, Golden Mouth: The Story of John Chrysostom – Ascetic, Preacher, Bishop (London, 1993); W. Mayer and P. Allen, John Chrysostom (London, 2000); Palladius, Dialogue on the Life of St John Chrysostom (ET, New York, 1985); M. A. Schatkin, John Chrysostom as Apologist (Thessaloniki, 1987); R. L. Wilkin, John Chrysostom and the Jews: Rhetoric and Reality in the Late 4th Century (London, 1983).

For a more extensive bibliography, see <<http://www.cecs.acu.edu.au/chrysostombibliography.html>>.

J. P. MITCHELL

CHURCH

'Ecclesiology' is the term for the area of theology considering the doctrine of the church, a topic that has been much disputed throughout Christian history. Universally agreed is that the church is the church of Jesus Christ and those who participate in the *salvation of *Jesus constitute the church.

The church is the entire company of believers, and yet more than just the collection of individuals since they share together in Christ through the *Holy Spirit. Disciples therefore belong to one another in an organic way, and share together in suffering and joy as 'the body of Christ'. The church therefore is human, yet divinely created and inspired, caught up in the life of *God the Holy *Trinity in its worship; Paul tells the Galatians that 'God sent the Spirit of his Son into our hearts, the Spirit who calls out, Abba, Father!' (Gal. 4:6).

The bond between Saviour and saved, Christ and his church, is the *grace of Christ, specifically the self-giving of Jesus on the cross and his rising to overcome sin and death, a new life given to his disciples, the church. The very earliest practices of *baptism and Communion (see *Eucharist), focused on the grace of Christ crucified and risen, emphasize this divine origin of the church: the redeemed, Spirit-filled humanity, worshipping the Father in and through the Son, living out the way of his *kingdom.

The debate as to whether the church is 'visible' or 'invisible' relates not to some mysterious hiddenness of the church in history, as if it were 'docetic' as to its human reality, but rather to the church from God's angle, since God alone knows the depths of the heart and of authentic faith. The church is filled with the invisible Spirit of God, but is to serve in the blood, sweat, toil and tears of this world.

Church as communion/koinonia

Recent ecclesiology has highlighted this trinitarian understanding of the church in a way attracting consensus from the major traditions. The *Eastern Orthodox have always stressed this basis of their ecclesiology, the church taken up into the divine life, especially in its eucharistic worship. From that tradition, John *Zizioulas's seminal book Being as Communion commended the idea of mutuality and love, found in the Trinity, as at the heart of the new life of the church. Many Western theologians have been influenced in this Eastern direction, attracted in part by its rejection of individualistic notions of human life in favour of more corporate and participatory categories to define humanity. The Reformed theologian Jürgen *Moltmann's Church in the Power of the Spirit takes the Eastern trinitarian line, stressing the communal interrelationship of the divine persons as the pattern for the church, but the structure of the church emerges very differently from that of Zizioulas, who commends bishops as key to the being of the church, over against Moltmann's pluralism.

The concept of communion, koinonia*, has been taken up in *ecumenical theological agreements fruitfully, and tends to give a full place to the local congregations as they share together in being the one church. The Roman Catholic Church's Second Vatican Council formally declared a move away from its rigid clericalism towards viewing the church as 'the whole people of God', catching this note of common communion in Christ for all believers (see *Roman Catholic theology), although the pontificate of Pope John Paul II has been widely seen as reversing this movement back to a centralist model. The Anglican-Roman Catholic International Commission (ARCIC)'s Final Report (1982) used the idea of koinonia, derived from the NT, as the spiritual bond of the believers with Christ and with one another in the local congregation of faith, needing the local minister to safeguard and build up this *fellowship or 'communion' after the teaching and lifestyle of the apostles. The individual churches or congregations share together in a way going beyond mere voluntary association, since communion with Christ holds them all together in a common body in the Spirit.

ARCIC develops this pattern in terms of ministers representing local churches and developing wider forms of leadership: bishops, which in turn produce archbishops, and ultimately – and very controversially – a world leader for the church. The *Reformed tradition, deriving from the teaching of Calvin, could agree with much of this, certainly the importance of the ordained minister, but not the final deduction about regional and global ministerial leadership. The Eastern Orthodox understand their bishops as the local ministers of local churches, their dioceses, and strongly reject the notion of any jurisdiction from a papal figure. Protestant churches tend to focus on the local congregation as the primary unit of the church worldwide. Nevertheless, it is possible to discern much common agreement about the very being of the church as communion with the Father, through the Son, in the Spirit, historically lived out locally and yet as a single entity, however differently the ministerial structures are worked out. Baptism and Holy Communion speak of sharing in Christ's great sacrifice in responsive self-giving and thanksgiving, at a local level but also more widely.

The Baptist theologian Miroslav Volf in his After Our Likeness, the Church as the Image of the Trinity set out a 'free church' or 'separatist' view of trinitarian communion as the basis of the church, stressing the local congregation as primary over against church with a wider historical being. He engaged with Zizioulas, and also with Joseph *Ratzinger, who became Pope Benedict XVI, for whom koinonia is understood centrally as being in communion with Rome first and foremost, rather than the diversity of the local churches as primary. This is a major difference between Rome and both the Eastern Orthodox and *Protestant churches, including the *Anglicans, none of which can agree that communion with and obedience to the global jurisdiction and occasional infallibility of the papacy is a condition of being a church. To start with koinonia as a key ecclesial concept is to make the church itself, rather than the structures of its ministry, the primary fact, although Orthodox and some Anglican ecclesiology urge that episcopal structure is essential. Most non-episcopally ordered churches regard any regional or national levels of leadership to be best organized by way of groups of ministers, meeting to 'oversee' (the meaning of the Greek term episcopos) churches in synods or presbyteries. The Brethren are unusual in rejecting any formal ordained ministry whatsoever.

One, holy, catholic and apostolic

From this understanding of church as koinonia the notions entailed in the well-known phrase found in the Nicene *Creed of 381, 'one, holy, catholic and apostolic', open up easily and ecumenically. The unity of the church is in Christ, not a mere uniformity, but unity in diversity, a fellowship of self-giving love, bonded by the Holy Spirit. The unity is of very different disciples, and also between local churches. The church is holy in that disciples and churches are set apart for, and redeemed by, Christ, seeking to do his will through his grace, and in constant need of repentance, as church history shows. The *catholicity of the church means its global scope (kath holos) across the whole world. Like a geological stratum, local churches worldwide will show distinctively Christian ways of life and worship that are the same in essence, coloured by local cultural differences. Whether the church is 'catholic' also in embracing the *communion of saints now in heaven is an interesting issue: theologically, the present church must be linked to those fellow disciples now in the eschatological fellowship, but there is no biblical encouragement at all for believers in space and time now to seek to commune with or pray for those who have gone before. This opens up the notion of *purgatory and the great debate about indulgences that triggered *Luther's protest and the *Reformation.

This debate is an important instance of the 'apostolicity' of the church, focused on loyalty to the teaching and practice of the *apostles, accessible now through the NT alone. The principles found in the NT seem, for example, difficult to square with an idea of purgatory, let alone indulgences. Church practices and teachings diverging plainly from the NT are not 'apostolic'. The question then is raised of interpretation of the text. Roman Catholicism claims to possess a 'magisterium' which flows by a historical succession from the apostle Peter, enabling it to read the apostolic texts aright. Again, this idea is not found in the NT or the early church, and so is neither apostolic nor catholic. Indeed, the church is most 'Petrine' when acknowledging its fallibility, as did Peter on his threefold betrayal of Jesus.

The place of the canon of *Scripture is crucial to the church's apostolicity and authority, in particular to emphasize that the church did not 'create' the texts, but rather acknowledged their authority and submitted to them as normative. The church's place is to sit under this authority of the prophets and apostles, found in Scripture and made alive now by the Spirit. Interpretation of difficult texts, which are in fact surprisingly few and peripheral, is a matter of the Spirit working gradually in and through patient and generous Christian attentiveness. There can be legitimate disagreement on matters such as infant or believers' baptism, but the core message of the church, redemption of our sins and newness of life through Christ and the Spirit, is totally clear and uncontested as the way, the truth and the life of the church.

Church praxis

Avery Dulles's book Models of the Church discusses several ways of understanding the church and its functions, one very important being the church 'as servant'. This reflects the life and ministry of Jesus, indeed his acceptance of death itself for us as a great moral act of redemptive love. *Love for human beings, for the sick and destitute, has been a crucial outworking of the church's koinonia with Christ in the world and itself an evangelistic sign. This has been evident in individual disciples' 'good works', for example Wilberforce's lifelong campaign against slavery, Elizabeth Fry's prison reform, Josephine Butler's stand for women against state-sponsored prostitution, Shaftesbury's campaigns for improved factory conditions, and the provision of hospitals and schools. Christianity is at the root of most of Western welfare institutions.

*Liberation theologians, including such thinkers as Gustavo Gutiérrez, Leonard Boff and Miguel Bonino, working out of a context of grinding poverty in Latin America, urge church '*praxis' to claim the 'structures' of society and so gain a political and economic footing. They have rejected an exclusive emphasis on the 'otherworldliness' of church concerns and emphasize the needs of real people in *poverty and powerlessness. For them the kingdom of God embraces the quest for justice and plenty for all, which includes political activism. This ecclesiological emphasis has brought with it interesting ways of interpreting *eschatology, such as 'the powers and principalities' including institutions oppressing people, which for example could be unfair trading patterns, or Western economic 'idols' needing to be deconstructed by the kingdom of God.

Liberation theology offers an important model of church, albeit one which deploys some *Marxist concepts while claiming to avoid Marx's secular assumptions. The 'contextual' and local aspects of church are important to this ecclesiology, often at loggerheads with the Vatican and its centralist control systems. Local 'base communities' have been important expressions of church, with Bible reading and practice a key part of churchly koinonia, the key question being not 'what did I learn?' but 'what did I do after reading that text?', praxis trumping theory, and the incarnational shape of Christian faith emphasized. A criticism of this emphasis can be that it neglects personal salvation in the interests of corporate and social good, but this is not necessarily so. *Evangelical ecclesiology can engage fruitfully with liberation theology. The *Pentecostal movement is an interesting alternative to liberation ecclesiology in Latin America, as David Martin has detailed in his Tongues of Fire (Oxford, 1990): 'The church has opted for the poor, but the poor have their own options'; the highly emotional style of Pentecostalist worship has attracted many among the poor. Praxis for the Pentecostals is primarily collective worship in the Spirit.

Church and state

As is evident from the book of Revelation, the church has been engaging with the *state from the very start of its life, at times suffering persecution at its hands, at times overly integrated into the state and its projects, as in the Middle Ages when popes could dictate to kings and bishops chosen by secular rulers. The *Barmen Declaration of 1934 constitutes a fundamental evangelical protest against the church allowing itself to be coordinated into the state's structures, as was Nazi policy. This crystalline statement of ecclesiology, written largely by Karl *Barth, classically declares: 'We reject the false doctrine that the church could have permission to hand over the form of its message and of its order to whatever it itself might wish or to the vicissitudes of the prevailing ideological and political convictions of the day.' This in effect was a rejection of 'cultural Christianity' by one of the twentieth century's deepest theologians, engaged in a desperate struggle with a totalitarian regime bent on conforming the church to evil, but popular, purposes.

The principle of Barmen, however, remains pertinent in less dramatic and fraught contexts, a declaration that the church is God's church, the church of Jesus Christ, not an organization to be run by the state or other groupings, however worthy. Barmen sounds a standing challenge to any established church wherein the government of the day has any say in choosing church leaders, thereby also recruiting the church as its political agency for cultural propaganda. The movement calling itself *Radical Orthodoxy stresses the radical difference of the church community and politics of peace from that of the state with its underlying deployment of violence, the church being the embodied presence of God in time and space. The work of Stanley *Hauerwas similarly stresses that the church is totally different in its way of life as a community; it is to change the world rather than unwittingly adopt secular and nationalistic ways. The church as the one place of honest reconciliation (see *Atonement) has also been a fruitful topic, revealing church as a way of being reconciled and reconciling. How the church should relate to the world and the state remains an ongoing and changing problem, one not to be ignored if William Temple's dictum is true, that 'the church exists for the benefit of its non-members'.

Church as mission

Allowing the church's message to be shaped by alien forces is a real danger in the global era which preaches the equivalence of all religions and rejects the notion of Christian preaching to other faiths as provocative and divisive. The church cannot become an agency for muting its own gospel message and adjusting it into a multi-faith compromise, at the expense of the word of the *cross, which always was provocative: 'foolishness to Gentiles' (1 Cor. 1:23) and upsetting to the purveyors of idols, obvious and subtly respectable in consumer culture.

The church is summoned openly to live out its fellowship, koinonia, with the Father, through Christ, in the Spirit, and to declare this message and enact it in the world. In the early twenty-first century the suffocating pressures against this clear mission of the church are immense, pressures to mute the distinctive message of Christ as the hinge of history, the start of a renewed humanity. While clearly God can and does work in the world outside the church, and in that sense the kingdom is wider than the church, this does not mean that the church is just one means of divine action and revelation among others. The church is not a general religious institution, but the very particular 'body of Christ', redeemed by the sacrifice of Christ into peace with God the Father in the power of the Spirit, and at the heart of God's redeemed creation.

See also: CHURCH GOVERNMENT.

Bibliography

K. Barth, CD, 4.2; J. Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion (1559); A. C. Cochrane, The Church's Confession under Hitler (Eugene, 1962); A. Dulles, Models of the Church (New York, 1987); P. S. Fiddes, Tracks and Traces: Baptist Identity in Church and Theology (Carlisle, 2003); P. T. Forsyth, The Church and Sacraments (London, 1917); G. Gutiérrez, A Theology of Liberation (London, 1988 [1971]); S. Hauerwas and W. H. Willimon, Resident Aliens (Nashville, 1989); R. Hütter, Suffering Divine Things (Grand Rapids, 2000); R. W. Jenson, Systematic Theology (Oxford/New York, 1999); J. Milbank, Theology and Social Theory (Oxford, 1993); J. Moltmann, The Church in the Power of the Spirit (London, 1977); O. M. T. O'Donovan, The Desire of the Nations (Cambridge, 1996); A. M. Ramsey, The Gospel and the Catholic Church (London, 1990 [1936]); E. Schillebeeckx, Church: The Human Story of God (London, 1990); J. L. Segundo, Theology and the Church (London, 1985); M. Volf, After Our Likeness: The Church as the Image of the Trinity (Grand Rapids, 1998); J. Webster, Word and Church (Edinburgh/New York, 2001); J. Zizioulas, Being as Communion (New York, 1988).

T. BRADSHAW

CHURCH DISCIPLINE

Although contemporary Christians are often wary of the term (which has been used primarily in the Reformed and Anabaptist traditions), church discipline has historically been seen as an integral aspect of the church's ministry of teaching and pastoral care, designed to promote individual *sanctification as well as to maintain the holiness of the church. In a broad sense, all members share in discipline as they exhort one another to holy living; but most Christian traditions have seen this responsibility as given concrete form in the prerogatives of the ministry to watch over, guide, admonish and (where necessary) formally exclude erring members. Discipline has usually been seen as applying to both doctrinal and moral aspects of Christian life.

A church's understanding of church discipline is influenced by its thinking on such matters as whether the church is to be pure or mixed, how it is governed, and the role played by the *ministry and the *sacraments in mediating salvation. These dictate who is seen as responsible for the practice of discipline – the priesthood, the whole body of the faithful, or civil rulers. In general, those who are seen as responsible for the church's government are the ones charged with primary responsibility for maintaining its discipline.

This article will focus on theological concepts which shaped differing approaches to church discipline, as space precludes discussion of how these worked out in practice.

Early and medieval

In seeking to apply NT teaching, early development of the church's penitential system drew on synagogue precedents for maintaining community standards and cohesion. The ultimate sanction, exclusion, was regarded as constituting (or representing) the individual's exclusion from the body of those who would be saved. Persecution during the third and early fourth centuries resulted in *schism as church leaders disagreed over what to do with those who had lapsed: was the church an army of saints or a hospital for sinners? What degree of restoration was possible? Did certain sins, notably *apostasy, put individuals beyond all possibility of restoration? Was the church's holiness to be understood in terms of its head, Christ (so Augustine), or its members (so the *Donatists)? Such challenges accelerated the development of an elaborate system designed to restore the individual who had sinned and to limit the spread of infection; it also encouraged individuals to delay baptism in order to lessen the likelihood of falling foul of strictures against post-baptismal sin. As the church came to be understood increasingly in institutional and hierarchical terms, its discipline received expression as part of *canon law, which laid down appropriate *penances for various categories of sinner and formal procedures for exclusion and readmission, as well as attempting to formalize the expectations laid on individuals. Some sins required public discipline, but the rise of auricular confession led to most being dealt with confidentially through priestly counsel and absolution. With the rise of the *monastic orders came a comprehensive approach to Christian discipline which dealt with inward as well as outward aspects of Christian living.

Orthodoxy sees itself as inheriting the patristic tradition of pastoral care. However, it has not, for the most part, shared the Western liking for juridical modes of thought and action, and although it has disciplinary canons and procedures of excommunication, and encourages auricular confession, it has been wary of speaking in terms of 'church discipline'. Nevertheless, since the church is the locus for the healing of the individual through transformation into the likeness of Christ (*deification), discipline in the broader sense is integral to the church's functioning.

In medieval Roman Catholicism, the 'power of the keys' became an important instrument for strengthening the *papacy's political standing. Whole nations were on occasion put under an interdict forbidding the regular celebration of the sacraments, because their rulers clashed with the papacy.

Reformation and post-Reformation

Chronologically, the *Anabaptists were the first of the sixteenth-century traditions to develop a coherent approach to church discipline, following the pattern laid down in Matt. 18:15–20. Members were responsible to watch over one another, but congregational leaders bore ultimate responsibility for maintaining the church's purity as a community of believers called out of the world. At *Schleitheim in 1527, one of the issues on which agreement was reached was the 'ban', which thereafter became a distinctive (and controversial) feature of discipline in the believers' church tradition. Anabaptism has been seen as an attempt to apply monastic standards of discipline to the whole body of believers.

The *Lutheran tradition has tended to oppose *law and gospel, and hence it was reluctant to introduce anything savouring of legalism, works-righteousness or the medieval penitential system. The gospel was seen as the divinely appointed means for achieving personal change. Furthermore, since civil rulers took on governing responsibility as 'emergency bishops', the church's freedom to function independently was in practice limited.

*Reformed Protestantism, however, had a more positive estimate not only of the place of the *law in the life of believers and churches, but also of the formalization of this in terms of codes of conduct and mechanisms for dealing with erring members. Civil powers were expected to uphold the church's decisions and in certain serious cases to implement them, but the church was seen (in theory, though not always in practice) as free to discipline its members as it saw fit. Influenced by contact with Anabaptism, *Bucer argued that, along with the preaching of the word and the right administration of the sacraments, the practice of discipline represented a mark of the true church, though he was careful to expound it as part of a comprehensive programme of Christian education. Catholicism saw a renewed emphasis on discipline in broader and narrower senses, especially as a result of the Council of *Trent. *Anglicanism, too, continued the medieval practice of public formal discipline.

In England and North America, *Puritanism worked out Reformed thought concerning discipline, attempting to make visible the clear distinction between the elect and the world. English Dissent and Scottish Presbyterianism continued this Reformed disciplinary tradition. However, the consistency with which discipline was practised varied between congregations, and the eighteenth century saw a decline in the frequency of formal disciplinary cases, reflecting that in other traditions. Wider cultural trends were at work here, including a more positive estimate of human nature. More recent factors accelerating this decline have included changing understandings of the nature of justice, reflected in changing approaches to *punishment, and a decline in confidence regarding the church's divine institution and authority.

Churches today, as throughout history, adopt varying standpoints on a range of matters involved in church discipline: how strictly it should be applied, what offences should be dealt with through formal procedures, the authority accorded to canon law or its equivalents, and the extent to which human discipline reflects the divine mind. As in the patristic era, internal tension results from disagreement. Overall, however, more emphasis is laid than before on the broader context of pastoral care and mutual ministry, and less on formal disciplinary procedures: when the latter are exercised, as in a few high-profile *heresy trials, they attract a disproportionate amount of attention.

See also: CHURCH; CHURCH GOVERNMENT.

Bibliography

P. Benedict, Christ's Churches Purely Reformed (New Haven and London, 2002); G. C. Berkouwer, The Church, Studies in Dogmatics (Grand Rapids, 1976); D. Bridge, Spare the Rod and Spoil the Church (Bromley, 1985); G. R. Evans (ed.), A History of Pastoral Care (London and New York, 2000); S. L. Greenslade, Shepherding the Flock (London, 1967); M. Jeschke, Discipling the Brother (Scottsdale, 1972).

T. GRASS

CHURCH FATHERS, see PATRISTIC THEOLOGY

CHURCH GOVERNMENT

Modern critical scholarship has made it more difficult than in the past to appeal to the Bible or the early church for a blueprint of church government. It is generally agreed that the NT does not reveal a single definitive pattern of polity, that nomenclature for various offices varies within the NT, and that there was a process of development in the communities. The liberal-Protestant antithesis, associated with F. C. Baur and A. von *Harnack, between the charismatic Corinthian community and the proto-catholic structures of the Pastoral Epistles, was exaggerated, but had a point.

This relaxation of ecclesiastical claims grounded in Scripture weakens the case for differences of polity becoming causes of serious division between the churches. It also generates a search for the deeper ecclesiological principles that inform the structure of the church in the NT. Both of these factors are at work in *ecumenical theology. The Anglican-Roman Catholic International Commission (ARCIC) renounced a direct appeal to the Petrine texts of the NT in support of the universal primacy of the Bishop of Rome, and looked instead to a providentially guided process of development in history. Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry (1982) discerned three dimensions of ministry – personal, collegial and communal – at work in the NT, and urged that they be reflected at every level of the churches' life.

The main structures of ecclesiastical polity are episcopal, papal, presbyterian, independent (congregational) and conciliar. They are not necessarily mutually exclusive.

Episcopal

By the mid-second century, a threefold ministry of bishop, presbyter and deacon was firmly and widely, but not universally, established, as appears in the writings of Ignatius of Antioch (c. 115) and Polycarp (mid-first to mid-second century). *Irenaeus and *Tertullian give no inkling that they were aware of a time when there were no bishops. Advocates of episcopacy point to the roles of James, who had a presiding role at the Council of Jerusalem, and to Timothy and Titus, who had a more than presbyteral authority, as apostolic delegates. Bishops are seen as successors of the *apostles, not in the latter's unique role as witnesses to the resurrection, but as carrying on their ministry of teaching, oversight of the *sacraments, and exercising discipline in the community, especially with regard to other ministers. However, while the apostles were mainly itinerant, bishops are localized.

The late nineteenth-century scholars J. B. Lightfoot and E. Hatch held that the episcopate emerged out of the presbyterate, as Jerome had stated with regard to the church in Alexandria. But Charles *Gore attacked this view, maintaining that bishops were the lineal descendants of the apostles. The Roman Catholic Church holds that the episcopal college, with the pope at its head, is the continuation of the apostolic college, in which Peter presided. While the 1550–1662 Anglican Ordinal maintained that the orders of bishops, priests and deacons had existed since the times of the apostles, the modern Church of England ordinals (Alternative Service Book and Common Worship) simply state that the church maintains the historic threefold pattern of ordained ministry.

Related to the question of origins is the question of necessity. One medieval view was that a bishop is a priest with wider jurisdiction. There was no higher calling or authority than to celebrate the *Eucharist and perform the miracle of transubstantiation. On that basis, the episcopate could not be the crown of orders. The English Reformers (see *Reformers, English) generally saw episcopacy as an inherited, expedient form of church government, one that had the support of 'the magistrate' (the civil ruler). Only after the early *Presbyterians had claimed divine right for their favoured system did some Anglicans begin to match that claim with regard to episcopacy. Richard *Hooker, however, did not go that far; while holding that bishops were 'apostolical' and God-given, he recognized that divine positive laws could be changed by the consent of the church if circumstances altered, and he went as far as to envisage that, if the episcopate were to be abolished, it could be reconstituted (presumably from the presbyterate). The High Church divines of the seventeenth and eighteenth century Church of England did not regard episcopacy as absolutely of the being (esse) of the church, because they refused to unchurch the non-episcopal Reformed churches on mainland Europe and recognized their superintendents (Gk episkopos) as de facto bishops. The Non-Jurors, who saw themselves as the continuing Church of England, and then the more extreme Tractarians (see *Anglo-Catholic theology), began to make episcopacy necessary to the existence of the church. Gore believed that the abolition of episcopacy by certain churches at the Reformation was a breach of the divine order.

However, this stance has not shaped the Church of England's ecumenical policy; that church has entered into agreements of mutual ecclesial recognition with several churches that do not have bishops (or bishops in the historic succession). However, the traditional *Anglican concern to affirm episcopacy without absolutizing it is reflected in the fact that these agreements do not bring about the interchangeability of ministries; for that episcopal ordination in intended visible historical continuity from the apostles is required. Among episcopalians, some hold that only bishops have the inherent authority to ordain and that episcopal ordination is not simply a matter of good order, but is the only true ordination, while others hold that while bishops and presbyters share the same power of order, it is fitting that bishops should ordain as an expression of their oversight. In episcopally ordered churches, presbyters lay on hands with the bishop at the ordination of presbyters: some interpret this as a gesture of solidarity, an acceptance into the college of presbyters; others believe that the presbyters are actually sharing with the bishop in the ordination.

Episcopacy belongs in the context of the threefold ministry. A bishop is first a deacon and then a priest and retains these orders on being made bishop. All episcopally ordered churches, except the Roman Catholic Church, involve other clergy and the laity in synodical structures of church government. The Church of England is conciliar as well as episcopal – though not quite 'episcopally led and synodically governed', because there are lay leaders, and bishops have a special role in government. There is an ecumenical consensus that the visible unity (or communion) which the churches seek will involve episcopacy.

Papal

The monarchical, centralized character of Roman Catholicism was the product of gradual development spread over more than a millennium. The exact connection between the apostle Peter and the church in the city of Rome is obscure. Clement of Rome uses 'bishop' and 'presbyter' interchangeably at the end of the first century. The first Western writer to assert that Peter was superior to the other apostles and alone received the keys to the kingdom of heaven, which he then shared with the other apostles, was Optatus (c. 370). *Leo I (mid-fifth century) made explicit what had long been implicit; the identification of the Bishop of Rome with Peter, not only in his office, but in his actions: he could speak and decide with the authority of Peter. Nicholas I (mid-ninth century) claimed that Rome was mistress, mother and head of all the churches and that its bishop was Peter's vicar. The investiture contest around 1100 over the respective rights of pope and emperor, bishop and king, intensified papal claims. The concentration of power in the *papacy was enhanced by Gregory VII (Hildebrand) from 1073; he claimed, 'Blessed Peter answers by me' and styled himself 'vicar of Peter' rather than the familiar 'vicar of Christ'. The seeds of the later dogma of universal jurisdiction are found in the notion, supported by forged documents, of a transfer of Roman imperial authority to the pope. The doctrine of 'fullness of power' (plenitudo potestatis), which included temporal (political) power, as well as spiritual authority, goes back to Leo I and was articulated by *Bernard of Clairvaux. It was enunciated by Innocent III at the beginning of the thirteenth century: the pope was between God and man, higher than man but lower than God; he judged all, but could be judged by none. This succoured the notion of papal world monarchy, promoted just when the papacy was at its most vulnerable. Boniface VIII's reign (1294–1303) saw the high watermark in papal claims (Unam Sanctam, 1302), but his claims were punctured in the contest with Philip IV of France.

The struggle with conciliarism (see below) eventually strengthened the papacy, as did the Reformation conflict, when the Council of *Trent brought greater doctrinal and administrative coherence to the Roman Catholic Church. The accepted doctrines of universal jurisdiction and infallible teaching authority were given dogmatic status at the First Vatican Council (1870–71), though the latter decree can be seen as an attempt to contain the excesses of Ultramontane aspirations for unlimited papal authority. There was an attempt at the Second Vatican Council (1962–65) to counterbalance a centuries-long process of centralization with the notion of episcopal collegiality (see *Vatican Councils). The Council magnified the office of bishop to counteract the dominance of the papacy; the episcopate represented the fullness of holy orders, and bishops received their authority directly from Christ. However, the practical application of collegiality has not been encouraged by the still highly centralized Roman Catholic Church.

In theological dialogue, some of the Roman Catholic Church's ecumenical partners have recognized that there could be a place for a universal pastor who would serve the unity of the Church, but they have not shown themselves willing to accept the papacy without major reform. In the encyclical Ut Unum Sint (1995) Pope John Paul II, in an unprecedented way, offered his primacy for ecumenical interrogation and sought the help of other traditions in elucidating what it might mean in an ecumenical climate.

Presbyterianism

The basic features of Presbyterian church government were laid down by John *Calvin, who followed Martin *Bucer in discerning a fourfold ordained ministry in the NT: pastors, teachers, elders and deacons (Institutes, IV, iii–iv). Calvin was not opposed in principle to bishops in the way that he was to the papacy. The exclusive claim for Presbyterianism came with Calvin's successor in Geneva, Theodore *Beza. The system was elaborated in seventeenth-century Scotland and England and became entrenched in polemics with Anglicans. Presbyterians take their cue from the fact that, in the NT, the words presbuteros and episkopos are often used interchangeably. This remained the situation reflected in the Didache. The first bishops were the pastors of parish-sized communities and presided in the council of presbyters. Classic exponents of Presbyterianism, such as G. Gillespie, held that church government should be modelled on that of the synagogue, where elders were drawn from among the people.

The parity of ministers is an axiom of Presbyterian polity (though in practice ministers of word and sacrament have more prestige than ruling elders), and all have equal authority. There should be a plurality of them in every congregation. The councils or courts of the church are composed solely of presbyters. Elders are regarded as ordained, but as of the people (laos). However, they are called to rule and to govern; their decisions are binding.

Some Reformed churches have given up the claim that Presbyterian government is by divine right, and this makes them open to insights from other traditions, especially episcopal. The Church of Scotland now has a twofold ordained ministry of presbyters and deacons (as does the Methodist Church in Great Britain), though it is not a pure form of Presbyterianism, as it involves lay people in the governance of the church and sees the whole church as a single 'connexion', governed by the Conference, which exercises corporate episkope. Both churches have recently shown themselves to be resistant to taking episcopacy into their systems.

Independency

The independent or congregational form of polity goes back to the English separatists of the late sixteenth century, but has been refined by such writers as John *Owen and R. W. Dale. In England most *Congregationalists merged with the Presbyterians to form the United Reformed Church in 1972, so compromising their traditional polity. *Baptist and *Pentecostal churches are the dominant form of independency in England, though the Baptist principle of 'association' moderates the autonomy of the local congregation. Independents believe that ‘church’ in the NT refers either to the church universal or to particular local churches that were autonomous. They believe that this local congregation is essentially independent of external control and should not become part of a larger unit, though they have a place for forms of co-operation and consultation. Most independent churches have also been congregationalist; in other words, they have been governed by the meeting of all the members, gathered in the church meeting. They see themselves as guided by Christ, the only head of the church and as directly responsible to him. However, many independent churches are led by a group of elders, who are elected by the meeting, but, once elected, have intrinsic authority.

Conciliarism

Conciliarism exists only in conjunction with other models of church government. It gives a high place to the church gathering in council through its representatives. It holds that authority should be constitutionally defined and that the assent of the governed is required for legitimate authority. Conciliarism looks back for legitimation to the first council of the church, in Acts 15, and to the early *councils, from Nicaea (325) onwards. It is generally recognized that councils that took place after the schism between East and West in 1054 cannot have the same authority as those of a virtually united church. There has not been an ‘ecumenical’ council in the East since then.

During the split in the papacy in 1378, first into two, later into three, contenders traumatized Western Christendom and generated the conciliar theories derived from canon law and ecclesiology. They appealed to the whole body to redress the failings of the centre. The early fifteenth-century councils (principally Constance, 1414–18) united the papacy, but failed to reform the church ‘in head and members’. The Reformation continued the conciliar aim of reform by other means. The sixteenth-century Reformers inherited the conciliar doctrine and some (e.g. *Luther and *Cranmer) appealed to a free general council to vindicate their stance. Conciliarism is still under a cloud in the Roman Catholic Church, because it is seen as a threat to the papacy (which does not have any constitutional constraints). But conciliar principles have shaped not only parliamentary forms of government, but all the major traditions of the Christian church.

See also: CHURCH; COLLEGIALLY AND CONCILIARITY.

Bibliography

P. Avis, Beyond the Reformation? Authority, Primacy and Unity in the Conciliar Tradition (London, 2006); idem (ed.), The Christian Church: An Introduction to the Major Traditions (London, 2002); E. Duffy, Saints and Sinners: A History of the Popes (New Haven and London, 1997); J. S. Gray and J. C. Tucker, Presbyterian Polity for Church Officers (Louisville, 1999); W. Henn, ‘Historical-Theological Synthesis of the Relation between Primacy and Episcopacy during the Second Millennium’, in Il Primato del Successore di Pietro (Vatican City, 1998); H. Küng, Structures of the Church (New York, 1964; London, 1965); O. O’Donovan and J. L. O’Donovan, From Irenaeus to Grotius: A Sourcebook in Christian Political Thought (Grand Rapids, 2004); F. Oakley, The Conciliarist Tradition: Constitutionalism in the Catholic Church (Oxford, 2003); C. Podmore, Aspects of Anglican Identity (London, 2005); B. Tierney, Religion, Law and the Growth of Constitutional Thought (Cambridge, 1982); W. Ullmann, The Growth of Papal Government in the Middle Ages (London, ²1962).

P. D. L. Avis

CIVIL RELIGION

The debate about ‘civil religion’ became a major academic issue in the late 1960s with the seminal article by sociologist Robert Bellah (b. 1927), entitled ‘Civil Religion in America’ (Daedalus 96, 1967, pp. 1–21; repr. in W. G. McLaughlin and R. N. Bellah [eds.], Religion in America, Boston, 1968). Bellah’s essay develops the argument of Jean-Jacques *Rousseau (1712–78), who in The Social Contract (1762) discussed the role of civil religion in society. Rousseau argued that, by introducing a distinction between church and *state based on the trans-national loyalty demanded by the God of the Bible, Christians actually undermine civil society. Bellah does not discuss Rousseau’s obvious sympathy for pagan Rome, but concentrates instead on his outline of the essence of a civil religion. In Rousseau’s views, belief in the existence of God, the life to come, the reward of virtue and the punishment of vice, and the rejection of religious intolerance, are all important for the smooth running of a state. All other religious beliefs may be held privately by individuals, but they must not be allowed to affect social duties or fundamental loyalty.

Bellah argues that the founding fathers of the United States shared a common outlook with Rousseau. He goes on to argue for the existence of an 'American civil religion' which is consciously or unconsciously appealed to by American leaders, especially presidents. To prove his point, Bellah analysed various presidential speeches, from Washington's first inaugural in 1789 to Kennedy's in 1960. Behind these speeches Bellah found a strong affirmation of the purpose and destiny of America and a call for patriotic values based upon biblical imagery and archetypes.

Bellah's article sparked a lively and stimulating debate among theologians, philosophers, sociologists and historians. Eventually, five types of religious activity were identified as civil religion. (1) Folk religion and American values, which seem to arise out of the actual lives of Americans. (2) A transcendent universal religion of the nation or religion of the republic. This view was propounded by Sidney Mead (CH 36, 1967, pp. 262–283) and assumes an essentially American prophetic faith. (3) A religious nationalism which glorifies American leaders and policies. Martin Marty (in R. E. Richey and D. G. Jones [eds.], American Civil Religion, pp. 139–157) argued that this type of religious response could be seen in the speeches of Richard Nixon, which identified American policies with Nixon's own policies. (4) A generalized democratic faith which sees America as the pinnacle of democratic institutions and their highest expression in a providential history. (5) A Protestant civic piety which identifies American with *Protestant moralism, individualism, activism, pragmatism and work ethic.

Against all of these views, various theologians have made major criticisms of an implicit idolatry. Herbert W. Richardson argued in his powerful essay 'Civil Religion in Theological Perspective' (in Richey and Jones, American Civil Religion, pp. 161–184) that the term civil religion 'unites two terms: the civil order and the religious order', and that this was an essentially unbiblical and anti-Christian position. He acknowledges that civil religion has had great influence in America, but says it deserves strong condemnation from Christians.

In Richardson's view, American civil religion is a growing force which is a corruption of the original ideals of American *Puritans and a potential threat to the future freedom of religion.

In addition to discussing civil religion in America, various authors have applied the theory to their own situation. Probably the most extensive discussion of civil religion outside America has taken place in South Africa. Here sociologists and theologians debated the use of biblical imagery by Afrikaner nationalists in relation to apartheid (see *Race). T. Dunbar Moodie's The Rise of Afrikanerdom is an excellent example of the application of this perspective to South African history. Apart from helping Christians to understand how a state can manipulate religious symbols, Moodie also helped to discredit the popular but false notion that apartheid was a natural historical development due to the influence of Calvinism.

Although there are many problems in identifying what exactly is meant by civil religion and how it operates in a society, the idea is a creative one which sensitizes Christians to the misuse of religious symbolism by secular groups. In the work of Bellah and Moodie, the existence of a civil religion is found at the heart of political and social life in modern states. But this need not always be the case. In British history, groups like the British Israelites represent an attempt to create a civil religion which would have legitimated British imperialism. Similarly, many observers find in the Unification Church or Moonies (see *New religions; *Sects) elements of civil religion which glorify South Korea and America (Thomas Robbins, 'The Last Civil Religion: Reverend Moon and the Unification Church', Sociological Analysis 37, 1976, pp. 111–125).

Among modern evangelicals the works of Francis *Schaeffer come close to propounding an evangelical civil religion, as can be seen from books such as How Should We Then Live? (1976). In Schaeffer's case his intention is clearly to promote a biblical appreciation of history. But in practice, among theologically unsophisticated people, this theological history often translates into something completely different and quite unbiblical. It is the ease with which biblical ideas can become sources for an idolatrous glorification of the state which is, from a Christian perspective, the true danger of civil religion.

Bibliography

T. D. Moodie, The Rise of Afrikanerdom: Power, Apartheid and the Afrikaner Civil Religion (Berkeley, CA, 1975); G. Müller-Fahrenholtz, America's Battle for God: A European Christian Looks at Civil Religion (Grand Rapids, 2007); G. Parsons (ed.), Perspectives on Civil Religion (Aldershot, 2002); R. E. Richey and D. G. Jones (eds.), American Civil Religion (New York, 1974).

I. HEXHAM

CLARKE, WILLIAM NEWTON
(1841–1912)

Baptist minister and theologian, Clarke is generally considered the first systematic theologian of theological liberalism in the US. Born in Cazenovia, New York, son of a Baptist pastor, Clarke studied for the ministry at Madison (now Colgate) University and Theological Seminary in Hamilton, New York. He pastored Baptist churches in the US and Canada for twenty years. Between 1883 and 1887 he taught NT at the Baptist Theological School in Toronto, Canada. After a brief return to the pastorate in Hamilton, New York (1887–90), Clarke became professor of theology at Colgate Theological Seminary where he taught until 1908.

Clarke published his best-known work, An Outline of Christian Theology (1898), after failing to find a textbook for his courses that systematically addressed both the intellectual ferment of his time and classical theological ideas and emphases. Drawing from evolutionary thinking, critical-historical approaches to the Bible, comparative religions, and especially the theology of Friedrich *Schleiermacher, Clarke articulated a theology that was anchored primarily in religious experience, which emphasized that the character of God is revealed pre-eminently in Jesus, and which asserted that God is active everywhere throughout the creation, including in non-Christian religions. Clarke's aims were essentially conservative, to frame Christian ideas in contemporary thought forms and language. Within the wide range of 'liberal' theologies, Clarke was an 'evangelical liberal' (see *Liberal evangelicalism).

See also: LIBERALISM AND CONSERVATISM IN THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

Works: An Outline of Christian Theology (New York, 1898); What Shall We Think of Christianity? (New York, 1899); The Use of Scripture in Theology (New York, 1905); The Christian Doctrine of God (New York, 1909).

Studies: E. A. Clarke (ed.), William Newton Clarke: A Biography (New York, 1916); C. L. Howe, Jr, The Theology of William Newton Clarke (New York, 1980).

H. E. RASER

CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA
(c. 150–c. 215)

Clement was a Christian philosopher, probably born in Athens, who succeeded his teacher Pantaenus as head of a Christian (catechetical?) school in Alexandria some time after 180. He left Alexandria around 202.

Apart from fragments preserved by various authors, his extant works consist of the Protrepticus (Exhortation to the Greeks), a polished work of Christian apologetics; the Paedagogus (The Tutor), a detailed guide for Christian life and conduct; the Stromateis (Miscellanies), a rich assortment of notes and outlines on a wide variety of topics; and Quis Dives Salvetur?, an extended sermon on the rich young ruler in Mark 10:17–31.

In many respects his thinking stands in the line of the Greek *apologists, but he represents a contrast to contemporary (Western) writers in his positive evaluation of Greek philosophy, his speculative bent and his deliberate lack of system. Alexandria having been the home of *Philonic allegory (see *Hermeneutics) and various brands of *Gnosticism, it is necessary to note Clement's use of allegory (not yet systematized as it is by *Origen) and his description of the perfect Christian as a 'true Gnostic'.

Though he vigorously opposes Gnosticism, Clement apparently retains *docetic elements in his *Christology, by denying emotions and certain corporeal functions in the man Jesus. He frequently uses the trinitarian formula, emphasizing the distinction between Father, Son (*Logos) and Holy Spirit and affirming the eternity of the Son's existence, without however coming to any clear definition of the nature of the *Trinity.

Before the incarnation, knowledge of God was given to the Jews through the law and to the Greeks through philosophy, which was inspired by the Logos, i.e. by Christ. The Logos became incarnate to impart knowledge and to serve as our model. Clement uses the language of *atonement and conquest of *evil with respect to Christ, but his main emphasis is on Christ as teacher. Though faith, understood as assent to the teaching of Christ, is sufficient for salvation, the true Gnostic moves beyond faith to knowledge, a full understanding of Christ's teaching, coupled with an exemplary mode of living (which corresponds closely to *Platonic and *Stoic ideals). This knowledge leads to perfect love and to a *mystic relationship with God, fully consummated only after death, when the believer becomes (like) God.

Salvation is obtained in relation to the church, and through baptism one is made a member of the church. In his arguments against the heretics, Clement emphasizes the antiquity and unity of the catholic church, the tradition handed down orally in the church from the apostles and the importance of interpreting the Scriptures (which for Clement included rather more than our present canon) in accordance with the 'rule of the church'.

Clement strongly affirms the freedom of the *will and the need for man to co-operate with God by accepting salvation. He apparently conceives of the possibility of repentance even after death.

Bibliography

Works in ET: in ANCL and ANF; selections in G. W. Butterworth (ed.), Clement of Alexandria, LCL (London, 1919); H. Chadwick and J. E. L. Oulton (eds.), Alexandrian Christianity, LCC (London, 1954).

Studies: H. Chadwick, Early Christian Thought and the Classical Tradition (Oxford, 1966); H. F. Hägg, Clement of Alexandria and the Beginnings of Christian Apophaticism (Oxford, 2006); S. R. C. Lilla, Clement of Alexandria: A Study of Christian Platonism and Gnosticism (Oxford, 1971); E. F. Osborn, The Philosophy of Clement of Alexandria (Cambridge, 1975).

T. G. DONNER

COBB, JOHN B. Jr (b. 1925)

Cobb is an American theologian known for his significant contributions to *process theology, the theology of *ecology, and dialogue between

*Christianity and other religions. Born to Methodist missionaries serving in Kobe, Japan, in 1940 Cobb was sent to live with his grandmother in Georgia to attend high school. After graduating, he attended junior college and the University of Michigan, and was thereafter admitted to an interdepartmental masters programme at the University of Chicago where he concentrated on modern criticisms of Christianity. When that experience left his faith in tatters, Cobb transferred to the Divinity School, and there he discovered resources in Whitehead's cosmology for constructing a Christian vision that took modernity seriously while transcending its reductionistic worldview. In 1949, he earned an MDiv, and three years later completed a PhD. He joined the faculty of the School of Theology at Claremont in 1958, where he co-founded the Centre for Process Studies with David Griffin, and the academic journal, Process Studies, with Lewis Ford. In the late 1960s, Cobb became aware of the ecological crisis, and worked to integrate a theology of ecology with process theology. He has also worked to link interfaith dialogue with process thought by suggesting that Whitehead's vision of metaphysical ultimacy as a plurality (creativity–God–world) grounds such diverse religious notions of ultimate reality as the Christian doctrine of God and the Buddhist concept of emptiness.

Bibliography

Selected works: A Christian Natural Theology (1965); Is It Too Late? A Theology of Ecology (1972); Christ in a Pluralistic Age (1975); Beyond Dialogue: Toward a Mutual Transformation of Christianity and Buddhism (1982).

Studies: G. Dorrien, The Making of American Liberal Theology: Crisis, Irony, and Postmodernity 1950–2005 (Louisville, 2006); D. R. Griffin and T. J. J. Altizer (eds.), John Cobb's Theology in Process (Philadelphia, 1977); D. R. Griffin and J. C. Hough (eds.), Theology and the University: Essays in Honor of John B. Cobb (Albany, 1991).

J. R. WILSON

COCCEIUS, JOHANNES (1603–69)

Johannes Cocceius was a prominent seventeenth-century Bible scholar, who worked in the tradition of advanced humanist scholarship (see *Humanism, Renaissance) and *Reformed theology. German by birth, he taught at Bremen, Franeker and Leiden. He was a prolific author, and his writings include commentaries on all the biblical books, a Hebrew and Aramaic lexicon, works on philology and ethics, and volumes on theology, especially his famous Summa doctrinae de foedere et testamento Dei (1648).

In this work he developed a *covenant theology which described all of human history by introducing the structure of consecutive covenants or foedera. By using the biblical concept of foedus (covenant), he sought to do justice also in systematic theology to the historical nature of the biblical narrative. He defined this covenant as ‘nothing other than a divine declaration of the way of perceiving the love of God and of obtaining union and communion or friendship with God’ (Summa doctrinae, ch. I § 5). He distinguished two fundamental forms of God’s covenant in salvation history: the covenant of works before the *fall and the covenant of *grace after the fall. The former was violated by the disobedience of Adam and Eve; the second was promulgated immediately after the fall. The covenant of grace Cocceius chiefly divided in two periods: ante et post Christum natum (before and after Christ’s birth). But the establishment of the covenant of grace, he argued, did not entail an abrupt end of the original, failed covenant in paradise. Therefore, he described the whole biblical history after the fall as a series of events by which the covenant of works was abrogated step by step, until the salvation promised in the covenant of grace is revealed in full glory and liberty. By means of this abrogation theme he infused his view on the covenant with a powerful dynamic, and with an eschatological perspective.

This *eschatological orientation also emerged in his interpretation of biblical prophecy. On the basis of a supposed analogy of the prophecies of especially Daniel and Revelation, he subsequently interpreted the Bible as a prolonged prophecy of the Christian church until the end of time, divided into seven periods. Elements of this ‘prophetic theology’ were elaborated in the works of a later generation of Cocceians.

Cocceius’s followers, however, were not servile imitators of his covenant system and prophetic theology. While some of them incorporated elements of Cartesian philosophy in the Cocceian covenant system (Fr. Burman), others developed a more pietistic model that influenced Reformed Puritan circles in the Netherlands (via H. Witsius and also Scottish covenant theology) and Lutheran pietistic theologians such as Ph. J. Spener and J. A. *Bengel.

Although the term Heilsgeschichte was coined in the nineteenth century, Cocceius can be viewed as the founding father of this concept in the Reformed tradition. Finally, his federal theology was of considerable importance in the theological and political history of Europe and the United States and forms the framework for much Reformed theology in the past three centuries.

Bibliography

W. J. van Asselt, The Federal Theology of Johannes Cocceius (1603–1669) (Leiden, Boston and Cologne, 2001); H. Faulenbach, Weg und Ziel der Erkenntnis Christi: Eine Untersuchung zur Theologie des Johannes Coccejus (Neukirchen-Vluyn, 1973); C. S. McCoy, The Covenant Theology of Johannes Cocceius, PhD diss. (Yale University, 1956); G. Schrenk, Gottesreich und Bund im älteren Protestantismus vornehmlich bei Johannes Coccejus (Darmstadt, 1967 [1923]).

W. J. VAN ASSELT

COLERIDGE, SAMUEL TAYLOR (1772–1834)

Coleridge was one of the most important pioneering figures to appear on the English theological scene during the nineteenth century. Most probably the originator of the term ‘*existentialist’, he also scored a ‘first’ as a psychedelic theologian. The impact of his work permeated the entire religious spectrum in England. Among those influenced by him were such important figures as J. S. Mill (1806–73), Thomas Carlyle (1795–1881), J. C. Hare (1795–1855), J. H. *Newman, Thomas Arnold (1795–1842), James Martineau (1805–1900), Rowland Williams (1817–70), F. D. Maurice (1805–72; see *Christian Socialism) and F. J. A. Hort (1828–92).

In 1795 Coleridge married Sara Fricker but soon felt they were incompatible. Eventually, they agreed to separate. While suffering the torment of domestic tension he became addicted to opium. At about the same time he was making the acquaintance of the Wordsworths and emerging from his fascination with the *determinism which had captivated him at Cambridge University.

Opium introduced Coleridge to a vast uncharted spiritual domain. The appeal of the experience of the new dimension of existence was heightened by the sensation of freedom from the limitations of time and space. At such times reason was able to enjoy the unhindered realization of its potential in perceiving spiritual truth. The implications of these discoveries were, he considered, revolutionary. 'Need we wonder,' he enquired, 'at Plato's opinions concerning the body, at least, need that man wonder whom a pernicious drug shall make capable of conceiving and bringing forth Thoughts, hidden in him before . . . is it not, that the dire poison for a delusive time has made the body . . . a fitter instrument for the all powerful soul?'

The nature of his *religious experience led him to insist, 'All revelation is ab intra [from within]'. The intellectually arid, law-court theology of the eighteenth-century apologist was a disservice to the cause of true religion. 'Evidences of Christianity,' he expostulates, 'I am weary of the word. Make a man feel his want of it . . . and you may safely trust it to its own Evidences.'

To safeguard religion from the assaults of the sceptic, Coleridge adopts *Kant's distinction between reason and the understanding, but adapts these concepts to suit his own purposes. In particular, he insists that reason is able to 'behold' truth, and 'is the Source and substance of truths above sense'. The understanding has no jurisdiction over suprasensible knowledge. It cannot comprehend the essence of true religion. Its faltering attempts to articulate the truths of reality are, inevitably, incomplete and erroneous. History, theology, the natural and human sciences fall within the province of the understanding.

He held that, as a historical document expressing 'ideas' or truths in human terms, the Bible contains much ineffectual and erroneous material. Those who adhere to the doctrine of the inspiration (by which he meant dictation) of *Scripture are branded as 'orthodox liars for God'. We discern the truth contained in Scripture by virtue of the fact that 'whatever finds me, bears witness for itself that it has proceeded from a Holy Spirit'.

In differing ways, Coleridge appealed to and influenced theologians of every standpoint. Many of the questions he raised remain as burning issues today.

Bibliography

Works: ed. W. G. Shedd, 7 vols. (New York, 1953), especially: Aids to Reflection (1825); On the Constitution of Church and State (1820); Confessions of an Inquiring Spirit (1840).

Studies: J. R. Barth, Coleridge and Christian Doctrine (Cambridge, MA, 1969); T. McFarland, Coleridge and the Pantheist Tradition (Oxford, 1969); B. Willey, Samuel Taylor Coleridge (London, 1972).

J. H. ELIAS

COLLEGIALITY AND CONCILIARITY

These two concepts are concerned chiefly with the *government or *ministry of the church. *Vatican II's Constitution on the Church (Lumen Gentium) spoke of the college of the apostles and of the college of bishops as successor to it (II:22–23). This was an attempt to redress the imbalance of Vatican I's exclusive concentration on the primacy of the bishop of Rome. The use of the concept of collegiality has not resolved the Roman problem of the relation between the *papacy and the rest of the bishops in governing the church, but it has encouraged regional episcopal conferences (virtually synods) and fostered more generally a co-operative, collegial spirit and style in church life.

The Faith and Order report, Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry (Geneva, 1982), set up the ideal of a collegial, as well as a personal (i.e. individual) and a communal, dimension of ministry at every geographical level. This pattern finds clear expression in *Presbyterianism, at the congregational level in the body of elders (including any ordained presbyters) and at broader levels in presbytery, synod and assembly.

In the Roman and Orthodox traditions, *councils comprise only bishops, so that collegiality and conciliarity inevitably overlap. But in so far as the latter is applicable to other churches, decision-making in synods, assemblies or conferences normally involves laity as well as ordained ministers, perhaps of different orders. 'Conciliar fellowship' as a way of describing the goal of church unity has been prominent in World Council of Churches circles, especially since the Nairobi Assembly (1975). This speaks of a unity between churches that is publicly manifested when their representatives assemble for a council whose decisions will be authoritative for all the participating churches. Such conciliarity allows for the continuation of some diversity among the churches. ‘Conciliar’ is also used to denote a quality of life within each local church – one that integrates and coordinates rather than excludes the gifts of individual members.

Conciliarity is thus a more comprehensive ideal than collegiality, although their more generalized applications are closer to each other. They both bear comparison with the concepts of sobornost* and koinonia*.

Bibliography

Faith and Order: Louvain 1971 (Geneva, 1971); L. Vischer, ‘After the Debate on Collegiality’, Ecumenical Review 37 (1985), pp. 306–319.

D. F. WRIGHT

COMMON GRACE, see GRACE

COMMON-SENSE PHILOSOPHY

This is the name given to a number of anti-sceptical philosophical positions adopted in reply to David Hume*, which stressed the philosophical importance of common-sense beliefs (e.g. about the existence of the self, the external world, the past and other minds), and also to common sense as a method of settling philosophical disputes. More weakly, the appeal to common sense may be regarded as a dialectical move, placing the onus of proving scepticism on the sceptic. Common-sense philosophy received its most able expression and defence from the theological ‘moderate’ Thomas Reid (1710–96), but the basic tenets of the ‘Scottish common-sense philosophy’ were taken over by numerous evangelical theologians (particularly those influenced by Princeton College and Seminary*, probably through the influence of the Scot John Witherspoon*), as providing both the epistemological and ontological basis of their natural theology and their philosophical ethics. Common-sense philosophy withered under its own internal difficulties, particularly the vagueness of the criterion of common sense, but more especially under the impact of continental idealism*. It enjoyed a revival in the twentieth century through the appeal to common sense by G. E. Moore (1873–1958) and to ordinary language by philosophers such as J. L. Austin (1911–60), and through the epistemology of R. M. Chisholm (1916–99).

Bibliography

R. M. Chisholm, Theory of Knowledge (Eaglewood Cliffs, 1977); T. Cuneo and R. van Woudenberg (eds.), The Cambridge Companion to Thomas Reid (Cambridge, 2004); H. A. Harris, Fundamentalism and Evangelicals (Oxford, 1998); J. McCosh, The Scottish Philosophy (London, 1875); G. E. Moore, Philosophical Papers (London, 1959); essays by N. Wolterstorff and P. Helm, in H. Hart et al. (eds.), Rationality in the Calvinian Tradition (Lanham, 1983); N. Wolterstorff, Thomas Reid and the Story of Epistemology (Cambridge, 2006).

P. HELM

COMMUNICATO IDIOMATUM, see CHRISTOLOGY

COMMUNION OF SAINTS

A theological term meaning ‘fellowship of believers’ which is found in the classical creeds*. It was originally inserted in order to express the belief that the living and the dead were united in the body of a single church, but it soon came to have a number of additional meanings which grew out of the ways in which the words ‘saint’* and ‘communion’ were defined.

In medieval theology, the word ‘saint’ was usually restricted to a relatively small category of Christians, including those whose names appeared in the Bible, who were martyrs* for their faith, or who had lived a life of exceptional piety and devotion. The most important single criterion, however, was doctrinal orthodoxy, and so the ‘fellowship of the saints’* came to mean the confession of Christ which the church formulated in creeds and other statements of a similar nature. The inclusion of both the living and the dead ensured that this confession had not changed over time, even if it had been periodically reformulated to deal with particular heresies. In later medieval theology, the term came to be understood as ‘sharing in holy things’, interpreting the Latin communio sanctorum as communio in sanctis. That view has been popular in Roman Catholic circles, where it is often associated with the church’s requirement that a person must be in communion with the see of Rome in order to partake of the sacraments, but although this remains the official view, most Catholic scholars today recognize that it is at best an extension of the credal sense and not the term's original meaning.

The *Protestant Reformers rejected the medieval understanding of sainthood; following the NT, they used the term to refer to all Christians. The fellowship of the saints thus came to mean the common life of any given congregation of believers, as well as the acceptance of the traditional teachings of the leading theologians and martyrs of the past. Doctrinal orthodoxy remained fundamental, but the scope of the term was broadened to embrace different spiritual gifts and ministries which were meant to be shared within the body of Christ. In the context of a divided Christendom, the communion of saints also came to be understood as the belief that all truly spiritual Christians were united with each other, regardless of their particular political situation or denominational affiliation. Because of this, it can be said that the doctrine of the communion of saints is one of the main theological pillars of the modern *ecumenical movement. A practical problem which it has encountered has been the need to distinguish between an essentially invisible church of 'true believers' on the one hand, and the largely nominal membership of institutional ecclesiastical bodies on the other. Many Protestants have tried to resolve this difficulty by seceding from 'mixed' denominations and creating what they see as 'pure' congregations of the saints. This tendency helps to account for the fissiparous nature of so much Protestantism, particularly as the 'pure church' remains an elusive ideal. Today most Protestants recognize their spiritual kinship with others who share their core beliefs, thus re-emphasizing the centrality of doctrinal orthodoxy in the definition of the communion of saints, and minimizing the significance of visible ecclesiastical divisions. Many Roman Catholics also think along these lines nowadays, as do some members of the Eastern Orthodox churches, though both Catholics and Orthodox give greater importance to the visible church as a means of defining what the boundaries of the communion of the saints are than Protestants usually do.

Theologically speaking, the doctrine of the communion of saints is interpreted in relation both to time and to space. In relation to time, it is taken to mean the fellowship of Christians in every age, past, present and future. Roman Catholics believe that it has a direct bearing on the church triumphant in heaven, and use the doctrine as a justification for praying to the dead, especially to the officially canonized 'saints'. Most Protestants vigorously reject that interpretation on the ground that prayer should be offered only to God, both because Jesus Christ, not the saints, is the one mediator between God and man (1 Tim. 2:5) and because the church triumphant has entered into eternal rest.

In relation to space, the doctrine means that all true Christians are united in fellowship with each other, regardless of nationality, language, social status or culture. The emergence of a truly worldwide Christianity has given this dimension of the doctrine a new significance, as theologians, church leaders and many ordinary believers from developing countries make an ever greater impact on the traditional 'Christian' world of the West. It seems almost certain that this phenomenon will become even more important in the future than it already is and that the implications for the communion of saints in the body of Christ will be worked out most fully in the mutual acceptance and even integration of different cultures and forms of worship in an increasingly globalized church.

See also: CHURCH.

Bibliography

E. Clowney, The Church (Leicester, 1995); Lutheran Church of Germany, Communio Sanctorum: The Church as the Communion of Saints, tr. D. R. Smith (Collegeville, 2005); B. L. Marthaler, 'Interpreting the Communion of Saints', Liturgy 5, 1985, pp. 89–93; M. Perham, Communion of Saints: An Examination of the Place of the Christian Dead in the Belief, Worship and Calendars of the Church (London, 1980); D. H. Steele, 'With All God's People: Towards a Protestant Reclaiming of the Communion of Saints', Theology Today 51, 1995, pp. 539–547; K. Ware, 'One Body in Christ: Death and the Communion of Saints', Sobornost 3, 1981, pp. 179–191.

G. L. BRAY

CONCILIARITY, see COLLEGIALITY AND CONCILIARITY

CONCUPISCENCE, see AUGUSTINE; SIN

Churches and the Third Reich, 2 vols. (London, 1987 and 1988).

CONFESSING CHURCH

K. CLEMENTS

The Confessing Church (die Bekennende Kirche) comprised that section of the German evangelical church which resisted the nazification of Protestantism during the Third Reich, 1933–45. The extreme nationalism that brought Hitler to power at the end of January 1933 was accompanied by religious movements such as the ‘German Christians’ (Deutsche Christen) that sought to transform the Protestant faith into a religion of Germanic racial purity and subservience to the state. This would have included the banning of all ‘non-Aryan’ (i.e. of Jewish descent) pastors from office and the imposition of a dictatorial ‘Führer-principle’ into church government.

There resulted the ‘Church Struggle’ (Kirchenkampf) from the spring of 1933 onwards. At church-political level the opposition was led by Pastor Martin Niemöller, who formed the ‘Pastors’ Emergency League’ that soon had 6,000 members, while the theological resistance was mainly nerved by Karl *Barth, who was then teaching at Bonn. At the end of May 1934 a Free Synod met at Barmen and unanimously adopted the Theological Declaration of *Barmen. Inspired largely by Barth and his christocentric emphasis upon revelation, this rejected the beliefs and methods of the ‘German Christians’ as inimical to the biblical faith and Reformation doctrine, and declared Jesus Christ as the one Word of God to be obeyed in contradistinction to all other claims to divine truth, power and authority. Thereafter, those pastors, congregations and regional (Land) churches that adhered to Barmen denoted themselves as the Confessing Church. A second synod at Berlin-Dahlem in October 1934 set up alternative church structures. The Confessing Church was never a majority in German Protestantism, and did not as such politically oppose the Nazi state. But adherence to it was costly, and until the end of the Reich its very existence represented almost the only public form of denial of Hitler’s claims to total allegiance.

See also: BONHOEFFER, DIETRICH.

Bibliography

E. Bethge, Dietrich Bonhoeffer: A Biography (Minneapolis, rev. edn, 1999); K. Scholder, The

CONFESSIONS OF FAITH

Confession has from the outset been constitutive of Christianity. The Jesus movement was distinguished from the rest of Judaism by its declared conviction that Jesus was Messiah. In various contexts in the developing life of the church, distinctive Christian beliefs were summarized in formulas of greater or lesser fixity in structure and wording (cf. 1 Tim. 3:16; O. Cullmann, The Earliest Christian Confessions, London, 1949). The *martyrs in particular made their confession before the world as they faced death (cf. 1 Tim. 6:12–13); the martyr-designate was a ‘confessor’.

To serve the needs of the church there developed in the second century the ‘rule of faith’ and later the *creeds. These may all be described as confessions of faith. So too may other statements such as the Chalcedonian Definition (see *Christology), technically not a creed, which begins, ‘We all with one voice confess our Lord Jesus Christ.’

Normally, however, the phrase designates the formal presentations of belief produced mainly by Protestants in the church divisions of the Reformation, including writings not calling themselves ‘confessions’, such as the decrees and creed of the Council of *Trent, the Heidelberg Catechism, the Thirty-Nine Articles and the Canons of Dort. Many of these confessions have remained authoritative doctrinal standards in their ecclesiastical traditions (hence ‘confession’ is also occasionally used with reference to such communions).

The survey given below restricts itself to the Reformation and post-Reformation confessions, and is still necessarily selective. But confessions continued to be formulated, such as the *Methodist Articles of Religion (Wesley’s revision of the Thirty-Nine Articles, adopted by American Methodists in 1784) and the Lambeth Quadrilateral (1888, stipulating the *Anglican essentials for church unity). Significant twentieth-century examples are the *Barmen Declaration (1934), the expanded but still very brief confessional basis of the *World Council of Churches approved at New Delhi in 1961, the *Lausanne Covenant (1974), and the Confession of 1967 of the United Presbyterian Church in the USA. This last was included in the church's Book of Confessions (1967), along with the Apostles' and Nicene Creeds, the Scots and Second Helvetic Confessions, the Heidelberg Catechism, the Westminster Confession and Shorter Catechism, and the Barmen Declaration (cf. E. A. Dowey, Jr, A Commentary on the Confession of 1967 and an Introduction to the Book of Confessions, Philadelphia, 1968). The ecumenical movement has produced many doctrinal formulations, including the widely based Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry of 1982.

The contemporary pluralistic confusion in theology has not been conducive to the writing of new confessions. The Book of Confessions represents one solution to the churches' difficulties with their sixteenth- or seventeenth-century confessional documents, which often speak disparagingly of the pope or inappropriately of the relation between church and civil power, as well as possibly being excessively doctrinally rigid in places. Another solution is relaxation of the terms in which office-bearers are required to subscribe to them. (The Church of Scotland requires acknowledgment of only the fundamental doctrines [unspecified] in the Westminster Confession, with liberty of opinion on issues not part of the [undefined] substance of the faith.) Or, again, churches have relegated confessions to the status of 'historic' statements of their faith.

In this debate, confessions are often compared to their disadvantage with the creeds, but the contrast is frequently overdrawn. Most confessions were certainly productions of dividing or divided churches, but so too was the Chalcedonian Definition. Both confessions and creeds were formed to exclude erroneous beliefs; both were historically conditioned by the heresies they refuted. The creeds' limitations (e.g. none mentions the Lord's Supper; they together contribute little on the *atonement) and obscurities (cf. '*descended into hell' in the Apostles' Creed, to say nothing of the technical terms of Nicaea and Chalcedon) are far more obvious than those of the confessions, which are normally more balanced and thorough. If confessions are more controversial, creeds are more minimal and have in practice lost more completely than confessions their originally basic function as touchstones of orthodoxy. This is, however, not true of the Apostles' or Nicene Creeds.

Conservative Christians may in response be found defending confessions indiscriminately, forgetting that for Protestants they (like creeds) can only be secondary to Scripture, and are subject to the judgment and revision of Scripture, as many of them explicitly state. Among some major traditions, e.g. the Baptist, churchmen have often refused subscription to any creed or confession; but claims to be 'Bible-only' Christians or churches ignore the quasi-confessional force of other forms, such as church constitutions, patterns of worship and practice, hymnaries and traditional schemas of biblical interpretation. In so far as most churches have found they cannot do without confessions in some form, the best defence of the Reformation confessions lies in their wider use in the teaching activities of the congregation.

Survey of confessions

Virtually all the confessions discussed below are given in English translation in J. Pelikan and V. Hotchkiss, Creeds and Confessions in the Christian Tradition, 4 vols. (New Haven, 2003). Many are also found in P. Schaff, The Creeds of Christendom, 3 vols. (New York, 1877ff., best edn 1919); J. H. Leith, Creeds of the Churches (Richmond, VA, 31982); A. C. Cochrane, Reformed Confessions of the Sixteenth Century (London, 1966).

Schleitheim Confession* (1527), seven articles drafted by Michael Sattler (c. 1490–1527) and adopted by the Swiss Brethren, 'the free church of the Zwinglian Reformation'. They give a clear statement of the distinctive views of mainstream *Anabaptists.

Augsburg Confession* (1530), the first major Protestant confession, a moderate account of Lutheran teachings compiled by *Melancthon and presented to the imperial Diet (Parliament) of Augsburg. It retains an unrivalled status throughout *Lutheranism. In 1531 Melancthon wrote an Apology for it in response to a Catholic Confutation. His subsequent revision of the Confession, softening in particular its assertion of Christ's real presence in the Supper, brought bitter controversy. It was the original, unaltered (Invariata), that was reaffirmed as the basic document of Lutheranism in the Book of Concord (see below). It starts with the Trinity, condemns ancient heretics and Anabaptists and says nothing on predestination (T. G. Tappert, The Book of Concord, Philadelphia, 1959).

Tetrapolitan Confession (1530), submitted to the same Diet by 'four cities' of South Germany led by Strasbourg (hence largely *Bucer's work). It was unable to follow the Lutherans' Augsburg Confession on the Lord's Supper, on which, inter alia, it sought to mediate between Lutherans and *Zwinglians (see *Eucharist).

First Helvetic (Swiss) Confession (1536), the first common confession of the Swiss Reformed cities, drawn up by *Bullinger and others, with help from Bucer and Capito (1478–1541), still hoping to reconcile the Swiss and the Lutherans. It begins with Scripture, gives prominence to church ministry, and covers temporal government (whose supreme task is to promote true religion) and marriage. It is also known as the Second Confession of Basel, where it was agreed. The First Confession of Basel (1534) was typical of earlier Swiss statements in having only local authority.

Genevan Confession (1536), produced by *Calvin and *Farel as part of the constitution of the city's newly reformed church. It was unique among the Reformation confessions in demanding subscription by all Geneva's citizens and residents – an impossibility, as events proved. Its twenty-one brief articles begin with Scripture as God's word, and include excommunication and the 'Christian vocation' of magistrates, but not predestination.

Second Helvetic (Swiss) Confession (1566), a revision of Bullinger's personal confession, approved at Zurich by the Swiss Reformed cities now including Geneva (but not Basel). Although a short book, it has been widely translated and as influential as perhaps the most mature of the Reformed confessions. It is marked throughout by a concern for continuity with the catholic orthodoxy of the early church, and by a practical, pastoral outlook. Article 1, on Scripture, declares that 'the preaching of the Word of God is the Word of God'. The involvement of Geneva built on the Zurich Consensus (Consensus Tigurinus, 1549) on the Lord's Supper, between Calvin and Farel for Geneva and Bullinger for the more Zwinglian Swiss churches. The approach of the latter probably predominates in the Consensus.

Gallican (French) Confession (1559), adopted at the first national synod of the Reformed churches at Paris. It was a recasting into forty articles of a draft sent from Geneva, with some significant deviations from the latter. Article 2 declares that God reveals himself first in creation and 'secondly, and more clearly' in his word, which the Genevan draft placed alone as Article 1. It acknowledges the three creeds, without Calvin's reservations. The synod at La Rochelle in 1571 reaffirmed it after minor revisions.

Scots Confession (1560), the first confession of the reformed Church of Scotland (superceded by the *Westminster Confession in 1647), drawn up by John *Knox, assisted by five other Johns – Douglas, Row, Spottiswoode, Willock and Winram. It rings with a spontaneous and even disorderly vigour, reflecting the critical haste of its production. It draws on a wide range of Reformed sources, spanning Knox's experiences on the continent and in England. God and creation come first, but election appears between incarnation and the cross. 'Out of this Kirk there is neither life nor eternal felicity' – but 'this Kirk is invisible, known only to God'. The notes of the true church include discipline as well as the word and sacraments. Condemned is the notion that the sacraments are merely 'naked and bare signs'. This lively, combative confession has enjoyed considerable modern appreciation (G. D. Henderson and J. Bulloch [eds.], The Scots Confession [modern English version], Edinburgh, 1960; K. Barth, The Knowledge of God and the Service of God, London, 1938).

Belgic Confession (1561), drawn up by Guido de Brès (1522–67) as an apologia for the persecuted Reformed of the Low Countries, finally becoming, at Dort in 1619 (see *Dort, Synod of), one of the doctrinal standards of the Dutch Reformed Church (with the *Heidelberg Catechism and the Canons of *Dort). It closely follows the Gallican Confession, e.g. in its apologetic dissociation from 'Anabaptists', although its statement on natural revelation is more careful.

Thirty-Nine Articles (1563), the basic confession of the Reformed Church of England (and hence of most other Anglican churches). Under Elizabeth I they were distilled from Cranmer's Forty-Two Articles of 1553, with a final change in 1571. Intended as an instrument of national religious unity, a via media between Rome and Anabaptism (not between Rome and Geneva), they reflect diverse continental influences – more Lutheran on predestination and in allowing beliefs and practices not contrary to Scripture, more Reformed on the sacraments. Their interpretation has been keenly disputed (cf. *Newman's Tract 90) (W. H. Griffith Thomas, The Principles of Theology, London, 1956; O. O'Donovan, On the Thirty-Nine Articles, Exeter, 1986).

Formula of Concord* (1577), a long document which resolved Lutheran controversies between the 'Philippists', who followed the accommodating Melancthon, and the 'Gnesio-Lutherans', the 'authentic' disciples of Luther himself. Compiled largely by James Andreae (1528–90), who also wrote an Epitome, and Martin *Chemnitz, its carefully balanced exposition had the effect of excluding rapprochement with the Calvinists, which the Melancthonians hoped for. It was included in the Lutherans' Book of Concord (1580) together with: the three creeds; the Augsburg Confession and its Apology; Luther's Smalcald Articles and Melancthon's Treatise on the Power and Primacy of the Pope (both 1537); and Luther's Large and Small Catechisms. This collection comprises all the generally accepted doctrinal standards of Lutheranism and is accepted by most Lutheran clergy at ordination (T. G. Tappert, The Book of Concord; E. Schlink, The Theology of the Lutheran Confessions, Philadelphia, 1961).

An irenic response to the Formula of Concord was the Harmony of the Confessions of Faith of the Orthodox and Reformed Churches published at Geneva in 1581. Produced by Jean Salvart (d. 1585), *Beza and others, this harmony of fifteen Protestant confessions, including Augsburg, argued that Protestant unity was not to be despaired of, but it had little appeal beyond the Reformed constituency (Peter Hall, The Harmony of Protestant Confessions of Faith, London, 1842).

Westminster Confession* (1646), a highly systematic exposition of Calvinist orthodoxy (see *Reformed theology), of remarkable comprehensiveness, balance and precision, which was adopted by the Church of Scotland in 1647 and subsequently became the confession of most Presbyterian churches, and, with appropriate changes, of Congregationalists (and Particular Baptists) in Britain and America. It was the work of the Westminster Assembly's largely *Puritan divines, commissioned to produce a confession to unite Scotland and England. It purveys a developed, so-called 'scholastic' Calvinism, reflecting the influence of Puritan *covenant theology and of the Irish Articles of 1615 (which were briefly adopted by the [Episcopal] Church of Ireland, despite saying nothing about the necessity of episcopal ordination and the three orders of ministry, being chiefly written by James Ussher, 1581–1656). Its more controversial features include double predestination (alongside free *will and contingent 'second causes'), the covenant of works with *Adam, a Puritan doctrine of *assurance and a sabbatarian view of Sunday. Even its critics recognize its solidity and majesty (S. W. Carruthers [ed.], The Westminster Confession of Faith . . . with Notes, Manchester, 1937; B. B. Warfield, The Westminster Assembly and Its Work, New York, 1931; A. I. C. Heron (ed.), The Westminster Confession in the Church Today, Edinburgh, 1982).

Cambridge Platform (1648) and Savoy Declaration (1658) were the fundamental formularies of, respectively, American and English *Congregationalism. In doctrine they essentially reproduced the Westminster Confession, with the changes needed to provide for a church polity of independent congregations (Schaff; Leith; W. Walker, The Creeds and Platforms of Congregationalism, New York, 1893).

Second London Baptist Confession (1677), known also as the Philadelphia Confession, similarly adapted Westminster Calvinism to *Baptist polity and baptism. It was the most widely accepted of Calvinist Baptist confessions (W. L. Lumpkin, Baptist Confessions of Faith, Valley Forge, rev. edn 1969). The New Hampshire Confession (1833) was a milder statement of Baptist Calvinist faith.

Confession of Dositheus (1672), the most important *Orthodox confession of modern times, defining Orthodox theology against Protestantism, but showing evidence of indebtedness to Roman Catholic thought; Orthodox are thus wary of placing too much weight on it as a statement of their faith. Dositheus (1641–1707) was patriarch of Jerusalem and presided over the synod there which canonized this confession. Its specific 'Calvinist' target was Cyril Lucaris (1572–1638), the patriarch of Constantinople who was strongly attracted to Protestantism. His own Confession of Faith (Geneva, 1629; G. A. Hadjiantoniou, Protestant Patriarch, Richmond, 1961) is a thoroughly Calvinist interpretation of Orthodox doctrine.

Bibliography

W. A. Curtis, A History of the Creeds and Confessions of Faith (Edinburgh, 1911); J. Pelikan, Creeds and Confessions in the Christian Tradition, vol. 4, Credo (New Haven and London, 2003); C. Plantinga, Jr, A Place to Stand: A Reformed Study of Creeds and Confessions (Grand Rapids, 1979); E. Routley, Creeds and Confessions (London, 1962).

D. F. WRIGHT

CONFIRMATION

The rite called 'confirmation' has become a 'rite in search of a theology'. It developed in the Western church from the separation of a secondary part of the third-century baptismal rite from the actual (water) *baptism, and in the fifth century gained the Latin title 'confirmatio'. Whereas it appears to rest upon the apostolic precedent of a post-baptismal laying on of hands (Acts 8:14–17; 19:1–7), in fact no direct continuity of usage can be traced to these occurrences, and, even if they do provide some precedent, it is doubtful whether they should be viewed as normative for Christian initiation in the way that water baptism is.

The Gospels give no warrant for such a rite; the Acts of the Apostles has many instances of the use of water baptism without a subsequent laying on of hands (so that these instances in fact appear as exceptions); the two instances themselves have very little in common with each other (and in particular the Acts 8 passage has the laying on of hands far apart in time from water-baptism, whereas the Acts 19 passage has it in immediate sequence); and the Pauline corpus (whether understood narrowly or broadly) has no mention of this rite, though much about water baptism. The only further possible biblical evidence is the obscure reference in Heb. 6:2 (where baptismōn does not necessarily refer to baptisms at all, and is not always translated as baptisms in the English versions). In general, there is silence, and there is no theology of initiation (whether outward and sacramental, or inward and regenerative) which would correspond to such a ceremony. There is reference to water baptism in some of the earliest post-apostolic authors, notably Ignatius of Antioch, the Didache, the Shepherd of Hermas (see *Apostolic Fathers) and Justin Martyr (see *Apologists). However, they too are silent about a post-baptismal laying on of hands or *anointing. The most primitive traceable practice, whether in the West or in the East, seems to have been simply water baptism, for adults and probably for infants, and this led straight into participation in Communion (see *Eucharist).

A post-baptismal laying on of hands in initiation is first to be discovered in the West in the late second century in *Tertullian and soon after in *Hippolytus. The East did not follow this until the second half of the fourth century, and then used anointing (the 'seal'). It still continues this practice to the present day (giving both water baptism and the 'seal' even to infants in one single rite of initiation which leads them into Communion). In the West the complex rite of water baptism (with or without anointing), laying on of hands, giving of the kiss of peace, and participation in Communion, held sway till around the sixth century, but afterwards broke into separate parts in most places. *Augustine's doctrine of original *sin, and the necessity of baptism immediately subsequent upon birth where any chance of death existed, led to clinical baptism of infants from the early Middle Ages. Confirmation (as it was called from the fifth century onwards) could not then take place at the same time (as it usually still required a bishop to give it), and the age of confirmation floated upwards in an unplanned way to suit the actual circumstances in which a bishop might be present to confirm. The title 'confirmatio' was used from the fifth century onwards of the detached episcopal laying on of hands. Thus the rite came, in process of time, to be interpreted not as initiatory, but (as its use declared it to be) 'confirmatory'. *Thomas Aquinas has it so far detached from baptismal initiation that he allows that ordination can proceed without the candidate having been confirmed!

Thus the Reformers inherited a pattern in which confirmation was given by anointing, and was viewed as a sacrament of strengthening or growth, for candidates at any age from infancy (though that was rare by the sixteenth century) to adulthood, though a mean age may have been between three and nine. The Reformers agreed that water baptism was the sole sacramental initiation, and did not wish to add confirmation to the rite of baptism, which in general they still administered to infants. Instead, they took the medieval pattern to its logical conclusion, raised the age of confirmation to between thirteen and sixteen, required massive *catechizing to precede it, and used it as a rite for adult admission to Communion. In this they were assisted by some bogus early church history promulgated by *Calvin, and believed on his authority. In fact, the new usage was unprecedented. What happened was that the outward sign reverted to the laying on of hands, which replaced 'the Bishop of Rome's buttering'. The Church of England Book of Common Prayer adopted exactly this discipline of Calvin's, and it has run to the present day. On the other hand, Article XXV of 1563 (see *Thirty-Nine Articles) added to the Edwardian Article a paragraph which said that confirmation is not to be counted as a sacrament of the gospel, as it arises from the corrupt following of the apostles, and has no visible sign or ceremony ordained of God. The Book of Common Prayer corresponded to this in that the prayer at the laying on of hands had no sacramental content or character ('Defend, O Lord, this thy servant with thy heavenly grace . . .'); and, when a section on the *sacraments was added to the Anglican Catechism in 1604, even though it occurred within the confirmation service and was preparing candidates for confirmation, it asserted that there are but two sacraments of the gospel, and made no reference to confirmation whatsoever.

The twentieth century saw differing attempts to produce a satisfying theology, and to bring pastoral and liturgical practice into accord with it. Non-episcopal churches have followed Calvin's pattern. Anglicans have first flirted with the notion that water-plus-the laying-on-of-hands equals full initiation, and have attempted to 're-integrate' the 'disintegrated' parts of the primitive (i.e. Hippolytan) rite; but more latterly they have been ready to see water baptism as full sacramental initiation, and have started to move towards child and even infant Communion on the basis of it. Roman Catholics have greatly widened the use of presbyteral confirmation (which has a long history in that church), and have sought in some places to associate it with first Communion. But thinness of the theological foundations in both Scripture, history and systematic theology still generally leaves it a rite in search of a theology.

Bibliography

R. J. Bastian, The Effects of Confirmation in Recent Catholic Thought (Rome, 1962); J. Behrens, Confirmation, Sacrament of Grace: The Theology, Practice and Law of the Roman Catholic Church and the Church of England (Leominster, 1995); C. Buchanan, Anglican Confirmation (Nottingham, 1986); G. Dix, The Theology of Confirmation in Relation to Baptism (London, 1946); J. D. G. Dunn, Baptism in the Holy Spirit (London, 1970);

J. D. C. Fisher, Confirmation Then and Now (London, 1978); G. W. H. Lampe, The Seal of the Spirit (London, 1951); B. Neunhauser, Baptism and Confirmation (Freiburg, 1964); E. C. Whitaker, Sacramental Initiation Complete in Baptism (Nottingham, 1975).

C. O. BUCHANAN

CONFUCIANISM AND CHRISTIANITY

Confucianism has been the most significant philosophical system for centuries among the Chinese, Japanese and Korean peoples in providing ethical principles and contributing to the stability of society. While Mao Tse-tung (Mao Zedong) and other communist leaders in mainland China tried to exterminate Confucianism from Chinese society for hindering the cause of the communist revolution, Confucianism was strongly rejuvenated in Asia by the governments of the Republic of China (Taiwan) and Singapore in line with the resurgence of traditional values.

Confucianism is considered by the Chinese as a philosophy rather than a religion; but 'philosophy' is not here used in the normal sense of the word in the West. Confucianism is more than a philosophy, as it combines philosophy with life itself.

There are similarities between Confucianism and Christianity in their *ethical teaching and their concern for peace in family, society and nation. However, the methods of achieving peace and tranquillity in society are radically different in the two.

(1) Confucius (551–479 BC) taught the golden rule and the moral perfection of the individual through harmony in five basic human relationships: between ruler and subject, husband and wife, parents and children, brother and sister, and brother/sister and friends. The ideal man in Confucianism is called Jün Tze (gentleman). He is not necessarily an aristocrat, but one who cultivates the moral characteristics of Jen (benevolence, love of others), Shiao (filial piety) and Li (sense of propriety), and who keeps the five virtues of courtesy, magnanimity, good faith, diligence, and kindness. The ideal man knows how to cultivate himself, how to rule his family, and how to govern his nation properly. The chief objective of Confucianism is to establish peace and order in society through a strong moral basis with the help of rituals and music.

In Christianity, Jesus' Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 5–7) in the NT and the Ten Commandments (Exod. 20) in the OT similarly emphasize a moral and peaceful society. This may provide a starting place for communication between Confucianism and Christianity.

(2) In Confucianism, a man's chief concern should be the duties of the present life rather than what will happen after death. There is, therefore, an emphasis on the 'now' of this present world. When Confucius was asked how a man should serve the spirits of the dead, he replied, 'As you are not yet able to serve the living, how will you be able to serve the spirits of the dead?' (Analect XI.11). When he was asked about death, he said, 'As you know nothing yet about life, how can you know anything about death?' (ibid.). Death and life must be accepted with resignation as the result of natural law, and they are determined by the 'will of heaven' (Ming) rather than either fate or divine *predestination.

By contrast with biblical teaching on *sin, Confucianism considers wrongdoing as improper, inexpedient and antisocial, without any reference to man's direct responsibility to a higher being or God. Most important is human reformation. Scripture, on the other hand, presents a doctrine of *salvation, *repentance, and forgiveness of sins from God (see *Guilt and forgiveness).

The Bible, in addition, gives due weight to both present and eternal existence, and stresses that people's earthly lives possess significance for them and God precisely in the light of their future existence (see *Eschatology; *Judgment of God).

There is also a radical difference between Confucianism and Christianity in the areas of *epistemology and methods of achieving human goals. The former starts with man and nature (humanism), the latter with the self-revelation of God (in a supernatural, theocentric and Christocentric outlook in life). Confucius was an agnostic and taught the basic goodness of human nature which man can cultivate for the betterment of humankind. For Confucius, man can achieve the peaceful society by his own ingenuity.

On the other hand, the Christian Bible teaches that individuals can do nothing apart from God and his *grace, and are totally dependent upon him for moral and spiritual life (John 15:5). The question of whether people need God for their moral and spiritual life distinguishes Christianity from Confucianism. Those in the West who deny supernatural elements in Christianity are attracted to Confucianism, while others in the Orient who see finitude and failure in humanism are open to Christianity.

Bibliography

Ching Feng, quarterly magazine produced by Tao Fong Shan Ecumenical Centre, New Territories, Hong Kong; Julia Ching, Confucianism and Christianity (Tokyo, 1977); Paul E. Kauffman, Confucius, Mao and Christ (Hong Kong, 1978); Bong Rin Ro (ed.), Christian Alternatives to Ancestor Practices (Talchung, Taiwan, 1985); Xinzhong Yao, Confucianism and Christianity (Brighton, 1996); J. D. Young, Confucianism and Christianity: The First Encounter (Hong Kong, 1983).

BONG RIN RO

CONGAR, YVES (1904–95)

Yves Congar was one of the leading Catholic theologians of the twentieth century. He regarded his vocation as being 'at once and by the same vein, priestly and religious, *Dominican and *Thomist, ecumenical and ecclesiological'. He contributed to the recovery of the biblical images of the church which emphasize its mystical nature. Congar's vision for ecclesial renewal led to a profound transformation of the Catholic Church, its relationship with the other churches and the world. The Second *Vatican Council (1962–5) became the catalyst for this change, and its documents gave authoritative expression to his most important ideas on the church. As he explains, 'I was filled to overflowing. All the things to which I gave special attention issued in the Council: ecclesiology, ecumenism, reform of the Church, the lay state, mission, ministries, *collegiality, return to the sources and Tradition.' Congar viewed his immense work at the Council as a part, albeit the most important part, of a vocation dedicated to the service of truth. Honoured as a pioneer of church unity and a champion of the laity, it is true to say that, for many in the Catholic Church, his role as reformer is ambiguous and his theology remains obfuscated to the present day.

Bibliography

V. Dunne, Prophecy in the Church: The Vision of Yves Congar, European University Studies

23 (Frankfurt, 2000); G. Flynn, Yves Congar's Vision of the Church in a World of Unbelief (Aldershot, 2004); idem (ed.), Yves Congar: Theologian of the Church (Louvain, 2005); E. T. Gropp, Yves Congar's Theology of the Holy Spirit (New York, 2004); A. Nichols, Yves Congar (London and Wilton, 1989).

G. FLYNN

CONGREGATIONALISM

The origins of Congregationalism may be traced back to England in the reign of Queen Elizabeth I (1558–1603). Her objective for the church was an enforced uniformity, but there were those who wanted to see the national church reorganized on *presbyterian (see also *Church government) rather than episcopal lines. Others, however, repudiated the whole concept of a state church and favoured the 'gathered church' principle. These became known as 'Separatists' (later 'Independents') and were the forerunners of the Congregationalists. They contended that the *church should consist only of those who had personally responded to the call of Christ, and who had covenanted with him and with one another to live together as his disciples.

A leading figure among the early Independents was Robert Browne (1553–1633), a Cambridge graduate who has been called the father of English separatism. In 1582 he published in Holland his famous Treatise of Reformation without Tarrying for Anie in which he set forth congregational principles. He asserted that 'the Church planted or gathered is a company or number of Christians or believers, which, by a willing covenant made with their God, are under the government of God and Christ and keep his laws in one holy communion'. Such churches, he claimed, are subject to neither bishops nor magistrates. Ordination is not vested in elders, but is at the hands of the whole church.

In various areas, companies of men and women put Browne's teaching into practice. Rather than submit to ecclesiastical regimentation, many sought religious freedom in Holland. Some of these later crossed the Atlantic where churches of the congregational pattern became one of the formative influences in the New World. It was from John Robinson's (c. 1575–1625) church at Leiden that the 'Pilgrim Fathers' set off in 1620 in the Mayflower. Congregationalism became the recognized church order in Connecticut and Massachusetts and continued to be so until the first quarter of the nineteenth century. Meanwhile, in England the pattern of church life taught by Robert Browne spread with the formation of Congregational and *Baptist churches throughout the country, particularly in the later seventeenth century. Following the Act of Uniformity (1662), over 2,000 clergy opted for nonconformity rather than conform to the Book of Common Prayer and an episcopal order. The faith and beliefs of the Congregationalists were expressed in the Savoy Declaration of 1658, just as the Westminster Confession a few years earlier had expressed the Presbyterian viewpoint.

During the following century there was less obvious growth in nonconformity, but two great Independents of this period call for mention – the hymn writers Isaac Watts (1674–1748) and Philip Doddridge (1702–51). A number of Independent and Presbyterian churches at this time became virtually *unitarian in doctrine, and dissenters lost much of their earlier zeal.

The Evangelical Revival, however, brought new life to the churches as a whole. In 1831 the Congregational Union was formed with the primary objective of 'promoting evangelical religion in connection with the Congregational denomination'. Insistence upon the independence of the local Christian community was never regarded as precluding a loose fellowship of independent local churches for purposes of mutual consultation and edification.

One of the great names in Congregationalism during the second half of the nineteenth century was that of R. W. Dale (1829–95). He was one of a long line of distinguished ministers at Carrs Lane Congregational Church in Birmingham. Dale combined moral fervour, intellectual power and intense religious conviction. He was the embodiment of nonconformity's interest in social and educational reforms. He maintained that Christian convictions either issued in political action or evaporated in pietistic sentimentality. He became a national figure and sat on the Royal Commission for Education, and was the ally and friend of leaders of the Liberal Party. It was said that in the city of Birmingham no major municipal decision would be taken before Dale's views had been canvassed. Dale found time to write a History of Congregationalism and was also instrumental in the founding of Mansfield College, Oxford (1886), the first principal of which, A. M. Fairbairn (1838–1912), was a significant mediator of German critical scholarship in Great Britain.

During the latter part of the nineteenth century the influence of biblical criticism was increasingly felt in Britain; Congregationalists and Presbyterians were, in many cases, ready to imbibe the teachings of ‘*liberal’ theologians. ‘Congregationalists drank more deeply of [them] than did any of the others. Congregationalism, freed by its new federation from the bondage of parochialism, and freed traditionally by its intellectual ethos from any risk of becoming mentally stagnant, offered enthusiastic hospitality to the new critical teachings on the Bible which came from Germany. There has always been a keen and energetic “modernist” movement in Congregationalism’ (E. Routley, The Story of Congregationalism).

In Britain, Congregationalism took a decisive step in 1966 when local Congregational churches were invited to covenant together to form the Congregational Church. This step was later followed by the union of the Congregational Church with the Presbyterian Church of England, leading to the formation of the United Reformed Church. With this new development, Congregationalism, as traditionally understood, largely disappeared from the scene in England, but not in Ireland, Scotland and Wales, although it remains the basis of church order in Baptist churches as well as in a growing number of independent evangelical churches.

A group of Congregationalists, determined to save historic independency, formed themselves into the Congregational Federation. Their quarrel with the scheme of union was not so much on theological grounds, but on the issue of the freedom of the local church to govern its own affairs under the direction of the Holy Spirit. The Federation believes strongly in the value of unity in diversity and deplors any tendency towards regimentation. A number of strongly evangelical Congregational churches did not enter the scheme of union, on the grounds that it was one further example of ecumenical compromise. They were critical of the scheme on the grounds of its theological ambiguity, as well as its abandonment of the principle of independency. They are linked together in an Evangelical Fellowship of Congregational Churches.

Worldwide, Congregationalism has been closely involved with the *ecumenical movement. This fact no doubt explains to some extent the underlying reasons for the various mergers which have taken place in different parts of the world between Congregational, Presbyterian and – in some cases – Methodist churches. The general trend in Congregationalism worldwide has been away from independency.

The Congregational system of church government has often been wrongly described as democratic. Ideally, the church is seen as being under the rule of Christ, and the church meeting seeks to discern his will. It is hardly surprising that many Congregational churches have been relatively small in membership – a large congregation finds it harder to work out the principle of ‘Christocracy’ through the medium of the church meeting. In a Congregational church the members are empowered to elect their own church officers and to choose their own minister. Membership of the church is on profession of personal faith in Christ, and new members are normally welcomed by being given the right hand of fellowship at a Communion service.

Bibliography

R. W. Dale, Manual of Congregational Principles (London, 1884); D. Jenkins, Congregationalism: A Restatement (London, 1954); A. Peel, A Brief History of English Congregationalism (London, 1931); E. Routley, The Story of Congregationalism (London, 1961); A. P. F. Sell, Saints: Visible, Orderly and Catholic: The Congregational Idea of the Church (Allison Park, 1986); W. Walker, The Creeds and Platforms of Congregationalism (New York, 1893); B. R. White, The English Separatist Tradition from the Marian Martyrs to the Pilgrim Fathers (Oxford, 1971).

G. W. KIRBY

CONGRUISM, see MERIT

CONSCIENCE

Although the language of conscience (Lat. conscientia; Gk syneidesis) was partially inherited from Roman Stoicism, the *patristic usage of the terms attempted to reflect scriptural concepts. For example, Ambrose of Milan wrote of conscience as a reflective self-opening whereby men are encountered and probed by God in grace and in judgment. Since the Fathers, Christian accounts of conscience have mainly been shaped by two distinctions.

Prospective and retrospective conscience

The first distinguishes between whether conscience is prospective (looking towards future action; 'directive') or retrospective (judging past action).

Prospective: The medieval period developed the most thorough systematization of a prospective account of conscience whereby it became an integral aspect of practical reason. *Thomas Aquinas first revised *Jerome's influential concept of synteresis (a linguistic corruption of syneidesis) to interpret it as an error-free, innate, human habit which contains the basic principles of natural law, and then defined conscience (conscientia) as an act (not a faculty) in which these principles are discursively applied to specific situations. As M. G. Baylor says, 'Conscience, for [Aquinas], was pre-eminently a part of the operations of the practical intellect as it reasoned to a decision about what should be done in concrete situations that confront the individual' (Action and Person, p. 42). Since, for Aquinas, the conscience can err, subsequent prospective accounts have tended towards a pastoral concern for correcting the conscience so that it gets the application right. This is often, though not necessarily, to the exclusion of conscience's retrospective function and, indeed, any essential reference to God.

Retrospective: Accounts which argue for an exclusively retrospective function have traditionally responded to this tendency by repositioning conscience within an explicitly soteriological framework. The Fathers characteristically failed to connect conscience to the *cross, while the scholastic treatments were aiming at an account of created human anthropology. But *Luther, the leading proponent of a return to a retrospective conscience, explained conscience as basic to a person's encounter with God in *judgment. On the one hand, conscience is how a person experiences the coincidence of his own painful awareness of sin and the terrifying condemnation of God. This experience is available to believer and unbeliever alike. On the other hand, by faith in God's grace, conscience is how a believer experiences the justificatory declaration of God's righteousness. On this account, which many believe reflects New Testament usage (cf. C. A. Pierce, Conscience in the New Testament), a Christian conscience, following *justification by faith, is characterized by assurance of peace with God. A logical corollary is that conscience becomes secondary to faith not only in soteriology, but also in *moral theology. For conscience under the influence of faith does not operate primarily as a judge of particular acts, but rather focuses on God's judgment on the whole person: simul iustus et peccator. Thus retrospective accounts have argued that conscience is a power of the soul rather than a habit of natural moral knowledge which instructs action. Synteresis slips out of sight to be replaced by *faith as the spring of ethical life.

Theological and psychological accounts

The second distinction pertains to conscience as theological and eschatological on the one hand, and psychological and sociological on the other. Historically, this distinction can be traced through the Renaissance, Freud, *Nietzsche and *Barth among others. Conceptually, this distinction focuses on whether conscience can be separated from the gracious presence of God. In the aftermath of the Reformation, some Renaissance thinkers' description of conscience as a form of 'God's providential government', separable from God's gracious activity, led to its development into an unforgiving demand for personal self-authenticity (O. O'Donovan, The Ways of Judgment, p. 307). This approach is congruent with, though not necessarily responsible for, modern accounts of the liberty of conscience which have found favour with contemporary Roman Catholic scholars. However, the decisive conceptual break was made by Freud and Nietzsche, who sought to explain conscience as a pathology which simply reflected back parental or societal norms rather than as something essentially theological. This psychological account, supported by modern sociological trends and the now largely discredited behaviourist school, has been accused of committing the genetic fallacy of mistaking mechanistic origin for total explanation. There remains too the question of whether accounts of conscience should start from the agent or from the moral field within which the agent operates, the latter lending itself more to theological interpretations.

A more radical analysis emerges from Christian *eschatology and, specifically, pneumatology. Karl Barth argued that conscience is present only in Christians and is judicial not executive. He proposed that conscience is the voice of God and the voice of the eschatological 'I' prayerfully united in the *Holy Spirit as a judgment from the future upon the present self.

However, these eschatological judgments are largely incommunicable to others because of fallen, human epistemology and so cannot be saved up as a store of moral knowledge. This eschatological reassertion of the traditional Reformation emphasis on soteriology, although involving the loss of a natural conscience, has refocused discussion of conscience today in Protestant theology. The early twentieth-century Roman Catholic emphasis on autonomy, critiqued by Barth, has been overtaken by sophisticated accounts such as that presented in the papal encyclical, Veritatis Splendor.

Bibliography

K. Barth, Ethics (ET, Edinburgh, 1981); M. G. Baylor, Action and Person: Conscience in Late Scholasticism and the Young Luther (Leiden, 1977); John Paul II, Veritatis Splendor (ET, London, 1993); O. O'Donovan, The Ways of Judgment (Grand Rapids, 2005); C. A. Pierce, Conscience in the New Testament (London, 1955); Thomas Aquinas, Summa Theologiae 1a2ae q.18–19; Vatican II, Dignitatis Humanae in A. Flannery (ed.), Vatican Council II: The Conciliar and Post Conciliar Documents (Dublin and Clonskeagh, 1975); J. Webster, 'Conscience', in J. Y. Lacoste (ed.), Encyclopaedia of Christian Theology (London and New York, 2005).

J. W. S. HORDERN

CONSERVATIVE THEOLOGY

The correlative terms 'liberal' and 'conservative' were coined in the early nineteenth century to express opposing political traditions and later transferred into Christian theology. The tradition of 'liberal' theology from F. D. E. *Schleiermacher to Paul *Tillich attempted to commend Christian faith to the sceptics of 'modern' *Enlightenment thought, but conservative theologians took the view that in the attempt, the liberal tradition was conceding too much to '*modernity'. Rather than visualizing two completely separate and opposed traditions, however, it is better to recognize a spectrum of theological views from liberal to conservative. Different kinds of conservative theology also need to be recognized, depending on which particular Christian tradition is being 'conserved'.

The nineteenth-century Roman Catholic Church was opposed to both political and theological liberalism, and their conservatism was formulated in the First *Vatican Council (1869–70) which promulgated the doctrine of papal infallibility. This strong conservatism led to the condemnation of Catholic 'modernism' early in the twentieth century, and was dominant in Rome until the Second Vatican Council (1962–5). In the Church of England, the Tractarian movement of the 1830s initiated a conservative *Anglo-Catholic tradition which tried to deny that the Church of England was Protestant and attempted to revive the liturgy and practices of the medieval period. In Protestant Germany, 'conservative' theology, represented by figures such as Adolf *Schlatter, was overshadowed by the major figures of Liberalism in the Ritschlian school (see *Ritschl, Albrecht). But after the First World War there was a more conservative reaction led by Karl *Barth and Emil *Brunner, which saw itself as reviving the emphases of the Reformation and embraced 'conservative' doctrines such as *Chalcedonian *Christology, the *Trinity and substitutionary *atonement.

In the English-speaking world meantime, the growing strength of *evangelical Christianity in the nineteenth century had to meet questions raised by Darwinian science, and the introduction of the historical-critical approach to the Bible. A strongly conservative Calvinist theology (see *Reformed theology), emphasizing the authority of Scripture, was maintained particularly in America by the 'Old *Princeton' school (whose heirs were later to dismiss Barth and Brunner as 'modernists'), and their belief in biblical inerrancy (see *Infallibility and inerrancy of the Bible) was one of the ingredients in the emergence of popular '*fundamentalism'. Many fundamentalists also embraced premillennialism (see *Millennium) or *dispensationalism and regarded Darwinian evolution as contrary to belief in creation.

The end of the twentieth century saw the decline of liberal theology, the rise of 'post-liberalism' in North America, and a widespread revival of 'conservative' doctrines of Christology and the Trinity across the church at large. A revived evangelicalism, fed by an increasingly vibrant tradition of conservative biblical scholarship, distanced itself from fundamentalism, but remained doctrinally conservative and grew in influence in Protestant Europe and North America as more liberal churches declined. Churches originally founded by conservative evangelical missionaries in Africa, Asia and South America grew even more. In North America (but not elsewhere) conservative theology is often linked with political and social 'conservatism'.

See also: LIBERALISM AND CONSERVATISM IN THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

D. W. Bebbington, Evangelicalism in Modern Britain: A History from the 1730s to the 1980s (London, 1989); A. I. C. Heron, A Century of Protestant Theology (London, 1980); G. M. Marsden, Understanding Fundamentalism and Evangelicalism (Grand Rapids, 1991); P. Toon, Protestants and Catholics (Ann Arbor, 1984).

T. A. NOBLE

CONSTANTINE (c. 272–337)

Constantine the Great reigned as Roman Emperor between 306 and 337. It is hard to overstate his impact on the history of the Christian church and on the development of Christian thought. He was the first Roman emperor to declare himself a Christian when, at the Milvian Bridge in Rome in 312, he saw a vision calling him to conquer in Christ and replaced the pagan insignia of his army with the cross. His Edict of Milan in 313 announced religious toleration for Christians and brought an end to a severe period of persecution of the church. He convened synods and *councils to resolve doctrinal disputes and encourage unity among Christians, notably in Arles (314) and *Nicaea (325). Under his reign, the church was given the opportunity to engage with the politics of the Roman Empire for the first time and had quickly to come to terms with its new imperial role.

While there is no doubt about the significance of Constantine for the church, there has been controversy about the genuineness of his faith and how to evaluate his impact. The first Christians beneficiaries of the change in the church's fortunes were enthusiastic about the virtues of their emperor. In his Oration in Praise of Constantine (335), Eusebius of Caesarea (c. 260–c. 340) called Constantine the paradigm of true religion, ordained by God to show the proof of the conquest of Christ through the rise of the Roman Empire. Christians of later times and different political contexts sometimes saw things differently, however: an Anabaptist tract published around 1530 is representative in dating the 'fall of the church' to its involvement with temporal power and the sword following Constantine's conversion (W. R. Estep, The Anabaptist Story, Grand Rapids and Cambridge, 31996). John *Wesley thought that the golden age of the church had been corrupted by riches, honours and power given to its ministers under Constantine and wrote that with Constantine 'not the golden but the iron age of the church commenced' (T. Jackson [ed.], The Works of John Wesley, Grand Rapids, 1978, vol. 6, pp. 261–262).

More recently, Stanley *Hauerwas has repeated the Anabaptist critique that the church was wrong to use the power of this world for the sake of the kingdom, but Oliver O'Donovan has argued in response that contemporary Christians saw Constantine's conversion as a sign that the powers had become subject to the rule of Christ in accordance with biblical prophecy. Jacob Burckhardt suggested in 1853 that Constantine took up Christianity driven merely by ambition and lust for power, but most have doubted the validity of this judgment.

See also: CHRISTENDOM; STATE.

Bibliography

T. D. Barnes, Constantine and Eusebius (Cambridge, 1981); N. H. Baynes, Constantine the Great and the Christian Church (London, 21972); J. Burckhardt, The Age of Constantine the Great (ET, London, 1949); H. A. Drake, In Praise of Constantine: A Historical Study and New Translation of Eusebius' Tricennial Orations (Berkeley, 1976); idem, 'Constantine and Consensus', Church History 64, 1995, pp. 1–15; S. Hauerwas, After Christendom (Nashville, 1991); A. Kee, Constantine Versus Christ: The Triumph of Ideology (London, 1982); O. O'Donovan, The Desire of the Nations: Rediscovering the Roots of Political Theology (Cambridge, 1996).

D. L. CLOUGH

CONSTANTINOPLE, COUNCIL OF

The First Council of Constantinople met in 381 and, although it only included 150 bishops from the Eastern Roman Empire, is regarded as the second ecumenical council, the first being the Council of *Nicaea of 325. It was called by the newly appointed emperor, Theodosius, and ended the *Arian controversy (at least within the empire). It rejected the various alternatives and re-affirmed the doctrine of the Nicene Creed of 325 that the Son was homoousios with the Father. This word, meaning 'of the same being' (sometimes translated 'consubstantial') had been rejected not only by Arians, but by many who are misleadingly called 'Semi-Arians'. The council acknowledged the deity of the Son and by 381 they had been convinced that the affirmation of this term was the only way to rule out Arianism.

The documents of the council have not survived, but it is regarded as certain that the Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed, documented seventy years later at the Council of *Chalcedon (451), must have been approved in 381. It is different in detail from the original Nicene *Creed of 325, but is recited today as 'the Nicene Creed'. In the third article the council gave a much fuller doctrine of the *Holy Spirit, thus excluding from the church the 'Macedonians', who accepted the deity of the Son, but not of the Spirit.

The council was not however entirely harmonious. After the death of its first chairman, Meletius of Antioch, *Gregory of Nazianzus, now recognized as archbishop of Constantinople, took the chair. But he was evidently unhappy that the deity of the Spirit was only strongly implied by saying that the Spirit 'proceeds from the Father' and was to be 'worshipped and glorified'. This followed the preference of his late friend Basil, whose brother, Gregory of Nyssa, was a member of the council. Gregory of Nazianzus would have preferred an explicit statement that the Spirit was God, homoousios with the Father and the Son. He had also been displeased that the strict Nicene Paulinus had not been recognized as bishop of Antioch in place of his late rival, Meletius. When a party of Egyptian bishops arrived, led by Timothy, the new archbishop of Alexandria, and objected to Gregory's recognition as archbishop of Constantinople (since he had already been de jure bishop of Sasima and de facto bishop of Nazianzus), Gregory resigned in disgust. The council elected a layman, Nectarius, as archbishop and third chairman of the council.

See also: COUNCILS; TRINITY.

Bibliography

G. L. Bray, Creeeds, Councils and Christ (Leicester, 1984); R. P. C. Hanson, The Search for the Christian Doctrine of God (Edinburgh, 1988); J. N. D. Kelly, Early Christian Creeds (London, 1972); idem, Early Christian Doctrines (London, 1978); A. M. Ritter, Das Konzil von Konstantinopel und sein Symbol (Göttingen, 1965).

T. A. NOBLE

CONSUMERISM

Consumerism is a possibility where a significant proportion of a human population has surplus wealth after providing for their basic needs. Once needs are met, further spending must be on goods that are chosen because they are desired rather than needed, and manufacturers of unnecessary goods seek to stimulate these desires and encourage this spending. Consumerism characterizes a society where the consumption of luxury goods has become a significant aspect of personal and social identity and members of society are predominantly understood as consumers of goods and services. Scholars differ on when consumerism originated, but there is strong evidence of a significant increase in consumer goods in late seventeenth- and eighteenth-century England. One of the features of a consumerist society is that the motif of consumption tends to expand well beyond products on sale: citizens become consumers of education, politics and even interpersonal relationships. Interaction with others in these spheres is then reduced to whether consumers are getting 'value' for the 'price' they are paying. Another is that the satisfaction promised after consumption turns out to be illusory because the desires promoted must be insatiable in order to sustain the markets that depend upon them.

Different theories have been offered to explain how choices are made in such a consumerist context. Thorstein Veblen sought to understand economic activity through neo-Darwinian natural selection and saw consumption as a competitive behaviour, aimed at impressing others and gaining social status. Here, the motivation to buy an expensive car is to be seen as someone wealthy enough to be able to afford it. This fails to account for consumption that is not apparent to others, however, as well as being inattentive to complexities such as disagreements about how status should be assigned to goods. Peter Sedgwick argues that theologians have depended too heavily on Veblen to understand consumerism, and draws on the work of Jürgen Habermas to argue that consumerism is a quest for personal identity in a *postmodern context where the institutions that used to provide identity no longer command allegiance. He argues that instead of condemning consumer culture, Christians should attempt to pose a creative alternative to consumerism. Others such as Timothy Gorringer and Sallie McFague call for resistance to consumerism rather than engagement with it, so that consumption of goods is related to human need instead of manufactured desire.

See also: POVERTY AND WEALTH.

Bibliography

C. Bartholemew and T. Moritz (eds.), Christ and Consumerism (Carlisle, 2000); Z. Bauman, Work, Consumerism and the New Poor (Milton Keynes, 1998); T. Gorringer, Fair Shares: Ethics and the Global Economy (New York, 1999); J. Habermas, Legitimation Crisis (Boston, 1975); S. McFague, Life Abundant: Rethinking Theology and Economy for a Planet in Peril (Minneapolis, 2001); N. McKendrick, J. Brewer and J. H. Plumb (eds.), The Birth of a Consumer Society (Bloomington, 1982); W. Schweiker and C. Mathewes (eds.), Having: Property and Possession in Religious and Social Life (Grand Rapids and Cambridge, 2004); P. Sedgwick, The Market Economy and Christian Ethics (Cambridge, 1999); D. Slater, Consumer Culture and Modernity (Cambridge, 2007); R. Tawney, The Acquisitive Society (New York, 1920); T. Veblen, The Theory of the Leisure Class: An Economic Study of Institutions (London, 1925).

D. L. CLOUGH

CONTARINI, GASPARO (1483–1542)

Born into a Venetian aristocratic family, Contarini was influenced in his youth by the civic *humanism widespread in Italy, and even as a lay person combined a passion to reform the pastoral and educational work of the church with a personal study of Scripture and particularly the Pauline letters. His understanding of *justification by faith, which he shared with a fascinating circle of friends, lay and clerical, men and women, led him to be critical of meritorious good works. As a Venetian diplomat, he became aware of the strength of reforming movements in Germany, and urged the reform of the *papacy, especially its civil service, or Curia. Pope Paul III appointed him a cardinal in 1535, and he headed a reforming group which sought to regain unity of the church by dialogue with moderate Lutherans. In 1541 the emperor, Charles V, briefly favoured such attempts at reconciliation at Regensburg, and Contarini as papal representative encouraged an agreement with the Lutherans on justification; discussion broke down, however, on the sacraments and church authority. Contarini died in 1542, and the Council of *Trent effectively ended such mediatory attempts.

Bibliography

E. G. Gleason, Gasparo Contarini: Venice, Rome and Reform (Berkeley and Los Angeles, 1993); P. C. Matheson, Cardinal Contarini at Regensburg (Oxford, 1972).

P. C. MATHESON

CONTEMPORARY THEOLOGICAL TRENDS

Contemporary theology is characterized by such greatly divergent methods and proposals that any neat map of the territory is exceedingly difficult to draw. Partly this is because some dominating models of an earlier generation have substantially been replaced (*Bultmann) while others have receded (*Tillich), but still others have been revived (*Barth); partly this is because much modern theology is pluralist, spanning different confessional and sometimes religious traditions; and partly this is because theology's conversation partners are no longer simply history, ethics and philosophy, but also, for example, social theories and the natural sciences.

Questions of *method remain at the forefront, with heightened interest in issues of pluralism. Despite some revisionist versions of *liberalism (D. Tracy), approaches labelled '*post-liberal' often hold the momentum. Traditional areas of prolegomena, such as the relation of *faith and reason or the scope of *natural theology, remain under discussion, along with efforts to appropriate *hermeneutical thinkers such as H. G. Gadamer and

P. Ricœur, and topics such as the role of the imagination or non-literal language. However, 'non-' or 'post-foundationalist' approaches desire to dominate, building on S. Hauerwas's emphasis on the specific virtues of Christian communities, H. Frei's recovery of biblical narrative, and G. Lindbeck's 'cultural-linguistic' definition of doctrine as the second-order regulative grammar for first-order religious speech such as prayer. The nature of 'narrative theology' remains unclear and the scope of postliberalism broad, but the Anglo-American world now sees renewed interest in Barth and in serious dogmatic theology without apologetic nervousness. Recent interest in the Roman Catholic Hans Urs von Balthasar has turned some attention to theological aesthetics (as also in the Eastern Orthodox theologian D. B. Hart), with drama as a motif for connecting interest in narrative more clearly to the real world and to redemptive history (K. Vanhoozer). Hermeneutical attention has galvanized a movement known as 'theological interpretation of Scripture' with contributions from biblical scholars in critical dialogue with B. Childs's 'canonical' approach (F. Watson, S. Fowl), as well as from theologians interested in pre-critical exegesis (D. Yeago).

Besides increasing the prominence of ecclesiology (see Church), such trends regarding method have accompanied sophisticated recoveries of classic theological figures. Historians are demonstrating that the Church Fathers (see Patristic theology) were not simply in thrall to 'substance metaphysics' or Greek philosophy in general, as the older history of dogma or doctrinal criticism suggested. Rather, classical theists used the language of Hellenism to resist its adoption at points that threatened the biblical gospel, as in the case of Arianism. Explorations of Augustine and Eastern Fathers recognize many more points in common than previously thought (L. Ayres, M. R. Barnes), and recoveries of Thomas Aquinas demonstrate him to be a scriptural, not just philosophical, theologian (M. Levering, J-P. Torrell). A contemporary movement that has expressed considerable devotion to medieval Catholic theologians (and Platonism) is the 'radical orthodoxy' pioneered by J. Milbank. However, the overall shape of its narrative – after certain glories of Christendom, a downward spiral from nominalism to the absolutism of the modern secular state – has been questioned, along with some subplots.

Radical orthodoxy has highlighted the secularism of social theory along with other academic and cultural practices. Thus theology and social science have increased interaction, but with more variety and tension. 'Political' or 'liberation' theologians have called into question characteristic assumptions about the primacy of theory and highlighted political identification with the poor and oppressed as a prime datum for theology. While it originated in the Majority World, notably Latin America (G. Gutiérrez), the theology of liberation now permeates Western agendas also, through, for example, black (J. Cone) or feminist (R. R. Ruether, M. M. Fulkerson) theologies which seek to counter the ideological effects of much traditional reflection. Theologians outside these categories now turn more attention to issues of justice and globalization, and hence (slowly) to non-Western theologies themselves. At the same time, the vitality of liberationist movements per se may have weakened, partly due to the responses of ecclesiastical and academic structures. Sophisticated engagement with political questions has also come from more traditional quarters (O. O'Donovan; J. H. Yoder).

Recovery of 'Christian self-description' (in H. Frei's terms) brings the reminder that theology should concern God, not just socio-political concerns or religious experience or talk about God. Influenced by Barth and K. Rahner, along with more recently a host of others, trinitarian theology is a contemporary focus. Here some Asian theologians and L. Boff have made oft-cited contributions. The Orthodox theologian J. Zizioulas has led many to appropriate the Cappadocian Fathers in a way that defines personhood as constituted by relationship. Strong analogies are then drawn between the divine being as a communion of three co-equal persons through perichoresis, and human personhood as fundamentally social, oriented democratically to egalitarian relations. Such 'social' forms of trinitarianism have become popular in postmodern contexts, even among fairly traditional theologians (C. Gunton) who criticize Western luminaries such as Augustine, Thomas, and Barth for over-emphasizing divine unity. Likewise, postmodern contexts have elicited further focus on the suffering of God in Jesus Christ, as emphasis on Luther's 'theology of the cross' has been recovered notably since J. Moltmann. Forms of 'open' or 'freewill' or 'relational' theism, making use of this theme, have stirred controversy among evangelicals in particular, with the claim that divine foreknowledge must be limited by the decision to engage human creatures in meaningful relationship. More broadly, while *process theology per se may have waned somewhat, forms of *panentheism abound.

Among reasons for thus conceiving God's being as embracing the world's becoming, perhaps on the analogy of the world as God's body, are not only attention to evil but also philosophy of science (P. Clayton). Yet defences of traditional approaches to the freedom of the Trinity (P. Molnar) and attributes such as divine immutability or impassibility (T. Weinandy) have been forthcoming as well, in addition to defences of the classical heritage against the *Hellenization thesis. Nevertheless, in the wake of terrorism, tsunamis and hurricanes, theologians must query how God relates to *suffering. Moreover, the possibilities and need for a post-supersessionist Christian theology must be on the agenda in the wake of the *Holocaust (R. K. Soulen, B. Marshall), along with the shape of inter-religious dialogue (G. d'Costa), especially among monotheistic 'peoples of the book' (the Society of Scriptural Reasoning) (see *Christianity and other religions).

Apart from the internal concerns and ongoing conversations of specific ecclesiastical communions, soteriology (see *Salvation) joins theology proper as a crucial area of doctrinal controversy. The *Lutheran-Roman Catholic Joint Declaration on the Doctrine of Justification issued from substantial biblical, historical and dogmatic groundwork, and resulted in ongoing disputation. Meanwhile, Evangelicals and Catholics Together also produced 'The Gift of Salvation' which brought fresh attention to the doctrine of *justification by faith. Subsequently, the nature of *atonement has been a matter of both heat and light. Historical objections to the dominance of penal *substitution theories, favouring a Christus Victor model, have been joined to biblical and moral objections concerning the nature of metaphor, the appearance of divine child abuse, and so forth. Postmodern interests, such as the scapegoat theory of the French thinker R. Girard, have also come to the fore, with penal substitution theorists seeking new construals in response. Apart from postmodern theorizing about the self, practical concerns such as bioethics, *sexuality and *gender have tended to dominate theological *anthropology, while popular aberrations have driven most theologians away from the *eschatological field since Moltmann and W. *Pannenberg. Constructive contributions to *Christology, despite the ferment in biblical studies regarding the *historical Jesus, have been modest, although non-Western theologies highlight the need for, and possibilities of, attention to Christ's humanity (D. Stinton). Also modest until very recently have been efforts toward a full-scale dogmatics, with exceptions such as Pannenberg and D. Bloesch. But now the feminist and traditionally trinitarian projects of S. Coakley and K. Sonderegger are harbingers of several fresh efforts.

Controversies of various kinds have left institutional *ecumenism in a somewhat stagnant condition. Nevertheless, there are contemporary examples of 'ecumenism of the trenches': besides Evangelicals and Catholics Together, there is 'In One Body through the Cross' (the Princeton Proposal for Christian Unity). Such a movement coalesces around 'Nicene Christianity' or the 'evangelical catholic' theology associated with C. Braaten and R. Jenson. Ecclesiology is also shaped by attention to the church's missional character. *Mission is not just one thing the church does, but what the church is throughout – sent by the triune God, participating in the dynamic of the Son and Spirit being sent. Thus the church's mission must be holistic, for it participates in the very missio Dei (D. Bosch), and always cross-cultural, for it embodies the gospel in every local culture (L. *Newbigin). Embodiment entails attention to sacramental theology and practice, perhaps even to the church having a sacramental character.

On the whole, while there is much faddishness, the best recent theology is increasingly sophisticated methodologically and seriously engaged with the classical texts of the Christian tradition – so much so that many now speak of 'retrieval' as a theological mode. While remaining an exercise in critical reflection, much contemporary theology now pays attention to scriptural, ecclesiastical and creedal authorities. Accordingly, as evidenced in recent years by theologians having significant ecclesiastical roles (R. *Williams as Archbishop of Canterbury; Joseph Cardinal *Ratzinger as Pope Benedict XVI), theology is more pre-occupied with constructive responsibilities.

See also: ASIAN THEOLOGY; EVANGELICAL THEOLOGY; ROMAN CATHOLIC THEOLOGY; EASTERN ORTHODOX THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

W. D. Buschart and K. D. Eilers, Theology as Retrieval: Receiving the Past, Renewing the Church (Downers Grove, 2015); D. Ford with R. Muers (eds.), The Modern Theologians (Oxford, 2004); P. Hodgson and R. King (eds.), Christian Theology (Minneapolis, 1994); H. Schwarz, Theology in a Global Context (Grand Rapids and Cambridge, 2005); C. Seitz (ed.), Nicene Christianity (Grand Rapids, 2001); K. Vanhoozer (ed.), The Cambridge Companion to Postmodern Theology (Cambridge, 2003); J. Webster and G. Schner (eds.), Theology after Liberalism (Oxford, 2000); D. Yeago, 'The New Testament and the Nicene Dogma', Pro Ecclesia 3, 1994, pp. 152–164. Among new journals, Modern Theology, the International Journal of Systematic Theology and Pro Ecclesia represent some trends described here.

D. J. TREIER AND J. B. WEBSTER

CONTEXTUAL THEOLOGIES

Background

'Contextual theologies' connote the range of theologies which have arisen as a result of a growing sensitivity toward the role of context and experience in the doing of theology. Although a number of terms have been used to refer to such theologies, including 'indigenous theologies', 'local theologies', 'ethnotheologies', and reference to the process of 'inculturation', 'contextual theologies' arguably is the most utilized.

The term 'contextualization' first originated in the 1972 Ministry and Context report by the WCC and responds to concerns raised by contemporary theologians and global ecumenical movements that theology must be rooted in the historical, material realities of particular communities. Key factors influencing this shift towards context include first, the turn toward the human subject or the '*anthropological turn'. This highlighted that knowledge could not be separated from the knowing subject and thus called for a shift away from classical theological deductive approaches (where knowledge was perceived as filtering 'from above'; i.e. from 'received' sources) to more inductive approaches ('from below') which recognized the human subject as the starting point of theological investigation.

Second, the expansion of the Western missionary movement in the nineteenth century gave rise to questions surrounding the role of culture in mission and consequently to the term 'indigenization', a term which tended to reflect a colonial view of mission as the transportation of a fixed, unchanging gospel into the fixed and static setting of non-Christian communities. However, as the movement developed, there became a growing sense of dissatisfaction amongst many Christian communities, particularly in parts of Africa and Asia, with the theology inherited from the colonizing West, thus leading to a subsequent growth in Majority World theologies (see *African Christian theology; *Asian Christian theology). Third was the arrival of *liberation theology at the Latin American Episcopal Conference (CELAM) in Medellín in 1968. Although not the first example of contextual theology, this increased the church's awareness of the importance of context, through its insistence that theology be rooted in the material and historical circumstances of the poor in Latin America.

Radical contextual theologies

More radical approaches to contextualization tend to articulate present experience and therefore 'context' as the starting point of theological method. Theology, it is maintained, is always done from particular locations. Rosemary Radford *Ruether, a prominent American feminist theologian, thus argues that all theology is grounded in experience. What have been seen as the universal and objective sources of theology – Scripture and tradition – are nothing more than codified collective human experience, and more importantly, male experience (R. R. Ruether, Sexism and God-Talk, p. 12). Hence, rather than seeing theology as the 'deposit of faith', received through *Scripture and tradition, contextual theologies such as *black theologies, *womanist theologies, *feminist theologies, Filipino theologies, Asian theologies, African theologies, and so on, tend to look with suspicion on such a perspective, noting how it often serves to reinforce white, Western, affluent, male experience as both normative and universal. In this sense, radical contextual theologies seek to expose the particularized nature of all theology by giving voice to those who have previously been excluded from theological conversation.

Here, Scripture and tradition are not considered to perform the function of redeeming culture and context from a 'sinful' condition. Instead, context is seen as a source of divine revelation and a lens through which Scripture and tradition should be read and a criterion against which they should be judged. Hence, Jacquelyn Grant, a contemporary womanist theologian, asserts that '[T]o do Womanist Theology, . . . we must read and hear the Bible and engage it within the content of our own experience. This is the only way that it can make sense to people who are oppressed' (in Feminism and Theology, p. 303). It is only by placing the text in conversation with present experience that it can assist in particularized struggles towards a better world.

Conservative contextual theologies

Many evangelicals have been concerned to uphold the primacy of *Scripture and to avoid *syncretism (the collapse of theology into culture). Integral to this has been a desire to maintain belief in an 'authentic' trans-cultural Christian message. David Wells thus argues that the task of theology is to de-contextualize Scripture by discovering what God has said and then re-contextualizing this so that it coheres with the cognitive assumptions and social patterns of our age (The Use of the Bible in Theology, pp. 175–176).

Others, however, have noted problems with this. Harvie Conn, for instance, maintains that it is problematic to insist that the 'husk' of culture can be stripped away to reveal the 'kernel' of the Christian faith, preferring to talk about a gospel 'centre' as opposed to a gospel 'core'. For him, the redemptive activity of God through Jesus Christ constitutes the 'centre' of the gospel, since this remains the same despite the particular context of the culture within which it is communicated. The role of the Bible, however, is to instruct and transform contemporary culture. Although there is continuity between biblical writers and people today (since both share in the same redemption history), the former must always address the latter because their testimony is 'God-breathed and inerrant', whereas ours is always 'tentative and in need of correction' (Eternal Word and Changing Worlds, p. 227).

Other evangelicals, however, afford culture a more formative place within theological method. Stanley Grenz insists that neither the gospel nor culture constitute pre-existing, fixed realities since both inform one another. Culture can help us interpret the Bible because the same Spirit speaks through both. Indeed, Grenz argues that since the Spirit's speaking always meets its hearers within specific historical-cultural settings, the Spirit cannot speak through the Bible except without speaking through culture. The Spirit communicates what is the 'word of God' for particular communities, hence there can be no foundational reading of the Bible. This arguably provides a more nuanced contribution to evangelical debate on the grounds that it avoids talk about the 'essence' of Christianity and recognizes that there can be no theology without context.

See also: CONTEXTUALIZATION; CULTURAL THEORY AND THEOLOGY; CULTURE.

Bibliography

S. B. Bevans, Models of Contextual Theology (Maryknoll, rev. edn 2002); H. M. Conn, Eternal Word and Changing Worlds: Theology, Anthropology and Mission in Dialogue (Phillipsburg, 1984); D. L. Gelpi, The Turn to Experience in Contemporary Theology (New York, 1994); J. Grant, 'The Challenge of the Darker Sister', in J. M. Soskice and D. Lipton (eds.), Feminism and Theology (Oxford, 2003), pp. 302–311; S. J. Grenz, 'Articulating the Christian Belief-Mosaic: Theological Method after the Demise of Foundationalism', in J. G. Stackhouse (ed.), Evangelical Futures: A Conversation on Theological Method (Grand Rapids and Leicester, 2001), pp. 107–136; S. J. Grenz and J. R. Franke, Beyond Foundationalism: Shaping Theology in a Postmodern Context (Louisville and London, 2001); R. R. Ruether, Sexism and God-Talk: Towards a Feminist Theology (London, 1983); R. J. Schreiter, Constructing Local Theologies (Maryknoll, 1994); M. Stackhouse, Apologia: Contextualization, Globalization, and Mission in Theological Education (Grand Rapids, 1988); C. F. Starkloff, 'The Problem of Syncretism in the Search for Inculturation', Mission n.s. 1.1, 1984, pp. 75–94; D. F. Wells, 'The Nature and Function of Theology', in R. K. Johnston (ed.), The Use of the Bible in Theology: Evangelical Options (Atlanta, 1985), pp. 175–199.

H. J. BACON

CONTEXTUALIZATION

Contextualization is a dynamic process of the church's reflection, in obedience to Christ and his mission in the world, on the interaction of the text as the word of God and the context as a specific human situation. It is essentially a *missiological concept. The interpreter or one engaged in this process may be part of the context or, as a cross-cultural communicator, represent a second context in a three-way process.

Contextualization is not a passing fad or a debatable option. It is essential to our understanding of God's self-revelation. The *incarnation is the ultimate *paradigm of the translation of text into context. Jesus Christ, the Word of God incarnate as a Jew, identified with a particular culture at a limited moment in history though transcending it. In his life and teaching he is the supreme *model of contextualization. His every command was de facto a command to contextualization, whether to love one's neighbour or to disciple the nations. The implication of this process is seen in the apostolic witness and the life of the NT church. The difference in theological emphasis and preaching method between Paul's address to the synagogue in Pisidian Antioch (Acts 13:16–41) and his address to the Areopagus in Athens (Acts 17:22–31) is but one notable illustration of the sociological and theological inevitability of contextualization. In the history of dogma the affirmations of the truths of God's revelation in Scripture have always involved a selection of themes and contextualized language in response to the particular theological and ethical issues confronting the church in that moment of history. The *creeds, *confessions and statements of faith reflect this process.

With the rapid expansion of the Western missionary movement in the nineteenth century, missionary strategists Henry Venn (1725–97), Rufus Anderson (1796–1880) and others developed the concept of indigenization, whereby the unchanging gospel was transplanted into the static and generally 'primitive' cultures of non-Christian peoples. This movement was primarily concerned with indigenizing the forms of worship, social customs, church architecture and methods of evangelism. It led in the twentieth century to a new appreciation of the importance of cultural anthropology for the preparation of missionaries and for the study of missions. The failure to indigenize resulted in the perpetuation of colonialism and the growth of a ghetto mentality among Christian communities. But the adequacy of the indigenization principle was seriously questioned. After the Second World War, the rise of nationalism, the decline of Western colonialism, and the spread of political revolution leading to military dictatorship or socialist and Marxist governments engulfed an increasing number of nations. The explosion of human knowledge, science and technology, and the spirit of materialism and secular humanism which permeated all modern societies resulted in a crisis of faith and a search beyond indigenous identity for truth and relevance.

The need to move from indigenization to contextualization was also accelerated by issues raised by modern theologians and the global ministry of conciliar *ecumenical movements. These issues include: the situational *hermeneutics of R. *Bultmann; the call to the church in the midst of rapid social change to be action-orientated, made for example at the World Conference on Church and Society at Geneva (1966); the questioning of the distinction between *salvation-history and world history at the WCC Assembly at Uppsala (1968); the acceptance of the principle of humanization and *universalism in salvation at the WCC Commission on World Mission and Evangelism at Bangkok (1972); and the search for the unity of mankind at the WCC Assembly at Nairobi (1975). The focusing on issues of social reconciliation, humanization and liberation led to a shift of priority from interpreting the text to reflection on suffering and oppression in particular contexts. Contextualization has become a way of doing politicized theology (see *Political theology).

The origin of the term 'contextualization' is credited to Shoki Coe and Aharon Sapsejian, directors of the Theological Education Fund of the WCC in their 1972 report, Ministry and Context. They suggested that the term 'contextualization' implies all that is involved in the term 'indigenization', but goes beyond it to take account of 'the process of secularity, technology and the struggle for human justice which characterised the historical moment of nations in the third world'.

Radical interpretations

Modern scholars, and *liberation theologians in particular, have made extensive use of the concept of contextualization as part of a wider theological debate. They begin by rejecting the traditional view of divine revelation as inscripturated in the Bible, since the word of God cannot be equated with any particular form, whether Scripture or theological systems. They deny that the Bible contains propositional truths and argue that since all Scripture is culturally and historically conditioned, its message is relative and situational. Further, they hold that there is no truth outside of the action of concrete historical events of human struggle. There can be no epistemological split between thought and action, truth and practice. Thus all authentic theology must be participatory theology. Theological knowledge comes only from participation in action and reflection on *praxis. As a result radical theologians hold that the hermeneutical process does not begin with the exegesis of Scripture, but with a prophetic 'reading of the times', discerning God's act of humanization and liberation in the general historical process and in particular situations. Gustavo *Gutiérrez argued that theology is reflection on praxis in the light of faith. It is a dialectical movement between action and reflection. The hermeneutics of Scripture give place to the hermeneutics of history. Evangelical Latin American theologians René Padilla, Emilio Antonio Núñez and others, while recognizing the validity of the deep concerns raised by liberation theologians, argued that this way of doing theology leads to a truncated gospel, a secularized political theology and ultimately to the demise of the institutionalized church and of the centrality of evangelism.

Conservative interpretations

Evangelical scholars, missionaries, church and lay leaders have taken seriously the validity of the shift from indigenization to the enlarged agenda of contextualization. A beginning was made at the *Lausanne Congress on World Evangelization (1974) and followed up at the Gospel and Culture consultation in Bermuda (1978). Nevertheless, for many evangelicals the task of contextualization is restricted to the faithful and relevant communication of the unchanging message into the language and cultural thought forms of those to whom it is communicated. This concern takes seriously the issues of the cultural conditioning of the biblical message, the communicator's self-understanding and the receiving community's response to the message. In this way, contextualization is understood in terms of 'dynamic equivalence', whereby the biblical message is seen to bring forth in the receiver a response equivalent to that which the biblical text produced in those to whom it was first addressed.

However, the task of contextualization calls for a more profound understanding of translating the gospel in its relationship to the contemporary historical situation. The time-honoured grammatico-historical method of biblical exegesis continues to be accepted as fundamental to authentic contextualization, giving clarity and understanding as to what the biblical writers said and meant in their own context. However, contextualization takes place only when the faithful exegesis of the text enters into a dialogical encounter with the issues of the human situation. This encounter will be both theological and ethical, in which belief and action are interdependent. It takes place in dependence on the Holy Spirit who is the hermeneutic key to relating text and context.

The interpreter's critical reflection on his or her own cultural pre-understanding is an essential part of this three-way process. While drawing on the insight of Bultmann's hermeneutical circle, scholars such as Orlando Costas find an alternative symbol in a dialogical spiral that points to an eschatological goal. This dynamic process of critical reflection and interpretation takes place as the interpreter identifies by faith with the text of the Scripture and at the same time distances himself from it in study and reflection. At the same time the interpreter identifies with and distances himself also from the context. Authentic contextualization takes place when these horizons meet. In the dialogue between text and context, the questions raised by the context are brought to the text for answers, while the text in turn raises new questions that confront the context. For example, the context may focus on specific issues of violence, while the text raises issues concerning sin and demonic power. Since the text is given and authoritative, and the context relative and changing, the dialogical movement will always be from text to context. In this way, the process of reflection differs sharply from that of the more radical views. However, while recognizing that there can be no absolute and final system of theology, the interpreter works in the confidence that the Spirit of God gives increasing clarity and assurance on the nature of the gospel and its relevance to every human situation.

Evangelicals recognize that valid contextualization takes place only where there is unreserved commitment to the path of discipleship. First and foremost, this calls for loyalty and commitment to Jesus Christ as Saviour and Lord of all of life, personal and social, and to his gospel. Evangelicals share with liberation theologians their commitment to the historic Jesus in his humility and suffering and his prophetic rebuke of hypocrisy and injustice. But they are equally committed to the Christ of faith – incarnate Son of God, crucified, risen from the dead and coming again at the end of time to consummate his kingdom. This commitment to Jesus Christ is within the trinitarian framework of God the Father and God the Holy Spirit.

Furthermore, true contextualization demands commitment to the *church as the people of God. The church with its openness to God in worship and fellowship is also called to obedience in humble service, especially to the poor, and to proclaim to all people that salvation is in Jesus Christ alone. Contextualization takes place primarily within the sphere of the church and only secondly within the world. Reflection and interpretation are the work of the church. The priesthood of all believers and the work of the Holy Spirit in illuminating Scripture emphasize that the church is the sphere in which contextualization takes place. It is not the prerogative of a professional theological élite alone, but is open to all God's people. The church as the body of Christ with the Spirit-given diversity of gifts of ministry ensures that this dynamic process of contextualizing theology and practice takes place.

True contextualization warns against the dangers of *syncretism in theological beliefs, religious practices and ethical lifestyles, but it is not driven to inertia or to maintenance of the status quo by fear of this danger. A willingness to take risks and commitment to clear missiological goals enables the communicator to overcome this fear. The Holy Spirit as the divine Communicator is the pioneer and enabler in the fulfilment of this task.

In this dialogical relationship between the biblical text and the human context all forms of idolatrous beliefs and practices, whether religious or secular, are judged and stand condemned. The church is committed to their destruction. Though all of culture is tainted with sin, it still reflects the truths and beauty of God's general revelation. Therefore that which is compatible with the law of God must be purified, transformed and put under the lordship of Christ.

Contextualization culminates in the good news breaking into every situation, with the newness of redemption from sin, guilt and demonic power, liberation from human despair and social injustice, and the actualization of faith, hope and love. Thus contextualization is a central task of the church in its mission in the world.

See also: CONTEXTUAL THEOLOGIES; CULTURE.

Bibliography

R. Bauckham, The Bible and Mission: Christian Witness in a Postmodern World (Grand Rapids, 2003); J. Miguez Bonino, Doing Theology in a Revolutionary Situation (Philadelphia, 1975); O. E. Costas, The Church and Its Mission (Wheaton, 1974); J. D. Douglas (ed.), Let the Earth Hear His Voice (Minneapolis, 1975); B. C. E. Fleming, Contextualization of Theology (Pasadena, 1980); D. Flemming, Contextualization in the New Testament (Downers Grove, 2005); D. S. Gilliland, The Word among Us: Contextualizing Theology for Today (Dallas, 1989); D. J. Hesselgrave, Theology and Mission (Grand Rapids, 1978); J. A. Kirk, Theology and the Third World Church (Exeter, 1983); C. H. Kraft, Christianity in Culture (Maryknoll, 1979); L. J. Lutzbetak, The Church and Cultures (Pasadena, 1976); I. H. Marshall (ed.), New Testament Interpretation: Essays on Principles and Methods (Exeter, 1977); B. J. Nicholls, Contextualization: A Theology of Gospel and Culture (Exeter, 1979); Bong Rin Ro and R. Eshenaur, The Bible and Theology in Asian Context (Taichung, 1984); V. K. Samuel and C. Sugden (eds.), Sharing Jesus in the Two-Thirds World (Bangalore, 1983); J. R. W. Stott and R. T. Coote, Gospel and Culture (Pasadena, 1979); J. Sobrino, Christology at the Crossroads: A Latin American Approach (Maryknoll, 1978); TEF staff, Ministry in Context (London, 1972); A. C. Thiselton, The Two Horizons (Exeter, 1980).

B. J. NICHOLLS

CONTINGENCY

All propositions are logically either contingent or necessary. They are logically contingent if their denial is consistent. States of affairs are causally either contingent or necessary. They are causally contingent if their existence depends on the existence of something else, causally necessary if not.

God's existence may be thought of as being causally necessary (he is uncaused) and even logically necessary (his non-existence is inconceivable), and these positions may be thought to have a scriptural basis (Ps. 90:2). Conversely, the universe may be thought of as causally and logically contingent, the expression of the free (i.e. unconstrained) goodness of God (Gen. 1). The contingency of the universe may seem to require an explanation, and this thought has been the basis of numerous 'cosmological' arguments for God's existence, most of them of dubious validity (see *Natural theology). *Anselm's ontological argument, if cogent, would be a demonstration of God's logical necessity. Philosophers since *Hume and *Kant have claimed that all logically necessary truths are uninformative, and hence that 'God exists' is, at best, a contingent truth.

Thinkers of an *existentialist cast of mind have given prominence to the mystery of human contingency as an element in what is in their view the meaninglessness of human life. By contrast, the Bible gives the recognition of such contingency as one reason for awe, reverence, humility and thanksgiving (Pss 90:12; 100).

Bibliography

D. R. Burrhill (ed.), The Cosmological Arguments (Garden City, 1967); A. Plantinga, The Nature of Necessity (Oxford, 1974); T. F. Torrance, Divine and Contingent Order (Oxford, 1981).

P. HELM

CONVERSION

The term conversion in Christian usage refers to the transformation of one's life brought about through the hearing of the *gospel and through the recognition of the call of God (see *Calling) upon one's life. Commonly referred to as 'new birth' or *regeneration, conversion involves the reorientation of a person's life to the truth of God made known in *Jesus Christ. It is a change of heart and mind and results also in a change of conduct as the convert is transformed according to the likeness of Jesus Christ.

There has been some dispute in the Christian tradition about how the work of God in conversion is related to the action of the individual. While most theologians have recognized the need for a freely chosen response to the gospel, most are also agreed that conversion must first be understood as the action of the *Holy Spirit in bringing people to see, understand and share in the *salvation wrought through the life, death and resurrection of Jesus. The response of *faith is thus a response made possible by God's *grace. The Protestant Reformers (see *Reformation theology) typically claimed that baptism marked the decisive point of conversion and that the practice of infant baptism expressed clearly the utter dependence of conversion upon divine grace. Others have contended, however, that the grace of God is active only in response to the individual's repentance and confession of faith.

A further point of disagreement concerns whether conversion is best understood as a discrete episode in which the individual accepts the gospel and responds in faith, or as a lifelong process of transformation. In the latter case, conversion is closely related to *sanctification, the process whereby believers are gradually conformed to the likeness of Christ. Reports of the conversions of Paul, *Augustine and John *Wesley, to name three well-known instances, trace conversion to a particular moment and experience, but many Christians claim that their faith in Christ has grown over a long period, with no identifiable point of conversion. Within the *evangelical tradition, conversion has usually been understood to refer to a particular point in one's life. A particularly insistent expression of this understanding occurred in Puritan New England where, for a time, church membership was restricted to those who could recount a conversion experience.

Whether conversion is understood as a singular event or as a process, it involves in both cases the transformation of one's life, a dying to the old self, and a rising to new life in Christ. So important is this transformation that, for John Wesley, a lack of evidence of a holy life was taken as a sure sign that a person had not been converted at all. Concomitantly, a holy life could be taken by believers as an assurance of their conversion and faith.

In evangelical thought, conversion is closely associated with *repentance. The reorientation of one's life to the truth made known in Jesus Christ involves, simultaneously, a turning from the life of the 'old Adam' and a turning toward new life in Christ. With that turning comes sorrow and confession that the person now born anew had for so long persisted in the life of sinfulness and disobedience. A point of debate has been whether Christ himself may be understood to offer that repentance on our behalf so that the decisive event of our conversion back to God takes place, not at some point in our own personal journey but in the life, death and *resurrection of Jesus, through which the world is reconciled to God. It is argued by some, in the *Reformed tradition especially, that Christ does for us what we cannot do for ourselves. That is, Christ offers a true repentance on our behalf, bears the consequences of our sinfulness, and thus turns us back to right relationship with God. Those awakened to this conversion are called to respond with *worship and praise for the wonders of God's grace. Such worship is to be expressed through every facet of the believer's life.

It is important to stress that while the new life of the believer has ethical ramifications, it is fundamentally concerned with a new relationship. Believers are made new because they are reconciled with God and made members of the body of Christ. It has been a weakness of the evangelical tradition to construe conversion in excessively individualistic terms. While conversion is necessarily personal, it is not the institution of a private relationship with God. An essential dimension of conversion is the believer's incorporation into the community of faith in Jesus Christ (see *Church). The call to discipleship is a call to participation in the community of believers who are together established as the body of Christ and who together are charged with proclaiming the gospel in the world. The converted life is one oriented both to God and to neighbours in faithful and loving service.

Bibliography

J. Baillie, Baptism and Conversion (London, 1964); G. Gutiérrez, 'Conversion for Evangelisation', in G. Gutiérrez, The Power of the Poor in History (ET, Maryknoll and London, 1983); W. James, The Varieties of Religious Experience, ed. M. E. Marty (Harmondsworth, 1983 [1902]); H. T. Kerr and J. M. Mulder (eds.), Famous Conversions (Grand Rapids, 1983); T. Smail, 'One Cross – Baptism into Communion', in T. Smail, Once and for All: A Confession of the Cross (London, 1998).

M. A. RAE

COPTIC CHRISTIANITY

The Coptic Church is essentially the church centring on the ancient patriarchate of *Alexandria, the Egyptian Church (Arabic qibt, Ethiopic qibs, 'Egypt'). We may identify four groupings: the *monophysite Orthodox Copts; the Melkites ('Emperor's men'), adherents of the Chalcedonian position; the Eastern Catholic Copts, dating from 1741; and the *Ethiopian Orthodox Church, Coptic only in its historic links with Alexandria. The term Coptic Church is used properly only of the first of these four groups.

The Coptic Church should not be subsumed under the heading of the *Eastern Orthodox churches as it belongs to the *Oriental Orthodox family of churches (formerly often known as monophysite). The distinction arose in the *Christological debates of the fifth century, which were brought to a focus at the Council of *Chalcedon in 451. The conclusions of that Council are not accepted by the Oriental Orthodox. Their view is that there is only one (divine-human) nature in Christ. The Copts reject the extreme position of Eutyches (c. 378–454), but subscribe to the formula attributed to *Cyril of Alexandria, 'one physis (which can be understood as 'nature' or 'person') of the incarnate Word'. Monophysitism is, in fact, peripheral to the theology of the Copts, and their initial acceptance of the monophysite view might be attributed in part to national pride, injured by the deposing and banishment of their patriarch, Dioscorus (d. 454), at Chalcedon, as well as to traditional Egyptian religion which conditioned Egyptian thinking to divine-human unity, and to the influence of philosophy. The Oriental Orthodox Church recognizes the formulations of the *Councils of Nicaea, Constantinople and Ephesus. In recent decades, dialogue between Eastern and Oriental Orthodox has led to the acknowledgment that both traditions share the same faith, and closer relationships are being sought.

Three ranks of clergy are recognized: the diaconate, the priesthood and the episcopate, although in theory the laity are seen to act with the clergy in giving effect to liturgy and sacrament. The Coptic patriarch is a monk, reflecting the historic importance of *monasticism, which may be said to have originated in Egypt with Antony (c. 251–356) and Pachomius (c. 287–346). Monasticism has seen a measure of renewal in recent decades.

Although no particular stress is laid on the number, seven *sacraments are recognized. Infant baptism is followed by *anointing with consecrated oil (chrism) and *confirmation. Communion is taken by the clergy in both kinds, but the laity more commonly take it in one kind only. The three orders of priesthood are referred to above. Penance follows confession. Marriage is in theory indissoluble, although this view is modified by reference to a sacramental eternity for the relationship. Anointing of the sick is the seventh sacrament.

The Coptic liturgy is very rich, employing the Coptic language or Arabic. Lectionaries are widely used, as are synaxaria, lives of the saints, related to the church calendar. Fasting is widely practised. There is a strong evangelical element in the Coptic Church, and nineteenth-century Western influence stimulated it to develop a flourishing Sunday School movement, which is led by well-trained teachers. It is estimated that 10% of the population of Egypt belong to the church, but it has experienced opposition in recent decades from Islamic extremists.

Bibliography

A. S. Atiya, A History of Eastern Christianity (London, 1968); idem (ed.), The Coptic Encyclopedia, 7 vols. (New York, 1991); C. Chaillot, The Coptic Orthodox Church (Paris, 2005), with further bibliography; W. H. C. Frend, The Rise of the Monophysite Movement (Cambridge, 1972; this includes a magnificent bibliography); P. Gregorius, W. H. Lazareth and N. A. Nissiotis (eds.), Does Chalcedon Divide or Unite? (Geneva, 1981); O. F. A. Meinardus, Christian Egypt, Faith and Life (Cairo, 1977); idem, Two Thousand Years of Coptic Christianity (Cairo, 2002); J. H. Watson, Among the Copts: Beliefs and Practices (Brighton, 2000).

F. P. COTTERELL

CORPORATE PERSONALITY

In Scripture and in human experience, self-awareness, moral and legal responsibility, blessing and trouble, reward and punishment are corporate as well as individual realities. Thus Israel and other nations can speak as 'I' as well as 'we' (Num. 20–21); the fate of a family can be bound up together (Josh. 7); one generation can bear the consequences of earlier generations' sins (Matt. 23:35); a church can be addressed as a person invited to open its 'heart' to Christ (Rev. 3:20).

For a period in the mid-twentieth century, under the influence of the work of H. Wheeler Robinson (1872–1945), the OT version of this common phenomenon was given a rather mystical connotation by being described in terms of 'corporate personality' connected with a primitive way of experiencing reality that was different from our modern way. The theory was used to explain passages in the Psalms which alternate between 'I' and 'we', and the servant passages in Isa. 40–55 with their changing identification of the servant. But it is now discredited, and such passages are better approached in other ways. There is no need for the hypothesis that OT or NT people's corporate or individual self-awareness was radically different from our own.

Bibliography

P. Joyce, 'The Individual and the Community' in J. Rogerson (ed.), Beginning Old Testament Study (London, 1983); J. R. Porter, 'The Legal Aspects of the Concept of "Corporate Personality" in the Old Testament', VT 15 (1965), pp. 361–380; H. W. Robinson, Corporate Personality in Ancient Israel (Philadelphia, 1980); J. Rogerson, 'The Hebrew Conception of Corporate Personality: A Re-examination', JTS 21 (1970), pp. 1–16; Sang-Won (Aaron) Son, Corporate Elements in Pauline Anthropology (Fort Worth, 2001).

J. GOLDINGAY

COTTON, JOHN (1584–1652)

Cotton studied at Cambridge, UK, encountering the preaching of *Perkins and *Sibbes. Converted under Sibbes' preaching, he was in turn instrumental in the conversion of John Preston. Ordained in the Church of England, Cotton agitated for a fully Reformed church and promulgated Calvinist doctrine (see *Reformed theology). In 1615 he encouraged those with an assurance of salvation to covenant together 'to follow after the Lord in the purity of his worship', thus distinguishing the elect from the generality of those in a state church.

In 1633 Cotton emigrated to New England, where he served as pastor in Boston, and was first engaged in controversy with Roger Williams over liberty of conscience and the nature of the gathered church, then in defence of a group accused of antinomianism, including Anne Hutchinson and John Wheelwright. He later disassociated from them. Cotton was a strong defender of *Congregationalism, seeking a middle road between Presbyterianism and separatism. He became a pivotal and influential leader of English *Puritanism, his Calvinism giving shape and scope to his soteriology and ecclesiology. His distinctive views on grace, the role of affections and assurance in post-regeneration experience, are largely consistent with other Cambridge Puritans such as Sibbes and Preston.

Bibliography

Works: A Treatise of the Covenant of Grace (1659); The Way of the Church of Christ in New England (1645).

Studies: E. Emerson, John Cotton (Boston, 1990); E. B. Holifield, Theology in America: Christian Thought from the Age of the Puritans to the Civil War (New Haven, 2003); M. Schuldiner, Gifts and Works: The Post-Conversion Paradigm and Spiritual Controversy in Seventeenth-Century Massachusetts (Macon, 1991); L. Ziff, The Career of John Cotton: Puritanism and the American Experience (Princeton, 1962).

J. GORDON

COUNCILS

A church council is a gathering of all those members of the church who are responsible for guarding the deposit of the apostolic faith.

1. In Christian theology

Councils are summoned to settle disputes of interpretation, or to pass judgment on matters not found in *Scripture, and their decisions are regarded as binding if they are 'received' by the *church as being in accordance with Scripture and its traditional interpretation. A general or ecumenical or universal council is one for which universal 'reception' by the church is claimed.

This theory has a number of weaknesses, and is in fact understood in different ways. To begin with, there is disagreement as to who has the right to summon a council. According to Byzantine tradition, which is followed by the Church of England (Article VIII), only the secular authority has this power. The Roman Catholic Church, on the other hand, believes that it is the prerogative of the *papacy. Other churches do not define this right, but in practice it is conferred on representative synods or officials, who are elected by more or less democratic means.

It is not agreed who has the right to participate and vote in a council. The Eastern churches restrict both participation and voting to bishops. Rome allows wider participation, but also restricts voting to bishops, whereas *Protestants invariably believe that representatives of the whole church should take part and vote.

The *authority of councils is also a subject of debate. The Eastern church believes that councils are infallible because they are inspired by the Holy Spirit, who speaks not only in the unanimous voice of the bishops but also in the answering echo of the church, which must receive and find the proper application for the decisions taken. The practical difficulties with this are that dissenting bishops have had to be silenced or excommunicated in order to achieve unanimity, and that there have been notable instances of conciliar decisions which have subsequently been rejected by the church, largely on non-theological grounds.

The Roman position is that the pope is the ultimate arbiter and executor of conciliar decisions. No council is valid unless he has given it his approval. The difficulty with this is that the great councils of the early church were held without Roman approval or participation, at least in some cases, though Rome has always accepted them as authoritative. This position also creates a tension between papal monarchy and episcopal oligarchy, which is a standard feature of the life of the Roman Church and which remains unresolved.

Following the schism of 1378 which led to two rival popes, the theory of papal monarchy which had grown up in the Middle Ages was called into question by many churchmen. They wanted to see the church governed by councils which would meet in principle every five years. The membership of these councils would be chosen on a national basis, and their authority would be at least equal to that of the papacy, which would still retain its ancient primacy. The Conciliar movement, as this trend came to be called, reached its highest point at the Council of Constance (1414–18), where it was agreed to set up the appropriate conciliar machinery. A council of the new type actually met at Basel in 1431, but by that time the papacy had regained much of its former prestige, and slowly it strangled the Conciliar movement. First it disrupted proceedings at Basel, and then it transferred the council to Ferrara, where it could be more easily manipulated. By the time it ended, the papacy had regained complete control, and the Conciliar movement was effectively dead. However, memories of it survived, and were to be influential at the time of the Reformation, when various theologians were to propose its revival as an answer to the Protestant breakaway.

Protestants attach no infallible authority to councils, and recognize their decisions only in so far as they can be shown to be in accordance with Scripture. Indeed, for most Protestants, councils of the type described above no longer play any role in church life. There is no agreed machinery for calling an interdenominational council, or for making its decisions binding on participants. The word has now come to be used mainly to describe interchurch organizations such as the *World Council of Churches, whose constitution explicitly eschews any interference in the internal life and doctrine of member churches.

See also: COLLEGIALLY AND CONCILIARITY.

Bibliography

B. Lambert, Ecumenism: Theology and History (London, 1967); P. Sherrard, Church, Papacy and Schism (London, 1978); G. Tavard, Holy Writ or Holy Church: The Crisis of the Protestant Reformation (New York, 1959); B. Tierney, Foundations of the Conciliar Theory (Cambridge, 1955).

G. L. BRAY

2. Survey of councils

What has been called the first council of the leaders of the church was held at Jerusalem in AD 48 or 49, in order to settle the dispute about the reception of Gentile converts into the covenant community (Acts 15). After that time, a number of local synods were held, at Antioch, Carthage and Alexandria, as well as Serdica (Sofia), Lyon and other places, to settle doctrinal disputes and heal schisms of different kinds. Some of their decisions have been preserved in church tradition and become authoritative in the wider Christian world. The most famous series of local synods were those held at Toledo between 400 and 694. Tradition records eighteen in all, and their canons are an invaluable source for the history and theology of the Spanish church during those centuries.

There is little doubt, however, that the most important church councils have been those which have received the title ecumenical, or universal. The Roman Catholic Church recognizes twenty-one of these, though other churches accept far fewer. Unlike the Roman Church, they have never given this title to an assembly consisting exclusively of members of their own church or communion.

The ecumenical councils may be conveniently grouped by historical period, with those which were held in ancient times having the greatest claim to universal recognition. The First Council of *Nicaea (325) and the First Council of *Constantinople (381) established the divinity of Christ and of the Holy Spirit. They have been traditionally linked together by the so-called Nicene, or Niceno-Constantinopolitan, Creed (see *Creeds), which is supposed to have been composed in 381 on the basis of the creed promulgated in 325. Modern scholars doubt this tradition, but there is no doubt that the creed, the councils and their theology have been accepted by virtually all the major branches of the Christian church.

The third ecumenical council was held at Ephesus in 431. It was concerned with the *Christological issues raised by *Nestorius, who was eventually condemned, in circumstances which did the church little credit. The council was followed twenty years later by the fourth, held at Chalcedon in 451, which condemned the Christology of Eutyches (c. 378–454), a monk who had championed and misrepresented the Alexandrian tradition. The council's famous Definition, perhaps the most significant Christological statement in the history of the church, decreed that Jesus Christ was one divine person in two natures, one human and one divine. This eventually drove the Egyptian and Syrian Churches into schism, because they supported a doctrine of *monophysitism, according to which Christ had only one nature.

The fifth council was the Second Council of Constantinople (553), which tried to heal the breach with the monophysites. It decreed that the human nature of Christ was not independent, but received its identity by being united with the divine person of the Son of God. This attempted compromise failed, however, and the breach became permanent after the sixth council, the Third Council of Constantinople (680), which declared that Christ had two wills, a human and a divine, which the monophysites and some of their orthodox supporters had denied.

In 691–92 a synod was held in the palace of Trullum, in Constantinople, which endeavoured to complete the work of the fifth and sixth councils. For this reason it is known as the Quinisext (Fifth-Sixth) Council in Trullo. It established the *canon law of the Eastern church, but it was rejected by Rome, whose traditions were somewhat different, especially in liturgical practice. As a result, this council is not included in the list of ecumenical councils.

List of ecumenical councils

Ancient councils

1.	Nicaea	325
2.	Constantinople I	381
3.	Ephesus	431
4.	Chalcedon	451
5.	Constantinople II	553
6.	Constantinople III	680
5–6.	In Trullo 	692
7.	Nicaea II	787
8.	Constantinople IV ⁺	870
	Constantinople IV	880

Medieval councils

9.	Lateran I ⁺	1123
10.	Lateran II ⁺	1139
11.	Lateran III ⁺	1179
12.	Lateran IV ⁺	1215
13.	Lyons I ⁺	1245
14.	Lyons II ⁺	1274
15.	Vienne ⁺	1311–12
16.	Constance ⁺	1414–18
17.	Basel/Ferrara/Florence/Rome ⁺	1438–45
18.	Lateran V ⁺	1512–17

Modern councils

19.	Trent ⁺	1545–63
20.	Vatican I ⁺	1869–70
21.	Vatican II ⁺	1962–65

 Not recognized by the Western church(es)

 Not recognized by the Eastern churches

The seventh ecumenical council was the Second Council of Nicaea (787), which was called to settle the *iconoclastic controversy. It authorized the veneration of icons on the grounds that it was possible to portray the divine person of Christ after the incarnation, and that honour paid to the image passed to the one represented. This decision was rejected at the Council of Frankfurt (794) and it has never affected the practice of the Western church, although it was later accepted by Rome. The Protestant Reformers all rejected it, but in the Eastern church it has come to occupy an important place as the last of the officially recognized ecumenical councils.

The eighth council, recognized as such only by the West, is the subject of dispute even today. Roman canonists have traditionally claimed that it was the council held at Constantinople in 870. This council condemned and deposed the Patriarch of Constantinople, Photius (c. 820–c. 895) who had broken with Rome over the double procession of the Holy Spirit (the filioque clause in the Nicene Creed) and the evangelization of Bulgaria. However, Photius was rehabilitated at another council of Constantinople, held in 880, and Rome apparently approved of this decision at the time. Modern scholars believe that the canonists of the eleventh century preferred to make the earlier council ecumenical, because by that time the two churches were in *schism and it suited the Roman canonists' case to argue that the Eastern church had been condemned in the person of Photius. In the modern ecumenical climate, research by Roman Catholic scholars has altered our understanding of events, and it is at least possible that both Rome and the Eastern churches may one day be able to declare the council of 880 to have been the eighth ecumenical council.

The next series of councils are the ten which were convened by the Western church during the Middle Ages. None of these is recognized today by the East, and their status among Protestants is undetermined. The first four were held at the Lateran Palace, the pope's official residence in Rome, and are of importance largely because they mark successive stages in the rise of papal power in the medieval church. At the first of these, in 1123, the church condemned lay investiture, which meant the practice of rulers in effect appointing the higher clergy in their realms. It also enjoined the monastic practice of celibacy on all clergy. The second council inveighed against false popes (1139), and the third against the *Albigensian heretics, who were fomenting rebellion in the south of France (1179). The Fourth Lateran Council (1215) asserted the unique primacy of the Roman see over all Christendom, and it is usually held to represent the high point of papal power in the Middle Ages. It also officially defined the dogma of transubstantiation (see *Eucharist).

Later medieval councils pursued similar themes, but the circumstances and locations in which they were summoned indicate a waning of papal power. The First Council of Lyons (1245) attacked the Holy Roman Emperor, Frederick II (1194–1250), but he paid little attention, and the pope was obliged to turn to France for support. The Second Council of Lyons (1274) attempted to heal the breach with the Eastern church. The Byzantine Emperor Michael VIII (1259–82) agreed to accept papal authority of a limited kind in return for aid against the Turks and the Normans (in Sicily), but help was not forthcoming, his own subjects repudiated him, and the union lapsed after his death. The Council of Vienne (1311–12) was called in order to dissolve the Crusading Order of the Knights Templar, on the ground that they were indulging in magical practices.

The Council of Constance (1414–18) was called to heal the papal schism which had broken out in 1378 and had resulted in the existence of three rival popes. The council resolved the schism, and also condemned Jan *Hus to be burned at the stake for *heresy. It decided to weaken the papacy by decreeing that the church would thenceforth be governed by synods meeting at five-yearly intervals. The scheme was not put into effect until 1429, when a council met at Basel, without the support or participation of Pope Eugenius IV (his predecessor had called it, and then died). The popes were determined to crush the Conciliar movement, and the opportunity to do so came in 1438, when the Byzantine Emperor John VIII (1425–48) offered church union to the West in exchange for support against the Turks. The pope called a council of his own (nominally a continuation of that at Basel), which met at Ferrara, only to be moved to Florence after a few months, because of an outbreak of plague. Eventually it was moved to Rome, where it was finally wound up in 1445. The Council of Florence, as it is most generally known, promulgated union with the different Eastern churches, including the Nestorians and monophysites, but these unions were forced, were dependent on aid against the Turks (which materialized, but did not succeed) and were concerned chiefly to back papal claims against the Council of Basel, which gradually petered out as its members withdrew their support and turned back to Rome. In the East, church union was not even proclaimed openly until 1452, and it was immediately repudiated when Constantinople fell to the Turks the following year. Nevertheless, the Council's decrees remain the basis of most of the Eastern Rite Catholic Churches (formerly known as 'Uniates'), who are Eastern in ritual but owe allegiance to Rome.

The last medieval council was the Fifth Lateran Council (1512–17), which tried to introduce some modest reforms into the church, but was overtaken by events in Germany which led to the Reformation.

Since the *Reformation, the Roman Catholic Church has held three councils, to which it has given the name ecumenical, even though no other church recognizes them. The first and most important of these was the Council of *Trent, which met in three distinct stages between 1545 and 1563. After initial attempts to include at least some Protestants, the council's attitude hardened and became extremely hostile to them. Trent spent its time defining and regulating Roman doctrines and practices which the Reformers had attacked, and it did so in a way which polarized the church and drove Rome into a Counter-Reformation which characterized it until the twentieth century (see *Reformation, Catholic Counter-). It produced a very influential *catechism, and the Tridentine Mass, authorized as the official Roman canon from 1570 until 1970, which enshrined the doctrines of transubstantiation and eucharistic sacrifice in a way which came to be regarded as typically Catholic. The abandonment of this Mass after 1970 even caused some conservative Catholics to accuse the church of having sold out to Protestantism.

The First *Vatican Council (1869–70) completed the work of Trent by defining the infallibility of the pope when making official (ex cathedra) statements in matters of faith and morals. The Second Vatican Council (1962–65) has been widely interpreted as a reaction against the Counter-Reformation spirit of Trent and the First Vatican Council, although it did not repudiate any of their decisions. The Second Vatican Council adopted some of the Reformers' principles, such as the use of the vernacular in worship, and many radical Catholics have since appealed to it as justification for their ideas. It is undoubtedly true that the Roman Church is more open to outside influences than it was before the Second Vatican Council, though the long-term effects of this are still unclear. Rome is now committed to ecumenical dialogue in a way in which it was not previously, and it must be wondered whether the pope will ever again summon an ecumenical council without the active participation of other churches. On the other hand, it is far from certain whether the Eastern Orthodox or the Protestant churches would be prepared to attend a council under papal chairmanship, something which never happened in the undivided church of the early centuries.

Bibliography

The Seven Ecumenical Councils (texts), in NPNF series 2, vol. 14; G. Albertigo, A Brief History of Vatican II (Maryknoll, 2006); A. P. Flannery (ed.), Vatican Council II: The Conciliar and Postconciliar Documents (Dublin, rev. edn, 1992); C. J. Hefele, A History of the Christian Councils, 5 vols. (Edinburgh, 1883–96); P. Hughes, The Church in Crisis: A History of the Twenty Great Councils (London, 1961); H. Jedin, Ecumenical Councils of the Catholic Church (Freiburg, 1960); H. J. Margull (ed.), The Councils of the Church: History and Analysis (Philadelphia, 1966); R. V. Sellers, The Council of Chalcedon (London, 1961).

G. L. BRAY

COUNTER-REFORMATION, see REFORMATION, CATHOLIC COUNTER-; ROMAN CATHOLIC THEOLOGY

COVENANT THEOLOGY

Patristic and medieval church

No systematic use of covenant emerged during the ancient church, but *Irenaeus based his millennialism on the land promises of the OT covenant, and *Chrysostom spoke of the sacraments as covenants. *Augustine defined a covenant as an agreement between two parties, emphasized the unity of the OT and NT and proposed a pre-fall covenant between God and Adam.

The medieval period saw the development of three covenantal ideas: (1) Papal absolutists developed a baptismal covenant of the Christian with the pope. Disobedience to the pope was a breach of covenant entitling the pope to resist even a king. Covenant-breaking was grounds for resisting authority. (2) Sacramental theologians explained the saving properties of the mass's re-sacrifice of Christ as a covenant of God. (3) Gabriel *Biel devised a covenant of *merit, whereby God justified a man for doing his best: 'to the ones who do their best, God does not deny grace.' This doctrine of justification by works in God's covenant of merit was held by Luther until with his rediscovery of justification by faith in 1517, he became an opponent of medieval covenant theology.

Early Reformed theology

Luther's law/gospel distinction resulted from a repudiation of Biel's covenant thought, and subsequently, the concept of covenant was developed neither in Luther nor in the Lutheran tradition. In *Reformed theology, however, from Zwingli and Calvin onwards, covenant became a key theme.

*Zwingli emphasized the covenant with Abraham for the relationship of the Christian with God, becoming his main argument for infant *baptism. In 1534, *Bullinger wrote the first treatise on the covenant, Of the One and Eternal Testament or Covenant of God. Bullinger argued that the Scriptures must be interpreted by the Abrahamic covenant in which God graciously offers himself to man, and demands that man 'walk before him and be blameless'.

*Calvin developed the covenant in his Institutes (1559) in several areas: the unity of the OT and NT, the mutuality and conditionality of the covenant, the benefits of *salvation, the *Christian life (law, prayer, repentance, assurance), *predestination (predestination explains how the covenant works), the reformation of the church (Rome had broken the covenant, and should be resisted), the sacraments. Where Calvin wrote of the one covenant of God, later scholastic 'federal' Calvinism (from foedus, Lat. for 'covenant') developed schemes of two or more covenants.

Students of Calvin developed a pre-*fall covenant of works and a pre-temporal covenant of redemption. In 1562, Zacharias *Ursinus spoke of a pre-fall covenant of law between God and *Adam that demanded perfect obedience with the promise of life, and threatened disobedience with the penalty of death. In 1585, Caspar *Olevianus presented a pre-temporal covenant between the Father and the Son for the salvation of man. This coupled with the covenant of grace resulted in the federal theology of theologians such as Johannes *Cocceius. The covenants of works and grace received confessional status in the *Westminster Confession and catechisms.

By the post-Reformation era, one can distinguish: (1) the covenant idea of the Bible, (2) covenant theology – the unity of the covenant of grace throughout salvation history, and (3) federalism, the distinction between a pre-fall covenant of works and the redemptive post-fall covenant of grace. This federal scheme sometimes included the eternal pre-temporal covenant of redemption or pactum salutis between the Father and the Son.

Later developments in Reformed covenant theology

Cocceius is important for covenant theology because he developed a theology of the history of the covenant, reflecting God's gracious abrogation of the covenant of works by bringing eternal life. As an acknowledged infralapsarian, he did not develop his covenant views to blunt predestination as has been claimed.

Other Reformed theological controversies revolving around the covenant include: (1) political resistance to tyranny as in Samuel *Rutherford's Lex Rex (1644); (2) *Arminius's view that God's covenant with his creation was the basis for his right to judge them for disobedience; (3) the denial of a pre-fall covenant of works by certain schools of Reformed theology; (4) the denial by the school of Saumur, led by Moses *Amyraut, that the Mosaic covenant was to be included in the covenant of grace; (5) the covenant as a central point in the *New England Puritans' discussions concerning legalism and antinomianism; as well as (6) the New England Congregationalists' famous 'half-way covenant' that allowed non-communing adults who had been baptized as infants to bring their infants to be baptized.

Baptist theology

The Baptist movement emerged from English nonconformity. While agreeing with the Anabaptists on believers' baptism, some *Baptists in the Calvinist tradition had affinity with aspects of covenantal thought. Theologians such as John *Gill and Andrew *Fuller were influenced by the hermeneutics and theological covenants of federalism.

Baptist covenant theologians such as Nehemiah Coxe, however, distinguished circumcision from believers' baptism by a bi-covenantalism in the Abrahamic covenant. By developing two covenants in Abraham's relationship with God, Baptists could affirm continuity between the Abrahamic covenant and the NT teaching on salvation, but discontinuity between baptism and Abrahamic circumcision.

John Gill developed a strong contrast between the conditionality of the Old Covenant with Israel and the unconditionality of the New Covenant with the Christian. He also lessened the tension between the *sovereignty of God and the responsibility of man that is often an emphasis of Calvinistic covenantal teachings of salvation. Gill also postulated a trinitarian covenant of redemption that recognized the role of the Holy Spirit in the pre-temporal covenant.

Modern theology

Covenant theology remains important in modern Reformed theological discussion, particularly in terms of the covenant of works, the prelapsarian covenant of creation made by God with Adam. Federal theology, however, has come in for sharp criticism in respect of the covenant of works and its allegedly contractual colouring (cf. J. B. Torrance in SJT 23, 1970, pp. 51–76, and 34, 1981, pp. 225–243). Karl *Barth developed his doctrine of covenant in relation to *creation, characterizing the creation as the outer basis of the covenant and the covenant as the inner basis of creation (CD, III.1, 41). This gave expression to what has been called his 'refined supralapsarianism' in seeing the goal of creation in God's people, the church.

Some have alleged that Calvin's theology is incompatible with the way in which federal Calvinism developed. Barth summarizes, 'In Calvin there can be no question of the Law destroying the character of the covenant as a covenant of grace, nor can we find any combination of the covenant concept with a primitive lex naturae. This idea came in as a result of the influence which Melancthon came to exercise on Reformed theology . . .' (CD, IV.1, 58).

Within traditional federal Calvinism, adherents of covenant theology such as John *Murray and Meredith Kline debated the primacy of God's grace or the primacy of God's law in the 'Adamic Administration' or the 'Covenant of Works'. Questions discussed include: Was the original covenant based on divine law and human merit, or was it fully gracious for unfallen humanity? Did Christ's death satisfy completely for man's salvation (the imputation of Christ's passive obedience) or did his perfect obedience to God's law satisfy the covenant of works for all the elect in Christ (the imputation of Christ's active obedience)?

Bibliography

T. K. Ascol, 'The Doctrine of Grace: A Critical Analysis of Federalism in the Theologies of John Gill and Andrew Fuller', PhD dissertation (Southwestern Baptist Theological Seminary, 1989); J. W. Baker, Heinrich Bullinger and the Covenant: The Other Reformed Tradition (Athens, OH, 1980); L. D. Bierma, German Calvinism in the Confessional Age: The Covenant Theology of Casper Olevianus (Grand Rapids, 1996); Jeong Koo Jeon, Covenant Theology: John Murray's and Meredith G. Kline's Response to the Historical Development of Federal Theology in Reformed Thought (Lanham, 1999); N. Coxe and J. Owen, Covenant Theology from Adam to Christ, eds. R. D. Miller, J. M. Renihan and F. Orozco (Palmdale, 2005); P. A. Lillback, The Binding of God: Calvin's Role in the Development of Covenant Theology (Grand Rapids, 2001); C. S. McCoy and J. W. Baker, Fountainhead of Federalism: Heinrich Bullinger and the Covenantal Tradition (Louisville, 1991); J. Murray, 'Covenant Theology', in EC, vol. III; S. Preus, From Shadow to Promise (Cambridge, MA, 1969); S. Strehle, Calvinism, Federalism, and Scholasticism: A Study of the Reformed Doctrine of Covenant (Bern, 1988); G. Vos, 'The Doctrine of the Covenant in Reformed Theology', in R. B. Gaffin, Jr (ed.), Redemptive History and Biblical Interpretation (Philipsburg, 1980), pp. 234–267; D. A. Weir, The Origins of the Federal Theology in Sixteenth-Century Reformation Thought (Oxford, 1990).

P. A. LILLBACK

COVENANTERS

Scottish *Presbyterians who from 1638 resisted attempts by Stuart monarchs to impose and maintain an episcopal system of *church government. Previously uneasy about the modified episcopacy established under James VI (d. 1625), the country became increasingly alarmed when Charles I not only made friendly overtures to Rome, but imposed upon the Scottish church a Book of Canons (1636) and a liturgy (1637) without the endorsement of General Assembly or parliament. These documents demanded explicit acknowledgment of the royal supremacy, transferred full power to the bishops, and threatened excommunication on those who rejected episcopacy (see *Caroline Divines).

When the king ignored their protests, Scots leaders prepared a legal bond of association known as the National Covenant (1638). After repeating a 1581 Confession condemning Roman Catholic errors, including 'tyrannous laws made . . . against our Christian liberty', the Covenant detailed those Acts of Parliament which had established the *Reformed faith and church government, and subscribers bound themselves to defend the Presbyterian religion and 'the King's majesty . . . in the preservation of the foresaid true religion'.

Charles prevaricated, Archbishop Laud (1573–1645) was unmoved; so a General Assembly met in Glasgow to reject Erastian tendencies (see *State) and royalist pretensions by proclaiming Christ as the only head of the church. The Scottish bishops were deposed, offending ecclesiastical legislation was condemned, and the notorious Court of High Commission abolished. The king, who was embroiled also in conflict with the English Parliament, lost the battle of Newburn against the Covenanting forces, and was forced to yield to Scottish demands. The Glasgow Assembly was given legal validity, and the Kirk with dubious wisdom asked the Privy Council to require all Scots to sign the Covenant. Thus the Covenanters took upon themselves the power they had denied to the crown, but more blame attaches to a king who had obtusely converted a protest against episcopacy into a rebellion against himself.

Basic to the Covenanting position was the firm opposition of the Reformed Church of Scotland to two principles: the authority of the civil power in spiritual matters, and the prelatic superiority of one minister over others. Among the early Covenanters who guided the Kirk in its return to Presbyterianism were Alexander Henderson (1583–1646), George Gillespie (1613–49) and Samuel *Rutherford, all of whom had a prominent part in the Westminster Assembly. Henderson, meanwhile, was the chief drafter of the Solemn League and Covenant, a religious alliance between the Scots and the English parliamentary party, though one essentially forced on the latter by political expediency.

Soon after the Restoration of 1660, Charles II had two leading Covenanters executed: the Marquis of Argyle and James Guthrie, minister of Stirling. Episcopacy was reimposed upon the land and church government vested in the Crown. Covenanter-ministers were ejected from their parishes, the process helped by a dissolute court, a Scottish Council of profligate nobles, and military leaders who carried out a policy of savage repression. Latterly known as 'the killing times', the persecution of Covenanters continued until James VII fled in 1688 and the Revolution Settlement vindicated the rebels and re-established Presbyterianism.

Cameronian or Reformed Presbyterian churches maintain a Covenanting succession, on both sides of the Atlantic.

Bibliography

J. D. Douglas, Light in the North: The Story of the Scottish Covenanters (Exeter, 1964); J. K. Hewison, The Covenanters, 2 vols. (Glasgow, 2nd 1913); A. Smellie, Men of the Covenant (repr. London, 1975 [1908]); E. Whitley, The Two Kingdoms (Edinburgh, 1977).

J. D. DOUGLAS

CRANMER, THOMAS (1489–1556)

Thomas Cranmer came to his mature doctrinal views only gradually. Typical of the Catholic *humanism of John Fisher's Cambridge, he was trained at Jesus College in *scholasticism, the Fathers and the Bible (BA, 1511; MA, 1515; BD 1521; DD 1526). During the 1520s he followed *Erasmus, emphasizing Scripture over scholastic reasoning, rejecting Luther's bondage of the will, and preferring *conciliarism to papal authority. Hence, he was able to work for Henry VIII's 'divorce'. Nevertheless, during the 1530s Cranmer accepted *justification by faith as the true Augustinian exegesis of Paul. His conversion to evangelical teaching most likely dates from his 1532 residency in Germany, while serving as the king's ambassador to Charles V, when he married a relative of the Nuremberg Reformer Andreas Osiander.

Unexpectedly, Cranmer was called back by Henry VIII to become Archbishop of Canterbury in 1533. After the split from Rome the following year, Cranmer worked with limited success to convince the king to introduce the Reformation into England. Only with the 1547 accession of Henry's young son Edward VI did Cranmer have the opportunity to reshape the teachings of the English church according to his own now clearly *Protestant principles.

First, he oversaw the publication of the Book of Homilies (1547). This collection of required sermons for parish clergy taught the supremacy and sufficiency of Scripture as well as justification by faith. Secondly, he compiled a new national *liturgy. The 1549 Book of Common Prayer used English exclusively, institutionalized the systematic reading of Scripture, removed all references to personal merit and emphasized a eucharistic sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving only. The next year Cranmer published a similarly revised Ordinal. His 1552 combination Prayer Book and Ordinal contained even more Protestant changes. The traditional order of the prayers in the Canon of the Mass was broken up so that the thanksgiving of the people was now their response to the grace received with the elements, not its grounds. In addition, the prayers themselves were altered to clarify that Christ's eucharistic presence was spiritual in nature, a holy communion in the heart of the believer through personal faith. Finally, Cranmer drew up an official statement of essential theological beliefs called the Articles of Religion (1553). Crucial for the future development of the Anglican Communion, the Forty-Two Articles (see *Thirty-Nine Articles) distinguished saving truth, which served as the basis of church unity and had to be clearly established by Scripture, from ecclesiastical traditions and ceremonies, which every nation was free to adapt to their own culture, so long as the result was not contrary to Scripture.

Although Cranmer was burned as an arch-heretic under Mary, his three formularies were adopted with only minor modifications by the Elizabethan church. Consequently, Cranmer's doctrinal and liturgical legacy served as the foundation for the emergence of *Anglicanism.

Bibliography

P. N. Brooks, Thomas Cranmer's Doctrine of the Eucharist (London, 2nd 1992); D. MacCulloch, Thomas Cranmer: A Life (London, 1996); idem, Tudor Church Militant: Edward VI and the Protestant Reformation (London: 1999); A. Null, 'Official Tudor Homilies', in P. McCullough, H. Adlington and E. Rhatigan (eds.), Oxford Handbook of the Early Modern Sermon (Oxford, 2011), pp. 348–365; idem, Thomas Cranmer's Doctrine of Repentance: Renewing the Power of Love (Oxford, 2000).

J. A. NULL

CREATION

The Christian doctrine of creation has been the object of immense controversy during the modern era, especially since the rise of evolutionary theory in the nineteenth century and developments in cosmology during the twentieth. Such controversies have significantly truncated the range of theological reflection on this doctrine. They have also deflected popular Christian engagement with this topic to an unduly narrow focus on the questions of cosmological and biological origins. In fact, in its classical expressions the Christian doctrine of creation addressed questions of origins only within the wider context of interest in the nature, purpose and status of creation, the structures appropriate to creaturely existence, the relationships between the various creatures, and the nature of *sin and *evil.

Nevertheless, it is reflection on the nature, status and purpose of creation – as these are framed through the NT's nexus of *Christology and creation – which lies at the heart of the Christian doctrine of creation. The biblical foundations and theological development of these themes will be the focus of what follows.

The New Testament

There can be few more all-encompassing claims for Jesus Christ than those contained in the prologue to the Gospel of John. Here, *Jesus, the one who 'made his dwelling among us' (1:14) is none other than the Word who was 'in the beginning' (1:1) and through whom 'all things were made' (1:3). Nor is this text alone. Col. 1:15–17 and Heb. 1:2 similarly identify Christ as the mediator of creation. Also noteworthy are those texts which identify Christ as the goal of creation (e.g. Eph. 1:9–10; 4:10; Phil. 2:9–11; Rev. 22:13). Notwithstanding assorted points of exegetical controversy, these texts point to a significant consensus across different strands of the NT literature around the Christological interpretation of creation. It is not just that Christ is being portrayed as a figure of cosmic significance – which he is – but that he is portrayed as the ground and purpose of creation. As such, these texts point to a strong affirmation of both the goodness of creation (how could it not be good if it was created by Christ?) and the fact that Christ's redemptive work is the redemption of, not a redemption from, creation. As statements, therefore, of the unity of creation and *redemption these texts specify Christologically one of the strands of OT teaching about creation.

The Old Testament

OT references to creation cannot be isolated from claims about monotheism, divine sovereignty and the order of creation, and these as articulated in polemical encounters with rival worldviews, theologies and cosmologies. Where, for instance, other ancient beliefs involved postulating creation as the outcome of battles between warring divinities, Gen. 1:1 – 2:4 affirms creation both as the good work of the sovereign will of the one *God and also as a reality distinct from God. And, where other cosmologies saw creation permanently threatened by various chaotic forces, OT writers envisaged the act of creation as God's ordering of (Pss 89:9–10; 104:7), or at least imposing limits on (Job 38:8–11), chaos. What remains unresolved in the OT is the tension between creation as an ordering (of already existent realities) and creation as the absolute beginning (of all that is not God). This tension will later yield, in both Christianity and Judaism, to a doctrine of creatio ex nihilo.

Also significant in the OT is the place which human beings have in God's creation. Alone among the creatures, they are the *image of God and are given dominion over the rest of creation (Gen. 1:26–28). On the basis of both etymological considerations and its canonical context, this designation cannot be taken either to licence any human exploitation of creation (e.g. Gen. 2:15–17; Deut. 20:19; 22:6) or to imply any divine indifference to the non-human creation (e.g. Gen. 8:21–22). After all, it was the very community which ascribed this specific status to humanity which also had a well-developed understanding of the role of the whole creation in the praise of God (e.g. Ps. 148).

Theological developments

As it moved into the world of classical Greek thought and as it struggled with *Gnosticism, Christianity encountered yet further rival views of the origin, nature and purpose of creation, such as the eternal existence of creation, an understanding of creation as the fashioning of pre-existent matter by an inferior divinity, and, concomitantly, redemption being a form of release or escape from the reality of creation. Reflecting the multi-layered context of the biblical references to creation, the Christian response to these issues was neither isolated from other areas of belief nor univocal. Nevertheless, the NT's consensus on the Christological unity of creation and redemption certainly forced the rejection of any understanding of creation as inferior, chaotic or evil. Nor can the impact of nascent patristic Christological debates (ultimately addressed directly in the Arian controversy) upon these reflections be underestimated. The clarification for Christological purposes of the distinction between creating and begetting both reflected and informed the developing Christian understanding of creation as a contingent event which brought into being a reality distinct from God. Herein lies the foundation of the Christian commitment to the idea of creatio ex nihilo. It does not rest on the disputable exegesis of particular verses (i.e. Gen. 1:1–2), but on the considered combination of various theological convictions.

Awareness of these various background convictions is essential for the full articulation of the doctrine of creation. In fact, what has often been lost in the reception and defence of this doctrine is precisely its Christological – and ultimately trinitarian – context. Placed in that context, the doctrine of creation depends for its coherence on maintaining various tensions which are proper to the doctrine. An insistence on the sovereignty of the divine creative will cannot be at the expense of an awareness that this same will is as loving, gracious and purposeful as it is sovereign. Equally, and for similar reasons, an emphasis on creatio ex nihilo can overlook God's continuing and eschatologically open relationship with creation. An unbalanced emphasis on the unity of creation and redemption can too easily surrender the distinction between the two. At the same time, an emphasis on the distinction of creation from God must not render creation alien to God, nor blind the believer to God's order in creation. Observing how these tensions play out in various theologians is always instructive. *Thomas Aquinas, for instance, affirmed the doctrine of creatio ex nihilo, but sought to describe the relationship between God and the creation through an appeal to a continuous hierarchy of causes (see ST 1a, 44–46), thus potentially threatening the distinction between God and creation. Karl *Barth defined creation as the external basis of the *covenant and the covenant as the internal basis of creation (see CD III/1, pp. 94–329). His appeal to covenant reflects the Christological telos of creation, but in deeming creation 'external' to the covenant, he potentially rendered problematic God's continuing relationship to creation. The debates surrounding these equally sophisticated proposals reflect the tensions inherent in doing justice to all the dimensions of the distinctively Christian understanding of creation.

Contemporary issues

Modern controversies related to the doctrine of creation often reflect the dissolution of one or more of the various tensions just discussed.

Creation and science

That the development of evolutionary theory and discoveries in cosmology turned the relationship between science and Christianity (see *Science and theology) into one of conflict was due to many factors, of which the interpretation of Genesis was only superficially the most important. More telling was the fact that the prevailing theology in the relevant contexts (i.e. *deism) had dissolved the tension between contingent origin and Christological purpose entirely in favour of the former. Consequently, the ordered openness of nature described by evolution, cosmology and quantum physics was wrongly perceived to be necessarily at odds with Christian teaching. More theologically balanced doctrines of creation in T. F. *Torrance and Alister McGrath allow for constructive dialogue between science and theology. Specifically, a Christological understanding of creation's origin and purpose allows McGrath to propose that the rationality discerned by the natural sciences is the same rationality as 'embedded in creation and embodied in Christ' (Scientific Theology I, p. 188). The discernment of order in creation can therefore be interpreted Christologically and need not merely become, as it risks becoming in Intelligent Design, the basis of an explanatory appeal to a 'god of the gaps'.

Creation, revelation and natural theology

A closely related issue is whether creation reveals God. Does the unity between creation and redemption extend to revelation? A negative answer to that question led Karl Barth to his vigorous attack upon ‘*natural theology’. Barth believed that natural theology rested on a necessary connection between God and human beings (thus dissolving the tension between creation’s distinction from God and God’s covenantal relationship with creation). Barth’s fear was that any such necessary connection implied a source of *revelation independent of that given uniquely and redemptively in Christ. The intensity of Barth’s polemic against natural theology has often obscured from his readers the positive statements he did make about the contingent role of creation in revelation. In fact, consistent with his particular understanding of creation and covenant, he was quite able to endorse faith’s recognition of a divinely given order in creation (see CD IV/3, pp. 135–165). Such a move justifies a ‘theology of nature’ which allows observations (scientific or otherwise) of nature’s order to be given an appropriate (albeit non-foundationalist) place in theological discourse.

Creation and the environmental crisis

The human exploitation of the earth which lies behind this crisis is often explained as the direct consequence of the Judeo-Christian teaching about the dominion granted by God to human beings (see *Ecology). As noted above, the texts themselves resist such interpretation. In fact, more problematic for many contemporary critics is the ideological function of the doctrine of creation more generally. The distinction between God and creation is said to justify the objectification of creation. Furthermore, the sovereignty ascribed to God is said to be illegitimately transferred to human beings. Thus, so the critics argue, is the exploitation of nature ideologically justified. The counter-proposal is an account of creation which deliberately surrenders the distinction between God and creation in a form of *pantheism (which tends also to dissolve several of the other tensions noted above). The actual intellectual and ethical advances of such proposals, the coherence of their criticisms of the orthodox doctrine, and their accounts of the latter’s reception are all issues likely to be vigorously debated for the foreseeable future.

See also: CREATION AND EVOLUTION; CREATION-CENTRED SPIRITUALITY; NATURE, THEOLOGY OF.

Bibliography

K. Barth, CD; D. Fergusson, Cosmos and Creator: An Introduction to the Theology of Creation (London, 1998); C. Gunton, The Triune Creator: A Historical and Systematic Study (Grand Rapids, 1998); G. May, Creatio Ex Nihilo: The Doctrine of ‘Creation out of Nothing’ in Early Christian Thought (ET, Edinburgh, 1994); G. McCulloch, The Deconstruction of Dualism in Theology: With Special Reference to Ecofeminist Theology and New Age Spirituality (Carlisle, 2002); S. McFague, The Body of God: An Ecological Theology (Minneapolis and London, 1993); A. McGrath, A Scientific Theology, vol 1: Nature (Edinburgh, 2001); J. Moltmann, God in Creation: An Ecological Doctrine of Creation (ET, London 1985); Thomas Aquinas, Summa Theologiae (ET, London, 1911); T. Torrance, Divine and Contingent Order (Edinburgh, 2nd 1998).

G. J. THOMPSON

CREATION AND EVOLUTION

To gain clarity in this area, hotly debated by some Christians, it is necessary to differentiate between the doctrine of *creation, which is not a scientific theory but a doctrine of the Christian faith confessed in the historic creeds, and the theory of evolution, which is a scientific theory and indeed a cornerstone of natural science today. The doctrine of creatio ex nihilo, that the world (that is, the universe, everything other than God) was created by God out of nothing, was formulated in the second century by the early Christian bishops, *Irenaeus of Lyons and Theophilus of Antioch, on the basis of Scripture and has been held by all major theologians and branches of the church ever since. The theory of evolution, that all animal species evolved from a common ancestry, was proposed before Darwin, but was established as the dominant paradigm of the science of biology and related sciences such as geology, following the publication of his book, The Origin of the Species, in 1859. It remains today the dominant and accepted view of the scientific community. Charles Darwin himself (1809–82) came from a Unitarian family, and his theory (along with the problem of evil) brought him to a crisis of faith. But it was his disciple, Thomas Henry Huxley (1825–95), who took up Darwin's theory as a weapon to fight for the place of science in the universities in opposition to classics and theology, and as an argument for what he called "agnosticism", a position which today is largely synonymous with secular humanism. Richard Dawkins presents a contemporary version of Huxley's position.

Despite the notorious debate at Oxford between Huxley and Bishop Samuel Wilberforce, many leading church leaders of the day (including such evangelicals as B. B. Warfield of Princeton, Henry Drummond of Edinburgh, and James Orr of Glasgow) accepted some form of evolution and did not see it as contrary to the doctrine of creation ex nihilo. After all, before evolution could begin there had to be matter, and science had not given any explanation for the origin of the material universe itself. The theory was disturbing, however, for many ordinary Christians, because they did not distinguish the doctrine of creation from their literal interpretation of the first chapters of Genesis. Ironically, the fundamentalist movement which developed mainly in America in the 1920s was in fact agreeing with Huxley against many theologians that belief in creation was a scientific theory held by Christians in opposition to Darwinism, and 'creationists' today continue to take that view.

The case for 'creationism' was revived in the 1960s by the publication of The Genesis Flood by John C. Whitcomb and Henry Morris. Today a significant percentage of American Christians accept their 'Young Earth' view that the earth was created 10,000 years ago in seven days and that much of the fossil record is due to the flood. Battles have continued in the courts as to whether these views can be accepted as reputable science. 'Old Earth' creationists, however, interpret the 'days' in Gen. 1 as long periods of time (as did Augustine), and often accept micro- as distinct from macro-evolution. Over against creationism as scientific theory, the case for 'theistic evolution' as compatible with the doctrine of creation has been maintained by evangelical leaders in the United Kingdom, including John Stott, Oliver Barclay and the geneticist, R. J. Berry.

In the 1990s, new opposition to Darwinism appeared in the advocacy of 'intelligent design' by an American law professor, Phillip Johnson, supported by William Dembski (a mathematician and philosopher) and the biochemist, Michael Behe. Rather than proceeding from Scripture, these writers attacked the presumptions of 'naturalism' in science and pin-pointed problems in the theory of evolution, particularly the problem of the 'irreducible complexity' at the biochemical level. These thinkers seem to advocate a revived teleological argument for God as Creator, rather than a fundamentalist form of creationism. They have defended 'intelligent design' against the accusation that it simply revives the 'god of the gaps', using God to explain aspects of science that we do not yet understand.

While the idea of the evolution of the species (and indeed the evolution of the cosmos over 13.7 million years since the Big Bang) may be logically compatible with a belief in the creation of the universe ex nihilo, advocates of 'theistic evolution' face greater problems in reconciling evolution with the Christian doctrine of humanity created 'in the image of God' and with the traditional understanding of the doctrine of the fall.

See also: ADAM; ANTHROPOLOGY; SCIENCE AND THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

D. Alexander, Creation and Evolution: Do We Have to Choose? (Oxford and Grand Rapids, 2008); R. J. Berry and T. A. Noble, Darwin, Creation and the Fall (Nottingham, 2009); M. C. Cunningham, God and Evolution: A Reader (London and New York, 2007); G. Finlay, S. Lloyd, S. Pattemore and D. Swift, Debating Darwin (Milton Keynes, 2009); K. W. Gibertson, Saving Darwin (New York, 2008); D. N. Livingstone, Darwin's Forgotten Defenders (Grand Rapids and Edinburgh, 1987); E. Lucas, Can We Believe Genesis Today? (Leicester, 2001); S. Myer, Signature in the Cell (New York, 2009); P. Nelson, R. C. Newman and H. J. Van Till, Three Views on Creation and Evolution (Grand Rapids, 1999).

T. A. NOBLE

CREATION-CENTRED SPIRITUALITY

A term originally associated with the work of theologians like Matthew Fox and Thomas Berry, and their dissatisfaction with an over-emphasis in Western theology on the moral categories of fall and redemption, with an accompanying devaluing of *creation and *incarnation. Fox argues that this has engendered an unbiblical dualism between humanity and divinity that alienated people from the natural world, and by differentiating the physical and spiritual aspects of human nature has created much of the ecological, social and personal dysfunction that characterizes contemporary life. A worldview that takes seriously the creation-incarnation axis of biblical teaching would start with 'original blessing' rather than 'original sin', and in doing so can offer reconciliation to a broken world, by recognizing the divine wholeness that already exists ('*panentheism' – God is not exclusively transcendent, but is also immanent in all things), and which invites an affirmation of diversity in people and the natural world. Virtually anything can therefore be regarded as a pathway into God, including the ancient traditions of many peoples as well as contemporary science. In the hands of Matthew Fox, this leads to an inclusive vision of the entire cosmos transformed through a common passion for justice for the natural world as well as for people and systems. It has also been criticized for incorporating a form of *syncretism, and a tendency to downplay the reality of *evil, though Fox denies this.

The notion that God can be found in the natural world as well as through direct revelation is deeply rooted in the Bible, and is also found in the teachings of the Greek Fathers, along with the theories and practices of medieval mystics such as *Hildegard of Bingen, *Thomas Aquinas, Meister Eckhart and Nicholas of Cusa, among others. It is undoubtedly the case that Christians have often used the notion of original sin (not a biblical term) as a form of control, and that the role of the natural world in the divine economy has largely been ignored. The same can be said of mystical experience, which has frequently been marginalized in favour of rational reflection. The rise of Pentecostal theology has to some extent reinstated experience as an authentic vehicle for the Spirit, while Rom. 8:19–23 indicates that concern for the environment (see *Ecology) is intrinsic to a biblical doctrine of salvation. Other questions raised by creation-centred spirituality include the nature of human beings as made in God's image (Gen. 1:27) (see *Image of God), and the role of *imagination and creativity in worship as well as theology.

Bibliography

T. Berry, The Dream of the Earth (San Francisco, 2006); L. Boff, Cry of the Earth, Cry of the Poor (Maryknoll, 1997); J. Drane, 'Matthew Fox', in T. A. Hart (ed.), The Dictionary of Historical Theology (Grand Rapids, 2000); M. Fox, Creation Spirituality (San Francisco, 1991); idem, Original Blessing (New York, 2000); idem, A New Reformation: Creation Spirituality and the Transformation of Christianity (Rochester, 2006).

J. DRANE

CREEDS

A creed (from the Lat. credo, 'I believe') is an authoritative statement of the main articles of the Christian faith to which believers are expected to assent. Broadly speaking, biblical religion has always been credal. Biblical and post-biblical Judaism confessed Yahweh's absolute unity and uniqueness by the Shema: 'Hear, O Israel: the LORD our God, the LORD is one' (Deut. 6:4). The genesis of the church's symbols (as creeds have been called from early times) resides in protocredal statements of faith and worship embedded in the NT (see *Confessions of Faith). With the confession, 'Jesus is Lord' (Rom. 10:9; 1 Cor. 12:3), early Christians acknowledged that the Nazarene was to be spoken of in the same terms as Yahweh of the OT. The text interpolated at Acts 8:37, 'I believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God', represents a primitive Christian baptismal affirmation. Other NT credal formulas affirm Christ's incarnation, saving death and glorious resurrection (Rom. 1:3–4; 1 Cor. 15:3–4; 1 John 4:2). The great Christological passage, Phil. 2:6–11, may have been sung at early Christian baptismal services. 1 Cor. 8:6 affirms the unity of God and the co-ordination of the Father with Jesus Christ. Finally, in the NT a *trinitarian confessional pattern emerged (Matt. 28:19; 2 Cor. 13:14), which became the paradigm for later credal formularies.

The *Apostolic Fathers reflect what J. N. D. Kelly calls 'quasi-credal scraps', and the *apologists a growing corpus of teaching that distills the essence of the Christian faith. What scholars refer to as the Old Roman creed (c. 140, Harnack) was an expanded trinitarian baptismal formula: 'I believe in God the Father Almighty and in Christ Jesus his Son, our Lord, and in the Holy Spirit, the holy Church, and the resurrection of the flesh.’ In the writings of *Irenaeus, *Clement of Alexandria, *Tertullian and *Hippolytus is found the ‘rule of faith’, or ‘the tradition’, which was an informal corpus of teaching provided to catechumens. The so-called Apostles’ Creed, while not apostolic in authorship, is nevertheless apostolic in content. Its present form (eighth century) represents a lengthy development from simpler trinitarian baptismal formulas, particularly the Old Roman creed. The Apostles’ Creed indirectly refuted various heresies (e.g. *Ebionites, *Marcion, *Gnostics, *docetists) and was widely used in the West for instruction and worship. ‘The Creed of creeds’ (P. Schaff, The Creeds of Christendom) contains the fundamental articles of the Christian faith necessary to salvation.

The Creed of Nicaea (325), which was probably based on earlier creeds from Jerusalem and Antioch, was drafted to refute the *Arian claim that the Son was the highest creation of God and thus essentially different from the Father (see *Christology). The Nicene Creed as we know it today represents in effect an enlargement of the teaching of the Creed of 325, probably approved by the Council of *Constantinople (381). It affirms the unity of God, insists that Christ was ‘begotten from the Father before all time’, and declares that Christ is ‘of the same essence [homoousios] as the Father’. Thus the Son is God in every respect. The Creed also upheld the divinity of the *Holy Spirit and his procession from the Father. In the West the phrase ‘who proceeds from the Father’ was later altered to read, ‘from the Father and the Son’. This so-called filioque clause, which affirms the double procession of the Spirit, followed the teaching of *Hilary, *Ambrose, *Jerome and *Augustine and appears in the Athanasian Creed, but was rejected by the Eastern Church (see *Eastern Orthodox theology). It became the major doctrinal issue in the schism between East and West that came to a head in 1054.

The Athanasian Creed, or Quicumque vult (from the opening words of the Latin text), was written by an unknown author in the *Augustinian tradition in Southern Gaul about the mid-fifth century. It contains a clear and concise statement of the Trinity and the *incarnation of Christ, both of which must be believed for salvation. Concerning the Trinity, the Creed affirms that ‘the Father is God, the Son is God, and the Holy Spirit is God; and yet there are not three Gods but one God’. The articles on Christ uphold his eternal generation from the substance of the Father, his complete deity and complete humanity, his death for sins, resurrection, ascension, second coming and final judgment. The East never recognized the Athanasian Creed.

The Chalcedonian Definition was prepared by over 500 Greek bishops at the Council of *Chalcedon in 451. In response to erroneous interpretations of the person of Christ advanced by *Apollinarius, *Nestorius and Eutyches (see *Monophysitism), the Definition states that Jesus Christ is perfectly God and perfectly man, that he is consubstantial with God as to his divinity, and with mankind as to his humanity. Moreover, humanity and deity are joined in the God-man ‘without confusion, without change, without division, without separation’. Chalcedon represents the definitive statement, albeit in Greek ontological language, of how Jesus Christ was God and man at the same time.

Creeds have served a variety of functions in the church. Initially elemental creeds were used in a *baptismal context. By responding to questions or reciting certain formulas which later became fixed, the baptismal candidate made confession of faith in Christ. Moreover, creeds were used for *catechetical purposes, i.e. for instructing new Christians in the essentials of the faith. The creeds (especially the ‘rule of faith’) were also employed for confessional purposes, that is, to refute and expose the heretical teachings of the docetists, Gnostics, *Monarchians, Arians and others. And finally, the creeds served a *liturgical purpose as they were recited at various places in the worship services of the churches.

As for the authority of the creeds, the Eastern Orthodox churches ascribe authority to the decrees of the seven ecumenical *councils, from the First Council of Nicaea (325) to the second at Nicaea (787). The Eastern churches have not accepted the Western doctrinal creeds and reject the filioque addition to the Nicene Creed. Rome, on the other hand, claims infallibility for all the pronouncements of the magisterium. Traditionally, the Apostles’, Nicene and Athanasian creeds were known as ‘the three symbols’. According to Rome, the ancient credal formulas contain truths revealed by God and thus authoritative for all time. The Protestant Reformers accepted the Apostles' Creed and the decrees of the first four councils by virtue of their agreement with Scripture, the only rule of faith and practice. *Luther said of the Apostles' Creed: 'Christian truth could not possibly be put into a shorter and clearer statement' (LW 37, p. 360). *Calvin said of the formulas of the ecumenical councils: 'I venerate them from my heart, and would have all of them held in due honour' (Institutes IV.ix.1). The main branches of *Protestantism value the four creeds discussed above as faithfully embodying the teachings of Scripture. Beginning with A. von *Harnack, critical scholarship has attacked the classical creeds for their reliance upon an alleged alien Greek philosophical system and an outmoded cosmology. Thus Protestants such as *Tillich, *Bultmann and J. A. T. *Robinson claim that the ancient creeds possess little cash value in the modern world. Even Roman Catholics such as H. *Küng and the Dutch compilers of the New Catechism (1966) claim that the creeds are human statements formulated in cultural contexts foreign to our own and are thus beset with serious limitations and even errors.

Orthodox Protestantism views each of the above-mentioned creeds as a norma normata, i.e. as a rule that is ruled by the final authority of the word of God. In general terms, the creeds expound 'what has always been believed, everywhere, and by everyone' (Vincentian Canon; see *Catholicity). But ultimately, even the best human formularies must be ruled by the infallible word of God. In sum, by virtue of their general agreement with Scripture, the orthodox creeds provide a valuable summary of universal Christian beliefs, refute teachings alien to the word of God, and are serviceable in Christian instruction and worship.

See also: CONFESSIONS; COUNCILS.

Bibliography

G. Bray, Creeds, Councils and Christ (Leicester, 1984); P. T. Fuhrmann, Introduction to the Great Creeds of the Church (Philadelphia, 1960); J. N. D. Kelly, The Athanasian Creed (London, 1964); idem, Early Christian Creeds (London, ³1972); J. H. Leith, Creeds of the Churches (Richmond, ³1982); P. Schaff, The Creeds of Christendom, 3 vols. (New York, 1877ff., best edn, 1919).

B. DEMAREST

CREMER, HERMANN (1834–1903)

Hermann Cremer was a Lutheran biblical scholar and theologian with a very wide influence on conservative *Protestant thought in Germany in the latter part of the nineteenth century. Born into a family deeply influenced by the *pietist movement, he moved away from that spirituality towards a more biblicist orientation, especially in his mature years as a professor at Greifswald from 1870. A determined and forceful personality, and a thinker of exceptional cogency, Cremer became a stout opponent of what he regarded as the destructive legacy of the *Enlightenment, rejecting the alliance with human *culture which he found among many contemporary Protestants.

Besides his work on the language of the NT (which bore fruit in his Biblico-Theological Lexicon of New Testament Greek, ET, Edinburgh, 1878, widely used in both Germany and Britain at the end of the nineteenth century), he is remembered particularly for his work on the doctrine of *justification, where he urged a strong doctrine of human *sin and a forensic account of the work of Christ. Cremer was a leading figure in church politics, and deeply influential on pupils and colleagues (notably the biblical and doctrinal theologian Adolf *Schlatter), as much by his character as by his theology. Towards the end of his life he became a noted opponent of *Harnack, then at the height of his influence in German intellectual life.

Bibliography

H. Beintker in TRE 8, pp. 230–236 (with German bibliography); G. Friedrich in TDNT X, pp. 640–650 (on his Lexicon); W. Koepp in RGG 1, cols. 1881–2.

J. B. WEBSTER

CROSS, THEOLOGY OF THE

The term theologia crucis was first used by Martin *Luther to describe his Reformation theology in its early period. It refers not simply to the doctrine of the cross, in which the cross is seen as the focal point of Christ's work of salvation (see *Atonement), but to an understanding of the whole of theology as theology of the cross, in that the cross is seen as the focal point of God's revelation of himself and therefore as the foundation and centre of all truly Christian theology. In the theology of the cross, the cross becomes a methodological key to the whole of theology. In Luther's epigram: Crux probat omnia ('the cross is the criterion of all things', Weimarer Ausgabe 5, p. 179). Hence Luther could claim that 'the cross alone is our theology' (p. 176), a claim which recalls Paul's words (1 Cor. 2:2) in a passage which was of fundamental significance for Luther's concept of a theology of the cross (1 Cor. 1–2).

In the Heidelberg Theses (1518) Luther contrasted his theologia crucis with the theology of glory (theologia gloriae), a term which sums up his objections to late medieval *scholastic theology. The two terms represent two approaches to the *knowledge of God: the theologian of glory perceives the glory of God – his power, wisdom and goodness, manifest in the works of creation; while the theologian of the cross perceives God hidden in the suffering and humiliation of the cross. Luther does not deny that there is a natural knowledge of God to be had from the created world (see *Natural theology), but in the soteriological context in which he insists that our knowledge of God must belong, it is useless. Indeed, it can be worse than useless, because the sinner distorts it to create an idol who supports his own attempts at self-justification by moral and intellectual achievement. But in God's revelation of himself in the cross, God shatters human preconceptions of divinity and human illusions about how God may be known. In the cross God is not revealed in the power and glory which natural reason can recognize as divine, but in the very opposite of divinity, in human disgrace, poverty, suffering and death, in what seem to us weakness and foolishness. Paradoxically, therefore, Luther says that God is hidden in this revelation (see *Hidden and revealed God), because he is not here immediately recognizable as God, but can be perceived only by faith. To recognize God in the crucified Christ is to realize that God is not truly knowable by those who pride themselves on their progress towards divine wisdom and goodness, but can only be known at the point where human wisdom is silenced and human ethical achievements are worthless.

Finally, it is important for Luther's concept of the theology of the cross that the humiliation and suffering of Christ, in which God hides his revelation, correspond to the humiliation and suffering of the sinner, for whom God conceals his real work (opus proprium) of salvation behind his strange work (opus alienum) of humiliation, which furthers it. Only the humbled sinner, struck down by the experience Luther calls Anfechtung ('spiritual conflict') can know the God who for his justification underwent the humiliation and condemnation of the cross. Hence Luther, in a famous sentence, insisted on the experiential basis of the theology of the cross, against any purely speculative theology: 'Living, or rather dying and being damned make a theologian, not understanding, reading or speculating' (Weimarer Ausgabe 5, p. 163).

The central and critical role of the cross in Christian theology has rarely been perceived as clearly as it was by Luther, but in modern times theologians as diverse as K. *Barth, K. *Rahner, J. *Moltmann and E. *Jüngel have attempted to do justice to it, and in some respects have pressed it further than Luther. In particular, they and others have sought to revise our (and the theological tradition's) preconceptions of God in the light of the cross. Barth, for example, insists that it is in the humiliation of the cross that Christ's divinity is most fully revealed. In the humanity, lowliness and suffering of the cross, the true God truly expresses his divine nature, which is his freedom to love humanity in this way, by contrast with all the false gods who cannot do so. A strong tradition of English theology in the twentieth century, as well as other theologians such as the Japanese Lutheran Kazoh Kitamori (1916–98), have argued that the cross is not taken seriously until a doctrine of God's suffering love replaces the traditional notion of divine *impassibility.

Two of the most notable recent attempts to develop a theology of the cross are Moltmann's (in The Crucified God) and Jüngel's (in God as the Mystery of the World). Moltmann, whose treatment owes much to Luther, aims to recover 'the profane horror and godlessness of the cross' from behind its religious interpretations. Jesus' godforsaken death is to be understood as the loving solidarity of the incarnate Son of God with godless and godforsaken men and women. Here, as in Luther, God is revealed in his opposite – in abandonment by God – because he is love which identifies with what is alien. But the implications of this revelation of God in the cross Moltmann wishes to pursue as far as 'a revolution in the concept of God', rejecting all notions of God not derived from the cross. The death of Jesus, as death, not of God, but in God, as an event between God and God, in which God abandons God to death, makes it necessary to conceive of God in terms of a *trinitarian history. The cross is the event of God's love in which the Son suffers abandonment by the Father, the Father suffers the death of the Son, and the Holy Spirit is the powerful love which spans the gulf between Father and Son and so reaches god-forsaken humanity. Thus Moltmann finds a consistent theologia crucis to require both a trinitarian doctrine of God and a doctrine of divine passibility, and further claims that such a theologia crucis thereby opens a way through the impasse of both metaphysical *theism and *atheism in the face of the problem of *suffering. Rather similarly, Jüngel makes the cross the starting point for a trinitarian understanding of God which transcends the modern dispute between metaphysical theism and atheism.

Bibliography

E. Jüngel, God as the Mystery of the World (Edinburgh, 1983); A. E. McGrath, Luther's Theology of the Cross (Oxford, 1985); J. Moltmann, The Crucified God (London, 1974); W. von Loewenich, Luther's Theology of the Cross (Belfast, 1976).

R. J. BAUCKHAM

CULLMANN, see SALVATION-HISTORY

CULTS, see NEW RELIGIONS; SECTS

CULTURAL THEORY AND THEOLOGY

The concept of *culture began to develop at the end of the nineteenth century and into the twentieth. It is more accurate to think of this in terms of a multiplicity of concepts as scholars have defined and understood cultures through different analytical lenses. The following are especially noteworthy.

Functionalist approaches are common in definitions of culture. Functionalism understands culture as that which is comprised of various elements that are structurally integrated to form a whole that then provides a functional order working for the best of the individual and society.

Structuralist approaches are exemplified in the work of Claude Lévi-Strauss, the father of modern *anthropology. *Structuralism draws heavily upon an application of linguistic theory. It understands culture as a system of signs, and is concerned with uncovering the structures that generate the patterns that make up a society.

Another worth considering is the worldview approach. This includes a certain set of cognitive presuppositions about the construction of reality. The worldview approach involves various assumptions: that worldview is the primary foundation of culture; that culture is related to certain basic philosophical categories; that cultural order is primarily cognitive; that human beings have a strong drive for *rational order and consistency; and that humans act rationally, given their cognitive assumptions. The worldview approach to culture is a common one among *evangelicals.

Considering the different approaches to studying culture, the following are common elements in defining it: culture is acquired through a process of learning, but it should not be understood as being purely cognitive; it is shared by members of a society; it is comprised of *symbols and meanings; and it involves structure and patterns.

*Theology relates to culture in that it involves a message that must be understood in differing cultural contexts, both the original cultural contexts of the biblical texts (Ancient Near Eastern and first-century Palestine) as well as the contemporary cultural contexts. Theology is also related to culture as it is communicated cross-culturally. Understood in this sense, it is better to think of cultural theories and theologies as different cultural ways of understanding, meaning-making and concerns, necessitating the development, expression and communication of diverse theologies for various cultural contexts.

H. Richard *Niebuhr's Christ and Culture has been influential among Christians in charting a relationship between theology and culture. His volume articulated five ways of viewing the relationship, to include 'Christ against Culture', 'Christ of Culture', 'Christ above Culture', 'Christ and Culture in Paradox' and 'Christ the Transformer of Culture'. Although influential, Niebuhr's approach has been the subject of significant critique.

Missionaries and *missiologists have often been at the forefront of developing and communicating theologies tailored for specific cultures. In the history of Christian missions the goal has often been to develop theologies within a particular culture and which best connect with its members. This type of theologizing has been labelled variously, including *contextualization', 'inculturation', 'localization' and 'indigenization'. More recently the term 'incarnational' has been used, as theologians and missiologists base their theological method within culture on the *incarnation of Christ, communicating transcendent theological ideas within a specific cultural context.

Contextual theology or local theology can be defined as 'the dynamic interaction among gospel, church, and culture' (Schreiter, Constructing Local Theologies, p. 22). This process begins 'with the opening of a culture, that long and careful listening to a culture to discover its principal values, needs, interests, directions, and symbols' (ibid., p. 28). Pastors, theologians and missiologists then shape theologies to best communicate within a culture.

Finally, changing global dynamics impact the development of theologies in relation to culture. This includes the process of *globalization, the changing face of Christianity with the shift of vitality and growth from the global North to the South and East, as well as the interactions of Christians with adherents of non-Christian religions (see *Christianity and other religions).

Bibliography

C. Geertz, The Interpretation of Cultures (New York, 1973); P. Jenkins, The Next Christendom: The Coming of Global Christianity (Oxford, 2011); C. Klassen, Religion and Popular Culture: A Cultural Studies Approach (Ontario, 2014); C. Kraft, Christianity in Culture: A Study in Dynamic Biblical Theologizing in Cross-Cultural Perspective (Maryknoll, 1979); G. Lynch, Understanding Theology and Popular Culture (Malden, 2005); H. R. Niebuhr, Christ and Culture (New York, 2001 [1951]); C. Ott and H. Netland, Globalizing Theology: Belief and Practice in an Era of World Christianity (Grand Rapids, 2006); L. Sanneh, Whose Religion Is Christianity? The Gospel beyond the West (Grand Rapids, 2003); R. Schreiter, Constructing Local Theologies (Maryknoll, 2002); K. Tanner, Theories of Culture: A New Agenda for Theology (Minneapolis, 1997).

J. W. MOREHEAD

CULTURE

'Culture' derives from the Latin colere, 'to cultivate', originally associated with agriculture and animal husbandry. It concerns the activity as well as the products of world-building, whereby the natural world is refashioned into one more fit for human habitation. More precisely, culture refers to the world of human making – a symbolic and concrete social order – regarded as an essentially meaning-making enterprise: 'man is . . . suspended in webs of significance he himself has spun' (C. Geertz, The Interpretation of Cultures, p. 5).

Culture in the Bible

In Christian theology, culture seldom received extensive attention as such before the nineteenth century. Several factors may account for this. First, no precise equivalent OT or NT term exists: kosmos, 'world', is its closest approximation, but with only neutral (John 21:25; 1 Cor. 14:10) or negative (Gal. 6:14; 1 John 2:15–17) connotations. Thus culture often goes untreated by biblical theology (summarizing scriptural teaching principally according to its idiomatic categories). Nonetheless, the creational accounts portray the cultivation of community and the earth's latent potential as components of humanity's calling to image and serve God (Gen 1:26 – 2:4; 2:15–24), a motif called 'the cultural mandate'. Culture's positive, ante-penultimate value in God's redeeming purposes is seen in the doctrines of (1) the *incarnation of Christ (redemptively embracing humanity and the world as a dwelling-place for God, John 1:1–14); (2) ecclesiology (Pentecost beginning to undo humankind's fragmentation occasioned by defiance of the cultural mandate at Babel, Gen. 11:1–8; Acts 2, and the translational mode of mission and Christian formation, Acts 15:1–35) (see *Church); and (3) *eschatology (the nations' cultural gifts purged of all evil and preserved in some fashion in the ultimate order of life with God in the renewed heavens and earth, Rev. 21:1 – 22:5).

Secondly, while theology is always shaped by specific socio-historical circumstances, a long-held, mistaken view of objective understanding as eliminating cultural conditioning led to widespread underestimation of culture's influence and value. Contemporary trends related to *globalization, the increasingly influential *postmodern outlook in many quarters, and the location of the church's most rapid growth centres in the global South now require a direct engagement with culture.

The culture concept

Culture, according to anthropology's nineteenth-century founder, is 'that complex whole which includes knowledge, belief, art, morals, custom, and any other capabilities and habits acquired by man as a member of society' (E. B. Tylor, Primitive Culture, p. 1). Two evangelical benchmark statements assume this classical definition. The Willowbank Report (1978) defines culture as 'an integrated system of beliefs (about God, or reality, or ultimate meaning), of values (about what is true, good, beautiful, and normative), of customs (how to behave, relate to others, talk, pray, dress, work, play, trade, farm, eat, etc.), and of institutions which express these beliefs, values and customs (governments, law, courts, temples or churches, family, schools, hospitals, factories, shops, unions, clubs, etc.), which bind a society together and give it a sense of identity, dignity, security, and continuity'. The *Lausanne Covenant (1974) maintains the biblical tension of affirmation and critique: 'because man is God's creature, some of his culture is rich in beauty and goodness. Because he is fallen, all of it is tainted with sin and some of it is demonic.'

This approach casts culture as a largely unitary, coherent entity: ideas, practices and structures that a population universally maintains. Social scientific study of late modern societies, manifesting diversities of various kinds, challenges this view. Such accounts stress contradictions within traditions, societal divisions and the power and economic interest-driven character of human interaction. Meanwhile, globalizing structures introduce and accelerate interchange among all locales within their networks.

This multiplicity within and between societies indicates that cultures associated with ethnic groups and national polities are not static, singular systems, but rather, relatively fluid, hybrid sets. *Niebuhr's fivefold typology of the Christ-culture relationship (opposition, agreement, synthesis, dualism, conversion) is problematic not only because it construes cultures as monolithic, but also because historical communities continually reassess, debate and adapt inherited traditions, borrowing from elsewhere to address emergent needs. More complex, dynamic, and nuanced analyses are needed.

Theological analysis of culture

For theological analysis of cultural phenomena,

two definitions from cultural theory provide helpful direction: culture refers to 'a particular way of life, whether of a people, a period or a group'; and it can be examined as 'a signifying system through which a social order is communicated, reproduced, experienced and explored' (R. Williams, Keywords, p. 90). Cultural products and practices resemble texts and can be exegeted similarly. A theological interpretation investigates the explicit and implicit claims, values, and functions a particular item exemplifies (e.g. according to its producers, distributors, users) in the context of members' self-understood 'way of life' and as related to the wider society. A multiperspectival 'thick description' (Williams, The Sociology of Culture, p. 13) of a work's many aspects must include the theological dimension – identifying and interacting with its ultimate concern, its religious import – to be complete.

Gospel, church and cultures

Theology's task does not end with analyses of current phenomena. While the gospel seeks to make its home in every cultural system and finds resonances there, a culture's redemption also requires the correction and reconfiguration of specific sociocultural values and practices in accordance with the *gospel (the 'indigenizing' and 'pilgrim principles', A. F. Walls, The Missionary Movement in Christian History, p. 9).

Thus, theological reflection continually returns to Scripture as its creative catalyst and norm (the decisive criterion for weighing claims from church tradition, reason and experience). A deepening, detailed grasp of biblical teaching (both parts and whole) is paramount for paradigmatic ethical reasoning as well as for theological understanding. The Scriptures, of course, brim with diverse examples, each implementing a measure of redemption within its concrete social and redemptive-historical situation. One helpful proposal suggests that comparative biblical-theological analysis can lend additional clarity regarding what can and cannot be ascribed to the 'redemptive movement' toward an 'ultimate' (eschatological) social ethic that the Scriptures display (which contemporary interpreters are to extend in their own contexts). A more systematic use of cultural analysis and intracanonical criteria (tracing texts' connections to patterns of coherence, discontinuity and development related to the unfolding biblical storyline) may further distinguish the consistent and the more contingent within the body of scriptural teaching concerning a given practice (see *Hermeneutics).

Theological-ethical discernment about one's own sociocultural world grows in proportion to awareness of its differences from the characteristic patterns of canonical teaching. Since every culture is contingent, human theological judgments and the statements, acts and products they generate (themselves enculturated) are, at best, partial, provisional grasps of the realities to which the Scriptures attest. All human activity thus requires critical examination and further refinement. The ultimate realization and regathering 'in Christ' of the new humanity, and the truth and goodness of its multicultural inheritance, are prefigured and presently tasted only as Christians intentionally press beyond instinctual ethnocentrism to engage in cross-cultural, multiethnic fellowship, offering their varied gifts and openheartedly receiving from one another whatever proves 'right, whatever is pure, whatever is lovely, whatever is admirable' (Phil. 4:4), sifted in the light of the cross of Jesus Christ, the risen, reigning Lord.

See also: CULTURAL THEORY AND THEOLOGY; SOCIETY, THEOLOGY OF.

Bibliography

P. Berger and T. Luckmann, The Social Construction of Reality (New York, 1967); C. Geertz, The Interpretation of Cultures (New York, 1973); P. Jenkins, The Next Christendom (New York, 2002); Lausanne Theology and Education Group, 'The Willowbank Report' (Wheaton, 1978); A. MacIntyre, After Virtue (Notre Dame, 1984); R. J. Mouw, When the Kings Come Marching In (Grand Rapids, 1983); R. J. Mouw and S. Griffioen, Pluralisms and Horizons (Grand Rapids, 1993); H. R. Niebuhr, Christ and Culture (New York, 1956); L. Sanneh, Translating the Message (Maryknoll, 1989); E. Y. Sung, 'Culture and Hermeneutics', in K. Vanhoozer (ed.), Dictionary for Theological Interpretation of the Bible (Grand Rapids, 2006); P. Tillich and R. C. Kimball, Theology of Culture (New York, 1959); E. B. Tylor, Primitive Culture (New York, 1877); K. J. Vanhoozer, 'Everyday Theology', in K. Vanhoozer (ed.), Everyday Theology (Grand Rapids, 2006); A. F. Walls, The Missionary Movement in Christian History (Maryknoll, 1996); W. J. Webb, Slaves, Women and Homosexuals: The Hermeneutics of Cultural Analysis (Downers Grove, 2001); R. Williams, Keywords (New York, 1985); idem, The Sociology of Culture (New York, 1982); N. J. Wolterstorff, 'Suffering, Power, and Privileged Cognitive Access', in D. Hoekema and B. Fong (ed.), Christianity and Culture in the Crossfire (Grand Rapids, 1997); C. J. H. Wright, Old Testament Ethics for the People of God (Downers Grove, 2004); J. H. Yoder, 'How H. Richard Niebuhr Reasoned', in G. Stassen, D. M. Yeager and J. H. Yoder (eds.), Authentic Transformation (Nashville, 1996).

E. Y. SUNG

CYPRIAN (c. 200–58)

Latin Church Father, and Bishop of Carthage from about 249 until his death, Cyprian was a pagan who was converted to Christianity in middle age and quickly rose to the office of bishop. He was well educated and a gifted speaker, able to unite and inspire a church which was undergoing severe persecution. Cyprian himself fled to safety in 250, but this left him ill-prepared to deal with the rigorist element in the church, which demanded that no concessions be made to backsliders. Cyprian disagreed, and began to preoccupy himself with the underlying issues of church order which had surfaced during the controversy.

His writings are less voluminous than those of *Augustine and less varied than those of *Tertullian, but they are an important source for our knowledge of the period and its problems. Cyprian's lasting importance for theology lies in his 'high' view of the *church, which he developed to counter the *schismatic tendencies which were latent in North Africa. He held an advanced theory of apostolic succession, and was insistent in demanding that his rights as a bishop be respected, ceding his authority to no-one, not even to the bishop of Rome (see *Church government; *Ministry). He was also determined to insist that outside the church there is no salvation (extra ecclesiam nulla salus), and he presided over the Council of Carthage (256), which expressly decreed that schismatic and heretical *baptisms were invalid (see *Rebaptism). This decision was repudiated by Rome, and is not held today, but it was typical of the rigorous outlook of the North African Church. Cyprian is an important witness to infant baptism, whose necessity he linked to original sin, and to the application of priestly and sacrificial terms to the ministry and sacraments of the church.

Cyprian might have been forced, ironically, into schism with Rome had it not been for a renewed outbreak of persecution, which claimed his life, and perhaps that of the bishop of Rome as well. After his death, Cyprian became the patron saint of the North African church, and the authority to whom later rigorists and schismatics, notably the *Donatists, would appeal.

Bibliography

Works: A. Brent (ed. and tr.), St Cyprian of Carthage: Selected Treatises (New York, 2007); idem, St Cyprian of Carthage: Selected Letters (New York, 2007); P. Campbell (ed.), The Complete Works of Saint Cyprian (Sydney, 2013).

Studies: A. Brent, Cyprian and Roman Carthage (Cambridge, 2010); P. Hinchliff, Cyprian of Carthage (London, 1974); G. S. M. Walker, The Churchmanship of St Cyprian (London, 1968).

G. L. BRAY

CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA (375–444)

Born and raised in Alexandria, Cyril succeeded his uncle Theophilus (fl. 385–412) as bishop of the city in 412. His early career (412–28) was dedicated to the exposition of the Scriptures and the refutation of heretics and unbelievers. The second period of his episcopate (428–33), more intense and fruitful than any other, was marked by his opposition to *Nestorius. Cyril's stand, strengthened by his alliance with the Church of Rome, led to the summoning of the Council of *Ephesus (431) which ended with Nestorius' condemnation. The last period of Cyril's life (433–44), was reasonably peaceful, though he had to explain his teaching to critics from both the *Alexandrian and the *Antiochene sides.

Cyril was a prolific writer who wrote in Attic Greek and had an extensive knowledge of the classics, the Scriptures and the Fathers, especially *Athanasius and the Cappadocians. His many commentaries demonstrate his biblical orientation. He employed the typological and historical methods of interpretation which are most clearly set out in his writings, On Worship in Spirit and in Truth and the Glaphyra on the Pentateuch. Cyril's anti-heretical dogmatic works are numerous, the most substantial being: Thesaurus on the Holy and Consubstantial Trinity, Dialogues on the Holy and Consubstantial Trinity, and Five Books of Negation against Nestorius' Blasphemies. In the last-named he argues for a true and personal (kath'hypostasin) union of the divine Logos/Son with the flesh born from Mary, against Nestorius' Christology based on a conjunction between the divine Logos and the man born from Mary. Cyril also argues for two births of one and the same (divine) Son, one (divine) in eternity and one (human) in time, whereas Nestorius' argument implies two sons, one divine and one human, who are conjoined in Christ.

Cyril also wrote many homilies, and about seventy of his letters are extant. Some of these played a central role in the conflict with Nestorius (see T. H. Bindley, rev. by F. W. Green, The Oecumenical Documents of the Faith, London, 1950, and L. R. Wickham, Cyril of Alexandria: Select Letters, Oxford, 1983).

Cyril is one of the most distinguished theologians of the early church, recognized by his contemporaries and his successors in the East (Chalcedonian Orthodox and anti-Chalcedonian *monophysites) and in the West (Roman Catholics and Protestants). He is the first Father to establish firmly the *patristic argument, which appeals to the earlier Fathers of the church for the right understanding of the apostolic preaching and the gospel of Christ.

Following Athanasius and the Cappadocians, Cyril accepted the Nicene homoousios, the three hypostaseis* of the Father, the Son and Holy Spirit and the unity of the divine ousia (see *Substance) seen in the three hypostaseis and expressed in their common will and activity. He is not as original in the content of his triadology as in the presentation of it, and he is not so much interested in the 'essential *Trinity' as in the 'economic', because of his soteriological interest which he inherited from Athanasius. As far as the essential Trinity is concerned, Cyril emphasizes both the coinherence of the three hypostaseis or persons and the primacy of the Father from whom the Son is born and the Spirit proceeds. But Cyril does speak of the procession of the Spirit from both the Father and the Son, not, however, with reference to the hypostasis of the Spirit, but with reference to the common essence of the Spirit with the Father and the Son.

*Christology is the key to Cyril's theology and the topic to which his contribution became decisive for the early church and subsequent generations. His terminology initially presented certain problems, because it was flexible and equivocal, but his thought was clear and helped to clarify and eventually settle problems relating to linguistic formulations. He followed Athanasius' principle that theological disputations were not about terms, but about the meaning embedded in them. This is why Cyril could use the term physis (nature) as equivalent to both hypostasis or person and ousia, and so speak of 'one nature of God the Word incarnate' and 'one person of God the Word in (from) two natures'. Thus it is unfair to argue that he changed his mind in Christology from a *monophysite to a dyophysite standpoint. Cyril has been unfairly accused of *Apollinarianism both by his Nestorian opponents and by modern patristic scholars who wish to stress the humanity (or, specifically, the psychology) of Christ almost independently of the Logos/Son of God. Equally unfair is the modernist charge that Cyril's Christology is only a Christology 'from above'. The doctrine of the two births of Christ does not imply the either/or of the schema 'from below' and 'from above', but brings the two together in the mystery of Immanuel, his *kenosis, his economy, his hypostatic union of two natures, his communication of idioms (properties) and, above all, in his virgin mother who is true theotokos (see *Mary).

Cyril understands *salvation in terms of both participation in and imitation of the human nature in relation to the divine nature, objectively in Christ and subjectively appropriated by human beings through the Holy Spirit who acts in and through the sacraments (for his eucharistic doctrine, see Ezra Gebremedhin, Life-Giving Blessing, Uppsala, 1977). The objective aspect of salvation in Christ is particularly stressed in his doctrine of justification of grace, developed in a masterly way in his evangelical interpretation of the law in On Worship in Spirit and in Truth.

Cyril's theological legacy has been influential in all Christian contexts in the East and in the West. A contemporary positive reassessment of this legacy would prove especially beneficial for the current ecumenical dialogue, since it affirms the basic dogmatic perceptions of classical Christianity.

Bibliography

Works listed in CPG III, nos. 5200–5438, and, with secondary literature, in J. Quasten, Patrology, vol. 3 (Utrecht, 1960), pp. 116–142.

Selected studies: A. M. Bermejo, The Indwelling of the Holy Spirit According to St Cyril of Alexandria (Oña, Spain, 1963); essays on Cyril's Christology by J. N. Karmiris, J. S. Romanides, V. C. Samuel, in Does Chalcedon Divide or Unite? (Geneva, 1981); C. Dratsellas, Questions of the Soteriological Teaching of the Greek Fathers with Special Reference to St Cyril of Alexandria (dissertation, Edinburgh, 1967), in Theologia 38 (1967), pp. 579–608, 39 (1968), pp. 192–230, 394–424, 621–643; A. Grillmeier, Christ in Christian Tradition, vol. 1 (London, 1975); F. J. Houdek, Contemplation in the Life and Works of St Cyril of Alexandria (unpub. dissertation, University of California, Los Angeles, 1979); A. Kerrigan, Cyril of Alexandria, Interpreter of the Old Testament (Rome, 1952); J. McGuckin, Cyril of Alexandria and the Christological Controversy (New York, 2004); S. A. McKinion, Words, Imagery, and the Mystery of Christ (Leiden, 2000); T. F. Torrance, Theology in Reconciliation (London, 1975); T. G. Weinandy and D. E. Keating, St Cyril of Alexandria (London, 2003).

G. D. DRAGAS

DABNEY, ROBERT LEWIS (1820–98)

A leading Southern Presbyterian theologian, educator, author and social critic, who taught for many years at Union Theological Seminary, Richmond, Virginia. Dabney firmly adhered to the conservative Calvinist 'Old School' tradition of American *Presbyterianism. His popular textbook, Lectures in Systematic and Polemic Theology (1878; repr. Edinburgh, 1985), owes much to the writings of *Calvin, the British *Puritans and especially the *Westminster Confession of Faith. His approach to the philosophical and theological currents of his day is influenced by Scottish *common-sense realism.

Dabney's exposition of such topics as the decrees of God (see *Predestination), *sovereignty and responsibility, the imputation of *sin and *eschatology is marked by the same non-speculative sobriety of statement found in the Westminster Standards. He gave much attention to *anthropology, particularly human psychology and the proper organization of social institutions. He endeavoured throughout to base his theology on the clear meaning of relevant texts of Scripture.

See also: PRINCETON THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

Works: Discussions, 4 vols. (1890–97), repr. as Discussions: Evangelical and Theological, 2 vols. (London, 1967); Discussions: Philosophical and Discussions: Secular (Harrisonburg, 1980 and 1979); The Practical Philosophy (repr. Harrisonburg, 1984 [1897]).

Studies: T. C. Johnson, The Life and Letters of Robert Lewis Dabney (repr. Edinburgh, 1977 [1903]); D. F. Kelly, 'Robert Lewis Dabney', in D. F. Wells (ed.), Reformed Theology in America (Grand Rapids, 1985); S. M. Lucas, Robert Lewis Dabney: A Southern Presbyterian Life (Phillipsburg, 2005); M. H. Smith, Studies in Southern Presbyterian Theology (Jackson, 1962).

D. F. KELLY

DALE, R. W., see CONGREGATIONALISM

DARBY, JOHN NELSON (1800–82)

The Anglo-Irish Darby was a founding father of the Brethren movement, a formative influence on modern forms of *dispensationalism, and an influential exponent of premillennialism (see *Millennium). While serving as curate in the Church of Ireland at Calary, Co. Wicklow, he became disillusioned with the establishment and started to associate with those of separatist tendency in the late 1820s. He developed distinctive views, particularly on the 'ruin of the church' as a structured body. He taught the duty of believers to gather for unstructured worship associated with 'breaking bread', to preach the gospel to unbelievers, and to lead lives of sacrificial devotion to Christ in expectation of his second coming (which would be preceded by the 'secret rapture' of believers).

In 1845 Darby broke with B. W. Newton (1807–99) of Plymouth and in 1848–9 with George Müller (1805–98) and Henry Craik (1805–66) of Bristol, leading to permanent division between those Brethren who followed him ('Exclusives') and those who did not ('Open'). Despite their turgid style, his voluminous writings on controversial, expository, doctrinal, apologetic and devotional themes have attracted both readers and popularizers (notably C. H. Mackintosh, 1820–96). His Bible translations in German, French and English reflect serious scholarship. Darby travelled extensively in Western Europe and, later, in North America, the West Indies and New Zealand. Though his ecclesiology has had little influence beyond the Exclusive Brethren, his *eschatology has attracted much support, particularly in North America.

Bibliography

Works: Collected Writings of J. N. D., 34 vols., ed. W. Kelly (London, 1867–1900; repr. Winschoten, Holland, 1971); Letters of J. N. D[arby], 3 vols. (Kingston-on-Thames, n.d.).

Studies: J. D. Burnham, A Story of Conflict (Carlisle, 2004); T. Grass, Gathering to His Name: The Story of Open Brethren in Britain and Ireland (Bletchley, 2006); H. H. Rowdon, The Origins of the Brethren 1825–1850 (London, 1967); M. S. Weremchuk, John Nelson Darby (Neptune, 1992); P. Wilkinson, For Zion's Sake: Christian Zionism and the Role of John Nelson Darby (Carlisle, 2007).

H. H. ROWDON

DARWINISM, see CREATION; CREATION AND EVOLUTION

DEATH

In biblical usage the word has four main senses. Physical death generally denotes the irreversible cessation of bodily functions (2 Sam. 14:14; Rom. 6:23; Heb. 9:27), but occasionally the gradual weakening of physical powers (2 Cor. 4:12, 16). Spiritual death describes man's natural alienation from God, his lack of responsiveness to God, or his hostility to God, because of sin (Gen. 2:17; Matt. 8:22; John 5:24–25; 8:21, 24; Rom. 6:23; Eph. 2:1; Jas 5:20; Jude 12; Rev. 3:1). The 'second death' refers to the permanent separation from God that is the destiny of the unrighteous (Matt. 10:28; Rev. 2:11; 20:6, 14–15; 21:8). Death to sin involves the suspension of all relations with sin that results from being alive to God through dying and rising with Christ (Rom. 6:4, 6, 11).

By divine decree, physical and spiritual death is the consequence and penalty of sin (Ezek. 18:4, 20; Rom. 5:12; 6:23; 7:13; Eph. 2:1, 5) and is the common lot of mankind because all have sinned (Josh. 23:14; 1 Kgs 2:2; Eccl. 9:5; Rom. 5:12; Heb. 9:27). Man and woman were not created unable to die but were created able not to die, although after the fall death became a universal biological necessity. God takes no pleasure in death (even of the wicked, Ezek. 18:23), yet premature death may be the result of divine displeasure (Ps. 55:23; 1 Cor. 11:29–30).

So pervasive and devastating is the influence of death that the NT can depict death as a realm where the devil reigns (Heb. 2:14; Rev. 1:18; 20:13), as a warrior bent on destruction (Acts 2:24; 1 Cor. 15:26; Rev. 6:8; 20:14), or as a domineering ruler (Rom. 5:14, 17). But by his death and resurrection, Christ robbed death of its power (Rom. 6:9; 14:9; Col. 1:18; 2 Tim. 1:10) and emancipated its captives (Rom. 8:2, 38–39; 1 Cor. 3:21–22; Heb. 2:14–15; Rev. 1:18), and through his second advent it will be finally destroyed (1 Cor. 15:23–26, 54–55; Rev. 20:14; 21:4).

Christians view physical death as a destructive force, because through it the bodily tent is permanently dismantled (2 Cor. 5:1) or stripped off (2 Pet. 1:14) and all links with the securities of earthly existence are severed (2 Sam. 12:23); there is a loss of physical corporeality and corporateness. Yet, positively, death may be seen as God's reclaiming of the breath of life (Ps. 104:29; Eccl. 12:7), as resting from one's labours (Rev. 14:13), as the surrender of the spirit into divine hands (Luke 23:46; Acts 7:59), or as the believer's departure from this life (Luke 2:29; 2 Tim. 4:6; 2 Pet. 1:15) to the immediate presence of the Lord (2 Cor. 5:8; Phil. 1:23; contrast with this Pss 6:5; 88:5), where the believer enjoys an enriched form of the intimate fellowship with Christ enjoyed on earth. Through resurrection the believer becomes immortal (Luke 20:35–36; John 11:25–26; 1 Cor. 15:52–54). That is, he or she becomes immune from any type of decay or death through a direct sharing in the life of God who alone is inherently immortal (1 Tim. 6:16). The Christian's attitude to physical death is therefore ambivalent; it should be neither welcomed nor feared.

The imminent advent of death or uncertainty about the time of death ought to prompt *repentance and preparation to meet God (2 Kgs 20:1; Luke 12:16–20), for death terminates all opportunity to repent (Heb. 9:27).

The Roman Catholic and Eastern Orthodox churches teach that after death those who have died in fellowship with the church but who lack Christian perfection enter an intermediate period of suffering in *purgatory that 'purges' them of venial sins and fits them for an eternal life of heavenly bliss with God (2 Macc. 12:39–45). *Luther, on the other hand, taught that at death all remaining traces of original depravity are eradicated from the believer's soul; death marks the final purgation of the soul.

See also: IMMORTALITY; INTERMEDIATE STATE; RESURRECTION, GENERAL.

Bibliography

L. R. Bailey, Sr (ed.), Biblical Perspectives on Death (Philadelphia, 1979); L. O. Mills (ed.), Perspectives on Death (Nashville, 1969); L. Morris, The Wages of Sin: An Examination of the New Testament Teaching on Death (London, 1954); J. Pelikan, The Shape of Death: Life, Death, and Immortality in the Early Fathers (London, 1962); K. Rahner, On the Theology of Death (London, 1972).

M. J. HARRIS

DEATH-OF-GOD THEOLOGY

A short-lived but widely publicized theological trend of the 1960s which took Friedrich *Nietzsche's slogan 'God is dead' as its leitmotiv. It was associated with the writings of Thomas Altizer (b. 1927) and William Hamilton (1924–2012). Altizer argued that God had become fully human in Christ, thereby losing his divine attributes in what can perhaps best be described as an extreme form of *kenoticism. Hamilton said that modern people are no longer able to believe in God, and so the church ought to dispense with him as well. Paul van Buren (1924–98) followed linguistic philosophers in arguing that the concept of God was 'cognitively meaningless' because God's existence is not scientifically verifiable, and therefore belief in him has no solid grounding.

In many ways, the death-of-God movement was an amalgam of currents present in modern neo-Orthodox theologians. Like Karl *Barth in his early commentary on Romans, it held to a radical separation between the divine and the secular spheres, but did not follow Barth's later modifications of this radical position. It also reflected something of his tendency to focus all theological and religious issues on Jesus Christ, but it understood him as a mere human being, whereas Barth always insisted that *Jesus was the incarnate Son of God. From Paul *Tillich it borrowed its prejudice against all forms of personalist and mythological language about *God. From Rudolf *Bultmann it borrowed the idea that objective ontological and dogmatic language about God is meaningless, so that theological language is reduced to language about human self-understanding in the light of Jesus. It was also influenced to some extent by John *Robinson, whose best-selling Honest to God (1963) was largely a popularization of Tillich, and by a particular interpretation of Dietrich *Bonhoeffer, who claimed that the modern world was one in which man had come of age and had to live without God.

The authors of the death-of-God debate are still alive and writing a generation later, but the extent of their influence is difficult to measure. Discontent with the traditional picture of God has become a feature of many left-wing tendencies in Christian theology, but few of these have tried to dispense with him altogether. Concentration on the humanity of Jesus at the expense of his divinity is also widespread in some circles, but most of these tend to assume that Jesus reflects God, not that he has replaced him. Radical *feminists and so-called '*open theists' have both tried to reinvent the Christian doctrine of God to suit their particular emphases, but again, this does not amount to abolishing him altogether. It would seem that theological radicalism has pulled back from this particular extreme, and that those who have been persuaded by it have become straightforward atheists. In retrospect, the death-of-God theology will probably be regarded as a transition from belief to unbelief which affected a certain number of leading intellectuals in the latter part of the twentieth century who continued to regard themselves as 'Christians' in a cultural sense, but who in reality had evacuated the Christian faith of any real meaning.

Bibliography

T. J. J. Altizer, The Gospel of Christian Atheism (Philadelphia, 1966); T. J. J. Altizer and W. Hamilton, Radical Theology and the Death of God (New York, 1966); J. Ice and J. Carey (eds.), The Death of God Debate (Philadelphia, 1967); J. Montgomery, The 'Is God Dead?' Controversy (Grand Rapids, 1966); J. Montgomery and T. J. J. Altizer, The Altizer-Montgomery Dialogue (Chicago, 1967); C. Van Til, Is God Dead? (Philadelphia, 1966).

G. L. BRAY

DECONSTRUCTION

The notion and practice of deconstruction comes to philosophy from French philosopher Jacques *Derrida, though it has multiple origins and its applications range far beyond Derrida's interest. First suggested in his 1967 book Of Grammatology, Derrida envisioned a method of philosophical inquiry that refuses to conform to the metaphysical or logical parameters that have defined philosophy historically. Deconstruction is offered not as a new philosophical system, or even a new methodology, but as a rigorous manner of reading and interpretation. Since its introduction and implementation by Derrida, deconstruction has become a tool utilized in literature, art, theology and a wide range of other disciplines.

Philosophy habitually protects its sacred and vulnerable concepts, ideas that hold together epistemology, politics, ethics and religion. At times, centuries of sedimentation piles atop an original and perhaps questionable concept. Investigating such ideas requires a disregard for the venerated traditions of philosophy. For deconstruction there can be no safe, unquestioned foundation for constructive thought; originary concepts must be discovered and then interrogated. In questioning the 'logos' of Western philosophy, for instance, Derrida knows he may be pulling out the lynchpin for the very structures of truth. He envisions the practice of deconstruction to be simultaneously faithful and violent.

Deconstruction originally evolves out of a method suggested by Martin *Heidegger, Derrida's teacher. Heidegger understood that words and concepts carry unseen baggage, accumulations from culture, accident, tradition, history and the pressures of philosophical systems. Words and concepts do not part easily with these accretions, and the act of investigating and peeling back layers will often threaten the survival of the concept itself. Deconstruction follows, in part, the boldness of Friedrich *Nietzsche, who routinely challenged the sacred nature of philosophy's most guarded ideas.

For Derrida, deconstruction takes the form of intensely careful readings. In the careful examination of a text, deconstructive readers look for small contradictions and unseen dependencies. Contradictions or coincidences, however slight, serve as fissures for pulling apart the seams of an argument. Deconstruction seeks to identify the missing leaps and assumptions that other readings unknowingly presume. There is a leap between every sign and its signifier, between every word and its reception. This slippage in meaning, which Derrida names différance, masquerades as a trivial loss, but may at times unravel the whole system. Attention to the unseen assumptions in an idea may also lead to more faithful understanding.

Bibliography

J. Caputo, Deconstruction in a Nutshell: A Conversation with Jacques Derrida (New York, 1997); J. Derrida, Speech and Phenomena and Other Essays on Husserl's Theory of Signs (Evanston, 1967); idem, Of Grammatology (Baltimore and London, 1967); C. Norris, Deconstruction: Theory and Practice (New York, 2003).

E. SEVERSON

DECREES, see PREDESTINATION

DEIFICATION

Deification, in Gk theosis, is perhaps best expressed in the affirmation made by no small number of Church Fathers, namely that 'God became man so that man might become God'. Predominantly present in the *Eastern Orthodox tradition, deification is at once understood as both a divine gift and the supreme goal of human existence. Biblical support is maintained for this doctrine through appeal to such passages as Ps. 82:6, John 10:34–35 and 2 Pet. 1:4. The expression used by the apostle Peter has become a sort of 'motto' of Orthodox theology's view of deification: to be deified means to become 'partakers of the divine nature'. In the view of the vast majority of Eastern theologians, whether past or present, any interpretation of these passages and these expressions other than an organic, realistic one would represent a negation of Scripture itself.

The concept of theosis is a complex one, being closely linked to a number of key theological terms, and being expressed in terms of a variety of models. We thus find references to deification as adoption, union, participation, fellowship, salvation, and so on. The models of deification to which appeal is most frequently made are the metaphorical, ethical and realist or *ontological models. The last is the one against which Western theologians (both Catholic and Protestant) most frequently raise objections, pointing out that it offers far more than can actually be attained in reality. In essence, this model affirms that human deification is not merely the attempt to grow in semblance to God, that is, to reproduce divine attributes in one's own life by imitation, but presupposes something far beyond this, namely the transformation of human nature along the lines of the Christological model of the *incarnation. Just as Christ assumed a human nature and deified it, in the same way it is possible for a human being to assume the divine nature so as to be deified in a very real sense. Of course, even if the entire deifying process is 'real', this does not mean that any sort of identification with the divine nature takes place. At the end, one still finds that what is in view is an imitation of the divine nature, received by grace. The concepts and language associated with deification appear far too daring to Christian theologians unfamiliar with the mysticism and *asceticism practised in the East. On the other hand, to an Eastern theologian these ideas sound familiar, and also stimulating, for nothing could be greater than to experience deification.

The Eastern theologian's familiarity with the idea of deification stems from the mode in which theology itself is understood in the East. Theology itself is *mystical – that is to say, it has a contemplative aspect, to which the concept and practice of theosis belong. The believer can attain the level of a real, true knowledge of God. In a way that resembles Neo-Platonic (see *Platonism) or Evagrian mysticism, knowledge is understood to have many stages, the last of which is unity with the divinity. Of course, one can never achieve a perfect union, inasmuch as the *knowledge of God is inexhaustible. Nevertheless, God chose to make himself known to humankind, or in other words, to make himself accessible to us. This encourages the mystic to dare to proceed further still, seeking to attain to the more advanced stages of deification.

Essentially, the possibility of human *union with God, or deification in terms of the ontological model, implies the replacement of human activity with the divine for a greater or shorter length of time. Human nature transcends itself, or more precisely, is raised above its natural limits by the deification process. This move beyond the limits of human nature is expressed by *Gregory of Nyssa in terms of epektasis or progress, by Maximus the Confessor in terms of the soul's 'ever-moving rest', and by Gregory *Palamas in terms of the experience of divine light. Although opening itself to suspicions of *pantheism, this approach cannot be accused of identifying Creator and creation in a complete unity. Human participation in the deification process is only by *grace, and not by nature.

See also: CHRISTIAN LIFE; IMAGE OF GOD.

Bibliography

P. M. Collins, Partaking in Divine Nature: Deification and Communion (London, 2010); V. Lossky, The Mystical Theology of the Eastern Church (Crestwood, 1997); N. Russell, The Doctrine of Deification in the Greek Patristic Tradition (Oxford, 2005); A. N. Williams, The Ground of Union: Deification in Aquinas and Palamas (Oxford, 1999).

E. BARTOS

DEISM

Deism is the name given to a movement which started late in the seventeenth century and persisted long into the next, with its programme for replacing traditional by rational religion. It is popularly regarded as belief in a remote creator, uninvolved in the world whose mechanism he devised; but this does not readily serve as a defining or even essential characteristic of the movement. Deism is hard to define, and deists are sometimes hard to identify. Broadly, deism stands for the abolition of *dogma founded on alleged *revelation and promulgated by an authoritarian priesthood such that the principle of rational scrutiny is quashed and its results disavowed. Constructively, deists often sought to promote a natural religion, universally bestowed on humanity by an impartial and benevolent God, its content in conformity with the unchanging moral law. Assault on the principle of revelation in *history (if it proclaims more than what reason can, or does, know independently) and on the claim that it occurred (if founded on belief in *miracles, *prophecies or inerrant *Scripture) was meant to vindicate reason over against superstition. Deists, remarked the English poet John Dryden, are 'rationalists with a heart-hunger for religion'. Prominent representatives included: in England, John Toland (1670–1722), Anthony Collins (1676–1729) and Matthew Tindal (1655–1733); in Germany, Hermann Reimarus (1694–1768); in France, *Voltaire; and in America, Thomas Paine (1737–1809).

Deism has seldom been regarded as of high intellectual calibre; its representatives were commonly outmatched at the level of pure debate. Arguably, however, they drew force from their opposition a defence that would ultimately prove unable to sustain orthodox claims, in the form of concessions (for example) to reason and natural religion. At the least, deism demonstrates what forces were at work in the eighteenth century to undermine classical Christianity. Its perception of God exhibits the revulsion felt at what was perceived to be the primitive deity of the OT and the arbitrary deity of historically particular revelation; its understanding of man indicates the confidence of the day in the sufficiency of rational morality for life and salvation. Its view of *nature illustrates how the stable harmonies in which *Newton had apparently enfolded the world could call forth a non-Christocentric worship of God; its assessment of the clergy shows how the structure of socio-ecclesiastical power revolted a free-thinking fraternity, sick of aggressive dogmatism masquerading as the prime Christian virtue. In the midst of this, the biblical scheme of fall and redemption was dismissed, and its literary presentation regarded as crude, corrupt and variously flawed. Scripture was discredited as the sole, sufficient or necessary foundation of religion.

Deism has long been regarded as a spent force and a non-combatant in twentieth- and twenty-first-century theological battles. Yet it could earmark a set of ideas, such as those involved in the divine perfection or the morality of rational discrimination in religion, which had great potential for overthrowing the traditional scheme. Meeting the thrust if not the actual particulars of the deists' arguments may still promote fruitful reflection on the nature of Christianity.

Bibliography

G. R. Cragg, Reason and Authority in the Eighteenth Century (Cambridge 1964);

J. Redwood, Reason, Ridicule and Religion: The Age of Enlightenment in England, 1660–1750 (London, 1976); L. Stephen, English Thought in the Eighteenth Century, vol. 1 (London, 1962); R. E. Sullivan, John Toland and the Deist Controversy: A Study in Adaptations (Cambridge, 1982).

S. N. WILLIAMS

DEITY OF CHRIST, see CHRISTOLOGY

DEMYTHOLOGIZATION

Rudolf *Bultmann announced his programme of demythologization in a lecture in 1941, 'New Testament and Mythology', and developed it in Jesus Christ and Mythology (1958). He declared: 'We cannot use electric lights and radios and, in the event of illness, avail ourselves of modern medical and clinical means and at the same time believe in the spirit and wonder world of the New Testament.' Although he had reacted against the 'classic' *liberal theology of the *Ritschlian school, like all the theologians of the broader liberal tradition, Bultmann was engaging in an apologetic presentation of the gospel to the era of *modernity. He assumed that modern science ruled out talk of miracles, of another world of spirits, angels and demons, and of a three-storied universe of heaven above, the earth, and hell beneath us. All such language in the Bible was no longer to be taken literally, and we had to recognize frankly that it was *myth.

The programme of demythologization which he proposed was the key feature linking the two sides of his thought. First, it was part of his sceptical view of the historicity of the NT. Not only were miracles such as the virgin birth and resurrection of Jesus ruled out by modern science, but the Gospels had been composed from oral traditions, and these stories took certain typical forms. 'Form criticism' could therefore trace how these had been shaped in the telling, and the Gospels therefore told us much about the theology of the early Christians, but little or nothing dependable about Jesus. But secondly, this fitted neatly with Bultmann's reinterpretation of 'faith' according to the *existentialist philosophy of Martin Heidegger. Faith had nothing to do with believing that certain events had objectively happened. Faith was the decision to live authentically, and it was the kerygma, the proclamation of Jesus as the Christ, which enabled us to come to this existential self-understanding. It was sufficient to know that he lived and was crucified.

Demythologization struck a chord in the mid-twentieth century when Western culture was self-consciously 'modern'. John A. T. *Robinson drew on Bultmann's ideas in his popular presentation of the Christian faith in Honest to God (1963). In The Myth of God Incarnate (1977), edited by John *Hick, a group of scholars used the concept of myth to develop a sophisticated denial of the *incarnation. And although some of Bultmann's former doctoral students rejected his extreme historical scepticism about the NT in their 'New Quest' for the *historical Jesus, they did not differ from him in rejecting *miracles and reinterpreting 'myth'. John Dominic Crossan and the scholars of the Jesus Seminar share the same perspective.

Various criticisms have been made of demythologization. First, Bultmann had a view of science which was already outdated when he was writing. Even the existentialist theologian John *Macquarrie commented, 'He is still obsessed with the pseudo-scientific view of a closed universe that was popular half a century ago', assigning anything which did not fit into that to 'myth' (An Existentialist Theology, London, 1955, p. 168). He shared the *deistic view of high modernity that science prescriptively ruled out any divine 'intervention' in the world. Secondly, and partly arising out of that, he shared the *positivistic historiography which was formulated by Ernst *Troeltsch. History dealt with outward facts which could be objectively determined. Thirdly, it is not always clear exactly what is meant by the word 'myth'. In ancient Greece the word mythos came to mean a tale or story, usually about the gods, which came to be regarded as legendary rather than factual, and was often the basis for religious ritual. But 'myth' can mean any story which explains the origins of anything or expresses a universal truth in story form. It can simply refer to the literary genre or it can be used to imply that it is an imaginary tale which has no basis in historical fact. It is not always clear which of these is in view. Fourthly, although demythologization claimed to keep the kernel of the gospel and throw away the cultural husk, many scholars have judged that it is not true to the gospel as presented in the NT. Oscar Cullmann criticized Bultmann for separating *faith and history, whereas for the NT writers in continuity with the Old, faith was inseparable from God's action in *history (Salvation in History, London, 1967, pp. 138ff., 148ff.). It was a serious misinterpretation to say that their focus was on the existential decision of faith rather than on their claims for the incarnation, death and resurrection of Jesus. Fifthly, existentialist philosophy itself now appears a highly individualistic philosophy of a passing era. Bultmann's interpretation of 'justification by faith' in Heidegger's terms may have seemed relevant and 'modern' at the time, but new 'postmodern' interests in the corporate, in community and indeed in history and language, have blunted its apologetic appeal.

Bibliography

H.-W. Bartsch (ed.), Kerygma and Myth (London, 1972); J. D. G. Dunn, 'Demythologizing – the Problem of Myth in the New Testament', in I. H. Marshall (ed.), New Testament Interpretation (Exeter, 1977); D. Fergusson, Bultmann (London, 1992).

T. A. NOBLE

DEMYTHOLOGIZING, see MYTH

DENNEY, JAMES (1856–1917)

James Denney was born in Paisley, educated at Glasgow University and Free Church College, and became minister of East Free Church, Broughty Ferry (1886–97), before being appointed first to the chair of systematic theology (1897), then NT language, literature and theology (1900), and finally principal of the United Free Church College, Glasgow.

Denney's voluminous literary output and correspondence reveals a man of great spiritual stature, of whom H. R. *Mackintosh said, 'I have never known his equal for making the New Testament intelligible as the record and deposit of an overwhelming experience of redemption.'

Passionate scholarship wedded to a burning conviction about the power of the gospel were hallmarks of a theological position centred on the *atonement. W. Robertson Nicoll (1851–1923) maintains that his wife 'led him into a more pronounced evangelical creed', inducing him to read *Spurgeon, whom he came to admire greatly, and who was instrumental in constraining him to proclaim the atoning death of Christ as the heart of the gospel. The cross became for him the centre of all Christian theology and the heart of all true preaching. He was influenced in some measure, however, by the critical theological spirit of his age: his attitude to matters such as the inspiration and authority of *Scripture (cf. his Studies in Theology), and *confessional subscription, which he proposed should be abandoned in favour of a simple confession of faith in God through Jesus Christ (cf. Jesus and the Gospel), became matters of debate, as did his trinitarian position and his eschatology.

Bibliography

J. M. Gordon, James Denney (Milton Keynes, 2006); J. R. Taylor, God Loves Like That!: The Theology of James Denney (London, 1962), contains complete bibliography.

J. PHILIP

DEPRAVITY, see SIN

DERRIDA, JACQUES (1930–2004)

Jacques Derrida was born into a Sephardic Jewish family in Algeria. He studied and subsequently taught philosophy in Paris, and latterly in America. He was influenced by many figures associated with Continental philosophy, notably Husserl, *Heidegger and *Levinas, but his own influence is most associated with that phenomenon of post-structuralism termed '*deconstruction'. Where structuralism had argued for or assumed stable structures of linguistic meaning, Derrida challenges the notion that there is any stable, fixed meaning.

The father of *structuralism, Ferdinand de Saussure, was interested in how signs signified, and he sought to show that the meaning of a word or phrase is generated by a verbal sign's associations with and differentiations from other verbal signs. But Derrida argues that in this chain of signs, signification is generated not only differentially but is also deferred: one sign in turn signifies another – the signifier becomes the signified – in a potentially temporally infinite series. Derrida calls this 'différance' and suggests thereby both the 'difference' between signs and the 'deferring' of any finally signified 'thing' at which the chain of signs ends. In the jargon of deconstruction, there is neither ‘transcendental signifier’ nor ‘transcendental signified’ external to and upholding the meaning of any chain of signs. Whereas it had once been thought that the possibility of stable meaning was underwritten by reason, truth, God, being or a ‘metaphysics of presence’, this is now ruled out.

Although it is largely ignored by analytic philosophers, Derrida’s work has some similarities to the later *Wittgenstein, and he wrote on speech-act theory in Limited Inc. *Death-of-God theologians were the first to introduce it to Anglophone theology in the 1980s, but since then it has had a widespread influence on *hermeneutics and *systematic theology, especially among those who pursue theologies of correlation.

Bibliography

Works: Of Grammatology (Baltimore and London, 1976); Limited Inc (Illinois, 1988).

Studies: H. Coward and T. Foshay (eds.), Derrida and Negative Theology (Albany, 1992).

A. J. MOORE

DESCARTES, RENÉ (1596–1650)

Descartes, a Frenchman who worked largely in Holland, is often termed the father of modern philosophy. In a bid to reconstruct the foundations of human knowledge, he inaugurated a method of intellectual enquiry whose procedure and results have commanded the attention of generations of successors.

In the Reformation era, the problem of validating claims to knowledge was acutely raised: differing religious convictions, scientific enquiry and the recovery of classical scepticism were all contributory factors. Descartes set about methodically *doubting all and any received certainties in order to discover the criterion and content of indubitable truth. This led him, by arguments that can be both described and assessed in different ways, to formulate the principle: cogito, ergo sum – ‘I think, therefore I am.’ The very act of doubting one’s own existence constitutes a demonstration of that existence, for only an existing self can think or doubt. Once Descartes attained this, he established successively the existence of God and of the external world (cf. *Natural theology). The former is proved in more ways than one: the idea of a perfect being, implied in the knowledge of one’s own imperfection, cannot come from a source other than such a being. Again: as the idea of a triangle contains the equality of its three angles to two right angles, so the idea of a perfect being contains the real existence of God. Further, if (as we can conclude) God is benevolent and not deceitful, we must infer that the world we perceive really exists, for God’s goodness guarantees the correspondence here between what appears and what is the case. Scepticism has been vanquished.

Theologically, important consequences followed from another set of convictions, those pertaining to the relation of mind and body. Descartes was a *dualist, holding that a human being is composed of these two substantially distinct entities (mind, or soul, and body) characterized respectively by thought and extension. Moreover, it is the immaterial soul, not the corporeal body, that constitutes the person. This conviction, quite apart from Descartes’ attempts to expound and defend it, has come in for heavy criticism especially in the philosophy of the twentieth century (see *Anthropology). But some Christian philosophers (e.g. H. D. Lewis, 1910–92) hold that a form of ‘Cartesian dualism’ is indispensable to Christian belief, including belief in life after death. In theology and ethics, in different ways, this issue is a vital one.

Descartes was more than a philosopher; he was a mathematician of distinction, using algebraic notation to describe spatial relations in his ‘analytic geometry’, and was also a keen scientist. His continental successors, pre-eminently *Spinoza and *Leibniz, have been labelled, along with Descartes, ‘rationalists’, to draw attention to the role of the mind apart from the senses in possessing and acquiring knowledge.

See also: RATIONALISM.

Bibliography

D. Clarke, Descartes: A Biography (Cambridge, 2006); J. Cottingham (ed.), The Cambridge Companion to Descartes (Cambridge, 1992); J. Cottingham, R. Stoothoff and D. Murdoch, The Philosophical Writings of Descartes (Cambridge, 1985); E. M. Curley, Descartes against the Skeptics (Oxford, 1978); A. Kenny, Descartes: A Study of His Philosophy (New York, 1968); B. Williams, Descartes: The Project of Pure Enquiry (Harmondsworth, 1978).

S. N. WILLIAMS

DESCENT INTO HELL

The term derives from the clause in the Apostles' *Creed (also included in the Athanasian Creed): Christ 'descended into hell' (descendit ad inferna). 'Hell' here refers not to the hell of eternal punishment (Gehenna), but to the realm of the dead, the underworld (OT Sheol, NT Hades). Hence modern translations of the Creed read 'he descended to the dead'.

That Christ in his human soul departed at death to the place of the dead, until his resurrection, is stated in the NT (Acts 2:31; Rom. 10:7; Eph. 4:9) and amounts to saying that he really died. According to one interpretation of 1 Pet. 3:19; 4:6, he preached the gospel to those who had died before his coming, in order to make salvation available to them. But it should be noted that this interpretation, first attested in *Clement of Alexandria, was rejected by *Augustine and many medieval exegetes, and was not until modern times a major exegetical basis for the doctrine of the descent. Although it is an interpretation which is still vigorously defended by some (e.g. E. *Schillebeeckx, Christ: The Christian Experience in the Modern World, London, 1980, pp. 229–234), many modern exegetes take 3:19 to refer to Christ's ascension, during which he proclaimed his victory to the rebellious angels imprisoned in the lower heavens, while 4:6 refers to Christians who died after the gospel was preached to them (see W. J. Dalton, Christ's Proclamation to the Spirits, Rome, 1965).

That Christ's descent effected the transference of OT believers from Hades to heaven has been thought to be implied by Matt. 27:52; Heb. 12:23. This notion is certainly found in the earliest post-apostolic writings (Ignatius, Ascension of Isaiah) along with Christ's preaching of the gospel to the dead (Hermas, Gospel of Peter, *Justin Martyr, *Irenaeus). This was the normal understanding of the descent in the patristic period. Although the *Alexandrian Fathers included the pagan dead among those whom Christ delivered from Hades, the prevailing view, which became the orthodox medieval view, was that only believers of the pre-Christian period were recipients and beneficiaries of Christ's preaching in Hades.

Alongside the theme of the preaching to the dead, another motif which was associated with the descent from a very early period (Odes of Solomon, Ascension of Isaiah, *Hippolytus) was Christ's victory over the infernal powers in order to liberate the souls they kept imprisoned in Hades. The earliest credal reference to the descent (in the 'Dated Creed' of Sirmium, 359) clearly alludes to this theme, and it would have been in the minds of those who recited the words, 'he descended into hell', when this clause appeared in some Western creeds from the fifth century and eventually in our Apostles' Creed. Christ's triumph over the devil and death in his descent was vividly narrated in the Gospel of Nicodemus, which became very popular in the medieval West, and it was graphically portrayed in medieval art. Although this theme of 'the harrowing of hell' strictly referred only to the salvation of pre-Christian believers, it represented symbolically Christ's liberation of all believers from death and the powers of evil. It dramatized the Christus victor theme in *atonement theology for the ordinary medieval Christian.

*Luther continued to make pedagogic use of the idea of the harrowing of hell, and it became Lutheran doctrine in the Formula of Concord. But *Calvin (Institutes II.xvi.10) interpreted the clause in the Creed as a reference to Christ's vicarious endurance of the torments of hell on the cross, and this became a common Reformed view.

In the nineteenth century, the descent into hell and an appropriate interpretation of 1 Pet. 3:19 became part of the relatively novel idea of opportunities of salvation after death for all who had no opportunity in this life, and even of a hope for *universal salvation based on 'extended probation' after death (the classic treatment is E. H. Plumptre, The Spirits in Prison, London, 1885). Among contemporary theologians who take the descent to symbolize the possibility of salvation through Christ for those who have not heard the gospel in this life are Schillebeeckx (loc. cit.) and W. *Pannenberg (The Apostles' Creed, London, 1972, pp. 90–95).

Bibliography

F. Loofs, ERE IV, pp. 654–663; J. A. MacCulloch, The Harrowing of Hell (Edinburgh, 1930).

R. J. BAUCKHAM

DETERMINISM

Most discussions of determinism are bedevilled by confusion between several different uses of the term.

1. In science it stands strictly for the hypothesis that the form of every physical event is determined uniquely by the conjunction of events preceding it. Science attempts to discover the pattern of interdependence and express it in 'laws'. Note that this hypothesis does not necessarily imply that all events are predictable-by-us, nor even that they are predictable-for-us (see below). It is also consistent with (but distinct from) the biblical theistic doctrine that every physical event depends on God for its coming into being (Col. 1:16–17; Heb. 1:3).

In physics, Heisenberg's 'Uncertainty Principle' (1927) asserts that observable data can never suffice for exact predictions of physical events; but (despite common assertions to the contrary) it does not logically deny strict determinism.

2. Theological determinism is the doctrine that the form of all events is determined according to 'the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God' (Acts 2:23, KJV). This neither depends on nor implies scientific determinism: it could apply even in a world that was scientifically indeterminate.

3. In philosophy determinism often stands for the doctrine that the future of human beings is inevitable-for-them, so that freedom of choice is illusory. This doctrine is often thought to follow from scientific determinism, and Heisenberg's principle has been invoked as a defence against it; but 'compatibilists' (including the writer) consider both these moves to be mistaken. A future event E may be physically determinate without being inevitable-for-an-agent-A, if its form depends (among other things) upon what A thinks or decides about it.

Suppose, for example, that the physical states of A's brain reflect what A thinks and believes, so that no change can take place in what A believes without a corresponding change in his brain-state (as assumed in mechanistic brain science). It follows that no completely detailed specification of the immediate future of A's brain can claim to be equally accurate regardless of what A thinks of it, for (ex hypothesi) it must change according to what A thinks of it! In other words, no completely determinate specification of A's future exists, even unknown to A, which A would be correct to believe, and mistaken to disbelieve, if only he knew it. What does exist is a range of options, any one of which will be realized, if, and only if, A opts for it, and none of which is inevitable-for-A. This is a rational basis for holding A responsible for the outcome, whether or not it was predictable-for-others. There is here a principle of relativity: what others might be correct to believe about A's future is not what A would be correct to believe.

Notice that the question here is not what A would do if offered a prediction. The question is whether A's future is inevitable-for-A, in the sense of having one, and only one, determinate specification (unknown to A) with an unconditional logical claim to A's assent. The argument shows that no such specification can exist.

This disproof of 'philosophical determinism' requires us neither to assume nor to deny determinism in either its scientific or theological senses.

Bibliography

G. Dworkin (ed.), Determinism, Freewill, and Moral Responsibility (London, 1970); D. M. MacKay, Human Science and Human Dignity (London, 1979), pp. 50–55; G. Watson (ed.), Freewill (London, 1982).

D. M. MACKAY

DEVELOPMENT OF DOCTRINE

We possess, on the one hand, the Bible as a collection of books written over many centuries, and, on the other, a continually increasing number of doctrinal statements produced by individuals and groups over the centuries (see *Confessions and *Creeds). Development of doctrine may refer to the relation of the Bible's later teaching to its earlier teaching (e.g. that of the doctrine of the *resurrection of the body to the concept of a shadowy existence in Sheol). However, the expression is more often used with reference to (1) the relation of the doctrine/theology produced within the church of post-apostolic times to that contained within the books of the Bible (e.g. the dogma of the *Trinity as found in the Athanasian Creed to the doctrinal statements about Father, Son and *Holy Spirit in the books of the NT); and (2) the relation of a *dogma or precise doctrinal statement which appeared late in the history of the church, to earlier expressions of the same basic teaching (e.g. the doctrine of *justification as taught by *Luther to that taught by *Augustine of Hippo).

Given that there is a difference – which may be in emphasis, arrangement of words, *contextualization, language, aim or purpose – between the teaching that appears in the Bible and the church's doctrinal statements allegedly based on the original scriptural information, the question arises: How best can this difference be explained? What kind of *models help us to understand the (often subtle) changes? There is the further question: What are the primary factors in a given situation which lead to the formulation of a doctrine for the first time, or to the more precise formulation of a doctrine already confessed within the church; and what models give helpful insight into these processes?

Before the middle of the nineteenth century, the word 'development' was not used to refer to these processes within history and human thought. *Roman Catholic apologists emphasized the immutability of doctrine, that one doctrine had been preserved unchanged from the apostolic teaching recorded in the Bible in the teaching of the (Roman, Western) church throughout the centuries: verbal changes were not of the essence of the matter; the concept had always been the same. In response, *Protestants emphasized the corruption of doctrine – especially after the *patristic period through the medieval era – and saw their own doctrinal emphases and insights as recovery of the pristine, original teaching of the apostles and the early Fathers.

However, it was J. H. *Newman in his important work, An Essay on the Development of Doctrine (1845), who insisted on the very fact of development as a new model replacing the models of immutability and corruption. He knew that there was a real difference between biblical data and statements from the church, as well as between earlier and later pronouncements from the church. He suggested models based on the way in which an idea enters the mind, grows and develops before it is expressed as a clear concept. However, Newman still needed the existence of the *papacy to guarantee that the development of doctrine within the mind of the church was the one approved by God. Thus, since Newman's work, it has become customary to talk about the problem of the development of doctrine. Though some Protestants still think that their doctrinal statements are direct modern-day equivalents of biblical data, most scholars are very much aware that an account has to be offered of the formulation of new doctrines and dogmas, as well as of the relationship between these as they exist within the continuing church. It is probably true to say that during the twentieth century, while Roman Catholics were much more absorbed with the problem of development, Protestants were more absorbed with the problem of *hermeneutics – how to interpret the Bible today. Of course these are related, and both exercises are necessary.

Bibliography

O. Chadwick, From Bossuet to Newman (Cambridge, 1987); R. P. C. Hanson, The Continuity of Christian Doctrine (New York, 1981); N. Lash, Newman on Development (London, 1975); P. Toon, The Development of Doctrine in the Church (Grand Rapids, 1978).

P. TOON

DEVILS AND DEMONS

Although the biblical writers encourage no speculation concerning the nature of evil powers, there is no doubt that they take them with intense seriousness, elaborating upon them with a variety of terms and images. Beginning with the reference in Gen. 1:1–2 to a chaos which is 'formless and void', the biblical story offers a picture of an ordered creation continually threatened by powerful and effective adversaries, supremely Satan or the devil, and the demons. The nature, origin and defeat of these adversarial spiritual powers, 'demonology', has been a theme within Christian theology, with the majority opinion finding their origin in some transcendent angelical fall or catastrophe. *Origen was the first to systematize this idea, equating Lucifer (Isa. 14:12–15) with Satan, who with other created angelic powers revolted and fell from heaven because of pride. *Augustine followed Origen, although not his opinion that the devil could finally be reconciled to God. *Thomas Aquinas held that the devil, who is the cause of all sin, was once probably the very highest *angel who, through pride, fell immediately after creation, seducing those who followed him to become his subjects. *Calvin likewise identified the devil as an angel whose malice came as a result of his revolt and fall.

More modern theologians have found such notions hard to digest. *Schleiermacher, often seen as the father of modern theology, questioned the conception of a fall among good angels. Instead, Jesus and his disciples drew their demonology from the common life of the period rather than from Scripture, so that the conception of Satan is not a permanent element in Christian doctrine. In contemporary theological enquiry, *Bultmann still sums up the prevailing view: 'It is impossible to use electric light and the wireless and to avail ourselves of modern medical and surgical discoveries, and at the same time believe in the New Testament world of daemons and spirits' (Kerygma and Myth, p. 5). Many modern theologians and others are therefore content to divorce the ministry of Jesus from its biblical context in a mission to 'destroy the devil's work' (1 John 3:8). The worldview of metaphysical *materialism has little room for supernatural powers of any kind, yet must itself be considered an unproven and unprovable philosophical assumption. It is by no means self-evident that a scientific methodology precludes that on which science is unable to adjudicate.

Conversely, NT scholars of varying convictions or lack of them have become increasingly persuaded that Jesus was an exorcist, whatever the precise nature of the forces he encountered. The demonic cannot therefore be excised from the NT without loss. The experience of global Christianity suggests that engagement with the demons continues to be a vital and significant aspect of Christian *mission, involving the manifestation of phenomena remarkably parallel to those recorded in the Gospels. Neither are such phenomena unknown in the West. Furthermore, theological enquiry post-Second World War has shown a renewal of interest in the NT language of 'principalities and powers' prompted by the need to make sense of the 'demonic' experiences of a Nazi state, the *Holocaust and Hiroshima. In a world where the 'Lordless Powers' (Barth) are rampant, perhaps this language still speaks of fallen and destructive supra-human realities from which humans need liberation and which in themselves need either to be overcome or redeemed. Opinions on the powers range from identifying them as fallen angels, or as social institutions and agencies, or as some pre-modern composite of the two. Far from being outmoded, however, the language is useful in locating realities which otherwise we would not have the power to name: the 'spirituality' (good or bad) of the frameworks within which we live our lives.

The NT world of demons and spirits needs not to be jettisoned but rather re-understood. A more conservative way of appropriating the language insists that it refers to a truly existent world of spiritual, ontological realities which, although unseen, impinge upon our present world. The devil is real, powerful and personal, although in principle defeated at the *cross. The powers and principalities are fallen angels which hold sway in the social and political realm and cause havoc. They may be counteracted through prayer. Demons are subordinate spirits which can tempt, possess and disturb people, yet whose activity can be nullified in the name of Christ, the Victor. Difficulties with this view include finding an adequate biblical basis for the concept of an angelic fall (surprisingly meagre). In addition, what it means to call the devil 'personal' gives pause for thought. If personhood involves being made in the image of the triune God, then to apply this to the devil is problematic: not even angels are described as being made in the image of God. If the devil is personal, and certainly the Bible ascribes agency to the devil, it is personality of a radically different kind from that of human beings.

A more experimental theological perspective, albeit rooted in discussion long present in the church's theology, denies ontology to the powers of evil, seeing them rather as the power of the negative, that destructive emptiness created by the displacement of the living God from the affairs of humankind. Evil is privation of the good. This is not to deny its power or its dynamic, since a vacuum, although nothing, can have devastating effects; and *death, which is the absence of life, is a power closely associated with evil itself which exercises great power through fear (Heb. 2:14–15). In this construct Satan is not an invisible, spiritual individual of the most intense form of evil, but the spirituality of a fallen society, a power generated out of the world and the flesh, the malicious and destructive spiritual dynamic produced by the cocktail of human sin and chaos. A difficulty with this perspective, besides its apparent complexity, might be that it lacks the focus of the ontological approach and so reduces the energy and clarity with which it is opposed by the people of God.

See also: EVIL.

Bibliography

K. Barth, CD III/3, pp. 289–531 and CD IV/4, pp. 213–233; G. A. Boyd, Satan and the Problem of Evil (Downers Grove, 2001); R. Bultmann,

'The New Testament and Mythology', in H. W. Bartsch (ed.), Kerygma and Myth, vol. 1 (London, 1953); E. M. B. Green, I Believe in Satan's Downfall (London, 1981); A. N. S. Lane (ed.), The Unseen World: Christian Reflections on Angels, Demons and the Heavenly Realm (Carlisle, 1996); E. Langton, Essentials of Demonology (London, 1949); S. H. T. Page, Powers of Evil: A Biblical Study of Satan and Demons (Leicester, 1995); J. B. Russell, Satan: The Early Christian Tradition (Ithaca, 1981); G. H. Twelftree, 'Spiritual Powers' in T. D. Alexander and B. S. Rosner (eds.), New Dictionary of Biblical Theology (Leicester and Downers Grove, 2000); W. Wink, Engaging the Powers: Discernment and Resistance in a World of Domination (Minneapolis, 1992); N. G. Wright, A Theology of the Dark Side (Carlisle, 2003).

N. G. WRIGHT

DEWEY, JOHN (1859–1952)

Dewey was a leading American pragmatist philosopher and liberal social reformer whose work remains influential in the fields of philosophy, psychology and pedagogy. Educated at the University of Vermont and Johns Hopkins University, Dewey's intellect was formed by the cross-currents of *Hegelianism, New England transcendentalism, reformist Congregationalism and the emerging sciences of evolutionary biology and psychology. After holding faculty posts in Michigan, Minnesota and Chicago, he moved to Columbia University, where he taught until his retirement in 1930.

Fundamental to Dewey's project is the suggestion that we abandon philosophical preoccupation with *epistemology – i.e. with the question of how we know the real world – in favour of understanding human knowing as a social practice by means of which we adjust to our environment and project possible futures for ourselves. On this account, ideas are always tools in the service of some plan of action, and the true test of any knowledge is its success or failure in bettering human life over time.

Dewey's chief contributions to religious thought were made in his 1929 *Gifford Lectures, The Quest for Certainty, and developed further in A Common Faith (1934). These works advance a thoroughly naturalistic interpretation of the 'religious quality of experience'. His aim was to emancipate this quality from any necessary connection with the dogmas and institutional forms of organized religion. Dewey held that *religious experience had no discrete object, act or internal state; neither did it have a supernatural origin. Rather, any experience can acquire religious force. An experience functions religiously when it incites an imaginative and harmonious alignment of our entire being with the social and natural world as a whole. Dewey's interest in religious experience lay in the potential of its stirring visions of ideal possibilities to direct our present willing and doing towards humanistic ends.

Dewey's work continues to inspire contemporary applications of pragmatic philosophy to the study of religion and Christian theology.

See also: PHILOSOPHY OF RELIGION.

Bibliography

H. L. Friess, 'Dewey's Philosophy of Religion', in J. A. Boydston (ed.), Guide to the Works of John Dewey (Carbondale and Edwardsville, 1970), pp. 200–217; L. Hickman and T. M. Alexander (eds.), The Essential Dewey, 2 vols. (Bloomington, 1998); B. Kuklick, Churchmen and Philosophers: From Jonathan Edwards to John Dewey (New Haven, 1985); S. Rockefeller, John Dewey: Religious Faith and Democratic Humanism (New York, 1991); J. P. Sonesson, Pragmatism and Pluralism: John Dewey's Significance for Theology (Cambridge, MA, 1993).

P. ZIEGLER

DIALECTICAL THEOLOGY

Also called 'crisis' theology after the Greek for 'judgment', dialectical theology arose in the crisis of the First World War (1914–18), an event which shook the foundations of European cultural confidence and broke up former optimistic attitudes. Karl *Barth is the theologian most deeply linked, as its primary inspiration, to this movement in German theology, notably through his famous 1922 commentary The Epistle to the Romans. This was not only a commentary on the text of St Paul's NT letter, but a radically new theological manifesto or summons to reject liberal Protestantism, for a long time dominant in German academic theology (see *Liberalism, German). Such was its impact that the Roman Catholic theologian of the time, Karl Adam, called it 'a bombshell in the playground of the theologians', indicating also its spiritual seriousness. Barth strongly felt that the prevailing *liberal Protestant theology was revealed as bankrupt in its attitude to the catastrophe of the First World War, since many well-known theological professors had supported the Kaiser's disastrous nationalistic and militaristic policies in the name of Christianity. For Barth, such Kriegstheologie, or theology of war, called for condemnation not blessing, an instance of the pressing need to recover divine judgment over against the chaos and sin of human pride at work in history. A parallel to Barth at this time was P. T. *Forsyth and his The Justification of God (1917), likewise arguing that the cross of Christ in history is the great eschatological act of *judgment on sin.

Barth's Romans set out to sound the alarm against 'cultural Christianity' by emphasizing again the transcendence, unknowability and sheer holiness of *God, and the danger of 'domesticating' God into morality, aesthetical sense, or any other human cultural or psychological activity. God for Barth is 'wholly other', of 'infinite qualitative' distinction from the created order, which is also deeply fallen. Indeed, we cannot speak of God with our merely human capacities since God's being eludes human concept and speech, and theology must therefore be 'dialectical' in constantly negating what it affirms. The unknowable God is known in the revelation of Christ, but the 'early Barth' stressed the negative.

He rejected conservative biblicism as seeking to objectify truth about God. Liberalism is even more roundly criticized for identifying God with human ethics. Roman Catholicism is rejected for identifying the divine with the institution of the church. Barth does wish to return to the Bible, but in its capacity to point us to God, as someone might point to a moving bird in flight. Liberal theologians in Germany felt Barth was rejecting reason and scholarship in favour of supernaturalism, whereas Barth responded that if God is transcendent, then only a dialectical approach is truly theological. We tread on holy ground. Barth had a sharp exchange of correspondence with Adolph *Harnack, his former teacher, illustrating well their complete difference in theological approach. For Barth, following *Anselm, theology has to be 'faith seeking understanding'. Following *Kierkegaard, he stressed personal faith in Christ, the one who transcends the merely human and historical and brings judgment strange to the complacent European culture of the day. Luther's message of judgment and grace meeting at the cross influenced both Kierkegaard and Barth.

Dialectical theology sought to recover a Christian *eschatology, by which was meant the inbreaking of God into history in divine strangeness and awe, over against human self-confidence and arrogance. Franz Overbeck was a key influence on Barth for this aspect of his early theology. The theme of the *kingdom of God coming with Christ into human history, bringing a new way of life into the selfishness of society, a way of life compatible with the socialist message, was gained by Barth from the Blumhardts.

Besides Barth, other theologians writing under the banner of dialectical theology included Rudolph *Bultmann, Friedrich *Gogarten and Emil *Brunner. Barth broke with Bultmann and Gogarten since they based their dialectical theology on human existence in dialectic with God, whereas Barth's dialectic was rooted in the event of *revelation and its judgment on human existence and experience. This eschatological emphasis on the inbreaking of the divine in judgment and grace on human culture and its various forms of idolatry was one of radical discontinuity, even dualism, over against the liberal tendency towards historicism and finding God in human experience.

The movement in fact contained different emphases and interests within itself, and the four theologians disagreed over various issues. Barth criticized Brunner for suggesting that the human being had a capacity for God, a 'point of contact', whereas Barth believed that God alone could supply that by grace. Barth was confirmed in his dialectical approach by the onset of Nazism in the 1930s, when many Christians sought to integrate Nazism into the church. Barth wrote, with two others, the *Barmen Declaration of 1934, radically pointing to Christ as 'the one Word of God'. Human *culture was corruptible and not a source for truth about God. Bultmann's path took a radically subjective turn, perhaps showing that dialectical theology itself was subject to dialectical polarization. For Bultmann, we can know by faith only that God exists and that the message of the gospel is that Jesus himself had authentic faith. It is open to us to accept this faith as we hear the gospel preached and take up an 'authentic' way of life.

Epistemologically, Bultmann is with Barth in rejecting any 'natural theology' or pathway from reason to faith: they both insist on a radical disjuncture. But in terms of ontology, Barth developed his dialectical theology in a much more objective and traditional direction, with Jesus revealed to faith as the trinitarian Son incarnate. For Bultmann, this is a return to metaphysics and *myth. Barth's dialectical theology insisted on the Kierkegaardian point at which the divine became human, a total mystery, a contradiction even, the holy God conquering human sin. The sheer otherness of God is most sharply focused at the *cross where God reveals and conceals himself, dialectically. This dialectic again owes much to Luther's 'God of the cross', and seeks to transcend the 'yes' and 'no' of affirmative and negative theologies (see *Apophatic theology) so as to preserve the Absolute of faith from fixed formulations devised by human thought. Barth's dialectical theology seeks to point to God as veiled and unveiled, neither pole of the dialectic being available to inspection without the simultaneous impact of the other. The dialectic deployed by Barth owes far more to Kierkegaard than *Hegel, whose dialectic of thesis, antithesis and synthesis was said to be the engine of historical development. Barth's dialectic aims at precisely the reverse in that it radically blocks any human grasp of the Absolute. Barth's dialectical theology likewise blocks any 'secret identification of God with man' in terms of the church, which Barth warns must not be regarded as deified in any sense, contrary to Roman Catholic ecclesiology. The church herself is not holy but, dialectically, awaits the touch of the Spirit.

Other cultural influences shaping dialectical theology in addition to Kierkegaard's writings and polemics against cultural Christianity include the novels of *Dostoevsky exploring the reality of sin and evil. The pessimistic side of human nature and history was pitted against liberal optimism, an optimism killed off on the barbed wire of the Somme. Artistically, this inter-war era was one of discontinuity and radical questioning. T. S. Eliot's poem, 'The Waste Land', portrayed a pessimistic, bleak European culture, adrift from its moorings. Expressionism in art, with its fractured and broken imagery, disturbing the conventional and establishment views, notably Picasso's Guernica on the Spanish Civil War, echo dialectical theology. Indeed, Barth's Romans is full of the imagery of lightning splintering trees, of mountain rivers gushing headlong downwards, of the crater left by the meteorite, that is, of the aftershock of grace encountering sin in judgment, but without an ongoing restored relationship. Barth later acknowledged that his dialectical phase, 'the rolling thunder of Romans', was a necessary overemphasis against the ruling liberal Protestantism of the day. He developed his dialectics in Christological fashion in his Church Dogmatics, following the logic of the incarnation that God has acted to assume full humanity in Christ.

Dialectical theology was overwhelmingly a German theological movement, and an attack on liberal theology which proved extremely successful. It also, however, swept away the conservative evangelical tradition of such theologians in Germany as Adolph *Schlatter, a scholarly biblical theologian. *Roman Catholic theologians too acknowledged Barth as their greatest critic and dialogue partner. The movement never really found a favour in England, but Scotland proved far more receptive. Today Barth and his dialectical way of doing theology has returned to fashion with the advent of *postmodernism and its rejection of 'foundationalism' or the building up of a rational basis for theology. Just as modernism is accused of rationalistic objectivism, so Barth's dialectics rejected the notion of God as an object accessible to human capacities and 'domestication' by reason, feeling, morality or spirituality. Our speech about God depends on the grace of God. Divine revelation, like the burning bush drawing Moses towards it, is to be approached in fear and trembling, pointing beyond itself. Scripture functions as this pointing finger. Barth remained a dialectical theologian in an important sense (according to Bruce MacCormack), but his early phase was radically so, almost dualistic in terms of both *ontology and *epistemology.

There has been a considerable renewal of interest in Barth in English-speaking theological circles, as liberal theology has lost touch with grassroots Christianity and fundamentalism is regarded as verging on bibliolatry. Dialectical theology declines any claim of human enlightenment or rationality to define God. It also refuses to allow a deification of any text or institution, albeit Scripture or church. They may 'become' witnesses to God as the Spirit acts. Dialectical theology tried to find a way of affirming God's reality and sovereign holiness as disclosed in the narratives of 'the strange new world of the Bible', while preserving divine freedom from capture by human language and concept. It has now gained the attention of postmodern thinkers, and is likely to remain relevant in any Christian critique of Western culture now struggling to find meaning.

Bibliography

C. Asprey, Eschatological Presence in Karl Barth's Göttingen Theology (Oxford, 2010); H. U. von Balthasar, The Theology of Karl Barth (Chicago, 1971); K. Barth, The Epistle to the Romans (ET, London, 1933 [1922]); N. MacDonald, The Strange New World within the Bible (Milton Keynes, 2001); B. McCormack, Karl Barth's Critically Realistic Dialectical Theology (Oxford, 1995); J. D. Smart, The Divided Mind of Modern Theology (Philadelphia, 1967); T. F. Torrance, Karl Barth: An Introduction to his Early Theology 1910–1931 (London, 1962).

T. BRADSHAW

of history – God has no place. This scheme of history in turn provided a basis for the *phenomenology of Edmund Husserl (1859–1938), the historicism of R. G. Collingwood (1889–1943), and the *existentialism of Martin Heidegger (1889–1976), which was to influence *Bultmann. Although Dilthey lies outside the main stream of theological scholarship, his approach to the philosophy of history was to influence the whole course of twentieth-century historical methodology, not only in the philosophical field, but also in the theological.

Bibliography

I. N. Bulhof, Wilhelm Dilthey (The Hague, 1980); H. A. Hodges, The Philosophy of Wilhelm Dilthey (London, 1952); R. A. Makreel, Dilthey: Philosopher of the Human Studies (Princeton, 1993); J. de Mul, The Tragedy of Finitude: Dilthey's Hermeneutics of Life (New Haven, 2004); H. P. Rickmann, Wilhelm Dilthey (London, 1979).

H. HARRIS

DIDYMUS, see ALEXANDRIAN SCHOOL

DILTHEY, WILHELM (1833–1911)

Wilhelm Dilthey was professor of philosophy at Basel from 1866, Kiel from 1868, Breslau from 1871 and Berlin from 1882 until his death. At the beginning of his university career he studied theology with the intention of entering the ministry, but, realizing that he could not accept the traditional doctrines of the Christian faith, soon abandoned this course. Henceforth his labours were devoted to philosophical, psychological and sociological studies, in which he developed a *relativistic approach and methodology to the Geisteswissenschaften (cultural or human sciences) in contrast to the Naturwissenschaften (natural sciences). In Dilthey's methodology there is no place for the *supernatural; knowledge of life comes from understanding the mental processes and world-views (Weltanschauungen) of human beings, and seeing these as part of the ongoing flow of universal history.

In theological circles, Dilthey is best known for his biography of *Schleiermacher (1870), but his greatest importance lies in his development of a philosophy of *history in which – over against the biblical understanding

DIODORE OF TARSUS, see
ANTIOCHENE SCHOOL

DIONYSIUS OF ALEXANDRIA, see
ALEXANDRIAN SCHOOL

DIONYSIUS THE AREOPAGITE, see PSEUDO-DIONYSIUS THE AREOPAGITE

DISPENSATIONAL THEOLOGY

Dispensationalism rests on the view that God's dealings with men have proceeded through 'well-defined time-periods' (L. S. Chafer) – 'dispensations' – in each of which God reveals a particular purpose to be accomplished in that period, to which men respond in faith or unbelief. Dispensationalists deny that they teach more than one way of salvation, admitting only that the content of faith varies according to the revelation given in each dispensation. Scriptural support is derived from passages which distinguish between, for example, past ages (e.g. Eph. 3:5; Col. 1:26), the present age (e.g. Rom. 12:2; Gal. 1:4) and the age to come

(Eph. 2:7; Heb. 6:5), and especially the use of aiōnas in Heb. 1:2 and 11:3.

Dispensationalists differ in identification of the dispensations, but it is fairly general to distinguish those of innocence (Adam before the fall), conscience (Adam to Noah), promise (Abraham to Moses), Mosaic law (Moses to Christ), grace (Pentecost to the rapture) and the *millennium. The sharp distinction drawn between Israel and the church (except during the dispensation of grace) is crucial. The systematization of modern dispensational theology owes much to J. N. *Darby and the Scofield Reference Bible (1909, by the American Congregationalist, Cyrus I. Scofield, 1843–1921).

The basic *hermeneutical principle is literal interpretation, which does not rule out symbols, figures of speech and typology, but does insist that, throughout, ‘the reality of the literal meaning of the terms involved’ is determinative (C. C. Ryrie, Dispensationalism Today, p. 87). Consequently, the promises of an earthly kingdom given to Israel as a nation must be fulfilled literally in a future, millennial kingdom (on the analogy of the literal fulfilment of the messianic promises relating to Jesus). Dispensationalists accept that believing Jews – as individuals – find their place in the church during the dispensation of grace, but the promises made to the natural seed of Abraham await the premillennial return of Christ with his church for their fulfilment. Then will be initiated the dispensation during which the material blessings promised to Israel will be bestowed and will be characteristic, though not to the exclusion of the spiritual dimension.

Some details are in dispute among dispensationalists. These include the number and designations of the dispensations and the point at which the dispensation of grace began. The most extreme view is that of E. W. Bullinger (1837–1913) who commenced the church age with the ministry of Paul after Acts 28:28, held that Paul’s prison epistles are the only Scriptures addressed primarily to the church, and denied that water baptism and the Lord’s Supper are for this age. There is less disagreement over the terminus ad quem of the dispensation of grace, though some believe the rapture of the church (which marks its termination) will not take place until the end (a few say the middle) of the great tribulation.

See also: ESCHATOLOGY.

Bibliography

L. S. Chafer, Systematic Theology, 8 vols. (Dallas, 1947); R. G. Clouse (ed.), The Millennium: Four Views (Downers Grove, 1977); A. H. Ehlert, ‘A Bibliography of Dispensationalism’, BS, passim (1944–6); S. Grenz, The Millennial Maze (Downers Grove, 1992); V. Poythress, Understanding Dispensationalists, 2nd edn (Phillipsburg, 1993); C. C. Ryrie, Dispensationalism Today (Chicago, 1965); E. Sauer, From Eternity to Eternity (Exeter, 1954); J. F. Walvoord, The Millennial Kingdom (Findlay, 1959).

H. H. ROWDON

DIVORCE, see SEXUALITY

DOCETISM

Among the cluster of movements that arose in response to the life, teachings, death and resurrection of Jesus emerged a tendency that came to be called Docetism, which responded with a ‘no’ to questions like – ‘Was Jesus a real human being?’, ‘Did Jesus really suffer?’ and ‘Did Jesus actually die on the cross?’ The proponents of this tendency, which was strongly affirmed among various *Gnostic groups, based their response on a particular way of understanding scriptural texts like 1 Cor. 15:45, which speaks of the last Adam being ‘a life-giving Spirit’, and 1 Cor. 15:47, which speaks of the ‘man from heaven’. For those who held docetic opinions, Christ only seemed to be human and only appeared to have a human body.

The word ‘docetism’ derives from a Greek work which has the meanings of ‘seeming’ and ‘appearing’. This was used to think about the humanity of Christ as being a disguise which concealed his true spiritual nature. There were several early teachers of faith for whom this tendency was incompatible with a Christological understanding of Jesus, who suffered in the flesh and who experienced the reality and finality of death. Prominent among these were Ignatius and *Irenaeus. Ignatius, writing at the beginning of the second century, argues that it is not possible to accept an ethereal disembodied view of Christ, since it is Christ’s actual suffering in the body that establishes the model for people to follow. He also denies the docetic tendency to spiritualize the resurrection and argues that Jesus remained in the flesh even after the resurrection, shown by the accounts of his eating and drinking with the disciples even while he was spiritually united with the Father. Only this reality could play a role in the transformation of human beings.

Irenaeus, writing toward the end of the second century, argues vehemently against Docetic teachings. In his major piece of writing against heresies, he hotly opposed the view of teachers like Simon the Samaritan, Saturninus, *Marcion and Basilides, that Jesus only appeared to be human. He contradicts Basilides' teaching that Simon of Cyrene, who had been compelled to carry Jesus' cross, had been transformed to look like the crucified Jesus, while the real Jesus stood by laughing.

Evidence for Docetic inclinations can be found in a variety of 'Gnostic' texts, including apocalyptic writings attributed to various disciples. Alternate views of what happened during the crucifixion is present in 'acts' and 'gospels' attributed to different disciples. A church leader like Serapion of Antioch, who was bishop during the turn of the second century, is recorded by the church historian Eusebius to have exposed the docetic nature of writings like the so-called 'Gospel of Peter'.

Christological thinking that tends to minimize the humanity of Jesus is always in danger of falling into Doceticism, and this is an ongoing challenge to those who continue to respond to the question as to who Jesus is.

See also: CHRISTOLOGY; JESUS.

Bibliography

J. K. Elliott, The Apocryphal Jesus: Legends of the Early Church (Oxford and New York, 1996); A. J. Hultgren and S. A. Haggmark (eds.), The Earliest Christian Heretics: Readings from Their Opponents (Minneapolis, 1996); J. Stevenson, rev. W. H. C. Frend, A New Eusebius: Documents Illustrating the History of the Church to AD 337 (London, new edn, 1987).

J. J. SEBASTIAN

DOCTRINAL CRITICISM

Doctrinal criticism is the appraisal of the truth and adequacy of doctrinal statements. The term owes its currency in British theology to a programmatic essay by G. F. Woods (1907–66), setting out the task of the doctrinal critic as that of subjecting doctrinal statements to the same kind of critical scrutiny brought to bear upon the biblical writings by biblical *criticism. As well as analysing the capacity of human symbols to articulate the transcendent, the critic assesses doctrines in the light of the historical setting in which they were formulated and in the light of contemporary understandings of reality. Woods's suggestions were extensively developed and applied in the work of Maurice Wiles (1923–2005), notably in the area of *Christology. While doctrinal criticism contributed much to the renewed interest in *systematic theology of recent years, it inherited a changed perspective on the authority and self-evidence of *revelation which stems from the *Enlightenment, according to which no *contingent statement or system may be accorded a position of privileged immunity from critical examination.

See also: CONTEMPORARY THEOLOGICAL TRENDS.

Bibliography

B. L. Hebblethwaite, The Problems of Theology (Cambridge, 1980); idem, Th 70, 1967, pp. 402–405; M. F. Wiles, Working Papers in Doctrine (London, 1976); idem (ed.), Explorations in Theology, vol. 4 (London, 1979); G. F. Woods, 'Doctrinal Criticism', in F. G. Healey (ed.), Prospect for Theology (London, 1966).

J. B. WEBSTER

DOCTRINE

Doctrine is generally understood to be communally agreed and communally authoritative teaching. More specifically, Christian interest in doctrine stems from the fact that the Christian faith has a constitutive cognitive content summarized in the claim, 'Jesus is Lord.' Although this claim is confessed, expanded and articulated principally in narrative form within the canonical Scriptures, doctrine serves to point to the unity, identify the emphases, expound the implications and specify the plot of the scriptural narratives. Classically, the result is a body of teaching focused on such topics as *God, *Christ, the *Holy Spirit, the *Trinity, *creation, humanity, *salvation, the *church and *redemption. Whilst such teaching is often presented as a systematically ordered body of doctrines in *creeds, *catechisms and *confessions, it is also embedded in liturgies, hymns and church polity.

Christian doctrine often emerges with particular clarity and energy when the church is required to specify its essential beliefs vis à vis the claims of alternative and/or hostile communities. The Nicene Creed, for instance, specifies the unity and basic plot of the Christian faith within a narrative framework of creation, *incarnation and redemption, whilst simultaneously identifying the triune character of God in contrast to prevailing forms of both monotheism and polytheism.

The identity-marking function of doctrine can, however, also be used as the basis of separation between Christians. Paradigmatic of this was the continental Reformation and the subsequent disintegration of *Protestantism into a multiplicity of denominations. Such disintegration was often justified by the appeal to particular doctrines (e.g. *justification, election – see *Predestination; inspiration – see *Scripture, doctrine of) abstracted from a broader doctrinal framework.

Awareness of this church-dividing function of doctrine made the whole doctrinal tradition ripe for criticism. Adolf von *Harnack argued that the doctrinal articulation of the Christian faith belonged to the *Hellenization of Christianity in which the Hebraic focus on narrative was replaced and obscured by an alien Greek tendency to objectify and systematize. More generally, modern (especially liberal Protestant) theologians sought to avoid the embarrassment of doctrinal division by explaining doctrine as diverse and distorted linguistic ‘expressions’ of some common pre-cognitive, pure experience of God.

Nevertheless, recent discussions display a lively retrieval of the doctrinal tradition. The Hellenization thesis is regarded as dependent on an exaggerated antithesis, and the appeal to pre-cognitive experience is deemed both conceptually flawed and itself alien to the Christian faith. Seminal in these discussions has been George *Lindbeck’s The Nature of Doctrine (1984). Rejecting expressivism, Lindbeck argues that doctrine is to faith as grammar is to language. Just as grammar regulates language in ways that enable effective communication, so doctrine regulates the practice of faith in ways that enable authentic experience of and response to God. Alongside widespread endorsement of his rejection of expressivism, Lindbeck’s critics have worried that stressing doctrine’s regulatory role undermines confidence in its capacity to state the truth of the gospel. At the same time, nervousness about naïve propositionalism has seen claims for doctrine’s truthfulness draw on wider discussions of critically realist correspondence theories of *truth. Such theories propose that truth-claiming statements are not merely projections of the human mind onto reality, but are themselves determined by and correspond to reality, even if imperfectly and therefore in ways subject to modification. Additionally, attention to the role of doctrine has led to explorations of the mutual interplay of thought and practice. Discussions about the truthfulness of doctrine also focus on its relationship to Scripture from which it derives. Appeals to such metaphors as ‘performance’ and ‘drama’ are leading these latter discussions into fruitful areas of enquiry.

Bibliography

E. T. Charry, By the Renewing of Your Minds: The Pastoral Function of Christian Doctrine (New York and Oxford, 1997); C. E. Gunton, ‘A Rose by Any Other Name: From “Christian Doctrine” to “Systematic Theology”’, IJST 1, 1999, pp. 4–23; R. Hütter, Suffering Divine Things: Theology as Church Practice (ET, Grand Rapids, 1997); N. Lash, ‘Performing the Scriptures’, in N. Lash, Theology on the Way to Emmaus (London, 1986); G. A. Lindbeck, The Nature of Doctrine: Religion and Theology in a Postliberal Age (Philadelphia, 1984); A. E. McGrath, The Genesis of Doctrine: A Study in the Foundation of Doctrinal Criticism (Oxford, 1990); N. Murphy, Beyond Liberalism and Fundamentalism: How Modern and Post-modern Philosophy Set the Theological Agenda (Valley Forge, 1996); S. W. Sykes, The Identity of Christianity: Theologians and the Essence of Christianity from Schleiermacher to Barth (London, 1984); K. J. Vanhoozer, The Drama of Doctrine: A Canonical Linguistic Approach to Christian Theology (Louisville, 2005).

G. J. THOMPSON

DODD, CHARLES HAROLD (1884–1973)

Charles Dodd was probably the leading twentieth-century British NT scholar. He showed that Jesus taught that the *kingdom of God was already present during his ministry. Dodd tried to understand his teaching, especially the parables, on the assumption that he did not expect any future apocalyptic events; later he modified this position. Dodd's recognition of 'realized' *eschatology was a necessary reaction to the 'futurist' eschatology of A. *Schweitzer and others. Dodd also gave a profound analysis of the use of Jewish ideas in a *Hellenistic framework in John's Gospel, and analysed its historical contents to show that it contained valuable historical traditions independent of the other written gospels. Dodd emphasized the combination of historical facts plus interpretation in *revelation. He was thus at the opposite end of the theological spectrum from R. *Bultmann, and he showed that it was possible and legitimate to write about the historical *Jesus. Dodd also showed how a basic pattern of preaching (*kerygma) lay at the root of *NT theology, and how this theology was developed from a study of various 'fields' of OT Scriptures. Despite some 'liberal' elements in his interpretation of Scripture, he made a positive and lasting contribution to NT scholarship.

Bibliography

F. F. Bruce, 'C. H. Dodd', in P. E. Hughes (ed.), Creative Minds in Contemporary Theology (Grand Rapids, 1966), pp. 239–269; F. W. Dillistone, C. H. Dodd, Interpreter of the New Testament (Grand Rapids, 1977).

I. H. MARSHALL

DOGMA

This Gk word was used in the pre-Christian world of public ordinances, judicial decisions or statements of principle in philosophy or science. In the LXX, it is used of government decrees in Esth. 3:9; Dan. 2:13; 6:8. In the NT, the judgments of the law are so referred to in Eph. 2:15 and Col. 2:14 and the decisions of the Council of Jerusalem in Acts 16:4.

In the Christian church 'dogma' became teaching which was considered authoritative. Throughout the first three centuries, the Lat. and Gk writers were inclined to call everything related to faith 'dogma'. *Chrysostom used the word specifically for those truths revealed by Christ and above reason. *Thomas Aquinas and the *scholastics did not often use the term and preferred to speak of the articles of faith.

From the Reformation onwards, the word came to designate those articles of faith which the church officially formulated as the truth which had been revealed. It reflected therefore a common recognition by the Reformed and Roman churches that dogmatic formulation is an activity of the church, often arising out of theological controversy or the need to clarify the faith to be embraced.

The Reformed milieu

In the debate over the nature of authority, the *Reformed understanding of dogma reflected its anchorage of authority in Scripture rather than in the church. The response of the church to doctrinal controversy was seen to be materially based upon Scripture. Formally, dogma bears the marks of the intellectual and cultural ethos in which it is formulated. It is not infallible, but nevertheless provides grounds for unity and stability within the church catholic.

*Pietism challenged the formal dimension of dogma in perceiving it as perpetuating an arid and intellectual scholasticism, far removed from the experience of God in the life of the believer. The *Enlightenment increasingly undermined the classic material substance of dogma, by challenging the church's identification of the word of God with Scripture. A new understanding of dogma and how it develops emerged. This is found in the writings of *Schleiermacher, *Ritschl and specifically in *Harnack's History of Dogma. Here the focus is upon the religious and ethical experience of the Christian community in which divine revelation is authenticated. Dogma is the articulation by and for that community of their perception of the revelation of God.

The return to orthodoxy spearheaded by Emil *Brunner and Karl *Barth in post-war Germany sought to purge the Reformed faith of seventeenth-century scholasticism while preserving the ground of dogma in the revelation of God in Jesus Christ. Dogma was seen as the articulation of the church's understanding of this revelation as the Holy Spirit bears witness to Christ in the Scriptures. Unlike their immediate *liberal predecessors or *existential successors, the neo-orthodox school did not view dogma as an attempt to understand and express human experience of God, but as the necessary and scientific response to 'the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ'. The modus operandi for dogmatic formulation has its roots in the nature of God and his revelation and not in the nature of man and his religious awareness. What is then the role of Scripture? It remains, in this framework, the source of the material content of dogma, but only in so far as its equation with the Word is indirect, for the Word of God is the revelation itself, i.e. Jesus Christ.

Dogma is essentially a corollary of orthodoxy. The increasing pluralism within Reformed confessional churches and their inability to function with objective criteria of *authority have produced a growing ambivalence to the articulation of dogma. Only in pragmatic areas of morality do the Reformed churches appear to speak with authority.

The Catholic stance

The *Roman Catholic Church has sought to affirm its understanding of dogma under the same pressures as that of the Reformed community. The traditional view in the Catholic Church is that dogma is truth revealed by God in Scripture and/or tradition and formulated by and for the church against error. Such truth is irrevocable, unchangeable and infallible. Dogma, therefore, does not add to what has been revealed but merely defines and declares it.

Although not denying this view of dogma, since the nineteenth century many Catholic theologians have queried the static and scholastic manner in which the church is perceived to have stated dogma. *Newman argued for a dynamic process of dogmatic *development in the church. Truth was implanted like seeds in the mind of the church and organically developed, so that latent truth became under the focus of controversy a full-grown dogma explicitly approved by the church.

A further stage in Catholic reflection is the awareness that there is a continual process of uncovering the meaning of what is expressed in dogma. Apart from truth transcending human thought and requiring analogical language to communicate, it was increasingly recognized that church pronouncements are the product of their age and reflect the cultural, philosophical and linguistic norms of the period. Most Catholic theologians would want to argue that the reality expressed will remain unchanged and unchanging, and that dogmas have an objective content whose meaning is valid for all ages. Nevertheless, the form of expression can be subject to revision.

Three further convictions have affected the contemporary Catholic stance. First, revelation is not the divine communication of abstract truths which dogma would put into propositions. Second, all truth is organically interrelated and finds its central focus in Jesus Christ. Third, revealed truth is self-authenticating in that it demands an existential response. Karl *Rahner argues that dogma is deduced from revelation, which is a 'saving event' wherein 'the incarnate Word' communicates the reality of God himself. Dogmas are not therefore merely statements about God, but are 'exhibitive' words with a 'sacramental' nature; i.e. 'what [a dogma] states actually occurs and is posited by its existence'. Dogma, therefore, when rightly affirmed and personally assimilated, is 'life'. This view he would wish to incorporate within the traditional twofold distinction between the formal (expressed by the church explicitly and definitively as a revealed truth) and the material (belonging to Christian revelation as it is found in the word of God addressed to us in Scripture and/or tradition).

*Neo-orthodoxy in the Reformed and Roman Catholic churches continues to grapple with how to draw from revelation truths which are organically interdependent, whose logic stretches traditional models to breaking point, and yet when articulated in dogmatic form may receive the allegiance of the faithful.

*Ecumenism and social and economic realities are in practical terms the two most powerful influences upon the major Christian traditions in their reevaluation of dogma. Today ecumenical dialogue has heightened the awareness of the influence of Western/Greco-Roman thought forms upon dogmatic formulations which, in the eyes of cultures more akin to the world of the OT and NT, are a distortion of the revelation with unsettling moral and spiritual ramifications. The socioeconomic conditions to which the gospel is to speak expose the bourgeois nature of the churches' historic dogmatic statements and their failure to emphasize those aspects of the revelation which hold together *creation and *redemption in cosmic deliverance.

See also: CONTEXTUALIZATION; LIBERATION THEOLOGY; POLITICAL THEOLOGY; SYSTEMATIC THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

K. Barth, CD 1:1; E. Brunner, Dogmatics 1: The Christian Doctrine of God (London, 1949); A. Harnack, History of Dogma, vol. 1 (London, 1894); A. Lecerf, An Introduction to Reformed Dogmatics (London, 1949); J. Orr, The Progress of Dogma (London, ³1908); W. Pannenberg, Basic Questions in Theology, vol. 1 (London, 1970), pp. 182–210 ('What Is a Dogmatic Statement?'); O. Weber, Foundations of Dogmatics, vol. 1 (Grand Rapids, 1981).

T. W. J. MORROW

DOMINIC AND THE DOMINICANS

The Dominicans, officially known as the Order of Friars Preachers (O.P.) and more popularly called the Black Friars, are one of the four great mendicant orders of the Roman Catholic Church. The founder of the order, Dominico (Dominic) de Guzman (1170–1221), was a Spaniard whose early career began in Castile. Educated at the University of Palencia, which was later moved to Salamanca, he became a member of the religious community attached to the cathedral at Osma. Because of his impressive ability he was sent to southern France to help convert the *Albigensian heretics. Dominic came to believe that the only way to reach them was with evangelical preaching accompanied by a lifestyle of apostolic poverty. To accomplish this task he set out on preaching missions in market-places and roadsides, living in poverty so extreme that he wore no shoes or sandals and begged for his food. At first his policy met with little success, and his mission was forced to end when Pope Innocent III (1198–1216) began to use force against the heretics in 1208.

Inspired by this vision of a group of preachers who would win *heretics and heathen by preaching the word and living a simple life, Dominic attracted a group of followers (1214). He prepared them for their task by careful instruction and by sharing his dream of a learned preaching order of mendicant friars. Despite the rather impressive nature of the group, they were denied recognition by the Fourth *Lateran Council (1215), but later Pope Honorius III (1216) sanctioned their mission, and in 1220 their rule, adopted from the *Augustinians with added requirements of preaching and apostolic living, was confirmed. Dominic spent the remainder of his life travelling in Italy, France and Spain organizing his order. He was canonized in 1234. A man of intelligence, courage and zeal, he was also an extremely effective administrator.

From its inception the order has accepted from its founder its synthesis of an active ministry with a spiritual life. The members live in community, observe diet and fast rules, and conduct liturgical rites, but, according to their constitution, time is to be given for study and preaching. Dominicans are governed by a relatively democratic order. However, a balance is maintained between the elected representative bodies, or chapters, and strong but elected superiors. In contrast to other orders of its time, the Dominicans were not a collection of autonomous houses, but were an army of preachers organized in provinces under a master general and prepared to go wherever they were needed. This organization has served as a model for many monastic movements, organized after the Dominicans took form.

From the beginning they insisted that no-one should preach without three years of theological training. Within forty years of the founding of the order their scholars were teaching at Oxford, Paris, Bologna and Cologne. Dominican intellectual activity led to the founding of several universities, where they emphasized the teaching of languages, including Greek, Hebrew and Arabic, in addition to the more standard curriculum of scriptural studies and theology. Some of the great masters of medieval thought, led by *Thomas Aquinas and *Albertus Magnus, were Dominicans who sought to harmonize *faith and reason in a series of massive volumes (see *Scholasticism). They lived at a time when Muslim scholars had made the works of *Aristotle available for the first time to medieval Europeans. These books, which presented a complete explanation of reality without any reference to the Christian God, challenged the academic minds of the thirteenth century. After a period of conflict and uncertainty, the thought of Thomas, bringing the Aristotelian and Christian systems together, was accepted as the basis for *Roman Catholic theology.

The academic pursuits of the Dominicans did not divert them from their mission to combat heresy and seek conversions. They continued to work among the Albigensians and extended their efforts to include the Jews and Moors in Spain. Their evangelistic efforts led them to preach to the non-Christian peoples in Eastern Europe and in Asia. When the Inquisition was established, Dominicans were assigned to help carry it out because of their dedication to the church and orthodoxy. They entered the new world as the first and most energetic missionaries under the Spanish and Portuguese explorers.

The Dominican order has experienced periods of achievement and of decline. During the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, discipline relaxed as Europe suffered from plague, warfare and division in the church. However, the sixteenth century witnessed a period of Thomistic renewal under leaders such as Francisco de Vitoria (c. 1485–1546) and Thomas de Vio Cajetan (1469–1534; see *Luther). During this period, Dominican studies were revised to meet the challenge of *humanism and *Protestantism. At the Council of *Trent (1545–63), attended by many Dominicans, *Thomistic theology was made the basis for the dogmatic decisions. With some modern revisions, it still remains basic to much of Roman Catholic thought. Despite this recognition, there were forces at work that undermined the order. The rise of new groups such as the *Jesuits and the loss of much of Eastern Europe to Western control began to push the Dominicans into the background. The eighteenth-century Enlightenment also dampened enthusiasm, weakened discipline and made recruiting difficult.

The order continues into modern times, standing firmly for orthodoxy and opposing novelty in theology. Paradoxically, many Dominicans have been active in the reform movement that resulted from the Second *Vatican Council, including theological reform (e.g. E. *Schillebeeckx). They have also led in the worker-priest movement, spoken decisively for the Majority World and made extensive use of the fields of radio, television, films and the stage in their preaching ministry.

Bibliography

W. R. Bonniwell, A History of the Dominican Liturgy (New York, 1944); W. A. Hinnebusch, The History of the Dominican Order (Staten Island, NY, 1966); B. Jarrett, Life of St Dominic (1170–1221) (London, 1924); idem, The English Dominicans (London, rev. edn, 1937); P. F. Mandonnet, St Dominic and His Work (St Louis, MO, 1944); idem, in DTC 6, 1920, cols. 863–924; S. Tugwell (ed.), Early Dominicans: Selected Writings (New York, 1982); M. H. Vicaire, Saint Dominic and His Times (London, 1964); R. Woods, Mysticism and Prophecy: The Dominican Tradition (London, 1998).

DONATISM

Donatism was a *schism which broke out in North Africa c. 313 and persisted until after the Muslim conquest in 698. Donatism is so called because its leading spirit was a man named Donatus, whom the schismatics elected as Bishop of Carthage in 313, shortly after the outbreak of controversy.

The origins of the schism were bound up with personal rivalries at Carthage, and later took on social and political implications in that the Donatists drew much of their support from the less-Romanized Berber tribespeople of the country. Yet the main and enduring cause was religious and theological. The Donatists were rigorous in their support of the spiritual rewards of *martyrdom, and it was the lax policy of the church at Carthage towards traditores (those who had ‘handed over’ their copies of the Scriptures to be burned during the Great Persecution of 303), which caused the bad feeling and led to schism. The election as bishop in 312 of Caecilian, who seemed unenthusiastic about the martyrs, and his consecration by a suspected traditor, caused a scandal among the rigorists and led to separation. Donatists regarded themselves as the true *church, and claimed *Cyprian’s authority in *rebaptizing Catholics.

In the fourth century, Donatism possessed gifted teachers in Parmenian (against whom *Augustine later wrote) and Tyconius (fl. c. 370–90), a layman who was a somewhat non-conformist Donatist and exercised a major influence on Augustine (who incorporated the essence of his Book of Rules, the first Latin Christian treatise on *hermeneutics, into his Christian Instruction) and on Western interpretations of the Apocalypse of John. Tyconius taught that the church was truly universal, a ‘bipartite’ mixture of the ‘cities’ of God and of the devil. His Paulinism also influenced Augustine.

It is sometimes said that the Donatists were against the links which the emperor, Constantine, was beginning to forge between church and *state at the moment the schism erupted, but the fact that they were prepared to appeal to the emperor for support argues against this conclusion. Donatist opposition to the Roman authorities stemmed from the attempts of the latter to persecute them. These attempts started in 317 and continued intermittently thereafter. A conference held at Carthage in 411 tried to reintegrate the Donatists into the Catholic Church, with some success. Augustine wrote against them, and justified their forcible coercion, and by the time he died, Donatism was a declining force. Its remnants may have partly merged with the Catholic Church during the Vandal occupation of North Africa (439–533) and the final phase of Roman rule (533–698).

R. G. CLOUSE

Bibliography

W. H. C. Frend, The Donatist Church (Oxford, 1952); M. A. Tilley, The Bible in Christian North Africa: The Donatist World (Philadelphia, 1997); idem (tr.), Donatist Martyr Stories (Liverpool, 1996).

G. L. BRAY

DOOYEWEERD, HERMAN (1894–1977)

A Dutch Christian jurist and philosopher, at the time of his death Dooyeweerd was professor emeritus at the Free University of Amsterdam and editor-in-chief of Philosophia Reformata, the scholarly journal of the Association for Calvinistic Philosophy. He was the founder, together with his colleague D. H. Th. Vollenhoven (1892–1978) and others, of the Christian philosophy now called the ‘Philosophy of the Cosmonomic Idea’.

Dooyeweerd was born into a family that had a strong attachment to the movement in the Netherlands which was headed by the Dutch theologian, journalist and statesman Abraham *Kuyper.

Dooyeweerd approached philosophy by way of investigating his own field of jurisprudence, penetrating to its foundations, which, he said, could be understood only in terms of a radically Christian world-and-life view. The great turning point of his thought came when he discovered that all thinking, and indeed all of life, has a religious root. He began to examine the foundations of jurisprudence and statecraft as adjunct director of the Abraham Kuyper Foundation in the Hague (1922–26). After assuming his professorship at the Free University in 1926, he worked out his principles more broadly and in greater detail and published in 1935–6 his magnum opus, the three-volumed Philosophy of the Law-Idea (or Cosmonomic Idea). The appearance of this seminal work marked the beginning of a new philosophy, which sought to base itself on the teachings of the Scriptures and to participate in the reformation of all of life in the name of Jesus Christ.

In all science and philosophy, Dooyeweerd argued, thought is guided by a threefold idea: that of the coherence (how things hang together), the deeper unity (where and how things come to a single focus), and the origin of all things (how, in this focusing, they manifest their dependence on the Creator-God, who has expressed and continues to express his will in his law, i.e. in the created order that holds for the entire cosmos). Dooyeweerd attempted throughout to demonstrate that thought, by its very nature, is dependent on underlying presuppositions, and ultimately on basic religious motives. He argued, furthermore, that science and philosophy can perform their respective tasks successfully only on a sound Christian foundation. Thus he entered, along with other reformational thinkers, into a critique of systems of thought that attempt to build on non-Christian foundations or seek to combine Christian and non-Christian (apostate) motifs.

Because of the intrinsic relation of thought and religion, Dooyeweerd’s critique is fundamentally a critique of theoretical thought itself, a theme that assumed greater prominence as his career progressed. Dooyeweerd’s philosophy has also made many positive contributions to other disciplines; for instance, in its examination of the foundations of jurisprudence, in its development of a theory of individuality structures as a foundation (e.g. of a Christian sociology), and in settling forth a new theory of the intertwining (enkapsis) of such individuality structures in man’s body, as a foundation for a Christian *anthropology.

Closely associated with Dooyeweerd’s name are those of the other original representatives, broadly speaking, of this philosophy, who, following the lead of Abraham Kuyper, have attempted to reform scholarship in the name of Christ: D. H. Th. Vollenhoven (history of philosophy); H. G. Stoker (b. 1899; psychology); and C. *Van Til (apologetics).

See also: PHILOSOPHY AND THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

Works: The Collected Works of Herman Dooyeweerd, eds. D. F. M. Strauss et al. (Lewiston, 1996–).

Studies: V. Brümmer, Transcendental Criticism and Christian Philosophy (Franeker, 1961); J. Chaplin, Herman Dooyeweerd:

Christian Philosopher of State and Civil Society (Notre Dame, IN, 2011); Yong-Joon Choi, Dialogue and Antithesis: A Philosophical Study on the Significance of Herman Dooyeweerd's Transcendental Critique (Cheltenham, 2006); C. T. McIntire (ed.), The Legacy of Herman Dooyeweerd: Reflections on Critical Philosophy in the Christian Tradition (Lanham and Toronto, 1986).

R. D. KNUDSEN

DORT, CANONS OF

The *Synod of Dort (Dordrecht, 1618–19) was an ecclesial gathering whose main concern was to address theological controversies that surrounded the ideas of James *Arminius (Dutch name Jakob Hermandszoon). In 1610, after Arminius' death, his followers wrote five key articles of remonstrance (from which they get their name, Remonstrants) that outline their disagreement with key Calvinistic doctrines.

Since the Canons of Dort are a direct response to the Remonstrants' five articles, they are sometimes known as the 'Five Articles against the Remonstrants'. In actuality, however, there are really only four headings or points in the Canons, since Dort combines the third and fourth Remonstrance headings, treating them together. Each section contains articles of affirmation, as well as articles of rejection.

The five major heads were as follows. The First Head is on divine *predestination. It affirms not only the justice and love of God, but also that his sovereign election is based on his own good pleasure and not founded on 'foreseen faith'. In this section the language of 'passed by' is employed for the non-elect, ensuring God is not understood as the 'author of sin', since he merely leaves them to their own rebellion. The Second Head is on the death of Christ, and it emphasizes the infinite worth and value of the *atonement, which is given with 'saving efficacy . . . to all the elect'. Christ died on the cross for his people, and not merely for a potential number that may be saved. The Third and Fourth Heads, which are combined, focus on the extent to which humanity, after the fall of Adam, is wholly affected by *sin in mind, heart, will and affections. Thus, sinful humanity is neither 'able nor willing to return to God' in light of their depravity, and it thus takes God's Spirit to bring life where there is only death and rebellion. The Spirit does not merely make regeneration possible, but rather actual, bringing faith and true conversion. In this light the gospel should be preached 'to all nations, and to all persons . . . without distinction'. Finally, the Fifth Head explores the *perseverance of the saints, which really emphasizes God's faithfulness and preserving grace, rather than the saints' consistency.

While there was unity about these doctrines, and agreement that they should be preached 'in due time and place', there was clear concern to avoid potential abuse – they must be handled with 'the spirit of discretion and piety'. Rightly handled, these doctrines 'enliven' and 'comfort' God's people and should not be used to 'investigate the secret ways of God'.

See also: REFORMED THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

'The Canons of the Synod of Dort' in J. Pelikan and V. R. Hotchkiss (eds.), Creeeds and Confessions of Faith in the Christian Tradition (New Haven, 2003); 'Canones Synodi Dordrechtanae' in P. Schaff (ed.), The Creeeds of Christendom: The Evangelical Protestant Creeeds (Grand Rapids, 1996); P. Y. De Jong (ed.), Crisis in the Reformed Churches: Essays in Commemoration of the Great Synod of Dort, 1618–1619 (Grand Rapids, 1968); D. Nobbs, Theocracy and Toleration: A Study of the Disputes in Dutch Calvinism from 1600 to 1650 (Cambridge, 1938); W. van 't Spijker, et al., De Synode Van Dordrecht in 1618 En 1619 (Houten, 1987).

K. M. KAPIC

DORT, SYNOD OF

This was a gathering of representatives of the international *Reformed community intended to end disagreements over the doctrine of *predestination which had persisted through the late sixteenth century. The synod was held in 1618–19 in Dort or Dordrecht by invitation of the government of the Netherlands, after civil war in which the party which favoured the more predestinarian position gained power. There were sixty-two representatives of the Dutch provinces and twenty-four foreign delegates.

Very considerable dissension had arisen in the Netherlands at the beginning of the century concerning the understanding of divine *sovereignty. This centred for a period in the teaching of *Arminius, but continued unabated after his death. In 1610 a document known as the Remonstrance was issued by those who were restless with the Reformed doctrine of predestination as it had developed under *Calvin and *Beza. It affirmed: (1) God's election is of all those who, according to his foresight, will have *faith in Christ and *persevere to the end; (2) the intent of the redemptive work of Christ was the salvation of all human beings but forgiveness is actually given only to those who believe; (3) fallen humanity is incapable of any good and specifically of saving faith, except by the intervention of the *Holy Spirit; (4) while *grace is necessary for all good, it is not irresistible; (5) the question of perseverance must be more carefully studied from *Scripture before any firm conclusion can be reached.

A number of conferences, notably at The Hague (1611) and at Delft (1613), did not resolve the questions. Resolution was therefore sought in a large gathering in which not only the Dutch churches but the international Reformed community would be represented. The issues were considered in the order of the Remonstrance, with the understanding that the third and fourth points were considered jointly. In the deliberations the Remonstrants did not have a part; they were viewed as accused of *heresy and subject to trial, rather than as members of the synodical party. The conclusions of the synod were set out in what are known as the *Canons of Dort, consisting of four chapters with a number of articles and a rejection of errors. The chapters relate respectively to sovereign predestination, definite *atonement, radical depravity (see *Sin) and effectual grace, and the perseverance of God with the saints. It is from this document that the articulation of five-point Calvinism has arisen.

In spite of certain differences among the delegates, particularly concerning the second point, there was a general approval of the Canons. They were worded at times in such a way as to accommodate certain differences of emphasis. In particular, the rejection of errors has often been thought to embody a very harsh repudiation of Arminianism. The Canons, complete with rejection of errors, were approved as a formulation of the faith of the Reformed Church of the Netherlands, and ministers were required to subscribe to them. This requirement was not maintained seriously in later times, but it still functions in the Netherlands and in churches of Dutch extraction in South Africa and the United States. In 1620 at the National Synod of Alais, French Reformed pastors were similarly enjoined to subscribe to the Canons.

Those who oppose the conclusions of Dort are almost unanimous in thinking that the synod was unduly harsh with the Arminian leaders and their views and that the Canons embody a scholastic form of doctrine which is foreign to the Scriptures. Those who approve of them ordinarily judge that the Reformed consensus on these difficult topics was expressed in a proper and balanced manner, and that a grievous deviation was thus warded off for at least a century in Reformed thinking. The subsequent history of the Arminians in the Netherlands, and the direction of Arminian bodies since that time, tend to confirm this opinion in the minds of traditional Calvinists, although some feel that if Arminian leaders had been treated more amicably at Dort and later, they might not have so quickly moved into positions which were in stark opposition to Reformed orthodoxy.

Bibliography

A. Hoekema, 'A New English Translation of the Canons of Dort', CTJ 3, pp. 133–161; P. Schaff, Creeds of Christendom (New York, 1919). A modern translation is found in the Acta of the 1985 Synod of the Christian Reformed Church.

Studies: P. Y. De Jong (ed.), Crisis in the Reformed Churches (Grand Rapids, 1968); W. R. Godfrey, Tensions within International Calvinism: The Debate on the Atonement at the Synod of Dort, 1618–1619, PhD diss. (Stanford, 1974); W. R. Godfrey and J. L. Boyd III (eds.), Through Christ's Word (Phillipsburg, 1985); J. I. Packer, 'Arminianisms', The Manifold Grace of God (Puritan and Reformed Studies Conference Papers, London, 1968); T. Scott, The Articles of the Synod of Dort (Utica, 1831).

R. NICOLE

DOSTOEVSKY, FYODOR MIKHAILOVICH (1821–81)

Brought up in a pious Russian Orthodox home, as a young man Dostoevsky went through a period of serious doubt. Exile in Siberia (1849–59) helped him to reaffirm his commitment to Christian principles, as embodied in the traditions and spirituality of the Russian church, and to develop a sense of the 'messianic destiny' of the Russian people. As a novelist, Dostoevsky gave expression in different ways to concepts such as the tremendous power of evil, the dangers of Roman Catholicism and socialism (which Dostoevsky tended to equate with each other), of individualism, indeed of any philosophy which did not give God his rightful place and recognize the salvific value of *suffering.

Dostoevsky was not, however, a systematic thinker. He did not write works of philosophy and theology, still less novels about abstract ideas. As a brilliant, creative writer, he has left us a series of unforgettable characters motivated by many different kinds of ideas and passions, some of which were those of the author himself. Undoubtedly, the most powerful exposition of ideas occurs in the 'Legend of the Grand Inquisitor' (The Brothers Karamazov, Book 5, ch. 5), of which Dostoevsky makes Ivan Karamazov the author. Dostoevsky aimed to portray the bankruptcy and pernicious influence of the philosophy of Ivan Karamazov/the Grand Inquisitor which led to man's putting himself in the place of God. This, Dostoevsky felt, was the heresy both of Roman Catholicism, whose 'Grand Inquisitor' condemns Christ for rejecting the three temptations in the wilderness, and also of socialism.

Bibliography

J. Frank, Dostoevsky, 5 vols. (Princeton, 1976–2003); A. B. Gibson, The Religion of Dostoevsky (London, 1973).

M. DOWLING

DOUBT

While there are many categories that explain the concept of doubt, one of the recognizable forms was expressed by René *Descartes. For Descartes, to move forward in knowledge and understanding was to move from doubt to certainty, so his first principle of knowledge was to begin in doubt. By employing this method, he believed that he avoided prejudice and misleading judgments. Descartes explained, 'The first of these was to accept nothing as true which I did not clearly recognise to be so; that is to say, carefully to avoid precipitation and prejudice in judgments, and to accept in them nothing more than what was presented to my mind so clearly and distinctly that could have no occasion to doubt it' (Discourse on Method, p. 82). For Descartes, doubt was the first step in producing clarity for truth statements. Yet elsewhere Descartes wrote of such an experience of doubting, 'It feels as if I have fallen unexpectedly into a deep whirlpool which tumbles me around so that I can neither stand on the bottom or swim up to the top' (Meditations on First Philosophy, 'Second Meditation', p. 16). Into this philosophical account of doubt Descartes appeared to think of knowledge, understanding and perception as grounded in propositional statements. Doubt thus prepared the way for statements on *truth and falsity, but he could also include distrust as part of doubt. Thus one could believe in the existence of God but doubt whether God could be trusted.

Søren *Kierkegaard established a different model for creating knowledge, understanding and perception in relation to doubt. Kierkegaard used the OT character, Abraham, as a type of dialogue partner in attaining knowledge. In Fear and Trembling, Abraham began in obedience, moved to uncertainty (the command to sacrifice Isaac), and then to understanding and trust. Doubt, or uncertainty, was not the starting point for knowledge, yet doubt was not disconnected from human experience. With Kierkegaard, doubt was part of the move to clearer understanding, yet clarity through obedience overcomes doubt. In this sense, as developed by Kierkegaard, it is possible to interpret one of the healing miracles of Jesus. Just before Jesus healed a young boy and enquired whether the father believed, the father responded, 'I do believe; help me overcome my unbelief!' (Mark 9:24).

While both Kierkegaard and Descartes accepted that it is possible to believe in the existence of God yet doubt that 'God was reconciling the world to himself in Christ' (2 Cor. 5:19), they would differ on the method of overcoming such doubt. Kierkegaard was not confident in the rationalist approach of Descartes and, instead, placed greater confidence in the priority of obedience. If Kierkegaard expressed a closer alignment to the theological task, in one sense we can understand that the theological task is never a completed project. Serious deconstructive doubt can only be reconstructed in obedience to the objective reality of a God who established communication through *revelation. With this in mind, doubt can be overcome along Kierkegaardian lines in the priority of obedience, or the continuous thinking in fresh ways through obedience.

Doubt, then, is not simply a 'No' to propositions as is the tendency with Descartes' *rationalistic philosophical system. Doubt can be more fluid and dynamic, but it still raises important questions within the Christian faith. Doubt, for Karl *Barth, can pertain to the experience of remaining uncommitted: it is uncertainty without resolution. According to Barth, such doubt or uncertainty can be resolved in obedience to God's word (Evangelical Theology, p. 125). This approach is closer to Kierkegaard than Descartes, and in this sense, doubt can be resolved in the healing or transformation of the mind through God's grace. Unresolved doubt is more familiar to the non-theological world, and for a Christian to live in such a world creates disorder. Barth used the metaphor of disability, stating that such a person is 'a theologian lame and limping on one foot' (Evangelical Theology, p. 129).

Barth's articulation of doubt provides a hermeneutic for Jas 1:6–8. To doubt, according to the epistle, is to be tossed by the wind in the sea without a rudder. In other words, using secular philosophical approaches leaves a person unstable in a double-minded situation. Such a condition leaves a person outside the full understanding of God's grace.

No-one can escape doubt in its various forms, but there is no ultimate despair, since doubt does not have the final word. As Barth prayerfully insisted, '... again he may obtain a glimpse when he begs God, "Thy Kingdom come!" Even within this boundary, without being able simply to do away with doubt, he can still offer resistance ...' (Evangelical Theology, p. 112).

Bibliography

K. Barth, Evangelical Theology: An Introduction, tr. G. Foley (Grand Rapids, 1963); R. Descartes, 'Discourse on the Method of Rightly Conducting the Reason and Seeking for Truth in the Sciences', in Key Philosophical Writings (ET, Hertfordshire, 1997); idem, Meditations on First Philosophy (ET, Cambridge, 1996 [1641]); S. Kierkegaard, Fear and Trembling, tr. W. Lowrie (Princeton, 1954).

D. L. RAINEY

DOXOLOGY

Doxology is the profound note of worship from believing Christian communities at the heart of all offering of true praise and worship to *God. The exaltation of the living God, revealed to people in the Lord Jesus Christ and affirmed in the lives of believers through the indwelling of the *Holy Spirit is central to the Christian experience. It has a primary association with the offering to the triune God of formal worship within communities of Christians, but in more recent times has also become associated with an approach to theological reflection which is worked out in a context of worship.

The classic doxological text from liturgy might be seen in the words of the hymn:

Praise God, from whom all blessing flow;
Praise Him, all creatures here below;
Praise Him above, you heavenly host;
Praise Father, Son and Holy Ghost.
(Thomas Ken, 1637–1711)

In such a text the key themes of doxology are exposed. The context is worship, the expression of praise is orthodox trinitarian, the scope of the praise is from the whole oikoumenē (created and inhabited earth), together with the company of heaven, and the central affirmation is that the triune God is the true source of blessing and hope. For many theologians, it is an axiom that true primary theology begins in the context of the community of faith. Furthermore, the gathering community of faith is formed in the life of worship and immersion in the *Scriptures. From such a beginning, discipleship, diaconal life, theological engagement and missionary enterprise flow. The exploration of theology or doctrine becomes a barren and fatal exercise when divorced from the offering of praise and worship, a mere intellectual discipline lost in the world of academia. Theology rooted in doxology takes seriously the NT imperative to be 'transformed by the renewing of your mind', so that you 'will be able to test and approve what God's will is' (Rom. 12:1–2), and by the activity of the Holy Spirit enabling believers to make the affirmation of praise, 'My Lord and my God!' (John 20:28).

Doxology, then, is not simply a note, a sub-theme or point for analytical reflection within the general theological enterprise. It is an undergirding in both worship and theological construction from beginning to end of the whole response that believers in the normative experience of the community in Christ, and by derivation, as individuals, make to the gracious offering of salvific love by the triune God.

Doxological affirmations are ‘expressions of praise to the God who enters into relationship with us’ (W. Pannenberg, Basic Questions in Theology, vol. 1, pp. 236–238). It is both an Alpha and an Omega of the worship and of the theologizing of the believing community arising out of community reflection in the Scriptures. Such community engagement and reflection takes place where there is a Christological hermeneutical key asserting that ‘at the name of Jesus, every knee should bow’ (Phil. 2:10), and where the Scriptures themselves are understood to be the divinely inspired: OT and NT Scriptures having supreme authority as the written word of God and being fully trustworthy for faith and conduct.

Doxology is at the heart of the life of communities of faith, not only in worship – especially in the celebration of the *Eucharist where the resounding note is doxological as believers engage in the anamnesis (‘remembrance’) of the passion and resurrection of Christ and enjoy an arrabōn (foretaste) of the banquet of the kingdom of God – but in the orthopraxy of the community lived out day by day. This is actualized in the way such believing communities fulfil their missional lives in the midst of the world. Doxology does not cease in worship, but is affirmed in the ministries of the communities and is a mark of authentic discipleship. Thus, there is a natural flow from the praise of the community gathered in worship, breaking open the word of God and breaking open the bread, into the offering of prayers – thanksgiving, intercession and supplication – by the individual believer, and on into the orthopraxy of the life of the believers as communities and individuals engaged in the realities of the world, affirming in all that they do the essential goodness of creation and the loving goodness of the Creator, who is drawing the faithful towards his kingdom where eternity will ring with the doxology of praise.

See also: LITURGY; WORSHIP.

Bibliography

T. Bradshaw, Praying as Believing: The Lord’s Prayer and the Christian Doctrine of God (Macon, 1998); S. J. Grenz, Theology for the Community of God (Carlisle, 1994); D. W. Hardy and D. F. Ford, Jubilate: Theology in Praise (London, 1984); J. W. McClendon, Jr, Systematic Theology, 3 vols. (Nashville, 1986–2000); A. E. McGrath, Christian Theology: An Introduction (Oxford, 1994); W. Pannenberg, Basic Questions in Theology, 3 vols. (London, 1973); G. Wainwright, Doxology (London, 1980).

K. JONES

DUALISM

The term ‘dualism’ refers generally to the existence within any particular domain of two fundamental (i.e. irreducible) kinds of substances or principles. Dualism must be distinguished, then, from *monism, according to which there is only one fundamental kind, and (less commonly) with pluralism, according to which there are multiple such kinds. It thus faces two key tasks. First, it must defend its assertion that there are two and only two kinds in any particular domain. And second, it must offer some account of the relationship that obtains between them. This latter task is typically complicated by the fact that dualism tends to emphasize the differences between the two in order to ward off any attempt to conflate them.

In Christian theology it is possible to discern at least four different domains in which it seems necessary to affirm or deny some form of dualism.

God and creation. Christian theology has often manoeuvred between two poles in its understanding of the relationship between *God and *creation: that of affirming God’s radical transcendence (i.e. God is completely separate from and wholly other than creation) and that of maintaining God’s immanence (i.e. God is intimately involved in and possibly even inseparable from the world). The former offers a dualistic account, positing God and creation as distinct kinds. The latter tends toward a monistic understanding, at times even going so far as to affirm a *pantheistic identification of God and creation. Traditionally, most theologians have endeavoured to affirm that God is distinct from creation as its Creator, while remaining intimately involved in all of its myriad aspects.

The mind and the body. Similarly, the human body can be understood dualistically, comprising a mental and physical substance, or monistically, either as a single material substance or, rather less commonly, as a mental or spiritual substance.

On a dualistic account, the human person is understood to comprise two distinct substances.

For some, this involves identifying the human person with a 'higher' substance (the mind) trapped in a 'lower' substance (the body), from which it longs to be freed (*Platonic dualism). Others distinguish the two substances primarily in terms of their radically differing properties (Cartesian dualism, see *Descartes). Both approaches have come under significant criticism for their ostensible denigration of the physical and their apparent inability to explain how such discrete substances could interact.

More recently, the advances of modern science, with its awareness of the extent to which a person's physical body affects his or her mental life, and developments in biblical studies, with a growing consensus that the Bible presents the human person as a whole person, have contributed to a move away from these earlier forms of dualism. In response, many have retained the dualistic framework, along with some of its concomitant problems, while arguing for a greater appreciation of the intimate interrelation between the two substances and the importance of identifying the person with their union, rather than with one substance alone ('holistic' dualism). Others have rejected the dualistic framework entirely. Opting for a monistic approach, these thinkers contend that we should view the human person as an entirely physical being, albeit one with mental aspects ('non-reductive', 'emergent' or 'dual aspect' physicalism). This approach has been criticized in turn by those who argue that the biblical texts affirm a duality within the whole human person, and by others for being unable to maintain the causal significance of the mind in an exclusively physical being (i.e. how ideas or thoughts can affect a physical thing).

Moral and physical evil. Some systems of thought have attempted to account for moral and physical evil by positing two principles, one good and the other evil, locked together in conflict (e.g. Zoroastrianism). Although some have seen a similar form of cosmic dualism in the 'war' between God and Satan (see *Devils and demons), Christian theology has consistently rejected the idea that God and Satan are equal powers. Instead, Christian theologians typically explain the existence of *evil as the result of the free (and in the Augustinian tradition God-ordained) moral actions of God's creatures.

Reason and revelation. According to many theologians and philosophers, we must distinguish between truths that are humanly ascertainable through reason or sense experience, and those that may be known only through divine *revelation. In its weaker form, this epistemological dualism maintains that the truths of revelation are fully rational, even if they transcend the ability of human reason to fully comprehend their rationality. A stronger form stipulates that revealed truths are so discontinuous with human reason as to be ultimately irrational. Rejecting this dualistic emphasis, others have argued for a form of epistemological monism that views revealed truths as a mere restatement of that which is otherwise discernible by reason.

Bibliography

W. S. Brown, N. C. Murphy and H. N. Malony (eds.), Whatever Happened to the Soul? Scientific and Theological Portraits of Human Nature (Minneapolis, 1998); J. W. Cooper, Body, Soul, and Life Everlasting (Grand Rapids, 2000); K. Corcoran (ed.), Soul, Body, and Survival: Essays on the Metaphysics of Human Persons (Ithaca and London, 2001); J. Foster, The Immaterial Self: A Defense of the Cartesian Dualist Conception of the Mind (London, 1991); J. L. Green and S. L. Palmer (eds.), In Search of the Soul: Four Views on the Mind-Body Problem (Downers Grove, 2005); J. P. Moreland and S. B. Rae, Body and Soul: Human Nature and the Crisis in Ethics (Downers Grove, 2000); R. Swinburne, The Evolution of the Soul (Oxford, 1986).

M. CORTEZ

DUNS SCOTUS, JOHN (1255/6–1308)

Born in Scotland, at Maxton-on-Tweed or Duns, Duns Scotus was accepted for the *Franciscan order at the age of fifteen. In 1291 he was ordained priest, having studied theology, probably at Oxford and at Paris, where he also studied between 1294 and 1297. By 1302 he was teaching at Paris, having already taught at Oxford and Cambridge. But the following year he was forced to leave Paris and return to Oxford. In 1304 he returned to Paris, to resume his teaching. But again his stay was brief; in 1307 he was transferred to Cologne, where he taught at the Franciscan House of Studies until his premature death.

Because Duns died young, he never wrote a Summa Theologica. He wrote two commentaries on Peter *Lombard's Sentences, of which the Opus Oxoniense (Oxford Work), a synthesis of his various sets of lectures on the Sentences, is his most important work, outlining his thought as a whole. Unfortunately, he did not live to revise it fully, and this task was continued by his disciples. The modern critical edition seeks to restore it to the form in which Duns himself left it. Duns's second most important work, and probably his last, is his Quaestiones Quodlibetales (Various Questions). This is clearer and more methodical than his earlier works and so provides a valuable supplement to the Opus Oxoniense. Duns's writings are not easy to read, due partly to his style and partly to the fact that he died before he could present his thought in a definitive form. Their difficulty earned him the title 'Subtle Doctor'. The sixteenth-century humanists and Reformers were less polite and coined the word 'dunce' from his name.

As a Franciscan, Duns followed in the *Augustinian tradition of *Bonaventura. He attacked the rival *Aristotelian tradition, especially the teaching of *Thomas Aquinas. But Duns was not an uncritical supporter of the Franciscan tradition. He revised it in the light of Aristotelian philosophy, rejecting Bonaventura's theory of divine illumination, for instance.

Thomas believed in the primacy of reason and knowledge over the *will. The will follows what reason presents to it as the highest good. God's will can therefore be explained by the use of reason. Duns, by contrast, stressed the primacy of the will. Reason shows the will what is possible, but the will is free to choose whichever option it wants to. The freedom of the will means that it does not simply follow whatever reason dictates.

Two major implications follow from this. Duns stressed the freedom of God. Things are the way that they are, not because reason requires it, but because God freely chose it. But God's will is not arbitrary or beyond all constraint. He cannot contradict himself, for instance. One aspect of God's freedom lies in his *predestination. First, he predestines Peter (representing the elect) to eternal glory. Secondly, he decides to give Peter the means to this end – grace. Thirdly, he permits both Peter and Judas (representing the reprobate) to sin. Finally, Peter is saved by God's grace, while Judas is justly rejected because he perseveres in sin.

Duns's stress on the freedom of God means that the role of reason and philosophy is necessarily limited. While earlier apologists, such as *Anselm, had sought to demonstrate rationally that the incarnation and the cross had to happen, Duns held that they happened because God chose that they should. This emphasized God's freedom, but also limited the possibility of showing such doctrines to be reasonable. In his stress on God's freedom, Duns went so far as to suggest that the Son would have become incarnate even had man not sinned, thus making the incarnation a free choice on God's part, not a necessity imposed upon him by man's sin. Duns believed that reason and philosophy could prove God's existence and some of his attributes. But much that Thomas believed to be demonstrable by reason (God's goodness, justice, mercy, predestination) Duns held to be known only by revelation. Such doctrines are accepted by faith alone, not proved by reason. But Duns agreed with Thomas that the truths of theology are never contrary to reason.

Duns is famous as the first major advocate of the doctrine of *Mary's immaculate conception. The predominant view at this time was that Mary had been freed from sin after her conception, but before her birth. Duns was the one who began to turn the tide, and he did this in a way that was remarkable for one with so little confidence in the power of reason to tell us about God. He argued that it is more perfect to preserve someone from original sin than to liberate them from it. Jesus Christ, as the perfect Redeemer, must have redeemed someone in the most perfect way possible – and who more fittingly than his mother? By presenting Mary's immaculate conception as the most perfect form of redemption, Duns defused the major objection to the doctrine: that it would mean that Mary did not need redemption. He himself claimed no more for the immaculate conception than its probability. But he argued that if there are a number of options, all of which are consistent with the teaching of Scripture and the church, one is to be chosen which ascribes the most glory to Mary. This principle, in addition to his argument for the immaculate conception, is of great value to those who wish to further the growth of Mariology, and Duns has been duly rewarded with the title 'Marian Doctor'.

See also: FAITH AND REASON.

Bibliography

Works: Critical edition: C. Balic (ed.), Opera Omnia (Vatican City, 1950ff.).

Studies: E. Bettoni, Duns Scotus: The Basic Principles of his Philosophy (Washington, DC, 1961); W. A. Frank and A. B. Wolter, Duns Scotus, Metaphysician (West Lafayette, 1995); J. K. Ryan and B. M. Bonansea (eds.), John Duns Scotus 1265–1965 (Washington, DC, 1965); T. Williams, The Cambridge Companion to Duns Scotus (Cambridge, 2002).

A. N. S. LANE

DURKHEIM, EMILE (1858–1917)

A French sociologist in the *positivist tradition, generally regarded, with Max *Weber, as a founder of modern sociological theory. His most significant work on religion was The Elementary Forms of the Religious Life (1912). He argued that one of the basic characteristics of religion is the classification of all things into two categories, the sacred and the profane. 'Beliefs, myths, dogmas and legends are . . . representations which express the nature of sacred things' (The Elementary Forms, p. 37). These representations are also collective, since they arise from human experience in society. The primal type of a 'collective representation' is the totem which is 'at once the symbol of the god and of the society' which means that 'the god and the society are only one' (p. 206). The symbols are created as a result of collective emotion, which means that Durkheim, who was influenced in this by W. Robertson Smith (1846–94), emphasized the primacy of ritual over *myth in the formation of religious traditions. Durkheim's views had some direct, if ephemeral, influence on biblical studies through the work of scholars such as A. Lods (1867–1948) and C. A. H. Guignebert (1867–1939), but he is more significant as the fountainhead of the sociological way of viewing religion in terms of its function, which has become a part of contemporary thought and with which contemporary theology has to come to terms.

See also: SOCIOLOGY OF RELIGION.

Bibliography

Works: The Elementary Forms of the Religious Life, tr. J. W. Swain (London, 1915).

Studies: S. Lukes, Emile Durkheim (Harmondsworth, 1973); idem, Emile Durkheim: His Life and Work (Stanford, 1985); J. Macquarrie, Twentieth-Century Religious Thought

(London, 2001); W. S. F. Pickering, Durkheim's Sociology of Religion: Themes and Theories (Cambridge, 2009); K. Thompson, Emile Durkheim (London, 2002).

D. A. HUGHES

DUTCH REFORMED THEOLOGY (SOUTH AFRICA)

As the epithet 'Dutch' implies, Dutch Reformed theology had its origins in the Reformation in the Netherlands. The early Dutch settlers, who came to the refreshment post established at the most southern point of Africa to supply ships on their trade route to the East, transplanted the Dutch Reformed Church from Dutch soil to African soil. For almost two centuries this theology developed in close contact with and along similar lines to Reformed theology in Holland. The three earliest Christian ecumenical confessions (i.e. the Apostles', the Nicene and the Athanasian *creeds) together with three Protestant *confessions of faith (viz. the Belgic Confession, the Heidelberg Catechism and the Canons of *Dort) formed its confessional basis. It is still mandatory for at least twelve sermons on the *Heidelberg Catechism to be preached annually in all congregations of the Dutch Reformed Church, and a summary of the catechism is still used in preparing catechumens for church membership.

When Britain finally took over the Dutch colony at the Cape in 1806, Presbyterian ministers from Scotland were imported to serve the Dutch Reformed Church with the intention of influencing the white inhabitants. This, in turn, introduced a strong evangelical-Puritan type of Scottish *Presbyterian theology, directed more at Scripture and its direct implications for the personal life of the individual, into the more confession-orientated Dutch Reformed theology, which tended to centre upon the teaching of the church and its way of existence. Under Andrew *Murray, in particular, this influence increased and spread, eventually turning Dutch Reformed theology into a strong *evangelical, *Puritan and conservative type of *Reformed theology.

After the Anglo-Boer War early in the twentieth century, the Dutch Reformed Church in the northern provinces (the Orange Free State and the Transvaal) identified strongly with the downtrodden Boers (Afrikaner people). Consequently Dutch Reformed theology became more people-orientated, which may be interpreted as a form of indigenization. Dutch Reformed theology gradually became deeply embedded in the newly awakened and growing nationalism of the white Afrikaans-speaking (Afrikaner) section of the South African population and subsequently developed in isolation from the rest of the country.

In the early 1930s the Dutch Reformed Church in South Africa experienced a severe theological crisis when a professor at the theological seminary for the training of ministers was accused of *heresy concerning the divine/human nature of Christ. As a result of this controversy, most of the theological students started to go to the Free University of Amsterdam instead of the University of Utrecht, where the majority had previously studied. The Free University of Amsterdam was considered to be more orthodox in its theological teaching. It was started by Abraham *Kuyper, who represented a strong confessional type of Reformed theology. The university stressed the confessional aspect of Reformed theology rather than the existing evangelical/Puritan types.

One aspect of confessional Reformed theology in particular, which developed strongly in the late 1930s, was the emphasis on the plurality in creation as stressed by Abraham Kuyper. This emphasis in Dutch Reformed theology eventually supplied the main motivation and justification for apartheid – the separation of *races in South Africa. Kuyper had strongly emphasized the variety in the created order. He insisted that because God loved this variety it must be preserved. This element in his theological thinking had a profound influence on some professors of theology in Holland, and it also found fertile ground in which to grow in South Africa. Variety was seen also to apply to people, and was given biblical sanction, it was believed, in the division of people at Babel and by Paul's words in Acts 17:26. The essence of plurality was that God created humankind as pluriform as the rest of creation. Therefore each race has a God-given responsibility to maintain its identity.

Another aspect of Dutch Reformed theology which should be mentioned is that it developed in Africa but in total isolation from Africa. The separation between Westerners and Africans (whites and blacks) caused this theology to remain almost purely Western with very little African influence. Dutch Reformed theology thus lost relevance for the African context in which it developed. A multi-racial education in Reformed theology may eventually turn Dutch Reformed theology into African Reformed theology, which will certainly contribute significantly towards the Christianization of the African context (see *Contextualization).

Bibliography

L. Cawood, The Churches and Race Relations in South Africa (Johannesburg, 1964); J. W. De Gruchy, The Church Struggle in South Africa (Cape Town, 1979); W. A. Landman, A Plea for Understanding: A Reply to the Reformed Church in America (Cape Town, 1968); Reply of the Dutch Reformed Church to the Report of the General Synod of Haarlem, 1973–1975, in Connection with the 'Programme to Combat Racism' (Cape Town and Pretoria, 1976); J. M. Sales, The Planting of the Churches in South Africa (Grand Rapids, 1971); J. H. P. Serfontein, Apartheid, Change and the N. G. Kerk (Johannesburg, 1982).

N. J. SMITH

DYOTHELITISM, see CHRISTOLOGY

EASTER

The earliest and greatest annual festival of the Christian calendar, called pascha in Greek (which also means Passover). On the basis of the evidence quoted by *Eusebius (EH 4.24.1–8), its existence can certainly be traced back to the time of Anicetus and Polycarp (c. 155) and probably to the time of the birth of Polycrates (c. 125). The reference in Epistle of the Apostles 15 may also date from c. 125. It is likely that the festival arose at Antioch c. 110, out of the weekly commemoration of Christ's resurrection on Sunday, the intention being to give special prominence to that Sunday which fell nearest to the actual season of the resurrection: the Sunday next after the Jewish Passover on 14 Nisan.

In the second century, the small Roman province of Asia observed Easter on 14 Nisan itself, whereas virtually the whole of the Christian world outside observed it on the Sunday following, and this has given rise to an alternative explanation of the origin of Easter. It has been supposed, notably by B. Lohse, that the practice of the province of Asia was the original Christian practice, and was a continuation of the observance of the Passover itself by Jewish Christians in NT times. However, it is very hard to understand why Jewish-Christian practice should have been preserved in Asia (a largely Gentile area, evangelized by the author of Col. 2:16–17 and Gal. 4:9–11) but not in Palestine or Syria (where there were more Jews than anywhere else, and where Jewish Christianity had its centre). So it is better to see the practice of Asia as presupposing the existence of Easter Sunday, and as an attempt to achieve greater precision than the rest of the Christian world, by transferring Easter from the Sunday after the Passover to the Passover itself. There is no evidence, incidentally, for the hypothesis that the church of Asia was celebrating Christ's death and the rest of the church his resurrection. The ancient Easter day celebrated both events (the separate Good Friday first appears in the fourth century).

The practice of Asia gave rise to an internal controversy between Melito and Claudius Apollinaris (c. 150–60) and to the worldwide Quartodeciman ('about the fourteenth') controversy (c. 190) in which the non-Asian view prevailed. Up to this point, all Christians dated Easter by following the decision made each year by the Jews about the Passover, which was still being fixed by observation; so they kept Easter either on the Sunday following the Jewish festival or (in Asia) on the actual Jewish festival day. However, since this dependence aroused Jewish mockery, in the third century Christians began to fix Easter independently, by astronomical calculation. The problem they faced was to reconcile the Jewish lunar year with the standard solar year of the Roman Empire. For this purpose the Roman church used a doubled eight-year cycle, and later an eighty-four-year cycle, while the Alexandrian church used the Metonic cycle of nineteen years, which was the most accurate of the three, and ultimately prevailed everywhere. In the meantime, however, the second great Easter controversy arose, between those who had begun to fix Easter astronomically, and those who continued to be guided by Jewish practice, and to hold it on the Sunday after the Passover. This controversy (often confused with the Quartodeciman, causing Quartodecimanism to be thought more lasting and widespread than it was) was resolved in principle by the Council of Nicaea in 325, the decision being in favour of the new method. The dissidents this time were not the church of Asia, but the churches of Syria, Cilicia and Mesopotamia.

The subsequent Easter controversies arose from the different methods of calculating Easter. The seventh-century controversy over the Celtic Easter was due to the Celtic churches having retained the eighty-four-year cycle after Rome had abandoned it. The controversy extending from the sixteenth century to our own day over the Julian and Gregorian calendars is due to the slight but accumulating inaccuracy in the Roman solar year, as established by Julius Caesar. By 1582 this had become significant enough for Pope Gregory XIII to have it corrected, but churches out of communion with Rome were naturally slow in adopting his reform. It was not adopted in England until 1752, when new Easter tables were introduced into the Book of Common Prayer; many of the Eastern churches have still not adopted it. Since Easter is a movable festival, related to the moon, it coincides in the Julian and Gregorian calendars about once every three years; but the fixed festivals, such as Christmas, now fall thirteen days later in the Julian calendar than in the Gregorian. The modern secular concept of a fixed Easter, which would mean abandoning the Jewish lunar year altogether, has met with some degree of favour in the Western churches, but none in the Eastern, where the only interest is in an agreed Easter.

Already in the second century the Easter celebrations were being continued over the following seven weeks, and a preparatory period of one or more days of fasting (the ultimate source of the later Lent) was also being added. The uniquely early origin of Easter, the scale of its celebrations, and the heat with which its date was debated, all bear witness to the unrivalled importance of Christ's death (see *Atonement) and *resurrection (the actual fulfilment of the ancient pascha) in primitive Christian thinking.

Bibliography

R. T. Beckwith, 'The Origin of the Festivals Easter and Whitsun', SL 13, 1979, pp. 1–20; P. F. Bradshaw and L. A. Hoffman (eds.), Passover and Easter: Origins and History to Modern Times (Notre Dame, 1999); J. G. Davies, Holy Week (London, 1963); A. A. McArthur, The Evolution of the Christian Year (London, 1953); T. Talley, 'Liturgical Times in the Ancient Church: The State of Research', SL 14, 1982, pp. 34–51; idem, The Origins of the Liturgical Year (New York, 1986).

R. T. BECKWITH

EASTERN ORTHODOX THEOLOGY

‘Eastern Orthodox’ refers to the churches in communion with the patriarchate of Constantinople (Istanbul). These include the national churches of Greece, Cyprus, Bulgaria, Romania, Serbia, Russia and Georgia, as well as the ancient patriarchates of Antioch, Jerusalem and Damascus. There are smaller Orthodox churches in a number of other countries, notably the USA, Britain and France, though these are composed mainly of immigrants and expatriates from Orthodox countries.

History

The historical development of Eastern Orthodox theology can be conveniently divided into five main stages. The first of these is the pre-Chalcedonian period (to 451). During this time the foundation of later Orthodoxy was laid in the writings of the Greek Fathers, of whom the most notable are *Athanasius, John *Chrysostom, *Cyril of Alexandria and the ‘Three Hierarchs’, known in the West as the Cappadocian Fathers. These are *Basil the Great, of Caesarea, *Gregory the Theologian, of Nazianzus, and Basil’s brother, *Gregory of Nyssa. These men, most of whom were virtually contemporaries, expounded the theology of the first ecumenical council, held at *Nicaea in 325, and ensured that their interpretation would carry the day at the second (*Constantinople, 381) and third (*Ephesus, 431). The main influence came from the *Alexandrian School of theology, which strongly emphasized the unity of the divine Christ, both before and after his *incarnation. There was also a great development of *trinitarian theology, largely thanks to Basil of Caesarea. The period ends with the fourth ecumenical council, held at *Chalcedon in 451. There the doctrine of Christ as one divine person in two natures, one human and one divine, was upheld (see *Christology), in spite of the objections of the Alexandrians (who favoured a doctrine of one nature in Christ), and the *Nestorians (who regarded the person as the result, not the cause, of the incarnation). After Chalcedon these groups split off to become the Nestorian Church, now a very small body of 50,000 members, and the *Monophysite Church, known in Egypt as *Coptic and in *Syria as Jacobite (after its sixth-century leader, Jacob Baradaeus). These churches still flourish, both in their countries of origin and in areas where they have spread, notably Ethiopia (Coptic) and South India (Jacobite).

The next phase was the early Byzantine period (451–843). This was dominated by Christological controversy, first against the Monophysites, and then against the *iconoclasts. The fifth ecumenical council (Constantinople, 553) tried to reconcile the churches of Egypt and Syria, but without success, and the attempt was formally abandoned at the sixth council (Constantinople, 680). The seventh and, in Orthodox eyes, last ecumenical council (Nicaea, 787) condemned the iconoclasts. The leading theologians of this period were Leontius of Byzantium (see *Hypostasis) and his namesake Leontius of Jerusalem (both sixth century), Maximus the Confessor and *John of Damascus. They gave Orthodox Christology a shape which reflects a deep and sophisticated appropriation of the dogmatic pronouncements of the Council of Chalcedon. The period is also notable for the development of Orthodox spirituality, especially the veneration of icons, the great liturgies, and the canonical regulations which govern the church’s life. These were codified at the so-called Quinisext Council, or Synod in Trullo, held at Constantinople in 691–92. The canons regulated such practices as clerical marriage, and the use of leavened bread in the Eucharist, which were rejected by the Western church. Many of the visible differences between Orthodoxy and Roman Catholicism can be traced to the canons of this council.

The third stage may be called the late Byzantine period (843–1452). During this time, Orthodoxy engaged in increasingly bitter polemic against Western theology and, as a counterweight to it, developed tendencies which were latent in the Eastern tradition. The main cause of dispute was the filioque clause, added to the Nicene Creed in the sixth century in Spain, and adopted officially at Rome c. 1014. The addition raised the question of papal authority in matters of doctrine, as well as the theological issue of the double procession of the *Holy Spirit. Photius, Patriarch of Constantinople from 858–67 and again from 880–86, led the opposition to the filioque clause, and his views are still repeated by Orthodox theologians today. On a more positive note, the period also witnessed a remarkable spiritual revival, which bore fruit first in the conversion of the Slavs (850–1000) and then in the practice of devotional meditation. The great names whose counsels are still followed by Orthodox monks today are *Symeon the New Theologian and Gregory *Palamas. The latter championed a monastic movement known as *Hesychasm, which practised a system of spiritual exercises not unlike yoga. This was bitterly resisted by Westernizing influences at Constantinople, but was declared to be orthodox in 1351. The Westernizers, who had been gaining in strength since the abortive union of the churches at the Council of Lyons in 1274, were now put on the defensive. A second union was promulgated at the Council of Florence in 1439, but it was never popular and was abandoned after Constantinople fell to the Turks in 1453.

Ironically, it was during the period of Turkish domination (1453–1821) that Western influence reached its peak in the Orthodox world. After the Reformation, all parties courted the Eastern churches, who were able to send many of their students to be educated in the West. This did not win Orthodoxy either to Rome or to the Protestant cause, but it made Orthodox theologians much more Western in their theological method and interests. In the seventeenth century, the patriarch successively of Alexandria and Constantinople, Cyril Lucaris (1572–1638), composed a Calvinistic *confession of faith, which was published at Geneva in 1629. This provoked a Catholicizing reaction, which can be seen in the Confessions of Peter Mogila (1596–1646) and Dositheus of Jerusalem (1641–1707). Both these confessions are now regarded as more faithful to Orthodoxy than that of Lucaris, but many modern Orthodox reject them because they reflect a theological method which is foreign to the Eastern tradition.

The modern period (1821 to the present) has been characterized chiefly by a recovery of the monastic traditions of Byzantine Orthodoxy and by the struggle of the church against persecution from both communism and Islam. During the nineteenth century, the established theological tradition of both Greece and Russia was almost completely subservient to German liberal Protestantism, and this trend has continued to some extent up to the present time. There developed an Orthodox dogmatic theology modelled on the West, as can be seen in the works of Chrestos Androustos (1869–1937), J. Karmiris (1904–92) and P. N. Trembelas (1886–1977; Dogmatique de l'église orthodoxe catholique, 3 vols., Chevetogne, 1966–68). An almost heretical *mysticism characterizes the leading *Russian theologians of the period, notably Alexis Khomiakov (1804–60) and Sergei *Bulgakov. These trends have produced a reaction, however, which is now very powerful. Beginning in the eighteenth century, with the edition of patristic texts known as the Philokalia, monastic ideas began to revive in the Orthodox world. These bore fruit in the twentieth-century revival of neo-Byzantinism, associated with the work of the Russians, Vladimir *Lossky and John *Meyendorff and with the Romanian theologian Dumitru *Staniloae. Orthodoxy is torn between liberal and conservative tendencies, with the latter appearing to be gaining the upper hand.

Characteristics

Orthodox theology differs from both Roman and Protestant teaching in a number of important respects. In general terms, it relies more on the philosophical base of Neoplatonism (see *Platonism), which the West in the main abandoned in the thirteenth century. It has a strongly mystical flavour, and fights shy of dogmatic definition as much as it can. Its authority is derived from 'tradition', which includes both the Scriptures, decisions of the *councils, especially the *Nicene Creed, and the Greek Fathers. The Latin Fathers before the eleventh century are honoured as part of this tradition as well, but in practice they are ignored. Also important are the testimony of the *liturgies, which have not changed for over a thousand years, and the veneration of icons, which is much more 'theological' in tone than any comparable devotion in the West.

The Orthodox doctrine of the *Trinity is superficially the same as the Western one, with the exception of the filioque clause, but in conception it is very different. The Orthodox put the primary stress on the persons of the Godhead, and tend to regard the Father as the hypostatization of the divine essence. He is the unique fountainhead of Deity (pēgē tēs theotētos), which explains why the Orthodox cannot accept that the Holy Spirit derives his being from the Son as well as from the Father. They also place great emphasis on the energies of God, a concept which is strange to Western minds. The Holy Spirit, for example, is said to proceed from the Father but to rest on the Son, whose energy he becomes. The concept is analogous to the Catholic notion of grace, though the Orthodox insist that they do not see the divine energy as a substance which can be infused into the believer.

This naturally affects their doctrine of *sanctification, and their sacramental theology. Orthodox believe in baptismal regeneration, and administer chrismation (confirmation) and Holy Communion to the newly baptized, including infants. They believe that the Holy Spirit descends on the elements of bread and wine by liturgical invocation (epiclēsis; see *Eucharist), but resist Roman Catholic ideas of transubstantiation. The believer is called to a life of *deification, which means transfiguration into the image and likeness of God. The supreme manifestation of this can be found in the ecstasy of the contemplative life, which occupies a much more important place in Orthodox spirituality than it does in Roman Catholicism.

By Western standards, Orthodoxy has a weak doctrine of *sin and *atonement. Sin is regarded as the effect of death and finitude, not as its cause. Salvation therefore tends to be seen primarily in terms of freedom from death, not as a release from guilt. In modern times this soteriology has made a great impact on Western theologians who for various reasons have recoiled from the Reformed doctrine of the atonement, and its influence can be seen in recent liturgical revisions.

Since 1961, Orthodox churches have participated in the World Council of Churches, which has forced them to take an interest in other kinds of theology. They have established very friendly relations with the non-Chalcedonian churches of the East, and have made some moves in the direction of Rome and the Protestant churches as well. On the whole, however, they remain by far the most closed of the major branches of Christendom. At the WCC their influence has mostly been exercised in favour of a more theological approach, and against political involvement. Today creative Orthodox thinking is more vital than at any time since the fourteenth century, and it offers itself as a conservative challenge to Western Christendom. There are a number of signs that its influence may be growing, and it is certain to become a major force in ecumenical circles in the future.

See also: ORIENTAL ORTHODOX THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

D. B. Clendenin, Eastern Orthodox Christianity: A Western Perspective (Grand Rapids, 1994); idem (ed.), Eastern Orthodox Theology: A Contemporary Reader (Grand Rapids, 2003); M. B. Cunningham and E. Theokritoff, The Cambridge Companion to Orthodox Christian Theology (Cambridge, 2008); V. Lossky, The Mystical Theology of the Eastern Church (Cambridge, 1957); G. A. Maloney, A History of Orthodox Theology since 1453 (Belmont, 1976); J. Meyendorff, Byzantine Theology (London, 1974); T. Ware, The Orthodox Church (London, 1993).

G. L. BRAY

EBELING, GERHARD (1912–2001)

Ebeling studied theology at Marburg under *Bultmann, at Zurich with *Brunner and at Berlin. After a time as a colleague of *Bonhoeffer in the theological seminary at Finkenwald (1936–7), he took charge of a provisional congregation of the *Confessing Church in Berlin. In 1946 he became Professor of Church History in Tübingen, moving to Systematic Theology in 1954. Two years later he transferred to Zurich to the chair of Systematic Theology, History of Theology and Symbolics. Here he founded the Institute of Hermeneutics (1962), finally retiring, as Professor of Fundamental Theology and Hermeneutics, in 1979.

Ebeling's theological thought shows him to be indebted equally to *Luther and *Schleiermacher. He was one of the editors of the Weimar edition of Luther's works (Weimarer Ausgabe) and of a complete edition of Schleiermacher. His unusually wide-ranging (historical, exegetical, dogmatic) monographs all concentrate on the attempt to interpret the relationship between God, man and the world as a continuum of living reality, to be experienced, understood and articulated by faith. His Dogmatik des christlichen Glaubens (Dogmatics of the Christian Faith, 3 vols., Tübingen, 1979) offered the Bultmann school's first substantial, systematic conspectus. In it Ebeling not only inculcates the basic and essential theological differentiations (e.g. between God and the world, visible and eternal life, political and evangelical use of biblical teaching), but also, with noteworthy impressiveness, makes us conscious that the proof of all Christian theology is prayer.

Bibliography

Many works in ET, including: God and Word (Philadelphia, 1967); Introduction to a Theological Theory of Language (London, 1973); Luther: An Introduction to His Thought (London, 1970); Word and Faith (London, 1963); The Word of God and Tradition (London, 1968).

Studies: S. P. Schilling, Contemporary Continental Theologians (London, 1966), ch. 6.

R. E. FRISCHE

EBIONISM

The Ebionites were a Jewish-Christian sect, first mentioned by Irenaeus, drawing its name from Hebrew ('ebyônîm*; 'the poor') but later dropping the title when it became a term of abuse (poverty of spirit and faith). Tertullian and Hippolytus erroneously believed the title referred to the sect's founder, Ebion. Early commentators on Ebionism (e.g. Origen and Eusebius) generally rely on hearsay and documents rather than first-hand evidence. However, Epiphanius and the Pseudo-Clementines provide important information on their doctrine, as does the Gospel of the Ebionites, which is heavily dependent on Matthew, the only Gospel they used. Their Christology was essentially *adoptionist. Jesus was a man who became the Messiah through obedience to the Jewish law (thus others might similarly become christ). They denied his pre-existence and the virgin birth; the Christ was believed to be an angelic being that entered Jesus at his baptism. Although they stressed the need of Jewish law, the Ebionites removed what they saw as interpolations, rejecting the sacrificial cult, monarchy, the validity of biblical prophetic books and anthropomorphic language used for God, and adopting vegetarianism, holy poverty and ritual ablutions. Sceptical of visions, Paul and his epistles were rejected on the grounds that he had not been an eyewitness of the earthly Jesus.

Bibliography

J. K. Elliott (ed.), 'The Gospel of the Ebionites', in The Apocryphal New Testament (Oxford and New York, 1993), pp. 14–16; A. F. J. Klijn and G. J. Reinink, Patristic Evidence of Jewish-Christian Sects (Supplements to Novum Testamentum 36; Leiden, 1973), pp. 19–43; H.-J. Schoeps, Jewish Christianity: Factional Disputes in the Early Church (ET, Philadelphia, 1969).

A. D. RICH

ECCLESIOLOGY, see CHURCH

ECKHART, see MYSTICAL THEOLOGY

ECOLOGY

Ecology (the study of ecos or place) was formally recognized as a separate discipline within biology by Ernst Haeckel in 1866; he defined it as 'the comprehensive science of the relationship of the organism to the environment'. Theologically, ecology, together with the related subject of environmentalism (which is wider in scope, involving the interaction of physical and geological factors as well as biological ones), can be regarded as the scientific study of *creation (Ps. 111:2).

The starting point for a theology of ecology is that the world belongs to *God (Ps. 24:1) and that God continues in active relation to the world as Creator (Isa. 42:5; John 1:1–3; Rev. 4:11), Redeemer (Eph. 1:10; Col. 1:20) and Sustainer (Ps. 104:27; Col. 1:17; Heb. 1:3). He rejoices in it, independently of any human witness (Job 38–39; Ps. 104:4–23), and he has committed its care to us (Gen. 1:28; 2:15). This responsibility is pictured in the relationship of Israel to the Promised Land: if Israel obeys YHWH, the created order within the land will be abundantly fruitful, but if Israel disobeys, the land itself will turn against them and ultimately drive them into exile. The treatment of the land is intimately linked with God's *covenant with his people (Deut. 27–30; Isa. 40–55).

Our privilege and task of creation care is commonly referred to as 'stewardship'. This term is disliked by some on the grounds that it implies an absent landlord, a feudal-style male hierarchy, an impossible task, or an arrogant assumption; such critics prefer a word such as 'trustee', 'co-worker', 'partner', 'priest', 'manager' or 'factor'.

Human actions have certainly damaged the world (over-fishing and over-grazing, deforestation, greenhouse gas emissions, release of toxic chemicals, etc.). Contrary to common assumptions (and former scientific conclusions), there is no intrinsic 'balance' or 'equilibrium' in the natural world. The illusion that there is derives from over-extrapolating the analogy between macrocosm ('nature') and microcosm ('individual bodies') or the recovery which often follows local disturbance.

Our ecological failures are traditionally linked to effects of the *fall described in Gen. 3, but this assumption needs examination: nature was certainly 'red in tooth and claw' before the advent of humankind (e.g. many species disappeared, predatory animals abounded, dinosaurs had arthritis), and there is no evidence from archaeology of any change in ecology when humans appeared on earth. The curses in Gen. 3 focus on the relationships of Adam and Eve with other creatures and with the land, rather than on the properties of the land itself. It should be noted, too, that Adam and Eve continued to exist physically after their expulsion from Eden – indeed all their children were born outside Eden, although Adam had been warned that he would die 'the day' that he ate the forbidden fruit (Gen. 2:17). The death introduced into the world by Adam's disobedience can best be understood as a break in relationship with God, a break healed by Christ's redeeming work (Eph. 2:1, 5, etc.). These considerations make it very difficult to maintain the traditional Western orthodoxy of a 'cosmic fall'. Apart from the overtly messianic passage in Isa. 11:6–10 (and 65:17–25), there is nothing in the OT to imply that the natural world itself is fallen or distorted in any way. God's declaration that creation is good in his eyes has not changed.

Ecological disorder is often attributed to Christian doctrine, following a much reprinted article on 'the historical roots of our ecologic crisis' by an American historian, Lynn White. In it, White placed the blame on 'an Occidental, voluntarist realization of the Christian dogma of man's transcendence of, and rightful mastery, over nature . . . [Our attitude is that] we are superior to nature, contemptuous of it, willing to use it for our slightest whim' (White, in Science 155, p. 1206). Whilst there is some historical truth in this judgment, it is based on a non-biblical understanding of human dominion as well as ignoring the widespread and influential *Benedictine tradition of stewardship.

Christian attitudes as parodied by White have certainly been prominent in those parts of the world influenced by the Western church and science, but they need to be qualified by two other important traditions – of the Orthodox Church and the 'Celtic' Church. Both of these are explicitly Christocentric whilst both are open to the dangers of *panentheism. For the Orthodox, our calling is to be 'priests of creation', continuing God's blessing in creation, preserving its beauty and nurturing its faithfulness, while the modern practice of 'Celtic Christianity' tends to spill over into *animism. Moreover, neither tradition fully incorporates the wildness and 'otherness' of the non-human world.

An important passage for a mature understanding of the environment is Rom 8:19–22, climaxing Paul's argument in Rom. 5–8 that the renewal of God's covenant results in the renewal of God's creation. Moule interprets Rom. 8:19–22 as meaning that 'man is responsible before God for nature. As long as man refuses to play the part assigned him by God, so long the entire world of nature is frustrated and dislocated. It is only when man is truly fitting into his proper position as a son in relation to God his father that the dislocation of nature will be reduced' (Man and Nature in the New Testament, p. 12). When Christ's *redeeming work and the empowering of the Spirit come together, we are enabled to recover the stewarding role we lost through the fall. Paul's message is one of hope for creation, just as the liberation of God's people from exile is linked by Isaiah with the rejoicing of all creation (Isa. 55:12–13). Kidner comes to the same conclusion in his Tyndale Commentary on Genesis: 'Leaderless the choir of creation can only grind in discord' (p. 73). Blocher argues similarly: 'If man obeys God, he would be the means of blessing the earth; but in his insatiable greed . . . and in his short-sighted selfishness, he pollutes and destroys it. He turns the garden into a desert (cf. Rev. 11:18). That is the main thrust of the curse of Genesis 3' (In the Beginning, p. 184).

Our understanding of the natural world should be theocentric – based on caring for a world created and sustained by God: neither anthropocentric (that the world is here chiefly for our use and enjoyment) nor bio- (or eco-) centric (that we are no more than a trivial component of an interdependent biosphere, as represented by the 'deep ecology' of Arne Naess or by James Lovelock's 'Gaia'). We share a common interest in and responsibility for the sustainability of the creation with all humankind and have no excuse for not making common cause with them; we differ from non-believers in being able to give a reason for the world's existence and hope for its future. The centuries-old concept that God is the author of both a Book of Words (the Bible) and a Book of Works (creation) is a powerful image. The books are written in very different languages, but only if we study them both will we have a full understanding of their author and our proper response (Ps. 19).

Christian awareness of the importance and implications of ecology has been rising rapidly in recent years, stimulated by secular concerns but spurred by rediscovering theological truths. Influenced by Jürgen Moltmann, the World Council of Churches in 1983 changed its long-standing 'Peace with Justice' programme into 'Justice, Peace and Integrity of Creation'. The General Synod of the Church of England produced major reports on the subject in 1969, 1986 and 2005; successive Lambeth Conferences have drawn attention to Christian responsibilities in the area; many denominations have issued their own environmental policies. In 2015 Pope Francis asserted that 'a true ecological approach must integrate questions of justice in debates on the environment, so as to hear both the cry of the earth and the cry of the poor' (Laudato Si', para 49), and many Catholic Bishops' Conferences have issued statements calling for Christian action (e.g. Christiansen and Grazer, 1996). Bartholomew of Constantinople (the 'Green Patriarch') has been particularly active in calling for environmental action; in 1995, he castigated crime against the natural world as sin. In 2006, the US National Association of Evangelicals issued an 'Evangelical Climate Initiative'. Many development agencies have pointed out that environmental care and poverty relief are tightly linked; there are important issues of environmental justice. Perhaps most importantly, the environment is increasingly seen as a fundamental doctrinal issue rather than nothing more than an enthusiasm for a minority.

See also: NATURE, THEOLOGY OF

Bibliography

R. Bauckham, Bible and Ecology (London, 2010); R. J. Berry (ed.), Environmental Stewardship (London and New York, 2006); idem (ed.), When Enough Is Enough (Leicester, 2007); J. J. Bimson, 'Reconsidering a Cosmic Fall', Science & Christian Belief, 18, 2006, pp. 63–81; H. Blocher, In the Beginning (Leicester, 1984); S. Bouma-Prediger, For the Beauty of the Earth (Grand Rapids, 2001); W. Brueggemann, The Land (Philadelphia, 1977); D. Christiansen and W. Grazer (eds.), And God Saw That It Was Good (Washington DC, 1996); D. G. Horrell, C. Hunt, C. Southgate and F. Stavrakopoulou (eds.), Ecological Hermeneutics (London and New York, 2010); D. J. Moo, 'Nature in the New Creation', Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society 49, 2006, pp. 449–488; C. F. D. Moule, Man and Nature in the New Testament (London, 1964); M. S. Northcott, The Environment and Christian Ethics (Cambridge, 1996); Pope Francis, Laudato Si' (London, 2015); L. White, 'The Historical Roots of Our Ecological Crisis', Science 155, 1967, pp. 1203–1207; R. S. White, Who Is to Blame? (Oxford and Grand Rapids, 2014); N. T. Wright, New Heavens, New Earth (Cambridge, 1999); idem, 'Creation and Covenant', in Paul: Fresh Perspectives (London, 2005).

R. J. BERRY

ECONOMY

The canonical tradition of the Orthodox Church employs the term 'economy' in a variety of meanings. Following the usage common from the classical period, economy means 'to administer'. I Constantinople Canon 2 uses economy in this sense when it directs the bishop of Alexandria 'to administer the affairs in Egypt alone'. Byzantine penitential discipline used economy similarly, but in the administration, or application, of a 'remedy . . . for the illness of sin', as enshrined in Trullo Canon 102. In this context, economy can be according to a strict observance or a lenient approach.

A subtle difference in meaning occurs whereby the latter meaning of economy has a sense akin to dispensatio in the West. In other words, the canons admit the possibility of canonical leniency, due to the 'necessity of the times' (Trullo Canon 37), in the administration of church life. As such, economy offers Orthodox canonists an accommodation to pastoral exigencies instead of the strict application of the text of the canons (akriveia). This meaning has developed further, most notably since the eighteenth century. It became understood less in the context of application, and more as principle of canonical leniency by itself, as a group of theologians, typically, though not exclusively, from the Greek-speaking world, put forward various explanations of how and when churchman can use economy. Others, usually from the Russian Orthodox Church, have argued that this view of economy presents merely an opinion and does not accurately reflect the tradition of the church.

See also: EASTERN ORTHODOX THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

J. Erickson, 'The Problem of Sacramental "Economy"', in J. Erickson, The Challenge of Our Past (Crestwood, 1991); A. de Halleux, "'Oikonomia" in the First Canon of Saint Basil', The Patristic and Byzantine Review 6, 1987, pp. 53–64; F. J. Thomson, 'Economy: An Examination of the Various Theories of Economy in the Orthodox Church', Journal of Theological Studies, n.s. 26, 1965, pp. 367–420.

A. RENTEL

ECUMENICAL MOVEMENT

Ecumenism is the attempt to foster unity between distinct groups of Christians. It typically entails the reconciliation or mutual recognition of doctrines, organizational structures and acts of witness and service. The more specific phraseology of the 'ecumenical movement' is associated with particular manifestations of ecumenism that have developed since the early twentieth century, but ecumenism as such has much deeper historical roots.

The term 'ecumenical' is derived from the Greek oikumene, meaning the whole inhabited earth. It is used in the NT both in this general sense (Luke 2:1; Acts 11:28), and more specifically in relation to the global mission of God (Matt. 24:14; Heb. 2:5). As the early church realized its part in this mission, so its identity as a universal body came to be designated as ecumenical. Hence the seven 'ecumenical *councils' that took place between the fourth and the eighth centuries, at which Western and Eastern churches were represented, and at which key creeds, declarations and policies were agreed. This 'undivided Church' subsequently fragmented in the Great Schism of 1054, in the splitting of Protestants from Roman Catholics at the *Reformation, and in subsequent intra-Protestant divergences such as those between *Lutherans, *Presbyterians, Independents and *Anabaptists. Henry VIII's breach with Rome in the 1530s was not so clearly a Protestant move, but the establishment of the Church of England (see *Anglicanism) with Henry as 'Supreme Head' constituted another significant fracture point. In time even finer distinctions would develop within Protestant traditions, so that by the late eighteenth century a host of Reformed, Baptist, Methodist and other sub-varieties would exist on both sides of the Atlantic, often with their respective churches and chapels in the same town.

The expansion of empire from this time fostered in many British Christians a more international perspective, and with it, a heart for world mission (see *Missiology). Often this was married to an enthusiasm generated by the various evangelical revivals that had taken place since the 1730s. While many of the mission agencies and movements that were formed in response to these developments had a singular denominational identity, some favoured a more interdenominational approach. The London Missionary Society was founded in 1795 by a group of Congregationalists, Anglicans, Presbyterians and Wesleyans and urged its missionaries to forswear ecclesial partisanship in their preaching. Similarly, the China Inland Mission was founded by Hudson Taylor in 1865 as an avowedly interdenominational body.

Reflecting these and other such endeavours, a diverse network of Protestants from Britain, America and the European continent joined together in 1846 to form the World's Evangelical Alliance. With its annual conferences, weeks of prayer and lobbying for religious liberties, the Alliance has justifiably been seen as a forerunner of the modern ecumenical movement. However, the birth of that movement proper is generally recognized as having taken place somewhat later, at the World Missionary Conference held in Edinburgh in June 1910. This conference was convened to review the mission work of 160-odd societies and churches, but its 1,200 delegates were also challenged to seek greater interdenominational cooperation. Similar challenges had been issued at earlier gatherings of Protestant missions, but Edinburgh also included Anglo-Catholics and gave a more prominent role to leaders of indigenous churches formed as a result of missionary activity. Not least thanks to its American chairman John R. Mott (1865–1955) and its British chief organizer Joseph Oldham (1874–1969), Edinburgh 1910 also bore a significant legacy. A Continuation Committee was formed which helped to generate three key ecumenical organizations. The first of these was the International Missionary Council (IMC). This was formed in New York in 1921 and went on to sponsor significant conferences in Jerusalem (1928), Madras (1938) and Whitby (1947). Having secured the rights of German missions after the war, the IMC focused on developing appropriate frameworks for mission among Jews and Muslims, as well as fostering greater coordination between mission agencies in Africa, Asia and Latin America.

The second major organization flowing from Edinburgh 1910 was the Life and Work Movement. Pioneered by the Swedish Archbishop Nathan Söderblom (1866–1931), this operated as a network of churches committed to shared Christian service and action, most notably in the area of reconciliation and peacemaking (see *Pacifism/peace). Inaugurated at Stockholm in 1925, it convened for a second conference at Oxford in 1937. The report of this latter conference, Church, Community and State, represents a landmark in modern Christian *social teaching.

Edinburgh 1910 largely avoided those matters of doctrine and polity which had been the ‘presenting issues’ of past church division, and the early days of the Life and Work Movement had in fact been associated with the slogan ‘Doctrine divides, service unites’. However, a third organization arose which would tackle these difficult areas head-on.

The *Faith and Order movement was constituted at Lausanne in 1927 under the guidance of the American Episcopalian bishop Charles H. Brent (1862–1929). Some 400 attendees from ninety churches identified core areas of theological agreement and disagreement, and a further conference was held at Edinburgh in 1937. This latter gathering was chaired by William *Temple, then Archbishop of York, later to become Archbishop of Canterbury. This Edinburgh conference also echoed calls for a closer-knit global ecumenical structure, proposing that the Life and Work and Faith and Order movements should come together in a ‘*World Council of Churches’ (WCC). An inaugural assembly was planned for this new body in 1941, but the Second World War intervened.

Eventually, in August 1948, the first assembly of the WCC was held in Amsterdam with 351 delegates from 147 churches present. However, the Roman Catholic Church did not join the Council, and despite increased engagement in more recent years, is still not a full member. In 1928, Pope Pius XI had attacked the fledgling ecumenical movement in his encyclical Mortalium animos, but by 1949, Pius XII’s decree Ecclesia sancta struck a far more conciliatory note: although the largely Protestant membership of the WCC was ‘dissident from the Catholic church’, their common witness to the gospel was, it declared, ‘an inspiring grace of the Holy Spirit’.

At Amsterdam the WCC had defined itself as ‘a fellowship of churches which accept our Lord Jesus Christ as God and Saviour’. This minimal basis of faith remained for the second WCC assembly at Evanston, Illinois in 1954, but at the third in New Delhi in 1961 it was adapted and expanded: the WCC was now to be ‘a fellowship of churches which confess the Lord Jesus Christ as God and Saviour according to the Scriptures, and therefore seek to fulfil together their common calling to the glory of the one God, Father, Son and Holy Spirit’. The trinitarian addition pleased the Eastern Orthodox churches who had joined the Council in 1948, and whose presence was now bolstered by the Russian Orthodox. In 1920 the Holy Synod of the Church of Constantinople had issued an encyclical, Unto the Churches Everywhere, which envisaged an antidote to the devastation of the First World War in a global Christian fellowship in analogy with the League of Nations. Now the Orthodox began to play a fuller part in making this a reality.

The 1961 New Delhi assembly also saw Roman Catholic interaction with the WCC progress when the Vatican allowed delegates to attend the Council as observers. The following year Pope John XXIII convened the epochal Second *Vatican Council. Not only were observers allowed to attend Vatican II from non-Roman denominations; the Council’s Decree on Ecumenism (1964) defined these denominations as ‘separated brethren’ rather than dissident outsiders. In the wake of this, Roman Catholic representatives became full participants in the Faith and Order strand of the WCC.

Another major development at New Delhi was the incorporation of the International Missionary Council into the WCC. Ostensibly, this recognition of missiological priorities should have encouraged evangelicals and Pentecostals, but in fact many in these traditions had been suspicious of the WCC from its foundation, and remained so after 1961. For some this was due to minimalism of its statement of faith, which was only partly mitigated by the additions made at New Delhi. By this time, too, theological *liberalism had become dominant in the seminaries and councils of many of the historic Protestant denominations that comprised the majority of the WCC's membership. Typically, evangelicals and Pentecostals saw liberalism as a false gospel, and viewed 'liberal' and 'ecumenical' as virtually synonymous. This scepticism intensified as the WCC appeared to recast traditional models of mission in terms of left-wing political and social activism. By the fourth WCC Assembly at Uppsala in 1968, it did indeed seem that the Council was allowing its agenda to be shaped along socialist and even Marxist lines, similar to those that would define the '*liberation theologies' developed in Latin America and elsewhere during the next decade or so.

This leftist socio-political orientation effectively eclipsed the Faith and Order work of the WCC for some time after Uppsala, but priorities changed significantly with the adoption of the 'convergence document' Baptist, Eucharist and Ministry at Lima in 1982. This text articulated a striking degree of consensus between major Christian traditions in the three areas stated, and offered a realistic account of how outstanding differences might be addressed. It went on to become the most influential report of the modern ecumenical movement, attracting constructive responses from around 200 churches and Christian organizations, several of them evangelical and Pentecostal. BEM in turn spurred a number of bilateral or multilateral conversations and unions. Precedents for these had existed from the formative days of the WCC, when the Church of South India had brought episcopal and non-episcopal traditions together in a new ecclesial structure (1947), and in later developments such as Pope Paul VI's and Patriarch Athenagoras' nullifying of the anathemas of the Great Schism (1965), the formation of the Anglican-Roman Catholic International Commission (1970), the inception of the United Reformed Church in Great Britain (1972), and the Leuenberg Concord between Lutheran and Reformed Churches in Continental Europe (1973). Following BEM, however, the level of such activity has risen considerably, and has included full communion agreements between Anglican and Lutheran churches in northern Europe (Porvoo, 1992) and between Lutheran, Reformed, Episcopalian and Moravian communities in the USA (1997–99). At Augsburg in 1999, the Vatican and the Lutheran World Federation signed a Joint Declaration on the Doctrine of Justification which recognized ongoing doctrinal differences in this area but which classed them as non-church-dividing, and which rescinded the mutual condemnations levelled in relation to them at the Reformation. Dialogues and agreements between other traditions and denominations continue apace.

*Evangelical and *Pentecostal engagement in ecumenism has also increased on national and international fronts in more recent times. The World's Evangelical Alliance was reconstituted in 1951 as the World Evangelical Fellowship (WEF), partly in response to the founding of the WCC, but for the reasons cited above its initial stance towards the WCC-style ecumenism was limited to 'benevolent neutrality'. In 1974 the *Lausanne Covenant offered an alternative to the perceived politicization of the WCC in the form of a fresh evangelical vision of mission based on both personal conversion and social transformation. Later, the WEF restyled itself as the 'World Evangelical Alliance', took on a fuller observational role at WCC assemblies, and participated in an extensive dialogue with the Pontifical Council for Christian Unity (1993–2002).

While fundamentalists and certain more conservative evangelical bodies continue to make disavowal of the ecumenical movement an article of faith, the decline of liberal modernist influence and the growth of evangelical and Pentecostal churches since the 1980s has been a factor in prompting the WCC to shift from a relatively 'centripetal' model of visible institutional unity to a relatively 'centrifugal' or devolved model more in keeping with mainstream evangelical and Pentecostal approaches to cooperation. One major expression of this was the founding in 1998 of the Global Christian Forum, an informal network in which WCC members could interact with leaders of non-WCC affiliated bodies on matters of mutual concern. Another was the establishment in 2000 of a Joint Consultative Group on Pentecostalism, which proceeded on a more open-textured, relational basis than had pertained in earlier Faith and Order dialogues. One notable outcome of this process occurred in August 2010, when the WCC General Secretary, Olav Fykse Tveit, offered a formal greeting to the 22nd World Pentecostal Conference in Stockholm – an unprecedented move which confirmed that, 100 years on from Edinburgh 1910, ecumenism was once again undergoing significant change.

Bibliography

C. E. Braaten and R. W. Jenson (eds.), In One Body through the Cross: The Princeton Proposal for Christian Unity: A Call to the Churches from an Ecumenical Study Group, Center for Catholic and Evangelical Theology (Grand Rapids and Cambridge, 2003); H. van Beek, Revisioning Christian Unity: The Global Christian Forum (Eugene, 2009); J. Briggs, M. Oduyeye and G. Tsetsis (eds.), A History of the Ecumenical Movement, vol. 3, 1968–2000 (London, 2004); H. E. Fey, A History of the Ecumenical Movement, vol. 2, 1948–68: The Ecumenical Advance (Eugene, 2009); T. E. Fitzgerald, The Ecumenical Movement: An Introductory History (Westport, 2004); M. Kinnamon and B. E. Cope, The Ecumenical Movement: An Anthology of Key Texts and Voices (Geneva and Grand Rapids, 1997); R. Rouse and S. C. Neill, A History of the Ecumenical Movement, vol. 1: 1517–1948 (Geneva, 1993).

D. H. K. HILBORN

ECUMENICAL THEOLOGY

Ecumenical theology can be construed to mean many things. For example, it could refer to the expression of the apostolic faith as articulated by the first four (ecumenical) *councils, that is, the councils of the undivided church as they articulated orthodox doctrine when challenged by various heresies, a process which led to the definition of the trinitarian faith of the *church (see *Creeds). At the opposite extreme in the story of the church, ecumenical theology can describe attempts to identify the theology of the contemporary church in all its diverse forms, embracing all the riches of the experiences of Christians from every continent. But these must be riches tested by the apostolic faith as set forth in Scripture, for ecumenical theology must not stand for a form of confessional pluralism in which diverse and often contradictory understandings are placed side by side as of equal legitimacy. Equally, ecumenical theology cannot be allowed to stand for a lowest-common-denominator theology – that which all Christians can agree upon shorn of all contentious elements. But ecumenical theology remains still very different from denominational theologies, or even *evangelical theology, with its focus around a range of agreed doctrinal priorities. By contrast, ecumenical theology has to be concerned about handling differences within an overall Christian commitment.

The basis of the *World Council of Churches itself points to certain fundamental agreements for ecumenical fellowship. As amended in 1961, it states that the WCC ‘is a fellowship of churches which confess the Lord Jesus Christ as God and Saviour according to the scriptures, and therefore seek to fulfil together their common calling to the glory of the one God, Father, Son and Holy Spirit’. Accordingly, it insists on a theology which is biblical, trinitarian, church-focused and missionary, with its vocation focusing on Jesus Christ as God and Saviour, that is to say, it centres on the *incarnation and *atonement. For many evangelicals, it lacks defining detail, but on the other hand it makes an essential statement about the Christian churches in worldwide fellowship without imposing a *credal statement on any church at the behest of an external council. That said, the Council has in recent years, partly out of concern for the consciences of its Orthodox members, but also in recognition of the concerns of evangelicals, introduced mechanisms to ensure that member churches take the basis seriously. Since clearly there are diversities of outlook within the church of Jesus Christ, its theology cannot be narrowly equated with an exclusively evangelical perspective, thus necessitating that theological discussion will accordingly range beyond the limits of evangelical thinking.

Whilst ecumenical theology seeks to be faithful to the inherited apostolic faith, it also seeks to relate this to the contemporary scene in both word and action (see *Culture). Thus, its concern for a wide-ranging diakonial ministry represents its understanding of Christ’s concern for a needy world. Seriousness about the coming of God’s *kingdom is seen in its concern to promote peace and justice and to be effective stewards rather than ruthless exploiters of God’s good creation. Thus, traditional concerns for social justice and peace are now supplemented by the promotion of a green agenda (see *Ecology) in the context of the biblical doctrine of *creation, whilst increasingly difficult *ethical issues in biotechnology claim attention. In all such programmes the theological sources and resources are critical, providing the essential defences preventing such concerns declining into feverish activism fuelled by mere political ideology. More concerned these days with mission than missions (see *Missiology), the Missio Dei is now seen as God working through all his people in every nation. Interfaith dialogue appears on the ecumenical agenda with new urgency, but there is no one agreed theology of dialogue. As ever against the view that the WCC is only concerned with a political agenda, it is theologically concerned to explore the nature of spirituality. Discussions about the church as an inclusive community are essential for some churches, but contentious for others.

Because ecumenical theology is a theology which champions the oneness of Christ's church, it will necessarily want to place all divisions and differences within the context of that unity which is Christ's gift to the church, distinguishing between a legitimate diversity of understandings, and that sectarian temper which unchurches all other than itself. A theology of unity certainly does not mean uniformity; rather, it celebrates legitimate diversity – ethnic, cultural, historical – within an essential unity, within a recognition of Christ's presence in different Christian groups. In this respect, it is important that it is the church as a body which patiently undertakes the theological task, never surrendering it to articulate individuals who, heedless of the corporate voice, by their action privatize theology.

The sole criterion for working out ecumenical theology must then be, as one Orthodox theologian (Nicholas Lossky) explains, 'God, himself, Jesus Christ, image of the Father, bearer of the Spirit who reveals Christ, and cries "Abba, Father" in the hearts of all the baptized.' Thus 'Ecumenical theology implies total humility and intellectual honesty; it implies being prepared to be guided into all truth by the Spirit of truth', a stance which involves 'a permanent crucifixion for the intellect'.

Bibliography

P. Avis, Reshaping Ecumenical Theology: The Church Made Whole? (London, 2010); J. Briggs, M. A. Oduyoye and G. Tsetsis, A History of the Ecumenical Movement, 1968–2000 (Geneva, 2004); G. R. Evans, Method in Ecumenical Theology: The Lessons So Far (Cambridge, 2009); W. Kasper, Harvesting the Fruits: Aspects of Christian Faith in Ecumenical Dialogue (New York, 2009).

J. BRIGGS

EDWARDS, JONATHAN (1703–58)

An American theologian and philosopher, Edwards was reared in a Christian home and culture, studying at Yale University. The first period of his ministry (in the Congregational Church, Northampton, MA, 1727–33) was a time of relative obscurity, followed by great popularity and success (1734–47), which ended with rejection (1750) and virtual burial in a little Indian outpost (Stockbridge, 1751–57) where he did his greatest work (Freedom of the Will; Original Sin; End of Creation; True Virtue). He was called to the presidency of the then nascent Princeton College shortly before his death.

According to Edwards' thought, 'nothing is more certain, than that there must be an unmade and unlimited being' (The Insufficiency of Reason as a Substitute for Revelation). On Being maintained that eternal being alone can be thought, and Freedom of the Will that 'we first prove a posteriori . . . there must be an eternal cause . . . and prove many of his perfections a priori'. In spite of this, apart from biblical revelation, man is 'naturally blind in the things of religion' (Sermon on Ps. 94:8f.). This is partly because of the complexity of metaphysical questions and mainly because of the noetic influence of sin. The Bible evidences its own inspiration by its shining 'bright with the amiable simplicity of truth' (Observations on Scripture), as well as in the external certification by its authors' God-enabled powers (The Miracles of Jesus Not Counterfeited).

By natural reason and Scripture God reveals his purpose in creating the world for his glory and therein the blessedness of his people (End of Creation) which consists in their disinterested benevolence toward his being-in-general (Religious Affections; True Virtue). Adam was first created upright, but fell into temptation (not calling on the efficient grace available to him) and brought the race which was 'constituted' one with him into ruin (Original Sin). Through the covenanted work of the God-man (On Satisfaction), God redeems the elect (Efficacious Grace), leaving the non-elect to their inexcusable unbelief and judgment (The Justice of God in the Damnation of Sinners).

This work of Christ is brought to the elect usually through the preaching in which the Spirit arouses previously 'sottish' people (Sinners in the Hands of an Angry God) to 'seek' (Pressing into the Kingdom; Ruth's Resolution). Of the many called, few are the chosen (see *Predestination). Only those who give a credible profession of faith and life are rightly admitted to and remain in the membership of the church and are entitled to her *sacraments (Qualifications for Communion), others being barred or excommunicated (The Nature and End of Excommunication).

A general awakening (see *Revival, theology of) that was occurring in the American colonies made Edwards believe the 'latter day' *millennium was dawning (Thoughts on Revival), which would be followed by the general judgment, conflagration, eternal hell and heaven (The Portion of the Wicked; The Portion of the Righteous). The awakening under Edwards, in addition to its immediate effects, had considerable power in preparing established churches for disestablishment after the American Revolution and, according to some scholars, in bringing about the Revolution itself. B. B. *Warfield thought that Edwards' defence of Calvinism (see *Reformed theology) had delayed the *Arminian conquest of New England for a hundred years.

Edwards is still regarded today as perhaps America's profoundest theological and philosophical mind.

See also: NEW ENGLAND THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

Works: many editions, e.g. 2 vols. (Edinburgh, 1974–75); The Works of Jonathan Edwards, 26 vols., ed. Paul Ramsey (New Haven, 1989–2009).

Studies: C. Cherry, The Theology of Jonathan Edwards: A Reappraisal (New York, 1966); D. J. Elwood, The Philosophical Theology of Jonathan Edwards (New York, 1961); S. R. Holmes, God of Grace and God of Glory (Edinburgh, 2000); G. Marsden, Jonathan Edwards: A Life (New Haven, 2003); I. H. Murray, Jonathan Edwards: A New Biography (Edinburgh, 1987); O. E. Winslow, Jonathan Edwards, 1703–1758: A Biography (New York, 1940).

J. H. GERSTNER

ELECTION, see PREDESTINATION

ELLUL, JACQUES (1912–1994)

Historian, social scientist and lay theologian, Ellul was born in Bordeaux, France, and worked as a professor at the Institute of Political Studies in the university there. In his youth he was converted to the Christian faith, and he was an active lay-preacher in the French Reformed Church.

His prolific writings fall into five categories:

(1) History. He wrote an extensive history of institutions.

(2) Sociology. In The Technological Society, his most important study, he examines the influence of 'modern technique' on all spheres of society, as well as on the human mind. Technique is considered an independent factor which functions in accordance with its own rules and which is developing into the 'technical system'.

(3) Social criticism. He proved himself to be a debunker of many a modern commonplace. For instance, he questioned whether modern man has ever come of age and whether modern society has really become secular. In his view, modern man is subject to the requirements of technique and believes his future and well-being are dependent on it, as if it were 'God himself'.

(4) Biblical studies. Some remarkable commentaries deserve attention (Jonah, 2 Kings, Apocalypse). His (biblical) study on The Meaning of the City is fundamental to an understanding of his theological thinking. The city stands for civilization and is the outcome of the efforts of men to build a world without the living God, which includes systems of religion, of morals, of defence, of insurance, etc. Man is now doomed to live in this city, which is judged by God. However, the Christian knows that God has promised a transformation of the works of men. The end of history is marked not just by the terror of Babylon, but also by the coming of the New Jerusalem.

(5) Ethics. These are based on 'the meaning of the city'. In his ethical works he attempts to escape the dangers of idealism, of moralism or of planning a sound society which can only lead to a well-ordered system which controls everything and everybody. What is left is the individual person, who is encouraged to be realistic about the situation he is in, determined by technical and political necessities, who is also encouraged to accept his responsibilities and to continue to hope for the impossible: true dialogue, righteousness, peace, freedom, love.

In this theological thinking, the influence of Karl *Barth is noticeable. Characteristic of his work is the dialectical tension between biblical revelation and modern technical consciousness. Also characteristic is his insistence on the importance of personal freedom and of the dialogue between God and the human person, which is continually obstructed by human systems.

Bibliography

Works: The Technological Society (New York, 1964); The Meaning of the City (Grand Rapids, 1970); The Politics of God and the Politics of Man (Grand Rapids, 1972); The Ethics of Freedom (Grand Rapids, 1976).

Studies: C. G. Christians and J. M. van Hook, Jacques Ellul: Interpretive Essays (Champaign, 1981); J. M. Hanks, assisted by R. Asal, Jacques Ellul: A Comprehensive Bibliography (Greenwich and London, 1984); B. Kristensen, 'Jacques Ellul', CG 29:4 (1976), pp. 106–110.

B. KRISTENSEN

EMERSON, RALPH WALDO (1803–82)

Ralph Waldo Emerson was an American writer who championed the creative self and exhorted others to believe they could retain the essence of Christian experience without the substance of Christian belief or practice. Born into a long line of New England clergymen, Emerson served a brief tenure as a *Unitarian minister before resigning his position and breaking with the church forever. He then launched a writing and speaking career that would bring him oracular status in his own day and an enduring reputation as one of the foremost figures in American literature.

In a series of works, including Nature, 'The American Scholar', 'The Divinity School Address', and Essays: First Series, Emerson sharply dismissed key particulars of Christian doctrine, including belief in the divinity of Jesus, the authority of the Scriptures, and the efficacy of the sacraments. According to him, instead of preaching 'a faith like Christ's in the infinitude of man', the church 'has dwelt, it dwells, with noxious exaggeration about the person of Jesus'; it preaches 'not the doctrine of the soul, but an exaggeration of the personal, the positive, the ritual'. Emerson instead encouraged his audience to 'dare to love God without mediator or veil' by seeking access to the deity without the aid of Scripture or the Son of God.

In espousing the innocence of human nature, in substituting intuition for revelation, and in proclaiming a glorious future for an essentially secular humanity, Emerson gave powerful voice to *romantic notions that were to become a central facet of the American experience.

Bibliography

L. Buell, Emerson (Cambridge, MA, 2003); B. Packer, The Transcendentalists (Athens, Georgia, 2007); R. D. Richardson, Emerson: The Mind on Fire (Berkeley, 1995).

R. LUNDIN

EMPIRICISM

Empiricism is the view that the source of all knowledge is sense-experience. It is based on the common perception that our senses provide us with knowledge. Its roots stem from the ancient Greeks, but it flourished as a reaction to *rationalism and its belief that reason was the basis of certain knowledge. In contrast, John *Locke, Bishop *Berkeley and David *Hume argued that all knowledge was based on the senses. This response was part of that critique of scepticism which operates by finding a source of absolutely certain knowledge. Hume divided what we know into matters of fact and relations of ideas. The realm of the relation of ideas is that of logic and mathematics. The truths of mathematics and logic are true by definition, necessary (i.e. they could not be false) and are known a priori. These truths are not part of the real world. In contrast, matters of fact stem from ordinary sense-experience. They are contingently true – they could be otherwise. They are known only by direct experience and a posteriori. They give genuine knowledge of the way the world is, and may be used to check what is said and claimed on the basis of experience. Common sense claims that we have ideas and concepts as well as sense-experience. Hume argued that these ideas or concepts either are relations of ideas, or can be analysed into having sensations or reflecting on them. For Hume, impressions were the actual content of the mind in the moment of perception. Ideas were less vivid copies of impressions, which could be amalgamated into complex ideas by the imagination. In the end, however, empiricism claims that there is nothing in the mind which was not previously in the sense.

Modern empiricism

Empiricism provides an answer to the sceptic and a unified source of all knowledge. This has developed in two ways. The search for certainty has led to the analysis of experience into irreducible, infallible units of experience called sense-data. These are the raw basics of our experience (e.g. a reddish blur) about which we cannot be mistaken. This approach highlights the problems of the reality of the external world and of the self. *Logical positivism has turned empiricism into a search for meaning based on ostensive definition, which sees knowledge as like learning a language, in which we give a name and point out an object so that no other understanding is possible. Verifiability has been the other basis for meaning, in which a statement is meaningful if, and only if, it can be verified by sense-experience. This was modified and even became a 'Principle of Falsifiability', which based knowledge on the failure to disprove. Empiricism is still based on *verification by sense-experience, using the methods of the empirical and inductive sciences as a solution to scepticism. It has created doubt about the truth and validity of religious statements and doctrines, based on a narrow view of experience being reducible to sense-experience alone.

Bibliography

A. J. Ayer, The Problem of Knowledge (Harmondsworth, 1971); D. Hume, An Inquiry Concerning Human Understanding, ed. L. A. Solby-Bigge (Oxford, 31975); R. G. Meyers, Understanding Empiricism (Chesham, 2006); H. Morick (ed.), Challenges to Empiricism (Belmont, 1972).

E. D. COOK

ENHYPOSTASIA, see HYPOSTASIS

ENLIGHTENMENT, THE

Between the close of the seventeenth and the eighteenth centuries, the intellectual history of Europe and America underwent such signal development that the whole age has been named after it. This is the era of Enlightenment. The Enlightenment varied from nation to nation; it took moderate or radical forms; one may speak of a 'High' or a 'Low' Enlightenment; and it also developed, rather than existing unchanged. These and other considerations suggest that to identify a single 'Enlightenment' is, perhaps insuperably, difficult. Nor can its nature be properly grasped if treated as a purely intellectual or literary phenomenon. For example, demographic studies, such as those revealing the facts about decline in infant mortality in some nations where there was Enlightenment, show the vital social context of themes such as "progress". Whatever the contours or conclusions of future studies, however, to understand and to evaluate 'modernity' we need to go back to the Enlightenment.

In their religious thought, prominent Enlightenment thinkers were markedly hostile to traditional Christianity. The *Reformation and its aftermath witnessed the dissipation, not demise, of *dogma, as alternative interpretations of Christianity claimed its authentic inheritance and condemned each other as well as unbelief. Bloodshed and persecution accompanied this, so that Enlightenment thinkers attacked the consequences as well as content of traditional dogma. Negatively, they rejected the principle of the rule of dogma, and with it a range of ideas both formal (such as *revelation, where it provided exclusive, necessary knowledge) and material (such as the accepted doctrine of *original sin). Positively, they sought the rule of reason, and with it the adumbration of new formal ideas (such as the nature of morality) and material ones (such as the relation of God to physical nature). *Kant defined Enlightenment as the spirit's determination to exercise its intellectual faculties in unfettered integrity – 'Dare to know.' He who did so had some claim to be called an 'enlightened' thinker.

But if the term 'reason' is used to pick out a typical Enlightenment attitude, it requires cautious treatment. Comprehensive metaphysical constructions, based on rational deductions, could be criticized in the name of practical philosophy. Cold analytic reason, conceived as the instrument of universal understanding, could be censured in the name of passionate sensibility. If the Enlightenment is the age of reason, reason must be understood either as the alternative to dogma or in terms of broad intellectual autonomy. Nor did Enlightenment thinkers abandon religion or revelation. Atheistic materialism could develop in France certainly, but it had its anti-Christian critics (such as *Voltaire). Revelation might be deprived of sole religious authority, of the right to impart anything not knowable by reason, or of the ability even to provide significant incentive for the religious life; yet it could be domesticated (as in German neology) rather than eliminated.

It is hard to account for the forces behind Enlightenment thought without offering, in this case, a theological interpretation. The rise of modern science was a major factor: *Newton, sometimes almost deified in the eighteenth century, had impelled the search for scientific explanation that would lead to interpreting the physical world in terms of physical law. The growth of historical criticism was significant: while the Enlightenment is often regarded as deficient in real historical understanding, it could distinguish between its own and the biblical world. Yet Newton found no quarrel with Christianity at points where his later admirers did, and antiquity as such was not alien to the Enlightenment thinkers, as the prestige of the ancient Roman world revealed. Unless one suspects that the logic of scientific method – whether in physics or in history – is hostile to faith, one may look for a broader context, in which scientific explanation could develop into the rival, rather than the complement, of religious explanation; and in which historical criticism could develop into the opponent, rather than exponent, of Christian doctrine. This is neither to commend Newtonian science, nor to accept the operative principles of early historical criticism – but neither is it to hold them intrinsically responsible for what followed.

This broader context is surely supplied by the explicit or implicit sense of human autonomy. Indeed, in any comprehensive account, this must be related to political and economic change and policy. But, in the present perspective, ‘autonomy’ has both a relative and an absolute meaning. It was relative to the Christian claims about man. It was absolute in its willingness in principle to dispense with external, even divine, authority if that was where its logic led. Christianity opposes autonomy on grounds of creation, fall and redemption. The Enlightenment could relegate the Creator to a remote caretaker or irrelevant possibility, deny the incapacity of human nature to attain heaven by its own created resources and affirm that the moral life, conducted in good faith, if not complete knowledge, fulfils the basic purpose of existence. If God is finally disposed of, as he dramatically was in the nineteenth century, it is because he is not needed; if he is not needed, it is not because he is simply intellectually disposed of, but because the heart is satisfied – or satisfied to look – elsewhere. In such matters, the will, as well as the intellect, is at work.

This brief summary cannot avoid, any more than can other generalizations, misrepresenting the Enlightenment in some of its aspects. It is also no more disinterestedly neutral than any other fundamental interpretation. But, in a truistic or profounder sense, *autonomy is compatible with the phenomenon of Enlightenment thought in its flow or formulations. *Hume, Edward Gibbon (1737–94), Voltaire, Jean Jacques *Rousseau, Christian Wolff (1679–1754), *Lessing, Giovanni Battista Vico (1668–1744), Thomas Jefferson (1743–1826) – these represent a cultural and intellectual range in the Enlightenment. There may be others more significant, for the question of who is significant, and why, will continue to be debated, as will the significance of the Enlightenment itself, if it is to be retained as a viable concept. To reject or accept the ‘Enlightenment’ overall seems futile. If calamitous consequences flow from the adoption of some of its axioms, note that there were calamitous aspects to the preceding history of Christianity. Karl Popper (1902–94) remarked that the urge to improve the lot of our fellows is both ‘admirable and dangerous’ and was rooted in the ‘longing of uncounted, unknown men to free themselves and their minds from the tutelage of authority and prejudice’. By considering what is here claimed or assumed about the motives of the ‘Enlightened’, we grasp and estimate the nature and significance of the enterprise.

See also: FRANKFURT SCHOOL; MODERNITY.

Bibliography

A. Broadie (ed.), The Scottish Enlightenment: An Anthology (Edinburgh, 2001); E. Cassirer, The Philosophy of the Enlightenment (Princeton, 1951); P. Gay, The Enlightenment: An Interpretation, 2 vols. (London, 1970); N. Hampson, The Enlightenment (Harmondsworth, 1968); M. Jacob, The Radical Enlightenment: Pantheists, Freemasons and Republicans (London, 1981); R. Porter and M. Teich (eds.), The Enlightenment in National Context (Cambridge, 1981); J. Schmidt (ed.), What Is Enlightenment? Eighteenth-Century Answers and Twentieth-Century Questions (Oakland, CA, 1996); B. K. Ward, Redeeming the Enlightenment: Christianity and Liberal Virtues (Grand Rapids, 2010).

S. N. WILLIAMS

EPHESUS, COUNCIL OF

The third Ecumenical Council was called by Emperor Theodosius II in 431 to resolve the *Nestorian controversy, which was arguably as important as the *Arian crisis for clarifying *Christological doctrine. In 429 Nestorius had disputed the traditional title Theotokos (God-mother) for Mary since, strictly speaking, this would suggest that she was some form of 'goddess'. He also rejected Anthropotokos (man-mother) proposed by Constantinopolitan monks (doubtless to draw out his theology), which suggested Christ was merely a man. He sought to reconcile the problem by proposing Christotokos (Christ-mother). These titles point to the heart of the dispute: the nature of Christ as both God and man united in one integrated person, as in the Nicene Creed or, as Nestorius was claimed to imply, two sons or natures joined in one human being. *Cyril of Alexandria entered the debate defending Nicene orthodoxy, only to be accused of *Apollinarianism. At the council, Nestorius and his doctrines were condemned and Cyril's doctrine held to be in agreement with *Nicaea. Eight canons were passed at the council, seven dealing with the doctrinal question and confirming the Nicene Creed as the basis of faith, and one with the autonomy of the church of Cyprus. The manner in which the council was conducted did the church little credit.

See also: COUNCILS; CREEDS.

Bibliography

The Seven Ecumenical Councils, in NPNF ser. 2, vol. 14; J. McGuckin, Saint Cyril of Alexandria and the Christological Controversy: Its History, Theology, and Texts (New York, 2004); N. P. Tanner, The Councils of the Church: A Short History (ET, New York, 2001); idem (ed.), Decrees of the Ecumenical Councils, 2 vols. (ET, London and Washington, 1990).

A. D. RICH

EPICLEISIS, see EUCHARIST

EPISCOPACY, see MINISTRY

EPISCOPIUS, see ARMINIANISM

EPISTEMOLOGY

The term comes from the Gk word for knowledge or science (epistēmē). Epistemology is the study of the nature and basis of experience, belief and knowledge. It asks what we know and how we know it. It is concerned to differentiate knowledge from feeling sure or believing. It asks how we justify claims to know, whether we can be wrong about what we know, if we can know only if it makes sense that we can also not know, and whether we know that we know something. There are many areas of difficulty in knowledge: e.g. knowing the self, the past, the future, universal facts, scientific laws and the facts of philosophy, aesthetics, morality, religion, logic and mathematics. Various modern philosophers have introduced distinctions to help analyse the nature of knowing. Bertrand Russell (1872–1970) distinguishes knowledge by acquaintance, which is direct and immediate, from knowledge by description, which is indirect. Gilbert Ryle (1900–76) distinguishes knowing how to do things, from knowing that such and such is the case.

Rationalism and empiricism

*Descartes sought absolute certainty in knowledge. He stressed that reason alone provided the route to absolute certainty. This *rationalist emphasis was countered by the *empiricism of *Locke, *Berkeley and *Hume, who argued that certainty was to be found through the senses alone. These key strands in philosophy share in a common debate over the origin of knowledge, are aware of the problems of universals and abstract ideas, use rational and scientific approaches, and engage in a search for certainty. Both are responses to the sceptical challenge to knowledge. The sceptic queries the reliability of knowledge, and argues that it is always possible to doubt. Rationalism and empiricism are attempts to cure doubt. *Kant offered a bridge between the senses and reason with his stress on the synthetic a priori categories of understanding which make knowledge possible. Knowledge of these categories was not derived from experience, yet was a condition of the comprehensibility of experience. His synthetic a priori claims have been much disputed. More recent philosophers have argued variously. G. E. Moore (1873–1958) and *Wittgenstein have set aside the issues of doubt and analysed knowledge in terms of meaning through linguistic usage. Ordinary language and common sense have little problem with philosophical doubt and offer a simple solution to it. *Polanyi has stressed the personal nature of knowing and its tacit dimension in which we know more than we can say. The *logical positivists have taken empiricism along the road of *verification and falsification as means for testing knowledge and truth claims, often using sense data as the ultimate source of certainty. A. J. Ayer (1910–89) offers an analysis of knowledge in terms of its being justified true belief. The key issues in epistemology seem to concern: the role of justification and its nature; ways of setting aside, or coping with, *doubt, and whether the sceptic's position makes any sense; the nature of what is known (whether it be in terms of ideas or what is real); an adequate theory of *truth (whether in terms of coherence or correspondence with reality); and the relationship between objectivity and subjectivity, in terms of whether we can know something totally objectively and to what extent subjectivity intrudes or is seen to be problematic.

Epistemology in theology

Traditionally, the distinction between belief and knowledge has taken the form of *faith and reason in theology. Biblical writers do not seem hesitant about making claims that God is known and that Christianity is not simply a question of faith, but also one of knowledge. *Anselm argues that faith seeks understanding, while others similarly assert that we believe in order that we may understand. Theologians express the various sources of knowledge in religion in terms of *revelation and experience. Revelation is usually divided into special and general. Special revelation includes the incarnation, the resurrection and the miracles, where God reveals himself in a 'special' way to particular people. General revelation is open to all and is usually seen in terms of *natural theology. This looks to the nature of the world and the nature of humanity as revealing something of the nature of God. He may be known by deducing his nature from the world or humanity. *Religious experience seems to offer a direct knowledge of God as seen in the call of the prophets and the many direct experiences of God and Christ as recounted in Scripture. Distinctive religious experiences, or simply interpreting the world or events in one's life or in the world's life as God's activity, have allowed personal claims to know God directly.

These knowledge claims have been criticized by philosophers, especially logical positivists, because of the absence of the kind of proof required by theories of verification and falsification. Theologians have responded in various ways. Some argue that religious experience is self-authenticating. Others argue that the positivist view of experience is too narrowly defined in terms of sense-experience. Religious experience has been interpreted as a disclosure model or situation parallel to scientific discoveries (see *Ramsey, Ian). John *Hick offers eschatological verification as the ground of knowing God. Others have argued that reason does not offer absolute knowledge in any realm and that belief is the best that any area of study and life can offer. Thus, Christian presuppositions are no worse or better off than any other set of presuppositions.

If we follow the biblical balance between faith and knowledge, it is crucial to deal with questions of truth and justification whenever claims of knowledge and belief are made. Both sets of claims require evidence and support, and the theologian must not shrink from seeking the best evidence and offering the strongest justification for knowledge and belief claims. Nevertheless, we must recognize the limits of reason and when there are unreasonable and inappropriate demands for proof and justification. This may be demonstrated by showing that nothing would count as satisfying these demands. Christians need to reflect on what would count against knowledge and belief in God. Biblical Christianity does not claim immunity from criticism, nor assume automatic acceptance by its hearers; it offers good reasons for the hope that is within us.

Bibliography

A. J. Ayer, The Problem of Knowledge (Harmondsworth, 1956); S. T. Davis, Faith, Skepticism and Evidence: An Essay in Religious Epistemology (Cranbury, 1978); J. Greco and E. Sosa, Blackwell Guide to Epistemology (Oxford, 1999); D. W. Hamlyn, Theory of Knowledge (London, 1971); C. Hay, The Theory of Knowledge: A Coursebook (Cambridge, 2008); J. Hick, Faith and Knowledge (London, 1966); T. Penethum, Problems of Religious Knowledge (London, 1971); D. L. Wolfe, Epistemology (Leicester, 1982).

E. D. COOK

ERASMUS, DESIDERIUS (c. 1469–1536)

The most renowned scholar of his time, Erasmus of Rotterdam was a complex and cosmopolitan Christian *humanist. Although courted by universities, popes, kings and an emperor, this frail intellectual carefully protected his independence. His consuming passion for piety and unity was best served, he felt, through the power of his pen.

Overcoming the stigma of an illegitimate birth, Erasmus was raised in a clerical world of monastic schools and rules. Although ordained in 1492, the young priest sought a release from his *Augustinian order to pursue university studies in Paris. He was steeped in classical literature and became a consummate Latinist.

A visit to England in 1499 proved to be a turning point when he was both captivated and challenged by an Oxford lecturer, John Colet (c. 1466–1519), the future dean of St Paul's Cathedral, who fired his imagination with the ideals of Christian humanism and specifically the importance of a return to the normal sense of the biblical text. Such a goal, the two agreed, would best be realized through a working knowledge of the original languages of the Bible.

The next years were given to travel and research, especially the study of Greek grammar. Inspired by the chance discovery of an obscure manuscript by Lorenzo Valla (1407–57) which criticized the accuracy of the Latin Vulgate, Erasmus gave himself to the production of a new Latin NT based on a critical Greek NT. In 1516 this New Instrument, as he titled the first edition, was published. Its influence was immense. With one book, Erasmus put the Greek NT within reach of preachers and scholars.

As his fame grew, Erasmus began to direct his influence against various abuses in the Roman Catholic Church. The satirical In Praise of Folly blasted away at the foibles of contemporary monasticism. He stood squarely against the misuse of indulgences (see *Purgatory), and when Luther delineated his Ninety-Five Theses, Erasmus gave his support. As *Luther became more strident, however, the irenic Erasmus began to distance himself from the controversial Reformer. Correspondence between the two churchmen became increasingly bitter. Goaded by Rome to strike out at the Lutheran heresy, Erasmus wrote a treatise On the Freedom of the Will in 1524, which took Luther to task on the thorny issue of *predestination and human freedom. The differences between the two men, however, were by no means solely theological. Erasmus sincerely wanted reform, but not at the expense of unity. The humanist defended Luther's freedom to criticize abuses, but he could never condone an ecclesiastical rebellion against authority.

The Reformers faulted Erasmus for vacillation and timidity, and various popes put his works on the Index of Forbidden Books, but his influence was enormous. Protestants and Catholics alike quoted and cited him freely on matters of biblical and theological interpretation. Calvin's Institutes are more indebted to him than appears on the surface. His Paraphrases on the New Testament, which were translated into many languages, had a sustained popular influence. His editing of the collected writings of major early Church Fathers was probably his most important contribution next to the 1516 NT.

Erasmian studies burgeoned in the twentieth century. Several biographical works were published, as well as major new editions of his works and letters.

Bibliography

Works: The Collected Works of Erasmus, eds. J. K. McConica et al. (Toronto, 1974–); Luther and Erasmus: Free Will and Salvation, LCC 17, eds. E. G. Rupp et al. (London, 1969); Opera Omnia, eds. C. Reedijk et al. (Amsterdam, 1969–).

Studies: C. Augustijn, Erasmus: His Life, Works, and Influence (Toronto, 1991); R. H. Bainton, Erasmus of Christendom (New York, 1969); A. G. Dickens and W. R. D. Jones, Erasmus the Reformer (London, 1994); J. McConica, Erasmus (Oxford, 1991); E. Rummel, Erasmus (New York, 2004).

N. P. FELDMETH

ERASTIANISM, see STATE

ERIUGENA, JOHN SCOTUS (c. 810–c. 877)

Eriugena was a philosophical theologian of Christian Neoplatonism (see *Platonism). Reared in Ireland (as both 'Scotus' and 'Eriugena' tautologically indicate), John became the most original thinker of the Carolingian renaissance, spending over thirty years from c. 840 as the leading light of Charles the Bald's palace academy near Laon in Gaul. Late in life he may have taught in England.

John's knowledge of Greek (rare in the West at the time and probably acquired in Ireland) equipped him to Latinize the thought of Greek Christian Neoplatonism. As well as works by *Gregory of Nyssa and Maximus the Confessor, he translated and commented on the influential corpus of *Pseudo-Dionysius. He was also indebted to *Boethius' interpretation of *Aristotelian logic; his dialectical style has earned him the title 'the first *scholastic'.

His most important work, Periphyseon or The Division of Nature (c. 862), was condemned in the thirteenth century. Its apparent fusion of biblical teaching and Neoplatonism (for he viewed both reason and *revelation as manifestations of divine wisdom, and virtually equated philosophy and religion) verged on *pantheism. All creation proceeds outward from God as source, by 'division' or 'progress', and by a circular motion of 'resolution' or 'regress' returns to him as goal. John's thought bears the typical marks of Neoplatonism: a preference for *apophatic or negative theology, a poetic, almost mystical ardour and intensity, a hierarchical scale of being, the *deification of all creatures, and the 'restoration of all things' proposed by *Origen. Nature and grace could scarcely be separated in John's system.

He opposed *Gottschalk on predestination. Appealing to *Augustine's early anti-Manichaean works, he advanced what seemed a *Pelagian appreciation of humankind's moral abilities, and denied that Augustine taught double predestination. No credible version of predestination or election survived in John's thought, any more than did eternal punishment or hell.

In the *eucharistic controversy associated with *Paschasius Radbertus and *Ratramnus, Eriugena taught a refined symbolist interpretation of the sacrament. Christ is offered and eaten 'not dentally but mentally' (mente non dente). In his vision of reality, all visible and corporeal things signified something incorporeal and intelligible.

Recent Irish scholarship has rediscovered John as the greatest Irish philosopher (except perhaps for *Berkeley). He has been too often depicted as a lonely outpost of Greek thought in the medieval West. Yet he worked among a colourful community of scholars, and must not be detached from the tradition that derives from Augustine. He posed in an acute form the perennial question of the relation between *faith and reason.

Bibliography

Most works in PL 122; for list see I. P. Sheldon-Williams in JEH 10 (1960), pp. 198–224; Periphyseon, ed. and tr. Sheldon-Williams (Dublin, 1968ff.).

Studies: H. Bett, Johannes Scotus Erigena (Cambridge, 1925); CHLGEMP, pp. 518–533 (Sheldon-Williams), 576–586 (H. Liebeschütz); D. Carabine, John Scottus Eriugena (Oxford, 2000); D. Moran, The Philosophy of John Scottus Eriugena: A Study of Idealism in the Middle Ages (Cambridge, 1989); J. J. O'Meara, Eriugena (Oxford, 1988); J. Pelikan, The Growth of Medieval Theology (600–1300), The Christian Tradition, vol. 3 (Chicago and London, 1978), pp. 95–105.

D. F. WRIGHT

EROS, see LOVE

ERSKINE, THOMAS (OF LINLATHEN) (1788–1870)

Thomas Erskine was an outstanding Scottish lay theologian, who combined the roles of leisurely laird and theological author and correspondent. Denominationally uncommitted, Erskine travelled theologically from an initial Calvinism (see *Reformed theology), through Irvingism, to a final though far from easygoing *universalism. His first book, Remarks on the Internal Evidence for the Truth of Revealed Religion (1820), argued that Christianity's truth was demonstrated by its correspondence with man's moral needs. It was well received by the orthodox world. His Unconditional Freeness of the Gospel (1828), however, provoked bitter criticism for its advocacy of universal atonement. In 1828 Erskine met John McLeod *Campbell, and enthusiastically supported him during his trial and deposition from the Church of Scotland. They became lifelong friends. Campbell's mature Christology is seminally present in Erskine's Brazen Serpent (1831). Erskine also encountered Edward *Irving at this period, and adopted his views on premillennialism (see *Millennium), Christ's humanity and the *gifts of the Spirit. The Doctrine of Election (1837) concluded Erskine's breach with Calvinism.

Erskine's thought shows increasing preoccupation with *conscience as the criterion of truth. He regarded God as a universal Father who is educating all men into a filial relationship with himself, and in later years saw the ultimate salvation of all as the essential gospel. Always a deeply pious and charming man, Erskine's writings and personal influence contributed notably to the liberalizing of nineteenth-century British theology.

Bibliography

Other works: An Essay on Faith (1822); The Gifts of the Spirit (1830); The Spiritual Order (1871).

Studies: J. S. Candlish, in British and Foreign Evangelical Review 22 (1873), pp. 105–128; W. Hanna, Letters of Thomas Erskine, 2 vols. (Edinburgh, 1877); T. Hart, The Teaching Father: An Introduction to the Theology of Thomas Erskine of Linlathen (Edinburgh, 1993); H. F. Henderson, Erskine of Linlathen (Edinburgh, 1899); D. Horrocks, Laws of the Spiritual Order: Innovation and Reconstruction in the Soteriology of Thomas Erskine of Linlathen (Milton Keynes, 2004); N. R. Needham, Thomas Erskine of Linlathen: His Life and Theology 1788–1837, unpubl. PhD thesis (Edinburgh, 1987); idem, Thomas Erskine of Linlathen: His Life and Theology (Edinburgh, 1990); T. F. Torrance, Scottish Theology from John Knox to John McLeod Campbell (Edinburgh, 1996); D. F. Winslow, Thomas Erskine: Advocate for the Character of God (New York, 1993).

N. R. NEEDHAM

ESCHATOLOGY

Eschatology is the doctrine of the end (eschaton) or the Last Things (eschata). Christian eschatology has its roots in the eschatology of Second Temple Judaism in which there was generally an expectation of the end of 'the present evil age' when Israel was oppressed, and the dawn of the 'age to come' when God would intervene to establish his rule. This was expressed in highly figurative *apocalyptic literature. In the NT, this perspective of Judaism was subtly altered so that, while in one sense the age to come had already come with the coming of Jesus, his resurrection and the giving of the Holy Spirit, in another sense it had not yet come. While Jesus was raised from the dead, his followers died and were not yet raised and evil was still rampant. Christians therefore still prayed: 'Your kingdom come'.

Patristic eschatology

As the Christian church became increasingly separated from its Jewish roots, its eschatology was affected by its cultural context. A strong *dualism in Greco-Roman culture separated the physical from the spiritual in both metaphysics and anthropology. The spiritual was eternal and of ultimate value; the physical (including the human body) was either inferior (as in *Platonism) or considered evil (as in various *Gnostic sects). In this cultural context, the early teachers of the church, such as *Justin Martyr, *Irenaeus or *Tertullian, still defended the clear NT teaching of the resurrection of the body and even the belief in a literal millennium when Christ was to return in his resurrection body to rule on earth.

But the strong influence of Platonism led to the increasing 'spiritualization' of Christian doctrine. *Origen was strongly committed to the Christian faith, but he taught that Christ's coming would not be physically in one place, that there would be no literal *millennium or reign on earth, and that the body would keep the same form, but be materially a 'spiritual body'. Most notably, he speculated that hell referred to spiritual anguish, a punishment that would be reformatory so that eventually all (even the devil) would be saved. His Platonism even led to the speculation that since 'spirit' is eternal, all human souls have existed from, and would exist to, all eternity.

While there was strong reaction against Origen, by the end of the patristic period Christian eschatology emerged from Greco-Roman culture in a somewhat different form. The expectation of Christ's return or parousia remained, and the last *judgment was expected, but the resurrection body would be 'spiritual' rather than material, and the idea of a literal millennium had largely disappeared. *Gregory of Nyssa, one of the leading Fathers of the Eastern church, shared Origen's universalism, but *Augustine in the West and John *Chrysostom in the East maintained that the punishment of the wicked would be eternal. Augustine broadened eschatology into a whole philosophy of history in his work, The City of God. Two cities, the city of God and civilization in opposition to God, battled through the ages, but eventually the city of God would prevail. But the doctrine of the resurrection of the body and the new creation, while still present in his thought, is overshadowed by his more Platonist vision of an eternal heaven in which the saints will gaze enraptured at the beatific vision. Only then will the pure in heart see the triune God.

The medieval and Reformation period

In the medieval period, descriptions of heaven and hell as the final destiny for human souls were heightened. In the Four Books of Sentences, which became the standard textbook for theology in the monastic schools and the new universities, Peter *Lombard defined the 'four Last Things' as *death, judgment, heaven and hell. Eschatology thus defined came as the final locus (theme) of theology in all standard treatments. Dante's vivid description of his journey through hell, purgatory and paradise in his Divine Comedy gripped the medieval imagination. Millenarianism made its appearances on the fringes of medieval Christianity, for example, in the thirteenth-century *Joachimites, whose teaching took the three ages of Joachim of Fiore as a starting point.

At the Reformation, Luther rejected the medieval doctrine of *purgatory which had become the basis for the abuse of indulgences, and the Magisterial Reformers, although they agreed that the pope was the *Antichrist, generally rejected millennialism as fanaticism. Calvin wrote commentaries on almost every book of the Bible, but not the book of Revelation. Among some of the *Anabaptists, however, there was a renewed interest. The various groups varied widely, but at one extreme, Thomas Münzer, a renegade follower of Luther, applied the apocalyptic visions of Daniel and Revelation literally to the politics of his own day, and during the Peasants' War led an army of peasants to their deaths at Frankenhausen, promising that Christ would intervene.

Evangelical millennialism

Millennialism flourished again among various sects during the English Civil War (1638–49) and the succeeding dictatorship of Oliver Cromwell, notably among the Fifth Monarchy Men. But earlier in the century, two Puritan writers, Thomas Brightman and Joseph Mede, both Cambridge scholars, initiated (respectively) postmillennialism and premillennialism. Postmillennialism was the view that Christ would return after (Lat. post) the millennium. That implied that the gospel would spread and the world become increasingly peaceful before the second advent. Premillennialism was the view that Christ would return before (Lat. pre) the millennium. That implied that conditions on earth would become progressively worse until Christ defeated evil at the second advent. In the eighteenth century, the leaders of the Evangelical Revival, such as Jonathan *Edwards, leaned towards postmillennialism, although John *Wesley appears to have held the more complex view of the great pietist scholar of Halle, Johann Albrecht Bengel (1687–1752), that there would be two millennia, one before and one after the second advent.

The evangelical movement for 'foreign *missions' led by William Carey, Thomas Chalmers, John Venn and many others was accordingly predominantly postmillennialist. The spread of the gospel would usher in the universal reign of Christ. This vision continued to inspire the American revivalist, Charles Finney, and the Scottish missionary, David Livingstone in the mid-nineteenth century. The missionary societies therefore engaged in medical and educational work to improve society, Livingstone advocating an alliance of Christianity, commerce and civilization to counter the Arab slave trade in East Africa.

But from the 1820s a more pessimistic premillennialism began to stir. Edward *Irving's teaching led to the Albury Park conferences, and despite Irving's rejection by evangelicals, leaders such as Horatius Bonar, Lord Shaftesbury and Henry Grattan Guinness advocated the premillennial view. John Nelson *Darby developed out of this the more elaborate scheme of *dispensationalism, adopted by some but rejected by others in the new movement of Christian Brethren. The OT prophecies applied to Israel, not to the church, and at the end of the present dispensation, Christian believers would be caught up to meet the Lord in the air in the ‘rapture’ before the great tribulation, which in turn would end with the second advent which would initiate the millennium. Darby was more successful in propagating his views in the USA. Dispensationalism became widely known through the annual Niagara Bible Conferences from 1883 to 1900 and was taught in the notes of the widely influential Scofield Bible (1909).

Postmillennialism continued to influence the wider evangelical movement, although the watchword of the Student Volunteer Movement (founded 1886), ‘The evangelization of the world in this generation’, was interpreted both ways. But premillennialism (though not necessarily dispensationalism) was stronger among the more conservative evangelicals in Britain in the early twentieth century. The leading Baptist preacher, F. B. Meyer, founded the Advent Testimony and Preparation Movement in 1917, while the fall of Jerusalem to General Allenby and the Balfour Declaration promising Jews a home in Palestine were hailed as events of epochal significance (see *Judaism and Christianity). Full-blown dispensationalism flourished in America, strengthened by the founding of Dallas Theological Seminary by Lewis Sperry Chafer. From the 1970s it was promoted in popular literature by Hal Lindsey in The Late Great Planet Earth and the ‘Left Behind’ series of novels by Tim LaHaye and Jerry Jenkins. While American evangelicalism continues to include all views, British evangelicalism and evangelical scholars in both countries and around the world generally reject the idea of a literal millennium as a misreading of Rev. 20:3 and adopt the amillennial views of Augustine and the Reformers.

Modern and contemporary theology

In academic theology, eschatology began to play a more significant role even in *liberal thought with the teaching of Albrecht *Ritschl. Hegel’s thought had made theologians more conscious of the significance of time and history, but Ritschl rejected both the metaphysical approach of *Hegel and *Schleiermacher’s focus on religious experience to turn to a more historical approach. This began with Jesus’ proclamation of the *kingdom of God, understood as a historical movement of moral and social progress initiated by Jesus and continued by the church. This perspective contributed (along with evangelical postmillennialism) to the general nineteenth-century belief in progress. At the same time, Karl *Marx, a baptized but apostate Jew, rejected this progressive view for the belief that the revolution of the proletariat would eventually lead to the classless society, a secularized form of eschatology. The ‘*social gospel’ of Walter *Rauschenbusch at the beginning of the twentieth century was more in line with the liberal theology of Ritschlian thought.

By that time, however, Ritschl’s view of the kingdom of God had been rejected by his son-in-law, Johannes Weiss, who argued that Jesus was not a figure comparable to a modern social reformer, but rather a wild Jewish apocalyptic visionary proclaiming the end of the world. This was taken up by Albert *Schweitzer in his rejection of the ‘*quest for the historical Jesus’ which had projected modern progressive views on to Jesus. Jesus had preached the ethic of love, but (according to Schweitzer) had sacrificed his life in the false belief that God would intervene to save him from the cross and usher in the new age of the kingdom. The kingdom of God was not the consequence of liberal social policies, but (in the misunderstanding of Jesus) could only come with the dramatic crisis of divine intervention.

Schweitzer’s view was challenged by C. H. *Dodd, who argued that Jesus proclaimed that the kingdom of God, expected by many Jews of his day, had already come in his ministry. This idea of ‘realized eschatology’ was corrected, however, by several NT scholars, including W. G. Kümmel, Oscar Cullmann and George Eldon Ladd. They characterized the eschatology of Jesus and of the NT as paradoxical. In one sense the kingdom God had already come with the presence of Jesus, but in another sense it had not yet come. This has become the standard and widely accepted interpretation of NT eschatology: this paradox is thought to recapture the structure of thought soon lost as the church lost contact with its Jewish roots and was shaped by the culture of the Greco-Roman world. That being so, the implication for *systematic theology is that eschatology is not merely the doctrine of the Last Things, to be treated as the final topic, as it has been since Peter Lombard. Rather, it shapes the whole of Christian theology: it is the key in which the whole music is set.

This conclusion was somewhat influential in the theology of Karl *Barth, although the early Barth at least still tended to think in terms of the Eternal invading time directly ‘from above’. It was in the theology of Wolfhart *Pannenberg and Jürgen *Moltmann that it began to be taken as the starting point for theology. They were linked together in what was called the 'Theology of Hope' in the 1960s, but actually there are significant differences between them.

Pannenberg rejected Barth's view of *revelation as the word of God, substituting the idea that revelation came as history. The whole, total *history of the world would reveal God only at the end, but the end had come proleptically in Jesus. We could establish his resurrection by the historical-critical method and so enter rationally into faith in Jesus as the revelation of God. Moltmann's first significant publication was entitled The Theology of Hope (1964), and his theology has since developed from this starting point of eschatology. Hope arises from faith in the crucified Jesus in whom God shared in our suffering, and it is this eschatological perspective which motivates Christians to crusade for social justice in the present. Without following either Pannenberg or Moltmann, evangelical Christianity has recovered a sense of the wholeness of the mission of the church in both evangelism and social action from this recovery of the eschatological perspective. But in articulating eschatology itself, N. T. Wright sums up the new perception that the Christian *hope is not the long-held and rather Platonist one of a disembodied existence as disembodied souls or spirits in an eternal heaven, but that, while at death believers go to be with the Lord, the real hope is for 'life after life after death'. It is hope not just for individual souls, but hope for *resurrection 'transphysical' life in the new creation.

In The Progress of Dogma (1906) James *Orr thought that the edifice of Christian theology was virtually complete except for some additions to eschatology. But instead, eschatology now shapes the whole building. While popular speculative millenarianism survives, the serious study of NT eschatology is providing new insights into the whole of Christian theology and into the *mission of the worldwide church today.

Bibliography

G. C. Berkouwer, The Return of Christ (Grand Rapids, 1972); E. Brunner, Eternal Hope (London, 1954); R. Bultmann, History and Eschatology (Edinburgh, 1957); O. Cullmann, Christ and Time (London, 1951); idem, Salvation in History (London, 1967); C. H. Dodd, The Parables of the Kingdom (London, 1936); M. J. Harris, Raised Immortal

(London, 1983); A. A. Hoekema, The Bible and the Future (Grand Rapids, 1979); S. Holmes and R. Rook (eds.), What Are We Waiting For? Christian Hope and Contemporary Culture (Milton Keynes, 2008); H. Küng, Eternal Life? (London, 1984); G. E. Ladd, The Presence of the Future (Grand Rapids, 1982); S. H. Travis, Christian Hope and the Future of Man (Leicester, 1980); N. T. Wright, Surprised by Hope (London, 2007).

T. A. NOBLE

ESSENCE OF CHRISTIANITY

Although association with *Feuerbach's The Essence of Christianity (1841) and *Harnack's What Is Christianity? (1900) has suggested that the subject is of interest only to historians of nineteenth-century thought, or one whose pursuit inevitably leads to abstract generalizations or reduction of living religion to sociological or ethical principles, these are not necessary conclusions. In fact, the issue is a central one of permanent and even increasing contemporary significance in at least five areas.

Definitions of the essential features of Christianity, which include *religious experience, *worship and *ethics, as well as doctrine, are: (1) offered in varying degrees by all *creeds, *confessions of faith and *catechisms, both ancient and modern; (2) the basis of *ecumenical discussions promoting reunion of the churches; (3) necessary for undertaking intra-religious dialogue; (4) entailed in every attempt at the *contextualization or cross-cultural communication of the gospel, which is a particularly sensitive issue for the Roman Catholic Church in different parts of the world (cf. Concilium 135, 1980; 171, 1984); and (5) the implicit or explicit basis of every work of *systematic theology or *apologetics.

Looking at the breadth and implications of the subject in this way makes it clear that there is a distinction to be made between understandings of the essence of Christianity that seek to reduce it to one or more key ideas, and those that attempt to do full justice to its complex elements. In this respect there are important differences between the approaches taken by Feuerbach and Harnack and those adopted by contemporaries such as *Schleiermacher or *Newman.

The constant tendency of a search for an 'essence' to de-historicize Christianity has to be resisted both by careful consideration of its components – religious experience, worship, ethics and doctrine – and by due regard for the unity and diversity of their manifestation from earliest times.

The question of ‘essence’ thus turns out to be closely related to the question of the *development of doctrine. It may therefore be useful to consider the arguments of Newman’s celebrated Essay on the Development of Doctrine (1845, ³1878). Whether or not his understanding of the church’s role in interpreting the mystery of *revelation is felt to be completely satisfactory, two of Newman’s conclusions are worth noting. The first is that Christian truth may be organized around one idea, in his case the *incarnation, providing it does not exclude another aspect of revelation. The second is that ultimately revelation is a mystery that cannot be systematized or exhausted in words, a timely reminder that knowledge of God comes through the response of the whole person.

Bibliography

J. D. G. Dunn, Unity and Diversity in the New Testament (London, 1977); G. E. Gunton, Yesterday and Today; A Study of Continuities in Christology (London, 1983); N. Lash, Theology on Dover Beach (London, 1979); H.-G. Link (ed.), Apostolic Faith Today, Faith and Order Paper 124 (Geneva, 1985); R. J. Schreier, Constructing Local Theologies (London, 1985); S. Sykes, The Identity of Christianity (London, 1984).

P. N. HILLYER

ETERNAL LIFE, see ESCHATOLOGY

ETERNITY, see TIME AND ETERNITY

ETHICS

The field of ‘ethics’ has been defined as ‘disciplined reflection on that dimension of human life denoted “moral”’ (A. Verhey, Dictionary for Theological Interpretation of the Bible, Grand Rapids and London, 2005). ‘Christian ethics’, then, is disciplined Christian reflection on the moral dimension of human life. In the light of the comprehensive claims of God over human existence as Creator and Lawgiver, and the equally comprehensive scope of his redeeming and sanctifying intentions, ‘the moral dimension of human life’ should be construed as embracing every conceivable facet of human activity. There are no aspects of human activity in which we are not constantly and inescapably confronted by questions of right conduct (moral action) or questions of virtue (moral character). Indeed, on such a broad definition, the moral dimension would also include every facet of the human relationship to the non-human creation, so that ecological and technological questions are also part of the subject matter of ‘ethics’.

Modern challenges to classical Christian ethics

This all-embracing understanding of the scope of ethics was, in the classical Christian era, associated with a particular view of the ground of ethics. Ethics was construed as grounded in ‘natural’ order. Nature was understood as ‘creation’, that is, as ordered by and revelatory of inherent, divinely established moral purposes (tela) accessible in principle to unprejudiced human reason. Nature as *creation, then, was governed by moral laws, and communicated moral truths. Such truths were seen as confirmed, clarified and expanded in Scripture, the highest authority in matters of ethics. This was the central conception underlying various versions of ‘natural law theory’ which dominated Christian ethical thinking from patristic times until the late Middle Ages, attaining its most systematic formulation in the work of *Thomas Aquinas. The Reformers later insisted that whatever moral knowledge ‘nature’ might communicate was only imperfectly discernible by the fallen human mind and could only be rightly apprehended through the correcting and judging lens of Scripture. Yet whatever disagreements there were over how, and how reliably, humans might gain access to natural moral truths, the core assumption of natural law theory – that created nature discloses moral truths – prevailed in European thought until the modern period.

Such a view came to be fundamentally challenged by influential modern thinkers. The challenge gathered momentum under the influence of seventeenth-century *empiricism, which began to reconceive ‘nature’ in mechanistic terms, dispensing with the Thomistic-Aristotelian moral teleology that had long underpinned the notion. This was a radically novel conception, representing a fundamental departure from the classical Christian view. Initially, this led to a new conception of ‘natural laws’ as observable or deducible causal regularities in the physical world. While this was a fruit of the seventeenth-century ‘scientific revolution’, inspired in part by the new *Reformation theology of creation, this view of physical nature was gradually extended into more and more areas of human nature as well. The eventual outcome of applying the new scientific method to human nature was a reductionist view of natural morality profoundly at odds with the prior integrated understanding of nature (including human nature) as saturated with moral purpose and revelatory of divine intentions. The challenge to the classical Christian view reached a new peak in David *Hume, who argued that it is impossible to derive an evaluative proposition from a descriptive one – an ‘ought’ from an ‘is’. Such an attempted derivation later came to be termed ‘the naturalistic fallacy’, because, so it was argued, ‘nature’ itself was incapable of embodying or conveying moral obligations.

The course of ethical theory since Hume may be construed as a continuing struggle to make sense of the relationship between the ‘is’ and the ‘ought’ which Hume had attempted to sever, and the efforts of *Kant and *Hegel were of particular importance in this regard. Kant sought to found a universally valid ethic of obligation (often termed a deontological ethic) on autonomous practical reason alone, rejecting the idea that ‘nature’, or the empirical world generally, could yield any moral duty. Hegel, Kant’s most searching critic, attempted to reconnect morality with human experience, but he did so not by invoking the earlier biblical notion of nature as creation, but rather by seeking to ground morality in history, thus generating a powerful historicist conception of ethics.

The nineteenth century witnessed a wide variety of responses to the impact of rationalist and historicist ethics. Neo-Kantianism sought to revive the flagging Kantian legacy, giving rise to a reformulation of the Humean bifurcation between ‘is’ and ‘ought’ as one between ‘fact’ and ‘value’. Mediated by *Weber and *Durkheim, among others, this distinction came to exercise a massively powerful hold over the emerging social sciences of the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. It lay behind the eventual dominance of *positivist methodologies whose influence is still evident wherever contemporary social scientists assert that the conclusions of their research are ‘value-free’, untainted by moral evaluation or personal commitment. Other scientifically oriented theories of ethics emerged alongside positivism, including utilitarianism and social Darwinism. These schools made renewed attempts to derive an ‘ought’ from an ‘is’, though they now conceived that which ‘is’ in positivist fashion, as explicable in terms of the methods of the natural sciences. *Marxism (not addressed here) generated quite another variant of ‘scientific’ ethics. In the first half of the twentieth century, other schools, such as *existentialism (which placed the ‘authenticity’ of the moral agent at the centre of ethics) and emotivism (which claimed that evaluative propositions were nothing but expressions of emotion carrying no empirical or cognitive content), added further to the mix.

These modernist ethical theories collectively posed major questions to the public credibility of traditional Christian ethics. An even more fundamental challenge had already been launched in the late nineteenth century by *Nietzsche. By pushing the logic of historicism to an extreme conclusion, he claimed not only that it was impossible to know reliably whether moral claims were universally valid, but also that the very pretension to make claims of universal validity was itself an inherently oppressive move, necessarily doing violence to those who were to be subjected to such supposedly universal principles. This sweeping Nietzschean critique was the driving force behind much late twentieth-century deconstructionism, whose stock-in-trade was the relentless attempt to expose widely endorsed and supposedly universal ethical principles such as liberty, justice, toleration, democracy and rights as mere instruments of political domination and exclusion.

Christian responses

Christian ethicists have attempted in various ways to come to terms with and respond to the successive waves of ethical theorizing thrown up by secular modernity and postmodernity. Some Christian theologians and philosophers have responded in what has been thought to be accommodationist fashion, incorporating one or other school of modern ethical theory into a supposedly Christian framework. Yet while charges of accommodation continue to be levelled today, it is noteworthy that increasing numbers of Christian ethicists display a concern to stand in continuity with biblical and traditional modes of thought. For some, this concern has come to expression primarily in their attempt to reassert the radical distinctiveness of Christian ethics over against, and in judgment upon, modern secularist conceptions (e.g. the radically Christocentric ethics of *Barth, *Yoder, *Hauerwas). Others, in more reconstructive mode, have devoted their energies essentially to reviving and restating the core insights of the classical Christian ethical tradition (e.g. the variegated contributions of *Bonhoeffer, *Ramsey, *Thielicke, Finnis, *O'Donovan, the later *MacIntyre).

Still others have construed their contributions principally as a critical engagement with prevailing schools of secular ethics in order to reformulate core biblical and theological concerns within the terms of prevailing discourse, while also attempting to address its deficiencies. Many have done so principally in dialogue with one or more modern intellectual currents (e.g. Fletcher, *Niebuhr, *Gutiérrez, *Moltmann, *Taylor). These encounters have been evaluated very differently. Some have evoked renewed charges of accommodation (e.g. against Fletcher's now largely discredited 'situation ethics'). Others have earned admiration in some quarters for the powerful critiques and constructive proposals issuing from such encounters (e.g. Taylor's critical exposure of the sources of the modern 'self').

More recently, however, a growing number of Christian ethicists have claimed to find post-modern currents more conducive to constructive dialogue. Commentators have certainly differed sharply over whether the Nietzschean school might, after all, turn out to provide resources for the cause of a reconstituted postmodern, post-secular Christian ethics. But some 'Christian postmodernists', often drawing also on phenomenology, have discerned particular significance in the 'ethical turn' in postmodern philosophy, its renewed appreciation of the ethical claims of personhood, and its repudiation of all forms of violence (see e.g. the contrasting appropriations of Derrideans such as Caputo, and the "Radical Orthodoxy" of Milbank).

It may seem remarkable that there should have been a notable revival of the classical Christian theory of natural law in such seemingly inauspicious circumstances, although defenders of natural law see this as a predictable rediscovery of a common, enduring human nature out of the cacophony of contemporary ethics. Such a revival has been witnessed not only in orthodox Roman Catholic circles (e.g. Finnis, George), but also in some sections of evangelical Protestantism (e.g. Budziszewski). One of the many challenges such a movement faces is, in the first instance, to persuade other Christians that some version of 'ethical naturalism' (the view that created nature discloses moral truths) is at all credible in a 'post-metaphysical' and 'postmodern' intellectual climate.

By contrast, the contemporary school known as narrative ethics (see *Narrative theology) is critical of what it sees as the longstanding tendency within Christian ethics to formulate objective general principles of morality in a deductive fashion (whether from Scripture or from practical reasoning). They claim that much modern Christian ethics has unwittingly absorbed a Kantian preference for abstract rational principles and neglected the historical character of Scripture itself. In rejecting modernist ethics, narrativists identify themselves as 'postliberal', and, to some degree, 'postmodern'. They propose instead that Christian ethics is the practice of a faithful ecclesial community, and that Christians come to discern ethical principles only by committed engagement in such a community and by embodying its distinctive gospel virtues (i.e. by 'living its story'). Most narrativists acknowledge, however, that an ecclesial community can only be 'faithful' insofar as it acknowledges the authority of *Scripture (and tradition). Yet, seeking to honour a core insight of historicism, they insist that the process of ethical discernment does not involve the rational apprehension of abstract and unchanging universal principles (whether located in Scripture or nature) by the individual mind. Rather, it involves the participatory exploration of the contemporary shape of discipleship within a believing and worshipping community. The future capacity of Christian ethics both to remain faithful to its own authoritative sources and to speak authentically and relevantly to contemporary culture may, in part, depend on whether these two creative strands of ethical reflection can adequately inform and complement each other.

Christian ethics facing the twenty-first century

As Christian ethics enters an already turbulent twenty-first century, it confronts a series of momentous challenges, many inherited from the twentieth, but bringing with them newly perplexing dilemmas and, more often than not, global dimensions.

Violence, war and peace

The experience of two devastating world wars in which tens of millions lost their lives in conflicts fought between supposedly 'Christian' nations could not but impose a posture of chastened humility upon Christian ethicists in the post-war period. A revived classical 'just war' theory, intended to restrain nationalist and imperialist militarism, then found itself confronting the awesome dilemmas of an escalating Cold War arms race. This race now threatens to gather renewed pace as a revived and aggressive Russian nationalism confronts an America conscious of itself as but declining sole superpower in a dangerous world with weak international institutions, nervous to protect its own political and economic interests, and possessed of military bases all over the globe. The outbreak of terrible regional wars and civil conflicts since 1989, and, of course, the scourge of terrorism since 9/11, have forced yet further rethinking of the ethics of war, peace-building and reconciliation in a persistently and perplexingly violent age. In these circumstances, Christian ethics must think far beyond the traditional 'pacifism vs. just war' debate to envisage the shape of a stable global order in which international power is effectively and collaboratively put to the service of justice and *peace.

Political authority, democracy and human rights

The traumatic experiences of political authoritarianism and totalitarianism in mid-twentieth-century Europe were deeply formative on Christian political ethicists. Many proposed that 'ethics after Auschwitz' must strive for a radically deepened sensitivity to the reality of enormous human evil. Later, *liberationist ethicists, first in Latin America and then in other regions of the Majority World, argued that the 'idealist' ethics of the Christian West had to be brought down to the level of the concrete struggles against oppression in those contexts. Liberationist ethics, informed initially (and problematically) by Marxist social analysis and later by post-colonial theorizing, in time spawned novel regional expressions, especially in African and Asian countries suffering under authoritarian regimes. Yet the widespread failures of many post-independence Majority World states – their endemic corruption, their institutional dysfunctionality, their persistent violations of *human rights – have chastened earlier liberationist optimism and pressed the question of whether there are not vital cultural and perhaps even religious pre-conditions necessary for the realization of a stable and just constitutional democracy. Given the potentially huge influence of a rapidly expanding Christian presence in many Majority World states, Christian political ethics is called to forge a credible notion of constitutional representative government, which firmly resists authoritarianism in any form, but is more than a mere transposition of Western models.

Globalization and ecology

The multi-faceted phenomenon of late-twentieth-century *globalization has evoked a revival of Christian economic ethics – from some quarters in defence of the supposed blessings of global *capitalism, from others, against its widely perceived deformations. The seemingly uncontrollable power of markets apparently dominated by transnational corporations and international finance (albeit shaken by the 2008 banking crisis), and the growth of abject yet avoidable *poverty in the Majority World – as well as in pockets of the Western world – have demanded new responses to the question of how to fashion global economic relations in accordance with an authentically Christian conception of economic justice. The near-universal scientific consensus on global warming, and mounting evidence of other kinds of irreversible environmental degradation, have produced a flourishing body of original Christian environmental thought (see *Ecology), yet one which has yet to bring about the far-reaching lifestyle changes that would be required if such catastrophic outcomes are to be averted.

Science, technology and the human person

These military, economic and environmental challenges are leading instances of persistent ethical dilemmas thrown up, at least partly, by the exponential advance of science and technology since the last century. Developments in vanguard disciplines such as biology, medicine, information technology (IT) and nanotechnology have continued to thrust novel and highly complex ethical dilemmas upon the attention of Christian ethicists. The possibilities opened up by stem-cell research and reproductive technologies, for example, are demanding ever more profound reflection on the relation between personhood and embodiment. And mounting evidence that the unprecedented advances in IT may actually be reshaping human relationships, often in damaging ways – for example, by corroding the internal life of families – deserves greater attention from Christian ethics than it has received (see *Science and theology).

Family, gender and sexuality

As if the foregoing external pressures were not enough for *families to cope with, the precipitous internal decay of this most vital social institution seems to continue unabated. On the one hand, Christian ethicists (at least in the West) were, by and large, favourably disposed towards the emancipation of women in the second half of the last century. This discovery of the concrete social implications of the biblical principle of gender equality was widely (though by no means uniformly) seen as a major advance in Christian ethics. Yet the troubling questions inevitably posed thereby to the expectations of marital and family relationships (e.g. the nature of parental authority, the meaning of ‘femininity’ and ‘masculinity’), and the implications of changed family structures for wider society (e.g. the sharp decline in the pool of available volunteers and carers as women entered paid employment), threw down far-reaching challenges which Christian ethicists have been slow to take up. The task here is to think beyond a mere reiteration of narrowly modernist views of ‘equality’ and postmodernist deconstructions of *‘gender’, in order to reprise a profoundly biblical understanding of ‘family’ and ‘marriage’ for a rapidly changing social landscape. Such an understanding, coupled with a similarly biblical conception of ‘friendship’, should also be the deeper starting point for an adequate ethical view of homosexual orientation, and indeed of *sexuality in general.

Pluralism

The simultaneous advance of secularization and the growth of cultural and religious pluralism in many historically ‘Christian’ cultures, and the continued existence of pluralism in other *cultures, continue to pose the dilemma of how Christian ethics might speak with both confidence and sensitivity in such seemingly inhospitable contexts. On the one hand, some Christians in ‘post-*Christendom’ contexts still need to come to terms with their loss of inherited privilege and begin to reckon with, and make the best of, their new status as one minority among many. On the other, others in such contexts need to eschew post-Christendom breast-beating and learn to speak unapologetically with a Christian voice in the public sphere, resisting the newly assertive secularist campaign to privatize religious faith. In other contexts, the dilemmas of Christian public witness in religiously plural societies vary very widely depending on the size and strength of the Christian minority and the attitudes towards it of rival religious groups, which can range from benign indifference to outright hostility. In this as in all ethical challenges facing the twenty-first-century church, serious, respectful and biblically inspired national and global dialogues within the community of faith will be an essential precondition of effective Christian ethical witness beyond it.

Bibliography

D. Atkinson and D. Field (eds.), New Dictionary of Christian Ethics and Pastoral Theology (Leicester, 1995); M. Banner, Christian Ethics and Contemporary Moral Problems (Cambridge, 1999); N. Biggar, Behaving in Public: How to Do Christian Ethics (Grand Rapids, 2011); J. P. Burnside, God, Justice and Society: Aspects of Law and Legality in the Bible (New York, 2011); A. J. B. Cameron, Joined-Up Life: A Christian Account of How Ethics Works (Nottingham, 2011); R. Gill (ed.), The Cambridge Companion to Christian Ethics, 2nd edn (Cambridge, 2002); S. Hauerwas and S. Wells (eds.), The Blackwell Companion to Christian Ethics (Malden, Oxford and Carlton, 2004); G. Meilaender and W. Werpehowski (eds.), The Oxford Handbook of Theological Ethics (Oxford, 2005); O. O’Donovan, Resurrection and Moral Order: An Outline for Evangelical Ethics (Leicester and Grand Rapids, 1994); G. H. Stassen and D. P. Gushee, Kingdom Ethics: Following Jesus in Contemporary Context (Downers Grove, 2003).

J. P. CHAPLIN

ETHIOPIAN ORTHODOX THEOLOGY

The principal classical texts currently recognized, in addition to the Scriptures (the canon of which is considerably larger than that of most other churches, including such works as the Shepherd of Hermas), as sources for the theology of the Ethiopian Orthodox Church are the Ethiopic Liturgy (pre-anaphora with fourteen anaphoras) and the work Haymanotä abäw ('The Faith of the Fathers', a collection of excerpts on the *Trinity and *Christology).

The Ethiopian Orthodox Church is heir to a rich theological tradition which cannot be described briefly. A full account would need to note what is more central to the tradition, and what is more peripheral; it would describe the historical doctrinal disputes with other churches, and within the Ethiopian Orthodox Church itself, which led to the production of theological literature; it would review the actual shifts which have taken place in the mainline Ethiopian Orthodox Church tradition; and it would portray the close integration of belief and practice in the daily life of the faithful, who now number at least 40 million. This tradition has given rise to certain distinctive practices, including the observance of the Sabbath as well as Sunday as holy days, and the imposition of dietary restrictions which resemble those of Judaism.

The *creeds accepted by the Ethiopian Orthodox Church are those contained in the Ethiopic Liturgy, namely the 'Creed of the Apostles' (not the Western 'Apostles' Creed'), and the Niceno-Constantinopolitan creed (without the filioque clause).

A framework which is commonly used for expositions of Ethiopian Orthodox theology is that of the 'five pillars of mystery', namely the doctrines of the Trinity, the incarnation, baptism, the Eucharist and the resurrection of the dead. Not infrequently, texts of the 'five pillars' are preceded by accounts of creation, and Ethiopian preaching of the gospel often follows this pattern: 'Adam was created, then fell, and Christ came to set him free.'

Modern Ethiopian theological statements also commonly contain an account of the 'seven sacraments' – baptism, post-baptismal anointing, Eucharist, repentance, orders, marriage, unction – but such systematization is less evident in the classical texts, and may have arisen in response to Roman Catholic teaching.

Further study of specific Ethiopian theological positions must take account of the actual language in which these are expressed. A bald statement such as that the Ethiopian Orthodox Church 'teaches transubstantiation' or 'honours icons' is misleading, as such ideas are differently conceived in Ethiopia, or at least have sets of associations different from those of Western theology.

The principal issue dividing the Ethiopian Orthodox Church from most other churches has been Christological, namely that it does not accept the *Chalcedonian Definition, and specifically rejects the phrase 'in two natures'. The Ethiopian position has been termed '*monophysite' or 'non-Chalcedonian', but the preferred description is 'unified' (Tweahedo), a word which forms part of the church's official title.

See also: EASTERN ORTHODOX THEOLOGY; ORIENTAL ORTHODOX THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

J. Bank, An Annotated and Classified Bibliography of English Literature Pertaining to the Ethiopian Orthodox Church (Metuden, 1984); C. Chaillot, The Ethiopian Orthodox Twahedo Church Tradition (Paris, 2002); D. Crummey, Priests and Politicians (Oxford, 1972); M. Daoud (tr.), The Liturgy of the Ethiopian Church (Addis Ababa, 1954); S. H. Sellassie (ed.), The Church of Ethiopia: A Panorama of History and Spiritual Life (Addis Ababa, 1970); E. Ullendorff, The Ethiopians: An Introduction to Country and People (London, 31973).

R. W. COWLEY

EUCCHARIST

Eucharist, or 'thanksgiving', is the most popular name given to the central sacramental rite of Christians. But the rite has other names which emphasize different aspects of the service, such as the Lord's Supper, Holy Communion, the Mass, the Breaking of Bread, the Holy Mysteries, the Qorbana, and so forth. The earliest record we have of this rite is Paul's injunction to follow the example and command of the Lord at the Last Supper with his disciples, to take bread and wine and eat and drink together as a memorial, or anamnesis of the Lord's death and rising again (1 Cor. 11:23–26)

(see *Salvation). This was following the example of Jesus, who on the night of his arrest shared a ritual meal with his disciples.

Eucharist and Passover

According to the Synoptic Gospels, the Last Supper was a Passover meal; John's Gospel suggests that it was a short time before the Passover. Passover imagery is evident in the way the Eucharist has developed, and thus provided a singular interpretation of the sufferings and death of *Jesus as the Lamb of God. Paul declares that every time believers break the bread and take the cup, they proclaim publicly the death of the Lord, until he comes (1 Cor. 11:26). John's Gospel suggests that the meal was before the Passover, and the meal led into the foot washing, followed by the farewell discourses. But for John's Gospel too the Last Supper is full of Passover imagery.

Passover was, and is, a family festival celebrated annually in every pious Jewish home. For the disciples gathered as Jesus' family in the upper room it must have been in paradoxical fashion a festive occasion and a ritual so familiar to the disciples that they must have found security in the midst of stress as they heard the familiar words and took part in the well-remembered actions of Passover, so rich with associations, and speaking so powerfully of the things of God.

Jesus must have startled and disconcerted his disciples by giving the Passover a new meaning and a quite unexpected and puzzling significance. When he performed the traditional ritual of taking unleavened bread – food for a journey – he said, 'This is my body which is for (or broken for) you.' And when he took the cup he said, 'This is my blood of the new covenant which is poured out for many.' In doing and saying these things, Jesus was linking together in the strongest and most dramatic of ways what happens at the Supper and what was to happen on the *cross the next day. The two events interpreted one another, and remain indissolubly linked in the Supper. The foot washing in John's Gospel is not only an example to the disciples of how they should behave; it also evokes the OT image of the Suffering Servant who gives himself for his people.

The meals that Jesus shared with his disciples after the resurrection also enrich our understanding of the presence of the Lord in the Supper. On the Emmaus Road the Lord opens the Scriptures to the puzzled disciples, and he is 'made known to them when he broke the bread' (Luke 24:35). And he reveals himself to the confused disciples who have returned in doubt and uncertainty to their fishing when he invites them to share with him in a fish breakfast beside the lake (John 21:1–14).

The fellowship of the table

Jesus' willingness to welcome all sorts of people to his table caused scandal at the time. 'How can a holy man feast with all sorts of people, including notorious sinners?' they asked (Luke 15:2). And in the early church where the breaking of bread was the regular weekly worship, from the beginning there was a strict discipline, excluding from the table evildoers, including, perhaps, many whom Jesus would have welcomed (1 Cor. 11:27–34). But causing scandal within the *fellowship was a grievous offence, and one Christian going hungry while others guzzled at the Lord's table was a serious offence which caused scandal both within the congregation and outside.

The hospitality at the Lord's table did not continue in the early church, and before long disciplinary procedures – later called 'the fencing of the table' – were instituted in most denominations. And it was not only notorious sinners who were excluded and denied hospitality, but believers of other traditions and denominations who were not allowed to share in communion. This refusal of hospitality continues today, and what is often declared to be a festival of reconciliation or a 'converting ordinance' is often an occasion of painful exclusion. And this denial of hospitality continues even when there is a notable convergence in understanding the theology of the Eucharist.

The early church

There is evidence to suggest that in the early church the Eucharist was a major element in the weekly agape, or love-feast, when the congregation gathered for a meal, for a celebration of the Eucharist and to hear the word expounded. Fairly early on, the agape meal and the Eucharist became separated, and from the second century we have a few rather incomplete orders of worship which indicate how Christian congregations celebrated the Eucharist. In some situations Jewish Christians found it very hard to share in the Lord's Supper with Gentile Christians. Some said it did not matter if there were separate celebrations for Jews and Gentiles. But Paul thought otherwise. For him the universality of the gospel and the work of Christ in tearing down barriers among people must be displayed in celebrations of the Lord's Supper at which there was no discrimination, no recognition or sanctioning of the age-old suspicion and hostility between Jew and Gentile. Paul withstood Peter to his face because he had equivocated on this vital issue (Gal. 2:11–16). And very similar issues have been wrestled with in the churches in modern time, in apartheid South Africa or in caste-dominated India, for example.

About AD 110, the Proconsul in Asia Minor reported to the Emperor Trajan on the strange practice of the Christians, who met together for a meal each week. The early second-century Didache gives an account of the weekly meal with breaking of the bread and taking of the cup with thanks, and after the meal a magnificent prayer of thanksgiving. Justin Martyr, who was converted to Christianity about 150, gives two accounts of the Lord's Supper in his First Apology. In the first, a baptism is followed by a Eucharist, including prayers of intercession and the 'kiss of peace'. In the second service, there is reading of 'the records of the apostles or writings of the prophets', followed by a homily. Hippolytus's The Apostolic Tradition was probably written in the early third century, and it contains the earliest text of a eucharistic prayer. It comes from a time before Eastern and Western liturgical traditions began to diverge significantly, and it has been amazingly influential in a wide range of modern liturgical revisions.

During the Middle Ages the *liturgies of the Eastern and the Western churches diverged significantly. For the Eastern churches the heart of the liturgy was the epiclesis, or invocation of the Holy Spirit to bless the bread and the wine and be present with the people of God. In a typical Orthodox Church the priest celebrates the Eucharist behind a screen, or iconostasis, with pictures of the saints. The priest's voice can be heard, but the actions cannot be seen by the people. In the Western church the priest stood at the altar with his back to the people, and the rite was held to transform ex opere operato the elements of bread and wine into the body and the blood of the Lord. The Lord was present in the elements, and continued to be present in the church through the reserved *sacrament. The faithful participated primarily through their presence, and while they were expected to be present at Mass frequently, they received the sacrament – in one 'kind' only – on infrequent occasions. There was an increasing tendency to concentrate attention on the elements of bread and wine rather than the rite as a whole, and to narrow down the understanding of Christ's presence in the bread and wine. This went with an underplaying of Christ's role as the host and master of the feast; his presence according to his promise whenever two or three are gathered in his name; his presence in the word; his presence in his body, the church; and his presence in the needy neighbour.

The Reformation

The Reformation came as a corrective to what was denounced as 'the idolatry of the Mass'. Like most correctives, it perhaps went too far, so that many Protestants tended to see the Lord's Supper as no more than a commemoration, to deny the real presence, and to refuse to see any sacrificial or eschatological connotations whatsoever. Sometimes Protestant church leaders found strong resistance from their people to many desirable changes, such as frequent Communion. *Luther taught a theology of 'consubstantiation', a theory that the presence of Christ was 'in, with, and under' the bread and the wine, as against the Roman Catholic assumption that in the sacrament the bread and the wine become the very body and blood of Christ. *Zwingli taught that the Lord's Supper was no more than a memorial meal. The Calvinists taught that in the Lord's Supper believers are lifted up to share something of the life of the *kingdom, and in particular the heavenly banquet (see *Reformed theology).

Eucharistic convergence

The twentieth century was a time of remarkable ecumenical convergence in eucharistic theology and practice, in almost all branches of the Christian church. It started with scholarly theological and historical work, which found its way into the renewal of eucharistic practice in one denomination after another. Eastern Orthodoxy contributed scholarly work from theologians such as John *Zizioulas and Alexander Schmemmann, but there was little change or experiment in liturgy, and a fairly complacent belief that the Orthodox liturgy needed no improvement or revision. The Second *Vatican Council of the Roman Catholic Church authorized and encouraged the development of a fresh vernacular Mass which was popular all around the globe, but was denounced by conservatives as 'a Protestant liturgy'. Altars were moved from the east wall of churches so that the faithful could gather around, and the priest faced the congregation, who were encouraged to participate in all sorts of ways which had been unthinkable a generation before. Fresh and exhilarating liturgies of the Eucharist were produced, most notably perhaps the Book of Common Worship of the recently united Church of South India. The World Council of Churches Faith and Order Commission produced in 1982 a remarkable 'convergence document', Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry, which demonstrated a remarkable agreement between the major churches on the understanding and celebration of the Eucharist. It is not unfair to suggest that this generation is experiencing a major renewal in eucharistic faith and practice in most of the major Christian denominations.

See also: WORSHIP.

Bibliography

P. F. Bradshaw (ed.), The New SCM Dictionary of Liturgy and Worship (London, 2002); D. Forrester, H. I. H. McDonald and G. Tellini, Encounter with God (London, 1996); R. C. D. Jasper (ed.), The Eucharist Today: Studies on Series 3 (London, 1974); J. Jeremias, The Eucharistic Words of Jesus (London, 1966); A. Schmemmann, The Eucharist (New York, 1988); B. D. Spinks and I. R. Torrance (eds.), To Glorify God: Essays on Modern Reformed Liturgy (Grand Rapids, 1999); M. Thurian, The Eucharistic Memorial (London, 1960); idem, The Mystery of the Eucharist: An Ecumenical Approach (London, 1981); G. Wainwright, Eucharist and Eschatology (London, 1971).

D. B. FORRESTER

EUNOMIANS, see ARIANSIM

EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA (c. 265–c. 339)

Eusebius is chiefly famous for his Ecclesiastical History (definitive edition c. 325), but theologically for pronouncements upon the *Trinity at the time of the *Arian controversy. He adopted the strains in *Origen's teaching which most leant towards a subordinationism, being imbued, like Origen, with a sense of God's unique self-existence as the author of all things. While insisting that the Son or *Logos existed before all the ages and all times, he nevertheless denied that the Son was coeternal with God, and he associated his generation with the Father's will. The focus of unity between Father and Son rested with a shared glory. Not surprisingly, Eusebius was embarrassed by the homoousios formula of Nicaea, probably because it recalled the spectre of Paul of Samosata (see *Adoptionism). The Holy Spirit fared even worse at his hands, being described as a 'third' rank and power and, as Origen said, 'one of the things which have come into existence through the Son'.

Eusebius was radical, but not as radical as Arius himself, though possibly drawn by the fear of Sabellianism (see *Monarchianism) into the circle of Arian influence. Those who were not Arians (but could not be counted among the more moderate opponents of *Athanasius) readily identified with his views.

The other strand of Origenism in Eusebius was his approach to *Christology. He continued the tradition of emphasizing the pre-incarnation *mediatorial function of the Word, but pressed the centrality of the Word in *incarnation even further, so that the human soul was eclipsed altogether. Thus, in some measure he anticipated the developments which led up to *Apollinarianism.

Perhaps Eusebius' greatest influence derived from his role as the apologist of the 'Constantinian revolution'. His theology of the Christian empire and the Christian emperor, correlating them with the kingdom of God and the Logos, laid down the main lines of Byzantine thought for centuries to come, but had less impact on the West.

Bibliography

H. W. Attridge and G. Hata (eds.), Eusebius, Christianity, and Judaism (Detroit, 1992); H. A. Drake, In Praise of Constantine: A Historical Study and New Translation of Eusebius' Tricennial Orations (Berkeley, 1976); R. M. Grant, Eusebius as Church Historian (Oxford, 1980); J. N. D. Kelly, Early Christian Creeds (London, 1972); idem, Early Christian Doctrines (London, 1977); C. Luibhéid, Eusebius of Caesarea and the Arian Crisis (Dublin, 1981); D. S. Wallace-Hadrill, Eusebius of Caesarea (London, 1960).

R. KEARSLEY

EUTYCHES, see MONOPHYSITISM

EVANGELICAL THEOLOGY

Contemporary evangelical theology has deep roots. Some consider that it was primarily shaped in reaction to theological liberalism, and while it is true that this conflict has lent a certain complexion to evangelical theology, its substance is drawn from the heritage of orthodox Christian theological formation. As one of its most prominent advocates, John Stott, insisted, evangelical faith is 'neither an eddy nor a backwater but mainstream Christianity'. In concert with the creeds and councils of the early church, evangelical theology affirms that: the Bible is the truthful revelation of God, and through it the life-giving voice of God speaks; God is a *Trinity of Father, Son and Holy Spirit; God is the almighty Creator and we are his dependent creation; God has entered history *redemptively in the *incarnation of Jesus Christ; Jesus *Christ is fully divine and fully human; the power and judgment of sin is a reality for all humanity; God graciously takes the initiative by *saving us in Jesus Christ and by the Holy Spirit; Jesus Christ is building his church, and the consummation of history will be expressed in his second advent, in the general resurrection, and in final judgment to heaven or hell (see *Eschatology).

Evangelical theology also has strong links with the early medieval church. It draws heavily upon the satisfaction view of the *atonement enunciated by *Anselm of Canterbury and shares the concomitant stress upon the passion of Jesus Christ expressed by no-one more fully than *Bernard of Clairvaux.

Evangelical theology becomes more distinctive, however, in relation to the Protestant Reformation. In 1531 Thomas More referred to the *English Reformers as 'Evaungelicalles', and in Continental Europe the term still widely functions as a synonym for 'Protestant'. Although it would later acquire an even more particular meaning in Britain and America, evangelical theology reflects signature *Reformation emphases on the plenary divine inspiration and supreme authority of *Scripture, and on interpreting it as naturally as possible, and on disseminating it in the vernacular. Likewise, it emphasizes a scriptural approach to worship and witness in which *preaching is central. Evangelical theology also draws from the Reformation its commitment to *justification by *grace through *faith, in which acceptance with God is received by trusting his loving self-disclosure and not by any human accomplishment. Against the same background it emphasizes that the *church is composed of all believers who have thus been incorporated by the Holy Spirit, and who have direct personal access to the Father.

The Reformation expressed itself in various institutional structures, and in these many of the diversities of evangelical theology arose. The Reformers and their successors differed on the *sacraments, *liturgy, *predestination, the *millennium, *church government, Christian assurance and the relation of church and *state. Hence evangelicals may be variously *Lutheran, Calvinist (see *Reformed theology), Zwinglian, *Anglican, *Anabaptist, *Baptist or *Arminian in their more detailed convictions, just as their preferred polity may be episcopal, presbyterian, congregational or connexional. Further variations on these diverse approaches were later developed in different forms of *Methodism, Brethrenism and *Pentecostalism. However, these specific ecclesiastical distinctions would be held by most evangelicals today as secondary to the shared convictions listed above. Indeed, the readiness of evangelicals to transcend such distinctions for the sake of common witness and service – to operate 'pan-evangelically' – is one of the defining characteristics of evangelical theology.

A definitive expression of this inter-confessional ethos came with the series of evangelical awakenings and revivals which began in the 1730s. Jonathan *Edwards, John and Charles *Wesley, George *Whitefield, Howell Harris, William McCulloch and others led these movements from a variety of denominational and doctrinal backgrounds, but all reaffirmed the theology of the great and received tradition while laying special emphasis on the theology of the *Christian life. The imperative of *conversion was continually to the fore, as was the consciousness of God's love and the *sanctification which accompanied it. No doubt there were differences on the instantaneousness of conversion and the possibility of perfection, but these were usually overridden by a shared impulse to renew the church, evangelize the world and improve social conditions. On these foundations were built the *mission societies of the following century, and the great movements of British evangelical social reform associated with William Wilberforce (anti-slavery), Lord Shaftesbury (factory acts), Hannah More (education) and William Booth and the *Salvation Army (evangelization and care of the poor). Between the 1780s and the 1820s a 'Second Great Awakening' in the United States spurred evangelicals there to a similarly deep concern not only for personal holiness but also for social and national well-being, as exemplified in the *revivalist theology and methods of Charles G. *Finney.

By the mid-nineteenth century evangelicalism was showing hopeful signs of marrying these practical preoccupations with *holiness, evangelism and civic service to serious scholarly endeavour. 1846 saw the formation of the World's Evangelical Alliance, an early expression of modern *ecumenism which attracted several leading academic theologians from Britain, Europe and the United States. From 1875 the Keswick Convention (see *Higher-life theology) coupled influential guidance on 'practical holiness' with teaching from prominent British and overseas expositors. However, evangelical theology was profoundly challenged in the later 1800s by the rise of theological *liberalism. In this climate, evangelicals tended either to seek accommodation with liberals (see *Liberal evangelicalism) or retrench into *pietistic or oppositional ghettos. Key legacies of this retrenchment were the decline in evangelical social concern characterized by David Moberg as the 'Great Reversal', and the development of *fundamentalism in the early twentieth century. Fundamentalism, in particular, tended to combine ecclesiological separatism with forms of *millenarian theology that mediated a typically pessimistic and *quietistic view of political and cultural engagement.

These trends meant that at the start of the twentieth century evangelical theology lacked both internal dynamism and external impact. However, a foretaste of more holistic approaches to come arose in the *Dutch neo-Calvinist school that developed around the scholar and statesman Abraham *Kuyper and the dogmatician Herman *Bavinck. This group affirmed the orthodox tradition while offering a rich theology of the Christian life in all its ramifications – one which engaged keenly with issues and worldviews arising in contemporary *society. Otherwise, much evangelical theological energy in the 1920s and 30s was expended either on intramural debates about the limits of evangelical soundness or on responding to the then-dominant liberal agenda. By the onset of the Second World War, sharper distinctions were being drawn between fundamentalists who advocated clear separation from the any liberal influence, and evangelicals who were prepared to remain within 'mixed' denominations and seminaries, or at least to interact ecumenically and theologically with non-evangelicals. In America many in this latter group came together to form the National Association of Evangelicals (1942), and the cooperative ethos of NAE was evident in the founding of the Evangelical Theological Society in 1949. ETS, in fact, both reflected and facilitated a significant revitalization of American evangelical theology in the post-war period. This revitalization was part of a wider 'neo-evangelical' movement that even more explicitly rejected fundamentalism while seeking to reposition its scholarship in the theological mainstream. As well as espousing a more open ecclesiology, neo-evangelicals characteristically endorsed theologies of *social responsibility which reclaimed the public vision of the previous century. A landmark in this process was Carl F. H. *Henry's book The Uneasy Conscience of Modern Fundamentalism (1947), which presented an avowedly biblical case for social involvement distinct from the liberal '*social gospel'. Later, more radical evangelical social theologies would follow from the Mennonites John Howard *Yoder and Ron Sider, while a new generation of Dutch neo-Calvinists, including Herman Dooyeweerd, Gerrit Berkouwer and Hans Rookmaaker, modelled a fresh engagement with contemporary thought and *culture – an engagement continued more recently still in the work of Stanley *Grenz, Kevin Vanhoozer, Nancy Murphy and others.

The 1940s also saw various key institutions founded on both sides of the Atlantic which would contribute significantly to the development of evangelical theology in the next few decades – most notably London Bible College (1943) (now London School of Theology), Tyndale House, Cambridge (1944) and Fuller Seminary in California (1947). Along with Henry, neo-evangelical theology found eloquent advocates in Bernard *Ramm and Donald *Bloesch. Like Ramm and Bloesch, several neo-evangelicals were influenced by Karl Barth, including the US-based British historical theologian Geoffrey Bromiley, who edited the English translation of Barth's Church Dogmatics along with the Edinburgh theologian, T. F. Torrance. However, another Briton teaching in North America, J. I. Packer, won support for a relatively more conservative line which was nonetheless distinguished from fundamentalism. Tensions between these two 'left' and 'right' wings of American evangelicalism have continued, not least with respect to the precise terms in which the authority of Scripture is understood. Nonetheless, most American evangelical theologians maintain a commitment to the inerrancy of Scripture (see Infallibility and inerrancy of the Bible), and this remains a requirement of ETS membership. In 2003 the distinguished ETS members Clark Pinnock and John Sanders faced censure for advocating a 'free will theism' (see Open theism) which questioned traditional attributes of God such as omniscience and impassibility, yet both were allowed to retain their membership. Building on the pioneering work of the English evangelical Sir Norman Anderson, Sanders has also been at the forefront of burgeoning evangelical theological reflection on other faiths. While divergence exists here, as in debates about justification in Paul, penal substitutionary atonement and the nature of hell, evangelical theology is arguably more fertile now than at any time in the past 150 years.

In Britain, fundamentalism and the discourse of inerrancy have always been less prominent than in the USA, and this may explain why the earliest shoots of post-war evangelical theological renewal in Britain were seen in the field of biblical studies, notably through the contributions of F. F. Bruce, Donald Guthrie and I. H. Marshall. Later, James Dunn, N. T. Wright and Richard Bauckham gained world-class reputations for their work on the historical background to the NT, while Anthony Thiselton and John Goldingay did much to introduce evangelicals to the principles and methods of hermeneutics. In other fields not directly related to biblical scholarship, evangelical theologians have nonetheless brought sophisticated biblical sensibilities to bear: e.g. Oliver O'Donovan in ethics, Robert Jenson in systematics and Alister McGrath in historical theology and apologetics.

Although considerable debate surrounds the extent to which Pentecostalism can be classed as an evangelical movement, in practice the majority of Pentecostal theologians are aligned with evangelical networks. While earlier expressions of Pentecostal faith often tended towards anti-intellectualism, increased links with historic denominations and mainline evangelical bodies, and ongoing relationships with the resultant charismatic movement, have spawned a vibrant community of Pentecostal scholars, journals and societies. From pioneers like Donald Gee and J. Rodman Williams to younger Pentecostal academics like Vinson Synon and Amos Yong, it is a community set to make an increasingly important contribution to theology in the twenty-first century. The charismatic movement itself, as it has shared the emphasis of Pentecostal theology on the Spirit, and particularly the gifts of the Spirit, has grown rapidly within the older denominations, and has influenced many evangelical theologians from those communities.

The rise of Pentecostalism and Pentecostal scholarship serve as a salutary reminder that evangelical theology can no longer be defined on Western terms alone. Indeed, the greatest church growth today is in non-white Majority World contexts, much of it Pentecostal and charismatic. Whereas resources for theological scholarship in these contexts were once scarce, macroeconomic shifts and increased funding from first-world Christian bodies have ensured that a new generation of theologians is emerging from beyond the traditional evangelical axis of Britain, Europe and North America. The pivotal Lausanne Congress (1974) consolidated neo-evangelical commitment to social action alongside evangelism, but through Sam Escobar, René Padilla and Vinay Samuel it also confirmed the rise of authentic 'global south' perspectives in evangelical theology. Latterly, evangelicals in non-Western contexts have been key shapers of indigenous theological approaches – e.g. the Dalit theology of Tamil Christians in India (see Indian Christian theology).

Finally, it should be emphasized that evangelical theology is a spiritual theology. The Bible is not only central to the theological enterprise, but it is meditated upon and prayed over in Christian community. Thus the goal of evangelical theological work is not so much to know theology as to know and to glorify God.

Bibliography

D. W. Bebbington, Evangelicalism in Modern Britain: A History from the 1730s to the 1980s

(Baker, 1992); A. Besançon Spencer and W. D. Spencer, The Global God: Multicultural Evangelical Views of God (Grand Rapids, 1998); D. G. Bloesch, The Future of Evangelical Christianity: A Call for Unity Amid Diversity (New York, 1983); G. A. Boyd and P. R. Eddy (eds.), Across the Spectrum: Understanding Issues in Evangelical Theology (Grand Rapids, 2002); D. W. Dayton and R. K. Johnson (eds.), The Variety of American Evangelicalism (Downers Grove, 1991); S. J. Grenz, Renewing the Center: Evangelical Theology in a Post-Theological Era (Grand Rapids, 2000); C. F. H. Henry (ed.), The Uneasy Conscience of Modern Fundamentalism (Grand Rapids, 1947); idem, Christian Faith and Modern Theology (New York, 1964); T. Greggs, New Perspectives for Evangelical Theology: Engaging with God, Scripture and the World (Abingdon and New York, 2009); T. Larsen and D. J. Treier (eds.), The Cambridge Companion to Evangelical Theology (Cambridge, 2007); G. M. Marsden, Understanding Fundamentalism and Evangelicalism (Grand Rapids, 1980); G. McDermott (ed.), The Oxford Handbook of Evangelical Theology (Oxford, 2010); J. I. Packer, God Has Spoken: Revelation and the Bible (London, 1979); B. L. Ramm, The Evangelical Heritage: A Study in Historical Theology (Waco, 1973); J. R. W. Stott, Evangelical Truth: A Plea for Unity (Leicester, 1999); C. Trueman, T. J. Gray and C. L. Blomberg (eds.), Solid Ground: 25 Years of Evangelical Theology (Leicester, 2000); N. T. Wright, Scripture and the Authority of God (London, 2005); A. Yong, The Spirit Poured out on All Flesh: Pentecostalism and the Possibility of Global Theology (Grand Rapids, 2005).

D. H. K. HILBORN

EVANGELICALISM, POSTCONSERVATIVE

'Postconservative' was first used as a term by Clark H. *Pinnock (1990) and more recently by Kevin J. Vanhoozer (2005) to denote *evangelicals who critically and constructively engage with *postmodern thought and culture, thereby distinguishing themselves from evangelical theologians more at home in *modernity. Gary Dorrien (1998) used the term to describe a diverse collection of evangelicals who see the demise of modernity as theologically advantageous; Roger E. Olson subsequently defined postconservatism more precisely and popularized its usage in a number of books and articles. Not everyone so labelled is happy with the term – Nancey C. Murphy, for example, prefers 'postmodern evangelical'. But 'postconservative' has become the most common term among both adherents and critics.

A harbinger of constructive engagement with postmodern thought and culture was Dave Tomlinson's The Post-Evangelical (1995), which sought 'to take as given many of the assumptions of evangelical faith, while at the same time moving beyond its perceived limitations' (p. 7). Tomlinson criticized the dogmatic certainty, rationalism and individualism of the evangelicalism with which he was familiar, and called for a less systematic and more communal form, with a critical *realist *epistemology, an understanding of Scripture as mediating the word of God, and a *spirituality that welcomes imagination, doubt and growth. The book sparked a major debate in Britain, but even many critics believed Tomlinson had identified crucial issues for the future of evangelicalism.

Postconservative evangelical theologians address similar concerns, but do so with greater theological precision and faithfulness to historic *orthodoxy. Central to their theology is their rejection of the *Enlightenment claim that the truth of knowledge requires it to be rationally established on the foundation of facts or experience that cannot in themselves be doubted. There is, they believe, no universal, neutral knowledge. Instead, they embrace a form of postfoundationalism which holds that all knowledge is necessarily perspectival, shaped by narratives within a community and tradition. While engaging a wide range of postmodern thinkers, postconservatives do not accept the relativism of neopragmatists and *deconstructionists. Most are attracted to those postmodern philosophers and linguists for whom it is not truth itself that is relative but our knowledge of it, such as Alasdair McIntyre, Michael *Polanyi, W. V. O. Quine, J. L. Austin and the later Ludwig *Wittgenstein.

As a result, postconservatives reject the scriptural propositionalism and rational *apologetics that dominated evangelical theology in the twentieth century. For them Scripture is not essentially a book whose truth is to be rationally demonstrated and propositions theologically systematized, but the central means to encounter Jesus Christ, and be personally, communally and missionally shaped by that encounter.

*Revelation is thus more transformational in purpose than informational.

The truth of Scripture is conveyed in the form of narratives and imagery such as metaphors that are used by the Holy Spirit to shape faithful imagination and transform hearts and lives. Through indwelling the biblical narrative, persons are enabled both to know and live the truth. Indeed, for N. T. *Wright and especially Vanhoozer, Scripture is essentially dramatic and used by the Holy Spirit to enable the church to participate in the drama of the gospel.

Thus, like *postliberals such as George *Lindbeck, postconservatives are concerned with the ecclesial embodiment of biblical narrative. But unlike postliberals, they locate *truth not only in the intertextual coherence and faithful embodiment of Scripture, but in its fundamental historicity and divine inspiration. Scripture shapes communities truthfully because it corresponds to divine revelation in history.

Because God is known in and through *history, there is no ahistorical *revelation. While the *gospel is *contextualized within every culture, it also exerts transformative influence on culture. As the gospel is lived out over time in a multiplicity of *cultures, the church as a whole grows in its understanding of the fullness of the gospel and its meaning for life.

Postconservatives emphasize relationality and community over the autonomous individualism characteristic of modernity. This relationality is central to their understanding of church, salvation and humanity, and most especially the triune God. While their doctrines of God vary, all critique the classical *theist preoccupation with divine attributes and instead seek to emphasize the personal and relational nature of God, and especially the love of God as revealed in *Jesus Christ.

Theologians often classed as ‘postconservative’ include Clark H. Pinnock, Stanley J. *Grenz and Kevin J. Vanhoozer. Others include Nancey C. Murphy, Roger E. Olson, John R. Franke, Henry H. Knight III, John Sanders, F. LeRon Shults, Rodney Clapp, N. T. Wright and Lesslie *Newbigin.

Bibliography

Post-evangelicalism: G. Cray, et al., The Post-Evangelical Debate (London, 1997); D. Tomlinson, The Post-Evangelical (London, 1995).

Postconservative evangelicalism: G. Dorrien, The Remaking of Evangelical Theology (Louisville, 1998); M. J. Erickson, The Evangelical Left: Encountering Postconservative Evangelical Theology (Grand Rapids, 1997); idem (ed.), Reclaiming the Center: Confronting Evangelical Accommodation in Postmodern Times (Wheaton, 2004); J. R. Franke, The Character of Theology: A Postconservative Evangelical Approach (Grand Rapids, 2005); S. J. Grenz and J. R. Franke, Beyond Foundationalism: Shaping Theology in a Postmodern Context (Louisville, 2001); S. J. Grenz, Revising Evangelical Theology (Downers Grove, 1993); idem, Renewing the Center (Grand Rapids, 2006); H. H. Knight III, A Future for Truth: Evangelical Theology in a Postmodern World (Nashville, 1997); R. Middleton and B. J. Walsh, Truth Is Stranger Than It Used to Be (Downers Grove, 1995); N. C. Murphy, Beyond Liberalism & Fundamentalism: How Modern and Postmodern Philosophy Set the Theological Agenda (Valley Forge, 1996); Lesslie Newbigin, The Gospel in a Pluralist Society (Geneva and Grand Rapids, 1989); R. E. Olson, Reformed and Always Reforming: The Postconservative Approach to Evangelical Theology (Grand Rapids, 2007); C. H. Pinnock, Tracking the Maze (San Francisco and London, 1990); K. J. Vanhoozer, First Theology: God, Scripture and Hermeneutics (Downers Grove, 2002); idem, The Drama of Doctrine: A Canonical Linguistic Approach to Christian Theology (Louisville, 2007); N. T. Wright, Scripture and the Authority of God (London and San Francisco, 2013).

H. H. KNIGHT III

EVANGELISM, THEOLOGY OF

Evangelism takes its shape and form from the evangel, the good news, or *gospel. In the NT, the gospel is variously described as the ‘good news of Jesus’ (Mark 1:1; Acts 8:35; 10:36; 11:20) or ‘the good news of the kingdom’ (Matt. 4:23; 9:35; 24:14; Luke 4:43; 8:1; 16:16; Acts 8:12). There is therefore a crucial link at the heart of evangelism between the person, work and identity of Christ and the announcement and in-breaking of the *kingdom of God. Kingdom language of course picks up a rich vein of OT history and imagery, running through the Israelite monarchy to God’s rule over the creation itself. The OT can be read as the story of God's search for someone to whom he can entrust rule over his *creation. This is the primary calling of humanity – to rule over creation in God's name (Gen. 1:28), yet the subsequent entry of sin and evil into the world through human disobedience (see *Fall) renders that prospect fraught with danger. The monarchy, reaching its high point in King David, a 'man after God's own heart' (1 Sam. 13:14) can be seen in the same light. Even David flatters to deceive and yet is promised a king from his offspring (2 Sam. 7) to rule forever. The coming of Jesus, the Son of David (Matt. 1:1; 20:30; 21:9, etc.), proclaiming and demonstrating the kingdom of God, is the culmination of this theme, with the rest of the NT indicating the start of the time when the kingdom is to be preached and lived in the present age, in anticipation of the *eschatological fullness of the reign of God in due time (Acts 1:6–8).

The content of the evangel can therefore be identified as the gospel of the kingdom, which is at the same time the gospel of *Jesus Christ. It is the announcement that *God has again set up his kingdom in the world, that he is its rightful ruler; that God's reign is the ultimate reality towards which all history tends; and that this reign has now broken into human history in a new way in the person of Jesus. To put it another way, as the early Christians would say, 'Jesus is Lord' (Rom. 10:9; 1 Cor. 12:3). Evangelism therefore has a clear Christological focus – it takes its reference from the nature of Christ as God's Son, the second *Adam, who is now seen as Lord of all through the *resurrection (Rom. 1:4) and who could truly be entrusted with power over creation. A high and robust *Christology will lead to confident evangelism; a tentative and diffident Christology will lead away from it. The message of the kingdom of God come in Jesus is gospel because if Jesus is Lord, then he has the final say over human destiny and the whole created order. The future of creation is not in the hands of blind chance or faceless biological processes, but in the trustworthy hands of God's King, the 'friend of sinners'.

This message is also controversial. If Jesus is Lord, then no political despot or system has the last word – neither do disease, hunger or *poverty. The proclamation of the kingdom of God and the lordship of Christ is a direct challenge to *idolatry of various kinds. It has a clearly political edge to it, as the claim of Christ to be Lord means a challenge to ways of human relating that devalue 'those for whom Christ died' (Rom. 14:15; 1 Cor. 8:11), or destroy the creation itself.

In the light of this discussion, evangelism can be described as the proclamation of the rightful and gentle rule of Jesus Christ, and the gracious invitation to bring a person or community's life under that rule, to learn its disciplines, its privileges and culture. It involves the announcement of God's willingness to overlook *sin through the sacrifice of Christ, and to send the *Spirit to indwell and fill the one who believes in Christ and who seeks to live his or her life under God's rule. It also establishes an inextricable link between the proclamation of the gospel of the rule of God in Christ and its demonstration. Jesus' words of invitation pointed out the significance of what was happening in his works of healing, the overcoming of evil and his mastery over creation (Matt. 12:28; Luke 11:20). In these works it was possible to see the reality of the kingdom, not in all its fullness (not everyone in Palestine was healed or raised from the dead), but in part. In the same way, the verbal proclamation of the reign of God today needs to be able to point to evidence of its reality in the present, in lives turned around, bodies and communities healed, creation transformed.

This leads to the central place of the *church in a theology of evangelism. The church is the community called out of the world to live out and proclaim the lordship of Christ over creation. Therefore the church is shaped by its evangelistic task. Rather than beginning with the church as a fixed institution that has a number of roles in the world, one of which happens to be evangelism, the church is to be ordered around its central identity and task: to embody and proclaim the rule of God. This gives a criterion for the order of the church. Whatever aids or contributes to this is to be embraced. Whatever deflects from it is to be questioned. It also helps to relate the ministry of evangelism to other ministries in the church. The role of theology is to test and protect the message: to 'make sure that what gets transmitted by the church's words and deeds is the Good News of what God has done in Christ, rather than some other message' (K. Vanhoozer, p. 73). *Worship, pastoral care and community action are not in competition with evangelism, but in harmony with it, as these are the ways in which the church lives out and demonstrates God's loving rule over and care for the creation in which the church is placed.

Bibliography

W. J. Abraham, The Logic of Evangelism (London, 1989); D. J. Bosch, Transforming Mission: Paradigm Shifts in Theology of Mission (Maryknoll, 1991); W. Brueggemann, Biblical Perspectives on Evangelism: Living in a Three-Storied Universe (Nashville, 1993); M. Green, Evangelism in the Early Church (Crowborough, 1984); L. Newbigin, The Open Secret: An Introduction to the Theology of Mission (London, 1995); G. Tomlin, The Provocative Church (London, 2002); R. E. Webber, Ancient-Future Evangelism: Making Your Church a Faith-Forming Community (Grand Rapids, 2003); K. J. Vanhoozer, The Drama of Doctrine (Louisville, 2005).

G. TOMLIN

EVIDENTIALISM

Evidentialism is a theory about epistemic justification, or whether believing a given proposition (or set of propositions) is justified. While every proposition is either true or false, there are three different attitudes one could take regarding the truth of that proposition. One may believe the proposition, or deny the proposition. To believe a proposition is to hold that the proposition is true; to deny a proposition is to hold that it is false. But there is a third possibility, and that is to withhold judgment, and neither believe nor deny the proposition. It will be convenient to think of these three different attitudes as 'belief policies'. Epistemic justification is concerned with the degree to which any of these three belief policies is reasonable from the epistemic point of view.

'The epistemic point of view' is language used by epistemologists to refer to the natural human interest in acquiring true belief in a responsible way. Epistemic justification, then, is *truth-oriented. The epistemic justification of a person's belief policy depends on the degree to which the basis for that policy makes it likely that the proposition is true. In other words, justification is 'truth-conducive' or 'truth-indicative', though it need not be a guarantee of truth.

As one of many theories of epistemic justification, evidentialism stresses the importance of evidence in determining the degree to which a particular belief policy is justified. Epistemic justification, according to this view, depends entirely on the character of a person's evidence. This account excludes the relevance of such factors as: how the belief happens to be caused, whether there are non-evidential motives a person may have for believing a proposition, and whether a person's belief-forming mechanisms happen to be functioning normally or properly.

There are varieties of evidentialism. They are best distinguished in terms of how each variety answers three central questions. First, what counts as evidence? Second, what is meant by 'a person's evidence'? (Presumably, it means 'evidence possessed by a person'. So the question becomes: What is it for a person to 'have evidence'?) Third, what is it about the evidence that justifies a person's belief policy regarding a particular proposition? This is a question about the relation between evidence and the likelihood that a proposition is true.

Some evidentialists deny that intellectual duties and cognitive virtues have a bearing on the justification of a person's belief policy. But if a theory can be developed showing how the possession of evidence is tied to the fulfilment of intellectual duties or having cognitive virtues, then there is the possibility that an evidentialist account can include these factors.

Critics of evidentialism often complain that evidence cannot be required for epistemic justification, since many beliefs are justified without argument or explicit reasons. But this is mistaken. Evidence should not be confused with argument, and some versions of evidentialism allow that a person may possess evidence in support of his or her belief, without consciously regarding it as evidence per se. Many evidentialists are *foundationalists, who hold that there are justified beliefs whose justification depends on direct acquaintance with evidence, rather than on the basis of an inference from other beliefs. This kind of evidence is made available through direct experiential acquaintance a person has with the object his or her belief is about. In an act of perception, for example, one has 'the evidence of one's senses'. But the evidentialist holds that for something to count as evidence in support of a person's belief, it must be epistemically apt – making it likely, from the person's point of view, that his or her belief is intellectually responsible.

In Christian *apologetics (see P. Hicks, 'Evidentialism', in New Dictionary of Christian Apologetics, IVP, 2006), strong or 'classical' evidentialism has been widely rejected by *Reformed epistemologists. While good evidence may be adduced for Christian beliefs, in the end only the work of the Holy Spirit can bring fallen minds to faith.

See also: EPISTEMOLOGY.

Bibliography

J. E. Adler, Belief's Own Ethics (Cambridge, MA, 2002); L. BonJour, The Structure of Empirical Knowledge (Cambridge, MA, 1985); R. Chisholm, The Foundations of Knowing (Minneapolis, 1982); idem, Theory of Knowledge (Englewood Cliffs, ²1977, ³1989, 2nd edn is best); idem, 'Firth and the Ethics of Belief', Philosophy and Phenomenological Research 50, 1991, pp. 119–128; R. Feldman, Epistemology (Upper Saddle River, 2003); R. Feldman and E. Conee, Evidentialism (Oxford and New York, 2004); S. Haack, Evidence and Inquiry (Oxford, 1993); P. Moser, Knowledge and Evidence (Cambridge, 1989).

R. D. GEIVETT

EVIL

'Evil' refers primarily to our intentional actions that cause undeserved harm or suffering serious enough to be addressed. Although generally we use 'evil' in contrast with 'good', 'evil' particularly can connote the horrendous or unthinkable – the demonic. Thus, for example, although we term murder evil, we use 'evil' emphatically when speaking about especially brutal murders, the systematic rape of women in war, or genocides. Traditionally, evils performed by humans are referred to as moral evils: evils for which human agents can be held morally accountable. In a theological context, moral evils, while committed against our neighbour, are also sins against God.

Evil refers not only to human actions but also to human dispositions to act in ways that cause harm or fail to meet certain standards. Thus, dispositions to lie, cheat, steal or covet are evils (vices) that may indicate a person's character. Classical ethics was more concerned with these dispositions than the actions themselves, since our actions flow from our character.

'Evil' can also refer to pain, suffering and dysfunction, and derivatively to things like diseases and natural disasters that cause these. This kind of evil, for which humans are not morally responsible, is termed natural or physical evil. However, not all (e.g. Barth) see the shadowsides of creation – pain, suffering, dysfunction, death – as evil, since as part of creation they participate in creation's goodness.

Origin and nature of evil

If *God is the ultimate source of everything, does evil come from God? Some, such as *Gnostics and Manichees (see *Dualism), viewed good and evil dualistically as independent powers eternally in combat. However, the Christian theological tradition is more greatly influenced by Plotinus and Neo-*Platonism. Just as matter is what remains when the emanation of the One ends, so evil is what remains when the Good runs out. Evil, having no independent existence, is a privation, yet none the less real for that. Like matter, evil is qualityless, mere potency; yet in having a nature it exists outside of and other than Being. Although evil cannot produce because production is good, it has effects. Evil as turning from the Good characterizes the individual soul whose descent into matter weakens it for subsequent enslavement, which is sin.

This view influenced *Augustine, for whom evil has its origin neither in God (for all God makes is good; Confessions, VII, 5, 12) nor in randomness, but is caused wilfully by created beings. Consonant with Neo-Platonism, evil is not a substance but a privation of the good, a deficiency or imperfection in the will, originating in the mind, that occurs when we intentionally turn from the Good. Though a privation, evil is real; darkness is the privation of light but nonetheless is real. Evil is found not primarily in the act itself, but in the intention. In his later works, Augustine insists that evil persists in us, making it impossible for sinners to comprehend divine truths. God's grace given in illumination of the mind is necessary to assist the sin-damaged will. Seven centuries later *Abelard echoes Augustine when he writes that sin, defined negatively, is non-being; it rests not in the act, but in consenting to not do what we truly believe God desires that we ought to do (Ethics III).

The view of evil as privation is more fully developed in the theology of *Barth, who identifies evil with nothingness (das Nichtige). Influenced by *Heidegger and Sartre, Barth sees nothingness as an alien power, a real enemy, that has its existence in the 'No' or rejection of God. For Barth nothingness has its own being in being not-willed by God. Das Nichtige is uncreated, but arises when God separates his creation from chaos. A menacing power, das Nichtige is a continuing threat that, apart from God's sustaining providence, would pull creation into non-being. Das Nichtige reveals itself as evil, not merely by posing the threat of non-being, but in opposing and resisting God and his grace. Sin occurs when the created gives itself up to that which opposes God.

Many (e.g. Boyd) attribute the source of evil to a being (Satan) who, as an external, aggressive, powerful adversary of God, seeks to pervert those who would do good, and to destroy the good that is done. Though as created by God Satan is good, God's gift of freedom allowed Satan to depart from the good of divine obedience and become an instigator of evil. Along with the demons over which he rules, Satan, the 'prince' (archon) of this age, has seized creation and with his demonic powers wars with God to maintain his authority. Natural evils, including sickness and suffering, can be caused by the demonic and are contrary to God's design. Although on the *cross Christ defeated the satanic forces, Satan remains, if not in control of the earth, powerfully active for evil until his promised final defeat.

Evil and the human predicament

The world religions affirm that a world with evil contravenes the ideal state. Buddhists view life as being evil (dukha: unsatisfactory, characterized by suffering found in birth, old age, sickness and death), rooted in ignorance, cravings and hatreds. Evils arise in dependent origination from prior conditions, as we cling to the permanence of things and of self when in reality nothing is permanent. The goal of life is to eliminate suffering by identifying its causes in us and by taking appropriate action to eliminate them in accord with the Eight-Fold Path of moral action and right meditation.

For Christians, evil was not part of the original state, but entered through wilful disobedience of God's commands. Christians understand evil not so much as suffering but as *sin (though sin results in suffering). Its origin lies not in creation, which the Creator viewed as good, but in the wills of conscious agents who, in morally culpable ways, did and continue both to do wrong and to develop non-virtuous dispositions. Paul interprets the sin of the first human as creating a predisposition in his descendants to do evil (original sin), a predisposition that weakens our ability to resist sinning. As a result of our sin, evil also affects the institutions that were intended for good: sexuality and child-bearing, work and agriculture, and family relationships. Thus, Christianity responds to the question, why we do evil by affirming that, contrary to a common view of humans, we have a disposition to do evil (classically, we have a sinful nature) and need divine *grace not to sin.

Why do humans do horrendous evils?

Burned into the twenty-first-century conscience is the question of how humans can be the intentional and responsible source of so much cruelty to other persons or to creation. The genocides of the twentieth century (see *Holocaust), continuing into this century, make vivid human diabolicalness. While some argue that horrendous evils require a group mentality or a pathological disposition, others suggest it can arise from ordinary people. The psychologist Waller suggests a model that invokes diverse factors such as an ancestral shadow, cultural belief systems and moral disengagement from the victims, a culture of cruelty, and an attitude of dehumanization toward or blaming the victim, to explain (not justify) how ordinary people can do extraordinary evil.

Addressing evil

All religions affirm that evil can be overcome. The paths to overcoming evil differ among the various religions. Whereas South Asian religions emphasize liberation from the evil of the human predicament by ethical action and meditation, for Christians Christ's *atonement addresses evil in humans and in the world. Different theories of atonement invoke diverse metaphors or paradigms – ransom, conquest, penal substitution, satisfaction, healing – that indicate the power of God to resolve the human sinful condition. Salvation requires a recognition of and repentance of our own evils and an acceptance of the incarnational suffering of Christ on our behalf.

Evil and the existence of God

The theodistic tradition

One major issue facing Christian theism concerns how evil can be compatible with the existence and nature of God. The critical philosophical/theological challenge comes in two forms, deductive and inductive. The deductive argument from evil or suffering claims incompatibility among the following propositions: God exists; God has the properties of omnipotence (God can do that which is logically self-consistent), omniscience (God knows anything that can be known, including the future) and omnibenevolence (God is virtuous and only does good actions); evil exists, and a good being eliminates evil as far as it can. The critic contends that these propositions entail that God would eliminate all pain and suffering in the world, which contradicts the contention that evil or suffering exists. Although some have sought to defuse the problem by qualifying God's properties (e.g. God is limited in power, knowledge or goodness), such solutions suffice only if the limitations were so significant that they would in turn jeopardize any significant conception of God. Others have constructed a (free will) defence to show that the atheologian cannot generate such a contradiction.

According to the inductive argument from evil, it is improbable that God exists, given the quantity and quality of evil and suffering in the world. The presence of seemingly divinely preventable, horrendous evils, such as the Asian tsunami or the Jewish, Cambodian or Rwandan genocides, renders God's existence unlikely.

Attempts to provide morally sufficient reasons for the existence of evil are termed theodicies (defences of God's justice). Theodicies for moral evils generally invoke the greater good of human freedom. God bestows on agents the freedom necessary for agents to be able to do good acts or be virtuous at all. Given the freedom to choose between good and evil, humans are morally responsible for moral evils. God permits our doing evil, but does not contribute to or desire the evil actions we perform.

Theodicies for the natural evils are more diverse. Both the OT and NT suggest that some (though not all) pain and suffering result from punishment for sin. Those in the so-called *Irenaean tradition suggest that God permits pain and suffering to build our characters: much as resistance builds muscles, evil is soul-building. The fact that death can occur without opportunity for life-changes or that the suffering proves to be too much for the person suggests that this explanation is at best partial. A third suggestion is that natural evils result from natural laws affecting psychophysical beings. Though God at times intervenes in nature, constant divine intervention in nature to prevent all evils would conflict with the human freedom needed for rational decision-making and moral action. God is the Creator of our creaturely nature and therefore of our finitude (our subjection to natural laws). Since laws are a necessary feature of any creation, and since the creation results in good, God is justified in creating finite beings subject to the vicissitudes of nature. The worry with this theodicy is that it tends toward *deism in limiting God's significant action in nature. Although each theodicy may provide a partial sufficient reason for evil, none is totally sufficient by itself.

Some Christians argue that since every event serves a divine purpose, evil events likewise serve a divine purpose. Such a strong view of divine *providence (often termed meticulous providence) reintroduces the problem of evil, for one would have to assert that God intends the evil we suffer in some way or other. It is more likely that many evils are the gratuitous by-products of freely chosen actions or natural laws, permitted by God in line with the above theodicies but not willed or intended by God. The traditional ethical principle of double effect (i.e. evil by-products are justified when they satisfy the following criteria: the act must be good or morally neutral, the overall outcome must be good, the intention must be good and the evil effect must not be a means to the good end) might be invoked to justify God's allowance of evil in such cases.

The anti-Theodacist tradition

Following the lead of *Kant, who contended that theodicies are impossible because, given the disparity between God and the world, we cannot know how God causally relates to the world or how the world connects to God's moral wisdom, some contemporary theologians reject the attempt to construct theodicies or defences. Theodicies reflect the *Enlightenment project, stemming from its rationalist presuppositions, of providing evidence for or justifying one's beliefs about God. They treat God as an object about which our human language and grammar can speak, while they treat evil in abstraction, apart from the historical and social horrors and personal tragic suffering.

To the contrary, since no 'order' or 'ratio' exists between the infinite God and the finitude of ourselves and our language, we cannot know the mystery that is God, let alone treat him as theodacists do merely as a possessor of divine perfections, apart from fullness of the Christian doctrines such as the Trinity, incarnation, redemption and life after death. The problem of evil is not a rational issue of how to justify God's existence to the unbeliever, but a historical issue addressing how God in Christ responds to human sin and suffering, and how through conversion and holiness we respond to evil. Evil engenders epistemological crises between the personal narratives of victims and their suffering and the narratives of the Christian community, forcing us to evaluate our historical and cultural position to enable us to respond to those suffering.

Ultimately, the existential or practical questions we must face concern our apathy toward evils and how we respond to our own and others' evils and the resultant suffering. Jesus' model was to condemn demonic evil in no uncertain terms and to extend compassion and assistance to those who suffered evil. The theology of the cross, of a saving God who as incarnate shares in suffering and in the atonement addresses human sin, becomes central to addressing evil. We cannot resolve evil, sin and suffering by ourselves through merely identifying with the victims; divine grace, as Augustine saw, remains necessary to transform us.

See also: DEVIL AND DEMONS; FALL; SUFFERING.

Bibliography

M. M. Adams, Horrendous Evils and the Goodness of God (Ithaca, 1999); idem, 'Theological Contributions to Theodicy', Faith and Philosophy 13, 1996, pp. 469–608; H. Arendt, Eichmann in Jerusalem: A Report on the Banality of Evil (New York, 1965); G. Boyd, Satan and the Problem of Evil (Downers Grove, 2001); G. R. Evans, Augustine on Evil (Cambridge, 1982); G. Graham, Evil and Christian Ethics (Cambridge, 2001); M. Peterson, God and Evil (Westview, 1998); A. Plantinga, God, Freedom, and Evil (Grand Rapids, 1974); K. Surin, Theology and the Problem of Evil (Blackwell, 1986); J. Waller, Becoming Evil (New York, 2002).

B. R. REICHENBACH

EXCOMMUNICATION, see CHURCH DISCIPLINE

EXISTENTIALISM

Existentialism is a reaction against *romanticism and *rationalism. It concentrates on human existence and the human situation. Existentialists range from theists like *Kierkegaard and *Dostoevsky to atheists like Sartre, Camus, *Heidegger and *Nietzsche. In literature, drama and poetry, the themes of anxiety (angst), dread and death, absurdity and meaninglessness and the individual and choice are presented, often obliquely. Particularly through Heidegger, existential theology has emphasized the existential moment in *hermeneutics and preaching in which each of us is challenged to respond to the direct call of God to live authentically. *Tillich stresses that God is not so much a being but the 'ground of being', and Weil and *Marcel have adopted a more participative and incarnational approach grounded in human experience. *Buber argues for dialogue and communication with the individual 'I' relating to the eternal 'Thou'. In recent philosophical work, there has been a shift towards *phenomenology, *postmodernism and *deconstructionism, often taking existential themes, approaches and interpretations to their logical extremes.

Theological engagement

Much of modern theology, particularly in the early twentieth century, shaped the theological writings both positively and negatively, focusing on the themes of subjectivity, authenticity, truth, faith and ultimately even the '*death of God'. Barth, Brunner and Bultmann all stressed the need for faith to be a personal, inner reality. Following Kierkegaard's notion of a 'leap of faith', the stress was on making truth one's own and the importance of the individual in terms of belief and action and biblical interpretation. Faith was to be abstract and remote but seen by works and ways of living. Authentic faith was a continual choosing to live with the whole of one's being. Sin and inauthenticity were part of the human failure to be what we were created to be.

Existentialism offers a frightening account of fear, suffering, separation and death in human existence. It can see life and the world as having no meaning, humanity as devoid of purpose, and no meaning in any one thing or in everything together. Life is absurd. For the theist this emphasized the need for a step of faith and the centrality not just of personal relationships, but of an 'I-Thou' relationship with God. For the atheist, humanity was alone and that meant not only was there no God, but we had to create our own meaning, reality and morality. The individual alone and isolated must take responsibility for that creation. Life is eternally making choices to live authentically, even if 'Hell is other people' (J. P. Sartre) and there is no comfort or help from outside humanity. There is no God to relieve our predicament.

Existentialism recognizes the danger of trying to escape from the reality of the here and now by retreating into the past, the present or the future, rather than living each moment in light of the past and open to the future. Jesus is often depicted as the genuine authentic human being – the man for others – but there can be little or no sense of his divinity and salvation through his death and sacrifice.

This life is usually the extent and limit of human existence, and our choices are significant because they affect every aspect of how we live and impact the world and others. Confronted by the absurdity and meaninglessness of everything, we can only seek to create our own sense and meaning through our choices.

Theological critique

Most existentialists allow no room for the Creator and Sustainer *God. They do not see the world, human existence or history as having purpose or meaning. Existentialism is reductionistic and focuses narrowly on the negative aspects of human existence without the Christian notions of hope and salvation. *Barth reacted against this kind of subjectivity by emphasizing the sheer objectivity of God in Christ and the importance not only of his revelation but also of the very capacity to receive that revelation. Grace not only gives human beings genuine choices, but also the capacity to choose well and in line with God's revealed will. Humanity is created by God to live in community. It was not good for man to be alone (Gen. 2:18). In creation and final redemption, humanity is social. The role of society, culture and family are crucial in gaining a sense of identity, and this communal aspect is mirrored and developed in the church.

The *gospel directly challenges the hopelessness of humanity. The *grace of Christ in the incarnation, cross and resurrection and the gift of the Holy Spirit make it possible for human beings to be transformed and to live authentically in the church.

Existentialists use exceptional examples to make their case, but life is regular and patterned by God's good providence. The human sciences are possible only because of such regularity.

The very statement of existentialism needs to be challenged. It is self-contradictory to state that 'everything is meaningless' and claim that statement is actually meaningful. We have been given the ability to make sense of a world which makes sense because of the Creator. There also needs to be a proper balance between the subjective process of making our own what we learn from the objective realities of God, the world and other people. Likewise, human will cannot be separated from the whole of what it means to be human, made in the image of God with physical, psychological, volitional and spiritual natures.

Morality is not simply a human construct, but stems from the revealed will of God in the nature of the world and humanity, in the various covenants which express the law and will of God, and most of all in the person, teaching and work of Jesus, who embodies the divine will and the perfect human response and obedience to that will. Morality is not only about the will, which Paul shows can fail (Rom. 7:15–20), but about the whole person in relationship to God in Christ by the grace and power of the Holy Spirit.

While Kierkegaard, Dostoevsky and Buber stress genuine faith in God, many question whether the strong subjective stress of a 'leap of faith' needs to be balanced by a clearer understanding of the objectivity of the triune God and of the good reasons to embrace and exercise *faith. God is neither dead nor absent. He reveals himself and his will in Christ, who not only restores and reconciles us with God, but shows that it is possible for a human being to live out and up to God's moral standards.

Philosophically and theologically, Christians will recognize that modern theology has many roots in and connections with existentialism. The account of human existence gives a dramatic picture of life apart from God and the awful predicament of isolation and separation from God. But Christians will want to question and debate the nature of the meaning, purpose and content of human being and beings, truth, meaning, faith, subjectivity and choice. There are competing views of human nature and the complexity of each holistic individual in the context of and in relationship with the human community and the world itself. What is at issue is the reality of God and his work in creating and sustaining the world, providence, revealing his law, his prophetic word and his moral standards, linked to a full account of the divine-human nature of Christ expressed through his incarnation, crucifixion, resurrection and return in glory. All of this is only known and responded to in faith and living obedience through the power and influence of the Holy Spirit.

Bibliography

J. Macquarrie, An Existentialist Theology (London, 1955); idem, Existentialism (London, 1972); D. E. Roberts, Existentialism and Religious Belief (New York, 1957).

E. D. COOK

EX OPERE OPERATO, see SACRAMENT

EXORCISM

Exorcism, often also known as 'deliverance', has long been a ministry exercised by the church. Its roots are in the gospel traditions about Jesus, who is portrayed as particularly successful in expelling demons from people (Mark 1:23–26). Exorcism in the name of Jesus continued into the apostolic missions recorded in Acts (16:18; 19:11–15) and was common in the post-apostolic church, becoming formalized in catechetical rituals as converts passed from paganism into Christian faith. Exorcism was seen as the driving out of demonic activity from the fallen creation in the name of Christ. Anointing came to symbolize both purgation from *evil in preparation for baptism in water and the bestowal of the Spirit. Since the third century exorcism has been practised as part of *baptism; in the East this is of a threefold nature. In time it was accompanied with the laying on of hands and the sign of the cross, as well as Bible readings, prayers, adjurations and execrations. By 252 in the West, exorcists formed one of the four minor orders of clergy. A rite of pre-baptismal exorcism was contained in the Anglican first Book of Common Prayer, but was dropped in 1552. Until 1969 exorcism was part of the rite of infant baptism in the Roman Catholic Church and is still retained in adult baptism. The various strands of the church possess therefore a considerable body of literature, well-winnowed by tradition and experience, which touches upon ministries of deliverance. Found here is the distinction between minor and major exorcisms. The former is performed by calling down blessing upon the afflicted, and the latter by the intentional expulsion of an unwanted spirit deemed to be in possession of an individual. In some traditions major exorcisms are only permitted after episcopal approval.

Since the study of human pathologies has hugely increased, questions inevitably arise about how exorcism is to be understood today. In pastoral contexts there are still those who present symptoms remarkably similar to those recorded in the Gospels; but are these to be interpreted psychiatrically? Are they, following traditional interpretations, attributable to fallen spirits? Might they even be the spirits of the dead or, more complexly, 'hypostases of nothingness' (Karl Barth)? Even if some biblical depictions of 'evil spirits' might now be identified as psychiatric disorders, notably Saul's 'evil spirit from God' (1 Sam. 18:10), the same conclusion is not so easily drawn about the Gospel accounts. Given the complexity of human nature, the various ways of interpreting the human condition available to us need not exclude the need for deliverance ministry. Martin Israel's language of 'removing evil influences' appears helpful at this point in naming the presence of powers that go beyond reductionist explanations, while at the same time maintaining a proper agnosticism concerning the precise nature of those disturbing and destructive entities which apparently have power to afflict people and places. Whatever is not understood about the form taken by evil powers, Christians can certainly know that 'Jesus is Victor!'. In Christ's name there is authority to deliver.

Guidelines drawn up by the House of Bishops for the Church of England in 1975 insisted that the ministry of exorcism must be (1) in collaboration with the resources of medicine, (2) in the context of prayer and sacrament, (3) with the minimum of publicity, (4) by experienced persons authorized by the diocesan bishop and (5) followed up by continuing pastoral care. All who are called to this ministry, wherever they are located in the church, should work with responsible practice of this kind.

See also: DEVIL AND DEMONS.

Bibliography

K. Barth, CD III, 3, §51,3 (Edinburgh, 1960); Church of England, A Time to Heal (London, 2004); M. Israel, Exorcism: The Removal of Evil Influences (London, 1997); K. McDonnell and G. T. Montague, Christian Initiation and Baptism in the Holy Spirit: Evidence from the First Eight Centuries (Collegeville, 1991); M. Perry (ed.), Deliverance: Psychic Disturbance and Occult Involvement (London, 1987); N. G. Wright, A Theology of the Dark Side (Carlisle, 2003).

N. G. WRIGHT

EXPIATION, see ATONEMENT; SACRIFICE

FAIRBAIRN, A. M., see
CONGREGATIONALISM

FAITH

In English, the word 'faith' refers to an attitude of belief, trust or reliance in the word or character of another, whereas the word 'faithfulness' refers to a virtue or quality of character seen in ongoing dependable action. Both meanings are found in the Hebrew 'aman word group and in the biblical story. Abraham had faith in God (Gen. 15:6), but is more commonly said to be faithful to God. Later Jewish writings emphasize the latter (e.g. 1 Macc. 2:52). Both meanings, trust in another and faithfulness to the other, make sense within the context of personal relationships.

In the NT, James picks up this double meaning (Jas 2:21–23), dismissing so-called faith (pistis) in God which does not issue in faithful action. Paul's complementary emphasis, aware of the unfaithfulness of OT Israel, is on the primacy of faith (pistis) as trust in another, specifically in the word and character of God revealed in *Jesus Christ. This is his understanding of Hab. 2:4, 'The righteous will live by faith', in Rom. 1:17 (see also Gal. 3:11). He establishes from Gen. 15:6 that Abraham's faith in the God who justifies the ungodly is the model for ours (Rom. 4:3–5). Recent scholarship has explored the idea that the Pauline phrase, pistis Iesou Christou, often understood in the past as our faith in Christ, can be understood to mean the faith of Christ, that is, the faith which Christ himself had in God and his faithfulness to God. In the Johannine writings, faith is that trust in Christ which is also 'knowledge', not knowledge of the abstract, but the knowledge of personal acquaintance.

The Fathers tended to think of faith as belief and to use other words (obedience, love) to refer to the Christian's faithful character. But thinking in a cultural context which valued the abstract idea as real, faith was understood more as 'faith that' (i.e. belief in a truth or doctrine) rather than 'faith in' a person. It was accepting and believing true statements, particularly the 'rule of faith' (regula fidei), a summary of Christian doctrine which came to be encapsulated in the creeds. In the medieval scholastics, this was formulated in a distinction between assensus, the acceptance of the truths or doctrines of Scripture as interpreted by the authority of the church, and fiducia, personal trust in God. The accent was often more on 'the faith', meaning the Christian faith, the doctrine to be believed (fides quae creditur), than on the faith which believes (fides qua creditur).

The Reformation can be seen as a revival of emphasis on faith as belief (fides qua creditur). This was to be understood not merely as assensus, acceptance of doctrine, but as fiducia, personal trust. Luther's interpretation of '*justification by faith' in Paul saw faith as 'the wedding ring' which unites the believer to Christ. We are not saved by our faithfulness, a view which Luther saw in some late medieval teaching and rejected as *Pelagian (salvation by works), but by our faith in Christ. But neither was this faith a good work, something we did by which we were justified: it was the gift of God. *Salvation was therefore not only by faith alone (sola fide) but, as Augustine had taught, by *grace alone (sola gratia). 'Justification by faith' became the doctrine of all the *Reformers and the subsequent Protestant churches, and *Luther regarded it as 'the article [of doctrine] by which the Church stands or falls' (articulus stantis vel cadentis ecclesiae).

At the Council of *Trent, the Catholic theologians of the Counter-Reformation were afraid that the Protestant doctrine encouraged *antinomianism, that is, a disregard for the moral law and the need for personal holiness. For them, faith was to be understood not just as faith in God but as faithfulness to God. The same anxiety that some Lutheran and Calvinist doctrine could lead to antinomianism was echoed in some *Anabaptist thinking. Later, the leaders of German *pietism and of the evangelical revival in Britain and her American colonies reacted against the tendency of Protestant orthodoxy to lapse back into thinking of faith as assensus, the acceptance of orthodox doctrine. Accordingly, they emphasized a living, personal faith (fiducia) in Christ. But along with the pietists, *Wesley, while fully adopting the doctrine of justification by faith from Luther and Calvin, also emphasized that it was 'faith expressing itself through love' (Gal. 5:6). Faith led to *sanctification (faithful living) as well as justification.

The philosophers of the *Enlightenment tended to polarize faith and knowledge. The search for certain knowledge by the exercise of human *reason tended to marginalize and eventually to dismiss the claims of the Christian faith based on the authority of Scripture and the tradition of the church. In reaction to the focus on orthodoxy in the Lutheran church and the attempt of Hegel to present Christian doctrine as merely illustrative of his metaphysical system, Søren *Kierkegaard spoke of 'the leap of faith'. Like the Pietists, he argued that Christian faith was not a system of doctrine, but a personal commitment. For him it was the subjective decision of the will to embrace the paradoxes of the faith (particularly the incarnation of the Eternal in time) as truth.

In the twentieth century, secular *existentialist philosophy drew upon Kierkegaard, and influenced theologians such as *Bultmann and *Tillich who interpreted faith as a 'leap' or decision to live 'authentically', that is, open to God's future rather than clinging to the dead past. In reaction to that existentialist view of faith, theologians such as *Pannenberg and many evangelicals emphasized that Christian faith was not an irrational 'leap', but a fully rational belief in the gospel which in turn was based in history. Karl *Rahner proposed that many who did not explicitly believe the gospel of Christ had 'implicit faith' (see *Anonymous Christianity).

To be true to the NT, a Christian understanding of faith must begin with *Christ. If in him the God of Israel was ultimately faithful to his promises of salvation, and if he as our representative demonstrated perfect human faith in God and faithfulness to God, then salvation has been completed for all who are 'in him' by faith. It is not that our faith is a good work which saves us, but that he saves us through our faith in him and is transforming us already into his faithful people.

Bibliography

D. M. Baillie, Faith in God and Its Christian Consummation (Edinburgh, 1927); G. C. Berkouwer, Faith and Justification (Grand Rapids, 1954); R. B. Hays, The Faith of Jesus Christ (Grand Rapids, 2002).

T. A. NOBLE

FAITH AND HISTORY

Christian faith is grounded in events reported in the Bible (see *Scripture) and centred on the life, death and resurrection of *Jesus Christ. The reliability of these reports became a matter of doubt and public debate in the post-Reformation era and has been widely disputed since the time of the Enlightenment. But if it is held that faith can no longer be grounded in the conviction that certain events occurred, what is its basis? How is it related to history? The issues surrounding these questions constitute what is known as 'the problem of faith and history'. Among the various approaches to it are the following:

(1) Biblical accounts of events are fundamentally or entirely reliable, but historical investigation cannot demonstrate their truth or probability. Faith is grounded in the actuality, but not the rational verifiability, of their occurrence.

(2) Biblical accounts of events are fundamentally or entirely reliable and historical-critical reason can give a significant measure of support to such belief. Faith may not be dependent on the results of historical investigation, but it gains strength and support from it.

(3) Faith is somewhat dependent on the results of historical investigation, but these results are provisional and faith contains a significant element of risk. This is in the nature of faith; faith is not certainty.

(4) Faith is indeed possessed of certainty, but it is not a certainty that particular events have taken place. Faith is not based on history and is independent of it. It is based on self-validating experience or encounter with God.

(5) Traditional ways of posing and answering the question of faith and history are misconceived. Scripture communicates and commends a mode of existence rendered through the medium of narrative, but narrative is a vehicle for absorbing our lives into its story independently of any correspondence between its account and external events.

(6) Faith is independent of both historical events and the narrative world of the Bible. It is a way of being in the world which may take its inspiration and values from the portrayal of Jesus in the NT, but it is self-supporting and self-sustaining as far as history or Scripture are in question.

These options are rather crudely described, can be modified or alternatively formulated and do not exhaust the possible ways of relating faith and history. However, they illustrate something of the range of positions adopted since the issue began to be debated in modern times. In approaching the question of faith and history, we might keep in mind at least five things.

First, Scripture contains a variety of literary genres, and we should try to identify and distinguish them as we consider what kind of 'history' is contained in the Bible. Our judgments will sometimes be provisional, since our customary ways of describing genres (e.g. prose, poetry, chronicle, narrative, legend) may impose inappropriate categories on the biblical materials.

Secondly, those who believe that faith is grounded in historical events must make distinctions, including some already mentioned. One is the distinction between the actuality and the demonstrability (or demonstrable probability) of an occurrence. Another is between events of greater and of lesser significance for religious faith.

Thirdly, even if we maintain that there are no such things as uninterpreted events, there is a distinction between an event and its interpretation. The fact that Jesus died may be essential for faith, but it is the interpretation of that death as an *atonement which provides the content of faith. Even an extraordinary occurrence like a resurrection only has saving significance if it is interpreted in a particular way.

Fourthly, an intellectual persuasion that an event has occurred – however we attain it – is not the same as saving faith. Saving faith is trust in and acceptance of Jesus Christ. Events may ground or may even, in some sense, be objects of faith, but mere belief (fides historica) is not saving (fides salvifica).

Fifthly, the hinge on which the testimony of the Christian Scriptures turns is the *resurrection of Jesus from the dead, with its twofold witness to an empty tomb and appearances of the risen Christ. However we conceive the metaphysics of the resurrection or the nature of the assurance of faith, the testimony itself is fundamental. Differences on whether historical investigation can or cannot, should or should not, be used to support this witness, should not obscure its centrality.

Diverse methods of approaching the Bible, especially since the last quarter of the twentieth century, have made 'the question of faith and history' appear rather antiquated to many biblical scholars and theologians. However, as long as the testimony of Scripture is considered seriously on its own terms, it is a question that should not go away.

See also: FAITH; HISTORY; INFALLIBILITY AND INERRANCY OF THE BIBLE.

Bibliography

C. Braaten, History and Hermeneutics (London, 1968); S. Evans, The Historical Christ and the Jesus of Faith: Incarnational Narrative as History (Oxford, 1996); H. W. Frei, The Eclipse of Biblical Narrative: A Study in Eighteenth and Nineteenth Century Hermeneutics (New Haven and London, 1974); M. R. Licona, The Resurrection of Jesus: A New Historiographical Approach (Nottingham, 2010); W. Pannenberg, Basic Questions in Theology, vols. 1 & 2 (London, 1970, 1971); L. Perdue, The Collapse of History (Minneapolis, 1994); N. T. Wright, The New Testament and the People of God (London, 1992).

S. N. WILLIAMS

FAITH AND ORDER

Together with the Life and Work movement and the International Missionary Council, Faith and Order was one of several strands of *ecumenical activity founded after the Edinburgh Missionary Conference of 1910, enabling the churches to explore their common mission. Persuaded by Bishop Charles Brent, the effective father of the movement, the American Episcopal Church campaigned to obtain the support of other churches in the setting up of a commission to prepare for the convoking of a first Faith and Order Conference, which met in Lausanne in 1927, bringing together churches of the Reformation, the Orthodox and the Anglican Communion. At this and subsequent conferences the wide degree of agreement between the churches was identified, as well as those areas where serious disagreements remained, affirming a unity which is both gift and goal. In 1937, at the second Faith and Order world conference in Edinburgh, Faith and Order agreed to unite with the Life and Work movement to seek to form a council of churches, which came into being after wartime delays in 1948.

The Faith and Order movement has a semi-autonomous existence within the *World Council of Churches. Its staff are employed by the WCC, which also funds its activities, but it has its own separate membership which since 1968 has included the Roman Catholic Church, together with an increased representation from the Orthodox Churches and from the non-Western world. It operates through a standing commission (thirty members), and a full commission (120 members), which meets approximately every four years, with world conferences being held more intermittently. It embodies the world's most representative theological forum. The third world conference was held at Lund in 1952, the fourth at Montreal in 1963 and the fifth at Santiago de Compostella in 1993.

Its aim, according to its bylaws, is 'to proclaim the oneness of the church of Jesus Christ and to call the churches to the goal of visible unity in one faith and one Eucharistic fellowship, expressed in worship and in common life in Christ, in order that the world may believe'.

Some of its more recent work has been a programme entitled, 'Towards the Common Expression of the Apostolic Faith Today', the production of its consensus document on Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry (1982) and the associated Lima Eucharistic text, which have been extensively studied by the churches who have widely responded to them, for clearly not all is acceptable to all, since profound differences cannot simply be bridged by ambiguous words. More recently the commission has been exploring the theme of 'The Unity of the Church as Koinonia' to see how this can help a divided church come together.

Bibliography

G. Gassmann (ed.), A Documentary History of the Faith and Order Movement 1963–1993 (Geneva, 1993); L. Vischer (ed.), A Documentary History of the Faith and Order Movement, 1927–63 (St Louis, 1963).

FAITH AND REASON

Because conceptions of both faith and reason have varied so widely in the Christian church, there is no one answer to the question of the relationship between the two. However, a few broad patterns may be distinguished.

If by 'reason' is meant the faculty of reasoning – drawing deductive and inductive conclusions from data – there is a broad measure of agreement within the Christian church that faith (whether understood as 'the faith' or as the act of faith) is compatible with reason; indeed, it requires reason both in order to understand what is believed, and to articulate what is believed in an orderly, coherent and systematic way. Christians have recognized such logical influences on the very surface of the Bible (e.g. Matt. 12:26; Luke 6:39) and in the outworking of the mysteries of the faith in *creeds and confessional formulae (e.g. the Nicene Creed). This attitude of reason to (the) faith has found classic expression in the words of the *Westminster Confession, that 'the whole counsel of God, concerning all things necessary for his own glory, man's salvation, faith and life, is either expressly set down in Scripture, or by good and necessary consequence may be deduced from Scripture' (I.vi). Even *Luther, who was capable of making very uncomplimentary remarks about philosophers such as Aristotle, did not shrink from writing a first-rate work of systematic theology, De Servo Arbitrio (On the Bondage of the Will; 1525).

In both the medieval period and in the *Enlightenment (as well as less dominantly in other periods), 'reason' came to mean not only the faculty of reasoning from data but also the ability to certify certain data as 'reasonable'. This has operated, destructively, in rationalist attacks upon the Christian gospel from outside the church. But also, from within the church, it has operated in three discernibly different ways.

(1) In the classical medieval position, and in all forms of *natural or rational theology since then, reason is said to provide a stock of initial propositions or data 'evident to the senses' or acceptable to all rational people, from which certain theological conclusions can be deduced which act as the praeambula fidei. Not that all Christians are capable of making the requisite inferences; but they can all be assured that such inferences are possible. Weaker senses of 'reasonable' also operated in anti-*deist writers such as Joseph *Butler and William *Paley, and those influenced by them. The religious and theological danger of this approach, quite apart from the success or otherwise of the 'proofs' of God's existence, lies in its abstract rationalism.

J. BRIGGS

(2) It was a characteristic position of the eighteenth-century Enlightenment that, in *Kant's words, religion should be confined 'within the limits of reason alone'. What this meant, in practice, was the excision of all supernatural references from Scripture, or the adopting of a *hermeneutic which effectively 'naturalized' them by regarding Scripture as a retelling of the truths of reason in figurative and emblematic form for popular consumption, and (in the case of Kant and his immediate followers) the distilling of the pure essence of religion in terms of individual ethics (Kant), sentiment and pious affection (*Schleiermacher) or social engagement (through the implementation of the ethics of Jesus; *Ritschl). It is of the utmost importance to recognize that such appeals to 'reason' and 'logic' are not neutral and objective, as they may appear to be, but incorporate substantive ontological, *epistemological and sometimes moral positions.

(3) 'Reason' has been appealed to in order to set up a barrier against the incursion of what has been regarded as mystical or enthusiastic excess. Thus John *Locke, writing against the background of what he regarded as the sectarian chaos of seventeenth-century England, could write: 'If anything shall be thought revelation which is contrary to the plain principles of reason and the evident knowledge the mind has of its own clear and distinct ideas, their reason must be hearkened to, as to a matter within its province' (Essay IV.xviii.8). Locke himself is somewhat equivocal in the way in which he employs this criterion, employing it not only in order to assert that no credible revelation can be unintelligible gibberish, but also to assert a more substantive control of what may count as revelation.

There has been a fairly definite correlation, and perhaps a logical connection, between views of the place of reason in articulating, reconstructing or delimiting the faith, and views of *faith. In the medieval church, and in much present-day Roman Catholic theology, faith is primarily, if not exclusively, assent to the basic doctrines of 'the faith'. The credibility of these doctrines is attested by the church's authority which is in turn based upon an appreciation of the rational arguments for God's existence, divine revelation, and the church as the infallible teaching authority. Faith is thus assent (sometimes explicit, often implicit) to those propositions certified by the church.

At the other extreme, faith is seen by many, particularly those influenced by *existentialism from Søren *Kierkegaard onwards (some would find antecedents in Luther and *Pascal, probably mistakenly), as a leap in the dark. It is an act of trust in God which goes beyond the evidence, and in some cases goes against the evidence. (This distrust of reason has sometimes been called 'fideism'.) It is clear that it would be difficult to hold such a view along with an acceptance of natural theology. But it would be a mistake to suppose that because faith requires no reasons, no reasons can be given for this view of faith.

In classical Protestantism, faith is trust in Christ for salvation, the Christ to whom the Scriptures exclusively bear witness. Though some have ventured to attempt to authenticate the Scriptures as the divine revelation by reason, appealing to certain of its unique features to do so, in general in Protestantism the Scriptures have been regarded as self-authenticating. God, by his Spirit, bears testimony to his people to the divine and saving character of his word not by investing that word with a set of private, Gnostic meanings, but by bearing testimony in the mind and conscience of the regenerate, in a dynamic, ongoing fashion, to the divine authority of Scripture. Faith in Christ is thus of a piece with faith in the trustworthiness of the Scriptures, which reveal and testify to Christ. It is not the 'reason' alone to which the Scriptures appeal, but the whole person in the context of the fellowship of the church.

See also: EPISTEMOLOGY; PHILOSOPHICAL THEOLOGY; PHILOSOPHY AND THEOLOGY; PHILOSOPHY OF RELIGION.

Bibliography

G. H. Clark, Religion, Reason and Revelation (Nutley, 1961); K. J. Clark (ed.), Philosophers Who Believe (Downers Grove, 1993); P. Glynn, God – The Evidence: The Reconciliation of Faith and Reason in a Postsecular World (Rocklin, CA, 1997); P. Helm, The Varieties of Belief (London, 1973); J. Hick, Faith and Knowledge (London, 1967); T. Keller, The Reason for God: Belief in an Age of Skepticism

(New York, 2008); C. Michalson, The Rationality of Faith (London, 1964); K. Ward, God and the Philosophers (Minneapolis, 2009).

P. HELM

FALL

Since patristic times, the Eden story (Gen. 2–3) has been given a decisive significance by Christian theologians, under the title ‘The Fall’ (introduced by Origen and Hippolytus Romanus, used by Gregory of Nyssa and Gregory Nazianzen). The rise of biblical criticism, the development of evolutionary theories, post-Enlightenment rationalism (and irrationalism) in idealistic and historicist forms, have led to a new questioning of the doctrine of the fall (‘originating original sin’), with its presupposition of original *righteousness and its consequence of ‘originated original sin’. Was there ever an historical Adam and, if there was, how can the sin of one individual affect the whole of humanity? Was there ever a state of perfect integrity? Did the fall make nature ‘red in tooth and claw’? Modernity has seen a swarm of interpretations that take the Genesis narrative as a *mythical account of the condition of all humankind through all time (including readings that imply a fall upwards, *Hegel, some *feminists).

Though the evidence is rather diffuse and lacks formal elaboration, the data of the OT warrant the traditional understanding of the fall as a particular event which destroyed a prior condition of harmony and fellowship with God, and had lasting catastrophic effects for all the descendants of the first couple. Were it not for the prestige of the rival scenario drawn from the theories of natural sciences, few interpreters would have adopted the ‘mythical’ reading of Eden.

The formal features of the biblical narrative contrast with those of myth; ‘most probably’, as James Orr wisely summarized, to be identified ‘as old tradition clothed in oriental allegorical dress’ (The Christian View of God and the World, Kerr Lectures 1890–91, Grand Rapids, repr. 1960, p. 185). It is the first link in a chain of historical sequence, in tune with the biblical valuation of *history, with *Adam as the first ancestor. The etiological intention is obvious, concerning death, birth-pangs, strained relationships of the sexes, and effects beyond human nature (the ground) which are difficult to measure (cf. Rom. 8:20–21, but also Ps. 104:20–22 and Job 38–41 for phenomena ascribed to God’s creative wisdom) (see *Ecology). The sinfulness of human nature (flesh), even from birth, is everywhere acknowledged, and there are some hints that the fountainhead might be found in the first father, even a few possible references to the Gen. 3 disobedience (e.g. Hos. 6:7: NIV is literal, ‘Like Adam, they have broken the covenant’; Ezek. 28:12–19, Adam being the figure behind the King of Tyre; Eccl. 7:28–29).

Intertestamental Judaism echoed that teaching (Ecclus. 24:25; Wisdom 2:23–24; 2 Baruch 48:42–43; IV Ezra 7:118f.), though, especially in apocalyptic literature, the fall of angels (Gen. 6:1–4; cf. Jude 6) loomed larger as the source of evils in the world. Adam originated the evil ‘impulse’ (yetser, Gen. 6:5) in all human hearts (IV Ezra 3:21–22; 7:48), which coexists with the good impulse in rabbinic texts (Qumran leans on a more deterministic side).

The NT doctrine of sin denounces more strongly the corruption of human nature and the universal bondage it involves. Matt. 19:8 suggests an original defection from a previous state of purity. The Johannine corpus insists on the devil’s role ‘in the beginning’ (John 8:44; 1 John 3:8; Rev. 12:9; 20:2). Paul’s interest is more anthropological; he mentions Eve’s role (2 Cor. 11:3; 1 Tim. 2:14), and focuses on Adam’s: it is part of the First-Adam/New-(Last)-Adam scheme he develops to unfold the meaning of Christ’s work on our behalf. Universal death is traced back to this origin: all die ‘in Adam’ (1 Cor. 15:21–22); more explicitly, Adam’s disobedience is said to have introduced sin into the world, and consequently death (the wages of sin) for all humans (Rom. 5:12–21), and even more precisely to have secured the condemnation of all, who were ‘constituted sinners’ (vv. 18–19). Since the parallel Adam/Christ is asymmetrical, their two roles being both alike and unlike (vv. 12, 14–16, 18–19), interpretations vary on the way Adam’s brings about such a state of affairs.

*Irenaeus may be called the first theologian of the fall (he rather spoke of ‘apostasy’), with an influence both Eastern and Western (he had been trained in Asia Minor and was the bishop of Lyons). He does maintain its historical character, and that Adam lost the prospect of immortality for his descendants; he more vaguely alludes to moral corruption, though Satan’s tyranny he emphasizes implies the bonds of condemnation (Against Heresies, III.23.1). He tends, however, to minimize the guilt of Adam and Eve, whom he considers to have been children (also sexually, III.22.4) and easily duped by the Serpent/devil (IV.38.1–2): this view is subservient to his main interpretation of salvation as growth, progressive conformation to God, owing to the ‘recapitulation’ effected by Christ. Despite human bondage, Irenaeus affirms that free *will was not annihilated; this is the common emphasis among the Fathers, who fought pagan, astral fatalism. Among the Greek Fathers, the fall has entailed the reign of death and demonic influence, and the spread of evil desires; of sin itself and guilt, there is little talk (though *Athanasius speaks of sin ‘passing’, and Didymus the Blind of its ‘transmission’, diadochè). *John Damascene, while stressing free will, could teach that man, having broken the divine command ‘passed on to his generation the impulse towards matter and far from God, and wrath come from the one authentic enemy of his salvation’ (Orthodox Faith, Book II.30). *Eastern Orthodox theology heightens its differences from the Augustinian tradition; it affirms that the fall (historical) entailed mortality but no guilt nor total depravity; the advantages of the pre-fall state are lowered, the fall somewhat de-dramatized, and salvation is seen primarily as deification (theōsis) rather than restoration.

In the West, a sterner view of sin prevailed, with the phrase ‘original vice’ coined as soon as *Tertullian, but free will was also emphasized. When *Pelagius, however, pushed further the logic of free will and all but denied any effects of Adam’s fall (for him, men and women were born in the state of Adam prior to his fall, were free from his guilt and the pollution of his sin, only exposed to the bad influence of his example), *Augustine took up the cudgels against him and for the first strong doctrine of original sin. His carefully constructed account of the connection between Adam’s sin and guilt and those of all humanity gave the fall a dramatically efficient role. He highlighted the privileges of original righteousness and the magnitude of the fall from it. He saw pride as the root of Adam’s transgression, and as the cause of that disorder of desire, concupiscence (lust), which was to him a central form of sin. Since all were germinally present in Adam (after the logic of Heb. 7:9–10), all actually participated in Adam’s sin (the so-called ‘realist’ interpretation; Augustine understood the last clause in Rom. 5:12: ‘in whom (Adam) all have sinned’). Therefore all are born both corrupt and guilty. The union of Adam and his descendants makes it possible to maintain both the radical necessity of sin (bondage), in everybody born, and its responsibility, since Adam had full free will when he violated the divine prohibition. The transmission of Adamic sinfulness Augustine attached to the conditions of human reproduction: the disorder of concupiscence even affects the lawful conjugal act, and thus every child is conceived and born in sin (Ps. 51:5, cf. Heb. 7).

Augustine’s interpretation was largely confirmed at the Council of Orange (529) and remained official dogma. His understanding of concupiscence was influential in the development of monastic *asceticism and the value set on *Mary’s virginity (considered to be perpetual). Scholasticism brought only refinements to the doctrine. *Anselm explained original righteousness in terms of rectitude and highlighted the negative dimension of loss in the fall: humans were deprived as much as they became depraved. Successors, in line with their Nature-Grace ground-motive, considered original righteousness as a super-added gift, above nature (supernatural or, rather, praeternatural): it was entirely lost, but nature itself was only weakened. This was *Thomas Aquinas’ view; he was also able to clarify the hereditary transmission of Adamic sinfulness: it does not happen through concupiscence in the sexual conjunction, but because procreation is the transmission of nature, and human nature is fallen. Following *Duns Scotus’ emphasis on will, the later medieval *nominalistic trend (especially among Franciscans) moved away from Augustine and his pessimistic/realistic outlook.

The Magisterial Reformers were Augustinians and (with the notable exception of *Zwingli) reaffirmed the dogma. Martin *Luther stressed the corruption and utter inability of fallen nature; it lies helplessly under the wrath of the God of law; the will no longer deserves to be called ‘free’, but, according to the title of Luther’s reply to Erasmus, it is a ‘slave-will’ (servum arbitrium) which only pure grace can rescue. Adam’s sin, which initiated that condition, was first and foremost unbelief.

John *Calvin followed Luther (and also owed more to Aquinas than meets the eye). His definition of original sin is worth quoting: ‘a hereditary depravity and corruption of our nature, diffused into all parts of the soul, which first makes us liable to God's wrath, then also brings forth in us those works which Scripture calls "works of the flesh" (Institutes, II.i.8). His intention is clearly to bind together guilt (incurring God's wrath) and depravity; he insists on Adam's sin being our own, since we are sinful, rather than merely 'alien'. To establish the connection, he relies on metaphors (sin flowing down) and the thought of God's ordinance: original sin is the outcome of a judgment, imputing Adam's sin to all, just as Christ's righteousness is imputed to all believers. *Beza and later *Reformed orthodoxy elaborated the doctrine of this ordinance: Adam's role depended on his appointment as 'federal Head and representative' ('federal': of the creational 'Covenant of works'); since he acted as the lawful representative of all, his disobedience can be imputed to all. Some theologians, such as Charles *Hodge, can interpret depravity as the first punishment, inflicted on the ground of imputed guilt. Calvin and his tradition gave prominence to a thought that is already found among the Fathers, that of the probationary character of Eden and the prohibition; it was a test of obedience and, had not Adam and Eve failed, they would have been raised afterwards to a higher form of life. *Berkouwer and a few others have observed that there is not the slightest hint in Scripture that it was so; the thought has to be read into the text. The Reformers departed from medieval tradition by rejecting the difference that was made between the 'image' and the 'likeness' of God; not without some ambiguity, they affirmed that the fall had defaced the image-likeness, only restored in Christ; this has consequences for the use of reason, which is first among 'image' faculties (see *Image of God).

Liberal and modernist theology, generally, has discarded the Augustinian dogma. Karl *Barth, though retrieving part of its language, offers a radical reinterpretation. He rejects any thought of 'inherited sin' (Erbsünde, the usual term for the dogma in German), though he does speak of 'original sin' (Ursünde). He remains ambiguous on the historical reference of the 'saga' (Sage) of Gen. 2–3, which he differentiates both from myth and from history in the ordinary sense, but he is clear that there never was a pre-fall state of 'innocence' (nor any other covenant than the covenant of grace). One should not talk of transmission: rather 'Adam' is the title or label (Überschrift) placed over the whole of human history. Death (future non-existence) as such is no consequence of a fall but part of the goodness of creation. The most original feature is the Christological foundation of original sin: Jesus Christ is truly the first Adam, and also as regards sin. The priority of Christ (required by Barth's dogmatic Christological principle) is not only noetic (we know our sin in the light of Christ) but ontic, in the order of being. He could write:

He is the man whom God in His eternal counsel, giving Him the command, treated as its transgressor, thus rejecting Him in His righteous wrath, and actually threatening Him with that final dereliction. That this was true of Adam, and is true of us, is the case only because in God's counsel, and in the event of Golgotha, it became true first of all of Jesus Christ (CD II.2, p. 739; emphasis added).

This reversal is bound with Barth's interpretation of evil as uncreated, yet real, 'nothingness' and his claim that sin is 'ontological impossibility'; it has no clear precedent and conflicts sharply with Calvin's emphasis on the Creation-Fall-Redemption sequence.

In the field of dogmatics, after Barth, one may mention the work of Wolfhart *Pannenberg, whose strength resides in his perspicacious treatment of the history of the dogma; he discerns Augustine's intention, but he believes he can do without a true historical fall, through a combination of free will and a metaphysical near-inevitability of sin in the relationship of Finite and Infinite. The main contribution has come from a philosopher, Paul *Ricoeur, whose Symbolism of Evil (1960) broke new ground and finely perceived the intention of Genesis. Ricoeur highlights the unique character of the Adam story (he says 'myth'), the only one that separates radically between the origin of being (all good) and the origin of evil (later); he sees the import of that historical beginning for evil: the goodness of the monotheistic Creator, the source of being, is safeguarded, indignation is preserved ('Evil becomes scandalous at the same time as it becomes historical'), the sinner's guilt is established, repentance is possible and called for; he notes that it is consonant with the prophetic call to conversion. Nevertheless, he thinks that scientific results rule out a simple, naive acceptance of historicity; he tries to exploit the meaning 'as if' the fall were really historical and promotes a 'symbolic' interpretation; his sentiment that the 'tragic myth' (evil part of the fabric of being), ultimately, cannot be overcome shows that he slides back into ontological accounts of evil.

The example of Ricœur's work suggests that the key issue today concerning the fall in Eden is that of historicity (see *Faith and history). The alternatives are an interpretation of sin (cardinal evil) as the misuse of freedom against the perfectly good God, perversion and corruption of his gifts, and an ontological interpretation which sees in it a component of being (which may be called, relatively, non-being). The latter view blunts the edge of any imputation of guilt and any call to repentance. The former view finds its counterpart in the glorious news of a similarly historical *redemption.

See also: DEATH; EVIL; SIN.

Bibliography

K. Barth, CD, IV.1; G. C. Berkouwer, Sin (ET, Grand Rapids, 1971); H. A. G. Blocher, Original Sin: Illuminating the Riddle (Leicester, 1997); J. Calvin, Institutes, II.i-ix; M. Luther, The Bondage of the Will (ET, Cambridge, 1957 [1525]); J. Murray, The Impartation of Adam's Sin (Grand Rapids, 1959); W. Pannenberg, Systematic Theology II (ET, Grand Rapids and Edinburgh, 1994); P. Ricœur, The Symbolism of Evil (ET, Boston, 1967); P. Ricœur, The Conflict of Interpretations (ET, Evanston, 1974); H. Rondet, Original Sin: The Patristic and Theological Background (Shannon, 1972); N. P. Williams, The Ideas of the Fall and Original Sin (London, 1929).

H. A. G. BLOCHER

FAMILY

Our understanding of what a family is has changed throughout history and is continuing to evolve. Traditionally, the family was both a means of having and caring for children and ensuring inheritance and the family's name. Marxists and feminists have offered critiques of traditional understandings of the family on economic, hierarchical and patriarchal grounds. There have been attempts to replace the family unit with wider communities where childcare was shared or given to specific specialists. With increasing levels of divorce and remarriage, single-parent families, homosexual partnerships and new biological reproductive technologies, many feel that the family is under threat. Such social, political and legal changes should make the church ask: what do we mean by 'family', and how can we prepare people for family life and support families through the pressures and demands of modern life?

Definitions

While there is great diversity in the social and cultural forms and expressions of family life, there are some central features which seem universal. It provides individual and social identity. It provides for the biological, social and emotional needs of its members. It is a formalized, social structure to ensure the procreation, nurture and education of children. Inevitably, society and the law create demands, pressures and expectations, and they constrain what family members may do to and with each other and how and when society may intervene and regulate family life and relationships. At root, family provides for the well-being and flourishing not only of children but all its members.

In biblical and historical times, 'family' included the whole household who lived and worked in the same location and shared, in some sense, worked on and benefited from the land which belonged to the family. Family is a setting where roles, duties, responsibilities and rights are balanced and where and how we learn how to navigate our social and practical worlds. Historically, our notion of family has been in flux. Today our families are smaller, more mobile, with more choice and higher life expectancy. In our societies we are surrounded by greater ethnic and cultural variety of models of family. Caring for elderly parents and relatives is creating a new set of demands, balancing the continuing concerns of nurture and education of children and the well-being of each family member. No family is an isolated unit, but works with schools, neighbours, communities and society to ensure that all its members are protected and flourish.

Theological and biblical perspectives

The Trinity expresses God's fundamental nature as three persons in one unity, a family community. Many see in the *Trinity a model for family relationships, with each person being unique, yet living and being in close spiritual and communal contact. The family is the basic unity of human life in creation. Men and women made in the *image of God are set in creation as a family. It was not good for man to be alone, and humanity is to be fruitful and multiply (Gen. 1:28). Marriage and family are the context for *sexual intimacy.

While polygamy, concubinage and levirate procreation were not unknown in biblical times, the Christian pattern has been monogamy. The leaving, cleaving and becoming one flesh blend sexual expression and family life. Childlessness, widowhood and parental death are serious matters and require God's special care and our human responsibility for those in need (e.g. Sarah, Rachel, Hannah; Lam. 1:5; 5:3; 1 Tim. 5:1–16). God is not just the Creator of humanity but the Father of all humanity (Eph. 3:14–15). We are all in his family, made in the image of our heavenly Father (Gen. 1:26).

The *fall reveals how family relationships can and do break down (Gen. 3 and 4). Sin undermines family relationships, between husband and wife, parents and children, brothers and sisters and brothers. There is enmity between Adam and Eve, Cain kills Abel, Noah is disgraced by his son, Abraham presents Sarah as his sister, Jacob and Esau and Joseph and his brothers are dysfunctional, and Absalom rebels against his father David. The OT balances pictures of, and advice on, how family relationships ought to be conducted with a brutally honest account of the disasters between husbands and wives, parents and children, brothers and sisters.

In biblical times, family was not so much our modern nuclear notion, but included folk bound by kinship and extended tribal relationships. It was more like a clan. The family is central in God's covenant purposes (Gen. 12:3; 17:11–14).

It is clear that in the giving of the Law and Commandments, honouring father and mother is mandated (Exod. 20:12). In both the Pentateuch and Wisdom literature parents are given specific instructions and advice about how to educate (especially spiritually) and bring up their children (Deut. 6:4–7; 5:13–15; 29:9–11; Exod. 12:24–27; Prov. 31). This is paralleled in Eph. 6:4 with the command to bring up children in the training and instruction of the Lord.

Jesus was not only incarnate in human flesh, but incarnated in a particular society, culture and family. Matthew is careful to delineate Jesus' descent from the house of David and lists his full genealogy. Jesus grew up in a family with other children and worked for his father. His first miracle was performed at the behest of his mother (John 2:1–11). Some suggest that Jesus' warning that to follow him might mean hating father, mother and the rest of the family undermines the importance of the family (Luke 14:26; 9:59–62; 12:52–53; Matt. 10:34–39), but this is rather a question of priority of claims and responsibilities and what is vital. If a choice has to be made, then following Christ is more important than family obligations.

In the Gospel accounts, Jesus is at pains to teach how important honouring parents is (Matt. 15:4–8) and chides the Pharisees for using the practice of Corban to break the command of parent honour and escape their financial obligations (Mark 7:9–13). His teaching is full of the importance of parents and of children (Matt. 19:14; Mark 10:14; Luke 18:16) and of how good parents behave towards their children, drawing a parallel with God as their loving heavenly *Father. Even on the cross, Jesus shows family concern and indicates that John will take care of his mother, Mary (John 19:26–27).

Scripture stresses the importance of the people of God in his purposes for the world. Followers of Christ are adopted into the family of God, the *church (Eph. 1:5; Gal. 4:5; Rom. 8:15–23). God is pictured as showing both a mother and Father's *love (Isa. 66:13; John 14:23; 16:27; 1 John 3:1). Jesus himself is the Son of God (Matt. 4:6; 27:43; Mark 3:11; Luke 1:35; John 1:34; 3:18), Son of Man (Matt. 9:6; 24:30; Mark 2:10; 13:26; Luke 19:10; John 3:14; Acts 7:56), our brother (Matt. 12:48–50; Luke 8:21), and members of his household are under his authority (Heb. 3:6). Jesus and his Father are closely bound (Matt. 11:25–27; John 5:19–30). His great high priestly prayer in John 17 reveals the integrated nature of their being. At Jesus' baptism, God recognizes that this is his 'beloved Son' in whom he is well pleased (Luke 3:22). Jesus constantly prays to his Father and even in the garden of Gethsemane and on the cross addresses his prayers to the Father, asking for the cup to pass and the Father to receive his spirit (Matt. 26:39–42; Mark 14:35–36; Luke 23:46). Jesus encourages his disciples to pray to God as their 'Father' (Matt. 6:9; Luke 11:2) and to expect that the Father will respond positively as a good father (Matt. 6:11; Luke 11:13). Jesus commends the faith of children as an example of genuine faith and warns against the abuse of children (Matt. 18:1–10).

The followers of Jesus experience the love of their Father (see *Love of God) and are called the children of God (1 John 3:1). Family relationships, experiencing and showing love, are the marks of being in Christ and born of God (1 John 4:7; 5:18). Time and again Christians are called brothers and relate to each other with brotherly love (2 Thess. 2:13–15; 1 John 3). Family and household relationships in the NT are reciprocal, with mutual duties and responsibilities under submission to Christ (Col. 3:18–4:1; 1 Pet. 2:18–3:7; Eph. 5:20–6:9). In Acts, households hear the gospel preached and respond together (Acts 10:24). Theologians have debated the extent to which the children of believers are included as members in the people of God, and see christening, naming, infant baptism and dedication as ways of expressing the status of children and families within the church. This often revolves around the nature of *baptism and confirmation and focuses on when children are admitted to Communion. Christ is pictured as a bridegroom, with the church as his bride (Rev. 19:7; 21:2), and the unity of the church and Christ is paralleled in the husband-wife relationship (Eph. 5:25–33). There is clearly a model here of husband-wife, church and Christ interconnectedness.

Theological ethics

Doctrine leads to practice. Theological truth is meant to be lived. Catholic theology emphasizes that the family manifests Christ's living presence to the world in a community of love and faithfulness. The family is a context of fulfilling mutual roles and responsibilities, helping each member mature and grow from the dependency of a new-born baby to interdependence and independence (Eph. 5; Col. 3; 1 Pet. 2–3). When the church emphasizes the family today, it can isolate the single, divorced and widowed, but it needs to teach what it means to found and be a family, and to be a family member, through marriage preparation and family support.

The phenomena of the house church and the home schooling movements raise key theological and ethical questions about how to balance the danger of adopting cultural norms and how to retain and recover biblical ideals. The idealization of children, concern with child abuse and the growing problem of caring for the elderly pose fresh challenges for the church. This is not just about helping individual families. Christians must consider how best to encourage social and political practices and laws, tax systems, housing and educational policies which enable and support families rather than do them harm.

Bibliography

S. C. Barton (ed.), The Family in Theological Perspective (Edinburgh, 1996); R. Clapp, Families at the Crossroads (Leicester, 1994); John Paul II, Familiaris Consortio: The Christian Family in the Modern World (Vatican, 1981); H. Pyper (ed.), The Christian Family: A Concept in Crisis (Norwich, 1993); J. H. Rubio Family Ethics (Georgetown, 2010).

E. D. Cook

FAREL, WILLIAM (GUILLAUME) (1489–1565)

William Farel was born in Gap, France. He matriculated at the University of Paris (1509) and came under the influence of Jacques Lefèvre, who directed Farel to the Scriptures, especially Paul's doctrine of *justification by faith. After persistent struggle, Farel experienced an evangelical breakthrough in 1516. In 1520 he followed Lefèvre to Meaux to preach reform in the French church. His banishment from France in 1522 caused him to itinerate among the Swiss cantons while engaged in debate against Roman theology.

During this period he composed his Sommaire (1525), a pocket-sized manual presenting a theology for the laity based heavily on Scripture. Along with forensic justification, Farel stressed a doctrine of the Christian life with a strong emphasis on obedience to the law through good works and ardent devotion. Expositions of the Lord's Prayer and the Apostles' Creed (neither extant), and a liturgy, completed a trilogy of writings explaining the 'new' theology.

Farel's fame lies in securing a hearing for Protestantism in Geneva, from 1532 to 1535. His forceful charge to young *Calvin to remain in Geneva is memorable. Later, from 1541 to 1565, he devoted himself to preaching in Neuchâtel, where he faced intense opposition. Those struggles among 'the lost sheep' portray a tireless evangelist with compassion for the common people.

Bibliography

H. Heyer, Guillaume Farel: An Introduction to His Theology (Lewiston, 1990); R. Hower, William Farel, Theologian of the Common

Man, and the Genesis of Protestant Prayer (unpubl. ThD thesis, Philadelphia, 1983); D. H. McVicar, William Farel, Reformer of the Swiss Romand: His Life, His Writings, and His Theology (unpubl. ThD thesis, New York, 1954); S. E. Ozment, The Reformation in the Cities (New Haven, 1975).

R. G. HOWER

FARMER, HERBERT HENRY (1892–1981)

Farmer was born in Highbury, London and studied at Cambridge University and Westminster College, Cambridge, which was, at that time, the theological college of the Presbyterian Church of England. In 1931 he joined the staff of Hartford Theological Seminary, Connecticut, as Riley Professor of Christian Doctrine and Ethics. In 1935 he returned to England to succeed John Oman and, in 1949, succeeded C. H. Dodd as Norris-Hulse Professor of Divinity at Cambridge, a post he held until his retirement in 1960. In 1951 he delivered the *Gifford Lectures at the University of Glasgow, the first series of which was published as Revelation and Religion (1954). The second series, with which he was not entirely happy, was published posthumously as Reconciliation and Religion (1998).

Farmer was the most significant mid-twentieth-century British thinker to develop a theology shaped by Wilhelm *Herrmann, Albrecht *Ritschl, Freidrich *Schleiermacher and, particularly, John Oman. However, because of Karl *Barth's popularity during this period, his work always appeared a little out of step with contemporary theological trends.

Farmer's most important work and the best introduction to his thought, The World and God (1935), interprets all religious experience in terms of divine-human personal encounter. For Farmer, this encounter has two primary elements, 'absolute demand' and 'final succour'. Humans become aware of God as unconditional 'will' calling for obedience at any cost and also as ultimate succour, in that God is also absolute love seeking our highest good, forgiving us, and supporting us when we fail.

Farmer is one of the most important theologians in the personalist tradition, for which humans are persons living in a moral universe, the source and ground of which is a personal *God, the ultimate reality, who is rational intelligence, purposive will and experienced as absolute goodness. As wholly good, God brings into existence good personal life (i.e. 'the world of persons'), a life that is only fully realized in fellowship with God. 'The conviction that God is personal, and deals personally with men and women, lies at the heart of Christian experience and thought.' As personal beings, we are constituted by the nature of the relationships we form with other persons, particularly the relationship we form with the 'Eternal Personal' (to be distinguished from the notion of a 'person'). The self, other selves and God constitute 'an ultimate and continuous order of personal relationships'. That is to say, persons are always in relation to the Eternal Personal in and through their relationships with one another, and, in and through their relationship with God they are related to each other: 'The self does not stand in two relations, one to God and one to his neighbour, but in one relation with, as it were, two poles; he is related to his neighbour in God and to God in his neighbour; it is a single and personal continuum or order.'

Perhaps Farmer's most significant popular influences on Anglo-American Christianity were his sermons and his homiletics, which were rooted in his theological personalism. He was widely recognized as one of the most important and engaging preachers of his generation, and his The Servant of the Word (1941) is still considered to be one of the most insightful studies in preaching.

Bibliography

Works: The World and God: A Study of Prayer, Providence and Miracle in Christian Experience (London, 1935); The Servant of the Word (London, 1941); Towards Belief in God (London, 1943); Revelation and Religion: Studies in the Theological Interpretation of Religious Types (London, 1954; Lewiston, 1999); The Word of Reconciliation (London, 1966); Reconciliation and Religion: Some Aspects of the Uniqueness of Christianity as a Reconciling Faith, ed. C. H. Partridge (Lewiston, 1998).

Studies: P. Donovan, 'Phenomenology as Apologetics', SJT 27, 1974, pp. 402–407; F. G. Healey (ed.), Prospect for Theology: Essays in Honour of H. H. Farmer (Welwyn, 1966); T. A. Langford, 'The Theological Methodology of John Oman and H. H. Farmer', Religious Studies 1, 1966, pp. 229–240; C. H. Partridge, H. H. Farmer's Theological Interpretation of Religion: Towards a Personalist Theology of Religions (Lewiston, 1998); idem, 'Henry Herbert Farmer', in S. Brown (ed.), Dictionary of Twentieth-Century British Philosophers (Bristol, 2005), pp. 274–276.

C. PARTRIDGE

FARRER, AUSTIN MARSDEN (1904–68)

A graduate in 'Greats' (classics and philosophy) and theology, chaplain of St Edmund Hall, 1931–5, and of Trinity College, 1935–60, and warden of Keble 1960–68, Farrer was a brilliant Christian thinker of quintessential Oxford type.

His prolific writings on philosophy, theology, and NT exegesis show an independent, lucid, agile, argumentative and articulate mind, fastidiously whimsical, witty in the matter of a metaphysical poet, *Newmanesque in sensitivity, incantatory in expression, and committed to a rational credal orthodoxy. He embodied a devotionally robust Anglican catholicism comparable to that of his peers, Kenneth Kirk (1886–1954), E. L. Mascall (1905–93) and C. S. *Lewis. He is difficult to read, for his informality of style, alternately musing and leaping, gives an appearance of waywardness to his tightest arguments.

His philosophical theology (Finite and Infinite, 1943; The Freedom of the Will, 1957; Love Almighty and Ills Unlimited, 1961; Faith and Speculation, 1964) has roots in both the substance-philosophy of medieval *scholasticism and the modern *metaphysics of action and clarification, based on linguistic usage (see *Religious language). His exegesis of Matthew, Mark and Revelation is heavily (some would say, fantastically) typological. In The Glass of Vision, 1948, he argued for *images rather than sentences as bearers of God's revealed truth.

Bibliography

C. C. Conti (ed.), Reflective Faith: Essays in Philosophical Theology (London, 1972); P. Curtis, A Hawk among Sparrows: A Biography of Austin Farrer (London, 1985); J. C. Eaton, The Logic of Theism: Analysis of the Thought of Austin Farrer (Lanham, 1983); J. C. Eaton and A. Loades (ed.), For God and Clarity: New Essays in Honor of Austin Farrer (Pittsburgh, 1983); D. Hein and E. H. Henderson

(eds.), Captured by the Crucified: The Practical Theology of Austin Farmer (London, 2004).

J. I. PACKER

FATHERHOOD OF GOD

Christian use of the name 'Father' in reference to God derives from Jesus' own use of the equivalent Aramaic term, Abba. Though not entirely without precedent in biblical Judaism (e.g. Isa. 63:16), the significance accorded its use by Jesus for the NT writers is signalled both by explicit remembrance of the Aramaic original even in clearly alien contexts (e.g. Rom. 8:15), and by the distinctive ways in which the name in Greek translation continues to be used. God is not only 'Father', and 'the Father' in the NT, but also, more tellingly, 'the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ', and 'our Father'.

The distinctive Christian doctrine of God the Father is closely bound up with this basic Christological reference. Hellenism could refer to Zeus as 'father', and Plato spoke of the divine 'father' and 'maker' of the universe in Timaeus 28c, in a text which greatly influenced Christian thought. The generic idea of the 'fatherhood of God', taken to be indicative of the divine creative power and providential care, owes much to these sources. The Christological reference implicit in NT usage, by contrast, has more specific implications: that there is a logical connection between the 'Son's' relation to God and ours; and that use of the name 'Father' must bear directly upon the substance of the Christian doctrine of God.

It was the burden of the trinitarian question elaborated in patristic theology to clarify the implications of biblical, liturgical and theological reference to God as 'Father' and 'Son'. The idea of the 'eternal generation' of the Son developed by *Origen in third-century *Alexandrian Christianity implied the eternity also of divine fatherhood, and rendered reference to the creative and providential activity of God in this context purely secondary and analogical. In the context of the *Arian crisis of the fourth century, this reasoning was further extended: central to *Athanasius' defence of the Nicene faith (see *Creeds), especially in his Orationes contra Arianos, was the claim that the Father-Son relation is in fact integral to the meaning of the word 'God'. Since God is eternally the Father of the Son, and since no creature can belong by nature to this relation, the Son can only be 'of one substance with the Father' (P. Widdicombe, The Fatherhood of God from Origen to Athanasius, pp. 159–222). In a complementary though distinctively Western argument, *Augustine later maintained that the name 'Father' is meaningful only to the extent that the name 'Son' is correlative with it, since the names of the persons strictly denote those eternal relations subsisting in God that have been opened to view in creation and redemption (e.g. Augustine, De Trinitate, VII). Modern Christianity, influenced by Enlightenment antipathy to the trinitarian question, has tended to conceive of God's 'fatherhood' mainly in terms of God's care for the world, but the concept in the older Christian tradition is fundamentally determined by these more strictly 'theological' concerns.

What the trinitarian dynamic also helps us to grasp is the basis upon which we call God 'Father'. This possibility rests not upon a generic divine attribute of fatherhood such as that of the Timaeus, or upon the naïve assertion that humans are all alike 'God's children', but rather, upon being drawn by the action of the Holy Spirit specifically into union with Jesus Christ, God's Son and our Lord, by virtue of union with whom we also are 'adopted' to become children ('sons') of God (see *Salvation). Thus in adoption we come to participate in the mutual love of the Father and the Son, not only being pardoned in justification, and being conformed to the image of Christ in discipleship, but also being made to share – though undoubtedly at a creaturely distance – the relations proper to the divine trinitarian life.

See also: CHRISTOLOGY; GOD; TRINITY.

Bibliography

J. Barr, 'Abba Isn't "Daddy"', JTS n.s. 39, 1988, pp. 28–47; J. Jeremias, The Prayers of Jesus (ET, London, 1967); A. F. Kimel, Jr (ed.), Speaking the Christian God (Grand Rapids and Leominster, 1992); K. Rahner, 'Theos in the New Testament', in K. Rahner, Theological Investigations, vol. 1 (ET, London, 1961); T. Smail, The Forgotten Father (London, 1980); P. Widdicombe, The Fatherhood of God from Origen to Athanasius (Oxford, 1994).

G. D. BADCOCK

FEDERAL THEOLOGY, see COVENANT

FELLOWSHIP

Seeking the restoration of communion with the divinity is a mark of our inclination toward the religious, an incurable feeling present in every human being. Contrary to secular pragmatism and scepticism, the Christian religion claims that the fellowship of human beings with the divinity is possible. The revelational and historic Christian sources assert the fundamental teaching that to have fellowship with the divinity (i.e. with an infinite and personal God) is the goal of human existence. The context that God the Creator decided for human beings to inhabit is the context of the *covenant, defined by the acceptance of a reciprocal relationship between God and humankind, with privileges and responsibilities (Gen. 3:8). We were not created to live in isolation, but in fellowship with other personal beings.

The concept of fellowship or communion (koinonia) is promoted by Christians mainly because of its participative and communitarian dimension. More precisely, in the Christian religion fellowship is defined in relationships. Therefore, the worship and fear of God, living in holiness and spreading unconditional love among people, trace the matrix in which one can rediscover real fulfilling fellowship, the objective testimony against present individualism and neopaganism.

Before everything else, the fellowship of believers is influenced and empowered by the model of the fellowship among the persons of the Holy *Trinity. The call of believers is to fellowship 'with the Father and with his Son, Jesus Christ' (1 John 1:3; 1 Cor. 1:9), and to 'the fellowship/communion of the Holy Spirit' (2 Cor. 13:14). The invitation refers to the experience of personal knowledge by *faith, and not to a mystical absorption or an ontological identification. That caused the Church Fathers to use a special term for this unique nature of relationship: perichoresis. Strictly speaking, the perichoretic relationship is the intimate relationship and reciprocal habitation of the persons in the Godhead: the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit. The specific dynamics of life in the Trinity suggests the prototype of the fellowship expected within the Christian community.

This life is possible because human beings were created after God's *image, which at the beginning included also the dimension of uncorrupted fellowship. The *fall of humankind distorted the divine image in themselves and the intimate relationship of creature and Creator. The constant longing of humankind for this communion is real, but the initiative for its accomplishment can come only from the divine. Therefore, any kind of fellowship enjoyed by human beings is a divine gift. At the centre of the Christian revelation stands the truth that by sharing/communication of God himself in the divine *Logos, in the person of Jesus Christ, he came to re-establish the initial state of fellowship. Therefore, anyone who enters into a real fellowship with the Son of God by faith can have fellowship with God the Father (John 1:1, 14, 18).

FATHERS, see PATRISTIC THEOLOGY

The trinitarian pattern of fellowship is made manifest in the ecclesial pattern. All those who answer to the divine call and enter into fellowship with the Son are integrated into the *church, 'the fellowship of the saints' (communio sanctorum). The restoration of personal fellowship with God brings the restoration of fellowship among believers through the work of the word and the Spirit. This new type of Christian communion manifested itself from the beginning of church history through a new form of *worship, prayer, Eucharist, teaching, edifying and sharing of goods (Acts 4:32–35; 1 Cor. 10:16–17). In the church, as the body of Christ, the principle of incorporation in the same body eliminates independence (1 Cor. 12), relationships come before activities, sharing comes before accumulating (Acts 2:46), and the harmony of fellowship is perfected in partnerships and common ministries (2 Cor. 8:3; Phlm. 6). Thus fellowship does not reduce itself to some common social activity, in which one interacts with the opinions, ideas or habits of others, but it embodies the perichoretic life of the Trinity in consecration, *ministry and sacrifice. The fellowship extends itself in public testimony, in *mission and social ministry, in generosity and collection, all proving to be a real investment in the context of covenant. Following the model of Jesus in his relationship with his disciples (cf. John 13:29), the fellowship of the church implies communitarian relationships through participation in the process of giving and receiving. Christians stay together because they share not only the spiritual, but also the material; not only the joys, but also the sorrows (Rom. 15:27; Phil. 1:7; 3:10; 4:15; 1 Pet. 4:13).

Finally, the ethical model gathers and actualizes the relational and the ecclesiastic models.

The condition of being partakers of the divine nature (2 Pet. 1:4) is to walk in the light (1 John 1:7). Fellowship and purity go together. You may enjoy authentic fellowship only if you live in the light, that is, in truth. To have authentic fellowship with God means to be open toward him, to refuse to live in darkness and decide to live in the light (cf. 1 Tim. 5:22).

See also: CHRISTIAN LIFE; DEIFICATION.

Bibliography

S. J. Grenz, Theology for the Community of God (Nashville, 1994); J. M. Lieu, The Theology of the Johannine Epistles (Cambridge, 1997); A. J. Torrance, Persons in Communion: An Essay on Trinitarian Description and Human Participation (Edinburgh, 1996); J. D. Zizioulas, Being as Communion: Studies in Personhood and the Church (London, 1985).

E. BARTOS

FEMINIST THEOLOGY

One of the first things to be noted in relation to 'feminist theology' is that we should, rather, talk of 'feminist theologies'. Although such theologies may have much in common (origins, concerns, methodologies), it is crucial to recognize distinct foundations, approaches and outcomes which may differentiate them. Feminist theology is an approach, or set of concerns, raising fundamental questions for Christian theology. Indeed, it might be said that it is the range of questions which is the common ground, but whether and where answers are found – and the nature of the answers – depends on the stance and approach being taken. It is a mistake to prejudice or dismiss feminist theology because of an assumption that it is one particular set or type of answers.

History and development

Within a circular hermeneutical model (ch. 1 of Sexism and God-Talk, London, 1983) Rosemary Ruether presents feminist theology as arising from a crisis faced by Christianity – a crisis comparable to that which led to the Reformation and which she understands as a disjunction between past tradition(s) and present experience's needs and questions. Tradition here is a broad term encompassing the 'codifications' which make up a religion: texts, beliefs, practices, doctrines, symbols, rituals, law codes, moral codes and so on; the 'shape' which a religion takes as it seeks to understand, explain and apply the initial revelatory experience(s) on which it is founded.

Each generation, Ruether argues, will inevitably approach and utilize religious traditions from the perspective of its own historically and culturally located experience. Of course, the nature and relative authority both of tradition and of our experience may be understood very differently, and we will return to this point below. However, it seems axiomatic that questions about *gender and *sexuality – like other issues, notably about race – arise out of the response of particular individuals and groups: 'but what about me?'

Feminist theology can thus also be seen as a significant case study of the ways in which Christianity might respond to the challenges of expressing Christian faith in a manner which is relevant and meaningful in specifically contemporary and culturally varied contexts (see *Contextualization).

This process has been very much related to global changes in the last two centuries. Paradigm shifts in relation to reform and equal rights movements may be related to earlier questioning and protest, but have been dramatically new in scale and in the pace of resultant change. It is also hard to overestimate the impact on theology of the participation of women in education and 'public life' in general. Christian faith was a key motivation for many of the nineteenth-century reformers, and it seems both inevitable and right that Christianity should continue to engage with and respond to these paradigm shifts and the contemporary issues which have emerged from them.

Women have, of course, always been centrally part of Christianity, and so, unsurprisingly, there have always been questions about gender. It is important to note that the questions raised by feminist theologies are not always or necessarily new questions. What has been new is the way in which gender has arguably become (for some) a way of approaching theology per se, rather than simply a concern of theology; a major determinant of the agenda, rather than simply a possible agenda item. This development can be seen as part of what has been described as a movement from 'first-wave' to 'second-wave' feminism.

The first wave of feminism emerged within the nineteenth-century political context of – and very much associated with – other movements such as those for the abolition of slavery and welfare reform. Its immediate impetus was concern over specific inequalities or exclusions (notably suffrage and education), and early feminist theology was similarly concerned with specific exclusions of women in the church, with campaigns for the ordination of women raising an increasingly far-ranging set of questions about *Scripture and tradition.

It is worth noting, however, that the work of Elizabeth Cady Stanton in the 1890s, with her assertion of the androcentric bias of the Bible, pre-empted some of the more 'second-wave' and radical concerns of the 1960s. Like feminism in general and like *liberation theologies to which it is related, feminist theology in this period turned its attention increasingly to fundamental and structural issues which were seen to underlie specific inequalities. Feminism began to discuss issues about female/male nature, *power, gender roles and stereotyping, and the concepts of sexism and patriarchy became central to much feminist analysis. The question had now been raised explicitly as to whether the specific gender inequalities identified within Christianity were also due to patriarchal assumptions and beliefs which might have shaped not only the practice of Christianity, but also the transmission and interpretation of Christian belief in texts and teaching. Such questions have led to re-examination of history and texts and to discussion about *hermeneutics, the nature of traditions and in fact the very way we understand God.

An early example of this development, regularly cited as both influential and indicative, was Valerie Saiving's article, 'The Human Situation: A Feminine View'. Her suggestion that Christian understanding of *sin has been shaped by particularly male perspectives and experience illustrates the impact within theology of the kinds of gender issues being raised in other discipline areas, and she draws specifically on the work of Margaret Mead. Some significant theologians of and after this period – such as Mary Daly and Daphne Hampson – would eventually conclude that Christianity was so essentially patriarchal as to be incompatible with feminism. Others – such as Kari Borrensen, Catharina Halkes and Rosemary Ruether – are convinced that the central truths of Christianity are not only compatible with feminist concern for equality and unity, but may provide a basis, resources and empowerment for such concern:

a 'place to stand' (Ruether, Sexism and God-Talk, p. 18).

Tasks

Feminist theology shares not only some of its origins and history with feminism, but also important aspects of its past and present preoccupations. The tasks with which feminist theologies engage range from specific, 'first-wave' concerns with particular roles and texts to 'second-wave' discussions such as those about traditional associations of women with nature and motherhood, or God-Talk.

Having identified feminist theology as arising from the crisis of disjunction between tradition and current experience and/or needs, Ruether sees it as inevitable and right that such crisis propels us to re-examine not only our experience and needs, but also tradition – the 'codifications' of religion.

There is a 'relativizing' element in feminist theology in recognition of the ways in which Christianity as a faith may be shaped by historical and cultural aspects. It questions how far the teachings, doctrines and practices of the church might have been distorted through and by the processes of codification, subject as they might be to a range of historical, cultural, political, personal and other influences. Whether or not this question is extended from church teaching and practice to include Scripture itself is a defining decision to be taken by any Christian thinker, and feminist theologians take a range of different views on this.

A useful example here is that of the ordination of women, since it uncovers questions from first and second waves of engagement. Initially, Christian thinkers sought to explore how women might be included in the existing ecclesiastical set-up, and whether leadership was necessarily male. They returned to their received traditions and sought biblical models of female leadership, sometimes re-examining the role of women among Jesus' first disciples and the earliest Christian church (such as the work of Elisabeth Fiorenza, In Memory of Her, London, 1996, and many other works), as well as the specific contested texts. They asked, 'Are there inclusive and egalitarian elements of the teaching and practice of Christ which have been lost or sidelined in the ways Christianity has developed and been practised?' From such engagements, Christian feminists argued for a pattern of inclusion and mutual submission as a true reflection of the intention, teaching and practice of Jesus Christ. Has the 'original revelatory experience' been obscured or even jettisoned in following centuries as later patriarchal contexts and their assumptions about gender roles became entrenched in the codifications of Christian tradition?

Second-wave questions took this interrogation further, asking what kind of ecclesial models would best reflect the 'original revelatory experience'. The ways in which these questions are answered have implications beyond ecclesiology (see *Church government). Approaches to church leadership reveal and reflect assumptions about the nature of the divine, the nature of priesthood, of authority, of what it fundamentally means to be male or female. Christian feminists found that received traditions, despite often claiming to be based only on Scripture, may in fact mask presuppositions about femininity and masculinity and ideas of propriety for which there is no clear Christian mandate.

This re-examination reflects a desire, according to Ruether, to 'go back' to the beginning, to set the original revelation against (some of) the possibly patriarchal ways in which Christianity has developed – and also to see how the original revelation might relate and speak to current experience and needs. There are varying views, of course, about the viability and possibility of such a 'return'.

Traditions or 'codification' are also re-examined with an interest in the ways in which it has reached us – not only the contents, but the process of transmission is under scrutiny. Is there important evidence about the role of women in early Christianity which is lost or obscured through the ways in which the texts have been written, assembled, translated and interpreted? Translation of key terms like diakonos and passages like those about Junia (Rom. 16:7) were identified early on as a crucial area for analysis. Furthermore, the omission of women from Paul's list of witnesses to the resurrection (1 Cor. 15), when set against the Gospel accounts to which women are central, raised new questions about the way in which the story has been told, and the kinds of factors which might have shaped its telling.

So feminist theologians talk frequently of the 'hermeneutics of suspicion'. It is necessary not only to re-examine the story, but also to be aware of who is telling the story and what differences that might make, a point that is relevant to all who interpret the Bible.

Importantly here, Christian feminism has sought to return to a theology where the person and teaching of *Jesus is central. Christian feminism has often been portrayed as the woeful ousting of Christocentric faith for something enshrining a secular ideology. As we have suggested, this would ignore and misrepresent the work of a great many Christian feminists who strive to unearth an original experience of Christianity where the practice and intention of Jesus Christ is central.

Feminist theology today

A century of concerted engagement with the findings and challenges of feminism has resulted in a spectrum of theological positions. In common with its secular equivalent, Christian feminism has both radical and liberal interpretations: those who desire a brand new order of human relationality, and those who seek equality within the existing schema. We can identify extreme positions and a number of mid-points. Most importantly, positions along the spectrum are determined by the weight given to experience and to tradition in shaping the resultant theology. Unfortunately, some critiques of feminist theology have focused on the two extremes, whereas most work done in relation to theology and gender in fact falls into the middle ground.

At one end of the spectrum, the radical frontier of Christian feminism, contemporary experience has the prerogative in deciding which elements of the Christian tradition are relevant and which should be rejected. Here some feminists have concluded that Christian tradition is ultimately inconsistent with the women's liberation movement. Viewed from this position, Christian feminism is an oxymoron. Having been examined and found wanting, some radical feminists suggest that Christianity should be rejected in favour of post-Christian spiritualities. This edge has been termed 'revolutionary', in that it finds the Christian tradition irredeemably patriarchal and oppressive and needing to be cast off in a radical way. This position is evident in the writings of Mary Daly (most famously in Beyond God the Father, London, ¹1986) and Daphne Hampson (Theology and Feminism; also After Christianity, London, ²2002).

At the other extreme, some Christian engagements with feminism have conversely privileged received traditions entirely over contemporary experience, rejecting the possibility that contemporary experience may question or shape Christian tradition at all. Feminism may be judged as aberrant and an alien intrusion of secular ideology into Christianity. Acute conservative positions view the Bible as instigating prescribed gender roles and an intractable worldview that must not be challenged. The gospel message is viewed as inseparable from the received traditions circumscribing it. Questioning tradition implies undermining the gospel itself. Given this, an attempt is made to allow received tradition to define contemporary experience fundamentally. At this end of the spectrum, engagement with feminism leads to the retrenchment of a supposed biblical worldview that is seen as under attack. W. Oddie's book What Will Happen to God? (San Francisco, ²1993) is a good introduction to views at this end of the spectrum.

For both the radical and the acutely conservative, there is a tendency towards an either/or mentality in the interaction between received tradition and contemporary experience. The majority of Christian responses to feminism fall somewhere between these positions and involve a process of mediation between experience and tradition. Here, within what have been termed 'reformist' responses, there is the recognition that the Christian *gospel holds an indispensable role in human liberation, possessing a means to combat oppression and injustice in all its forms. While upholding the unique liberatory potential of the gospel, reformist Christian feminists accept that this gospel has been filtered through human experience and invariably marked by the sinful effects of centuries of patriarchy. As such, this received tradition requires interrogation and reformulation. The interface between Christianity and feminism gives rise to a process of deconstruction where the gospel's emancipatory power is to be uncovered and reclaimed like a 'golden thread'; a process that leads not to destruction, but to expression of a renewed Christian tradition. (The term 'golden thread' is Hampson's, Theology and Feminism, pp. 25ff.) Such reformist positions are held (in quite different ways) by many notable theologians, including Rosemary Radford Ruether, Sallie McFague and Elaine Storkey.

Emerging themes

Christian feminism is at the forefront of engaging with twenty-first-century issues, foremost of which are environmental concerns, an appreciation of the relevance of ethnicity and race to theory, and the challenges of post-modernity. We believe that that there is a methodological capacity within Christian feminism that makes it an efficient respondent to changing concerns. Lessons learned in the deconstruction of the codifications of traditions and in hermeneutics of suspicion in the twentieth century make it well placed to engage with twenty-first-century interests.

First, contemporary Christian feminists form part of the vanguard relating theology to *ecology, giving rise to a movement termed 'Christian eco-feminism'. Rosemary Ruether, Sallie McFague and Celia Deane-Drummond are notable in exploring this interface. They identify ways in which roots of ecological destruction are linked to those of social oppression. The solution to both the oppression of women and the earth is to be found in a holistic, anti-hierarchical paradigm available through a renewed Christianity. Christian feminists contend that spiritual conflict and sin, structural as well as individual, lie at the heart of ecological exploitation. They identify the root causes of oppression and offer spiritual as well as practical solutions, a concern shared by some other ecologists who identify a link between environmental concern, gender and spirituality. From this engagement, Christian eco-feminists draw both ethical implications concerning the way we live in our environment and a theological model of an organic relationship between God and the world.

A second twenty-first-century concern has been the recognition of the global context for faith. Within feminism, there is a growing appreciation of the way in which women's experiences are shaped by *race or ethnicity and that many women have suffered a double oppression. *Black and Asian women theologians respond negatively not only to exclusion from patriarchal and Eurocentric forms of religion, but also in identifying a further exclusion from Western feminist theologies. They recognize the need for black women to find their own voice, insisting on the importance of particularity in resistance to universalizing and essentialist tendencies they identify within Western feminism, which should not claim to speak for them. Accordingly, they have taken it upon themselves to reapprehend Scripture and tradition in light of their own experiences. Some of these approaches have been termed 'womanist', and Mercy Oduyoye and Chung Hyun Kyung are foremost examples. *Womanist writers have been especially interested in using literature, exploring the role and power of narrative in theology and faith, and celebrating culture as an expression of their religious, black, female identity.

Perhaps this willingness to listen to the voices beyond the master narrative has also equipped Christian feminism, thirdly, with a means to engage with the challenge of *postmodernism. Today multiculturalism and diversity provide the framework for political, cultural and social theories. All have been required to consider voices from the margins and resist imposing a false hegemony. This global context for faith, coupled with post-structuralist theories of language (see *Deconstructionism) and the dissipation of meaning, have shaped a twenty-first-century paradigm that has become termed 'postmodernity'. In relating to this context, some Christian feminists have found an ally in postmodern theory as they dismantle the rigidity of universalism and the hierarchies imposed by dualistic thinking. This is evident in the writing of Maggie Kin, Susan M. St Ville and Susan M. Simonaitis. Such theorists extend critique of patriarchy and *modernism to encompass feminism itself, suggesting that all universal categories are oppressive. They use a post-structural philosophy of language and discourse theory to argue for a plurality of perspectives. Others are more suspicious of the tenets of postmodernism, especially the notion that meaning is purely constructed in language. Elaine Storkey (Created or Constructed?) provides an introductory overview of feminist theology's engagement with post-feminist and post-structuralist approaches. In engaging with postmodernism, Christian feminists have joined the debate as to the place of psychoanalysis within theories of subjectivity, the nature of epistemology, the relationship between gender and sex, and the decentring of heterosexuality.

In all these areas of discussion we see the full spectrum of possibilities in relating experience and tradition. We also see the breadth which might be encompassed in the term 'feminist theology' and the scope of its concerns and possibilities. Christian feminist theologians are committed to the task of interpreting Christianity for a contemporary audience, and the questions they raise as they weigh contemporary experience and received tradition are precisely those which confront all those seeking to present an authentic Christian faith for the twenty-first century.

Bibliography

D. Carmody, Christian Feminist Theology (Oxford, 1995); E. S. Fiorenza, In Memory of Her (London, ²1996); D. Hampson, Theology and Feminism (Oxford, 1990); U. King, Feminist Theology from the Third World: A Reader (Oxford, 1994); M. van Leeuwen (ed.), After Eden (Paternoster, 1996); A. Loades (ed.), Feminist Theology: A Reader (London, 1996); S. McFague, Models of God (London, 1987); R. Muers, 'Feminism, Gender, and Theology', in D. F. Ford (ed.), The Modern Theologians (Oxford, Malden, MA and Victoria, ³2005); R. R. Ruether, Women and Redemption (London, 1998); V. Saiving, 'The Human Situation: A Feminine View', The Journal of Religion 49, 1960, pp. 100–112; E. Storkey, Created or Constructed? (Paternoster, 2000).

S. E. ALSFORD AND S. MANN

FEUERBACH, LUDWIG ANDREAS (1804–72)

Feuerbach was the best-known nineteenth-century proponent of the view that *religion arises as a projection of human aspirations. After study with *Hegel in Berlin (and several years as a convinced Hegelian), Feuerbach underwent a philosophical conversion. The result appeared first in The Essence of Christianity (1841) and then in a series of works which explicated both his anti-Hegelianism and his distinctive convictions about religion. Feuerbach's arguments rested upon a post-Kantian conception of reality. That is, since we cannot know the world in itself, our minds contribute to our conception of what actually exists. Feuerbach also drew on *Schleiermacher's assertion that religion consists in an inner conviction, or sense, of absolute dependence. Feuerbach, however, differed from *Kant and Schleiermacher, who were *theists. He insisted that if these thinkers are correct, they demonstrate that all our supposed knowledge of God is merely an enlargement of ideas about ourselves and human experience. 'God,' Feuerbach wrote in 1841, 'is himself the realized wish of the heart, the wish exalted to the certainty of its fulfilment . . . the secret of theology is nothing else than anthropology – the knowledge of God nothing else than a knowledge of man!' (Essence of Christianity, pp. 121, 207). Thus, when humans talk about their God or religion, they do nothing more than abstract and externalize their own experience. Feuerbach claimed the support of *Luther, since Luther had emphasized the way in which God expressed his divinity in human qualities through the incarnation. Feuerbach also went further to make a general statement about the basis of reality. Against Hegel, who postulated ideas or intelligence as the foundation, Feuerbach contended that 'Nature, Matter, cannot be explained as a result of intelligence; on the contrary, it is the basis of intelligence. . . . Consciousness develops itself only out of nature' (Essence of Christianity, p. 87). Feuerbach felt that the *atheism which resulted from his views was not a message of despair, but a testimony to the nobility of humanity. If humans could project such an ennobling and altruistic faith as Christianity, this spoke very well indeed for the quality of humanity itself.

Feuerbach's ideas had a significant influence on Karl *Marx and Friedrich Engels, who drew from him the belief that the material realm is the basis for all ideology. For Marx, Feuerbach established true materialism and true science by demonstrating that human social experience establishes our conception of humankind. Yet Marx also criticized Feuerbach for not breaking cleanly enough with Hegel. The key for Marx was not idealized humanity, but people in their concrete social and economic relationships. Feuerbach's influence can also be seen in Sigmund Freud's treatment of religion as an 'illusion', and in Martin *Buber's concentration upon inter-human relationships as the source of knowledge and ethics.

The mark of Feuerbach was especially great on twentieth-century theology. Radical thinkers such as John A. T. *Robinson concede that 'in a real sense Feuerbach was right in wanting to translate "theology" into "anthropology"' (Honest to God, London, 1963, p. 50). Other theologians have contended against Feuerbach. Chief among these was Karl *Barth, whose insistence upon God's transcendence is, among other things, an effort to repudiate Feuerbach. When Barth denies the value of *natural theology, and when he contends that Christianity is not a religion, he is responding to Feuerbach's description of faith as mere human projection. The seriousness of Barth's response to Feuerbach suggests that while the latter's human-centred atheism is important for understanding nineteenth-century German philosophical history, it is even more important as a continuing challenge to those who believe in divine *revelation, the *supernatural and the otherness of God.

Bibliography

Works: The Essence of Christianity, tr. G. Eliot (New York, 1957); The Essence of Faith According to Luther (ET, New York, 1967).

Studies: K. Barth, Protestant Thought from Rousseau to Ritschl (ET, New York, 1959); M. Buber, 'What Is Man?' in Between Man and Man, tr. R. G. Smith (Boston, 1955); V. A. Harvey, et al., Feuerbach and the Interpretation of Religion (Cambridge, 1997); K. Marx, 'Theses on Feuerbach' (1845), in Marx and Engels on Religion (ET, New York, 1964); E. Schmidt, 'Ludwig Feuerbachs Lehre von der Religion', Neue Zeitschrift für systematische Theologie und Religionsphilosophie 8 (1966), pp. 1–35.

M. A. NOLL

FICHTE, JOHANN GOTTLIEB (1762–1814)

Fichte was one of the founders of *German idealism. In his main philosophical works he attempted to provide a rigorous philosophical foundation for Immanuel *Kant's (1724–1804) critical philosophy. His philosophy of religion was in many ways similar to Kant's, especially in identifying the substance of religion with morality and in deriving religious belief from the demands of the moral life. Accordingly, he argued that any supposed historical revelation of God must be judged by whether the content of the alleged revelation agrees with the content of the moral law. Revelation, therefore, adds nothing to morality; its purpose is to motivate us to perform our moral duties. This emphasis on morality is due to the driving force of Fichte's philosophy, the need to vindicate the claims of human freedom over against philosophical theories of naturalism and determinism, especially that of Benedict *Spinoza (1632–77). Fichte achieved public notoriety in 1798–99 when charges of atheism arose in the wake of some his published works. Although Fichte was not an atheist, he did hold that God cannot be regarded as personal or self-conscious. Instead, he presented God as the creative ground of the universe's moral order.

We are not able to form a clear conception of this ground, although Fichte referred to it as reason, will, life and being.

Bibliography

Works: Attempt at a Critique of All Revelation, tr. G. Green (Cambridge, 1978); The Vocation of Man, tr. P. Preuss (Indianapolis, 1987); 'The Basis of Our Belief in a Divine Governance of the World', tr. D. Breazeale, in Introductions to the Wissenschaftslehre and Other Writings (1797–1800) (Indianapolis, 1994); D. Breazeale (ed.), The Popular Works of Johann Gottlieb Fichte, tr. W. Smith (London, facsimile edn, 1999).

Studies: D. Breazeale and T. Rockmore (eds.), Fichte: Historical Context/Contemporary Controversies (Atlantic Highlands, 1993); idem (eds.), New Perspectives on Fichte (Atlantic Highlands, 1996).

S. M. POWELL

FIDEISM

Fideism is the view that an appropriate basis of belief, including religious belief, is not the intellect, but the will, or perhaps the emotions or preferences. Thus *Pascal claims that it is reasonable, in the absence of compelling evidence, to wager on God's existence, since more is lost if God exists and one fails to believe in him than if he does not exist and one believes. William *James argued that one may believe (in the absence of sufficient evidence) if the choice is live (one that arises out of present beliefs and desires), forced (that is, one cannot avoid making a choice), and momentous. As can be seen from these cases, fideism is not necessarily irrational, since there may be 'second-order' reasons for being fideistic. However, fideism depends on the controversial claim that belief may depend on the *will. The problem is: If I have good reason for believing that today is Thursday, how can I 'will to believe' that it is Friday? However, this objection does not rule out that one may set oneself to believe some proposition over a longer period, by choosing to concentrate on certain factors (e.g. that such a proposition is comfortable), and by neglecting others (e.g. the evidence against it).

Bibliography

W. Clifford, 'The Ethics of Belief', in Lectures and Essays II (London, 1879); P. Helm, Belief

Policies (Cambridge, 1994); W. James, 'The Will to Believe', The Will to Believe and Other Essays (New York, 1917); S. Kierkegaard, Concluding Unscientific Postscript to 'Philosophical Fragments', ed. and tr. H. V. Hong and E. H. Hong (Princeton, 1991); B. Pascal, The Pensées, tr. J. M. Cohen (London, 1961).

P. HELM

FILARET (PHILARET) DROZDOV (1782–1867)

A *Russian Orthodox theologian and churchman, Filaret was a monk who, after teaching biblical studies, theology and philosophy at St Petersburg, became archbishop (1821) and metropolitan (1826) of Moscow. Through his lectures and sermons, and his Christian *Catechism of the Orthodox Catholic Eastern Greco-Russian Church (1823), he exercised a wide influence on nineteenth-century Russian theology. Having assimilated Protestant elements in his youth (especially from the works of Feofan Prokopovich, 1681–1736), he exemplified an intense biblicism (which led to attempts to purge his Catechism of its 'Lutheranism'). He keenly supported Bible Society work, dissented from declarations that Western Christians were heretics, and reflected the abandonment of the *scholastic style in theology in favour of the *patristic. He was enormously influential in affairs of church and state, despite the restrictive rule of Nicholas I (1825–55), which he survived long enough to become the honoured author of the 1861 manifesto emancipating Russia's peasants from serfdom. He was canonized by the Russian Orthodox Church in 1994.

Bibliography

ET of Catechism in P. Schaff, The Creeds of Christendom, vol. 2 (New York, 1877), pp. 445–542; G. Florovsky, Ways of Russian Theology, Part One (Collected Works, vol. 5: Belmont, 1979).

D. F. WRIGHT

FILIOQUE, see CREEDS; EASTERN ORTHODOX THEOLOGY; HOLY SPIRIT; TRINITY

FINNEY, CHARLES GRANDISON (1792–1875)

For Finney, the 'father of modern revivalism', the doing of theology was always an eminently practical matter. Whether serving as itinerant evangelist, pastor, professor of theology or college president, his fundamental goal remained the same: to secure the *conversion of sinners and to set them to work in preparing the way for the coming *millennial kingdom.

Finney was trained as a lawyer, but after his dramatic conversion in 1821 sought ordination in the Presbyterian Church and began his labours as a missionary to the settlers of upstate New York. Using such 'new measures' as the anxious seat, protracted meetings and allowing women to pray in public, a series of *revivals soon began to sweep across that region with such frequency that it came to be known as the 'Burned-over District'. Although Finney was involved in promoting revivals throughout his lifetime, even travelling to England for that purpose (1849–50, 1859–60), the period 1824–32 remained the high-water mark of his revival career.

When illness began to curtail his travels, he became pastor of the Chatham Street Chapel in New York. He subsequently held pastorates at the Broadway Tabernacle of New York (1836–7) and the First Congregational Church of Oberlin, Ohio (1837–72). In 1835 he became professor of theology at the newly formed Oberlin Collegiate Institute in Ohio (now Oberlin College). He later served as president of Oberlin College (1851–66).

Theologically, Finney is best described as a New School Calvinist (see *New Haven theology). His preaching and teaching, always pointed and dramatic, stressed the moral government of God, human ability to repent and create new hearts, the perfectibility of human nature and society, and the need for Christians to apply their faith to daily living. For Finney, this included the investment of one's time and energy in establishing the millennial kingdom of God on earth by winning converts and involving oneself in social reform (including anti-slavery, temperance and the like).

Throughout his lifetime, Finney produced a variety of books, sermon collections and articles. Among the more important were his Lectures on Revivals of Religion (1835; repr., ed. W. G. McLoughlin, Cambridge, MA, 1960), a kind of manual on how to lead revivals; his Lectures on Systematic Theology (Oberlin, 1846), reflecting his special brand of ‘*Arminianized Calvinism’, and his Memoirs (1876), recounting his involvement in the great revivals of the earlier nineteenth century.

Bibliography

C. E. Hambrick-Stowe, Charles G. Finney and the Spirit of American Evangelicalism (Grand Rapids, 1996); K. J. Hardman, Charles Grandison Finney (1792–1875) (Syracuse, 1987); W. G. McLoughlin, Jr, Modern Revivalism: Charles Grandison Finney to Billy Graham (New York, 1959); G. M. Rosell, ‘Charles G. Finney: His Place in the Stream of Evangelicalism’, in L. I. Sweet (ed.), The Evangelical Tradition in America (Macon, 1984).

G. M. ROSELL

FIorenza, ELISABETH SCHÜSSLER (b. 1938)

Elisabeth Fiorenza is a leading feminist theologian renowned for her pioneering work in biblical interpretation. Born in Romania, fleeing to West Germany during the Second World War, Fiorenza remained committed to *Roman Catholic theology, becoming the first woman to take the licentiate in practical theology at the University of Würzburg (1962). She is the Krister Stendahl Professor of Divinity at Harvard Divinity School, having lectured previously at the University of Notre Dame and the Episcopal Divinity School in Cambridge, Massachusetts. She is co-founder and editor of the Journal of Feminist Studies in Religion, co-editor of Concilium, and the first woman to be elected as president of the Society of Biblical Literature (1987). She has published widely and is best known for her ground-breaking book In Memory of Her: A Feminist Theological Reconstruction of Christian Origins (1983, translated into twelve languages).

In Memory of Her argues for a feminist biblical *hermeneutic that questions the authority and use of the biblical text. Informed by the feminist critique of androcentrism and *Foucault’s account of the extent to which historical narratives reflect underlying power struggles, Fiorenza questions the traditional interpretation of Christian origins. Hence, by rereading the text ‘in a different key’, Fiorenza reconstructs Christian *history in order to de-naturalize female subordination. On the grounds that traditional interpretations of the texts reflect androcentrism and since there is a lack of proof concerning the non-participation of females in history, she supposes that it is ‘possible’ that females contributed to the shaping of the early church. Thus, by employing a fluid notion of the canon and by conceiving of the Jesus movement as a ‘discipleship of equals’, Fiorenza is able to reconcile feminism and Christianity. In Bread Not Stone she examines the Bible as a dual resource for female empowerment and continued victimization, while But She Said contains the radical assertion that biblical texts which fail to liberate oppressed groups are untrue or misinterpreted. From the 1990s Fiorenza has been leading the way with her use of the terms ‘kyriarchy’ (master-rule) rather than patriarchy to acknowledge a multiplicity of oppressions and oppressors, ‘G*d’ to highlight the inadequacy of androcentric god-language, ‘wo/men’ to avoid implying that all women have the same experience, and the biblical ekklēsia (assembly) rather than church (belonging to lord/master) to emphasize equality.

Fiorenza’s critics accuse her of finding more egalitarianism in the early church than is warranted, but this criticism misses the point, since her aim is to highlight the political, cultural and ethnic biases that are at work in the transmission of history and serve to legitimate patriarchal structures in the Christian religion: thus, Fiorenza insists that all accounts of Christian origins, whether feminist or traditional, are constructions rather than historical facts. Consequently, her corpus is a formidable challenge to readings of the biblical text that marginalize women’s place in church and theology; she calls them to account both in terms of the gendered history on which they are founded and in respect of the political values they continue to advocate.

See also: FEMINIST THEOLOGY; GENDER.

Bibliography

Works: In Memory of Her: A Feminist Theological Reconstruction of Christian Origins (London and New York, 1983); Bread Not Stone: The Challenge of Feminist Biblical Interpretation (Boston, 1984); But She Said: Feminist Practices of Biblical Interpretation (Boston, 1992); Discipleship of Equals: A Critical Feminist Ekklēsia-logy of Liberation (London, 1993); Jesus: Miriam’s Child, Sophia's Prophet – Issues in Feminist Christology (London, 1994); Jesus and the Politics of Interpretation (New York and London, 2000).

Florovsky and the Russian Religious Renaissance (Oxford, 2013).

A. LOUTH

E. MCINTOSH

FORGIVENESS, see GUILT AND FORGIVENESS

FLACIUS, see LUTHERANISM

FLOROVSKY, GEORGES (1893–1979)

Georges Florovsky was born in 1893, the son of a Russian priest. He graduated in arts from Odessa University in 1916, and later lectured there. He left Russia in 1920, first for Sofia and then for Prague, where he lectured in law 1922–6. In 1926 he became Professor of Patristics at the Institut St-Serge in Paris, being ordained priest in 1932. After the Second World War, he moved to the United States, and became the Dean of St Vladimir's Orthodox Theological Seminary 1948–55, then taught at Harvard 1956–64, and at Princeton from 1964.

His patristic scholarship is mostly found in his Paris lectures, published in the 1930s. His greatest scholarly work was his Ways of Russian Theology (1937), which gave a doleful account of Russian theology, subject to a 'Babylonian captivity' of the West, reaching its apogee in the religious thought of his contemporary émigrés. Russian theology needed to embrace a patristic 'Christian Hellenism': a 'Neo-patristic synthesis', as he came to call it, that is, a theology recovering the insights of the Greek Church Fathers from the Apostolic Fathers to St Gregory Palamas. Although he had reservations about some aspects of the inchoate *ecumenical movement, he came to be deeply involved in it and was one of the architects of the theological statement endorsed at the first meeting of the *World Council of Churches at Amsterdam in 1948. During his time in the States he became an immensely revered Orthodox voice on the theological scene.

See also: RUSSIAN ORTHODOX THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

Works: Collected Works, ed. R. S. Haugh, 14 vols. (Vaduz, 1987–9).

Studies: A. Blane (ed.), Georges Florovsky: Russian Intellectual, Orthodox Churchman (Crestwood, 1993); P. L. Gavrilyuk, Georges

FORMULA OF CONCORD

The Formula of Concord is a confessional document devised in 1577 to resolve several doctrinal disputes among Lutherans that arose shortly after the death of Martin Luther. To a large extent, these disputes were prompted by different reactions to the resurgence of Catholicism (see *Reformation, Catholic Counter-) and the spread of Calvinism (see *Reformed theology) in Germany during that era. One party of theologians, known as the Gnesio-Lutherans, argued that the Philip-pists, another group widely influenced by the teachings of Luther's co-worker Philipp *Melancthon, were endangering the purity of the Lutheran movement by their openness to ideas more closely associated with those other competing theological traditions. The most important disagreements concerned the role of the will and the significance of good works in the process of salvation, as well as the nature of Christ's presence in the Lord's Supper.

In defence of the stress on salvation by grace expressed in 1530 in the *Augsburg Confession, the Formula of Concord noted more explicitly that the human *will, after the fall, is unable to do anything to render itself fit to receive grace. The Formula condemned some Philippists who suggested that the will was able to cooperate, though weakly, with grace, and some Gnesio-Lutherans, on the opposite extreme, who declared that human nature was so substantially infused with original sin that it no longer bore a trace of the image of God.

Martin *Chemnitz and Jakob Andreae, the mediating theologians who composed the Formula of Concord, condemned radical statements made by some Philippists and Gnesio-Lutherans who, in the heat of debate, had argued that good works were either necessary for, or harmful to, salvation. Concerned to avoid both works-righteousness and moral irresponsibility, they stated more simply that good works will surely follow true faith.

On the issue of the Lord's Supper (see *Eucharist), the Formula of Concord sought to differentiate more clearly between the theology of the Swiss Reformers and the Lutherans. In contrast to Calvin and some Philippist Lutherans, it specified that both true believers and unbelievers receive the true body and blood of Christ by mouth along with the sacramental bread and wine.

The Formula of Concord never received as wide an official endorsement among Lutheran churches as the Augsburg Confession, but in 1580 it was included in the Book of Concord, the collection of confessional writings that continues to be the most authoritative standard of theology for the majority of Lutherans down to the present.

See also: CONFESSIONS OF FAITH; LUTHERANISM AND LUTHERAN THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

The Book of Concord: The Confessions of the Evangelical Lutheran Church, eds. R. Kolb and T. Wengert (Minneapolis, 2000).

Studies: F. Bente, Historical Introductions to the Book of Concord (St Louis, 1965 [1921]); E. Klug and O. Stahlke, Getting into the Formula of Concord (St Louis, 1977).

E. LUND

FORSYTH, PETER TAYLOR (1848–1921)

Forsyth was born and educated in Aberdeen in Scotland. On advice from his friend William Robertson Smith, he studied theology under *Ritschl at Göttingen, then at New College, London, after which he spent the rest of his life as a pastor and theologian. Both words are required to explain the power and passion of Forsyth's theological oeuvre. He was Congregational pastor for twenty-five years in Shipley (1876), Manchester (1885), Leicester (1888) and Cambridge (1894), followed by twenty years as Principal of Hackney College in London. In 1899 and 1907 he visited the United States, in 1905 was Chairman of the Congregational Union, and in 1910 was appointed Dean of the London Faculty of Theology.

During his early pastoral years his theological position moved from liberal theologian heavily indebted to German thought, and impatient with traditional formulations of doctrine, to that of 'classical Christianity' with an enduring focus on the *cross as the 'magnetic north' on the Christian compass. The consequences of Forsyth's theological and personal 'conversion' was an abandonment of earlier humanistic ideas, while retaining the tools of liberal higher criticism used now with discriminating purpose (see *Liberalism and conservatism in theology). In 1896 the potent mix of critical scholarship, personal tragedy on the death of his wife, and evangelical experience were distilled into an address entitled 'The Holy Father', in which Forsyth announced the main emphases of his future theological manifesto.

From 1897 when The Holy Father and the Living Christ was published, until 1918 when his last book This Life and the Next was issued, Forsyth produced a steady flow of constructive, pastoral, occasional and at times polemical theological publications. The range of interest and subjects indicates the non-systematic but contextually engaged style of Forsyth's theology. He wrote important, original constructive treatments of the *atonement and *Christology; presented fresh construals of ecclesiology and the sacraments combined with bold statements on issues of church relations and polity; produced bracing and robust reflections on prayer and spirituality which while eschewing mystical speculation do not lack a sense of the profound, transformative power of encounter with God in Christ; and his lectures on preaching and art indicate the breadth and depth of Forsyth's awareness of the pastoral realities and *cultural constraints that must inform and challenge contemporary articulation and proclamation of the gospel. There is no discernible overarching programme in Forsyth's theological writing and development other than the pervasive, recurring attention he pays to the cross as the work of Christ.

Forsyth's secure grasp and trenchant expression of both evangelical essentials and critical scholarship made him a key opponent of R. J. Campbell's so-called New Theology, and a recognized theological leader within and beyond English *Congregationalism. Gratefully confessing that he had been turned 'from a love of God to an object of *grace', his emphases in some respects anticipated Barth. The objectivity and primacy of grace, the 'Christological concentration' on Jesus Christ crucified and risen as the centre of theology and revelation, and biblical exegesis as the primary basis and essential content of dogmatics, are emphases shared by the two theologians without traceable dependence.

Like his contemporary, James *Denney, Forsyth presented the atonement as a reality beyond the conceptual control of one theory. Reconciliation, judgment, substitution, victory, regeneration, sacrifice and satisfaction provide a complex nexus of ideas that are woven together into a continuing exposition of the cross. However, in seeking an understanding of atonement adequate to its significance for Christian faith, the holy love of God became both the dogmatic background and kerygmatic foreground of Forsyth's exposition (see especially The Cruciality of the Cross and The Work of Christ). Rejecting any sentimental or 'soft' view of divine love and Fatherhood, and dismissive of reductionist views of sin to psychological or social forces, he insisted on the ontological reality and radical moral and eternal consequences of sin. 'Do not say God is love. Why atone? . . . The New Testament says God has atoned! What love! . . . you can go behind love to holiness, but behind holiness you cannot go.' The purpose of God in the cross was to redeem, to create a new moral order through 'the Son's sinless obedience and the Father's, holy satisfaction' (L. McCurdy, Attributes and Atonement).

The cruciality of the cross derives, for Forsyth, from the centrality of Christ as God's self-revelation of holy love, the overcoming of sin by 'a holy God, self-atoned in Christ [as] the centre of the world'. In his Christology (particularly The Person and Place of Jesus Christ), Forsyth explored a form of *kenosis which sought to do justice to divine immutability and the reality of God incarnate in Christ, primarily by asserting the crucial connection between incarnation and atonement, and by balancing divine kenosis with the notion of divine plerosis, 'making dogmatic room for Christ's growth in grace, personality and achievement until he was filled with the fullness of God' (McCurdy, Attributes and Atonement).

'Love is only divine as it is holy; and spirituality is Christian only as it meets the conditions of holy love in the way the cross did, as the crisis of holy judgement and holy grace.' In Christian Perfection and The Soul of Prayer Forsyth expounded Christian *spirituality as a matter of will directed to obedience, as inner moral urgency generated by grace finds expression in an outward and active engagement with the world. Rather than contemplative cultivation of spiritual experience, Forsyth urged the energizing exertion of will, wrestling with God, because 'resisting His will may be doing His will', and 'our soul is fulfilled if our petition is not'. Unanswered prayer is never a reason for thinking ill of God: 'He says no in the spirit of yes.' Through prayer moral personality is renewed in the regular encounter of the soul with the God who is Holy Love. The cross gives prayer its guarantees and its moral power. Thus the Christian life is 'repentant praise', because 'we confess much more than sin – a Saviour to our own worst depths and to the wide ends of the earth'.

In his thinking and writing, Forsyth ranged widely across cultural and theological fields. Almost a third of his library included German theologians, amongst them Ritschl, *Kähler, Zahn and *Schlatter. He expressed conscious indebtedness to the great Congregational Puritans, *Owen and *Goodwin, whose writings 'not only tingle, they soar', and live on in the spiritual life. From English theologians such as Maurice, Forsyth derived important insights on the nature of faith, and from Dale a permanent conviction of the centrality of Jesus in constructive theology of the atonement, and the cross as the primary focus of Christian theology. An early reader of the astringent *Kierkegaard, appreciative of *Pascal's epigrammatic fire, suspicious of mysticism 'used as the sufficient basis of religious certainty for a whole church', he nevertheless insisted, 'Bernard is my favourite saint and his Canticles a great delight.' The poets were read with receptive admiration (Dora Greenwell, a favourite), with critical appreciation (Browning) or outright disagreement (Whittier). The mind of Forsyth was both free-ranging and theologically assimilative, but to the powerfully centred end of expounding the person and work of Christ in terms that, while never adequate, would at least seek 'to stretch to the measure of eternal things without breaking under us somewhere'.

The theology of Forsyth continues to inspire postgraduate research and theological reflection in such contemporary writers as Fiddes, *Gunton, *Bloesch.

Bibliography

Works: The Work of Christ (London, 1938); The Person and Place of Jesus Christ

(London, 1946); The Church and the Sacraments (London, 1947); The Cruciality of the Cross (London, 1948); Positive Preaching and the Modern Mind (London, 1949); The Soul of Prayer (London, 1949); The Holy Father and the Living Christ (London, 1957); Christ on Parnassus (London, 1959); The Church, The Gospel and Society (London, 1962).

Studies: W. L. Bradley, P. T. Forsyth, The Man and His Work (London, 1952); J. M. Gordon, 'Peter Taylor Forsyth and Alexander Whyte', in J. M. Gordon, Evangelical Spirituality. From the Wesleys to John Stott (London, 1991); T. Hart (ed.), Justice the True and Only Mercy: Essays on the Life and Theology of P. T. Forsyth (Edinburgh, 1995); M. Husbands, 'Forsyth, P. T.', in BDE; L. McCurdy, Attributes and Atonement. The Holy Love of God in the Theology of P. T. Forsyth (Carlisle, 1999). With comprehensive bibliography; L. McCurdy, 'Forsyth, P. T.', in DHT.

J. GORDON

FOUCAULT, MICHEL (1926–84)

Michel Foucault, a philosopher and historian, is best known for exploring the ubiquity of power relationships in *modernity. In his surveys of the asylum, healthcare, prisons and sexuality, he argues that what masquerades as truth or rationality is in fact procedures of power. In Madness and Civilization (1961), he undertakes a historical enquiry into how madness has been managed across the centuries. He argues that though the modern age appears as more enlightened – in that it no longer simply incarcerated the insane, but sought to treat them – the reality was that we merely substituted one form of imprisonment for another. In The Order of Things (1966), his analysis of knowledge charts a series of 'epistemes' or guiding frameworks, in which our categorization and thinking take place. His conclusion is that knowledge is 'culture-bound instead of universal, epoch-relative instead of cumulative . . . no more than our persistent self-delusion'. Foucault is frequently accused of inconsistency for this apparent 'universal' critique of universal knowledge. However, he is best understood as providing a critique 'from within'. His later works emphasized the development of the self, drawing on Greek and early Christian literature to address issues such as confession and conscience, especially in relation to sexuality.

Bibliography

P. Rainbow (ed.), The Foucault Reader (London, 1984); J. K. A. Smith, Who's Afraid of Postmodernism? (Grand Rapids, 2006).

J. THACKER

FOUNDATIONALISM

Foundationalism is a term from the theory of knowledge concerning how beliefs become rationally acceptable (or justified), which has developed wider application to other disciplines, including theology.

Narrowly conceived, foundationalism is a dominant family of views in Western thought which affirm that knowledge-beliefs are of two sorts: basic beliefs, which do not receive rational support from other beliefs, and non-basic beliefs, which are inferred from other beliefs. The architectural metaphor of a 'foundation' comes from the fact that inferred beliefs are based or grounded on basic beliefs. The critical aspect of any foundationalist theory concerns its criteria for basic beliefs as those beliefs which do not require inference from other beliefs to ground knowledge. The dual attraction of foundationalism is its ability to halt scepticism by providing a stopping point in the justification process and its common sense acknowledgment that some non-inferential beliefs are rationally appropriate. Following René *Descartes, modern foundationalists believed that basic beliefs must possess an infallible guarantee of truth. The majority of Western philosophers now reject this view, opting instead for a modified foundationalism, because modern foundationalism is overly restrictive to the point of failing its own test for knowledge. Modest foundationalists believe that basic beliefs are fallible, providing a basis for knowledge that is defeasible, or able to be defeated or revised in light of further evidence.

In theology, foundationalism is a broader, somewhat contestable term referring to Western Christian theological discourse whose goal is to construct an infallible body of theological knowledge. In modern Christianity, conservative theological foundationalists look to Scripture as the foundational source of inerrant, infallible propositions (as declarative sentences), whereas their liberal counterparts appeal to some form of human rational experience.

For each, the goal of theology is to articulate theological propositions that can be known for certain. Discussions of theology and foundationalism frequently conflate foundationalist justification with modern foundationalism and thereby ignore the implications of modest foundationalism for theology.

There are two basic lines of objection to foundationalism. One questions the foundationalist account of knowledge, while the other, *postmodern, line challenges the need to, and even the moral permissibility of, prescribing knowledge foundations at all. Modest foundationalism has launched an effective response to the former. The latter objection, however, challenges the entire foundationalist project on philosophical and moral grounds, and it is unclear whether the foundationalist response is adequate or even appropriate, particularly alongside increasing acknowledgment of non-Western and postcolonial thought.

See also: CONSERVATISM AND LIBERALISM IN THEOLOGY; INFALLIBILITY AND INERRANCY OF THE BIBLE.

Bibliography

J. Beilby, 'The Implications of Postmodernism for Theology: On Meta-Narrative, Foundationalism and Realism', The Princeton Theological Review XII, 2006, pp. 11–16; L. Bonjour, 'The Dialectic of Foundationalism and Coherentism', in J. Greco and E. Sosa (eds.), The Blackwell Guide to Epistemology (Oxford and Malden, 1999); J. R. Franke, 'Christian Faith and Postmodern Theory: Theology and the Nonfoundationalist Turn', in M. B. Penner (ed.), Christianity and the Postmodern Turn: Six Views (Grand Rapids, 2005); J. R. Franke and S. J. Grenz, Beyond Foundationalism: A Postconservative Theological Approach (Grand Rapids, 2000); P. Klein, 'Foundationalism and the Infinite Regress of Reasons', Philosophy and Phenomenological Research LVIII, 1998, pp. 919–926; J. P. Moreland and G. DeWeese, 'The Premature Report of Foundationalism's Demise', in M. J. Erickson, P. K. Helseth and J. Taylor (eds.), Renewing the Center: Confronting Evangelical Accommodation in Postmodern Times (Wheaton, 2004); A. Plantinga, 'Reason and Belief in God', in A. Plantinga and N. Wolterstorff (eds.), Faith and Rationality (Notre Dame, 1983); M. Westphal, 'Hermeneutics as Epistemology', in J. Greco and E. Sosa (eds.), The Blackwell

Guide to Epistemology (Oxford and Malden, 1999).

M. B. PENNER

FOX, GEORGE, see QUAKER THEOLOGY

FRANCIS AND THE FRANCISCAN TRADITION

The founder of the Order of Friars Minor (the Franciscans), Francis of Assisi (1182–1226), is one of the most admired figures of Christendom. Reared in an atmosphere of luxury, parties and polite society, during his youth he dreamed of a career of military glory, and composed love poetry in the style of the Provençal troubadors. Francis's father (Pietro Bernardoni) believed that his son should become a knight or a merchant, but in his early twenties Francis experienced a religious *conversion which was expressed in a number of dramatic ways. One of them involved the distribution of some family goods for religious purposes. By 1209 he began to live in 'apostolic' *poverty and wandered the countryside clothed in a ragged cloak and a robe belt from a scarecrow – hence the distinctive dress of the Franciscans. He attracted followers to the lifestyle of poverty, love and brotherhood that he taught and exemplified. They begged from the rich and ministered to the sick and the poor while they preached the gospel to the outcasts of medieval society.

In 1210 Pope Innocent III allowed Francis to organize a religious order, the Little Brothers, based upon poverty and service to others. A second order was founded in 1212 when an influential woman named Clare was commissioned by Francis to perform many of the same activities as the brothers. Thus was formed the order for women called the Poor Clares. In addition to his activities among Christians, Francis was concerned with missionary activity and went to Syria (1212), Morocco (1213–14), and Egypt (1219) to evangelize the Muslims. Illness and other misfortunes prevented much success in these endeavours.

Because of the rapid growth of the Order and the need for organization beyond the few simple rules formulated by Francis, a new set of regulations was approved by Pope Honorius III in 1223. A cardinal was named protector of the group, but this displeased Francis, who became less involved in the order. He spent the remainder of his life in solitude, prayer and writing. It was during this period that he produced the 'Canticle to the Sun', his Admonitions and his Testament. In 1224 he allegedly received the stigmata, a series of wounds on his body similar to those inflicted on Jesus as he was crucified. He was canonized (see *Saint) by Gregory IX in 1228.

Of all the achievements of Francis, the one which may be of greatest interest today is the respect he showed for God's *creation. His enthusiastic, sacred outlook on the world led him to view everything as a living comrade. Many sources report his sermons to the birds, which included the charming line: 'My brother birds, much ought you to praise your Creator and to love him . . .'

Despite his personal example, it was probably inevitable that the Order founded on the principles of simplicity, poverty and service could not adhere to them once it became a successful movement. The Franciscans developed into one of the leading thirteenth-century orders of friars that sought to meet the spiritual needs caused by rapid urban growth and the spread of heresy. Unlike earlier groups of monks, the friars lived among the people, ministering the gospel as well as providing social services to the needy. The problem was that such large-scale enterprises needed financing and organization. All such businesslike activities were discouraged by Francis, who left a will asking that the vow of poverty should not be changed among his followers. Only four years after his death, Pope Gregory IX declared that the will was not binding, thus permitting the Order to hold property. A conflict arose between the Spirituals or Fraticelli, who insisted on keeping the founder's request, and those who accepted the new approach. The main body of the Franciscans, the Conventuals, agreed with the changes. During the latter half of the thirteenth century, tension between the two groups eased under the leadership of *Bonaventura, who maintained a balanced approach between structure and spirit. As an outstanding intellect, he represented the increasing role of scholarship within the Order, which began working in the new urban universities.

As the Franciscans increased their material wealth, Europe entered a difficult time during the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, experiencing plague, warfare and papal division. The Order declined during these years, but a reform movement, the Observants, developed in its ranks. They wished to re-establish a strict rule and were granted ecclesiastical recognition in 1415. The new group was opposed by the more moderate Franciscans represented by the Conventuals. In 1517 Leo X officially separated the Order into two independent branches: the Friars Minor of the Regular Observants and the Friars Minor Conventuals. Further discord among the Observants led them to divide into several factions, including the Capuchins, the Discalced (Shoeless) and the Recollects. Increasing division caused Leo XIII (1897) to unite all the Observants except the Capuchins.

Despite the admonition of Francis that the Christian faith 'consists not in working miracles . . . nor in learning and knowledge of all things; nor in eloquence to convert the world', his followers have been heavily involved in theological scholarship, preaching and missions and even in politics. During the medieval period all branches of *scholasticism were influenced by Franciscan contributions. Because the order is so diverse, it included those, such as *Duns Scotus and *William of Ockham, who undermined the theological system of *Thomas Aquinas through *Aristotelian logic; while others followed Bonaventura and emphasized the role of meditation and prayer in Christian thought; and a third group supported the outlook of Robert Grosseteste (c. 1175–1253) and Roger Bacon (c. 1214–92) and insisted on the centrality of observation in arriving at truth. However, all groups of Franciscans were agreed in opposing the synthesis of *faith and reason elaborated by Thomas Aquinas.

The Franciscans have also been active in preaching the gospel. Their missionary journeys took them to China as early as 1294, and they accompanied the Portuguese and Spaniards on their pioneering journeys to India and America. Currently, Franciscans are found working in every mission field of the world.

Many popular devotional practices of the Roman Catholic Church have been encouraged by Franciscan influence. Among the better-known of these are devotion to the Christmas Crib, the Sacred Heart, the Precious Blood, and the Stations of the Cross.

Today the Franciscans are divided into three major branches: the Observants, the Conventuals and the Capuchins. The largest of these is the Observants. They revised their constitution after *Vatican II and have defined the Order's goal as that of a movement which continually reinterprets the gospel in the light of current problems. Many of these friars look on their role as that of the conscience of the church. Such an attitude has led individuals including Leonardo Boff, a Brazilian theological professor, to apply Marxist ideas to the problem of the poor. The support that his liberation theology has received has caused conflict between the Order and the Vatican. Other Franciscan groups have remained more conservative and continue to apply the teachings of their leading medieval scholars such as Bonaventura to contemporary issues.

The Franciscans have contributed in an important way both to Catholicism and to Christendom in general. Their work in evangelizing the new towns of the Middle Ages, developing Christian scholarship and serving in a variety of missionary and social ministries, has helped to make faith in Christ a living reality.

Bibliography

L. Boff, Church: Charism and Power (New York, 1985); idem, St Francis: A Model for Human Liberation (London, 1985); I. Brady (ed. and tr.), The Marrow of the Gospel: A Study of the Rule of St Francis of Assisi (Chicago, 1958); L. Cunningham (ed.), Brother Francis: An Anthology of Writings by and about S. Francis of Assisi (New York, 1972); O. Englebert, Saint Francis of Assisi (Chicago, 1966); E. H. Gilson, History of Christian Philosophy in the Middle Ages (New York, 1955); M. A. Habig, St Francis of Assisi: Writings and Early Biographies (Chicago, 1973); H. Holzappel, The History of the Franciscan Order (Teutopolis, 1948); J. R. H. Moorman, A History of the Franciscan Order: From Its Origins to the Year 1517 (New York, 1988); K. Osborne, The History of Franciscan Theology (New York, 1994); N. Şenocak, The Poor and the Perfect: The Rise of Learning in the Franciscan Order, 1209–1310 (New York, 2012); A. Thompson, OP, Francis of Assisi: A New Biography (New York, 2012).

R. G. CLOUSE

FRANKFURT DECLARATION

The Frankfurt Declaration on the Fundamental Crisis of Christian Mission (1970) reaffirmed the basic elements of biblical mission over against their distortions in contemporary missiological thinking, particularly in the ecumenical movement since the integration of the former International Missionary Council with the World Council of Churches in New Delhi in 1961. The Declaration was promulgated by a gathering of German theologians who had joined the struggle of the confession movement 'No Other Gospel' to counteract the effects of radical biblical criticism on the life of the church. The Declaration was occasioned by the unhappiness of many evangelical mission leaders and theologians about Section II, 'Renewal in Mission', of the Fourth Assembly of the WCC in Uppsala, 1968, and might be considered as a German equivalent to the Wheaton Declaration (1966). Both stand in the tradition of modern confessional statements, of which the Barmen Declaration of the Confessing Church in Germany in 1934 is the most outstanding example.

In fact, the form of the Frankfurt Declaration is modelled on the Barmen Declaration. Its seven affirmations, each one introduced by a biblical key text, restate the classical understanding of mission and condemn opposing modern theological concepts. The 'Seven Indispensable Basic Elements of Mission' are intended to safeguard: (1) the sole authority of the Bible over against situational hermeneutics; (2) the primacy of doxology over against humanization as the goal of mission; (3) biblical Christology over against an anonymous Christ-presence in human history; (4) the significance of personal faith in salvation over against universalism; (5) the spiritual nature of the church over against a merely functional understanding of it; (6) the uniqueness of the gospel over against other religions; (7) the reality of Christ's second coming for the eschatological orientation of mission over against an ideology of progress or revolution.

The original purpose of the Declaration was not a call for separation from the WCC's Commission of World Mission and Evangelism, but a call to it to return to its former biblical tradition, seen most clearly in the pronouncements of the World Missionary Conferences of Whitby (1947) and Willingen (1952). This call went largely unheeded. Rather, the actual effect of the Frankfurt Declaration was to stir up an intense debate not only in Germany, but all over the world. In Germany it contributed to the split between the conciliar organization of mission societies and the 'working fellowship of evangelical missions' which became final after the Bangkok World Missionary Conference of 1973. The basic concerns of the Declaration influenced the *Lausanne Covenant in 1974.

Bibliography

CT XIV:19 (19 June, 1970), pp. 3–6; P. Beyerhaus, Missions: Which Way? (Grand Rapids, 1971); idem, Shaken Foundations (Grand Rapids, 1972).

P. P. J. BEYERHAUS

FRANKFURT SCHOOL

Founded in 1923 as the Institute for Social Research, the School's influence may be dated from Max Horkheimer's directorship in 1930. Its members left Germany under the Third Reich, settling in New York, but returned to Germany after the Second World War as the only surviving institution from the Weimar Republic.

In the earlier generation of scholars, key figures are Max Horkheimer (1895–1973), Theodor Adorno (1903–69) and Herbert Marcuse (1898–1979). The leader of the younger generation is Jürgen Habermas (b. 1929). An eschatological character in the School's thought reflects the influence of *Hegel and *Marx, but the Jewish background of many of the members is a distinct and conscious influence. The major theme in their work is critique of the *Enlightenment, both its philosophy and its impact on 'mass-culture'. Closely linked with this is their analysis of Nazism.

The School has consistently attacked the *positivism central to the Enlightenment theory of knowledge, and with it the view that *nature should be made subject to human control, and that this subjection/domination should become the chief purpose of knowledge; that 'whatever does not conform to the rule of computation and utility is suspect' (Adorno and Horkheimer, Dialectic of Enlightenment, 1944, repr. London, 1979, p. 6). A world dominated by technology is the material realization of the Enlightenment goal.

Positivism and technology are linked by a popular view of physical science as both the model form of knowledge and the bringer of material benefit to the world. In this way they legitimate one another. The result is that 'the fully enlightened world radiates disaster triumphant' (ibid., p. 3); for man, 'existent social practice, which forms the individual's life down to its least details, is inhuman, and this inhumanity affects everything that goes on in society' (Horkheimer, 'Traditional and Critical Theory', 1937, in P. Connerton, ed., Critical Sociology, Harmondsworth, 1976, p. 220).

The Frankfurt School's *anthropology has, therefore, a dialectical character; in this inhuman world, 'critical thought has a concept of man as in conflict with himself' until inhumanity is overcome. There are parallels here and elsewhere with the thought of Jacques *Ellul.

A right view of reality is imperative; central to it is a refusal of the *Kantian distinction between subject and object. 'Social reality' is not 'extrinsic' to the individual. The critical thinker rejects analyses of the world which cut him off from 'the experience of the blindly dominating totality and the driving desire that it should ultimately become something else' (Adorno, et al., The Positivist Dispute in German Sociology, London, 1976, p. 14). 'Totality' here has more than rhetorical significance: 'totality is what is most real' (p. 12), but it is also illusory (it hides the fact that a really human world would be different).

Public debate, even in a democracy, is seen as deformed. Habermas's primary concern is to criticize forms of rationality which lead to such distorted discourse (drawing on insights from psychoanalysis as well as from classical philosophy), and to construct a theory of 'communicative action' in which a genuinely consensual generalized ethics can develop. Theory-building in this sense is a salvific activity; 'theory is the telos, not the vehicle' (ibid., p. 113).

Bibliography

T. Bottomore, The Frankfurt School and Its Critics (London, 2002); P. Connerton, The Tragedy of Enlightenment (Cambridge, 1980); J. Habermas, Knowledge and Human Interests (London, 1978); D. Held, Introduction to Critical Theory (London, 1980); M. Jay, The Dialectical Imagination (London, 1973); H. Marcuse, From Luther to Popper (London, 1972); T. Wheatland, The Frankfurt School in Exile (Minneapolis, 2009).

H. W. SMART

FREEDOM, CHRISTIAN

The Christian understanding of freedom is rooted in the OT, where the exodus is the paradigmatic event of God's liberation of his people from slavery. Importantly, this was not just liberation from oppression, but also liberation for the service of God. God's rule, unlike Pharaoh's, made Israel a society free from structures of privilege and exploitation.

In the NT, freedom acquires further dimensions: from the inner compulsion of sin, from the entail of guilt, from subjection to death (see *Guilt and forgiveness). The image of the exodus is used to portray Christ's work as the liberator of his people from all that disables and threatens human life. But as, in the OT, freedom means equally freedom for the service of God and Christ. Freedom is not licence to sin, but a new enablement to serve voluntarily, to make God's will one's own, to do good from the heart rather than under constraint. In Paul's theology, where freedom is especially a prominent theme, this is the work of the Spirit, for 'where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is freedom' (2 Cor. 3:17).

Freedom in the Spirit is associated with being sons and daughters of God, since ideally, unlike slaves, children obey parents with the glad and free obedience of love. But the image of Christians as slaves is also, paradoxically, used, and was powerfully enacted by Jesus himself when he washed his disciples' feet, performing the servant's role as an example to his disciples to do the same for each other. The image of slavery is re-functioned to make the humblest form of service a matter of voluntary love. The NT, instead of replacing a model of society in which there are masters and slaves with one in which everyone is his or her own master, replaces it with a model in which everyone is the willing servant of all. Thus Christian freedom does not lead to competitive individualism, but to loving community.

In the theological tradition, discussion of Christian freedom has focused on the issue of *grace and free *will, attempting to do justice both, on the one hand, to the sense in which humans are enslaved to sin and cannot free themselves, and, on other hand, to the fact that freedom and coercion are contradictory. While this discussion has divided Christians, it has also highlighted the important truths that the human plight is one of profound internal subjection to *sin, and that the kind of freedom worth having is not mere freedom of choice, but the freedom to choose good.

In the modern period, freedom has become a dominant value of Western culture, and Christian theology has had to engage with the new ideas of freedom that have emerged from the Renaissance and the *Enlightenment. One strand in this modern thinking has been the conception of freedom as absolute self-determination, such that the destiny of humanity is to appropriate the absolute freedom of God and to transcend all limits. This led to the catastrophic project of domination over the rest of creation (see *Ecology). Secondly, freedom has been conceived as autonomy. For *Kant, obedience to God's commands was inconsistent with human autonomy, and morality could rest only on recognition of universal moral truths. For *Nietzsche, even this contradicts autonomy, which must be the freedom to create one's own values, a notion that has become widespread in *postmodernity. What is valued has come to be freedom of choice as such (the freedom of consumerism), rather than the freedom to choose well. Finally, modern freedom is highly individualistic. The truly free person is the sovereign individual, free of all dependence, relating to the world only by mastery. Many of the dilemmas of contemporary Western society are rooted in a misconception of freedom as the opposite of all dependence, belonging and society.

In this context, Christian theology must reconceive freedom as not only contradicted by oppressive relationships, but also enabled by the kind of belonging and relationships we find in fellowship with God and in Christian community. We must point out that mere freedom from quickly becomes a new enslavement, while the freedom worth having is the freedom to choose well and to serve God and others in voluntary love.

Bibliography

R. Bauckham, God and the Crisis of Freedom (Louisville, 2002); C. E. Gunton (ed.), God and Freedom (Edinburgh, 1995); A. J. McKelway, The Freedom of God and Human Liberation (London, 1990); J. Moltmann, The Trinity and the Kingdom of God (London, 1981); D. Nicholls, Deity and Domination (New York, 1989).

R. J. BAUCKHAM

FREEDOM OF WILL, see WILL

FREE WILL, see WILL

FREI, HANS (1922–88)

Hans Frei was an American theologian best known for his work on biblical *hermeneutics and for his contributions to *postliberal theology.

His early work examined modern attempts to interpret those biblical narratives characterized by literary realism, particularly various portions of the Gospels. Some modern interpreters have taken these texts simply as evidence for ‘the facts’, others as expressions of a certain flavour of religious consciousness. Frei suggested instead that they should be seen as providing a narrative identification of their central character, Jesus Christ, and that their meaning simply is this story that they tell. This is a meaning that can be grasped before any questions of factuality or of significance for the reader are raised, and Frei argued that the story can therefore dictate when and how those questions are posed. With regard to factuality, he argued that it is in the resurrection narratives that the question of historical reference is pushed most urgently by the stories themselves. With regard to significance for the reader, he argued that typological interpretation (which sees realities in the present as ‘types’ of biblical realities) is the best way to explore the significance of realistic narrative texts like these for personal, ecclesial and political life.

Frei later conceded that his claims could not be justified simply by appeal to the literary qualities of the Gospel texts. Only a deep consensus in Christian reading practices (the sensus literalis), which has involved taking the Gospels primarily as realistic depictions of Jesus, can provide the soil in which his kind of reading will flourish. Frei also developed a typology distinguishing theologians who present theology as the internal discourse of a particular community, describing its idiosyncratic ways of thought and practice, from those who present it as the re-interpretation of Christian claims according to some universal philosophical scheme. He argued that his hermeneutical claims would flourish best amongst theologians who let their philosophical claims about realism, reference and meaning be governed by the particular shape of the Gospel narratives as they are read in distinctive ways within the Christian church.

See also: NARRATIVE THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

Works: The Eclipse of Biblical Narrative (New Haven, 1974); The Identity of Jesus Christ (Philadelphia, 1975); Types of Christian Theology, ed. G. Hunsinger and W. C. Placher (New Haven, 1992); Theology and Narrative, ed. G. Hunsinger and W. C. Placher (New York, 1993).

Studies: G. Green (ed.), Scriptural Authority and Narrative Interpretation (Philadelphia, 1987); M. A. Higton, Christ, Providence and History (London, 2004); J. Springs, Toward a Generous Orthodoxy (New York, 2010).

M. HIGTON

FULLER, ANDREW (1754–1815)

Andrew Fuller was an English Particular (Calvinistic) *Baptist whose reputation as a theologian largely rests on his Gospel Worthy of All Acceptation (1785). This challenged the High Calvinism (see *Hyper-Calvinism) associated with John *Gill by contending that it was the ‘duty’ of all who heard the gospel to believe, whether they were part of the elect or not. Consequently, preachers could, and should, ‘offer’ the gospel to their hearers by directly inviting all to respond. Fuller based his argument closely on Scripture, but also made use of a distinction between ‘natural’ and ‘moral’ ability derived from Jonathan *Edwards’ Freedom of the Will (1754). People’s inability to come to Christ apart from the Holy Spirit’s work was wholly ‘moral’, and therefore all who refused to respond were culpable. The Gospel Worthy constitutes the classic statement of ‘Edwardsean’ evangelical *Calvinism in a British context. Its stress on human responsibility provided Particular Baptists with a rationale for applied evangelistic preaching. Fuller put his principles into practice through his work as a pastor and, especially, as the energetic secretary of the Baptist Missionary Society, which he helped found in 1792.

Fuller also wrote a large number of other theological and apologetic works, the most significant of which is probably The Gospel Its Own Witness (1800), which sought to combat *deism and was widely respected.

Bibliography

Works: A. G. Fuller (ed.), Works, rev. edn, J. Belcher, 3 vols. (Harrisonburg, ³1988 [1845]).

Studies: C. Chun, The Legacy of Jonathan Edwards in the Theology of Andrew Fuller (Leiden, 2009); P. J. Morden, The Life and Thought of Andrew Fuller (1754–1815) (Milton Keynes, 2015).

P. J. MORDEN

FUNDAMENTAL THEOLOGY

Fundamental theology is one of the most problematic and creative areas of Christian theology. An established discipline in *Roman Catholic theology, fundamental theology is also recognized as a useful demarcation of a vital area of *Protestant theology. Attempts have been made to explore the possibilities of an *ecumenical fundamental theology that is politically aware and socially self-critical.

Traditionally, fundamental theology examined the presuppositions of the Christian faith – the existence of *God, the reality of *revelation and man’s capacity to receive it (the sensitive area of the relation of revelation and reason; see *Faith and reason) – in a systematic way as a prolegomenon to the study of *dogma. But the fundamentals were already given, rather than proposed as hypotheses to be established. At its best, this approach could be seen as ‘faith seeking understanding’ (see *Anselm); at its crudest, it could appear to be an attempt to prove revelation, a purely formal way of handling the most basic questions of theology.

The current conception of fundamental theology stems from *Rahner’s reassessment of the discipline and the encouragement this derived from the Second Vatican Council’s Constitution on the Church in the Modern World (see *Vatican Councils). This approach is the beneficiary of the old discipline of *apologetics. It is motivated by a concern to commend the faith to the world and to establish its credentials in the light of modern thought, but it seeks to do this by a critical presentation of the whole self-expression of the Christian faith, rather than by an artificial abstraction from the contents of Christian doctrine (see *Systematic theology). Rahner set out to reconstruct fundamental theology in union with dogmatic theology so as to impart to the whole enterprise of Christian theology an open and apologetic character that responds to the questions raised by man’s subjectivity in the modern world.

Fundamental theology is in a vulnerable position, as it mediates between Christian doctrine and other relevant disciplines. But it is a theological, not a pre-theological, discipline, since it is conducted from the standpoint of faith. Here it is distinct from both *philosophy of religion (see also *Philosophical theology; *Philosophy and theology), which does not require *faith, and apologetics proper, which, though obviously conducted from the standpoint of faith, does not presuppose faith in its audience.

A new departure in Roman Catholic fundamental theology has been initiated by J. B. *Metz, who, though in sympathy with Rahner’s approach, regards it as naively theoretical – neither acutely aware of its ideological determinants, nor committed to the struggle against oppression at the level of *praxis (see also *Political theology). Metz proposes a practical fundamental theology structured by the three practical *hermeneutical categories of narrative, memory and solidarity, in relation to which the standard themes and problems of fundamental theology – the actuality, character and credibility of revelation, and the subjects, conditions and consequences of its reception – would be interpreted.

In Protestant theology, the discipline of fundamental theology owes its momentum to G. *Ebeling, for whom it is concerned with the question of the *truth of theology through a process of *verification and self-criticism in an integrated dialogue not only with other theological disciplines, but with all relevant sources of information and insight. This is of course conspicuously and intentionally lacking from *Barth’s CD, but was strongly attempted in *Tillich’s Systematic Theology.

Some degree of coherence can be imposed on this varied scene if fundamental theology is understood as analogous to the philosophy of science or of history, in other words, as a theological *epistemology or as the discipline of theological method comprising the sources, scope, aims and rationality of theology in dialogue with the whole range of theological studies. Such a fundamental theology would have a public aspect and serve an apologetic function as the meeting point of Christian doctrine and other relevant disciplines.

Bibliography

P. Avis, The Methods of Modern Theology (Basingstoke, 1986); A. Dulles, The Craft of Theology: From Symbol to System (New York, 1992); G. Ebeling, The Study of Theology (London, 1979); H. Fries, ‘Fundamental Theology', SM II, pp. 368–372; idem, Fundamental Theology (Washington, 1996); H. H. Knight, A Future for Truth: Evangelical Theology in a Postmodern World (Nashville, 1997); R. Latourelle, 'A New Image of Fundamental Theology', in R. Latourelle and G. O'Collins (eds.), Problems and Perspectives of Fundamental Theology (Ramsey, 1982); G. A. Lindbeck, The Nature of Doctrine: Religion and Theology in a Postliberal Age (Philadelphia, 1984); A. E. McGrath, The Genesis of Doctrine: A Study in the Foundations of Doctrinal Criticism (Oxford, 1990); J. B. Metz, Faith in History and Society: Towards a Practical Fundamental Theology (London, 1980); J. B. Metz and P. Avis, SJT 35, 1982, pp. 529–540; K. Rahner, Foundations of Christian Faith: An Introduction to the Idea of Christianity (London, 1978).

P. D. L. AVIS

FUNDAMENTALISM

Fundamentalism developed its distinctive characteristics primarily in North America, and has had its widest influence in the USA where revivalist *evangelicalism has been the dominant religious heritage. Although it has many missionary exports and also many parallels in anti-modernist Protestant movements in other countries, we can best understand its distinguishing features by looking at the prototypical and widely influential American developments.

The word 'fundamentalism' originated in the USA in 1920 as the designation that editor Curtis Lee Laws (1868–1946) used for his anti-modernist party in the Northern Baptist Convention. The term was soon used to describe a broad coalition of evangelical Protestants who fought militantly against *modernist (i.e. liberal) theology and against some features of *secularization of modern culture. This remains the most accurate way to use the word. Essential to being a fundamentalist is that one be (1) an evangelical *Protestant; (2) an anti-modernist, meaning that one subscribes to the fundamentals of traditional supernaturalistic biblical Christianity; and (3) militant in this anti-modernist or in opposition to certain aspects of secularization. A fundamentalist, then, is a militantly anti-modernist evangelical.

This picture is complicated by a number of other broader and narrower usages. Sometimes the word is used generically to designate any religious anti-modernist group, hence 'Islamic fundamentalists'. Martin Marty and R. Scott Appleby promoted this use in their multivolume Fundamentalism Project (Chicago, 1991–5). Opponents of Protestant fundamentalism may use the term loosely to describe almost any of the features, especially the more extravagant or anti-intellectual ones, of evangelical *revivalism, such as those especially common in the American South. Such usage invites confusion of fundamentalism with revivalism generally and with several closely related movements with revivalist roots. For instance, the *holiness movement, which arose in the middle decades of the nineteenth century, was distinguished especially by emphasis on experiences of outpourings of the Holy Spirit leading to lives of sinless *perfection. *Pentecostalism, arising in the early twentieth century, was marked by stress on receiving spectacular spiritual powers. Fundamentalist anti-modernist militancy was sometimes also adopted by these groups, so that they often became 'fundamentalistic'. These movements tended to remain distinct and ecclesiastically separate, although some Pentecostals and members of the holiness movement did affiliate with fundamentalist institutions and initiatives. Nonetheless, these three movements were ultimately related by common origins to the broader and still more diverse heritage of nineteenth-century American revivalism, and many of their traits commonly called 'fundamentalist' are more accurately called 'revivalist'.

In America, 'fundamentalism', when used carefully, has come to refer to the more narrow phenomenon of the main groups of militantly anti-modernist white evangelicals. (American black evangelicals are often revivalist in style, fundamental in doctrine, and anti-modern in ethics, but they do not typically call themselves 'fundamentalists'.)

The characteristics of the distinctively 'fundamentalist' movement can be seen best from its history. As Ernest R. Sandeen has shown in his important study, The Roots of Fundamentalism: British and American Millenarianism, 1800–1930 (Chicago, 1970), one major source of fundamentalism was the premillennial prophecy movement originating from the work of J. N. *Darby and others. Although in England this movement produced primarily the Plymouth Brethren who left the traditional churches, in the United States its main expression in the late nineteenth century was within major northern denominations, such as the Presbyterian and the Baptist. *Dispensationalism was the distinctive feature of this movement and became almost canonized in the notes of C. I. Scofield's famous Reference Bible (New York, 1909). Many American dispensationalists also adopted the moderate holiness teachings fostered by England's Keswick Convention.

Dispensationalism, which predicted the ruin of the church in this epoch, encouraged militancy against the rise of aggressive theological modernism in the early twentieth century. In the USA, especially, where modernism was strong, dispensationalists found many allies who wished to defend the fundamentals of the faith against modernism. Among the northern Presbyterians, conservatism was strong, bolstered by the intellectual leadership at Princeton Theological Seminary (see *Princeton Theology). Conservative Presbyterians first developed the strategy of defending lists of fundamental doctrines. Dispensationalists also organized the publication, from 1909 to 1915, of The Fundamentals, defending traditional doctrines. Many fundamentalist groups had lists of 'fundamental' doctrines, though no one list was ever standard. The most common points were the inerrancy of *Scripture (see *Infallibility and inerrancy of the Bible), the deity of Christ, his *virgin birth, the substitutionary *atonement, Christ's *resurrection, and his second coming (see *Eschatology).

During the 1920s fundamentalists fought hard against modernist gains in the major northern Presbyterian and Baptist denominations. Smaller fundamentalist controversies occurred in other denominations, and parallel splits between conservatives and liberals took place in a number of churches in the United States and Canada. Meanwhile, fundamentalists took on a cultural as well as an ecclesiastical dimension as they attacked aspects of moral erosion after the First World War. The campaign led by William Jennings Bryan (1860–1925) to keep evolution from being taught in American public schools was the chief expression of such concern. The spread of evolutionary teaching was seen as undermining the authority of the Bible in American life and as fostering moral relativism. Marxism, Romanism, alcohol, tobacco, dancing, card-playing and theatre attendance were other major targets for fundamentalist attacks. Amid these conflicts, fundamentalism grew as a coalition of anti-modernist Protestants from many traditions, throughout the USA, north and south, other English-speaking countries and their missionary outposts. At the centre of the coalition were American dispensationalists, whose fundamentalism was least tempered by other traditions.

By the 1930s fundamentalism was beginning to take a distinctive ecclesiastical expression. Increasingly, the most militant fundamentalists felt that they should separate from groups which contained modernists, and from independent congregations or denominations. Most such fundamentalists became Baptist and were dispensationalist. Separatism was becoming a test of true faith.

What had been the broader militant anti-modernist coalition of the 1920s thus began to split by the 1940s. One major group in America softened its militancy and tried to retain contact with mainline denominations. Led by spokespersons such as Harold John Ockenga (1905–85), Carl F. H. Henry (1913–2003) and Edward J. Carnell (1919–67), they at first called themselves 'neo-evangelicals', and by the later 1950s simply 'evangelicals'. Their association with Billy Graham (b. 1918) signalled the growth of this inclusivist wing of 'evangelical' ex-fundamentalists. Meanwhile, militant separatists, such as John R. Rice (1895–1980), Bob Jones (1883–1968) and Carl McIntire (1906–2002), claimed they were the only true fundamentalists. After 1960, 'fundamentalism' in America could be used to distinguish this separatist sub-group from the broader 'evangelicalism', which included ex-fundamentalists and Bible-believing Christians from many traditions.

Separatist fundamentalism continued to grow, although it probably never constituted more than 10% of America's estimated 40 to 50 million 'evangelicals' in the 1970s and 1980s. By the 1980s, especially with the rise of Baptist fundamentalist Jerry Falwell's (1933–2007) Moral Majority, the political concerns of fundamentalists to preserve traditionalist Christian mores in American public life had become prominent again, as they had been in the 1920s. Fundamentalist politics now included strong support for the state of Israel, important to dispensational prophetic interpretation. While holding to a dispensationalist premillennialism that believed in the inevitable decline of human history, Falwell was hopeful that political moral reform on issues such as abortion and homosexual marriage might temper this downward spiral. This later tendency became one of the more visible marks of fundamentalist and evangelical involvement with politics throughout the 1990s and into the 2000s. During the 2004 presidential election in which influential fundamentalists like Falwell, James Dobson and Bob Jones III publicly supported the Republican incumbent George W. Bush, both homosexuality and abortion were among the more important 'moral issues' on the conservative platform.

Bibliography

D. O. Beale, In Pursuit of Purity: American Fundamentalism since 1850 (Greenville, 1986); J. A. Carpenter, Revive Us Again: The Reawakening of American Fundamentalism (New York, 1997); G. M. Marsden, Fundamentalism and American Culture (New York, 2006).

G. M. MARSDEN AND J. D. HANKINS, JR

GALLICANISM, see PAPACY

GENDER

The concept of gender refers to the understanding of human identity in terms of the perceptions of masculinity and femininity. Gender is a complex issue, for it influences our stance towards God, ourselves and others, as well as being itself informed by the convictions we hold as organic beings. The awareness of the importance of this aspect of ourselves has been reflected in the growing field of gender studies, including their relationship to religion.

Gender identity and gender relations represent a significant aspect of societal fabric and its interpretation, and therefore vary accordingly. In contemporary studies, especially under the influence of feminist scholarship, it has become increasingly common to distinguish between the notion of sex and that of gender. The first denotes biological differences between women and men, whereas the second refers to the interpretation of those differences in their social contexts. Thus, gender is commonly understood as socially constructed and reflecting the variables of cultural norms of a given tradition. Other researchers, among whom both traditionalists and feminists can be found, point to what they see as inescapable biological and physiological differences between the sexes and therefore subscribe to essentialism of some sort (e.g. C. Gilligan, In a Different Voice).

Much of gender studies has been woman-centred, in reaction to the dominance of hermeneutics carried out from the male point of view. The emerging 'men's studies' represent a response to the current crisis in male self-understanding in the Western world, caused by radical social changes which have greatly affected the patterns of gender roles. Gender studies also address the perceived Platonic divide between spirit/mind and body and the complications and clashes of the two, typically resulting in explorations in transcending the limitations of the body so that the body corresponds to how the person feels 'inside', rather than the other way around.

Theological reflections on gender are a fertile field, ranging from radical gender polarization to focus on the enrichment of the concepts of both femaleness and maleness in the light of the dynamic changes taking place in contemporary societies. It is often related to discussion on *God in regard to gender terms, especially by pointing to the features of God which are characteristic of both genders as well as to the disassociation of God from sexual characteristics in the Judeo-Christian tradition.

For Christians, gender is a component of the story of God and human beings. It starts with the creation of humanity as male and female and the union of the two; continues through the story of the Jewish nation characterized by differing expectations regarding men's and women's roles, although with some notable exceptions, such as Deborah or Esther; through the way Jesus engaged with men and women and his redefinition of family with its radical reorientation of the purpose of human life no longer bound to procreation; through the affirmation of the epistles that in Christ there is no longer male and female, whether in marriage or singleness; to the vision of the Day of the Lord when the renewed community of God's creation will celebrate life in its fullness (though views would differ in regard to whether gender would still play any role).

One of the continuing debates in Christian communities concerns the makeup of the relationships between, and the social roles of, men and women, often with reference to the so-called household rules or codes (e.g. Col. 3:18 – 4:1; 1 Tim. 2:8–15; 1 Pet. 2:18 – 3:7). These are interpreted either in a very literal sense as fundamental for overcoming the current crisis of the institution of the *family in the Western world, or as functioning in the framework of the cultural norms of the ancient world which was oppressive towards the marginalized, and therefore to be discarded today as not true to the liberating spirit of Christ. This is reflected in the debate between the complementarians (those arguing that because women and men are biologically different, this will be reflected in their social roles) and egalitarians (who are concerned with the equal treatment of men and women in terms of worth, giftedness and calling). Another way to look at the issue, however, is to see household codes as reflecting creative reconstruction of personal and social forms of life in a given culture in the light of the good news of the in-breaking *kingdom of God. In that case, a Christian community is engaged in the challenging yet indispensable invitation to live out the eschatological reality of the new household of God (cf. J. H. Yoder, The Politics of Jesus, Grand Rapids, 2003, pp. 162–192; J. G. Stackhouse, Jr, Finally Feminist).

As some theologians would argue, even when assuming the same roles, males and females often tend to operate in differing ways. Whether gender differences are seen as mutually exclusive or interchanging, and how the liberty of beings created in the *image and likeness of God interplays with biological factors, will shape the way gender is appropriated inside and outside the church. As both the witness of Scripture and the experience of those living in the Majority World indicate, a comprehensive approach to individual gender identity requires the framework of communal identity in which humans can see themselves and others as embodied beings, and the social meaning of human embodiment can be measured by faithfulness to the vision of the fullness of Christ.

See also: FEMINIST THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

S. C. Barton, 'The Epistles and Christian Ethics,' in R. Gill (ed.), The Cambridge Companion to Christian Ethics (Cambridge, 2001); L. S. Cahill, 'Gender and Christian Ethics,' in R. Gill (ed.), The Cambridge Companion; C. Gilligan, In a Different Voice: Psychological Theory and Women's Development (Cambridge, 1993); C. Penner (ed.), Women and Men: Gender in the Church (Waterloo and Scottsdale, 1998); J. G. Stackhouse, Jr, Finally Feminist: A Pragmatic Christian Understanding of Gender (Grand Rapids, 2005).

L. TOTH (ANDRONOVIENE)

GENERAL REVELATION, see REVELATION

GENERATION, ETERNAL, see TRINITY

GERMAN IDEALISM

The term 'German idealism' refers to developments immediately after Kant, principally including J. G. *Fichte, G. W. F. *Hegel and F. W. J. Schelling (1775–1854). Their shared goal, executed with significant differences, was to chart a path between the philosophical tendencies of *Spinoza and *Kant. They were highly influential on *Barth, *Bonhoeffer, *Balthasar and *Rahner.

The German idealists inherited the powerful notions of a single determining 'substance' from Spinoza and free 'subjectivity' from Kant. The task they set themselves was to relate the two notions in a systematic and comprehensive theory.

The central themes of the German idealists are the thinking subject, nature and culture, and the ways these are related to each other. Are humans part of nature, and thus links in a great chain of causality, as Spinoza had claimed? Are the products of culture related to nature, and if so, how? If humans are free, and yet part of nature, what does this imply about nature?

Fichte claimed, in the various versions of his Science of Knowledge, that the human subject is radically free and in some sense 'posits' or 'places' the world for itself, restrained in some way from unrestricted freedom by its own internal checks. This action he called a 'deed-act' (Tathandlung). The ground of knowledge is thus the free act of the subject. Schelling, in his earlier work, claimed that human action is fully part of nature which is itself free. The ground of knowledge is the 'absolute' identity which exists prior to its differentiation into different 'things'. There is no direct access to the absolute, which is prior to ontology and language; it is the products of art such as painting and music that perform a conscious relation to the unconscious absolute, through the insights of the genius. Hegel, in his famous works, claimed that the one substance is also 'subject' in Kant's sense. Nature and culture are all the products of this self-developing 'spirit' (Geist), which achieves higher levels of self-consciousness and conceptual clarity, from nature, through religion and art, to the pinnacle of philosophy. The absolute is a result of a process of dialectic which is reached at the end of the process. Schelling, in his later works, claimed that Hegel's account was 'merely logical' and failed to grasp that the ground of reality is an origin that cannot be grasped by thought.

The first issue of relevance to theology is the description of the human subject developed by the German idealists, and the difference between Fichte and Hegel. At stake are the freedom and constraints that characterize human action. In orthodox Christian theology human action is *free and graced. Its fruits are characterized by estrangement from God owing to sin, and reconciliation to God owing to Christ's life, death and resurrection. The activity of the soul cannot be separated from its receptivity to God's *grace, which is mediated in many different ways. Fichte claimed, following Kant, that the subject is radically free, and extended this insight to the claim that the subject 'posits' (setzt) the world. The model for this radical freedom in the earlier tradition is God's creation of the world. Fichte appears to attribute this divine creativity to humanity. Its product is an account of human action that is almost unconstrained. Hegel claimed, following Spinoza and Kant, that while the subject is free, its agency is a matter of recognition between subjects who inhabit a community. Radical freedom produces actions that have no significance. It is freedom as it participates in the life of the spirit that produces meaningful, significant action. Again, the arguments supporting these claims are complex. Their significance for theology lies in their implications for debates about the ways in which human freedom and divine grace are related.

The second issue of relevance to theology is the relation of thinking to its ground, and the difference between Hegel and Schelling. At stake is the scope of thinking. In orthodox Christian theology God appears in creation in a way suited to human perception: as a man who speaks human languages (see *Accommodation). Knowledge of God is obtained though knowing creatures, and any language used to describe God will be a language whose most familiar use is the description of creatures. God is the Creator of creatures. God is also the Giver of life to creatures. There is more of God than can appear in ways suited to human perception or, by extension, conception. To say that God as Creator and as life cannot be conceived is the historically relevant claim behind Hegel's claim that the 'absolute' is the product of a developing self-consciousness of spirit which can be conceived, and Schelling's counter-claim that the 'absolute' is the origin of the world and language and reasoning which cannot itself be conceived. The arguments supporting these claims are complex. Their significance for theology lies in their implications for debates about the degree to which God, and thus the grounds of faith, can be adequately conceptualized in *philosophy.

Bibliography

K. Ameriks (ed.), The Cambridge Companion to German Idealism (Cambridge, 2000); A. Bowie, Schelling and Modern European Philosophy (London, 1993); D. Henrich, Between Kant and Hegel (London, 2003); T. Pinkard, German Philosophy 1760–1860 (Cambridge, 2002); G. Zöllner, Fichte's Transcendental Philosophy (Cambridge, 1998).

N. ADAMS

GIFFORD LECTURES

The Gifford Lectures refer to the lectureships endowed at the ancient Scottish universities (Aberdeen, Edinburgh, Glasgow, St Andrews) by the will of Adam Gifford (1820–87), who as a judge of the Court of Session took the honorary legal title of Lord Gifford. A follower of *Spinoza, Gifford wished to promote 'the study of *natural theology, in the widest sense of that term, in other words, the knowledge of God', to be pursued as 'a strictly natural science, the greatest of all possible sciences . . . that of Infinite Being, without reference to or reliance upon any supposed special exceptional or so-called miraculous revelation. I wish it studied just as astronomy or chemistry is.'

Starting in 1888, the lectures have featured the most distinguished religious thinkers within and beyond the English-speaking world, and have been issued in numerous significant publications. Lecturers have included: John *Baillie, *Barth (who justified his series as an exposition of 'a totally different theology' without whose challenge natural theology loses its vitality),

*Brunner, *Bultmann, Christopher Dawson, John Dewey, A. S. Eddington (The Nature of the Physical World), Austin *Farrer, J. G. Frazer, E. *Gilson, J. S. Haldane, W. C. Heisenberg, W. R. Inge, W. Jaeger, William James (The Varieties of Religious Experience), John MacMurray, G. Marcel, E. L. Mascall, *Moltmann, F. Max Müller, Reinhold *Niebuhr, Michael Polanyi, A. E. Taylor (The Faith of a Moralists), William *Temple, Paul *Tillich, Arnold Toynbee, C. C. J. Webb and A. N. Whitehead (Process and Reality).

In recent decades, lecturers have included R. J. Berry, Noam Chomsky, Antony Flew, Stanley *Hauerwas, John *Hick, Alasdair *MacIntyre, Donald M. *Mackay, Raimundo Pannikar, Jaroslav *Pelikan, Roger Penrose, Alvin *Plantinga, John *Polkinghorne, Paul *Ricœur, Carl Sagan, Stephen Toulmin, David *Tracy and Nicholas Wolterstorff.

Such a selection illustrates how generously the founder's terms have been interpreted.

Bibliography

S. L. Jaki, Lord Gifford and His Lectures: A Centenary Retrospect (Edinburgh, 1986); B. E. Jones (ed.), Earnest Enquirers after Truth: A Gifford Anthology (London, 1970); L. Witham, The Measure of God: Our Century-Long Struggle to Reconcile Science and Religion (San Francisco, 2005).

D. F. WRIGHT

GIFT, THEOLOGY OF

Discussion of the theology of 'gift' became prevalent in North America and Continental Europe during the first decade of the twenty-first century and was particularly promoted by the writings of John Milbank and Kathryn Tanner. Its origins, however, lie in the writings of the French anthropologist, Marcel Mauss, who published his study, The Gift, as long ago as 1924. Mauss claimed that primitive society, long before the rise of individualistic and competitive capitalism, operated with a system of 'gift-exchange' which promoted social cohesion. The free giving of goods and services elicited similar responses. Jacques *Derrida argued, however, that a 'pure gift' must be given without any expectation of return or exchange, and this became a code for the divine *revelation which cannot ever be fully expressed or reduced to a linguistic formula, but only by endlessly deferred meaning. Jean-Luc *Marion reinterpreted the notion of 'pure gift' as 'saturated phenomenon' – that is to say that the intuitive knowledge of the divine cannot be conceptualized.

John *Milbank drew on this train of thought from French anthropology and philosophy in his essay, 'Can a Gift be Given?' (1995). He rejected Derrida's idea of 'pure gift' as an impossible dream and reinterpreted the concept of 'gift' in fully doctrinal, trinitarian terms. Reverting to Mauss's original notion of 'gift-exchange', he wanted to recast *systematic theology under the 'transcendental category' of 'gift' in order to provide a basis for a *Christian socialism, and began this project with his book, Being Reconciled (2003). The divine self-gift elicits a human response leading to 'participation'.

Kathryn Tanner in turn criticized Milbank and sees the concept of 'gift-exchange' from Mauss as sharing the same individualistic competitiveness and contractualism as *capitalism. In line with her reading of Calvin, she advocates instead a form of 'pure gift', a divine 'unilateralism' in which the persons of the *Trinity give themselves unconditionally and without any competition. When this is received, it issues in a 'reflected' human generosity to those in need. Despite the key difference, however, both Milbank and Tanner are attempting to draw on *patristic trinitarian theology and the notion of 'participation' in the Trinity to combat the structures of global capitalism.

The more traditional theological language for 'gift' is 'grace'. Charisma, the Greek word for 'gift', is derived from charis, translated 'grace'. Etymologically, charis comes into Latin as caritas, translated into English as 'charity' or 'giving love'. The English word 'grace' is derived from the parallel Latin term, gratia. The debate about 'gift' can therefore be seen as a continuation of the long-standing debate about *grace, and indeed Milbank criticized *Reformation theology, and particularly Calvin (see *Reformed theology), for its concept of 'unilateral' grace, unconditionally given and only 'passively' received. Following the more catholic *Augustinian tradition, Milbank noted that 'gift' is a name given to the Holy Spirit in Augustine's De Trinitate. He interprets *Augustine's trinitarian ethic of love in terms of gift-giving. Human beings are brought by the Spirit into the trinitarian 'gift-exchange'. Rather than passively receiving God's self-giving, we are to be engaged in 'active reception', that is to say, in actively giving the love one receives from God to one's neighbour. Indeed, without that, one cannot receive God's love. The divine gift is therefore 'coincident with relation', and 'reciprocity' is inseparable from receiving the gift. In contrast to Marion's notion of a 'saturated phenomenon' in which the divine self-giving is overwhelming and cannot be comprehended or resisted, Milbank sees an ecstatic reception in which we actively participate in the trinitarian exchange in the community of the church.

J. Todd Billings has argued that Milbank has not fully understood Calvin, and particularly his 'double grace' (duplex gratia) of *justification and *sanctification as two aspects of *union with Christ. Believers are passive in receiving the pardon and *adoption which is ours in justification. We do nothing to merit this reception of grace. But as we receive grace through the gift of faith, we will necessarily be active in holiness, for, since 'Christ cannot be torn into parts', justification and sanctification cannot be divorced.

Despite any failure to understand Reformation theology, however, and despite their differences, Milbank and Tanner are challenging traditional evangelical theology to think of grace not merely in individualistic terms, but also in terms of how Christian theology addresses economic and social questions.

Bibliography

J. T. Billings, 'John Milbank's Theology of the Gift and Calvin's Theology of Grace: A Critical Comparison', Modern Theology 21:1, 2005, pp. 87–105; S. Coakley, 'Why Gift? Gift, Gender and Trinitarian Debates in Milbank and Tanner', SJT 61: 2, 2008, pp. 224–235; M. Mauss, The Gift: The Form and Reason for Exchange in Archaic Societies (London, 1990); J. Milbank, 'Can a Gift Be Given?', Modern Theology 11, 1995, pp. 119–161; idem, Being Reconciled: Ontology and Pardon (London, 2003); K. Tanner, Jesus, Humanity and the Trinity (Minneapolis, 2001); idem, Economy of Grace (Minneapolis, 2005).

T. A. NOBLE

GIFTS OF THE SPIRIT

The beginning of the twentieth century saw the rise of a new form of the *Pentecostal movement, emphasizing the gifts of the Spirit and resulting in new denominations. In the 1960s the emphasis on the gifts spread to existing churches (including the Roman Catholic Church) through the *charismatic movement. Both movements emphasized the recovery of the gifts of the Spirit in the church's ministry, but often tended to focus on the more miraculous gifts such as tongues (glossolalia), prophecy and healing. In classic Pentecostalism the gifts were regarded as the evidence of the *baptism of the Spirit coming subsequent to the new birth, but that was not always held in the charismatic movement. Other Christians take the 'cessationist' view (held by the Reformers) that the more miraculous gifts associated with revelation ceased once the NT books were written.

All Christians, however, agree on the diversity of roles and spiritual gifts in the *ministry of the church. These are found in the Pauline writings, especially 1 Cor. 12; 14; Rom. 12:3–8 and Eph. 4:7–13. Clearly, Paul links the use of spiritual gifts to the work of Christ as well as the Holy Spirit.

For Paul, the concern in establishing the use of spiritual gifts is the unity of the *church. With the prior emphasis on one Lord, one faith, one baptism, the exercise of spiritual gifts should not disrupt the unity in the *fellowship established by God. Although Paul may imply a type of hierarchy in the practice of the gifts, there is no elitism, and so each person finds an appropriate ministry in light of the variety of gifts given to the church. With the emphasis on unity, there is importance given to the spiritual depth exhibited in the church through the gifts. While some of the gifts appear as 'offices' of leadership in the church (see *Church government), other gifts appear to be designed for the supportive structure of the fellowship. This includes not only mission to the world, but the provision for inner cohesion.

Theologically, it is important that our understanding of the gifts of the Spirit should be an integral part of pneumatology, the doctrine of the *Spirit, and so viewed in trinitarian perspective. The use of gifts of the Spirit should be closely related to the fruit of the Spirit in Gal. 5. Only as Christians evidence the fruit, spiritual depth and maturity, can the spiritual gifts further the unity and healthy growth of the church.

Bibliography

G. Fee, God's Empowering Presence: The Holy Spirit in the Letters of Paul (Carlisle, 1994);

S. Ferguson, The Holy Spirit (Leicester, 1996); R. Martin, The Spirit and the Congregation: Studies in I Corinthians 12–15 (Grand Rapids, 1984); S. Schatzmann, A Pauline Theology of Charismata (Carlisle, 1987); T. Smail, The Giving Gift: The Holy Spirit in Person (London, 1994); M. Turner, The Holy Spirit and Spiritual Gifts: Then and Now (Carlisle, 1994).

D. L. RAINEY

GILL, JOHN (1697–1771)

John Gill was an English Particular *Baptist theologian and pastor whose prodigious written output earned him the nickname ‘Dr Voluminous’. Probably his best-known work was The Cause of God and Truth, published in four parts (1735–8), which defended Calvinistic soteriology (see *Reformed theology). But he also produced a multi-volume Exposition of the Holy Scriptures (1746–66), together with numerous other works, many of which were polemical in intent.

Gill was associated with the theology known as ‘High Calvinism’ (see *Hyper-Calvinism) which exalted the divine decrees in a way that downplayed the importance of human responsibility. In practice, this led to an insular ecclesiology and a refusal to offer the gospel to all, as only the elect could properly respond. Some recent scholarship has sought to rebut the charge that Gill was a High Calvinist. But he disliked the ‘open offer’, and his influence almost certainly discouraged applied evangelistic preaching. In the years following his death his continuing influence was anathema to many evangelical Baptists, with the nineteenth-century preacher Robert Hall memorably describing Gill’s writings as a ‘continent of mud’. A balanced assessment of Gill will, however, seek to avoid reading him against the background of later missiological debates and acknowledge that his writings probably helped Particular Baptists to resist the rationalist thinking which was making inroads into church life elsewhere.

Bibliography

J. Gill, Exposition of the Old and New Testaments, 9 vols. (Paris, Arkansas, 1989 [1746–66]); M. A. G. Haykin (ed.), The Life and Thought of John Gill (1697–1771): A Tercentennial Appreciation (Leiden, 1997); J. Rippon, A Brief Memoir of the Life and Writings of the Late Rev. John Gill, DD (London, 1838).

P. J. MORDEN

GILSON, ÉTIENNE (1884–1978)

Étienne Gilson taught medieval philosophy in France, chiefly at the Sorbonne (1921–32) and the Collège de France (1932–51), and then at the Pontifical Institute of Medieval Studies in Toronto, which he had directed since its inception in 1929. Resident again in France from 1959, he wrote prolifically until his death, producing over a hundred books and articles after his seventy-fifth birthday.

Gilson was early influenced by H. Bergson (1859–1941), the French philosopher and champion of ‘intuition’ and creative evolution. From studies of *Descartes he moved to the medieval era, with monographs on *Bonaventura (1924), *Augustine (1928; ET, The Christian Philosophy of St Augustine, London, 1961), and *Bernard of Clairvaux (London, 1934). His *Gifford Lectures of 1930–31 were translated as The Spirit of Medieval Philosophy (1936).

Gilson always presented himself as a Christian philosopher, refusing to modernize *Thomism as though its essence could be independent of theology. Among the different *scholastic syntheses of medieval Christian philosophy, the Thomist was for him, as for his ally Jacques *Maritain, the best creative basis for interpreting modern culture. He defended teleology for both philosophy and biology, and called himself a dogmatist, while insisting that unchanging *dogma requires ever-fresh expression.

A man of public life, honoured by the French resistance and at one time a senator in the government, he enjoyed universal recognition as perhaps the most distinguished historian of medieval philosophy.

Bibliography

M. McGrath, Etienne Gilson. A Bibliography (Toronto, 1982); F. A. Murphy, Art and Intellect in the Philosophy of Étienne Gilson (Columbia, 2004); A. C. Pegis, A Gilson Reader (New York, 1957); P. A. Redpath (ed.), A Thomistic Tapestry: Essays in Memory of Etienne Gilson (Amsterdam, 2002); L. K. Shook, Etienne Gilson (Toronto, 1984).

D. F. WRIGHT

GLOBALIZATION

Globalization may be defined as the big idea that the world has changed to become much more interconnected than it was in previous eras. Precisely when this happened is disputed, especially by sociologists, and exactly what it looks like is also debatable. Zygmunt Bauman labels the term itself as a 'fad' word that everyone uses and few understand, which further frustrates the situation on account of the term's ubiquity in everyday and academic writing. The concept, 'globalization', is difficult to understand due to the sheer scope of what it seeks to account for, embracing the entire social, economic, geographical, technological and political situation of our present world.

The word is often used as a given to describe where the world currently finds itself, or a current scenario that has taken over all things: 'now that globalization has shaped the world . . .'; or 'since globalization has happened . . .'; or, 'in a world shaped by globalization . . .' The idea, however, is best understood as a process. Jan Aart Scholte describes this process as including five features: (1) cross-border international exchange relations; (2) economic liberalization that challenges artificial state restrictions on borderless markets; (3) the universalization of local cultures into a wider synthesis; (4) the overall Westernizing or modernizing of the wider world; and (5) increased transplanetary connectedness. According to political theorist David Held, globalization refers to the deeper, wider, faster forms of interconnectedness of all of social life, including the cultural, criminal, financial, and even spiritual.

Colonialism: assertion from above

The powerful forces of globalization find precedence in the earlier processes of imperialism and colonialism. Imperialism refers to the practice of establishing the power and presence of a nation-state (or civilization), as ancient empires would exercise their rule on foreign territories through military and political control. Often foregoing actual settlement, imperial rule established itself through indirect forms of domination (especially economic) over other groups. Colonialism, on the other hand, set out to settle its people on the newly conquered territories, establishing colonies which would then exploit the places of settlement in ways that benefitted the home country both economically and strategically. In the ancient world, the Greeks, Romans, Moors, Ottomans and many others set up colonies in this way.

By the sixteenth century, however, colonialism took on a new shape as technological advancements in navigation and nautical engineering allowed explorers to connect with a wider range of the world. Faster ships could sail more speedily to distant ports, enabling closer connections between home countries and colonies. Thus a deeper form of ongoing exploitation was established through planned permanent settlement. This is how European countries exerted their political control over other parts of the 'newly discovered' world, including the Americas, Australia, New Zealand, Africa and other places. This process continued from major power groups, including forms of colonialism by the USA (over places like the Philippines and Puerto Rico), establishing colonies on other territories until just after the Second World War, and especially in the 1960s when different national liberation movements emerged to establish societal and political forms of independence from the colonial occupiers.

It was during this same period during the mid-twentieth century that Lesslie *Newbigin, British missionary to India, noted that the old style of colonialist Christian missionary engagement had met its demise. The older colonial model of *missions accompanied the earlier colonialization, since occupying a territory or region meant not only establishing a civic centre, but additional, spiritual motivating factors also aimed to establish a spiritual centre of life for the foreign people groups (e.g. the Spanish pueblos and early Franciscan missions in colonial California). As such, a new model of indigenous missionary engagement emerged in the mid-twentieth century, paying greater attention to the integrity of local indigenous *cultures. Newbigin is a classic example in this regard, submitting himself to the authority of the local leaders in the church where he served in South India, which in turn appointed him as bishop of the newly established Church of South India in 1947.

Globalization: assertion from below

In contrast to the top-down approaches of imperialism or colonialism, globalization indicates a form of cultural exchange that is not imposed in such hegemonic ways. Instead, cultural exchange most naturally takes place in our current world through various dynamic formal and informal networks of exchange, without the essential value projections of an earlier era. It arises more naturally, through the process of advanced forms of migration, education and exchange, valuing more regional and localist approaches to life and culture.

Bilateral in its manner of exchange, and capturing strongly ambitious impulses, it is difficult to tell whether globalization may be a new form of colonialization, whether Euro-centric, American or something else. Whatever globalization may be, however, it seems to include an opportunity for increasing the common experience of humanity as a whole. It runs multi-directional, through social classes and transnational identities. While exhibiting abuses, where major transnational companies have exploited foreign workers, or terrorist networks develop new angles, so also it has provided new possibilities of more just treatment of oppressed people groups, more responsible approaches to resources and the environment, and better approaches to life on this earth.

There have been many responses to globalization, from capitalism's various forms of innovation and exploitation, to a postcolonial consciousness among contemporary European and American scholars. Globalization is perhaps most seen in major urban centres, from cultural producers like Los Angeles or Mumbai, to economic centres like Shanghai, Tokyo, London and New York. Yet amid the dynamic life these places have cultivated, the latter half of the twentieth century often gave way to suburban 'white flight' from many centres only now to be met with the reverse trend of gentrification, uprooting urban communities by forcing higher costs of living and other powerful expressions of cultural elitism and oppression.

Christianity and globalization

Latin American *liberation theologians provided sharp resistance to globalization, declaring the system as evil and unbiblical. Yet this approach often failed to acknowledge various developmental goods offered to the global South. Christianity in its various expressions – localized, regional and transnational – is both a product and agent of globalization. As such, it affirms the local as well as the universal and transcendent, including the significance of particular settings as meaningful places to do theology from. Roland Robertson suggested that this new emphasis on localization itself is a feature of globalization. Thus globalization may indeed provide a platform not only for sharing the gospel more locally in today's increasingly interconnected world, but also allow for a deeper understanding of and participatory sharing in the particularities of other localized expressions of Christianity, especially where it faces extraordinary difficulties throughout the world. This is especially important as Christians seek to love one another and the neighbours to whom we are increasingly connected over time and through the globalization process.

See also: CONTEXTUALIZATION.

Bibliography

L. Bretherton, Resurrecting Democracy (Cambridge, 2015); D. S. Browning, Globalization and Grace, vol. 2 (London, 2001); Y. H. Ferguson and R. W. Mansbach, Globalization (Abingdon, 2012); S. Kim, Theology in the Public Square (London, 2011); L. Newbigin, The Gospel in a Pluralist Society (Grand Rapids, 1989); F. Sanders and J. S. Sexton, Theology and California (Farnham, 2014); M. L. Stackhouse, Globalization and Grace, vol. 1 (London, 2000); idem., Globalization and Grace, vol. 3 (London, 2001); idem., Globalization and Grace, vol. 4 (London, 2008).

J. S. SEXTON

GLORY OF GOD

A multifaceted term used in the Bible to describe the honour, splendour, majesty and power of *God. The Hebrew word kabod originally meant 'weight' or by extension 'importance', and its Greek equivalent doxa meant 'opinion' or by extension 'reputation'. The theological concept contains both these ideas in equal measure. It can be applied to creatures as well as to God, since everything has its own value or importance which ought to be recognized. The key here, however, is that each person or thing should be honoured with the glory appropriate to it. When God's glory is compromised by being attributed to a creature, the result is *idolatry, something which from the beginning has always been recognized as one of the worst sins. On the other hand, believers are entitled to share in God's glory to some extent, because their salvation is entirely his work and enhances his reputation when it becomes known. Those whose lives are transformed by the indwelling presence of his Holy Spirit become people of light (an image frequently used to describe God's glory) and bring honour to him as they manifest the signs of holiness and moral goodness in their lives.

The centrality of God's glory for Christian worship and living has always been recognized, but until the twentieth century it was not developed as a separate subject in its own right. The glory of God was an aspect of the doctrine of creation, and in particular of the creation of the human race, the supreme manifestation of the divine glory. The created order demonstrated by its regularity, and also by its inaccessibility to mere human minds, the supreme honour which had to be paid to the Creator. Men and women, created in the image and likeness of God, manifested that glory on earth, but as a result of the fall, it was corrupted and virtually effaced. One of the main motives for God's intervention to save us from our sins, put forward by almost every major theologian from Irenaeus to Calvin and beyond, was precisely for the restoration of this tarnished glory.

In modern times a different emphasis has emerged. One factor which has contributed to this has been the renewal of interest in liturgy and the appreciation that worship is essentially an act of giving glory to God. The belief of many liturgists that prayer shapes theology, often expressed in the Latin phrase lex orandi, lex credendi, has been very influential in this respect, and has led to the appearance of systematic theologies grounded in the concept of worship or doxology. The chief objection to this approach is that worship is the expression of theology, not the other way round, and that it is quite possible to compose liturgies or write hymns which do not do justice to the glory of God as they should – the theologically problematic or simply pedestrian quality of many modern productions in this field being regarded as ample evidence of this.

At a somewhat different level, there has also been a growing understanding of the importance of beauty as a theological concept, and the idea that the whole creation reflects the glory of God (cf. Ps. 19) has led some thinkers to apply this principle to a Christian understanding of the universe in which the creation and salvation of the human race is the crowning achievement which brings glory to God the Creator and Redeemer. This idea can be found, for example, in the work of the eighteenth-century American theologian Jonathan Edwards, but it has been most extensively developed in the work of the twentieth-century Roman Catholic theologian Hans Urs von Balthasar, who reacted against the apparent denigration of creation which he and others perceived in the work of Karl Barth. Balthasar wrote a seven-volume work called The Glory of the Lord in which he developed the importance of aesthetics for our understanding of God, and in the process reinterpreted the concept of God's glory by concentrating on the beauty of the divine perfection as its principal manifestation.

If this approach is to be adopted, the paradoxical quality of the revelation of God's glory needs to be taken into account. Christian theology is primarily a theologia crucis, stressing that the glory of God is revealed most fully and profoundly in the suffering and death of Jesus Christ, who became sin for us and died in order to take that sin away. In doing this, 'he had no beauty or majesty to attract us to him' (Isa. 53:2). A theologia gloriae which ignored or downplayed this point would fail to do justice to biblical teaching and is unlikely to strike deep roots in the Christian tradition.

Bibliography

H. U. von Balthasar, The Glory of the Lord, 7 vols. (Edinburgh, 1982–91); G. Wainwright, Doxology: The Praise of God in Worship, Doctrine and Life: A Systematic Theology (London, 1980).

G. L. BRAY

GNOSTICISM

The modern terms 'gnosis' and 'gnosticism' derive from the Greek words gnōsis ('knowledge') and gnōstikos ('pertaining to knowledge'). Such knowledge originally referred to what could be perceived through reason and later to mystical knowledge. However, the use of the term in late antiquity as a title for a specific group of people and their heretical beliefs as opposed to describing various forms of such belief has been called into question. Modern use of the term 'gnosticism' appears to date from the seventeenth century, derived from the word gnōsis in the full Greek title of Irenaeus' Against Heresies. Some recent scholars have called for the term to be redefined or abandoned on the grounds that it is either an unhelpful means of describing a wide range of phenomena or suggests a single identifiable sect or religion, a position that is debated. Similarly, the current tendency to understand gnosticism as originating in pre-Christian Jewish Sethianism has been questioned, seeing it instead as a *heresy arising from within Christianity.

Patristic sources

Following the discovery of the Nag Hammadi gnostic texts in 1945, it became apparent that while the writers used a range of self-designations (including Christians, race of Seth and immoveable race), they did not use gnōstikos (or a Coptic equivalent) for this purpose. Before this discovery the primary source of information on gnostics came from early heresiologists and polemicists such as *Justin Martyr, *Irenaeus, *Origen, *Tertullian, Hippolytus and Epiphanius. Although their works preserved extracts of gnostic writings, their principal aim was one of self-definition, establishing a Christian identity distinct from heresy, Judaism and Greco-Roman society and thought. Of particular significance and influence has been Irenaeus' Against Heresies (which may be dependent in part upon Justin Martyr) in which he identifies a range of figures and groups holding gnostic beliefs which he describes and then argues against their theological positions. Hippolytus, drawing on Irenaeus, similarly identified and countered gnostic sects in his Refutation of all Heresies, and Epiphanius' Panarion ('Medicine Chest'), if somewhat unreliably, identifies a number of gnostic sects, seeking to explain how they related to others.

Gnostic leaders

Justin, Irenaeus and Hippolytus all claim that Simon Magus (Acts 8) was the founder of gnostic heresy (and, for Irenaeus, many other sects as well), but this is now doubted not least because of the confusing and conflicting descriptions of the beliefs associated with him. According to Irenaeus, Simon's successor was another Samaritan, Menander, who also worked in Antioch and claimed that anyone baptized into him would not die. The second-century Saturninus of Antioch and Basilides of Alexandria were both understood to be dependent upon Simon and Menander. Irenaeus explains that the former held that an unknown father created angels (one of whom was the 'God of the Jews') who then created human beings and that he had a *docetic view of Christ. The account of Basilides' teaching is differently reported: by Irenaeus, who attributes to him a dualistic system, and by Hippolytus a *monistic system. Cerinthus, from Asia Minor and teaching in the early second century, also held that the world was created by lesser beings than the supreme unknown God and maintained a docetic *Christology, but he is also associated with the *Ebionites. There is some dispute as to whether *Marcion of Sinope should be regarded as gnostic. His Christology was docetic, and he distinguished between the Creator God of the Jews and the God revealed by Christ, rejecting the OT and establishing the first canon of the NT, consisting of Luke's Gospel and ten Pauline letters from which he excised anything that he regarded as a Jewish interpolation or corruption of the original text. However, he does not exhibit traits that scholars commonly associate with gnosticism: his emphasis on faith rather than gnōsis; his rejection of allegorical interpretations of Jewish scripture; the lack of a myth associating the God of Jesus with creation; and the absence of any teaching on humans having within them a divine spark destined to return to its original spiritual realm.

Before the discovery of the Nag Hammadi texts, the most famous gnostic teacher was Valentinus, an Alexandrian Christian who gained a wide following in Rome when he moved there (c. 140). Irenaeus records that Valentinus adapted gnostic thought to his own system, but describes his teaching based primarily on the development of his thought taught by his disciple Ptolemy. From the realm (plērōma) of the good, unknown God there emanates an elaborate series of aeons or eternities, and it is from the lowest and fallen of these, Sophia (wisdom), that there came into being the demiurge or God of the OT who created the visible world; there is thus a dualistic separation of the spiritual and material worlds. The aeon Christ was understood to have descended into Jesus at his baptism in order to teach people about their heavenly origin and enable them to return to the heavenly realm. Valentinus thus divided humanity into three categories: pneumatics (i.e. Valentinians) to whom this gnōsis is given; psychics who are Christians living by faith but can only reach the middle realm of the demiurge; and hylics, the rest of humanity destined for destruction.

In the Nag Hammadi Gospel of Truth, often attributed to Valentinus or to the Valentinian school, Christ is said to reveal the truth of the Father and restore unity with him through his teaching and resurrection.

Gnostic sources

Before the twentieth century three Coptic gnostic codices were discovered. The fifth-century Codex Brucianus contained two works, one untitled and the other the Books of Jeu. The latter, probably dating originally from the late third century, contain revelations of Christ to his disciples; the various names of the 'true God' and Father of Christ, Jeu (a variant of YHWH), are illustrated with ideographs. The Books of Jeu are referred to in the fourth-century Pistis Sophia (Codex Askewianus) which contains further revelations of Christ to his disciples. The fifth-century Codex Bezae Cantabrigiae (published in 1955) contains four works: the Gospel of Mary, which consists of a dialogue between Jesus and his disciples, including a special revelation to his favourite, Mary Magdalene; an Apocryphon ('secret book') of John; the tractate Sophia of Jesus Christ containing mythological material; and an Act of Peter. The first two codices were held to represent a later form of gnosticism that offered little of importance concerning the origins of gnosticism and Christianity, and so they received little serious attention.

The Mandaean community of modern Iran and Iraq has been held out as the last surviving gnostic sect. The study of Mandaean materials has suggested to some a pre-Christian oriental origin for gnosticism. *History of religions scholars used this material to reconstruct an artificial gnostic redeemer myth which, while it is found in no single ancient literary source, has had a considerable influence on how gnosticism has been understood. *Manichaeism had a much less positive view of the demiurge and the world. It arose in Iran in the third century and has been seen not only as influenced by gnostic ideas, but also as a later development of gnosticism that for the history of religions school could shed light on its origins.

The Nag Hammadi library, containing a large body of mainly gnostic material, has had a significant impact on gnostic studies in recent years. Although matters of authorship, origin and date are still debated, it has been seen as a collection of material arising from a community that saw itself as Christian with a unifying myth and rite of initiation. The correlation between this heterogeneous collection of texts and heresiological accounts of gnostic thought is limited and the diverse perspectives and literary genres contained within them has led to much debate on such matters as classification, origins and definitions. It has also been suggested that it was originally part of a Christian monastic library, though whether for heresiological or edificatory purposes is uncertain. The variety in the material has also suggested that the distinction between orthodoxy and heresy in early Christian Egypt was not clearly defined. The fifty-two writings in the library frequently reflect biblical literary genres, and several of the works appear more than once. Particularly significant among these is the Apocryphon of John, of which there are three copies (a fourth copy is extant in another manuscript further suggesting its importance); some of the Church Fathers, especially Irenaeus, appear to have been familiar with some version of it. Mythological in nature, the Apocryphon of John describes secret mysteries revealed to the apostle by Christ after the resurrection on such matters as the nature of divinity and levels of it, humanity (including its fall and salvation), the heavenly realm, visible creation (including how it came into being and the subdivine powers that control it), the origin of evil and how to escape this evil world and return to the heavenly realm. The library also includes the well-known Gospel of Thomas, which does not seem to have been gnostic originally, but appears to have been influenced by gnostic ideas as the text was edited. It contains numerous supposedly secret sayings of Jesus (many with NT parallels) which develop a theme of self-recognition in order to discover what is hidden; by gaining knowledge of one's divine origin, salvation is achieved through leaving behind all that binds one to the corruptible world.

Common features

Although there is no systematic gnostic theology and a wide variety of gnostic ideas are found in both Christian polemical and gnostic writings, beliefs common to different gnostic systems can be identified, some of which have already been noted. Anticosmic ('world rejecting') *dualism is frequently seen as a distinctive characteristic of gnosticism; the world is regarded as evil, as sometimes is its Creator, the demiurge often seen as the God of the OT, who is separate from the good, supreme and unknown God. However, this needs to be treated with caution, as the Nag Hammadi texts do not support such a generalized and consistent view. Sparks of divine light are said to be trapped in the bodies of the elect élite (pneumatics), or sometimes all people, who are unaware of their divine origin. A redeemer (often a docetic Christ) is therefore sent to give them secret gnōsis of their true nature and enable them to escape the evil world and return to the world of light. The archons (rulers of this world) attempt to prevent the soul's ascent through the aeons to be reunited with God, but the use of secret formulae provided by Jesus facilitates the journey. However, the redeemer myth is not so consistently expressed as this might suggest. It has long been held that the gnostic negative view of the world coupled with the need of gnōsis rather than faith or works for salvation perhaps goes some way to explaining the ascetic and licentious behaviour associated with gnosticism; both responses can be seen as rejection or means of overcoming the evil world. Gnostic texts do advocate or at least imply forms of ascetic self-denial and renunciation aimed at achieving something of the perfection and serenity that would be fully enjoyed when the soul had returned to the plērōma. The libertine model of gnostic ethics has been challenged, not least because of the lack of evidence for this in the Nag Hammadi texts. It has been suggested that the only direct, if debatably gnostic, evidence of sexual licence is found in the extensive quotations by Clement of Alexandria from Epiphaneus' Concerning Righteousness. Epiphaneus, not unlike his father Carpocrates, if Irenaeus' depiction of him is accurate, regarded monogamy as an unnatural limitation imposed by human law on God's plan for sexual freedom. However, there is far more evidence for *asceticism than for libertinism. Rites such as baptism, which included chrismation with scented ointment, and the Eucharist tended to be spiritualized as symbols of gnōsis.

Conclusion

There is no clear consensus on how gnosticism should be defined, and the diverse nature of the evidence for gnostic beliefs from Christian polemicists and gnostic texts suggests a variety of thought rather than a single system. Although gnostic texts provide evidence of the context in which Christianity developed, the extent to which, for example, the extracanonical gospels contribute to our understanding of Jesus hinges largely on their date. However, the contemporary fascination with such texts and the appeal of gnosticism to, for example, New Age groups demonstrates the importance of contemporary engagement with them.

Bibliography

C. A. Evans, Fabricating Jesus: How Modern Scholars Distort the Gospels (Nottingham, 2007); H. Jonas, The Gnostic Religion (London, 1992); K. L. King, What Is Gnosticism? (Cambridge, MA and London, 2003); B. Layton, The Rediscovery of Gnosticism, 2 vols. (Leiden, 1980–81); A. H. B. Logan, The Gnostics: Identifying an Early Christian Cult (London and New York, 2006); C. Marksches, Gnosis: An Introduction (ET, London and New York, 2003); B. A. Pearson, Gnosticism and Christianity in Roman and Coptic Egypt (London and New York, 2004); J. M. Robinson, The Nag Hammadi Library in English (San Francisco, 1988); K. Rudolph, Gnosis: The Nature and History of an Ancient Religion (ET, Edinburgh, 1983); M. A. Williams, Rethinking 'Gnosticism': An Argument for Dismantling a Dubious Category (Princeton and Chichester, 1996); E. M. Yamauchi, Pre-Christian Gnosticism: A Survey of the Proposed Evidences (Grand Rapids, 1983).

A. D. RICH

GOD

The church confesses, worships and serves God, as he has revealed himself in Scripture.

The identity of God

In Christian *monotheism, following biblical *revelation, God is understood in two ways: through the doctrine of the *Trinity; and through an account of the divine perfections.

Monotheism

History demonstrates a variety of views of the divine. Christian accounts are *theistic, rather than *deistic or *pantheistic, and monotheistic rather than *polytheistic. Deism, first formulated in the seventeenth century, sees the cosmos as a closed system with its maker outside it, and so denies God's direct providential control of events and his miraculous creative interventions into the ongoing life of the world.

Pantheism, which pre-dates Christianity in Oriental religions (see *Buddhism and Christianity; *Hinduism and Christianity), recognizes no creator-creature distinction, but sees everything, good and evil included, as a direct form or expression of God. As *Coleridge put it, for a pantheist, God minus the universe leaves nothing; for a theist, God minus the universe leaves God, entire and complete.

Polytheism is more directly denounced in Scripture, as the constant form of Ancient Near Eastern and Greco-Roman religion. It posits many divine beings, limited by each other, none omnipotent. Worship must therefore be spread and allegiance divided amongst them all. (Early Christians were routinely accused of 'atheism' for their refusal to worship any and every god with which they were presented.) Monotheistic belief stresses the uniqueness of God, his independence from the world, and his involvement with the world.

Trinitarianism

Belief in God's tri-unity is distinctive, and basic, to Christian theism. While developed trinitarian theology only appears in the fourth century AD, the later theology is a faithful response to God's self-presentation in the biblical revelation. Divine works, such as creation (e.g. Col. 1:15–18) and redemption (e.g. 2 Thess. 2:13–14) are presented as the work of Father and Son, or (more rarely) Father, Son and Spirit. More tellingly, monotheistic affirmations of faith from the OT are expanded to include the Son in the NT (1 Cor. 8:6), and worship is offered to Father, Son and Spirit indifferently and together. Blessing is often given in triadic form (2 Cor. 13:14; Rev. 1:4–5). The early theologians, supremely the Cappadocian Fathers and *Augustine of Hippo, found language in which to speak of God which was adequate to this biblical data. God is one – or, perhaps better, unique (the *patristic theologians would have hesitated to 'count' God); this unique God exists eternally in three persons: Father, Son and *Holy Spirit.

The Cappadocian discussion stressed the unity of divine action (*Basil, On the Holy Spirit; *Gregory of Nyssa, Ad Ablabius; see also *Gregory of Nazianzus). God's saving act, for instance, is decreed by the Father, carried forth by the Son, and perfected by the Spirit. It remains, however, one act of one God. In this, they were simply working carefully through the necessary logic of the NT witness. Augustine switched the focus to God's eternal life. God is triune, not just in his actions in the world, but in himself from all eternity.

The divine names in the Bible

Divine names begin in the Scriptures. Although 'God' functions in Christian *worship as a proper noun, in the OT God is named in many ways, expressing the various aspects of his perfect life:

1. El, Eloah, Elohim (in English translations of the Bible, typically 'God'); El Elyon ('God most high'). These names suggest a transcendent being, superhumanly powerful, and with inexhaustible life in himself, on whom everything that is not himself depends for its being and life.
2. Adonai ('Lord'). One who rules over all else.
3. Yahweh ('the LORD'), Yahweh Sabaoth ('LORD of hosts' or 'LORD Almighty'). Yahweh is God's personal name for himself, by which his people were to invoke him as the Lord who had taken them into covenant with himself in order to do them good. When God first revealed this name to Moses (Exod. 3), he explained it as meaning 'I am what I am', or perhaps more accurately, 'I will be what I will be'. It is thus a declaration of independent, self-determining existence.

The NT identifies the God who is Father of Jesus Christ as the God of the OT, the only God there is, and it sees Christian *salvation as the fulfilment of God's promises. There is thus no space for *Marcionism, or any other system that sets the God of the OT against the God of Jesus. God is named in the NT as 'Father' (see *Fatherhood of God). 'Lord' (kurios; translating Adonai) becomes the regular term for characterizing, confessing and invoking the risen and enthroned Christ (Acts 2:36; 10:36; Rom. 10:9–13; 1 Cor. 8:6; 2 Cor. 12:8–10; Rev. 22:20, etc.). Christians are to be baptized into the 'name' (singular) of 'the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit' (Matt. 28:19). This is God's 'Christian name', as Barth happily put it.

The language of belief

Human language is all that we have for worshipping, confessing and discussing God. It is adequate, but it has to be systematically adapted for the purpose. God co-opts or commandeers our language to enable it to refer adequately to him. Scripture, in presenting God in *anthropomorphic terms, quietly witnesses to this adaptation or co-option. God's life, thoughts, attitudes and actions are presented as basically comparable to our own, although they contrast with ours in being free both from the limitations of our creaturely finiteness and from the moral flaws that are part and parcel of our fallenness. The words are thus used in Scripture in a sense analogous to, though never quite identical with, the sense they would carry if used of humans.

In the early development of theology, Basil and Gregory of Nyssa stressed in their debates with Eunomius that our language concerning God is a product of epinoia, or human construction. The words which we use to speak of God thus refer genuinely, but only imperfectly. The classic development of this theme comes in the work of St *Thomas Aquinas, who developed a nuanced account of *analogy based on the similarity of being that exists between God and the creatures because of God's own gracious gift of his life to other beings. St Thomas's account was almost immediately criticized by John *Duns Scotus, who believed that any analogy must, logically, be based on an underlying univocity, and so suggested that existence itself is true in exactly the same way for God and the creatures. God is; we are; these two statements are not distinguishable. However, an account of analogy similar to that of St Thomas was accepted on all sides of the *Reformation debate.

In the Eastern church, St Gregory *Palamas introduced the notion of the 'divine energies', which effectively removed the perfections as descriptions of God's life at all. What we know are the energies, which serve to mediate God's presence to the world; God's life in itself remains completely unknown to us. The Western church opposed Palamas on this point, claiming that such a doctrine made speech about God too unavailable to us.

More recently, Karl *Barth has criticized what he understood Aquinas to be saying, and argued for a reversal in the direction of the analogy. We do not understand justice (say) in human terms, and then find it echoed in God; true justice is divine justice, and any human analogue is a pale and distorted shadow. Whether Barth was right to accuse Aquinas of arguing the former must be questioned; his positive point, however, is significant. God is the primary reality; creaturely existence is secondary, derivative and dependent. 'This is love: not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and sent his Son as an atoning sacrifice for our sins' (1 John 4:10).

The perfections of God

The 'perfections of God' are ways in which God is properly named, or described. Any word or concept that adequately completes the sentence 'God is . . .' is a perfection of God. Classically, the perfections of God are divided into two classes: 'uncommunicated' perfections, which are realities true only of God, and 'communicated' perfections, which are realities granted in some analogical measure to other creatures.

The uncommunicated perfections

1. God is self-existent (a se), self-sufficient and self-sustaining ('divine aseity'): God exists necessarily, with no need of help or support from the created order (cf. Acts 17:23–25). Divine aseity is God's quality of having life in and from himself. It denies any account of God which suggests he needs the world to be who he is.
2. God is simple (i.e. totally integrated), perfect and immutable: God is wholly and entirely involved in everything that he is and does. His nature, intentions and ways of acting do not change, either for the better (because the perfect cannot become better) or for the worse. His immutability is not the changelessness of an eternally frozen pose, but the moral consistency that holds him to his own principles of action and leads him to deal differently with those who change their own behaviour towards him (cf. Ps. 18:24–27). In the medieval *scholastic tradition, God was understood to be actus purus: pure activity. His changelessness must be understood under this rubric, as the constancy of a perfectly dynamic and active life.
3. God is infinite, bodiless (a spirit), omnipresent, omniscient and eternal. These words affirm that God is not bound by any of the limitations of space or time that apply to his creatures. He is always present everywhere, though imperceptibly, and is at every moment aware of all that ever was, is or shall be, and all that could have been.
4. God is purposeful, omnipotent and sovereign. God has a plan for the universe which guides its *history. In executing this plan, he governs and controls all created realities. Without violating the nature of things, and without at any stage infringing on human free agency (see *Freedom, Christian; *Will), God acts in, with and through his creatures so as to do everything that he intends exactly as he intends it. By this overruling action, despite human disobedience and demonic obstruction, he achieves his intended goals.

5. God is both transcendent over, and immanent in, his world. These nineteenth-century words express the thought that on the one hand God is distinct from his world and does not need it; while on the other hand he permeates the world in sustaining creative power (see *Creation), shaping and steering it in a way that keeps it on its planned course.
6. God is impassible. This means, not that God is impassive and unfeeling (a frequent misunderstanding), but that no created beings can change God's intentions or life without his previously intending it. God enters human suffering and grief, as Scripture testifies abundantly, and the *cross proves beyond all doubt, but he does so by his own deliberate decision. He is never simply acted upon by his creatures. Recent theology has often criticized the idea of divine *impassibility (see, classically, *Moltmann, The Crucified God), arguing that it is an improper accretion from Greek philosophy, foreign to the gospel story, and that belief in God in a suffering world is rendered difficult or impossible by the doctrine. Against this, we should note that divine impassibility is not a claim that God is unable to sympathize with our sufferings, but a claim that no creature can harm, damage or impede God. Only if God is *sovereign and omnipotent in this way can we hope that he will be able to overcome the troubles and evil of the world and bring, finally, the eschatological *kingdom where 'there will be no more death or mourning or crying or pain' (Rev. 21:4).
7. God is incomprehensible. After listing all these perfections of God, it is important to stress again that God's life cannot be encompassed by human language. Our words point, haltingly and imperfectly, towards the single, simple perfection that God is. However, we do not understand or define God's nature. We witness to the nature of his perfection, far beyond our understanding, with worship and awe.

The communicated perfections

In God's dealings with humanity we see many divine perfections displayed that have analogues in human life. God's justice is comparable to human concepts of *justice, even if it is infinitely beyond any human reality. God is Jesus-like, for *Jesus is God in the flesh. The key affirmations we can make concerning God's character would seem to be these:

1. God is holy *love (see also *Love of God): the essence of all love is giving prompted by goodwill, with joy in the recipients' benefit. The statement, 'God is love' (1 John 4:8), is explained in context as meaning that God gave his Son as a propitiatory *sacrifice for human sin to bring believers to new life (see *Atonement). Love that gives freely, without regard for the worth of the recipient, is at the heart of the NT account of God's life – not just in his relationships with the world, but in his own inner life, according to John 5:20 and 14:31. Giving in order to make the recipient great must be understood as the moral shape of the triune God's own life.
 God is also 'the Holy One'. Holiness, in the Bible, suggests separateness from the world, purity and hatred of moral evil (see *Sanctification). Accounts of love that ignore such realities are simply deficient, biblically. Rather, God's love is holy love, and God's holiness is loving holiness. The cross is classically understood as the place where God demonstrates both his holiness and his love to the utmost degree.
2. God is moral perfection. God is not just awesome but also adorable. His moral perfections, such as his truthfulness, faithfulness, *grace, mercy, loving-kindness, patience, constancy, wisdom, justice, goodness and generosity, are supremely beautiful and inspire adoration, devotion and praise. Theology has not begun, and God has not been known at all, unless the study of God's nature and character results in heartfelt worship.

See also: CHRISTOLOGY.

Bibliography

K. Barth, CD, I.1, II.1, 2; H. Bavinck, The Doctrine of God (Grand Rapids, 1952); D. G.

Bloesch, God the Almighty (Downers Grove, 2005); G. Bray, The Doctrine of God (Leicester, 1993); A. Coppedge, Portraits of God (Downers Grove, 2001); J. M. Frame, The Doctrine of God: A Theology of Lordship (Phillipsburg, 2002); C. Kaiser, The Doctrine of God: An Historical Survey (London, 1982); V.-M. Kärkkäinen, The Doctrine of God: A Global Introduction (Grand Rapids, 2004); R. H. Nash, The Concept of God (Grand Rapids, 1983).

S. R. HOLMES

GOGARTEN, FRIEDRICH (1887–1967)

Gogarten was a German Lutheran pastor turned systematic theologian who taught in Jena (1925–31) and later became Professor in Breslau (1931–5) and Göttingen (1935–55). Gogarten partnered with Karl *Barth, Eduard Thurneysen (1888–1977) and George Merz (1892–1959) to found the journal Zwischen den Zeiten (Between the Times) and the dialectical theology movement along with Emil *Brunner and Rudolf *Bultmann. A staunch opponent of Weimar Germany, but never a National Socialist, Gogarten was briefly associated with the German Christians in 1933, directly criticizing Barth and the *Confessing Church, but retracting his position only months later when German Christian anti-Semitism became explicit.

Gogarten's early theology attempted to avoid the 'timeless truths' of both idealism and orthodoxy and eventually located one of the foundations for theology in an *existentialist anthropology by reversing Martin *Buber's formula to Thou-I in order to de-emphasize the priority of the self, an overall *anthropological turn earning Barth's public disavowal. The later Gogarten relied on Bultmann's programme of *demythologization to endorse Christianity as the world's pre-eminent secularizing force that ended public mythology by relating Christianity to faith and worldly affairs to reason. Both periods are united by Gogarten's interests in anthropology, law and gospel, history and ethics.

Bibliography

Works: Ich Glaube an den dreienigen Gott (Jena, 1926); Demythologizing and History (ET, London, 1955); Der Mensch Zwischen

Gott und Welt (Stuttgart, 1967); Christ the Crisis (ET, London, 1970).

Studies: L. Shiner, The Secularization of History: An Introduction to the Theology of Friedrich Gogarten (Nashville, 1966).

D. A. GILLAND

GOODWIN, THOMAS (1600–80)

Academically gifted and religiously sensitive, Goodwin left Norfolk for Cambridge University when he was still just twelve years old. Graduating at sixteen, he excelled in his academic development, yet he was initially more interested in popularity than spiritual reality. This changed in 1620 when, hearing a funeral sermon, he was deeply disturbed about his sin and spent seven years looking for peace. When Goodwin had a very definite experience of 'new birth', he was a transformed man: as the living God 'created the world and the matter of all things by a word, so he created and put a new life and spirit into my soul, and so great an alteration was strange to me'. This experience helps to explain the experimental warmth throughout the ministry of Goodwin.

Goodwin became a *Congregationalist in 1634, and in 1643, along with his friends Nye, Burroughs, Bridge and Simpson, he was appointed to the Westminster Assembly, leading the Congregationalist party and later working to produce the Savoy Declaration of 1658. At the Restoration Goodwin felt that he could no longer maintain his work in Oxford, and in 1660 he left the university and settled in London, later establishing City Temple in Holborn. The members of his Oxford congregation followed him to London where he remained throughout the plague and the Great Fire. He spent his life studying how Jesus is the total answer to the sin and corruption of *Adam, and on his deathbed Goodwin confessed, full of assurance, that he had 'the whole righteousness of Christ'.

Bibliography

The Works of Thomas Goodwin, 12 vols., facsimile of 1861–66 version of Nichol's Standard Divines (Grand Rapids, 2006).

P. R. BLACKHAM

GOOD WORKS, see SANCTIFICATION

GORE, CHARLES (1853–1932)

Gore was an Anglo-Catholic leader and scholar, and Bishop of Worcester (1902–5), Birmingham (1905–11) and Oxford (1911–19). Scion of an aristocratic family, Gore was educated at Harrow where his early ‘Catholic’ spirituality was nurtured by, among others, B. F. *Westcott. An outstanding undergraduate at Balliol, Oxford, he was elected fellow of Trinity College in 1875. As vice-principal of the newly founded theological college at Cuddesdon (1880–83), and as first Principal Librarian of the new *Anglo-Catholic study centre in Oxford, Pusey House (1884–93), Gore exerted a personal and spiritual influence comparable to that of J. H. *Newman. These early years were also Gore’s most significant theologically, as he controversially sought to imbue traditional Tractarianism with the modern spirit of a critical scripturalism in his quest for an effective popular dogmatic. His The Ministry of the Christian Church (1888, new edn 1919) is, however, a spirited conservative defence of High Church views of the historical origins of episcopacy. His liberal catholicism came to fruition in his contribution to, and editorship of, the controversial volume of Oxford essays by like-minded scholars, Lux Mundi: A Series of Studies in the Religion of the Incarnation (1889). Traditional Tractarians were further discomfited by Gore’s Bampton Lectures, The Incarnation of the Son of God (1891), which not only contained a Greek patristic reaffirmation of the dogmatic centrality of the incarnation, but also claimed that Christ’s full earthly humanity involved a voluntary self-emptying (*kenosis) of his divine knowledge and a resultant human ignorance.

No narrow-minded academic aristocrat, Gore was passionately concerned for social justice and for a credible grass-roots manifestation of Christian thought and life: hence, his lifelong involvement with the Oxford Mission to Calcutta and the *Christian Socialist Union, and his civic involvement and support of the Workers Educational Association when Bishop of Birmingham. Gore wedded an Anglo-Catholic apologetic to this concern for Christian social action. His Dissertations (1895), The Body of Christ (1905), Christ and Society (1928), and exposition of the Sermon on the Mount (1896) reveal a Catholic sacramental dogmatic accompanying his call for Christian service in church and world.

Despite successful episcopal labours, Gore became increasingly isolated, vigorously and unpopularity denouncing a progressive Anglo-Catholicism which commended liturgical supplementation (e.g. reservation of the Eucharist) and credal laxity. He devoted his last years in London to teaching and writing, notably in defence of the Christian faith (cf. his dogmatic trilogy Belief in God, 1922, Belief in Christ, 1922, The Holy Spirit and the Church, 1924) and of his Anglo-Catholic position (e.g. his critique, The Anglo-Catholic Movement Today, 1925).

Bibliography

J. Carpenter, Gore, A Study in Liberal Catholic Thought (London, 1960); W. R. Inge, in Edinburgh Review 207 (1908), pp. 79–104; G. L. Prestige, The Life of Charles Gore: A Great Englishman (London, 1935); A. R. Vidler, ‘Charles Gore and Liberal Catholicism’ in Essays in Liberalism (London, 1957); A. T. P. Williams in DNB (1931–1940), pp. 349–353.

C. D. HANCOCK

GOSPEL

The gospel describes the core proclamation of the Christian faith, centred on *Jesus Christ and the divine plan of *redemption fulfilled in his life, death, resurrection and renewal of creation. The Old English word godspel translated the Greek term euangelion, meaning ‘glad tidings’ or ‘good news’. Lutheran dogmatics tends formally to distinguish the ‘law’ of the old covenant from the ‘gospel’ of the new, but lexically at least euangelion and its variants appear in both the LXX and the NT. In Isa. 40:9 and 52:7–10 the returning exiles become heralds of joy to Jerusalem, Judah and the nations. In Isa. 61:1–2, an anointed redeemer preaches good news to the poor and liberty to captives. Jesus significantly applies this Messianic text to himself when launching his own mission (Luke 4:18–21). Indeed, while the key accounts of Jesus’ ministry were not formally named ‘Gospels’ until the second century, it is significant that Mark identifies his narrative from the outset as ‘the gospel about Jesus Christ, the Son of God’ (Mark 1:1).

Matthew and Mark in particular associate the gospel with the ‘kingdom’ or ‘reign’ of God, as demonstrated most vividly in Jesus’ miracles and parables (Matt. 4:23; 9:35; Mark 1:14–15; 4:26). Whereas certain more pietistic traditions have presented 'gospel ministry' largely in terms of individual *conversion, growing theological appreciation of this link between gospel and *kingdom over the past century or so has led most Christian bodies to articulate a broader understanding which relates the gospel to social justice, communal well-being and *ecological stewardship, as well as to personal *salvation. Echoing the Hebrew concept of shalom, this definition underlies the *Barmen Declaration, drafted by the German Confessing Church in opposition to Nazism. It is also reflected in the evangelical *Lausanne Covenant, with its emphasis on the 'whole church' taking the 'whole gospel' to the 'whole world'.

Euangelion and its cognates appear even more often in Paul's letters than in the Synoptics. Here the message proclaimed by Jesus is seen more explicitly to have been embodied by him in the fact that he died for sinners, was buried and was raised from the tomb (1 Cor. 15:3–5). Thus, Jesus not only declares the good news; he is the good news (Rom. 1:1–4, 9; 1 Cor. 9:12b; 2 Cor. 4:4). Just as he is divine, eternal and unparalleled, so is the gospel; and just as this gospel must be proclaimed, so also it must be faithfully heard, received and applied for *salvation (1 Cor. 9:16–23). Thus for individuals, societies and the world as a whole, the gospel is nothing less than a matter of life and death.

'*Evangelical theology' is the term given to that historical tradition of theology and church life which, since the Reformation, has centred on the euangelion. Although at various times in the past evangelical understanding of the gospel has tended towards more personalized forms of conversion, in other periods and situations evangelical commitment to the authority of *Scripture has prompted a broader understanding of the gospel as concerned not only with individual salvation, but with corporate, societal and cosmic dimensions of the 'good news'. This has become especially apparent in recent mainstream expressions of evangelicalism. For these as for other authentic accounts of the gospel, while contexts may change and while understanding may grow, what has not altered, and cannot alter, is that the gospel is personified and centred in the Lord Jesus Christ.

Bibliography

C. E. Braaten, That All May Believe: Theology of the Gospel and the Mission of Church

(Grand Rapids, 2008); M. J. Erikson, Christian Theology (Grand Rapids, 2nd 1998), pp. 1069–1076; G. Friedrich, 'Euangelizomai, euangelion, proeuangelizomai, euangelistēs', in TDNT 1 vol. edn, abridged G. Bromiley (Grand Rapids, 1985), pp. 267–273; I. H. Marshall, New Testament Theology: Many Witnesses: One Gospel (Leicester, 2004); J. R. W. Stott (ed.), Making Christ Known: Historic Mission Documents from the Lausanne Movement, 1974–1989 (Carlisle, 1996); R. H. Strachan, 'The Gospel in the New Testament', in G. A. Buttrick (ed.), The Interpreter's Bible, VII (New York, 1951), pp. 3–31.

D. H. K. HILBORN

GOTTSCHALK (c. 803–69)

Gottschalk was a *Benedictine theologian, poet and monk who caused an argument over *predestination that agitated the church in France and Germany during the Carolingian era. His father, Berno, a Saxon noble, placed him in the monastery at Fulda, but when he came of age he asked to be released from his vows. This request was granted by the Synod of Mainz (829), but Louis I the Pious, on an appeal from the abbot of Gottschalk's monastery, Rabanus Maurus, reversed the decision. Gottschalk was then moved to the monastery at Orbais, where he began an intensive study of the work of *Augustine. Becoming a priest, he visited Rome and later served as a missionary in the Balkans. His constant emphasis upon double predestination led to his condemnation at the synods of Mainz (848) and Quiercy (849 and 853). He was dismissed from the priesthood, beaten until he almost died and imprisoned for life at the monastery of Hautvillers.

His view of predestination included the belief that God foreordains those he wishes to heaven or to hell, that one can have absolute certainty of salvation or damnation, that God does not will that all shall be saved, that Christ died only for the elect, and that no-one can exercise free *will for the doing of good works but only for performing evil acts. Several theologians wrote in support of his views, including *Ratramnus, Prudentius of Troyes (d. 861) and Remigius of Lyons (d. 875). When three opponents of Gottschalk's teaching, including Hincmar of Reims (c. 806–82), sent letters to Remigius to justify the harsh treatment he had received, Remigius responded in the name of the Church of Lyons with a Reply to the Three Letters, which criticized the treatment given to the monk, clarified the issues and partially supported Gottschalk's position.

The lively debate over predestination demonstrates that the issues raised in the earlier *Pelagian controversy had not been settled. They were to surface again at the time of the *Protestant Reformation and in more recent times as a result of the *Wesleyan movement. These discussions, accompanied by a certain amount of rancour, continue to divide evangelicalism in modern times. There was little new ground broken in the ninth-century phase of the argument and neither party prevailed, nor was any compromise reached. Some of Gottschalk's fellow monks tried to free him by appealing to the pope, but this attempt failed. He remained in prison unreconciled to his ecclesiastical superiors. The resentment he felt because of the severe treatment he had received probably led to the mental illness he experienced before his death. A man of great literary talent, he left several thoughtful poems that rank with the finest literature produced by the Carolingian Renaissance.

Bibliography

G. W. Bromiley, Historical Theology (Grand Rapids, 1978); J. Jolivet, Godescala d'Orbais et la Trinité (Paris, 1958); J. Pelikan, The Growth of Medieval Theology (600–1300): The Christian Tradition, vol. 3 (Chicago, 1978); K. Vielhaber, Gottschalk der Sachse (Bonn, 1956).

R. G. CLOUSE

GRACE

In its primary meaning, grace is undeserved favour, usually that extended from a superior to an inferior. The Hebrew term for this is hen and the Greek is charis, a word closely related to charisma, which means a gift of (divine) grace. As traditionally understood, the grace of God is first of all the free act by which he reaches out to sinful human beings and rescues them from condemnation, even though they have done nothing to deserve this favour. It is manifested within the context of the *covenant that God made with Israel, the nation which he chose of his own free will to represent him on earth, and in the NT to 'all people, especially of those who believe' (1 Tim. 4:10) and who, as the church, are the new people drawn from every nation and chosen for salvation in Christ, again without any action on their part which might have earned it. But the word is also used to refer to God's transforming power in those who have become his children.

It follows from this that every aspect of human *salvation is an act of divine grace, from the original *calling (election), through *redemption, *justification, *conversion, *sanctification and finally glorification by incorporation into the risen and ascended body of Christ in heaven. Its all-embracing character within the context of salvation has given rise to a number of theological developments, some of which have come to characterize particular types of Christianity. Indeed, it is not too much to say that it is the different understandings of grace, as much as anything else, which have created the main divisions within the Christian church as we know them today.

The doctrine of grace was little developed in the early church until the time of *Augustine, who was forced to respond to the challenge presented by the teaching of *Pelagius. Pelagius believed that human beings were capable of contributing to their salvation by their own efforts, though the grace of God was still required in order to bring those efforts to fruition. Augustine condemned this teaching on the ground that every aspect of our salvation is a work of God's grace to which we can add nothing. According to him, baptism is prevenient grace, given by God at the very beginning of the Christian life in order to take away the guilt of original sin. This is then complemented by co-operating grace, which God gives to souls regenerated by baptism, so that they might grow to be more like God. Then there is sufficient grace, which was given to Jesus of Nazareth so that in his human flesh he could live without sin in the world, and finally efficient grace, which sanctifies us and makes us fit to dwell in the kingdom of heaven.

In medieval *scholastic theology these different types of grace were codified and linked to different ministries of the church, which came to be seen as the great dispenser of God's grace in the world. The ways in which it was communicated to believers were known as the means of grace, which were listed and analysed by a series of medieval theologians. The church itself was a means of grace, but so too were things like prayer, the reading and exposition of Scripture, and above all the seven *sacraments. A person in good standing with the church had access to the means of grace which its ministry made available, but the church had the power to cut people off from them if it so chose (excommunication). In theory, excommunication was reserved for the most serious sins, but as time went on, it was routinely used for even minor matters of church discipline such as failure to pay tithes, and its original force was compromised accordingly.

Medieval theologians also developed the notion that grace builds on nature and perfects it. This idea gained ground after the reintroduction of pagan philosophy, in particular the science of *Aristotle, into Western Europe in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. *Thomas Aquinas and others concluded that human reason could advance only so far on its own, and that in order to receive the fullness of truth it had to be supplemented by divine revelation, which was an act of grace. In this way, they came to believe that the Bible accepted and addressed an essentially Aristotelian view of the universe, which it then rounded out with knowledge which could only be communicated by God. It was this conviction, as much as anything else, which provoked the intellectual crisis of the sixteenth century, when it was realized that Aristotle was fundamentally mistaken in many of his supposedly scientific assertions. The nature-grace dualism which scholastic theology had erected on the understanding that Aristotle and the Bible were both infallible in their respective spheres was strongly challenged and either overthrown (in Protestant countries) or reasserted by force (in Catholic countries). The tension is most clearly visible in the medieval doctrine of transubstantiation, which rested on the belief that grace transforms nature and perfects it by turning simple bread and wine into the body and blood of Christ (see *Eucharist). Scientific discoveries made this distinction untenable, and transubstantiation was accordingly rejected by Protestants, whereas the unfortunate Galileo was condemned and imprisoned for having reached the same conclusion in a Catholic environment.

*Protestantism redefined the means of grace, putting preaching at the top of the list and firmly subordinating the sacraments (now reduced in number to two) firmly to it. The work of God in the life of a believer was effected chiefly through the reception of the preached word of God, and the sermon rapidly became the central act of Protestant worship. The effects of preaching were carefully analysed into conviction of sin, righteousness and judgment, followed by conversion, sanctification and *assurance of salvation – all of them works of saving grace.

Protestantism also asked whether God's grace was aimed primarily at the forgiveness of sins or of sinners, and by opting for the latter fundamentally changed the nature of medieval theology and religious practice. By asserting that God sent his Son into the world to die for people and not for things, the Reformers raised a host of new questions which had to be answered. Did Christ die for everyone, or only for those whom he had chosen by grace before the foundation of the world? Was it possible to resist the grace of God once it got to work in a person's life? Debates over these and related questions divided the Reformed churches (see *Reformed theology) into those who answered that Christ died only for the elect, and that grace was irresistible ('strict Calvinists'), and those who believed that Christ's atoning death was universal, and individual human beings were enabled by grace to respond in faith ('mild Calvinists' or 'Arminians'). Some so-called *Arminians defended 'free will' and so were regarded by critics as proposing a revamped form of Pelagianism and therefore as deeply heretical. But Arminians true to Arminius (such as John *Wesley) insisted that the very freedom to believe was the gift of prevenient grace, but that grace was not irresistible. It is probably true to say that most Protestants today, not to speak of other Christians, hold beliefs which are closer to the Arminian position than to the Calvinist one.

Within Calvinist circles there has been a debate about the extent of God's grace, touched off mainly by questions about the status of those who do not belong to the company of the elect (see *Predestination). Nineteenth-century theologians like Charles *Hodge and Abraham *Kuyper came to believe that God had made a covenant with Adam, which was renewed in Noah and which applies to the entire human race. This is a covenant of temporal preservation, but not of eternal salvation. Under it, unbelievers are permitted to share in the work of having dominion over the creation, and within that context there is no difference between them and believers. In such fields as art, music, literature and the natural sciences, Christians are free to work alongside others to develop the creation mandate common to them both. This is why this covenant has come to be known as the covenant of common grace.

Distinct from this, though not entirely separate, is another covenant, made originally with Abraham and sealed in Jesus Christ. This is the covenant of eternal salvation which is granted only to the elect. In this world it is manifested primarily in the different thought patterns which govern the lives of believers and set them apart from others, but the real effects of this will only become fully apparent in the next life, when those who are called to believe in Christ will go to reign with him in his heavenly glory. This is the covenant of special grace. It is clearly the duty of the church to bear witness to this grace, but Protestant theologians, unlike their *Roman Catholic counterparts, do not see the church as the exclusive vehicle of it. The Christian family, Christian schools and even Christian political parties may also have a role to play in ministering God's special grace, which is not confined to a clerical élite, but to a *priesthood which extends to all believers. There is thus no real distinction between the 'sacred' and the 'secular', because everything is sacred in God's eyes. Nor can it be said that there is a radical distinction between nature and grace, since everything belongs to the realm of grace, whether people are conscious of this or not.

In practice, many Christians find it very difficult to absorb the notion of common grace, and most of the time the term refers only to God's initiative in salvation. At the same time, Protestants are much more likely than Roman Catholics to reject clericalism and to believe that the grace of God is given to all believers. The ordained clergy may be trained to fulfil certain functions within the church, but they have not received a particular grace which sets them above the laity in any objective sense.

The *Eastern Orthodox tradition has developed a very different understanding of grace from anything found in the West. It has steadfastly refused to analyse it or separate it into different theological compartments, and despite some similarities with Roman Catholicism, it has consistently attacked the Roman doctrine (and by implication the Protestant ones as well) for holding to a doctrine of 'created grace' which can be quantified and dispensed in varying proportions. To the Orthodox mind, grace is fundamentally a charismatic experience of God which can take many forms, of which the highest is the beatific vision of the Lord granted to those who have been transfigured by the divine light, or 'deified' as Orthodox theologians somewhat misleadingly tend to phrase it. In this understanding, although grace can be given to anyone, it is most clearly present in the lives of those who have forsaken the cares of the world for a life of mystical contemplation in preparation for the perfect union with Christ in heaven.

Varied though its manifestations are, the basic connection between grace and salvation remains at the core of Christian teaching even today, and at the popular level it is as visible and influential as ever. The popularity of a hymn like 'Amazing Grace', even outside church circles, is a clear reminder of this. More elaborate schemes remain the province of minorities, but for ordinary Christians grace is a term associated most readily with the saving work of Christ, which remains at the heart of all Christian worship and proclamation.

Bibliography

J. P. Burns, The Development of Augustine's Doctrine of Operative Grace (Paris, 1980); W. D. Buschart, Exploring Protestant Traditions (Downers Grove, 2006); D. Engelsma, Common Grace Revisited (Grandville, 2003); J. M. Ensor, The Great Work of the Gospel: How We Experience God's Grace (Wheaton, 2006); A. T. Evans, The Grace of God (Chicago, 2004); D. Fairbairn, Grace and Christology in the Early Church (Oxford, 2003); M. S. Horton, God of Promise: Introducing Covenant Theology (Grand Rapids, 2006); R. K. Johnston et al., Grace upon Grace: Essays in Honor of Thomas A. Langford (Nashville, 1999); R. T. Kendall, Grace (Lake Mary, 2006); G. I. Mantzarides, The Deification of Man (Crestwood, 1984); J. Oman, Grace and Personality (Cambridge, 1931); C. Ryder Smith, The Bible Doctrine of Grace (London, 1956); T. F. Torrance, The Doctrine of Grace in the Apostolic Fathers (Edinburgh, 1948); C. Van Til, Common Grace (Philadelphia, 1947); G. A. Wilterdink, Tyrant or Father? A Study of Calvin's Doctrine of God (Bristol, 1985).

G. L. BRAY

GRATIAN, see CANON LAW

GREGORY OF NAZIANZUS (c. 329–90)

Gregory, also known as Gregory the Theologian, was one of the three great Cappadocian Fathers (with *Basil and *Gregory of Nyssa). He formed a close friendship with Basil, later the leading figure of the group, while they were students in Athens. After his return to Cappadocia, Gregory reluctantly submitted to be ordained a presbyter to help his aged father, the Bishop of Nazianzus. A sermon preached subsequently (Oration II) is a seminal work of pastoral theology. Later Gregory was consecrated bishop against his will to help Basil, by then the metropolitan Bishop of Caesarea, in an ecclesiastical power struggle. After Basil's death, he was called to lead the tiny remnant of orthodox Christians in Constantinople, capital of the Eastern Roman Empire. Gregory's outstanding oratory and the accession of the Emperor Theodosius I led to the triumph of orthodoxy over *Arianism. After becoming Bishop of Constantinople and briefly presiding at the Council of *Constantinople (381), Gregory resigned and retired thankfully to Cappadocia.

Gregory's theology is to be found in his sermons, letters and poems. The five Theological Orations, preached in Constantinople in 380, contain his classic exposition of the doctrine of the *Trinity. After emphasizing the purification necessary for the theologian and the incomprehensibility of *God, he expounds the doctrine of the Trinity in terms of relationships within the Godhead. The Father is the begetter and emitter, the Son is the begotten and the Holy Spirit is the emission. The begetting of the Son and the procession of the Spirit are beyond time, so that all three are coeternal. While the Father may be greater than the Son in the sense that he is the cause, he is not greater by nature, for the two are of the same nature. The names, Father and Son, make known to us an intimate relation within the Godhead.

On this basis, Gregory strongly defends the deity of the *Holy Spirit. The Spirit must be either a creature or God, and only the latter alternative can give coherence to Christian doctrine. The Spirit, however, is neither begotten nor unbegotten, but the one who proceeds (to ekporeuton). The distinction of the three is thus preserved in the one nature. Gregory unequivocally proclaims what Basil had expressed so guardedly, that the Spirit is God and consubstantial with the Father.

Gregory's main contribution to the development of *Christology was in his opposition to *Apollinarius. He argued that the whole of human nature which fell in Adam must be united to the Son, body, soul and mind, 'for the unassumed is the unhealed'.

Bibliography

Works: ET of selected works by C. G. Browne and J. E. Swallow in NPNF, second series, vol. 7 (1894; repr. Grand Rapids, 1974); cf. also E. R. Hardy and C. C. Richardson, Christology of the Later Fathers (LCC 3, London, 1954).

Studies: C. A. Beeley, Gregory of Nazianzus on the Trinity and the Knowledge of God (Oxford, 2008); B. Daley, Gregory of Nazianzus (London and New York, 2006); J. L. González, A History of Christian Thought, vol. 1 (Nashville, 1970); J. N. D. Kelly, Early Christian Doctrines (London, 1977); J. A. McGuckin, St Gregory of Nazianzus: An Intellectual Biography (New York, 2001); F. W. Norris, Faith Gives Fullness to Reasoning: The Five Theological Orations of Gregory Nazianzen (Leiden, 1991); R. R. Ruether, Gregory of Nazianzus: Rhetor and Philosopher (Oxford, 1969); I. P. Sheldon-Williams in CHLGEMP, pp. 438–447; J. H. Srawley in ERE III, pp. 212–217; H. H. Watkins in DCB II, pp. 741–761; D. F. Winslow, The Dynamics of Salvation: A Study in Gregory of Nazianzus (Cambridge, MA, 1979).

T. A. NOBLE

GREGORY OF NYSSA (c. 335–95)

Gregory was the youngest of the three Cappadocian Fathers (together with his elder brother *Basil of Caesarea, and their friend *Gregory of Nazianzus). In the late ninth century, he helped to bring about the victory of Nicene orthodoxy over *Arianism and give definitive shape to the doctrine of the *Trinity. Gregory lacked the university education of the other two, but became like them a teacher of rhetoric and surpassed them as a speculative thinker. He was created Bishop of Nyssa in 372 by Basil to assist him in an ecclesiastical power struggle. After Basil's death, Gregory was one of the leading figures at the Council of *Constantinople in 381.

Gregory's contribution to the Cappadocian doctrine of the Trinity is most succinctly expressed in his short treatise, That We Should Not Think of Saying There Are Three Gods.

The Cappadocians had balanced the emphasis of *Athanasius and the older Nicenes on the unity and common ousia (substance) of the Trinity with an emphasis on the distinctiveness of the three hypostaseis (persons). But this could lead to the danger of *tritheism, especially if the analogy of three men sharing the same substance of humanity is used. But Gregory argues that we ought not to speak of three gods sharing the same substance of deity (or Godhead), because it is actually inaccurate and misleading to speak of three men when the ‘man’ (i.e. the human nature) in them is one and the same. Furthermore, the analogy falls short, in that three men may pursue activities separately, whereas in God, each act towards the created world is common to all three, having its origin in the Father, proceeding through the Son and being perfected by the Spirit. Gregory’s dogmatic works also include an important treatise Against Eunomius and a treatise against *Apollinarius.

A fuller account of Christian doctrine is given in The Catechetical Oration, written to help the instruction of converts. Here the influence of Neoplatonism (see *Platonism) and of *Origen is evident in his interpretation of the Christian doctrines of *creation, humanity (particularly *sexuality) and *evil.

Gregory is more faithful to the orthodox tradition than Origen, yet he clearly teaches *universalism, a redemption and restoration of the whole creation (including the devil). Those not purified in this life will be purified by fire after death. Gregory’s originality is seen particularly in his doctrine of the *atonement and of the *Eucharist. He explains the atonement in terms of the paying of the ransom (the life of Christ) to Satan (see *Redemption), who took it ‘like a greedy fish’ swallowing ‘bait’, not realizing that the Godhead was concealed within the flesh ‘like a fishhook’. This grotesque imagery, together with any idea of a ransom being paid to the devil, has generally been rejected by the church. The merits of Gregory’s theory lay in its objective and cosmic view of the atonement and in the way in which he linked it to the divine attributes of goodness, power, justice and wisdom. His doctrine of the Eucharist arises from his understanding of the physical aspect of salvation in the *resurrection of the body. He taught that *salvation was communicated to the body through the Eucharist. The bread and wine became the elements of the body of Christ through the words of consecration, so that as we receive them our bodies share in divine immortality.

Gregory is also noted for his influential *mystical writings in which he traces three stages in the ascent of the soul from apatheia, freedom from passion, through gnōsis, mystical knowledge in which the senses are left behind, to theōria, the highest stage of contemplation in which (since a created soul cannot see God) one passes into the limitless ascent into the divine darkness.

Bibliography

Works: ET of selected works by W. Moore and H. A. Wilson in NPNF, second series, vol. 5 (1890; repr. Grand Rapids, 1976); cf. also E. R. Hardy and C. C. Richardson, Christology of the Later Fathers (LCC 3, London, 1954).

Studies: L. Ayres, Nicaea and Its Legacy (Oxford, 2004), pp. 344–363; S. Coakley et al., Re-thinking Gregory of Nyssa (Oxford, 2003); J. L. González, A History of Christian Thought, vol. 1 (Nashville, 1970); J. N. D. Kelly, Early Christian Doctrines (London, ⁵1977); M. Ludlow, Gregory of Nyssa: Ancient and Post(modern) (Oxford, 2007); A. Meredith, Gregory of Nyssa (New York, 1999); I. P. Sheldon-Williams in CHLGEMP, pp. 447–456; J. H. Srawley in ERE III, pp. 212–217; L. Turcescu, Gregory of Nyssa and the Concept of Divine Persons (Oxford, 2005); E. Venables in DCB II, pp. 761–768.

T. A. NOBLE

GREGORY OF RIMINI (c. 1300–58)

Gregory was born at Rimini in Italy. Having become an Augustinian friar, he proceeded to study and then to lecture in theology. From 1341 to 1351 he taught at Paris. In 1351 he returned to the Augustinian house at Rimini, becoming in 1356 and 1357 vicar general and prior general of the order. His most important surviving work is a commentary on the first two books of Peter *Lombard’s Sentences.

Gregory’s theology has been described as an *Augustinian response to the questions of the fourteenth century. He accepted, with his contemporaries, the separation of *faith and reason, revealed truth and natural knowledge. He emphasized the limits of reason and the inscrutability of God’s ways. He based theology on God’s *revelation, allowing little scope for a *natural theology. He was a philosophical *nominalist. Thus far, Gregory was in accord with the dominant and radically untraditional Ockhamist school (see *William of Ockham). But Gregory's theology, more traditional than theirs, was a return to the teaching of Augustine. Together with his contemporary *Bradwardine, he opposed the current *Semi-Pelagianism. He stressed the sovereignty of God and our total dependence upon grace for salvation. Fallen humanity can do no good without God's grace. Election is God's sovereign and unmerited choice of us. Gregory followed Augustine in teaching that those who die unbaptized in infancy are condemned to hell, for which he earned the title tortor infantium. But a fairer assessment of his theology as a whole is found in the more traditional title, doctor authenticus.

Bibliography

G. Leff, Gregory of Rimini (Manchester, 1961).

A. N. S. LANE

GREGORY THE GREAT (c. 540–603)

Gregory renounced a secular career as prefect of Rome in order to become a monk following the *Benedictine rule (see *Asceticism and monasticism). Out of the proceeds of his own estates he founded monasteries in Sicily and Italy. Even as pope, an office he held from 590, he retained a monk's garb and lived with his clergy under a strict rule. His most influential work was his Pastoral Rule, which had a decidedly monastic tone.

Gregory's *papacy fell during chaos and internal strife for Italy. In a power vacuum Gregory took various initiatives, appointing governors to Italian cities and providing materials for the war against the Lombards. Thus he effectively extended the temporal power of the papacy.

Though Gregory asserted the sovereign authority of the apostolic see, whenever he suspected heresy or uncanonical procedure, he preferred not to interfere with the authority of other bishops. He abhorred the title 'ecumenical patriarch' adopted by the Patriarch of Constantinople as uncanonical and arrogant. In reaction he adopted for himself the humble title of 'the servant of all the servants of God'.

Gregory combined a learned *Augustinianism with various traits of popular piety. He published Dialogues full of accounts of bizarre prodigies and visions of Italian saints, which he credulously accepted. He gave the doctrine of *purgatory an important extension when he made it a dogma that souls in purgatory would be released by the sacrifice of the Mass. Again, though not himself approving the worship of *images, he allowed them a place in the worship of the illiterate.

Gregory also played an active role in the expansion of the church. His initiative behind the mission of Augustine of Canterbury to England is well known, but he also took steps to strengthen the church in Spain, Gaul and North Italy.

Bibliography

J. Cavadini (ed.), Gregory the Great: A Symposium (Notre Dame, 1995); F. H. Dudden, Gregory the Great, 2 vols. (London, 1905); G. R. Evans, The Thought of Gregory the Great (Cambridge, 1986); R. A. Markus, Gregory the Great and His World (Cambridge, 1997).

G. A. KEITH

GRENZ, STANLEY J. (1950–2005)

Born 7 January 1950, Grenz was ordained to *Baptist ministry (1976) and completed his doctorate under Wolfhart *Pannenberg at the University of Munich (1978). After a short stint as a pastor, he taught at Sioux Falls Seminary for nine years and then, excluding a brief Distinguished Professorship at Baylor University (2002–03), taught theology at Carey Theological College in Vancouver, Canada for his remaining career.

Arguably the leading North American evangelical theologian at the turn of the century, and certainly the most significant Canadian Protestant theologian, during his lifetime Grenz authored, co-authored or edited twenty-eight books, and over 100 articles, essays and reviews.

Central to Grenz's methodology was the role of *Scripture (theology's norma normans), tradition (theology's norma normata) (see *Scripture and tradition) and *culture as the context from which theology draws its questions, borrows language, but ultimately speaks with the *gospel message of *salvation through Christ. Although third by order of priority in the theological endeavour, because culture was not seen as a 'source' for theology at all, Grenz received significant critique within evangelicalism, even as he prodded evangelicals to move toward more constructive theology for the church's *mission. Remaining conservative on the gay issue, having written much on *sexuality, he was still criticized for his engagement with *postmodern culture.

His methodology led him to emphasize three dominant motifs in theology: *Trinity, community, *eschatology. In different ways, each of these can be traced back to Pannenberg, after whom Grenz was working to develop a distinctly trinitarian theology for evangelicalism. His theological project began to emerge in the multi-volume Matrix of Christian Theology series, which unfortunately was cut short with his untimely death on 12 March, 2005.

Bibliography

Selected works: Revisioning Evangelical Theology (Downers Grove, 1993); The Social God and the Relational Self (Louisville, 2001); The Named God and the Question of Being (Louisville, 2005)

Studies: B. S. Harris, The Theological Method of Stanley J. Grenz (Lewiston, 2011); J. S. Sexton, The Trinitarian Theology of Stanley J. Grenz (London, 2013); D. Tidball, B. Harris and J. S. Sexton, Revisioning, Renewing, Rediscovering the Triune Center (Eugene, 2014).

J. S. SEXTON

GROTIUS, HUGO (1583–1645)

Huig de Groot was a Dutch jurist, publicist, statesman and theologian. Precocious in study and attainment, Grotius imbibed rational humanism from both his family and his studies at Leiden University which he entered in 1595. After being granted the degree of LL.D by the University of Orleans, he practised as a lawyer in Holland, and held important public offices.

In 1610 the followers of *Arminius published a Remonstrance stating the five points on which they departed from strict Calvinism (see *Reformed theology). The debate was, however, complicated by its being embroiled in questions as to the relative powers of the Dutch Provinces and central authority. Grotius, of the Arminian persuasion, strove for peace and urged moderation in Ordinum Pietas (1613). He also drafted the Resolution for Peace (1614) by which the States-General forbade preaching on controverted doctrines, and commended toleration. Politically the dispute was dealt with by a coup, Maurits of Nassau, Prince of Orange and leader of the Calvinists, seizing major cities in 1618. Jan van Oldenbarnevelt, the leader of the Arminians and supporter of provincial autonomy, was executed for treason, and Grotius was imprisoned for life. The Synod of *Dort (1619) asserted the five points of Calvinism against the Remonstrance of the Arminians.

In 1621 Grotius escaped and settled in Paris. He returned briefly to Holland in 1631, retiring thereafter to Germany. From 1635 to 1645 he was Swedish ambassador to Paris. He died at Rostock as a result of shipwreck off Danzig.

Grotius had a literary reputation, his early drama Adamus Exul (1601) influencing Milton's Paradise Lost. In law his Mare Liberum (1609) first expounded the freedom of the high seas, and his works in civil law are still used. His De lure Praedae (1604, but published 1868) foreshadowed De lure Belli ac Pacis (1625), a seminal work of modern international law, in the course of which Grotius indicated that the principles of *natural law might be based as much on reason and social order as on revelation, and be valid even if there were no God – a hint which others took much further.

In theology Grotius moved to a creedless position, moderation and *toleration being paramount. His De Veritate Religionis Christianae (1627) stated the common core of Christianity irrespective of denomination and theology, and recommended trust in God and the following of Christ's teaching. It was translated for missionary purposes into Arabic, Persian, Chinese and other languages. Other works, such as the Via ad Pacem Ecclesiasticam and the Votum pro Pace Ecclesiastica (both 1642) were attempts to promote reunion and peace. However, these were rejected by many as sacrificing too much of the Protestant and Reformed cause. His Annotationes in Vetus et Novum Testamentum (1642) rely on philology, science and history to explicate the texts commented on in a way unusual at a time when received doctrines of inspiration would have excluded such methods.

His Defensio fidei catholicae de satisfactione Christi adversus Faustum Socinum Senensem (1617, ²1636), an attack on *Socinianism of doubtful effect, contains what has become known as the governmental or rectoral theory of the atonement, which derives from, but is tangential to, penal theories of the atonement (see *Substitution, penal). Coloured by then developing notions of the role of the sovereign, the theory anticipates some modern views. God's pardon of sinners is within his absolute unfettered discretion, the death of Christ being accepted by him as ruler or governor, not as creditor or offended party. As ruler, God's interest is in the good government of the world. The death of Christ illustrates the punishment which sin may attract, and therefore serves good government by acting as a deterrent. It also forms a contrast with the mercy shown through God's forgiveness of sinners, thus bringing home to humankind the depths of that mercy.

Bibliography

ET of De Iure Belli ac Pacis by F. W. Kelsey (London and Washington DC, 1923–8; repr. New York, 1964); E. Dumbauld, The Life and Legal Writings of Hugo Grotius (Norman, 1969); W. S. M. Knight, The Life and Works of Hugo Grotius (London, 1925; repr. New York and London, 1962); R. W. Lee, 'Hugo Grotius', Proceedings of the British Academy 16 (1930), pp. 3–61; J. ter Meulen, Concise Bibliography of Hugo Grotius (Leiden, 1925); idem and P. J. J. Dietmanse, Bibliographie des écrits imprimés de Hugo Grotius (The Hague, 1950); C. A. Stumpf, The Grotian Theology of International Law: Hugo Grotius and the Moral Foundations of International Relations (Berlin, 2006); H.-J. van Dam, J. M. Henk and N. and E. Rabbie (eds.), Hugo Grotius – Theologian (New York, 1994).

F. LYALL

GUILT AND FORGIVENESS

Biblical data

God proclaims two characteristics of himself to Moses: he is 'forgiving iniquity and transgression and sin' but also 'by no means clearing the guilty' (Exod. 34:7, NRSV). Without acting against the guilty, God seems unjust. Without acting in forgiveness, God seems merciless. How can he be both? Further, if *God is perfect, as traditional theology asserts (see e.g. in the West, Anselm, *Thomas Aquinas, *Turretin; and in the East, *John of Damascus), then he must be both perfectly forgiving and perfectly just, rather than one attribute predominating at the other's expense.

This is no minor tension since guilt and forgiveness bulk so large in *salvation history: judgment is exercised justly on guilty 'Gentile' Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen. 19), on guilty Israel and Judah in the exile (Dan. 9:14) and God's final just *judgment awaits (Rev. 19:1–2 underlines God's judgments as just). Yet salvation history also speaks in the covenant with Abraham of blessing for all nations (Gen. 12:3), a blessing fulfilled in the forgiveness of sins (Acts 3:19, 25–26). Dealing with sin is a major focus of OT sacrifice (e.g. Lev. 16:16 on the Day of Atonement), but this is anticipatory shadow rather than reality. The final or real sacrifice is that of Jesus, the final high priest, who offers a perfect *sacrifice for sin (Heb. 10:1–19; see *Atonement).

The new covenant stresses interiority (dealing with the heart) and forgiveness of sin (Heb. 8:12; 10:17). This centrality of forgiveness is present in Paul's citation of Ps. 32:1–2 in Rom. 4:7: 'Blessed are those whose iniquities are forgiven, and whose sins are covered' (NRSV). Forgiveness acquires here a strong 'law' association since forgiveness is of 'iniquities' and stands in parallel with covering sin. This dealing with sin and iniquity is unearned (Rom. 4:4–6), while 'guilt' is established as liability for sins committed (Rom. 3:9–19; cf. Jas 2:10), and is the precondition for condemnation. Both guilt and forgiveness relate to *sin, something constituted by the law of God. Hence guilt is predominantly associated with sin as offence against God, even though the immediate expression may be actions or omissions at the expense of another human. Thus David says he has offended only against God (Ps. 51:4), yet he has also wronged Uriah by murder and Bathsheba by sexual predation. Since sin is offence against God, it is God's prerogative both to judge it and to forgive. In the NT fulfilment, *Jesus is both judge (John 5:27–29) and able to forgive sin (Mark 2:10). Dealing with guilt and providing forgiveness ultimately centres on Christ.

Law, guilt and forgiveness

Since the guilty are forgiven of some breach of law, guilt is objective in that it is a liability under a law that lies outside oneself. Lack of a subjective sense of guilt does not guarantee innocence, nor does its presence conclusively indicate guilt. 'Legal breach' here does not simply refer to the Law of Moses. First, Paul indicates in Rom. 1:18–22 that humanity has obligations to God (to *worship him as God and to be thankful to him) that arise simply from the relationship of creator and creature. The relationship carries duties outside the Sinaitic law. Further, this underlines that legal breach does not preclude personal relationship: it is precisely wrongdoing within the relationship that grounds God's judging actions in Rom. 1:18–32. Similarly, God imposed the exile for breaches of a personal covenantal relationship. Secondly, since aspects of the OT law are fulfilled in Christ, it is important when explaining legal guilt today to show how those outside the Sinaitic covenant are lawbreakers. This is often done in terms of the creator-creature relationship, Jesus' summary of the law in terms of love, and the detailed commands retained in the NT epistles.

Who deals with guilt?

With these considerations in mind, the place of God becomes central. He establishes the *law and relationships within which sin occurs and is the arbiter of guilt. He is also the one who forgives. This theocentric emphasis is strongly developed by *Athanasius in his account of divine mercy and forgiveness. He reasons (De Incarnatione 6, 7) that since God has established a law (Gen. 2:17) and is utterly truthful, he cannot simply extend mercy for *Adam's sin by fiat. That would involve him 'unsaying' his own laws. God must be true to himself. The law imposing death for disobedience must be kept, and ultimately this means that only God can restore creation since he alone can bring new life. Further *Anselm in Cur Deus Homo reasons that we cannot ourselves make satisfaction to God by paying him back with meritorious acts (see *Penance) since we owe God every good act anyway. We must consider, he repeats, the seriousness of sin. As such, we cannot provide satisfaction to God ourselves to deal with guilt, but God himself must do so for us as a human being.

This theocentricity is intensified by Luther's perception that sin lurks, not just in our worst, but in our best actions (Heidelberg Disputation, 1518, thesis 3), since we do apparently holy things to serve ourselves and our pride rather than God. In fact, reasons Luther, 'The person who believes that he can obtain grace by doing what is in him adds sin to sin so that he becomes doubly guilty' (Heidelberg, thesis 16). Hence *Reformation thought in both *Lutheran and *Reformed versions insisted that God's grace was alone in forgiving sins, with no meritorious human contribution possible.

Guilt freely forgiven

For both Lutheran and Reformed alike God's *grace in freely forgiving sins was critical (notably Martin *Chemnitz, esp. Loci Theologici, locus XIII). The idea 'freely' here (taken from Rom. 3:24) has a double aspect. From God's side, forgiveness is free because no law outside him binds him to forgive (that would deny his *sovereignty). Nor is he providing a reward or wage to the deserving: rather he is disposing of his blessing as he wills and in accord with his own character. He forgives freely because he is that kind of God. From our side, God's forgiveness is free, since we do, and can do, nothing to earn it, for the reasons Anselm and Luther give.

The Anglican Homily 'A Sermon of the Salvation of Mankind' (Homilies, book 1, 3) is broadly representative of such Reformation syntheses. Both God's mercy and justice are fulfilled: '. . . with his endless mercy he joined his most upright and equal justice'. This is possible because Christ perfectly keeps God's law for his people: 'He for them fulfilled the law in his life. So that now in him and by him every true Christian man may be called a fulfiller of the law . . .'

This work of Christ is appropriated by *faith alone, but a common note for both Lutheran and Reformed theologians of the Reformation was that this goes beyond just 'general assent' to a belief that God in Christ is merciful to oneself as an individual (e.g. Melancthon, Apology for the Augsburg Confession on article 12; Calvin, Institutes, III.2.7).

Criticisms of free forgiveness for guilt

An important criticism of the Reformers was that they opened the door to licence. However, both Lutherans (e.g. Melancthon in the Apology) and *Calvin (Institutes, III.3–6) stress the importance of the fruits of repentance. A key point of difference was that the *Roman Catholic Council of *Trent envisaged a meritorious place for human works in *justification (see Sixth Session 1547, canons 24, 32) and that justification was not through faith alone (canon 12). In fact, the bulk of the Reformers did stress the need for law and obedience (see *Christian life; *Sanctification). In their reaction to the *antinomianism of Johannes Agricola and others, Luther and others envisaged that 'law' must be taught to humble proud hearts to seek mercy in Christ alone and not in themselves (see *Melancthon and Chemnitz on the *law-gospel relation).

This emphasis on teaching the law is pertinent in a Western cultural milieu which can stress entitlement (see e.g. J. M. Twenge, Generation Me, New York, 2006) and a therapeutic approach (see e.g. O. J. Madsen, The Therapeutic Turn, London, 2014) to human predicaments. The accountability implicit in objective guilt challenges entitlement thinking as well as assumptions that all one needs is appropriate cure/treatment. That said, guilt is not the only dimension to human problems – being guilty does not preclude being a genuine victim in need of healing and liberation.

Finally, some theologies reduce the tension between guilt and forgiveness by elevating *love as God's primary attribute (a recent example is the *Open Theism movement: see e.g. Richard Rice in The Openness of God). The traditionalist answer is that it is not wrong to see God's love as primary, but we must see God's justice as equally primary and how he has fulfilled both (see *Righteousness).

Implications of free forgiveness

This understanding of guilt and forgiveness suggests three things for the *church's life. First, a church is a community of forgiven sinners, none of whom may look down on their neighbours. Secondly, the church will explain guilt, not to obscure grace, but precisely so that forgiveness may be seen fully. Thirdly, the church will be a community of mutually forgiving sinners: while forgiveness is God's in the first instance, he has also instructed us to forgive each other in a secondary way, precisely because he has first forgiven us (Col. 3:13).

Bibliography

J. Calvin, Institutes, III.3; J. Edwards, 'Sinners in the Hands of an Angry God', sermon 8 July 1741, <<http://www.ccel.org/ccel/edwards/sermons.sinners.html>>; P. Melancthon, Apology for the Augsburg Confession, on article 12; idem, 'Sermon of the Salvation of Mankind', Homily 3 in Book I of The Homilies; J. Owen, 'An Exposition upon Psalm 8 CXXX', in The Works of John Owen, vol. VI: Temptation and Sin, ed. W. H. Gould (Edinburgh, 1967), pp. 323–326; J. Wesley, Sermons 5 and 6, 'Justification by Faith' and 'The Righteousness of Faith', in The Works of John Wesley, vol. 1 (Nashville, 1984), pp. 181–216; C. Williams, He Came Down from Heaven and the Forgiveness of Sins (Berkeley, 2005).

M. OVEY

GUNTON, COLIN EWART (1941–2003)

Colin Ewart Gunton was the leading English *systematic theologian of his generation, perhaps of the twentieth century. Taught by Robert Jenson, he pioneered a theological style that was seriously interested in dogmatic questions, and basically conservative and *Reformed in orientation. His early work explored the doctrine of God (his doctoral thesis, comparing Karl *Barth and Charles Hartshorne, published as Becoming and Being), Christology (Yesterday and Today, a profound defence of classical Christology), and the doctrine of reconciliation (The Actuality of Atonement, an exploration of theological method and how it affected what was said about the atonement). It was meeting John *Zizioulas on the British Council of Church's Study Commission on the Trinity that enabled Gunton to develop his mature voice. In The Promise of Trinitarian Theology, he developed a nuanced social *trinitarianism, stressing the personhood of the three hypostases, and the relationships between them, but without collapsing it so bluntly into an account of society, as some recent trinitarian theology has done. This was increasingly allied to a stress on the gospel history as the primary locus of God's revelation – the primary triune relations were to be understood and interpreted through the narratives of the Jewish man *Jesus of Nazareth, and his relationship with the God he called Father. This led to a sustained interest in the nature of particularity (hinted at already in his work on Christology), and questions of the mediation between God and creation.

Building from these basic insights, he produced incisive social commentary (particularly in his Bampton Lectures, The One, the Three and the Many) and profound constructive theology. Books on revelation (A Brief Theology of Revelation, his Warfield lectures), creation (The Triune Creator) and the divine attributes (Act and Being) all showed how a focus on the Trinity might reshape these doctrines. At the same time a regular flow of essays, a one-volume summary of Christian doctrine, The Christian Faith, and a projected three-volume Dogmatics hinted at how the approach might develop in other areas also.

Gunton maintained a lifelong interest in English theology, particularly in its non-conformist forms (he himself was a convinced Congregationalist, and a minister of the United Reformed Church; two books of his sermons have been published). Amongst his essays, attempts to re-ignite theological interest in such figures as Samuel Taylor Coleridge, Edward Irving or John Owen testify to this. He also encouraged research students to work and publish on these, and similar, figures. His interest in English theology was not confined to its history; he served the churches and the academic theological community cheerfully and tirelessly in a variety of ways.

Bibliography

B. G. Green, Colin Gunton and the Failure of Augustine (Eugene, 2011); L. Harvey (ed.), The Theology of Colin Gunton (London, 2010).

S. R. HOLMES

GUTIÉRREZ, GUSTAVO (b. 1928)

Gutiérrez is a Peruvian Roman Catholic priest known for his creative and formative role in the development of Latin American liberation theology. Born in Lima, he abandoned medical school and studied for the priesthood in Chile. He took graduate studies in psychology in Louvain followed by theology at the University of Lyon, both influential schools on Latin American progressive Catholicism. Ordained as a secular priest in 1959, Gutiérrez was an advisor to the Union of Catholic Students and taught at the Catholic University of Lima. Starting from a pastoral concern for the decline of Catholicism in Latin America, he proposed a new social practice for the church, one that was being pioneered by missionaries from Europe and North America, based on taking sides with the poor in the acute social conflicts of the 1960s. Such activism was made possible by the Second Vatican Council, and its application to Latin America through the Bishops' Conference (CELAM) of Medellín in 1968. The documents from this gathering call the church to take 'a preferential option for the poor' in language and categories formulated by Gutiérrez. His thinking was eventually condensed in the book A Theology of Liberation (1971), published in English in 1973; it started with a social analysis of Latin America and suggested radical pastoral changes based on a new reading of Scripture and tradition 'from the perspective of the poor'. After 1979 under Pope John Paul II, Gutiérrez' theology was the subject of an inquiry to which he responded in his book Truth Shall Make You Free (1986). Gutiérrez decided to remain within Roman Catholic orthodoxy, and accordingly A Theology of Liberation was revised for its fifteenth anniversary edition, eliminating Marxist vocabulary about class struggle. During those fifteen years Gutiérrez had become known around the world and received honorary doctorates from universities such as Nimega (1981). In his later book We Drink from Our Own Wells (1983) he outlined a spirituality of liberation, followed by biblical studies on Job (1986) and the God of Life (1989). In 1993 his massive work Las Casas: In Search of the Poor of Jesus Christ was published in English. It is an exhaustive study of the development of a theology of conquest and forced Christianization in the sixteenth-century conquest of Latin America, and the defence of the Indians that was articulated by the Dominican Bartolomé de las Casas. In 1998 Gutiérrez entered the Dominican Order. Through the years he has kept his parish work in Rímac, a shanty town of Lima.

See also: POVERTY AND WEALTH.

Bibliography

Works: G. Gutiérrez, A Theology of Liberation, rev. edn (Maryknoll and London, 1988 [1973]); The Power of the Poor in History (Maryknoll, 1983); We Drink from Our Own Wells: The Spiritual Journey of a People (Maryknoll, 1984); On Job: God-Talk and the Suffering of the Innocent (Maryknoll, 1987); The Truth Shall Make You Free (Maryknoll, 1990); The God of Life (Maryknoll, 1991); Las Casas: In Search of the Poor of Jesus Christ (Maryknoll, 1993); Sharing the Word Through the Liturgical Year (Maryknoll, 1997).

Studies: R. M. Brown, Gustavo Gutiérrez: Makers of Contemporary Theology (Atlanta, 1980); C. Cadorette, From the Heart of the People: The Theology of Gustavo Gutiérrez (Oak Park, 1988); M. H. Ellis and O. Maduro (eds.), The Future of Liberation Theology: Essays in Honor of Gustavo Gutiérrez (Maryknoll, 1989); E. J. Muskus, The Origins and Early Development of Liberation Theology in Latin America: With Particular Reference to Gustavo Gutiérrez (Carlisle and Waynesboro, 2002).

S. ESCOBAR

HALLESBY, OLE (1879–1961)

Ole Hallesby was a Norwegian evangelical theologian who originally lost his evangelical convictions through the influence of *liberalism at the University of Oslo, but was converted shortly before graduation (1903). He was called to be a preacher of the 'Inner Mission' within the (Lutheran) Church of Norway, and his preaching resulted in widespread spiritual revival.

In 1909 he received his PhD from Erlangen and became a professor of systematic theology at the Free Faculty of Theology in Oslo, recently founded (1907) in reaction against the liberalism dominant in the state university.

From 1919 Hallesby took a clear stand in preaching, teaching and writing for the biblical faith against liberal ideas that denied the truth of the Apostles' Creed. He advised *evangelicals not to cooperate with liberal theologians and pastors. Though he strongly emphasized the need for *conversion and vital Christian experience, Hallesby remained a firm Lutheran, laying strong emphasis upon the teaching of the confessions of the Lutheran Church in Norway. In this respect he is typical of many of the leaders of the 'free' organizations within that church. He initiated the establishment of a variety of institutions sponsored by such voluntary societies.

During the Second World War, Hallesby was a member of the Christian Council that resisted Nazi control of the church. For this reason he was imprisoned, together with other Christian leaders in Norway.

The author of textbooks on dogmatics and ethics, Hallesby is best known outside Norway for his works on Prayer (ET, London, 1948) and Why I Am a Christian (ET, London, 1950).

N. YRI

HARNACK, ADOLF (1851–1930)

Harnack (created von Harnack in 1914), a German church historian, was the son of the Lutheran theologian Theodosius Harnack.

After studying at the universities of Dorpat (where his father held a chair) and Leipzig, he taught at the universities of Leipzig (1874–9), Giessen (1879–86), Marburg (1886–9) and Berlin (1889–1921). From 1905 to 1921 he was director of the Prussian State Library; in 1910 he became president of the Kaiser Wilhelm Gesellschaft for the promotion of learning and science. With Emil Schürer he founded the Theologische Literaturzeitung in 1876, and in 1882 he became founding editor, with Oscar von Gebhardt, of the series Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur. His literary output continued without intermission from his collaboration with von Gebhardt and Theodor von Zahn in an edition of the *Apostolic Fathers (1876–78) to his final study of 1 Clement (1929).

In theology he was generally a *Ritschlian. With the publication of his popular series of lectures What Is Christianity? (1900; ET, 1901), he came to be viewed as the spokesman of *liberal Protestantism. He perceived the *essence of Christianity to lie in the fatherhood of God, the infinite worth of the individual soul, the higher righteousness and the commandment of love. This work, by stimulating Alfred Loisy to write L'Évangile et l'Église (1908), indirectly precipitated the modernist crisis in the Roman Church (see *Modernism, Catholic). Another modernist, George Tyrrell, observed that 'the Christ that Harnack sees, looking back through nineteen centuries of Catholic darkness, is only the reflection of a Liberal Protestant face, seen at the bottom of a dark well' (Christianity at the Crossroads, London, 1909, p. 44).

Jesus' simple message, Harnack believed, had been distorted and corrupted by Catholicism, resulting from the alien intrusion of Greek *metaphysics. This belief was elaborated in his study of the Apostles' Creed (Das apostolische Glaubensbekenntnis, 1892) and in his multi-volume History of Dogma (1886–90, 6¹⁹²²; ET, 1894–99).

His work in early church history is of abiding value. One of his greatest works was his study of *Marcion (1921, 2¹⁹²⁴), a *heretic with whose outlook (especially on the OT) he felt considerable sympathy. Also worthy of honourable mention are his Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur bis Eusebius, 3 vols. (1893–1904), The Mission and Expansion of Christianity (1902, 4¹⁹²⁴; ET, 1904–5); The Constitution and Law of the Church (1910; ET, 1910) and Die Briefsammlung des Apostels Paulus (1926).

In his monographs on NT criticism he reached increasingly conservative conclusions. In his Sayings of Jesus (1907; ET, 1908) he reconstructed the text of Q (the source presumably underlying the non-Marcian material common to Matthew and Luke) and argued that it was 'a document of the highest antiquity', reflecting in places 'the memory of an apostolic listener' and presenting a reliable portrait of Jesus. Luke the Physician (1906; ET, 1907) argued that Luke and Acts were composed by one man, an associate of Paul, and in particular that this man was the author of the 'we' narratives of Acts. Further evidence on this last point was adduced in The Acts of the Apostles (1908; ET, 1909), which also investigated the sources underlying the earlier chapters. In The Date of the Acts and of the Synoptic Gospels (1911; ET, 1911) he dated Luke-Acts (and a fortiori Mark) not later than AD 64 and Matthew shortly after AD 70.

Bibliography

W. H. C. Freund, JEH 52, 2001, pp. 83–102; K. Nowak et al. (eds.), Adolf von Harnack: Christentum, Wissenschaft und Gesellschaft (Göttingen, 2003); W. Pauck, Harnack and Troeltsch: Two Historical Theologians (New York, 1968); M. Rumscheidt (ed.), Adolf von Harnack: Liberal Theology at Its Height (London, 1989); A. von Zahn-Harnack, Adolf von Harnack (Berlin, 1951).

F. F. BRUCE

HARTSHORNE, CHARLES, see PROCESS THEOLOGY

HAUERWAS, STANLEY (b. 1940)

Stanley Hauerwas, the Gilbert T. Rowe Professor of Theological Ethics at Duke University Divinity School, was born in Pleasant Grove, Texas. The son of a bricklayer, he was educated at Southwestern University, Georgetown, Texas, and then Yale Divinity School, where he earned a PhD. More recently he received an honorary DD from Edinburgh University. Before moving to the Methodist University of Duke in 1984, he taught for fourteen years at a Catholic institution: the University of Notre Dame. He is a prolific writer and outspoken speaker, making him one of North America's best-known and perhaps most controversial theologians.

His publications are extensive and wide-ranging. Hauerwas has produced over two dozen books, many made up of essays. Among contemporary theologians he is a leading exponent of the short essay as a form of theological expression. Many of his essays, such as From System to Story: An Alternative Pattern for Rationality in Ethics (1977), co-written with David Burrell, are widely cited. Here and elsewhere Hauerwas was critical of 'quandary ethics', in which scholars analyse difficult individual cases in order to derive ethical principles or foundations. In its place he has highlighted an approach to *ethics rooted in the formation of virtuous character. This is a recurring theme for Hauerwas. The primary issue is not what the moral subject should do, but rather what kind of person we should become. Through his writing and teaching Hauerwas has encouraged Christians from widely diverging traditions to think further about the importance of nurturing virtues for the Christian life. He was influenced not only by *Aristotle and *Thomas Aquinas in this move, but also by twentieth-century theologians such as John Howard *Yoder and philosophers such as Iris Murdoch and Alasdair McIntyre.

Two of his best-known books are A Community of Character (1981) and, a text commonly described as his most 'unified' book, The Peaceable Kingdom (1983). Within these and other publications he developed further the themes of virtue, character, narrative and non-violence. Hauerwas is a passionate pacifist who has challenged earlier twentieth-century theologians such as Reinhold *Niebuhr and Paul Ramsey, especially their defence of just war (see *Pacifism/peace). Throughout the 1980s and beyond, his thinking has continued to evolve, with more nuanced accounts of the place of narrative and a greater emphasis upon the importance of the church for Christian discipleship. Hauerwas has consistently emphasized the centrality of the story of *Jesus' life, death and resurrection for Christian ethics. An academic, linked with the United Methodist Church and more recently the Anglican Church, who regularly speaks beyond academia at local churches, he has made significant contributions to debates related to medical, legal and political ethics, as well as the importance of welcoming the stranger, the outsider or the disabled. In his sixties he highlighted the importance of *worship for Christian ethics and continued to challenge aspects of American patriotism, nationalism and liberalism, as well as produce notable publications, including an original Barthian reading of *natural theology in With the Grain of the Universe (2001), a theological commentary on the Gospel of Matthew (2006) and a critical reflection upon The State of the University (2007).

Bibliography

Selected Works: Vision and Virtue: Essays in Christian Ethical Reflection (Notre Dame, 1974); Character and the Christian Life: A Study in Theological Ethics (San Antonio, 1975); A Community of Character: Toward a Constructive Christian Social Ethic (Notre Dame, 1981); The Peaceable Kingdom: A Primer in Christian Ethics (Notre Dame, 1983); Against the Nations: War and Survival in a Liberal Society (Minneapolis, 1985); Suffering Presence: Theological Reflections on Medicine, the Mentally Handicapped, and the Church (Edinburgh, 1986); Resident Aliens: Life in the Christian Colony (with William Willimon) (Nashville, 1989); Naming the Silence: God, Medicine and the Problem of Suffering (Grand Rapids, 1990); After Christendom: How the Church Is to Behave If Freedom, Justice, and a Christian Nation Are Bad Ideas (Nashville, 1991); Unleashing the Scripture: Freeing the Bible from Captivity to America (Nashville, 1993); Dispatches from the Front: Theological Engagements with the Secular (Durham, NC, 1994); Wilderness Wanderings: Probing Twentieth-Century Theology and Philosophy (Boulder, 1997); Sanctify Them in Truth: Holiness Exemplified (Nashville, 1998); A Better Hope: Resources for a Church Confronting Capitalism, Democracy and Postmodernity (Grand Rapids, 2000); With the Grain of the Universe: The Church's Witness and Natural Theology (Grand Rapids, 2001); The Blackwell Companion to Christian Ethics (with Samuel Wells) (Oxford, 2004); Performing the Faith: Bonhoeffer and the Practice of Non-Violence (2004); Matthew, Brazos Theological Commentary on the Bible (Grand Rapids, 2006); The State of the University: Academic Knowledges and the Knowledge of God (Oxford, 2007).

Studies: J. Berkman and M. Cartwright (eds.), The Hauerwas Reader (Durham, NC, 2001); this includes an annotated bibliography and wide selection of readings. J. Stout, Democracy and Tradition (Princeton, 2004);

S. Wells, Transforming Fate into Destiny: The Theological Ethics of Stanley Hauerwas (Carlisle, 1998).

J. P. MITCHELL

HEALING

Health

A theological understanding of healing must be based on a theological understanding of health and illness. The standard secular definition of health is that of the World Health Organization, stated thus: 'A state of complete physical, mental and social well-being and not merely the absence of disease and infirmity'. Some theologians have criticized this definition, arguing among other things that complete well-being is impossible in earthly life. Consensus as to what it actually means is difficult to achieve given that there is controversy over whether mental illness overlaps with spiritual as well as social dis-ease. Definitions of mental health and illness vary in practice geographically and historically, and debates over them have a major impact on the reading of biblical stories of healing and exorcism by OT prophets and by Jesus and his disciples. Some Christians have tried to promote Jesus Christ as the model of mental health. Problems arise in the implicit correlation or even the conflation made between modern psychological models of mental health and the sinlessness of Jesus as the Incarnate Son.

The healing *miracles of Jesus demonstrate his intent and ability to restore the sick to adequate physical and mental health. The purpose of those miracles is to witness to the glory and authority of God bringing in the new creation through Christ. Health in Scripture and the Christian tradition is a gift from God intended to witness to his *glory. It is not simply a right, though many Christians accept that access to healthcare is a right in modern societies with welfare systems. However, pressure on welfare state systems due to the ageing populations of Western countries are provoking governments to act on lifestyle-induced patterns of ill health such as alcohol abuse and eating problems. Christian theological reflection and practice in relation to health and illness is therefore still important in the secular West, as more people increasingly struggle to be healthy. The goal of lifelong complete physical, mental and social well-being is strictly impossible given that even the healthiest people must die in the end. The rise of the hospice movement from within the Christian community witnesses to the continued need to promote mental health and spiritual well-being even for the terminally ill who will never recover physically.

Illness

Illness is the result of the intrusion of *evil into creation, thereby thwarting God's purpose of physical, mental and spiritual well-being for all his creatures. It is also present in human life due to the condition of original *sin. This does not entail that all sickness is the result of individual sinful intentions and acts, i.e. the individual sufferer is not necessarily to blame for their illness, nor is there a sense in which medical care should be administered only to those who supposedly 'deserve' it. Christian theology has generally counselled that sick persons should fight their illness and not give into it. This is due to the traditional Christian view of *death, the ultimate outcome of illness, as the enemy of humanity, and of suicide as a form of murder and a rejection of God's gift of life.

Healing

The definition of healing is closely related to the definition of humanity restored in Christ. This means that Christians can accept that healing may not necessarily be complete until the believer is *resurrected for eternal life with God. This eschatological perspective on healing is strongly emphasized in Paul's Corinthian correspondence. It is a perspective that has been emphasized by Christians working with disabled people.

A problem arises if Christians teach that healing from a particular condition can be accomplished only through faith in Christ. Both the biblical witness and the scientific evidence for most illnesses disprove such a claim. Rather it shows that Christian faith in particular, and religious faith in general, is correlated with a slightly higher probability of being healthy. This is famously true of healing from addictions such as alcoholism as a result of participation in Alcoholics Anonymous. Participants in AA are told to enlist the support of their chosen 'higher power', who may or may not be the Christian God. Empirical studies tend to show that healing is more likely in such cases if a person's adoption of faith is intrinsic rather than extrinsic, i.e. if their main goal is submission to the divine will regardless of the consequences.

A Christian understanding of healing is particularly important as regards mental illness, given the often troubled relationship between Christianity and the mental health professions. The question of whether a person's condition is to be diagnosed as resulting from mental illness or as a result of a combination of sinful self-chosen acts and being damaged by being sinned against by others is always pertinent for Christians. For example, the concept of personality disorders entered psychiatry only in the last few decades, having previously been labelled more moralistically as character disorders.

Healing ministries in the global church

A theological account of healing requires a trinitarian framework. In the Western church Augustine of Hippo was influential in developing a theological understanding of healing as a gift from God that is available to believers throughout history. Some charismatic and Pentecostal theologians argue that Jesus Christ is the ultimate source of all healing through his *redemption of all creation and his self-sacrifice on the cross. Typically, those who accept that gifts of healing are still operative in the church derive those gifts from the view that the Holy Spirit mediates those gifts given by Christ to his disciples (see *Gifts of the Spirit). As the church is the community of believers born again of Christ's eternal Spirit in every historical age, many *charismatic, *Pentecostal and other evangelicals argue that the gifts of healing are available to believers in every age.

The ministry of healing and the attestation of healing miracles is central in conversion to evangelicalism, especially its Pentecostal and charismatic strands, globally today. Evangelical controversies have arisen in the last few decades over the so-called 'Gospel of Health and Wealth', the belief that God grants health and prosperity to those who have a strong enough faith in him (see *Poverty and wealth). Churches espousing these beliefs have multiplied in the global South, but have also grown in the United States.

The prevalence and depth of theologies and ministries of healing in the global churches has social dimensions. Healing ministry is a more mainstream part of evangelicalism in the United States than in Western Europe, and this is partly attributable to a fit between certain theologies of healing and a therapeutic, optimistic, goal-oriented social worldview together with the lack of a welfare state system with its concomitant promise of free healthcare for all citizens. Likewise, healing may be more mainstream in certain non-Western, especially African churches, due to theologies of healing filling a void owing to lack of state healthcare, as well as to the attractiveness of diverse Christian theological anthropologies for some people in comparison to their previous indigenous religions. Globally the church today supports medical and spiritual healing, thus continuing in the spirit of the early church which founded the first hospitals in the fourth century as a communal and institutional means of healing illness, and as an antidote to the magical attitudes to healing prevalent in the classical world.

Bibliography

K. E. Alexander (ed.), Pentecostal Healing: Models in Theology and Practice (Blandford Forum, 2006); D. X. Burt, 'Health, Sickness', in A. D. Fitzgerald, Augustine Through the Ages: An Encyclopaedia (Grand Rapids, 1999), pp. 416–419; S. E. Lammers and A. Verhey (eds.), On Moral Medicine: Theological Perspectives in Medical Ethics (Grand Rapids, 1987); E. Lucas, Christian Healing: What Can We Believe? (London, 1997); F. MacNutt, Healing (London, 1989); M. Maddocks, The Christian Healing Ministry (London, 1995); D. McConnell, The Promise of Health and Wealth: A Historical and Biblical Analysis of the Modern Faith Movement (London, 1990); M. A. Yarhouse, R. E. Butman and B. W. McRay (eds.), Modern Psychopathologies: A Comprehensive Christian Approach (Downers Grove, 2005).

C. A. E. MOSELEY

HEAVEN, see ESCHATOLOGY

HEGEL, GEORG WILHELM FRIEDRICH (1770–1831)

Hegel is one of the three major figures in *German idealism, together with *Fichte and Schelling. Hegel's significance for philosophy is assured by two significant contributions. The first is his use of *Aristotelian themes (sociality, community) to repair the rationalist (especially *Kantian) emphasis on autonomy and freedom. The second is his emphasis on the historicity of concepts to develop the Kantian insight that human knowledge is tied to judgment, and that judgment relies on concepts. By describing the human agent as social as well as free, and by insisting that human judgment relies on concepts that are historically determined, Hegel's work produced one of the most important descriptions of human judgment.

Hegel is the most influential philosopher to develop an account of what it means to be 'modern'. He notices that people take certain things to be authoritative; he asks how they come to take them as authoritative. To be *modern, for Hegel, is to refuse to take something to be authoritative at another's insistence, and to embrace that something positively and freely. The modern community is self-determined and self-reflective. Modern philosophy, in the modern university, is likewise a matter of self-determination and self-reflection, and that includes paying attention to real contradictions in the world rather than allowing them to be solved, or merely appear to be solved, by appeals to external authorities. His method of 'dialectic' is his way of describing the significance of 'negation' for thinking and for social life.

Hegel's significance for theology rests on his significance for philosophy. Hegel insists that knowledge is 'mediated', which means (following Kant) that we do not know things by direct intuition (*Descartes, *Leibniz), but must judge what our senses give us by means of things (concepts, ideas, ways of thinking) that do not accompany the objects we seek to know. This is indebted to Christian theology. Knowledge of God is mediated by Jesus Christ: no-one has seen God by direct intuition. Revelation is mediated by the Holy Spirit: no one can faithfully interpret Scripture unaided by God. Hegel's tendency to extend the notion of mediation to all knowledge carried risks, and his philosophy was criticized from the start for seeming to claim that concepts are like the incarnation, or that the community is like the Holy Spirit. Christians worship Jesus Christ and the Holy Spirit. Are concepts divine? Can the community claim divine sovereignty?

Hegel's emphasis on 'thinking' has stimulated theologians in various ways. Hegel often claims that it is the significance of objects and events, rather than their brute existence or occurrence, that is the concern of the thinking person. It is their manner of being 'thought' that matters. This draws attention to the contexts in which things appear, and the presuppositions of those who relate to them. It can also give the impression that Hegel's idealism is a matter only of 'thinking' and not of 'reality'. For Hegel what is real is determined by its significance for someone, rather than its brute existence of occurrence. Yet Hegel also says that 'religion' is a matter of sensual practices and metaphorical language: bread and wine, incense, music, Scripture; 'philosophy' by contrast is a matter of thinking: concepts, logic, reflection. This leads Hegel to claim that liturgy is a lower activity whose concerns are not only clarified in philosophy, but surpassed by it. Hegel was criticized for this claim by Schelling, who argued that the ground of thinking is an origin that cannot be thought. He can also be criticized for seeming to think that concepts are not metaphorical.

Hegel's claims about God go significantly beyond emphasizing the mediation of objects through concepts, or stressing the significance rather than the mere existence of objects. Hegel tends to think teleologically in three of his most theologically significant texts. He speaks of 'absolute knowing' at the end of the Phenomenology of Spirit (1807), of 'the absolute idea' at the end of the Science of Logic (1816) and of 'the completed religion' at the end of his lectures on the philosophy of religion. His tendency is to arrive at completion or absoluteness at the end of the process of human inquiry.

This can be viewed as theologically dangerous and even heterodox. Premodern theology tended to think of the mystery of creation and the mystery of the eschaton as being illuminated, in a partial but abundantly generous way, by the person of Jesus Christ and the gift of the Holy Spirit. By contrast, and drawing on both *rationalist (Leibniz, Kant) and so-called *mystical (Böhme, Oetinger) traditions, Hegel tended to think of inarticulate realities at the beginning, which become developed and conceptualized realities at the end. God becomes progressively known; the Spirit becomes progressively more self-conscious. Hegel tends to try to reason in a 'presuppositionless' fashion in a way that intends to be suitable for 'modern' thinkers, but also rules out Scripture. Hegel appears to believe that philosophy can finally not only arrive at a concept of God, but do so without attention to Scripture.

The most famous claim that serves the project of achieving the absolute idea (a claim that is less theologically significant than that project as a whole) is that history is the developing self-consciousness of the 'absolute' or 'spirit' (Geist). The word 'absolute' here signifies that which is the ground of reality. It is what unifies difference and makes difference possible. It is the process which contains negation. It is substance (in Spinoza's sense) that is subject (in Kant's sense). The word 'spirit' signifies that the absolute is both nature and culture, fully self-conscious.

Debates about how to interpret Hegel, which have intensified in recent years, partly concern how best to understand his claims about the 'absolute idea' in the Science of Logic and the 'eternal idea' of God in the lectures on the philosophy of religion, and the relation between the two. On one reading Hegel seems to claim that God can be conceptualized. On another Hegel is interested only in conceptualizing God's significance for us. There is disagreement among scholars on these issues, but the task is largely agreed: the most fruitful theological investigation is one that offers the fullest account of the relation between the Phenomenology, the Logic and the lectures.

See also: PHILOSOPHY AND THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

F. Beiser, Hegel (London, 2005); P. Hodgson, Hegel and Christian Theology (Oxford, 2005); S. Houlgate, Introduction to Hegel (Oxford, 2005); T. Pinkard, Hegel: A Biography (Cambridge, 2000).

N. ADAMS

HEIDEGGER, MARTIN (1889–1976)

A key twentieth-century philosopher, Heidegger famously reopened the 'question of *being'. He contended that while philosophers have always investigated entities of different kinds, they have largely neglected the underlying question of what it means for an entity 'to be'. Heidegger sought to retrieve the 'meaning of being' and expose how faulty *ontological assumptions embedded in the history of Western philosophy have damaged human understanding. To avoid perpetuating those mistaken assumptions, he discarded traditional metaphysical language, choosing to craft his own custom vocabulary.

In his formidable masterwork, Being and Time (1927), Heidegger analyses the nature of human being in the hope of uncovering what it more generally means for something to be. Dispensing with traditional scientific and theological anthropologies, he repurposes the phenomenological method of his mentor, Edmund Husserl, in order to access the distinctive type of being humans possess. Heidegger's analysis finds that humans are not self-contained subjects standing apart from the world – as modern philosophy since Descartes had taught – but are characterized by 'existence': fundamentally, humans have their 'being in the world' and are composed of a set of relations to things, others, their potentialities and possibilities. He uses the colloquial German word Dasein (the 'presence' or 'there-ness' of a thing) in place of other anthropological labels, such as 'rational animal' or 'person', because it uniquely conveys the idea that humans 'exist'. Although the work remained unfinished, Heidegger's analysis of Dasein includes innovative discussions of anxiety, authenticity and finitude – core existentialist themes. Moreover, the work suggests that the meaning of being is time, since temporality is shown to be basically and inseparably constitutive of Dasein's various structural items.

Perhaps on account of Heidegger's failure to complete Being and Time, the 1930s witnessed a major change in his approach to the question of being, which he himself labelled 'the turn'. Dropping Dasein as his starting point, Heidegger now attempted to think being from the standpoint of being itself, a move that led him to philosophize in an often quasi-mystical way about the truth of being's 'essential unfolding'. Emblematic of this phase is his view that the early Greeks originally experienced being through the 'self-showing' of entities, and that in forgetting this insight, Western philosophy has precipitated the present age of technology in which entities have been catastrophically reduced to mere things for manipulation. Crucially for Heidegger, poetry and art may retrieve the West from the nihilism of technological thinking, insofar as they reconnect humans with the basic experience of being. His proposal in Contributions to Philosophy is that, far from rejecting technology, humans should inhabit the technological world in a manner that 'shelters' the truth and openness of being.

Heidegger's active involvement in Nazism is a subject of ongoing controversy. Nevertheless, his work paved the way for significant advances in French philosophy (Derrida), hermeneutics (Gadamer) and political theory (Arendt). Heidegger's relationship to Christian theology is also of considerable importance, not least because, having initially trained for the priesthood, much of his pre-turn conceptuality is the product of serious engagement with St Paul, Augustine and Kierkegaard.

The early theological reception of Heidegger's work focused on the Dasein analytic, which Bultmann and Tillich used as a resource in the development of their existential theologies. More recently, studies by Marion and Caputo have traced the implications of Heidegger's post-turn thought for theology, particularly with regard to his critique of Western philosophy. They ask, if theology must no longer rely on traditional metaphysical understandings of being, then what language is appropriate for conceiving God's nature and activity? After the 'end of metaphysics' what does it mean for God 'to be'?

Bibliography

H. Dreyfus, Being-in-the-World: A Commentary on Heidegger's Being and Time, Division 1 (Cambridge, MA, 1991); J.-L. Marion, God without Being (Chicago, 1991); R. Safranski, Martin Heidegger: Between Good and Evil (Cambridge, MA, 1998); J. Wolfe, Heidegger and Theology (Bloomsbury, 2014).

A. MCFARLANE

HEIDELBERG CATECHISM

The Heidelberg Catechism had its genesis in the volatile confessional climate of the late Reformation. Between 1546 and 1559, the Palatinate emerged as one of the most powerful Protestant territories in Germany. During the first years of the reign of Elector Frederick III (r. 1559–76), theological controversy between conservative (Gnesio) *Lutherans, followers of Philipp *Melancthon, as well as Calvinists and Zwinglians, exploded within the university faculty at Heidelberg and disrupted the Palatinate churches. Frederick responded by sponsoring a theological disputation and dismissing contentious faculty members, actions that tipped the balance toward the Reformed camp. Further, the elector commissioned a team of professors, ministers and church superintendents to prepare a new catechism for his realm, with the aim of providing Christian instruction for children and achieving confessional harmony among his subjects. This doctrinal statement, known as the Heidelberg Catechism, was published in German and Latin editions in early 1563.

Scholars continue to debate the authorship of the Heidelberg Catechism. Whereas the traditional view ascribed principal authorship to Reformed theologian Zacharias *Ursinus and minister Caspar *Olevianus, most interpreters now believe that the catechism was the cooperative effort of a team of scholars overseen by Frederick himself, with Ursinus providing primary theological leadership. Like other Protestant catechisms of the period, the Heidelberg Catechism employs a question/answer format in treating the Apostles' Creed, the Lord's Prayer, the Ten Commandments and the sacraments. Beginning with the question 'What is your only comfort in life and in death?', the Catechism proceeds in 129 questions/answers to address three primary dimensions of the Christian gospel: human guilt, God's grace in Jesus Christ and the Christian's response of grateful service. That the Catechism seeks consensus within a moderate Reformed and Melancthonian theological perspective is particularly evident in its treatment of sacramental theology and its inclusion of law under the rubric of the Christian life. Likewise, it avoids detailed discussion of more 'angular' Reformed doctrines such as election, reprobation and covenant. Although not entirely free of religious polemic – for example, *Anabaptism is proscribed, the Catholic Mass is deemed 'accursed idolatry' (phrase inserted in the second edition), and the Lutheran doctrine of ubiquity is rejected – the Heidelberg Catechism on the whole evinces an irenic tone and warm, devotional character. Zurich Reformer Heinrich *Bullinger praised it as 'the best catechism ever published' (quoted in F. H. Klooster, The Heidelberg Catechism, p. 196).

In the century after its initial publication, the Heidelberg Catechism went through no less than sixty-five editions and was translated into Dutch, English, French, Czech, Greek, Hungarian and Romansch. Today, it serves as a widely accepted confessional standard in German, Dutch and Hungarian Reformed churches.

See also: CATECHISMS; REFORMED THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

L. D. Bierma, An Introduction to the Heidelberg Catechism: Sources, History, and Theology (Grand Rapids, 2005); I. J. Hesselink, 'The Dramatic Story of the Heidelberg Catechism', in W. F. Graham (ed.), Later Calvinism: International Perspectives (Kirksville, 1994); F. H. Klooster, The Heidelberg Catechism: Origin and History (Grand Rapids, 1982); B. Thompson (ed.), Essays on the Heidelberg Catechism (Philadelphia, 1963); D. Visser (ed.), Controversy and Conciliation: The Reformation of the Palatinate 1559–1583 (Allison Park, 1986).

S. M. MANETSCH

HEIM, KARL (1874–1958)

A German Protestant systematic theologian, Heim taught at Tübingen. His theological development was strongly influenced by *pietism, especially by its evangelistic emphases. His major theological legacy is a six-volume work of apologetics, Der evangelische Glaube und das Denken der Gegenwart (The Protestant Faith and Contemporary Thought) (Tübingen, 1931–52), translated into English in a variety of volumes.

Heim attempted to mediate between Protestant theology and modern worldviews, notably those he found presupposed in natural science, and tried to develop a critical role for Christian theology in the contemporary world. His work was for a time influential on teachers and pastors in Germany, and he remains one of the few German theologians to address himself seriously to natural science.

Bibliography

Works: God Transcendent (ET, London, 1935); Spirit and Truth (ET, London, 1935); Christian Faith and Natural Science (ET, London, 1953); The Transformation of the Scientific World-View (ET, London, 1953); Jesus the Lord (ET, Edinburgh, 1959); Jesus the World's Perfecter (ET, Edinburgh, 1959).

Studies: I. Holmstrand, Karl Heim on Philosophy, Science and the Transcendence of God (Stockholm, 1980); C. Michalson, 'Karl Heim' in D. G. Peerman and M. E. Marty (eds.), A Handbook of Christian Theologians (Nashville, 2nd 1984).

J. B. WEBSTER

HELL, see ESCHATOLOGY

HELLENIZATION OF CHRISTIANITY

By this is meant the penetration into Christianity of beliefs and practices which originated in the pre-Christian or non-Christian culture of ancient Greece. Generally speaking, this is now regarded as a positive development by most Roman Catholic and Orthodox theologians, whereas most Protestants tend to think of it as a corruption of the faith.

The facts of Hellenization, beyond the superficial level, are almost impossible to document with any degree of certainty. The NT was written in Greek, but this followed the established practice and style of Hellenized Judaism and was not a Christian innovation. There is much debate as to whether the apostolic interpretation of the OT was seriously affected by Greek ideas or not. At one time it was widely believed that John 1:1–14 reflected a Middle Platonic *logos doctrine, possibly mediated through *Philo of Alexandria, but this has been strongly challenged by modern scholarship, which tends to emphasize John's Hebraic roots.

Matters are more complex when we turn to the post-apostolic period. Christianity spread in the Hellenized Roman Empire more than it did elsewhere, and this certainly left its mark. *Justin Martyr thought that Socrates and Plato were Christians before Christ, and the belief that *Platonism was a kind of Gentile OT, preparing the Greeks for the coming of Christ, later became widespread. There were a number of syncretistic sects, now known collectively as "Gnostic", which tried to merge pagan and Christian ideas in different ways. Perhaps the most significant development along these lines was the widespread adoption of the allegorical method of interpretation (used earlier by Jewish writers such as Philo), to overcome difficulties which Greek minds felt in the literal text of Scripture. By using this method, *Origen and others were able to harmonize Christianity with late Middle (and later Neo-) Platonism, much to the detriment of the former.

How far Hellenizing tendencies were responsible for the development of Christian doctrine is a matter of considerable controversy. Conservatives generally argue that the *creeds and other doctrinal statements were a reaction against the influence of Hellenism, which after the fourth century became a term of abuse, even among the Greeks (who subsequently called themselves Rōmaioi rather than Hellēnes). Liberals, however, argue that *dogma is itself a philosophical concept. According to them, a non-Hellenized Christianity would have been much more pluralistic in its theology, and would probably not have insisted that Jesus Christ was God incarnate. Some of them even regard Islam as a Semitic reaction against Hellenized Christianity, though that is certainly an oversimplification of what was a very complex development.

Bibliography

J. Daniélou, Gospel Message and Hellenistic Culture (London and Philadelphia, 1973); E. Hatch, The Influence of Greek Ideas on Christianity (New York, 1888); M. Hengel, Judaism and Hellenism, 2 vols. (London, 1974); R. H. Nash, Christianity and the Hellenistic World (Grand Rapids, n.d.).

G. L. BRAY

HELVETIC CONFESSIONS, see CONFESSIONS OF FAITH

HENOTHEISM, see MONOTHEISM

HENRY, CARL F. H. (1913–2003)

The Protestant theologian Carl Henry was widely recognized as an intellectual spokesman for evangelical Christianity. Converted in 1933 as a New York journalist, he studied at Wheaton College (MA), Northern Baptist Theological Seminary (BD, ThD) and Boston University (PhD). He taught theology at Northern Baptist (1940–47) and at Fuller Theological Seminary (1947–56), prior to becoming founding editor (1956–68) of the influential Christianity Today magazine. Always an understanding encourager and adviser of younger Christian writers, Henry from 1968 devoted himself to research and writing. He was chairman of the World Congress on Evangelism (Berlin, 1966), and also presided over the Evangelical Theological Society (1967–70) and the American Theological Society (1980–81).

Among his numerous books are The Uneasy Conscience of Modern Fundamentalism (1948), which spurred conservative Protestants in America out of cultural isolation into social engagement; and Christian Personal Ethics (1957), now a standard textbook. His magnum opus is God, Revelation and Authority (Waco, 1976–82), the six volumes of which are also available in Korean and Mandarin. Henry was a founder of the Institute for Advanced Christian Studies which produces literature directed at secular university students. As lecturer-at-large for World Vision International from 1974, he gained a global ministry of teaching, lecturing and preaching.

Bibliography

Works: Confessions of a Theologian (Waco, 1986).

Studies: G. Fackre, 'Carl F. H. Henry', in D. G. Peerman and M. E. Marty (eds.), A Handbook of Christian Theologians (Nashville, 2nd 1984); Bob E. Patterson, Carl F. H. Henry (Waco, 1984); C. Wright Doyle, Carl Henry: Theologian for All Seasons (Eugene, OR, 2010).

J. D. DOUGLAS

HERBERT OF CHERBURY (c. 1583–1648)

Edward, first Baron of Cherbury, brother of the poet, George, made his reputation as a philosopher, historian, diplomat and adventurer. He has been styled 'the father of *deism' but his system differs significantly from much later deist thought, and the extent of his influence upon it is debatable.

In his foundational work, De Veritate (On the Truth), he sought to refute the sceptical denial of the possibility of knowledge, by adumbrating an original method of discovering the truth. His theory of universal 'Common Notions' provided the grounds for cognitive certainty and produced a scheme of rational religion when extended into that sphere. The five 'Common Religious Notions' are: (1) there is a supreme God; (2) he ought to be worshipped; (3) virtue and piety constitute the main elements of such worship; (4) sin must be expiated by repentance; (5) there are future rewards and *punishments. Herbert passionately advocated a form both of religious tolerance and of religious liberation for the laity. To the extent that he assimilated religious to general *epistemology and maintained that the practice of natural religion can lead to eternal blessedness, Herbert heralded an approach to religion that became broadly characteristic of much seventeenth- and eighteenth-century British and European thought.

Bibliography

Works: M. H. Carré (tr. and ed.), De Veritate (Bristol, 1937).

Studies: R. D. Bedford, The Defence of Truth: Herbert of Cherbury and the Seventeenth Century (Manchester, 1979); R. H. Popkin, The History of Scepticism from Erasmus to Spinoza (Berkeley, 1979).

S. N. WILLIAMS

HERESY

Heresy is teaching or belief which claims to be Christian and yet is contrary to orthodox doctrine. One of the meanings of the Greek word hairesis is a sect or school of philosophy, and the word is used in that sense in the Acts of the Apostles (5:17; 15:5; 24:5; 26:5; 28:22). Paul refers to haireseis in 1 Cor. 11:19 (translated as 'factions' in the NRSV) and in Gal. 5:20 ('party-spirit'). The adjective hairetikos ('factious') occurs in Titus 3:10, and 2 Pet. 2:1 refers to false prophets who will bring in 'destructive heresies' (haireseis). 'Heresy' therefore came to mean false teaching arising within the church and causing division. Among the Apostolic Fathers (see *Patristic theology), bishop Ignatius of Antioch refers to heresy as poison or a deadly drug (Trall. 6:1–2) and to heretics as 'ravening dogs' from whose bite one must flee (Eph. 7:1).

But to define heresy, or heterodoxy, wrong or other (heterē) opinion or belief (doxa), requires a prior definition of what constitutes orthodoxy, straight or right (orthē) belief. For Christians, that is determined by apostolic teaching, embodied in the books of the NT, and yet more must be said, for the unavoidable question arises of how the NT is to be interpreted.

Towards the end of the first century, the word 'heresies' appeared in the title of the first major treatise of Christian theology, the Adversus Haereses of *Irenaeus, bishop of Lugdunum (Lyons) in Gaul (France). This includes a catalogue of numerous sects grouped under the name of '*Gnosticism', who generally worked with a *dualism between the realm of the divine or the spiritual, comprising numerous levels or aeons of divine beings, and the realm of matter which was essentially evil. This gave rise to *Docetism, the heresy that Christ only appeared (dokei) to be human. At this early period, the boundaries of the church were fairly fluid, for although the Gospels and the epistles were read widely throughout the churches, the NT canon had not yet been definitively determined and no council of the whole church had yet given guidance on interpreting the NT or defining the limits of Christian orthodoxy, and it was easy for this popular Gnostic religiosity to infiltrate. (This led to the modern theory of Bauer, answered by H. E. W. Turner, that what was later accounted ‘orthodoxy’ was merely one variation post-dating the ‘heresies’.) One rich Christian, *Marcion, also seeing the world as evil, attributed its creation to the vengeful god he saw in the OT and differentiated the loving God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ as a different deity. At the same time, there were Jews (the *Ebionites or ‘Poor’) who claimed to be followers of Jesus, and yet insisted that he was a man chosen by God, rejecting any confession of his deity.

The solution proposed by Irenaeus to these heresies already wracking the church in the late second century was that orthodox Christian doctrine could be recognized within the living tradition of the church, specifically the bishops appointed by the apostles together with their successors. But it could also be summarized in the ‘rule of faith’ (regula fidei), not found in any specific agreed formula, but always bearing the same triadic shape. It was belief ‘in one God, the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth . . . and in one Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God, who became incarnate for our salvation, and in the Holy Spirit, who proclaimed through the prophets . . .’ (Adversus Haereses, I, 10, 1). This summary of the faith arose from Matt. 28:19, was used as a confession made at baptism and variously expanded in different churches. Yet there remained the question of how this triadic faith was to be interpreted, and in the third century, the heresy of Sabellius, that the one God was Father, Son and Spirit in three successive modes (modalism), had to be rejected (see *Christology).

But it was in the fourth century that serious heresy prompted the development in which the baptismal confession became the basis for a more official creed. The creed approved at the Council of *Nicaea in 325 was formulated specifically to exclude the heresy of *Arianism, the belief which was already present within the church before Arius, that the Word (*Logos) or

Son of God was not to be identified with God himself, but was the first of the creatures through whom God created the world. Instead of the One God of Sabellius who was not really or eternally Three, the ‘Arians’ in effect posited a kind of hierarchical tritheism. The controversy raged for another sixty-five years before the Nicene *Creed was approved in revised form by the Council of *Constantinople (381), insisting on the full deity of Christ. The phrasing was rather different, but the key formula of the Creed of Nicaea was retained – that the Son was ‘of one Being with the Father’ (homoousion tō Patri). Contemporary scholarship argues, however, that to classify many of the fourth-century views as ‘Arian’ or ‘Semi-Arian’ is misleading, and that Arius was a minor figure whose name was attached by Athanasius to a variety of views within the church.

With the Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed, there was now a standard of orthodoxy approved by an ecumenical council and accepted by the church. But heresies about the doctrine of the person of Christ still flourished. *Apollinarianism (that Christ had no human mind) had been condemned at Constantinople (381), but at the later Council of *Chalcedon, *Nestorianism (that there were in effect two persons in Christ, the Son of God and the Son of David) and Eutychianism (that the humanity of Christ was deified in such a way that there was no longer a distinct human nature) were both condemned. The ‘Symbol’ of the Council of Chalcedon added a clarification of the second article of the Creed to insist that we should speak of Christ as one person (the Son of God) in ‘two natures’, deity and humanity, distinct but not separate. The trinitarian and Christological heresies therefore are those which deny the doctrine of the *Trinity formulated in the creed and the doctrine of the person of Christ as further clarified in the Chalcedonian Symbol. However, it should also be noted that the Coptic, Syrian and Armenian churches, while they reject the *Monophysitism of Eutyches, are ‘Miaphysites’: they insist on speaking of the ‘one nature’ (mia physis) of Christ, and although this was regarded as heretical by the Greek and Latin churches, it is now often understood as a difference in the use of language, since they clearly asserted (and still affirm) both his true deity and his true humanity.

But even while the Christological heresies were causing dispute in the early fifth century, several other heresies particularly affected the Latin-speaking church of the West. *Manichaeism was like Gnosticism both in holding to a metaphysical dualism between two ultimate principles (or 'gods') of good and evil, and also in that it arose outside rather than from within the church. *Donatism arose from within as a movement in north Africa to preserve the purity of the church and was rejected by *Augustine's doctrine that the church was only holy by *grace. *Pelagianism, the more outright heresy that salvation could be attained by human merit, was also rejected by Augustine on the grounds that salvation was by *grace. It was condemned by the second Synod of Orange (529).

Subsequent disputes, such as that between Greek East and Latin West over the filioque clause in the creed, led to mutual anathemas, but these would now be regarded as disputes within the church. The *Reformation led to further disputes which are now generally accepted as divisions within the church, but some of the ancient Christological and trinitarian heresies arose again, notably in the teaching of Servetus (who rejected the doctrine of the Trinity) and *Socinus. Socinianism arose out of a strong biblicism which rejected the credal, trinitarian interpretation of Scripture and went beyond Arianism (rejecting the full deity of Christ) to what became known as *Unitarianism (rejecting even his pre-existence as a subordinate deity). Unitarianism flourished particularly in the eighteenth century as *deism became popular.

*Schleiermacher presented an analysis of heresy. Since the heart of the Christian faith is the experience of Jesus as the Redeemer, the four 'natural heresies' are Pelagianism, which denied the need for redemption; Manichaeism, which regarded creation as beyond redemption; Ebionism, which denied that Jesus was any different from us and so could not provide redemption; and Docetism, which said that Jesus only appeared to be human and so could not provide the kind of redemption we need. But this does not take trinitarian heresies into account, and it was the 'liberal' tradition following Schleiermacher which reproduced in *Harnack and many others a revival of several of the ancient heresies.

While 'heresy hunting' often displays an unchristian spirit, and while the history of the church is replete with the persecution of heretics in ways we now deplore, the Christian church cannot dispense with the category of 'heresy' if the Christian faith is not to lack definition and mean anything and everything. It is important to distinguish, however, between doctrinal disagreements between authentic Christians, and heretical doctrines which deny the faith.

See also: SCHISM.

Bibliography

W. Bauer, Orthodoxy and Heresy in Earlier Christianity (Philadelphia, 1971 and London, 1972); R. Olson, The Mosaic of Christian Belief: Twenty Centuries of Unity and Diversity (Leicester, 2002); G. L. Prestige, Fathers and Heretics (London, 1977); B. Quash and M. Ward, Heresies and How to Avoid Them: Why It Matters What Christians Believe (London, 2007); K. Rahner, On Heresy (New York, 1964); H. E. W. Turner, The Pattern of Christian Truth: A Study in the Relations between Orthodoxy and Heresy in the Early Church (London, 1954).

T. A. NOBLE

HERMENEUTICS

Hermeneutics (a term derived from the Gk verb hermēneuō, to interpret) is the study of interpretation. General hermeneutics can take as its subject matter the interpretation and understanding of any act of communication, whether written or oral, verbal or non-verbal, and as such tends to include fundamental questions about the nature of language, meaning, communication and understanding, and the possibility of 'correct' interpretation. Biblical hermeneutics focuses specifically on the interpretation, understanding and appropriation of biblical texts. It can be understood (1) as a specific application of a general hermeneutics, albeit as one which might push general hermeneutics to its limit in some way; or (2) as having a character all of its own thanks to the unique nature of the biblical texts, and specifically their relationship to God and God's ways with the world; or (3) as being the unique foundation of a revised and theologically informed general hermeneutics, which sees all communication as somehow caught up in the communication of God to the world displayed most clearly in the Bible.

Pre-modern biblical hermeneutics

Beginnings

For biblical hermeneutics to exist, there must first be scriptural texts that exist in some relatively stable form and are regarded as capable of shaping life in the present, and then there must be some kind of explicit reflection upon the nature and limits of the processes by which the text's life-shaping potential is realized by readers. The Hebrew Bible contains significant amounts of textual interpretation (scribal glosses, the inclusion and arrangement of pre-existing material, direct quotation and commentary, the Chronicler's reworking of the traditions found in Kings, and so on), but there is no clear sense of a fixed canon of text to be interpreted, nor any explicit reflection on the processes of interpretation involved. Similarly, the expansively paraphrasing Aramaic translations of Hebrew Scripture known as Targums are certainly interpretation of classic texts for present situations, but they too don't assume the fixity of the classic texts, and don't tend to include reflection upon their own production. Some examples from Qumran and early Rabbinic midrashic interpretation do seem to assume that there are relatively fixed texts to be interpreted, and that because the texts cannot simply be reshaped so as to apply to contemporary needs and situations, some process of fairly sophisticated interpretation is needed if the texts' life-shaping potential is to be unlocked. It is, however, only with early rabbinic codifications of the rules by which valid midrashic interpretation could proceed (such as Rabbi Hillel's seven 'rules' – middoth – of interpretation) that we see explicit reflection on these processes, and so only then that biblical hermeneutics proper begins to appear.

There is a great deal of scriptural interpretation in the NT, most of which does seem to assume the relative fixity and contemporary authority of the texts used, but there is rather less that explicitly reflects on the nature and limits of the interpretive process. Two examples, however, capture well the most important characteristics of early biblical hermeneutics. On the one hand, we have the claim in 2 Tim. 3:16 that 'all Scripture is God-breathed and is useful for teaching, rebuking, correcting and training in righteousness'. The pervasive assumption of early Christian scriptural readers is that the texts are intended by God to lead readers deeper into knowledge of God and into service to God's mission in the world; interpretation is the process by which scriptural texts that may not initially seem to serve this divine intention are worked on until their divine educative potential is unlocked.

A second example of explicit biblical hermeneutics can be found in the writings of Paul the apostle, as he justifies Christian claims to true understanding of Hebrew Scripture, and distinguishes Christian readings of those texts from others. In 2 Cor. 3–4, he draws on the narrative of the veiling of Moses not just to make claims about the stages of God's salvific plan, but in order to justify his hermeneutics, explaining how the advent of Christ allows a different and truer construal of the meaning of Hebrew Scriptures than is available without Christ. As Paul explained this point further, he deployed (as one part of a more complex array of diverse and interlocking metaphors) language about 'letter' and 'spirit', contrasting a reading of Scripture informed and enlightened by Christ's advent (one that in his view can lead us deeper into the glory of God) with one that is constructed without attention to Christ. In so doing, Paul provided terminology that was later to be widely used to distinguish between literal or plain sense readings of a text and the spiritual readings that fully unearth that text's educative potential. That contrast (with which one may compare the contrast between peshat and darash in rabbinic interpretation) was to become a basic distinction in Christian biblical hermeneutics for centuries to come.

Patristic and medieval exegesis

The distinction between 'literal' and 'spiritual' readings in the patristic period became a distinction between 'grammatical' readings governed by the ordinary procedures for making sense of texts in Greco-Roman culture, and 'figural' readings which went beyond this and employed the techniques of allegorical or typological exegesis to explore the full Christ-centred tutelary potential of the texts. It was assumed that the Scriptures formed a single text with a unified central meaning (the depiction of, and induction into, God's ways with the world culminating in Christ), and that Christ was a recap or concluding summary of the whole.

The theory and practice of allegorical interpretation goes back to pre-Christian times. Many Stoic philosophers respected Homer as a classic text, but were embarrassed by the crudities and absurdities of stories about the gods and goddesses of ancient polytheistic Greek religion. Some interpreters in the Stoic and *Platonic tradition reduced this tension by interpreting the stories of these gods and goddesses as disguised accounts of human qualities or elements of nature. Plato spoke of a ‘meaning below’ (hyponoia) the surface of the text, and many first-century writers describe this as allegoria. From Greek thought, this method of reading a text found its way into Jewish circles. *Philo wrote as a Jew seeking to commend Jewish faith to educated Greeks and Romans, and used allegorical interpretation as a device for rereading passages in the early chapters of Genesis that he found embarrassingly anthropomorphic, or passages in Leviticus that described the minutiae of animal sacrifice. Thus the method was established in Jewish and Greek circles before its growth within the Christian church.

Allegorical interpretation has had an ambivalent status in Christian tradition. *Origen argued that Paul himself provided precedent for allegorical interpretation in his identification of the wilderness rock with Christ in 1 Cor. 10:1–4. There has always been controversy about whether this passage and Gal. 4:22–26 constitute genuine examples of allegorical interpretation. Much depends on definition and questions about Paul’s purpose. Many draw a firm distinction between allegory, which depends on a correspondence between texts, and typology, which depends on a correspondence between the events to which those texts point. Some argue that Paul uses typology but not allegory; others have argued that the distinction is not clear-cut in the NT and patristic periods, and that much allegorical exegesis has at least elements of the typological and vice versa.

Clement of Rome (c. 96) provides a very early example of Christian allegorical interpretation. Commenting on Josh. 2:18, he observes that the Israelite spies gave Rahab a sign ‘that she should hang out a scarlet thread from her house, foreshadowing that all who achieve and hope in God shall have a deliverance through the blood of the Lord’ (1 Clement 12:7). Clement of Alexandria, a century later, argued that the interpreter should expect to find hidden meanings in the biblical writings, because the mystery of the gospel transcended the meaning of any particular passage. Origen, one of the most influential of early Christian exegetes, spoke of the body of the text which taught readers truly about God’s economy, but did so in ways that were sometimes difficult and obscure and so could drive them to a deeper level of spiritual reading which laboured to see the whole text as a unified educative structure leading to contemplation of God. There were some, notably theologians associated with Antioch in the late fourth century (see *Antiochene School), who in large part rejected the allegorical method, but for the most part it was the common inheritance of patristic exegesis.

In the medieval period, the practice of spiritual exegesis developed until interpreters could talk regularly of a fourfold sense of Scripture. The plain or literal sense of a passage was expanded by allegorical reading that asked what light the text threw on the divine economy (or, more narrowly speaking, on matters of Christian doctrine), by tropological or moral reading that drew out the text’s significance for practical conduct, and by anagogical reading that considered the text’s relation to the culmination of God’s purposes in eternity.

Reformation hermeneutics

For the Reformers no less than for patristic and medieval readers, Christ is the sum and substance of the Scriptures: the Bible is, in Luther’s metaphor, the manger in which the infant Jesus is to be found. For the Reformers, Scripture was God’s sermon, addressing sinful humanity with words of law and of grace – words that are made effective within the hearer by the work of the Spirit (see *Reformation theology). The Scriptures are sufficient for this purpose, and with the aid of the *Spirit these words can be clearly and unambiguously heard. These divine words have certainly been spoken in Scripture by means of human words, and the Reformation saw various aspects of literal or grammatical reading flourish as the Reformers drew on the textual and philological techniques of Renaissance *humanism to assist them in reading the texts afresh in the languages of their human authors. Spiritual exegesis was not, however, rejected, and figural or typological reading remained for most of the Reformers an important part of the reading process.

Modern biblical hermeneutics

The end of the pre-modern consensus

There was a rough consensus in pre-modern biblical hermeneutics that literal and spiritual senses combined could lead the reader into an understanding of and participation in the one divine economy centred on Christ; in that sense, the Scriptures presented a 'world' within which the reader could find him- or herself. As early modernity progressed, a reversal began to take place. With the rise to prominence of non-theological disciplines thought capable of giving comprehensive accounts of the world (the natural sciences, philosophy, history), the question for biblical interpreters became: How do the Scriptures and what they speak of fit into this world? Historical criticism, in particular, developed in the seventeenth century and became the dominant force in biblical interpretation in academic circles (and often more widely) from the eighteenth. The prime question to ask of texts was how they stood up as evidence by the canons of historical criticism, and whether the events they depicted really happened. Whether the answers given were conservative or radical, the religious application of Scripture frequently became a matter of tracing the implications of the facts to which the texts pointed, rather than finding the Scriptures as such to be a unified and multi-layered school for Christian life. The exploration of spiritual senses began to be seen as a distraction from or even corruption of this new form of literal-historical reading.

Romantic hermeneutics

*Romantic hermeneutics provided, in the hands of theologians like Friedrich *Schleiermacher, one way of rescuing the religious significance of scriptural texts after the demise of pre-modern spiritual exegesis. Romantic interpreters focused on the texts not as evidence for historical facts, but as the creative expressions of religious individuals or communities – expressions from which the quality of the authors' religious consciousness could be reconstructed and shared by a sympathetic reader. Schleiermacher stressed the spiralling nature of such hermeneutical investigation: the interpreter has to undertake a creative leap into a provisional understanding of the experience that the text expresses, but this depends on an understanding of that text's component words and phrases. Yet the meaning of those words and phrases in turn depends upon their context within the text as a whole, for the consciousness encoded in the text is an organic whole rather than an aggregate of individual thoughts and impressions. This understanding of the 'hermeneutic circle' was later taken up by the philosopher Wilhelm *Dilthey, who drew on it to develop an influential account of the distinctiveness of the human sciences, grounded as they are in the interpretation of expressions of human experience.

It is as an heir to this Romantic tradition that much twentieth-century biblical hermeneutics (as, for instance, the existentialist hermeneutics of Rudolf *Bultmann, or the New Hermeneutic of Ernst Fuchs and others) turned to examining the ways in which biblical texts could disturb and reshape patterns of perception and thought in the reader that lie deeper than those that can be verbalized in clear propositions or theories – repainting the 'horizon' against which all a person's individual experiences and thoughts are perceived. In the second half of the twentieth century, these conversations were much influenced by the philosophical hermeneutics of Hans-Georg Gadamer, who described interpretation as a matter of the 'fusion of horizons', whereby the interaction between the worldview encoded in a text and the worldview embodied in the reader leads that reader to a transformed understanding.

The hermeneutics of suspicion

The hermeneutics of suspicion is another child of the attempt to see where the Scriptures fit into the world described by non-theological disciplines. A hermeneutics of suspicion argues that the claims and descriptions offered by biblical texts cannot necessarily be taken at their face value, but are determined by and cloak forces at work beneath the surface. With the right analytical tools, the texts may be seen both to promote and to disguise the power of their authors or of the groups for which they speak – whether that is the power of one particular faction in the struggles of early Christianity, or the power of the ruling or wealthy classes, or the power of patriarchy. Similarly, attempts to interpret these texts may be shown up as determined not by a disinterested commitment to the texts themselves, but by a variety of unspoken interests that subtly or more blatantly shape what the interpreter thinks he or she sees in the text. In neither case is it necessary to accuse the author or interpreter of conscious deception: the ideology that determines the text or interpretation may well be invisible to those whose interests it serves and to those whom it disempowers.

*Feminist hermeneutics can take both of these forms, looking either at the shaping of biblical texts or of their reception history by patriarchal ideology. *Liberation hermeneutics tends to focus more on the latter, pointing to the ways in which the revolutionary socio-political message of the Scriptures has been neutered by powerful and privileged interpreters simply incapable, from their vantage point, of seeing what was before their noses. Deconstructionist hermeneutics can be seen as a radical form of the hermeneutics of suspicion, chasing the play of interlocking and evolving ideologies that have shaped not just the text and the history of its interpretation, but the very idea of a unified text to be interpreted, or of unified readers capable of disinterested interpretation.

Hermeneutics and dogmatic theology

In a rather different vein, a renewed attempt to think through biblical hermeneutics in the light of credal convictions about the divine economy, drawing only unsystematically on non-theological philosophical hermeneutics, was pursued by such twentieth-century theologians as Karl *Barth and Hans Urs von *Balthasar, and their followers. Barth, for instance, claimed that Scripture is to be understood within a thoroughly trinitarian and incarnational frame. The Word of God to the world is in the first place Jesus of Nazareth. That incarnate Word is then present in a second form, in the form of witness, in Scripture, and in a third form as the church's proclamation of Christ on the basis of the scriptural witness. It is only when we read the diverse texts of the Bible as a unified canon witnessing to Christ, for the sake of proclamation, that we read them as Scripture (and this incidentally means that theological exegesis can treat the results of historical criticism only as initial steps in exegesis, clarifying the nature of some of the raw materials, but incapable on its own of coming to terms with the real subject matter of the Bible). To say that Scripture is a witness to Jesus Christ is not, for Barth, to say that we should think of it primarily as a source of correct information about him; it is, rather, a witness to Jesus Christ as the Word of the Father, and we hear that Word only to the extent that we find ourselves grasped by him, our sins judged by him, and the love of God proclaimed to us in him. And, for Barth, the hearing of that divine Word is in no sense a human achievement, the outcome of appropriate hermeneutical techniques correctly applied; it is the work of the Spirit on us and in us, converting us to the Word. Other theologians have stressed even more than Barth the extent to which the Spirit who allows us to hear the Word is the Spirit who animates and unifies the body of Christ, so that a true 'spiritual' interpretation cannot be the product of an individual reader, however inspired, but must emerge out of the conversation between readers who are the diverse members of the body of Christ.

Postliberal hermeneutics

In the later decades of the twentieth century, a number of *postliberal theologians have turned away from the attempt to construct a philosophical hermeneutics of general applicability, or from the attempt to develop a purely dogmatic biblical hermeneutics, and have instead turned to tracing the specific ways in which the Bible has been and is used by real Christian communities. A postliberal theologian might trace the settlements within a particular community by which its specific ideas and practices shape the way in which it approaches Scripture, with Scripture in turn, when approached in that way, supporting the ideas and practices of the community. There is an unavoidable circularity here, but postliberals tend to be non-*foundationalists – that is, they assume that such circularity is ultimately unavoidable: in the end, no reading practice can be justified simply on a priori grounds. Differing approaches to Scripture sustained by different communities of interpretation can nevertheless be compared to a certain extent according to how coherent and comprehensive they are, and by the extent to which they allow Scripture to shape and inform the community's life in a wide range of contexts. The focus on community use does not mean straightforwardly accepting that the community can make of Scripture what it likes. Postliberals such as Hans *Frei have pointed to the fact that central amongst the reading practices of mainstream Christian groups have been ones which genuinely allow the Scriptures to stand over against the community as a source of judgment and critique.

See also: HISTORY OF THEOLOGY; SCRIPTURE; SCRIPTURE, DOCTRINE OF.

Bibliography

K. Barth, CD, esp. I.I; H. W. Frei, The Eclipse of Biblical Narrative (New Haven, 1974); A. J. Hauser and D. F. Watson, A History of Biblical Interpretation, vol. 1 (Grand Rapids, 2003); J. Holcomb, Christian Theologies of Scripture (New York, 2006); H. de Lubac, Medieval Exegesis, 2 vols. (Grand Rapids and London, 1998–2000); C. Rowland and M. Corner (eds.), Liberating Exegesis (London, 1990); F. D. E. Schleiermacher, Hermeneutics (Oxford, 1978); A. C. Thiselton, Hermeneutics: An Introduction (Grand Rapids, 2009); idem, New Horizons in Hermeneutics: The Theory and Practice of Transforming Biblical Reading (Grand Rapids, 1992); idem, The Hermeneutics of Doctrine (Grand Rapids, 2007); P. Tribble, Texts of Terror (London, 2003); F. Watson, Paul and the Hermeneutics of Faith (London, 2005); F. Young, Biblical Exegesis and the Formation of Christian Culture (Cambridge, 1997).

M. HIGTON

HERRMANN, WILHELM (1846–1922)

Herrmann grew up under *pietist influences, but during his theological studies embraced the up-and-coming theology of Albrecht *Ritschl and became his foremost disciple. After a period as a lecturer at Halle, he was appointed professor of theology at Marburg in 1879, where he remained to the end of his life. His most famous work is The Communion of the Christian with God (1886; ET, 1971), which deals with the doctrine of God and the Christian's relationship with him.

'God' for Herrmann is not the traditional three-in-one of orthodox Christianity, but rather 'the personal vitality and power of goodness'. Jesus is not the Son of God in the sense traditionally understood by the church, but rather a man in whose exemplary character the power of God, i.e. the power of the highest good, was revealed. For Herrmann there are no supernatural miracles. Jesus demonstrated that the highest good is a life of love. It is the beauty of Jesus' life that reveals God.

In contrast to the scepticism of the 'Did Jesus live?' movement, Herrmann maintained that the evangelists' portrayal of Jesus is completely independent of historical reality; even if Jesus had never existed, the portrait of him would still remain permanently valid for its purpose. He therefore discounted the results of the higher-critical investigation of the Bible as in no way requiring amendment of the picture of Jesus contained in the Gospels. In Herrmann's opinion, the portrait would stand for all time as a model of how we should live, even if it were completely devoid of historicity. Christianity did not need a historical apologetic.

Bibliography

R. T. Voekel, The Shape of the Theological Task (Philadelphia, 1968).

H. HARRIS

HESYCHASM

Hesychasm (i.e. quietism, from Gk hesychia = quietness), though generally regarded as a theological movement in fourteenth-century Byzantium stemming from a particular type of Christian spirituality, finds its beginnings in the early development of anchoritic *asceticism. In the beginning it was a matter of practice, but from the fourth century onwards, with the rise of great figures like *Basil the Great, Evagrius Ponticus (346–99), *Macarius, *Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite, *Maximus the Confessor, John Climacus (c. 570–649) and *Symeon the New Theologian (see *Eastern Orthodox theology), ascetic hesychasm was given a theoretical or theological basis. The fourth-century hesychast was one who attempted to be totally freed from visible realities, through mastery over passions and acquisition of virtues, illumination of the mind by contemplation and prayer of the mind (or heart), so that he might arrive at quietness in God or *vision of God.

From the sixth century onwards 'monologic' prayer, consisting in the rhythmic repetition of one sentence, phrase or word, usually the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, became the means of attaining divine hesychia. In the seventh century St Catherine's Monastery at Sinai became the centre of a type of hesychasm epitomized in The Ladder of John Climacus (tr. C. Luibhèid, London, 1982). In the second half of the tenth century Symeon the New Theologian gave hesychasm a new impulse by linking it with a purely Christocentric vision of the 'divine light' (cf. Symeon the New Theologian: The Discourses, tr. C. J. de Catanzaro, London, 1980; G. A. Maloney, The Mystic of Fire and Light: St Symeon the New Theologian, Denville, 1975). Growing out of this, a psychological technique of prayer was developed. The central element was the ceaseless repetition in solitude of 'Lord Jesus Christ, have mercy on me a sinner', to which the posture of the body and the manner of breathing could be added as secondary elements. The end of it all was the vision of the 'uncreated light' of God.

In the fourteenth century both the vision of the 'divine light' and especially the method used for its attainment became the subjects of bitter controversy. Opposition to hesychasm was led by Barlaam of Calabria (c. 1290–1350) and George Akindynos (c. 1300–49). The 'uncreated' light of the hesychasts was held to imply ditheism. *Gregory of Palamas was the greatest apologist of hesychasm, putting forward the distinction between God's essence (ousia) and energies, linking the latter with the uncreated divine light and arguing that God, who is invisible, unapproachable and incommunicable in his essence, becomes visible, approachable and communicable in his energies.

After intense conflict, a decisive synod of 1351 endorsed Gregory's distinction, and also the principles: (1) that the energies are uncreated, (2) that God is not composite, (3) that the word 'divine' can be attributed not only to the essence, but also to the energies of God, and (4) that men do not participate in the essence, but in the energies and grace of God. Henceforth, Barlaam and Akindynos would be regarded as heretics, and Palamas as the mouthpiece of orthodoxy. Yet disputes over hesychasm continued, especially as a result of Latin influence from the West. Hesychasm lives on in the Orthodox East, especially on Mount Athos; it exercises a measure of influence in the West, partly through the compilation of eighteenth-century hesychist writings known as the Philokalia.

Bibliography

Works: Gregory Palamas, The Triads, tr. N. Gendle (London, 1983); The Philokalia, 5 vols., tr. G. E. H. Palmer, P. Sherrard and K. Ware (London, 1979–95).

Studies: L. Clucas, The Hesychast Controversy in Byzantium in the Fourteenth Century, unpubl. diss., 2 vols. (Los Angeles, 1975); C. D. L. Johnson, The Globalization of Hesychasm and the Jesus Prayer (London, 2010); J. Meyendorff, Byzantine Hesychasm (London, 1974); idem, St Gregory Palamas and Orthodox Spirituality (New York, 1974); idem, A Study of Gregory Palamas (London, 1962); G. C. Papademetriou, Introduction to St Gregory Palamas (Brookline, MA, 2004).

G. D. DRAGAS

HICK, JOHN HARWOOD (1922–2012)

Hick was a philosopher of religion and a radical theologian. He was educated in Edinburgh, Oxford and Cambridge, and was formerly a minister of the United Reformed Church in Britain. He held numerous academic positions, including latterly emeritus professor at Birmingham University and the Claremont Graduate University, California. He was a Fellow of the Institute for Advanced Research in Arts and Social Sciences, University of Birmingham, and a Vice-President of the British Society for the Philosophy of Religion and of the World Congress of Faiths.

Hick's earlier works were concerned with central traditional issues in the *philosophy of religion (cf. Philosophy of Religion, Englewood Cliffs, NJ, ³1983; Faith and Knowledge: A Modern Introduction to the Problem of Religious Knowledge, New York, 1957; and essays on the existence of God, etc.). His most significant book in this field is Evil and the God of Love (London, ³1985), which prefers a so-called *Irenaean to an *Augustinian approach to the problem of *evil, and also appeals to an eschatological resolution that will be unveiled only at the end.

Hick's attention then turned to questions about the *uniqueness of Jesus as the incarnate Son of God in the context of the other world religions (cf. God and the Universe of Faiths, London, 1973). He argues for the reduction of the 'high' Christology of the Nicene Creed and the Chalcedonian definition of the faith (cf. Hick, ed., The Myth of God Incarnate, London, 1977). It can be established that there has been a historical development in Hick's *Christology from an earlier orthodoxy to the later rejection of it. This is due to his assumptions that: no special revelation of God is possible; unconditional *universal salvation is certain (cf. Death and Eternal Life, London, ²1985); and all world religions are equal in their theological aspirations and claims. Hick argued that the traditional arguments for the uniqueness of Jesus Christ are invalid, regressive and even harmful to the harmonious co-existence of people of different faiths which is the need of the hour. He therefore pleads for a return from a Christocentric to a theocentric theology, with all the great religious systems alike providing access to the 'ultimate reality' of God.

Hick delivered the 1986–87 *Gifford Lectures, and in 1991 was awarded the Grawemeyer Award for Religion.

See also: CHRISTIANITY AND OTHER RELIGIONS.

Bibliography

C.-R. Brakenheim, How Philosophy Shapes Theories of Religion . . . (Lund, 1975) – with special reference to Hick; G. D'Costa, John Hick's Theology of Religions: A Critical Evaluation (New York and London, 1987); N. Jason, A Critical Examination of the Christology of John Hick, with Special Reference to the Continuing Significance of the 'Definitio Fidei' of the Council of Chalcedon, AD 451 (unpubl. dissertation, University of Sheffield, 1978); T. R. Mathis, Against John Hick: An Examination of His Philosophy and Religion (Lanham, 1985); C. Sinkinson, The Universe of Faiths: A Critical Study of John Hick's Religious Pluralism (Carlisle, 2001).

N. JASON

HIDDEN AND REVEALED GOD

A concept particularly associated with the theology of Martin *Luther and Karl *Barth.

Meaning of terms

To speak of God as revealing himself is to imply that God is a hidden God: the Deus revelatus still remains a Deus velatus. Moses, Jacob, Job, the psalmists and prophets are all aware of the 'hiddenness' of God, even in his act of revealing himself. *Clement, *Origen, Chrysostom (c. 344/54–407), *Augustine, doctors, mystics, schoolmen were all conscious of the unknowability of God, and Luther intensely so. Modern, secularized humanity may have lost its earlier awareness of the mystery of God, that divine holiness which transcends all human experiences, aesthetic, intellectual and moral. Nevertheless, the mystery of God remains, as well as the question: 'How do I know him?'

In the Bible *revelation is disclosure of truth about God by the agency of God, as distinct from man's discovery of truth as he investigates his secular experience. In the NT it is expressed as God's disclosure in his Messiah in judgment and salvation, an event already effected in the advent of Jesus, though still to come on the last day.

The OT left unresolved the problem of how the God of Israel can be 'squared with' the history of Israel. The NT sharpened this poignantly in the disclosure of the work of God who, in showing his righteousness and mercy, yet suffered on the cross. The revelation of God cannot simply be read off from history or human experience. The crucial question still remains: How can the hidden God be revealed to me? How shall I find a gracious God?

The hidden God revealed in Christ

No theologian has tackled the problem of God as hidden and revealed more penetratingly than Luther. Luther argued that knowledge of God was twofold: (1) General, that there is a God, that he created heaven and earth, that he is righteous, and that he punishes the wicked. This knowledge was open to all humankind. (2) Particular or 'proper', that God loves us and seeks our salvation. This was revealed only in Christ.

Luther did not share the scholastic view of *Thomas Aquinas, or even of *Duns Scotus and *William of Ockham, that the general knowledge of God was attained by inference, and that reason was the foundation on which the proper knowledge of God revealed in Christ could be erected. He argued biblically that no-one can see God and live. We cannot say what God is like in himself, but only what he does for us. In any dealings with man, God has to wear a 'mask' (larva), and these 'masks' describe the way God meets man in his concrete existence (i.e. through the ordinances he established, and through the human beings he had created doing God's work in their appointed roles).

This had an exact parallel in the incarnation. Just as we do not infer God's existence, nature and attributes from his masks or veils, but recognize that God comes to meet us in them, so is it none other than God who comes to us and meets us in Christ. God gives no gifts less than himself. This was the supreme revelation wherein the hidden God is revealed: 'He who has seen me has seen the Father' (John 14:9); 'No man comes to the Father but by me' (John 14:6). We see by, and in, faith alone. Similarly, the faculty of reason, though of divine origin, cannot of itself find God or the road to salvation.

In a striking passage in the Heidelberg Disputation (1518), referring to God's 'face' and God's 'back' (Exod. 33:23), Luther argued against the 'theology of glory' of the schoolmen in favour of the 'theology of the *cross'. God's 'back' means his humanity, his weakness, his foolishness (1 Cor. 1:21, 25; cf. Isa. 45:15), i.e. the *incarnation. God is always revealed 'under a contrary form'; weakness is strength, foolishness is wisdom, death is life. In this simple truth of the gospel lies the divine secret, the disclosure supreme. We must stoop to learn about God from God as revealed in Christ, and not from our own understanding.

Deliverance by faith

The problems of election and *predestination, of *suffering and the *wrath of God remain, but they are delivered by faith out of our minds into the hands of God where they belong: they now appear as solutions, not problems. Luther never speculated on these problems, for he never faltered in faith: it is faith alone and only faith which fortifies and safeguards a soul from doubt, speculation, despair. In those memorable words, Wer glaubt, der hat (if you believe, you already possess), he argued that sufficient truth for man had been revealed in Christ, and only the believing heart which had grasped (or rather had been grasped by) the theology of the cross could see this. Even then, God is more deeply hidden in Christ crucified than he is in creation or in history. Power in weakness, glory in suffering, life in death, all show how hidden he is. This paradox of the cross and of God working in 'contrary form', reveal him as hidden, and leave him open to faith only. Election and predestination Luther experienced as God's love, without whose prior move he would have known nothing and been lost. Even in the wrath of God is hidden God's love, for wrath is but the annihilating reaction of the love of God to man's sin and disobedience: it disguises God's care and concern to redeem man. Similarly, in weakness, fear and suffering, all we need to know is that grace is sufficient, and strength is made perfect in weakness.

When Barth (as Luther before him) argued that we can know God only in Christ, he meant that it is only in a faith-experience of Christ that a person becomes open to revelation: the problems of wrath, predestination, suffering, the painful hiddenness of God, are all transmuted into an experience of the love, the care and the mercy of God. All experiences of life, evil and good, now become the raw material of the good life in which the believer experiences God's loving care in all things. In this experience of Christ, the hidden God becomes the revealed God.

Bibliography

J. Atkinson, Luther's Early Theological Works, LCC 16 (London, 1962); J. Dillenberger, God Hidden and Revealed (Philadelphia, 1953); B. A. Gerrish, 'To the Unknown God: Luther and Calvin on the Hiddenness of God', JR 53, 1973, pp. 263–292; A. E. McGrath, Luther's Theology of the Cross (Oxford, 1985).

J. ATKINSON

HIGHER-LIFE THEOLOGY

A pattern of Christian holiness teaching (see *Holiness Movement) popularized by the American Presbyterian minister, William Edward Boardman (1810–86), in his Higher Christian Life (1859). Boardman's book, which sold over 100,000 copies on both sides of the Atlantic, asserted that the experience of *sanctification is a distinct work of grace, clearly separable from *justification, if not in theory, then certainly in practice. He insisted that it is not to be confused with Wesleyan *perfectionism (Boardman's bête noire), and that it has been enjoyed throughout the centuries by outstanding Christians such as *Luther, *Baxter, Jonathan *Edwards and (surprisingly, in view of his aversion to *Wesley's teaching) some early *Methodist people such as Hester Ann Rogers (1756–94) and William Carvosso (1750–1835). The book's immediate popularity released Boardman for an itinerant convention ministry during which he met, and was later joined by, Robert Pearsall Smith (1827–98) and Hannah Whitall Smith (1832–1911), a couple who were to give his teaching wider popularity throughout Britain.

Emphasizing sanctification as a crisis experienced by faith, Boardman accepted neither the Wesleyan nor *Reformed doctrine of holiness, believing that Wesley claimed too much whilst the *Puritans and Reformers did not expect enough. Robert Pearsall Smith endeavoured further to meet the demand for popular holiness literature by writing Holiness Through Faith (1870). His wife, Hannah, added to the partnership some further concepts from her *Quaker background (particularly stillness and guidance), and this unusual fusion of Wesleyanism and Quakerism, expounded in her book, The Christian's Secret of a Happy Life (1875), was to become one of the most remarkable features of late nineteenth-century holiness teaching, combining the idea of a dramatic crisis with the 'rest of faith' ('Let go and let God').

The Boardman and Pearsall Smith message came to be presented in England at holiness conventions held at Broadlands (1874), Oxford (1874), Brighton (1875) and Keswick (1875). In its infancy the movement was in danger of concentrating on subjective experiences rather than objective teaching; some of its earlier addresses were more in the nature of extemporaneous talks and testimonies than carefully prepared expositions of Scripture. Over successive decades the teaching of the annual interdenominational Keswick Convention, held each July, gradually changed. Throughout its history the Convention Council has refrained from formulating a closely defined theology of sanctification, leaving its speakers free to expound and apply the various facets of scriptural teaching concerning personal and practical holiness. While recognizing that for some Christians the appropriation of their unique resources in Christ may find its focus in a particular moment of crisis, the Convention has given greater prominence to central biblical themes such as promised deliverance from known sin, continual cleansing by and identification with Christ, the practical implications of his lordship and the perpetual filling of the *Holy Spirit (see *Baptism in the Spirit), equipping Christians for service in the world. A strong missionary and evangelistic concern has been present from its earliest days and is integral to the Convention's main message.

Bibliography

S. Barabas, So Great Salvation: The History and Message of the Keswick Convention (London, 1952); D. Bebbington, Holiness in Nineteenth-Century England: The 1998 Didsbury Lecture (Carlisle, 2000); The Keswick Week (London, 1892–); J. C. Pollock, The Keswick Story (London, 1964); C. Price and I. Randall, Transforming Keswick (Carlisle, 2000); W. B. Sloan, These Sixty Years: The Story of the Keswick Convention (London, 1935); B. B.

Warfield, Perfectionism, 2 vols. (New York, 1931).

R. BROWN

HILARY OF POITIERS (c. 315–67)

Hilary was born of a pagan, noble family. Like *Augustine after him, he found pagan philosophy a useful preliminary to the Christian gospel. Shortly after his conversion he was made Bishop of Poitiers. Subsequent resistance to *Arianizing trends within the Gallic church led to a term of banishment in Asia Minor.

During his exile Hilary gained firsthand experience of Eastern theology, and was particularly influenced by the *Origenism of men like Basil of Ancyra (fl. 340–60). His work On the Synods dates from this period. It was an attempt to reconcile fellow Westerners to the different theological approach of the anti-Arians in the East.

His exile was also the occasion for his On the Trinity, the outstanding Latin theological treatise of the Arian controversy. Hilary added little to the orthodox view on the relationship of the Father and the Son or on the role of the Holy Spirit; but he did make an original contribution in *Christology, for he saw the most effective counter to Arian insistence on the human weakness of Christ in the postulation of three distinct stages in Christ's existence.

In the first stage, Christ was pre-existent as the Son of God, united with his Father in a mutual indwelling. At the incarnation (the second stage) he was born as a man without in any way ceasing to be God. Nevertheless, since Christ appeared in the form of a servant for man's benefit, effectively a breach was created within the Godhead. The human nature which Christ assumed was separated by an infinite distance from God the Father, though it was indissolubly linked to the divinity of God the Son. It was the latter's task to raise the human nature to the level of the divine – a task accomplished at his resurrection and ascension. In the third stage, Christ was restored to that glory which he shared with his Father before the incarnation. Believers, therefore, might hope that they too would share in the glory to which Christ had elevated human nature.

The key to Hilary's soteriology is the *deification of humanity, which God had purposed from the beginning. Its achievement had merely been complicated, not first inspired, by sin. Hilary has a clear concept of the two natures in the incarnate Christ, as well as of the unity of his person. His treatment, however, of the events of Christ's life falls into *docetism. He argued that Christ possessed a unique sort of body – a heavenly body, because its owner, who had come down from heaven and was on earth, was still in heaven. This body might fulfil all the functions of a human body and go through suffering, but it did so only by special condescension, and even then it did not really feel pain. According to its own nature, the body was free of human needs, and evinced the sort of power shown in the miracles and in the transfiguration. In effect, he had reached the polar opposite position from the Arians on the incarnate Christ. For him the miraculous displays of power were the rule, not the exception, for Christ's human body.

Bibliography

Select works in ET in NPNF.

Studies: C. Beckwith, Hilary of Poitiers on the Trinity: From De Fide to De Trinitate (New York and Oxford, 2009); P. Galtier, Saint Hilaire de Poitiers (Paris, 1960); C. B. Kaiser, 'The Development of Johannine Motifs in Hilary's Doctrine of the Trinity', Scottish Journal of Theology 29, 1976, pp. 237–247; E. P. Meijering, Hilary of Poitiers on the Trinity (Leiden, 1982); G. M. Newlands, Hilary of Poitiers: A Study in Theological Method (Berne, 1978); Lionel R. Wickham (ed.), Hilary of Poitiers (Liverpool, 1997).

G. A. KEITH

HILDEGARD OF BINGEN (1098–1179)

Hildegard was first a novice at Disibodenberg, in the Rhineland area of Germany, then convent mistress in 1136. From 1141 her occasional visions became expressed in words, which coincided with moving to Rupertsburg near Bingen. She spoke of being fairly constantly 'in the shadow of the living light' in spite of her pain. The living light itself which brought joy and release in visions was less common. The authority she believed herself to have was that of a 'Marian' mystical knowledge, for which self-annihilation made room.

Known as 'the Rhineland Sibyl', her express desire was to clarify the tradition of orthodox theology with some 'pictures'. Yet the world and humanity are both the puzzle and the solution to each other; and she awaited the answer of the Holy Spirit to clarify her visions, which became texts for 'exegesis'. The imagery of the visions are replete with OT influences as well as the Rule of *Benedict and a number of Church Fathers. *Bernard of Clairvaux was her staunch defender, getting Pope Eugene III to read her works when she was suspected of heresy.

A true representative of the high Middle Ages, her imagery was pastoral rather than domestic, as in the case of later medieval spiritual writing. She thought of God as an artist who in salvation history came to improve on his work in the human soul. As artists in his image, we are called to co-operate in this task. Her innovations in musical composition she viewed as part of this operation. Yet, for Hildegard, Jesus Christ shows us the fullness of the revelation of the divine artist.

See also: SPIRITUALITY.

Bibliography

J. L. Baird (ed.), The Personal Correspondence of Hildegard of Bingen: Selected Letters with an Introduction and Commentary (Oxford, 2006); F. Bowie and O. Davies (eds.), Hildegard of Bingen: An Anthology (London, 1990); Hildegard of Bingen, Scivias (New York, 1990).

M. W. ELLIOTT

HINDUSIM AND CHRISTIANITY

Frederic Spiegelberg has commented that, 'As we study the religions of the modern world we immediately become aware of one outstanding phenomenon – that the Occident and the Orient are apt to conceive the basic concepts of which the human race is capable in diametrically opposed ways' (Living Religions of the World, London, 1957, p. viii).

Superficial acquaintance may convey a different opinion, but it remains an indisputable fact that Hinduism and its derivatives, *Buddhism, Jainism and Sikhism, stand in diametrical divergence from Christianity on every major doctrine of faith and practice. A brief survey of Hindu teachings basic to the understanding of human destiny and salvation will amply demonstrate the truth of this statement.

Scripture

Hindu theology places a high premium on the Vedas as the revealed scriptures, rooted in the divine omniscience and 'received' by sages in deep transcendental meditation. The Vedas are referred to with reverence, and at first sight appear to have the same claim to authority as the Bible does in Christianity. Yet in spite of the insistence on the divine origin of the Vedas, another doctrine completely alters the nature of scriptural authority. This is well stated later in the Gita, probably the most popular scripture in present-day Hinduism: 'As is a pool of water in a place flooded with water, so are all the Vedas to a person who has attained Enlightenment' (2:46), i.e. once the seeker has attained Moksha or 'the Enlightened Consciousness' or 'Nirvana' or 'God-realization' (all of which signify *salvation in Hinduism), even the revealed scriptures no longer have a claim on him. In effect, this doctrine elevates the subjective experience of God-realization beyond the claim of the objective word of scripture. As a consequence, probably not even a handful of Hindus have ever read the entire Vedas. Aspirants prefer to bypass the close study of scripture in pursuit of experience in meditative practice (see *Religious experience). In this hazardous retreat into the subjective world of private experience, each individual is supreme and above authority.

God

There is no conception of God in Hinduism similar to the Christian doctrine of a sovereign *God who created the universe and governs it in the exercise of his omnipotent power (see *Sovereignty; *Creation; *Providence). In Hinduism, God is utterly beyond form and definition; he is the totally Other, unknowable and unknown. A distant omniscience in the heavenlies, he is also immanent in the universe, so that everything in nature is shot through with the divine. It is for this reason that the worship and propitiation of the forces of nature, or even of great men, comes so easily to Hindus.

Incarnation

Hindus have a doctrine of incarnation. The unknowable Divine becomes incarnate in flesh and blood during times of world crisis, and dwells among men in order to restore righteousness. But by contrast with the finality of Christ's *incarnation, in Hinduism incarnation is a process and is recurrent whenever the world is threatened by upheaval. The concept of a God of *love, especially the sacrificial love that is inherent in the Christian gospel, is foreign to the Hindu understanding of the Divine.

Humanity and its destiny

In Hinduism, the human person is a perfectible being. It is freely admitted that he is imperfect and prone to evil, but the cause of this is nothing inherent in his nature but ignorance (Avidya). This ignorance is his absence of understanding of his true divine nature. He is essentially a spiritual being with the divine spark as his core. If this were truly realized and made manifest, his radiant spiritual nature would shine forth. The highway that leads to this state is spiritual practice, especially silence, meditation, intense self-abnegation and the chastening of one's gross carnal nature. Thus man is the architect of his own salvation and needs no *mediator, still less a saviour or redeemer. Hinduism is par excellence a blueprint for auto-salvation. The individual achieves his own deliverance from the knot of human bondage into the liberty of God-realized people of spirit.

Karma and reincarnation

These twin doctrines are characteristic of all oriental mysticism, especially in the Indo-Aryan world. The law of Karma is simply the law of causality applied rigorously in the moral and conceptual realm as well as the physical. 'As a man thinketh, so is he' is an example of this law as it works in the realm of thought and moral intent. The law of rebirth or reincarnation (see *Metempsychosis) is the safety valve in Hinduism. If a seeker fails to realize his destiny of God-consciousness in this life, he can always lay the foundations of a second chance to labour for his salvation in another incarnation. Probation does not exhaust itself in one life; there is always a second opportunity for those who cannot face the rigours of the discipline prescribed for the spiritual athlete who sets himself single-mindedly to break through the coils of his earthly bondage. Divine grace is operative only at the fringes of the process, almost at the end of the human effort.

Hindu-Christian dialogue

It is an essential Hindu doctrine that all religions are pathways to God and that no religion can justifiably make any claim to exclusiveness (see *Christianity and other religions; *Uniqueness of Christ). Any religion that insists on being the only true one is unwarrantedly restrictive and narrow, in the light of the all-embracing amplitude of the divine will. Here Christ and Hinduism emerge in clear conflict (cf. John 14:6).

However attractive Hinduism may appear, especially with its techniques of meditation and spiritual practice, from a Christian point of view its 'Achilles' heel' is its failure to address itself meaningfully to the cold, hard, inescapable fact of *sin. Christians see sin, by which they mean that alienation of humanity from God which leads to alienation from our fellows and, above all, from ourselves, as the great harasser of humankind. For Christians this is dealt with by the divinely appointed method, namely, reconciliation by repentance and self-surrender through faith in the Lord Jesus and his redemption (see *Atonement); anyone who gives himself to meditation and spiritual discipline, however sincerely, is playing a dangerously losing game.

These profound differences between Hindu and Christian beliefs have not deterred writers and teachers from both traditions attempting to identify and build on points of contact between the two. Reforming Hindus such as Sri Aurobindo (1872–1950) have drawn on the Bible and Christian teaching to correct what they have seen as the weaknesses of Hinduism. Christians such as Raimundo Panikkar (1918–2010) have urged the use of Hindu concepts to commend Christianity to Hindus. Panikkar's book, The Unknown Christ of Hinduism (London, 1980), finds common ground in the humanity shared by Hindu and Christian and brought to true focus in the incarnation – for Hindus have not found it impossible to regard Jesus as an incarnation of deity. But other Indian Christian theologians (e.g. S. Kulandran, Grace: A Comparative Study of the Doctrine in Christianity and Hinduism, London, 1964) continue to view the two faiths as incompatible, and the approach of Panikkar as verging on *syncretism.

Bibliography

J. Brockington, Hinduism and Christianity (London, 1992); J. M. Brown and R. E. Frykenberg (eds.), Christians, Cultural Interactions, and India's Religious Traditions (Grand Rapids, 2002); H. Coward (ed.), Hindu-Christian Dialogue: Perspectives and Encounters (Delhi, 1993); J. Kalapati, Dr Radhakrishnan and Christianity: An Introduction to Hindu-Christian Apologetics (Delhi, 2002); S. Nirved-Ananda, Hinduism at a Glance (Calcutta, 1957); S. Radhakrishnan, The Hindu View of Life (London, 1960); B. Robinson, Christians Meeting Hindus: An Analysis and Theological Critique of Hindu-Christian Encounter in India (Oxford, 2004); D. S. Sarma, Hinduism Through the Ages (Bombay, 1967); H. E. W. Slade, Schools of Oriental Meditation (London, 1973); H. Smith, The Religions of Man (New York, 1957); R. Tagore, The Religion of Man (London, 1966); T. C. Tennent, Christianity at the Religious Roundtable: Evangelicalism in Conversation with Hinduism, Buddhism and Islam (Grand Rapids, 2002).

P. M. KRISHNA

HIPPOLYTUS (c. 170–c. 236)

Hippolytus came to Rome from the Eastern Mediterranean, perhaps Egypt, and was the last major ecclesiastical writer in Greek at Rome. A presbyter and then counter-bishop in the church at Rome, he was exiled (c. 235) under Emperor Maximin to Sardinia, where he died.

The facts of his life are obscure, and the authorship of some works attributed to him is disputed. His major work, Refutation of All Heresies (Philosophumena), attempts to trace the origin of *Gnostic systems and other erroneous teachings to Greek philosophies. He was indebted to *Irenaeus for much of his information on heresies (as he was for much of his theology), but he had access to other sources. His Commentary on Daniel is the earliest surviving orthodox commentary; it placed the return of Christ at 500 years after his birth and so sought to quiet anxiety about the end. Similar eschatological concerns are found in On Christ and Antichrist. The Apostolic Tradition is important for liturgical practices and theology, especially with reference to baptism, Eucharist, ordination and the love feast. Recovery of its text is difficult because it survives mainly in later (expanded) versions. Against Noetus opposes the modalism (see *Monarchianism) of Noetus of Smyrna, active at the end of the second century.

Hippolytus led his followers into *schism shortly after Callistus was elected Bishop of Rome in 217. The two men were personal rivals: Hippolytus was educated and came from cultured circles; Callistus was a former slave whose practical abilities had made him a leading deacon. The two men clashed on church discipline: which sinners could be reconciled to the church and on what terms, and what would be the church's attitude in fellowship on social and moral questions. Callistus favoured taking a forgiving and moderate approach, willing to reconcile those guilty of sexual sins and to recognize marriages not sanctioned by Roman law. Since the church is a saving society, it should be inclusive in membership. Hippolytus favoured keeping serious sinners under discipline until their deathbed, leaving forgiveness in the hands of God. He wanted a church of the pure. The two men also represented rival Christologies. Callistus emphasized the oneness of God, trying to walk a middle way between the modalism of Sabellius and what he called the ditheism of Hippolytus. The latter developed his doctrine of Christ from the Logos Christology of the apologists and from Irenaeus. The Logos, immanent in God, is eternal, but came forth to have a separate existence in connection with creation and separate personality in the incarnation, when he became fully Son of God.

Hippolytus and Pontianus, Callistus' second successor, were exiled at the same time. They apparently became reconciled, for the two parties reunited and commemorated both men as martyrs. A statue of Hippolytus has been found containing a list of his writings and tables which he prepared for determining the date of Easter.

Bibliography

A. Brent, Hippolytus and the Roman Church in the Third Century: Communities in Tension before the Emergence of a Monarch-Bishop (Leiden, 1995); J. A. Cerrato, Hippolytus between East and West: The Commentaries and the Provenance of the Corpus (Oxford, 2002); G. Dix, The Treatise on the Apostolic Tradition of St Hippolytus of Rome (London, 1968); J. H. I. von Döllinger, Hippolytus and Callistus (Edinburgh, 1876); D. G. Dunbar, 'The Delay of the Parousia in Hippolytus', VC 37, 1983, pp. 313–327; J. M. Hanssens, 'La Liturgie d'Hippolyte', Orientalia Christiana Analecta 155 (Rome, 1965); J. B. Lightfoot, The Apostolic Fathers, part 1, vol. 2 (London, 1890); P. Nautin, Hippolyte et Josipe: Contribution à l'histoire de la littérature chrétienne du troisième siècle (Paris, 1947); D. L. Powell, 'The Schism of Hippolytus', SP 12, 1975, pp. 449–456; J. E. Stam, 'Charismatic Theology in the "Apostolic Tradition" of Hippolytus', in G. F. Hawthorne (ed.), Current Issues in Biblical and Patristic Interpretation (Grand Rapids, 1975); C. Wordsworth, St Hippolytus and the Church of Rome (London, 1880).

E. FERGUSON

HISTORICAL JESUS, QUEST FOR

This phrase achieved currency as the title of the English translation of Albert Schweitzer's famous survey of attempts to rewrite the life of Jesus (originally published in German under the title Von Reimarus zu Wrede – 'From Reimarus to Wrede'). In this work, Schweitzer summarized the main 'lives of Jesus' that were written between the end of the eighteenth century and the beginning of the twentieth. Such works reflected the impact of Enlightenment rationalism on NT research: scepticism towards the miraculous, combined with reflection upon the discrepancies between the Gospel accounts (the 'Synoptic Problem'), resulted in a generally low estimation of the value of the canonical Gospels as historical accounts. The 'lives of Jesus' sought to reconstruct the reality behind the texts of the Gospels, assuming that the 'real' Jesus was an ordinary person around whose memory legends had developed and a 'supernatural nimbus' had grown. In fact, Schweitzer saw the scholars behind these lives as projecting their own values onto the figure of Jesus, memorably likened by George Tyrrell to staring down a deep well and seeing their own faces reflected. A disturbing aspect of this, now a matter of sensitivity in biblical studies, was the extent to which the scholarly reconstructions were based on a belief that the Judaism of Jesus' day was ossified and lifeless and that Jesus came to liberate those who would follow him from its darkness.

The last figure discussed by Schweitzer was William Wrede (1859–1906), who argued that the Gospels were never intended to be historical works, but were theologically motivated and coloured throughout. This made it doubtful whether much reliable information about Jesus could be extracted from them. Such a position was reinforced by such scholars as Rudolph Bultmann, who used form-criticism to identify secondary additions to the tradition and concluded that the actual historical Jesus is virtually inaccessible to the historian: all that we possess of historical worth is a handful of his sayings. Bultmann himself was, in any case, much more concerned with the development of the kerygma*, the Christian faith that was projected on to Jesus through the construction of myths*. For him, the secondary additions to the Jesus tradition were just as valid as objects of study as the historical Jesus. To appreciate the significance of this, it is important to locate Bultmann within the context of the German theological movements of the early twentieth century, particularly with regard to their concept of religion*. Subsequently, however, many have simplistically taken his project of ‘demythologization*’ as foundational to any historically defensible study of the life of Jesus.

Ernst Käsemann*, one of Bultmann’s former students, believed that his teacher had been too extreme in his assessment of the historical worth of the Gospels. Using the ‘criterion of dissimilarity’, whereby sayings that fit neither within ancient Judaism or early Christianity are deemed plausibly to be the authentic teaching of Jesus, Käsemann sought to retrieve genuine sayings of Jesus. This sparked what James M. Robinson (b. 1924) came to label ‘A New Quest of the Historical Jesus’ (in more recent times, this has come to be referred to as the ‘Second Quest’, for reasons explained below). In fact, Robinson’s label is slightly misleading; outside of the circle of scholars affected by Bultmann’s thought, there had always been scholars who believed, on sound historical grounds, that the Gospels contained reliable information – and rightly so, despite the sweeping indictment of their method by Robinson. Within Germany we should mention Joachim Jeremias (1900–79) and at least spare a thought for K. Bornhäuser (1868–1947), Bultmann’s contemporary at Marburg. Outside Germany there was the great British trio of C. H. Dodd*, T. W. Manson (1893–1958) and Vincent Taylor (1887–1968), among others. Despite such misgivings, the label ‘New/Second Quest’ has endured, probably in part due to the fact that in the early 1980s, N. T. Wright* coined the phrase ‘The Third Quest for the Historical Jesus’ to denote the new stage of Jesus research that he saw reflected in the work of Ben Meyer, among others. It has now become more or less standard to use this label to denote the current corpus of historical Jesus research.

Again, however, the label may be misleading: it is difficult to see much unity in this corpus of the kind that might allow us to see it as a movement. It is extensive and diverse, reflecting a broad range of opinion on the methods that ought to be used in handling our sources and of the picture of Jesus that can be reconstructed from them. Some contributions, such as those made by the Jesus Seminar collective (which famously voted on the authenticity of Jesus’ sayings using coloured balls) are scarcely different from those made by the Second Quest scholars, being largely sceptical of the authenticity of the contents of the Gospels and for the most part focusing on Jesus’ sayings, rather than narratives about his actions. Others, however, such as N. T. Wright, have been strikingly conservative, arguing that the Gospels are, in fact, largely reliable accounts and that our picture of Jesus must be reconstructed from his actions as much as from his teachings. Even the common view that the Third Quest has restored to pre-eminence the Jewishness of Jesus needs to be qualified as being too simple an assessment: scholars such as John Dominic Crossan (b. 1934) and Burton Mack have emphasized Hellenistic influence within Galilee and presented Jesus as being rather like the Greco-Roman Cynic philosophers.

Nevertheless, there are some characteristics of the Third Quest that set it apart from its predecessors. Most obviously, the social location of Jesus is a prominent concern; in this respect, the Third Quest reflects the burgeoning interest in the social sciences within biblical studies in recent years. It also, however, reflects the fact that a much more complex methodology is employed in research into the historical Jesus. It is no longer the case that discrete criteria are applied to the Gospel sources in order to distinguish the authentic from the secondary: now the criterion of dissimilarity is balanced by the criterion of plausibility (whether a saying or story of Jesus can be regarded as plausible in the context of first-century Galilee) and others. Another distinctive feature of the Third Quest is the willingness of many of its contributors to question the hegemony of Enlightenment rationalism, often building upon the philosophical explorations of postmodernity*. While many scholars continue to regard the supernatural as either myth or misunderstanding, others are unwilling to dismiss it so easily. As a consequence, the Third Quest has seen at least some constructive theological contribution from biblical scholars, notably N. T. Wright, who has written on Christological themes and on concepts of justification. Most recently, Pope Benedict XVI (see *Ratzinger, Joseph) has engaged with the Third Quest, dialoguing with its findings as he presents his own more theological understanding of Jesus of Nazareth.

Bibliography

B. Chilton and C. A. Evans, Studying the Historical Jesus: Evaluations of the State of Current Research (Leiden and New York, 1994); I. H. Marshall, I Believe in the Historical Jesus (London, 1977); J. Ratzinger, Jesus of Nazareth (Milan, 2007); B. Witherington III, The Jesus Quest: The Third Search for the Jew of Nazareth (Downers Grove, 1997); N. T. Wright, The New Testament and the People of God (London, 1992); idem, Jesus and the Victory of God (London, 1996); idem, The Resurrection of the Son of God (London: 2003).

G. MACASKILL

HISTORICAL THEOLOGY

Since Christian *theology always stands in a tradition in which theologians refer to those who went before them, it has always had a historical dimension. Even the earliest bishops and teachers refer to the apostolic writings of the NT. But it was only with the development of the historical-critical method in the nineteenth century that historical theology developed as a distinct discipline. Before then writers in many fields tended to think of the past as very similar to their present and so often tended to read their own ideas and categories back into previous generations. The new historical consciousness, an awareness that the past was often subtly different from the present, stimulated to some degree by the Romantic movement, led to the development of 'scientific history' in which primary documents from the past were examined critically to establish 'what really happened'. This new ideal of 'scientific objectivity' to establish 'objective facts' separate from interpretation also affected the study of the history of Christian theology.

One key figure, John Henry *Newman, undertook the study of *Patristics, continuing an Anglican tradition of appealing to the Fathers to argue (against Rome) that the Anglican tradition was true to the ancient Catholic Church. But his seminal idea in the Essay on the Development of Christian Doctrine (London, 1845), published in the year that he became a Roman Catholic, was to bear fruit in eventual acceptance by Protestants and Roman Catholics that change in doctrine was not necessarily a departure from the faith, but was, at least in the central tradition of Christian theology, a drawing out of previously unseen implications. This challenged the claim of the Roman Catholic Church to be always the same (semper eadem), and opened the way to the later ressourcement movement ('back to the sources') which prepared the way for the Second *Vatican Council.

But whereas Newman put historical theology at the service of Christian orthodoxy, Adolf von *Harnack, who was to emerge as a spokesman of *Ritschlian *liberalism, believed that objective historical study demonstrated that Christian orthodoxy had departed from the teachings of Jesus. The doctrines of incarnation, Trinity and the atonement were a distortion of his simple message by Greek metaphysics. Harnack's multi-volume Dogmengeschichte (1886–90; ET, History of Dogma, 1894–99) set new standards of scholarly thoroughness, but despite that, his 'scientific' method did not guarantee the vaunted 'objectivity'. James Orr's History of Dogma (1901) deliberately countered Harnack's interpretation, arguing (like Newman) that the historical development was the drawing out of the implications of the Christian message, and his book marked the acceptance of Newman's thesis by evangelicals. Numerous studies since then have generally borne out the Newman-Orr thesis.

The striving for objectivity has had considerable success. One outstanding instance of this is the way in which Roman Catholic scholarship which in the past treated Luther with vituperation has come to a more balanced and positive assessment of his place in the *development of doctrine. Numerous outstanding and definitive works have appeared, including specialist studies of the Fathers such as J. N. D. Kelly's Early Christian Doctrines (London, 1977) or R. P. C. Hanson's The Search for the Christian Doctrine of God (Edinburgh, 1988) and comprehensive surveys such as Jaroslav Pelikan, The Emergence of the Catholic Tradition (5 vols., Chicago, 1971–89), or Justo González, A History of Christian Thought (3 vols., Nashville, 1970–75). However, historical research no longer pretends that it can attain absolute objectivity by completely separating 'objective facts' from interpretation.

The question also remains whether historical theology is only a species of *history employing the historical-critical method, or whether it should not also still play its more ancient role within the methodology of Christian theology. The concession that absolute objectivity is a myth raises the question of what presuppositions are acceptable. Theologians may also ask whether the insistence that theologians of the past should be seen only within the context of their own time and *culture does not preclude consideration of the truth of their claims about the God who is not a creature of time or culture. Theologians might well claim that when the historical-critical method rules, the result is actually theological history, a branch of the history of ideas, and that true historical theology must rather follow a theological methodology. Theologians such as, for example, John *Zizioulas (Being as Communion, London, 1985) or T. F. *Torrance (The Trinitarian Faith, Edinburgh, 1988), while still paying attention to historical fact and to primary documents, are less interested in the distinctive cultural setting of past theologians, and more interested in engaging them as conversation partners and guides in the task of Christian theology today. This would argue that to reduce historical theology to theological history is to *relativize theological claims. In contrast, however, it could be argued that such an approach raises questions about the methodology of theology itself and how far it is shaped, and should be shaped, by cultural, *contextual circumstances.

See also: DOGMA.

Bibliography

J. Pelikan, Historical Theology (New York and London, 1971).

T. A. NOBLE

HISTORY

History, in the sense of the historical process, is recognized by Christians as the sphere of earthly existence where God has dealings with humanity. Although the whole chain of world events, past, present and future, was rarely, if ever, described as 'history' before the late eighteenth century, discussion of its significance has formed part of theology down the ages. In the Bible there are ample materials for constructing an understanding of history, even if (as has been much debated) it contains little elaboration of a theology of history as such. In the OT God is presented as an agent in the historical process. Supremely in the exodus from Egypt, but also in many other events, God displays his power (e.g. Ps. 136). By contrast with the nature deities of surrounding nations, *God *reveals himself primarily in history. In the NT God takes a decisive part in human affairs through Christ, his purposes begin to unfold through the church and it is promised that history will come to an end with Christ's return for *judgment. So the chief biblical convictions about history are that (1) God has been shaping the overall course of the historical process from the beginning in *creation; (2) he intervenes in particular events, usually in judgment or mercy; and (3) he will bring his plans to a triumphant conclusion in the last things. By contrast with the cyclical view of history, widespread in ancient and oriental civilization, that events regularly recur on the seasonal pattern of nature, Christians have therefore held a linear view of history as a process moving towards a climax predetermined by God. His control they have described as *providence; the future climax is the ground for their *hope.

Different Christian estimates of the future have frequently been based on beliefs about the millennium. In particular, if the bliss of the *millennium was to be expected before the end of history, hope could be intensified into an ebullient optimism. By the fourth century, such millenarianism was fading before an 'imperial theology' holding that the Roman Empire was earning God's favour by adopting the Christian faith. Voiced most eloquently by *Eusebius, the first great historian of the church, the imperial theology, together with millenarianism, was sharply challenged by *Augustine. In The City of God he propounded a magisterial theology of history according to which the welfare of the community of believers in every age does not depend on temporal power and the millennium is identified with the present history of the church. Augustine's periodization of time into seven epochs was to haunt the medieval Christian imagination. It was not until the rise of *Joachimism in the thirteenth century that Augustine's framework was significantly modified. The teaching of Joachim that history is approaching a new age of the Spirit freed from ecclesiastical forms was to inspire a range of groups including many associated with the *Radical Reformation. Nevertheless, Augustine remained the main influence over the classical Reformers at the same time as cyclical motifs drawn from ancient literature were re-injected into Christian thought by the Renaissance. The last *Augustinian theology of history, the Discourse on Universal History (1681) by Bishop J. B. Bossuet (1627–1704), was to be ridiculed for its parochialism by *Voltaire. The *Enlightenment generated its own view of history, a *secularization of the Christian understanding, in the idea of *progress. Philosophies of history, however, were most in vogue in the *Romantic era, when the scheme of *Hegel was but the most elaborate. From the same soil sprang the German tradition of historicism, according to which each society produces its own distinctive values in the course of its history. The tradition could incline, as it did in the hands of F. C. Baur of the *Tübingen School, to discount the possibility of *miracle in history. It eventually led, in the thought of *Troeltsch, to the belief that, without God, all values are relative.

With Troeltsch we enter the lively twentieth-century debates on the relation of faith to history. Perhaps the chief stimulus was the *existentialist claim of *Bultmann that history is irrelevant to faith, a claim to which the new phase of the *quest for the historical Jesus was a response. Another source has been interest in Hegel, the chief influence over both the contention of *Pannenberg that all history is revelatory and the critique of traditional Catholicism in Gustavo *Gutiérrez and some other exponents of *liberation theology. Biblical studies, specially in Gerhard von Rad (1901–71) and Oscar Cullmann, have drawn attention to the centrality of ‘*salvation-history’. And *Moltmann has argued that *eschatology is the key to understanding history as well as theology. Meanwhile, others have tried to state a Christian understanding of history for our time. Nicolas Berdyaev from an Eastern Orthodox standpoint (see *Russian Orthodox theology), Herman *Dooyeweerd from a Dutch Reformed standpoint and Eric Voegelin (1901–85) from a Lutheran standpoint have wrestled with the issue. Most influential, however, have been Reinhold *Niebuhr, with his rejection of the idea of progress, and Sir Herbert Butterfield (1900–79), a Methodist historian whose Christianity and History (1949) discerns God at work in the past. Looming behind these studies is the central question for any Christian philosophy of history, the problem of *suffering, which is perhaps treated most tellingly by P. T. *Forsyth in his wartime work, The Justification of God (1916).

Bibliography

D. W. Bebbington, Patterns in History (Leicester, 1979); D. P. Fuller, Easter Faith and History (London, 1968); V. A. Harvey, The Historian and the Believer (London, 1967); C. T. McIntire (ed.), God, History and Historians: Modern Christian Views of History (New York, 1977); K. Popper, The Poverty of Historicism (London and New York, 1993).

D. W. BEBBINGTON

HISTORY-OF-RELIGIONS SCHOOL

History-of-Religions School is the English translation of the German phrase, Religionsgeschichtliche Schule. It designates a group of scholars who in the late nineteenth and early twentieth century attempted to understand the religious developments of the OT, the NT and the early church by relating them to the context of other religious movements. Inspired by *positivist principles, these scholars used historical and philological approaches to explain the origin of biblical religion.

The Old Testament

Hermann Gunkel's Schöpfung und Chaos in Urzeit und Endzeit (Creation and Chaos at the Beginning and End of Time, Göttingen, 1895) derived much of the OT's themes of creation and chaos from Babylonian mythology. As opposed to Julius Wellhausen (1844–1918), Gunkel (1862–1932) placed this derivation not in the exilic period but in the second millennium BC. Hugo Gressmann (1877–1927) in Der Ursprung der israelitisch-jüdischen Eschatologie (The Origin of Israelite-Jewish Eschatology, Göttingen, 1905) attempted to demonstrate the antiquity of the mythological themes found in the prophets. Rudolf Kittel's (1853–1929) Geschichte des Volkes Israel (History of the People of Israel, rev. edn, Gotha, 1912) maintained that Moses had taught not a monotheism but an 'ethical monolatry'.

The New Testament

Wilhelm Heitmüller (1869–1926) argued in 1903 that Paul's understanding of the *Eucharist was not derived from the original teachings of Jesus but from the Hellenistic world. Wilhelm Bousset (1865–1920) examined the early church as a Hellenistic-Jewish phenomenon. His greatest work, Kyrios Christos (1913; ET 1970), set forth the thesis that it was the Gentile Christians in the context of their worship who first addressed Christ as Kyrios ('Lord') in place of the title 'the Son of Man', which derived from Jewish eschatology. Some of the Christians who had been members of the mystery cults thus reinterpreted Christ as their new 'mystery god'.

In his work, Hauptprobleme der Gnosis (The Main Problems of Gnosticism, 1907), Bousset explained *Gnostic teachings as the result of a transformation of older oriental Hellenistic philosophy. He held it self-evident that Gnosticism existed prior to Christianity.

Richard Reitzenstein (1861–1931) was a philologist who studied the role of mysticism in Hellenism. His Poimandres (1904; repr. Darmstadt, 1966) suggested that the Hermetic tractate Poimandres was the source of Johannine thought. He also used late Mandaean (see *Gnosticism) texts to reconstruct the background of Christian baptism in Die Vorgeschichte der christlichen Taufe (The Pre-history of Christian Baptism, 1924; repr. Darmstadt, 1967).

In his most famous book, Die hellenistischen Mysterienreligionen (Hellenistic Mystery-Religions, Stuttgart, 1910; ET 1978), Reitzenstein argued that Paul was profoundly influenced by Hellenistic religious traditions such as the mystery religions and Gnosticism. In fact, he went so far as to call Paul the greatest of all the Gnostics.

In his work, Das iranische Erlösungsmysterium (Iranian Mystery Religion, 1921), Reitzenstein used recently discovered documents from Turkestan to recover the alleged Iranian roots of a pre-Christian Gnosticism – without realizing at the time that these were Manichaean texts. Later he maintained that Manichaeism must have preserved some very ancient Iranian Gnostic traditions.

Appraisal

The views of such scholars as Reitzenstein and Bousset had a great impact upon Rudolf *Bultmann, one of the leading NT scholars of the twentieth century. Despite the enormous impact of the writings of Bousset and Reitzenstein in Europe, their writings were not translated into English in their lifetimes.

The use by the history-of-religions scholars of late and unrelated sources to explain Paul's religion or to reconstruct a hypothetical pre-Christian Gnosticism has been severely criticized. In Earle Ellis's trenchant phrase, 'There is a tendency to convert parallels into influences and influences into sources' (Paul and His Recent Interpreters, Grand Rapids, 1961, p. 29).

Bibliography

W. Bousset, Kyrios Christos (ET, Nashville, 1970); H. F. Hahn, The Old Testament in Modern Research (rev. edn, Philadelphia, 1966), ch. III, 'The Religio-Historical School and the Old Testament'; R. Reitzenstein, Hellenistic Mystery-Religions (ET, Pittsburgh, 1978); E. M. Yamauchi, Pre-Christian Gnosticism (Grand Rapids, 2nd 1983).

E. M. YAMAUCHI

HODGE, CHARLES (1797–1878)

Charles Hodge was the best-known proponent of the conservative Calvinistic theology that came from the Presbyterian seminary in *Princeton, New Jersey, from its founding in 1812 to its reorganization in 1929. Hodge arrived from his native Philadelphia in 1812 to study at Princeton College, where he was converted during a period of revival. He then entered the seminary and soon became a devoted student and close friend of Archibald Alexander (1772–1851), the professor of theology. Hodge became professor of oriental and biblical literature at Princeton in 1822; in 1840 he was transferred to the chair of exegetical and didactic theology, a position which was augmented by the professorship of polemic theology at Alexander's death in 1851.

Well before then, however, Hodge had proven his mettle as a forceful voice for conservative *Reformed theology against a wide variety of alternatives. Especially in the pages of the Princeton Review, which he edited for nearly fifty years, Hodge was a lion in controversy. His adversaries ranged across the theological spectrum – from *Schleiermacher and other Romantic theologians of inward subjectivity, through representatives of the Oxford Movement (see *Anglo-Catholic theology) and nineteenth-century conservative Roman Catholicism, to Americans such as Charles G. *Finney, Horace *Bushnell, John W. Nevin (1803–86) and Philip Schaff (1819–93) of *Mercersburg, and Nathaniel W. Taylor (1786–1858) and Edwards Amasa Park (1808–1900) from *New England. Hodge's point of view was consistent. He contended for sixteenth- and seventeenth-century understandings of Calvinism. He proclaimed the dangers of unchecked religious experience, whether in the form of sophisticated European *Romanticism or frontier American revivalism. He championed scientific method, understood in terms of Francis Bacon's *empiricism, as the proper way to organize the *infallible teachings of Scripture. But what most troubled him were positions which undercut high Calvinistic convictions about divine sovereignty in salvation or which valued too highly the moral capacities of unregenerate human nature. Hodge could sometimes appear overly rationalistic in these polemics, and he occasionally misread his opponents to their disadvantage; but by and large, he conducted his polemics on a very high plane. After Hodge's death, the Lutheran theologian C. P. Krauth said that 'next to having Hodge on one's side is the pleasure of having him as an antagonist' (A. A. Hodge, Life of Charles Hodge, p. 616).

Although Hodge exerted his greatest efforts in the defence of Calvinism, his interests ranged very widely. He was the author of major commentaries on Romans, Ephesians and 1 and 2 Corinthians. He wrote frequently on Presbyterian ecclesiastical affairs. He penned numerous expositions of Christian teaching for laymen, of which The Way of Life (1841) was perhaps the most notable in its limpid prose and affective power. He wrote a not inconsiderable objection to Darwin's apparent assault on the idea of design (What Is Darwinism?, 1874). He often commented cogently on public affairs, taking generally conservative positions on social issues. His lifetime's classroom instruction was summed up when he published his Systematic Theology in 1872, a work which like many of his other writings remains in print and in use to this day.

It has been noted that Hodge's Systematic Theology and some of his polemical essays play down the role of the Holy Spirit and the noncognitive dimensions of the faith. In other writings, however, like his commentaries and works for the laity, these aspects of Christian experience receive much fuller consideration. Hodge probably did not integrate the various aspects of his thought as carefully as one could wish. But his work remains the most effective nineteenth-century American presentation of Calvinism. It is wide-ranging in its concerns, spiritually sensitive in its insights, and thought-provoking in its defence of Reformed distinctives.

Bibliography

Works: Essays and Reviews: Selections from the Princeton Review (New York, 1857); Systematic Theology, 3 vols. (New York, 1872–3).

Studies: W. S. Barker, 'The Social Views of Charles Hodge (1797–1878): A Study in 19th-century Calvinism and Conservatism', Presbyterian. Covenant Seminary Review 1, 1975, pp. 1–22; P. Gutjahr, Charles Hodge: Guardian of American Orthodoxy (Oxford, 2011); P. A. Hicks, The Philosophy of Charles Hodge (Lewiston, NY, 1997); A. A. Hodge, The Life of Charles Hodge (New York, 1880); J. O. Nelson, 'Charles Hodge (1797–1878): Nestor of Orthodoxy', in Willard Thorp (ed.), The Lives of Eighteen from Princeton (Princeton, 1946); J. W. Stewart and J. H. Moorhead (eds.), Charles Hodge Revisited: A Critical Appraisal of His Life and Work (Grand Rapids, 2002).

M. A. NOLL

HODGSON, L., see ANGLO-CATHOLIC THEOLOGY

HOLINESS, see GOD; HOLINESS MOVEMENT; SANCTIFICATION

HOLINESS MOVEMENTS

Holiness movements in modern Protestantism generally trace back to John *Wesley's teaching that Christians could have an undivided desire to serve God and a 'perfect love' for God that excluded sin. For Wesley, this doctrine of 'Christian perfection' was the 'grand depositum' given to 'the people called Methodists'. *Sanctification was the developing work of God from *regeneration to 'entire sanctification' and beyond. But he rejected the term 'sinless perfection' as he recognized continued human weakness and the need for confession of faults and failings (see *Perfection, perfectionism).

In the nineteenth century Wesley's doctrine was refashioned, particularly in America. Phoebe *Palmer, the wife of a New York doctor, led the 'Tuesday meetings for the promotion of holiness' in her home, and went with her husband on preaching tours in Britain and America. She advocated what she called a 'shorter way' to holiness by total consecration, 'laying all on the altar', signified by kneeling at the communion rail. Two prominent Congregationalists, Charles G. *Finney (the most prominent revivalist of the 'second awakening') and Asa *Mahan, both of Oberlin College, Ohio, advocated the view that the day of Pentecost was the 'entire sanctification' of the apostles. This gave them a biblical proof text for the 'second blessing', a 'crisis' in the Christian life. They therefore equated Wesley's 'entire sanctification' with the *Pentecostal 'baptism of the Holy Ghost' (see *Baptism in the Spirit).

By the 1870s the holiness movement had become very influential across American *Methodism. It included two breakaway denominations, the Wesleyan Methodist Church of 1843 and the Free Methodist Church of 1860. The National Camp Meeting Association for the Promotion of Holiness was established at Vineland, New Jersey, in 1867. Of the many smaller churches begun independently, the Pilgrim Holiness Church (1897, uniting with the Wesleyan Methodists in 1968 to form the Wesleyan Church) and the Church of the Nazarene (1908) became the largest. But the holiness tradition also remained within mainstream Methodism, leading to the foundation of Asbury Theological Seminary in 1923.

The holiness movement which began in Methodism was also influential across other American denominations. Congregationalists such as T. C. Upham and R. A. Torrey (D. L. Moody's successor), Presbyterians such as W. E. Boardman (author of The Higher Christian Life, 1959), Baptists such as A. B. Earle, as well as Quakers, Mennonites and Episcopalians, all belonged to the '*higher life' movement. Many of them followed Finney's emphasis on the power for service brought by the 'baptism of the Holy Ghost' rather than the Wesleyan emphasis on sanctification and purity of heart.

In Britain (and then around the world), the *Salvation Army emerged as the largest denomination in the Wesleyan holiness tradition. William and Catherine Booth were deeply influenced by Phoebe Palmer (not least in her strong advocacy of women preachers). In British Methodism, those committed to Wesley's doctrine launched the Methodist Southport Convention in 1885, and Cliff College in 1903. Other independent leaders of holiness missions were Richard Reader Harris, QC, who founded the Pentecostal League of Prayer, Francis Crossley of Star Hall, Manchester, Paget Wilkes of the Japan Evangelistic Band, and Oswald Chambers, author of the popular devotional book, My Utmost for His Highest.

A further variant of holiness spirituality began with a conference in 1874, when about one hundred people met at Broadlands, in Hampshire, the home of William and Georgina Cowper-Temple. The main speakers, Robert Pearsall Smith and his wife, Hannah Whitall Smith (author of The Christian's Secret of a Happy Life, 1875), were Quaker manufacturers from New Jersey who testified to receiving 'the blessing' of victory over sin at a Methodist camp meeting.

Much larger meetings in 1874 and 1875 led to the establishment in 1875 of the annual interdenominational Keswick Convention. Evan Hopkins, one of the early Anglican Keswick leaders, outlined three views of sanctification within *evangelicalism: the Calvinist tradition that holiness was achieved by earnest effort (strongly advocated in this period by Bishop J. C. Ryle), the Wesleyan tradition of the 'clean heart', and the Keswick position of the perpetual 'counteraction' of the sinful nature through 'full surrender'. Keswick teaching gradually found widespread acceptance among British evangelicals in the first half of the twentieth century. The emphasis on consecration, as in the hymns of Francis Ridley Havergal, strongly influenced the Student Volunteer Movement in which hundreds offered themselves for missionary service.

Leading Keswick speakers, who helped to spread the Convention's message of holiness, included Bishop Handley Moule of Durham (previously a Cambridge professor), Andrew *Murray of South Africa, and the Baptist minister Graham Scroggie (awarded a DD by Edinburgh). The Keswick approach has often been regarded as inward-looking, but the speaker who united inner-directed piety and outward-directed social concern was F. B. Meyer, a Baptist minister who became Keswick's leading international speaker. He stressed the power of the Spirit for holiness. In 1955, Keswick's devotional and practical teaching was strongly challenged from the *Reformed perspective in an article by James I. *Packer.

The traditional Keswick emphasis was maintained by speakers such as George Duncan, minister of St George's Tron, Glasgow, but gradually Keswick embraced a more general evangelical spirituality. Both the Wesleyan and Keswick traditions rejected the focus on the *gifts of the Spirit which characterized the new Pentecostal movement after 1900.

In recent years there has been some revival of interest in Wesleyan holiness and in the Keswick tradition, in part because of extensive historical work being done on both evangelicalism and *spirituality. In 2000, in Transforming Keswick, Charles Price described Keswick teaching as Bible-based, Christ-centred, Holy Spirit-enabled, practical, and mission orientated. The Wesleyan holiness denominations continue to grow around the world and through the scholarly rediscovery of John Wesley are recovering his more nuanced understanding of sanctification.

Bibliography

S. Barabas, So Great Salvation: The History and Message of the Keswick Convention (London, 1952); D. W. Bebbington, Holiness in Nineteenth-Century England (Carlisle, 2000); D. Bundy, The Global Impact of the Wesleyan Traditions and Their Related Movements (Portland, 2002); M. E. Dieter, The Holiness Revival of the Nineteenth Century (Metuchen, 1980); C. E. Jones, Perfectionist Persuasion (Lanham, 1974); W. C. Kostlevy, Historical Dictionary of the Holiness Movement (Portland, 2001); C. Price and I. M. Randall, Transforming Keswick (Carlisle, 2000); I. M. Randall, Evangelical Experiences (Carlisle, 1999).

I. M. RANDALL

HOLL, KARL (1866–1926)

Karl Holl was a distinguished German church historian, who was professor of church history at Tübingen (1901–6) and Berlin (1906–26). His Habilitationschrift was on Greek monasticism (1896), followed by works on *John of Damascus (1897), and Amphilochius of Iconium (c. 340–95) in 1904. He later assumed the editorship of the 'Berlin Corpus' of the Greek Fathers (Griechische Christliche Schriftsteller), and in this series published his renowned three-volume edition of Epiphanius (c. 315–403) (1915–33). During these years of intensive research on the Greek Fathers he also worked on *Luther, as well as *Calvin and the Enthusiasts (see *Reformation, Radical). These years culminated in his epoch-making Gesammelte Aufsätze (Collected Essays, vol. 1, 1921, ⁷1948; vols. 2–3, 1928, ²1932). It was his immense knowledge of patristics which, reinforced with his unique grasp of Luther, gave both originality and independence to his judgments as well as an interest in *systematic theology. He was no party man, for his interests were wide, covering Russian as well as English church history; this breadth of outlook gave him a balanced and informed mind. He reacted against certain emphases of Lutheran orthodoxy, notably the forensic view of *justification (as formulated by *Melancthon rather than Luther). More than any other single person it was he who was responsible for the Luther renaissance of the 1920s.

His contribution lies first in that he made the sole basis of his thought the exact historical and philological study of sources. Secondly, he related Luther to the whole spiritual and historical development of the West, thereby making Luther of intense contemporary significance. Thirdly, he showed Luther's to be a theocentric religion based on man's relation to God, a theology of *conscience.

Bibliography

W. Bodenstein, Die Theologie Karl Holls (Berlin, 1968); A. Jülicher and E. Wolf, RGG III, cols. 431–433; W. Pauck, introd. to ET of Holl's The Cultural Significance of the Reformation (New York, 1959); J. M. Stayer, Martin Luther, German Saviour: German Evangelical Theological Factions and the Interpretation of Luther, 1917–1933 (Montreal, 2000); J. Wallmann, TRE XV, pp. 514–518.

J. ATKINSON

HOLOCAUST

The genocide of around 6 million Jews in Europe through systematic/industrialized murder by the Nazis in the years 1941–45 is commonly known as 'Holocaust'. Some interpretations would include the beginning of the Second World War in 1939, or the onset of state persecution of Jews with the Nazi rise to power in Germany in 1933 in their definition of Holocaust. Derived from the Greek word in the LXX for a wholly burned offering (e.g. Lev.

6:23), and originally used figuratively of wholesale sacrifice, the term has been used since the late 1950s for this specific series of events. Some definitions also include 5 million non-Jews who were murdered by the Nazis between 1933 and 1945 across Nazi-occupied Europe. While the history of the term 'holocaust' suggests that prior to this time it had been commonly used to describe catastrophes of both human and natural origin, the sacrificial connotations of the term as well as its undifferentiated use for different groups of victims of the Nazis have been criticized. In order to clarify the distinctive aim (total annihilation) of the organized racist persecution of Jews by Nazi Germany, many prefer the Hebrew term Shoah, meaning complete destruction. Equally biblical in origin (e.g. Job 30:14; Ps. 35:8; Isa. 6:11) the term does not refer to sacrificial contexts. In modern Hebrew, shoah is also used to refer to other disasters caused by humans or nature. In some religious Jewish circles, the Yiddish/Hebrew term Hurban is preferred, as it stresses the continuity of the Nazi genocide with other events in Jewish history such as the destruction of the First and Second Temples, the Crusades, etc.

Christians have responded to the Holocaust with increased theological reflection on the relationship of Christians to Jews, the church to the synagogue. This includes reflection on Christian responsibility for anti-Semitism and Christian complicity in Nazi policies and their application, as well as a rethinking of Christian aims to convert Jews to Christianity. Johann Baptist Metz and Jürgen Moltmann are two theologians whose theologies are motivated in part by reflection on the Holocaust and the consequences of this genocide for the future of Christianity and Christian-Jewish relations. Metz's political theology asks students of theology to beware of theologies that purport to be the same before and after the Holocaust. Moltmann's recasting of the major themes of systematic theology is influenced by his reading of Holocaust literature (notably Elie Wiesel's Night) and works by Jewish religious scholars such as Abraham Joshua Heschel. The works of Franklin Littell and Roy Eckardt as well as Paul van Buren focus explicitly on the Holocaust, arguing that because of Christian culpability for the development of racist anti-Semitism, reflection on this genocide should form the centre of Christian theology after 1945. There is general agreement among these theologians that the Holocaust marks such a break in human history that history can no longer be understood as an evolution from lower to higher forms of civilization.

Jews have responded to the Holocaust with systematic reflection as well as practical social restructuring and rebuilding. Theologically, both Jews and Christians raise the question, 'Where was God?' in the Holocaust. While Jewish theologians struggle with the question of whether God abandoned God's people, the covenant and the implications of the Holocaust for *theodicy, questions regarding the responsibility of humanity ('Where was "man"?') are often foregrounded. Jewish theological reflections on the Holocaust are rarely 'systematic' in the sense this term carries in Christian theology. Rather, they address a concrete historical situation and aim to derive insights from history as well as contemporary Jewish practice in order to establish possible interpretations of the Holocaust which would be helpful for Jewish life in the present. It is characteristic that the majority of Jewish theologians who make the Holocaust a central focus of their work are at home in Reform and Liberal Jewish movements, while for the most prolific Orthodox scholars of the twentieth century the Holocaust, though certainly central to their experience and interpretation of Jewish life, does not become a sustained theological trope. In addition, interpretations of the Holocaust in other areas, such as art, literary criticism, sociology and history, can equally be seen as ways in which Jews struggle with the legacy of the Holocaust. An increased movement towards memorialization is recognizable in Israel and many Western countries which, though sometimes motivated by Jewish concerns, has also captured the interests of wider society.

Most church statements relating to the Holocaust and Christian-Jewish relations are formulated in Western countries who share concerns associated with the Holocaust. Arguably, this is due to the fact that churches in Europe were historically affected by the Holocaust and its aftermath, and churches in North America share historical ties with European churches, often feeling the need to reflect on their own church politics during the Holocaust. With the exception of North America, churches outside of Europe have, in the majority, not come forward with declarations on the Holocaust and Christian-Jewish relations.

It should be noted that Christian theology that explicitly focuses on the Holocaust is the province of few, mostly liberal Christian scholars. A few evangelical theologians have recently also begun to engage in this field, often with an interest in the interpretation of the State of Israel for contemporary Christian views of Jews. Some Christian theologians reflecting on the Holocaust construct a dependence of Christianity on Jews, suggesting more or less strongly that after the Holocaust Christian worship and the future existence of the church depend on the continued existence of the Jewish people as Jews. These theologies also posit a close salvation-historical connection between Jews and Christians, arguing that without the continuity of God's covenant with Jews, the Christian connection with the God of Israel is severed.

As far as the wider Christian community is concerned, these positions do not enter the mainstream, hence are not part of theological controversies. Conservative Christians do not focus theological reflection on the Holocaust, and in the majority object to the theological and doctrinal demands of Christian Holocaust theologians, perceiving these as distortions of Christian doctrine.

See also: ISRAEL; JUDAISM AND CHRISTIANITY.

Bibliography

Z. Braitermann, (God) After Auschwitz: Tradition and Change in Post-Holocaust Jewish Thought (Princeton, 1998); P. M. van Buren, A Theology of the Jewish-Christian Reality, Parts I-III (San Francisco, 1981-8); J. S. Conway, 'The Changes in Recent Decades in the Churches' Doctrine and Practice Toward Judaism and the Jewish People', in Y. Gutman and A. Saf (eds.), Major Changes Within the Jewish People in the Wake of the Holocaust: Proceedings of the Ninth Yad Vashem International Historical Conference, Jerusalem, June 1993 (Jerusalem, 1996), pp. 589-612; D. Engel, The Holocaust: A History of the Third Reich and the Jews (Harlow, 2000); R. P. Ericksen and S. Heschel (eds.), Betrayal: German Churches and the Holocaust (Minneapolis, 1999); E. S. Fiorenza and D. Tracy (eds.), The Holocaust as Interruption, Concilium 175 (Edinburgh, 1984); S. R. Haynes, Prospects for Post-Holocaust Theology (Atlanta, 1991); S. L. Jacobs (ed.), Contemporary Christian Responses to the Holocaust, Studies in the Shoah V (Lanham, 1993); idem, Contemporary Jewish Responses to the Holocaust, Studies in the Shoah V (Lanham, 1993); S. T. Katz, Post-Holocaust Dialogues: Critical Studies in Modern Jewish Thought (New York and London, 1983); J.-B. Metz and J. Moltmann, Faith in the Future: Essays on Theology, Solidarity, and Modernity (Maryknoll, 1995); Secretariat for Ecumenical and Interreligious Affairs, and National Conference of Catholic Bishops (eds.), Catholics Remember the Holocaust (Washington DC, 1998).

K. H. HOLTSCHNEIDER

HOLY SPIRIT

A formulated doctrine of the Holy Spirit was a relatively late arrival on the Christian theological scene and has never been developed in as full and detailed a way as many other dogmatic themes. In the early centuries attention was concentrated on controversies about the *Trinity and the person of Christ rather than on the Spirit. As *Gregory of Nazianzus puts it in the fourth century, 'It was not right while the deity of the Father was not yet acknowledged plainly to proclaim the Son, nor when that of the Son was not yet received to burden us further . . . with the Holy Spirit' (Gregory of Nazianzus, Fifth Theological Oration on the Holy Spirit, para. XXXVI).

That quotation not only describes the order in which the doctrinal questions were historically addressed; it hints that to speak theologically of the Spirit has special difficulties that make it a 'burden'. More than that, it reflects the NT perspective summed up in the words of Jesus about the Spirit: 'He will not speak on his own' (John 16:13). There is a reticence about the Holy Spirit in that he constantly points us away from himself as he initiates us into knowledge of and relationship with the Father and the Son.

The Spirit and the *creed

Pneumatology, the technical term for the doctrine of the Holy Spirit, has three main concerns: (1) the relationship of the Spirit to the Father and the Son within the trinitarian life of *God; (2) the work of the Spirit in imparting knowledge of God and new life in Christ to the Christian community and individual believers within it; and (3) the relation of the Spirit to God's purposes of creation and re-creation in the world. This article will deal almost exclusively with the first two of these headings because they have been the central concerns of the mainline theological tradition; the third has remained marginal until our own day.

Concentration on the theology of the Holy Spirit emerged in the fourth century with *Athanasius' Letters to Serapion. This was followed by *Basil of Caesarea's important treatise, On the Holy Spirit (c. 350), which proved highly influential for all that was to follow. The first detailed dogmatic statement about the Spirit, along the lines laid down by Basil, is in the third article of the *Nicene Creed as it was revised at *Constantinople in 381, where the Spirit is confessed as 'the Lord, the giver of life, who with the Father and the Son is to be worshipped and glorified'.

Here the divinity of the Spirit is clearly affirmed, he has the same title of divine lordship as the Father and the Son and along with them is a proper object of worship. That implies that the Spirit is not an impersonal divine energy, nor simply a way of describing how the Father and the Son relate to us and act upon us, but is himself a source of personal action who, in his own special way, expresses in his relationships and actions the same sovereign love as the Father and the Son.

According to the basic NT witness, the distinctive work of the Spirit is to enable us to confess God as Abba, Father (Rom. 8:15) and Jesus as Kyrios, Lord (1 Cor. 12:3). According to John 16:14, it is the Spirit who brings to the Son the glory of being known and loved by the company of believers. All this requires that he should be recognized as one who shares the divine nature, but who interacts personally with the Father and the Son in the work of salvation. Later both Eastern and Western tradition followed Athanasius and Gregory Nazianzen in affirming the Spirit as well as the Son to be homoousios (of the same being) with the Father, so making the affirmation of his essential divinity secure.

In the creed of 381 the emphasis of the third article is on the Spirit's trinitarian relationships: his relationship to us both in creation and redemption is affirmed in the most general terms as the 'giver of life' and the one who has 'spoken through the prophets'. This is quite inadequate to the rich NT material on the work of the Spirit and cries out for fuller development.

A further inadequacy in *patristic teaching about the Spirit comes to light in the *Christology promulgated at *Chalcedon in 451, in which Christ is declared to be both fully God and fully man without reference to the Spirit as the agent of his incarnation, who comes upon him in his baptism and who, as he himself confesses at Nazareth (Luke 4) inspires and energizes his ministry. The neglected role of the Spirit in the constitution of the person and work of Christ has become a subject of keen theological debate in our own day.

Son and Spirit in East and West

In the following centuries the *Orthodox East and the *Catholic West increasingly diverged in the way that they developed their trinitarian theology, not least in the way that they understood the relationship between the Spirit and the Son. This came to a head in the so-called filioque dispute, in which the East insisted that the Spirit like the Son had his eternal origin only in the Father, while the West, under the influence of St *Augustine, insisted that the Spirit proceeded 'from the Father and the Son' (Lat. filioque). At first sight this looks like an ancient dispute without contemporary relevance, but on closer examination, we can see that it involves issues that are central to a proper understanding of the Christian gospel.

The Catholic West alleged that the position of the Orthodox East did not take adequate account of the dependence of the work of the Spirit upon the work of the Son and at least opened the door to a possibility of relating to the Spirit without at the same time relating to the Son. This could lead to a unfocused spirituality to which the person and work of Christ was not central or even to a pluralistic understanding of other religions as works of the Spirit even when they rejected Christian claims about Christ.

The East retorted that such fears were unfounded, because the confession that both Son and Spirit were homoousios with the Father, and so with each other, meant that any possibility of relating to the one without relating to the other was totally excluded.

Eastern theologians in turn alleged against the West that its filioque teaching subordinated the Spirit to the Son and was in danger of understanding the Spirit simply as the way in which the ascended Christ acted in and among his people. This could lead to a binitarian

(= two person) rather than a properly trinitarian (= three person) doctrine of God.

The East claimed that the scriptural data pointed not to a one-way dependence of the Spirit upon the Son, but to a mutual interdependence in which the incarnate Son was totally reliant upon the Spirit whom he received from the Father, while the Spirit was sent into the world through and as a result of the ministry and atoning work of the Son. As the first systematic theologian, *Irenaeus of Lyons, put it in the second century, the Son and the Spirit were the two hands of God who were sent from the Father and worked in total co-ordination to inaugurate, execute and complete his creative and saving purposes in the world.

The East-West dialogue on the relation of Son and Spirit, broken off by the schism between them, has been resumed in our own day with positive prospects and the suggestion that the legitimate claims made by both sides might be reconciled and satisfied if the disputed creedal phrase were amended to read 'who proceeds from the Father through the Son'. The point that is relevant to both evangelical and charismatic Christians in our own day is to insist that there can be no dealing with the Spirit that does not involve a dealing with the Son and no dealing with the Son that does not involve a dealing with the Spirit.

In the Catholic West the filioque clause was incorporated into the creeds and either accepted or defended by all the major shapers of the theological tradition from Augustine, through Anselm and Aquinas, Luther and Calvin to Karl Barth in our own day.

The Spirit in the Catholic West

The way that tradition developed gave substance to the Orthodox claim that it involved a downgrading of the Spirit and his work. In Augustine's trinitarianism the Father and Son were seen as the Lover and the Beloved, and the Spirit as the love that bound them together. Love, however, is a relationship between persons rather than itself a third person, so that such a model lends itself to the depersonalization of the Spirit.

It is not therefore surprising to find that when the West began, as it increasingly did, to reflect on God's interaction with us in the giving and receiving of salvation, it spoke not of an interpersonal transaction between the Spirit and the believer, but rather of an impersonal infusion of grace through the sacraments mediated or even controlled by the ordained priesthood. In such a context there was not much interest in the person and work of the Spirit.

The Reformation approach

The Reformation marked a new approach to pneumatology, notably in the theology of John *Calvin. Calvin saw the appropriation of the salvation which had been achieved once for all in Christ as the personal action of the Holy Spirit. What Christ did for us remained ineffective until the Spirit brought us to faith and joined us to Christ. This established the closest connection between the Holy Spirit and our justification and sanctification in Christ (see *Salvation).

For the *Reformation tradition with its emphasis on the authority of *Scripture (see doctrine of), the inspiration of the authors of Scripture by the Spirit was of central importance and has led to an ongoing debate about exactly how that inspiration is to be understood. Calvin taught that the Spirit was at work not only in the biblical writers but also in their readers. It was the 'internal witness of the Spirit' that persuaded us that the Bible was the written word of God and enabled us to believe its message. This teaching has been expanded as an integral part of Karl Barth's doctrine of *revelation where the Spirit not only opens the Scriptures to us, but through their witness enables us to believe in Jesus Christ as the Word of God incarnate for our salvation through whom we know the Father.

The neglected theme of the Christological dimension of the Spirit's part in the constitution of Christ's person was explored by the Puritan John *Owen in the seventeenth century, a subject developed by Edward *Irving in the nineteenth century. Irving's distinctive contribution has been more valued in our day than in his own but remains controversial.

*Pietism and the eighteenth-century evangelical revival led by Wesley and Whitefield brought a new emphasis on 'the new birth'. In *evangelical theology in general the Spirit was characteristically presented as the agent of our regeneration and sanctification and led to a keen debate between Calvinists and Arminians about how the divine initiative of the Spirit and the human response of faith were related to each other.

The rise of Pentecostalism

In the nineteenth century the *Holiness movement radically interpreted, or (some would say) distorted, John Wesley's teaching on sanctification with a new focus on Pentecost as evidence of a 'second blessing' beyond regeneration described as 'the *baptism in the Holy Spirit', which could be experienced by those who fulfilled the requisite conditions for its reception.

This gave rise to a variety of second-blessing theologies, some of which looked to the Spirit to confer complete cleansing from sin or *perfection, but others to a filling with the Spirit that empowered people for mission and service and bestowed on them some of the charismatic *gifts described in 1 Cor. 12. This latter teaching was the distinguishing mark of the *Pentecostal movement and, from the time of the revivals of the early twentieth century, the initial evidence of this Spirit-baptism was characteristically held to be the exercise of the gift of tongues.

In the mid-twentieth century this experience of renewal in the Spirit began to be sought and found in nearly all the mainline Christian denominations, Catholic and Protestant, and gave rise to much debate about the soundness of the theological presuppositions on which it was based, with various attempts to reinterpret what was happening in terms of more traditional Reformed, Catholic or Anglican doctrinal approaches.

Whatever their practical and theological excesses and shortcomings, the Pentecostal and *Charismatic Movements have been transforming both for individuals and churches and have helped us to reappropriate the NT emphasis on the Spirit not just as the giver of new birth and personal holiness, but the powerful driving force that motivates and equips Christians for participation in God's *mission in the world. Pentecostal Christianity has been a major force in the massive spread of the gospel in the third world.

The Spirit and the trinitarian revival

This new openness to the Spirit has been replicated in mainline theology. In the pneumatology that predominated in nineteenth-century Protestant liberalism the distinction between the immanent human spirit that is our possession and the transcendent Spirit who is God's gift in Christ became at best unclear, with the danger that more attention was paid to religious experience than to biblical revelation.

That trend was challenged and to a large extent reversed by the revival of trinitarian theology starting with Karl *Barth and Karl *Rahner. The Spirit was again seen as the gift of the Father conferred through his Son to regenerate and sanctify his people and to resource them for their witness to the world. This emphasis on the Spirit as the inspirer and enabler of missionary outreach to the world, echoing as it does the first chapters of Acts, has been characteristic of contemporary pneumatology and has found eloquent and insightful expression in the work of the Anglican, John V. Taylor.

Barth himself remained true to the Western theological tradition by defending the filioque and maintaining a one-way dependence of the Spirit on the Son. The post-Barth theologians have not all followed him in this. Jürgen *Moltmann has argued for a distinctiveness of the divine persons that has opened him to a charge of incipient tritheism. Wolfhart *Pannenberg has proposed a trinitarian doctrine of *creation in which the order and reliability of the creation is seen as having its basis in the Son who is also the Logos, while the dynamic movement of the creation from its divine origin to its divine fulfilment is the work of the Spirit who is the Lord and Giver of Life.

In terms of ecclesiology (the doctrine of the *church), the Orthodox theologian, John *Zizioulas, has suggested that the life of the people of God is instituted by the Son but constituted by the Spirit. What Christ has done once for all in his own humanity at the beginning is reproduced and reflected by the Spirit so that the life of the people of God is constituted by what he does among them. This is reflected in the sacrament which was instituted by Jesus, but has its power and efficacy through the Spirit who makes Jesus savingly present to those who in faith eat his bread and drink from his cup.

So also in contemporary understanding of *worship, in line with Rom. 8:26–27, emphasis is laid on prayer and praise as themselves the gift and work of the Spirit, rather than the product of human attempts to reach God.

All in all, this is a time of great pneumatological debate and creativity in which the person and work of the Spirit are being explored within the trinitarian context where they belong and in the context of experience and worship that testify to their reality. If different times in Christian history have concentrated on the different theological themes that their situation called upon them to clarify, our own day may be credibly described as the era when the theology of the Holy Spirit is at last coming into its own.

Bibliography

J. Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion (Philadelphia, 1960); Y. Congar, I Believe in the Holy Spirit (London and New York, 1980); G. Fee, God's Empowering Presence (London, 1994); A. I. C. Heron, The Holy Spirit (London, 1983); J. Moltmann, The Spirit of Life (London, 1992); J. I. Packer, Keep in Step with the Spirit (Old Tappan and Leicester, 1984); T. A. Smail, The Giving Gift (London and Eugene, 1994); J. V. Taylor, The Go-Between God (London, 1972); M. Vischer (ed.), Spirit of God, Spirit of Christ (London, 1981); J. M. Welker, God the Spirit (London, 1994); J. Zizioulas, Being as Communion (London, 1985).

T. A. SMAIL

HOMOIOUSIOS, see ARIANISM;
ATHANASIUS; CREEDS; TRINITY

HOMOSEXUALITY, see SEXUALITY

HOOKE, RICHARD (c. 1553–1600)

Hooker was an *Anglican theologian and apologist. Apart from a famous controversy with the *Puritan Walter Travers (c. 1548–1635) at the Temple Church in 1586, Hooker's life was uneventful (Fellow of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, 1577–84, master of the Temple, 1585–91, and rural incumbencies), but his later years were devoted to the writing of his masterpiece, Of the Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity, of which Books I–IV were published in 1593 and Book V in 1597. The remaining books, which Hooker apparently failed to put into final form, were published after his death (VI and VIII, 1648, VII, 1662). The authenticity of these last three books, once discredited because their views on monarchy and episcopacy were not those of the later seventeenth-century Church of England, has been vindicated by modern scholarship. Hooker's aim in the Polity was to defend the Elizabethan Church of England against Puritan criticisms of its polity, ceremonies and liturgy.

Like most Anglican theologians of his day, Hooker was at first preoccupied with apologetic

