against Rome, and only after his controversy with Travers did he make the defence of the Elizabethan ecclesiastical establishment against the Puritans his major concern. Although his Puritan critics, including Travers, regarded him as dangerously sympathetic to the Church of Rome, and traditional interpretation of Hooker has praised his ecumenical outlook, in fact his attitude to Roman Catholicism was only a little more generous than that of most of his Protestant contemporaries. His allegiance to the royal supremacy (the monarch's role as governor of the Church of England) and the doctrine of separate national churches, and his firm conviction that *justification by faith alone is essential to true Christianity, made him view the Roman Catholic doctrines of the *papacy and justification as extremely serious errors. However, without surrendering a fundamentally *Protestant position, Hooker's very independent theological development produced, in the Polity, a theology less influenced by continental Reformed theology and more influenced by the Fathers and, especially, the medieval scholastics, than that of any of his Anglican contemporaries.

Hooker's approach to anti-Puritan apologetic in the Polity differed from that of other Elizabethan apologists, who debated detailed differences over polity and *liturgy on the basis of a common Calvinist theological position (see *Reformed theology). Hooker's method was to produce a broad theological structure on which to base his defence of the details of the ecclesiastical establishment. By broadening the whole discussion and setting the immediate issues of the controversy in the context of a comprehensive theological structure of his own creation, Hooker produced a work of controversy which was also an enduring contribution to the English theological tradition. His theology is not at all representative of the 'Anglican' theology of his day, but later became a major influence on the emergence of a distinctively Anglican theological tradition.

In opposition to what he saw as the Puritans' unbalanced reliance on Scripture alone as a sufficient guide in all religious and ecclesiastical matters, Hooker went back to the scholastic (especially *Thomist) synthesis of reason and *revelation, with its appropriation of both the *Aristotelian and *Platonic philosophical traditions (see *Faith and reason). On this basis, Hooker created a vision of the universe ordered by reason expressed in *law. All reality is or should be governed by a harmonious structure of rational law, which extends from the eternal law of God's own being, through the natural laws of creation and human reason, and the positive divine law revealed in Scripture, to the human positive laws of church and state. As all being, in its various levels, derives from God, so all law, in its various levels, derives from the rational law of God's being. Thus both Scripture and human reason, expressed in antiquity, tradition and political authority based in implicit consent, belong within a universal and hierarchical rational order. The stress is on harmony rather than conflict, so that reason in the form of tradition and authority may be expected to complement and interpret revelation.

From this structure the profound conservatism of Hooker's thought follows, making his work a massively uncritical defence of the status quo in church and *state. An organic, hierarchical, law-governed concept of the universe supports an organic, hierarchical, law-governed concept of human society. The rational nature of hierarchy, law and tradition provides the rational basis for the necessity of obedience to the established order. The harmony of revelation and reason supports the integral harmony of church and state, as co-extensive aspects of the one Christian society.

In his defence of the Anglican liturgy against the Puritans, Hooker extols the value of beauty and order in external ceremonies and signs, plays down the necessity for preaching, and gives a central role to the sacraments. Within a general context of the harmony of nature and grace (see *Natural theology), Hooker's theology is incarnational and sacramental. The *sacraments effect our participation in Christ who is humanity's participation in God.

Hooker had little influence in his lifetime, but during the seventeenth century, with the growth of an Anglican theology which distanced itself from Calvinism, he attained his position as the Anglican apologist par excellence. Especially this was the case after the Restoration (1660), when, with the aid of Izaak Walton's tendentious and unreliable biography, the Restoration bishops promoted Hooker's theology as the quintessence of Anglicanism, while at the same time creating an image of Hooker more in line with the principles of the Restoration Church of England than the historical Hooker was.

To the influence of Hooker, traditional Anglican theology owes much of its reasonable moderation, its sense of the harmony of *Scripture and tradition, faith and reason, grace and nature, church and state, its boast of representing the golden mean between Roman and Protestant extremes, and its social and political conservatism.

Bibliography

Works: Of the Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity, 4 vols. (Folger Library edn, Cambridge, MA, 1977–82); The Works of Mr Richard Hooker, ed. J. Keble, 7th edn rev. by R. W. Church and F. Paget, 3 vols. (Oxford, 1888).

Studies: R. K. Faulkner, Richard Hooker and the Politics of a Christian England (Berkeley, 1981); W. Speed Hill (ed.), Studies in Richard Hooker (Cleveland, 1972); P. E. Hughes, Faith and Works: Cranmer and Hooker on Justification (Wilton, 1982); O. Loyer, L'Anglicanisme de Richard Hooker, 2 vols. (Lille, 1979); A. S. McGrade (ed.), Richard Hooker and the Construction of Christian Community (Arizona, 1997); P. Munz, The Place of Hooker in the History of Thought (London, 1952/1971).

R. J. BAUCKHAM

HOPE

In Christian theology the understanding of hope initially rests in God's promises communicated to humanity. In other words, hope is grounded in the God who established a relationship with all of creation, but is specifically revealed in God's creation of humanity. Eventually, the final *revelation on which hope rests is interpreted through Christ. In this the final revelation is expressed in Christ's victory over sin, death and hell through his *resurrection.

In the mid 1960s Jürgen *Moltmann articulated the meaning of Christian hope in his book, The Theology of Hope. Moltmann set the agenda for insisting that the centre for theological thought was in the eschatological hope in Christ. The concept of hope and the related idea of *eschatology became the hermeneutic for theology and a basis for rethinking Christian *social ethics. Wolfhart *Pannenberg continued this theme with the publication Revelation as History. For Pannenberg, God is ahead of us, making all things new. The future is now to be brought into the present through Christ the God-man. Crucial to both Moltmann and Pannenberg was Karl *Barth's Christology, which countered the previous influence of Friedrich *Schleiermacher's liberalism. Although both Moltmann and Pannenberg have received a wide variety of critical assessments, they set the agenda for a rigorous *Christological focus on Christian hope.

For both Moltmann and Pannenberg, their work continued on a biblical focus regarding the affirmation of the historical *Jesus as an eschatological prophet. Through Jesus' words and deeds we gain an insight into the future hope in the present. Jesus proclaimed, 'The *kingdom of God has come near' (Mark 1:15), meaning that the future has now become present, and, in his eventual death and historical resurrection, there now was confidence in Christ as the hope for the future for both humanity and all of creation. The resurrection of Christ was the culmination of his entire ministry from birth to death. At every stage of Jesus' life he defeated the powers of evil and won a decisive victory. Hope now centred in the person of Christ and in his work. Importantly, the affirmation was clear that in Christ came the universal hope for all (Col. 1:20).

With Christ bringing the future into the present, Christian theology was now to run counter to the world of *evil powers. This meant that patience, a fruit of the Spirit, does not translate into inactivity. Since God's mission is reconciliation (see *Atonement), the church is given the ministry of reconciliation to the world (2 Cor. 5:18–19), as difficult as this may be. Here, with active patience, the future expectation does not lose sight of God's presence with us (Matt. 1:23). Trials and tribulations are to be expected, but they do not lead to despair (Rom. 5:1–5), for it is the ministry of the church, in light of Christian hope, that protests against the prevailing evil powers. This leads to the conclusion that no political system deserves ultimate allegiance, so a theological protest is always necessary since the hope for the future is made secure in God's mission to the world.

Christian hope is to be understood in light of the *trinitarian activity. The Father who sent the Son to take human flesh (John 1:14) and live with humanity, also sent the eschatological Spirit who brings Christ's victory over sin, death and hell into the Christian experience. Holiness, then, is not only a specific human spiritual reality, but with the Spirit there is holiness and renewal in the Christian community, and within the Christian community the emphasis on renewal and reconciliation is displayed at the Lord's Table in sacramental action. This leads to a renewed emphasis on the interpretation of God's *creation as a 'new heavens and a new earth' (Isa. 65:17–25). Such a mission is accomplished through Christ, empowered by the *Holy Spirit. With our hope in Christ we have been sealed with the Holy Spirit (Eph. 1:12–13) as the foretaste of how the present is to be recreated. God's promised hope is 'Yes' in Christ (2 Cor. 1:20–22) and is made present in the power of the Holy Spirit.

Near the end of Moltmann's early work on Christian hope he made it abundantly clear that hope creates *mission, and so it is the church's mission to establish hope throughout the world. Moltmann stated, 'One of the first senses in which this happens is in the missionary proclamation of the gospel, that no corner of this world should remain without God's promise of new creation through the power of the resurrection' (Theology of Hope, p. 328). Primarily, hope does not begin in human effort. Hope begins in the resurrected Christ with whom the church is empowered by the Holy Spirit. It is this eschatological community, in mission, that brings hope into every corner of the world.

Bibliography

R. Bauckham and T. Hart, Hope Against Hope: Christian Eschatology in Contemporary Context (London, 1999); K. E. Broder and M. W. Elliot (eds.), 'Let the Reader Understand': Eschatology in Bible and Theology (Leicester, 1997); J. Moltmann, Theology of Hope (ET, London, 1967); W. Pannenberg (ed.), Revelation as History (ET, London and New York, 1969).

D. L. RAINEY

HOPE, THEOLOGY OF

'Theology of Hope' refers principally to two theologians, Wolfhart *Pannenberg and Jürgen *Moltmann. 'Hope' designates their emphasis on the future as the place of divine action. Pannenberg and Moltmann are best understood as responding to two impulses in twentieth-century theology: Karl's *Barth's focus on divine revelation and the recovery of *eschatology. They accepted Barth's focus, but criticized him for presenting revelation as the Word that existentially encounters us. In response, borrowing an idea from G. W. F. *Hegel, they held that history in its totality is the revelation of God. Eschatology thus became for them a critical theme, for the totality of *history, which is God's revelation, is in our future. Yet this eschatological future is not simply in the future; in the resurrection of Jesus Christ it has entered into the midst of our history. Hope is thus grounded in a revelatory future that has, in a preliminary way, already taken place. In later developments, Pannenberg and Moltmann placed increasing emphasis on the doctrine of the Trinity, emphasizing the social analogy in contrast to Barth's Augustinian approach. They also articulated powerful ways of understanding the doctrine of creation. Additionally, Moltmann expressly connected the principle of hope to *liberation theology and to Martin Luther's theology of the cross.

Bibliography

J. Moltmann, The Crucified God: The Cross of Christ as the Foundation and Criticism of Christian Theology, tr. R. A. Wilson and J. Bowden (New York, 1974); J. Moltmann, Theology of Hope: On the Ground and Implications of a Christian Eschatology, tr. J. W. Leitch (Minneapolis, 1993); W. Pannenberg, Systematic Theology, tr. G. W. Bromiley, 3 vols. (Grand Rapids, 1991–1998); idem (ed.), Revelation as History, tr. D. Granskou (New York, 1968).

S. M. POWELL

HUBMAIER, BALTHASAR (1481–1528)

Born in Friedberg in Bavaria, Hubmaier studied in Ingolstadt, and was appointed to Regensburg as the chaplain at a significant Marian shrine. He made an impact on the city through his preaching, a skill that was to remain important throughout his ministry. His commitment to the 'ordinary people' was also evident, there taking the form of anti-Semitic preaching, since he identified the Jewish community with financial exploitation, as well as being significantly shaped by the pervasive anti-Semitism of the period.

He moved from Regensburg to Waldshut, and in 1522–3, he began to move towards reform, reading the writings of Luther, going to Zurich to meet Zwingli, and marrying – a well-recognized sign of a preacher who wished to identify with Reform.

The community of Waldshut was deeply affected by the Peasants' Uprising of 1524–25.

In 1525, Reublin, an *Anabaptist evangelist, arrived and preached believers' baptism. Hubmaier and sixty others were baptized, and what was effectively a civic-sponsored Anabaptist church was inaugurated.

Later in 1525 Hubmaier returned to Zurich. Arrested there, he was required to recant. Although in his first recantation appearance, he actually preached on believers' baptism, following torture, he did recant, and was released. He fled to Nikolsburg in Moravia, and there succeeded in converting the politically powerful in the city. Most citizens followed, and again, Hubmaier inaugurated a civic-based Anabaptist church.

In 1527 he was re-arrested and taken to Vienna, where again he was required to recant. He did not, and was burned in 1528, three months before his wife was executed, by drowning.

Hubmaier was not a typical Anabaptist. His conviction that civic society and the church could be identified set him apart. He also rejected the position of pacifism which marked most sixteenth-century Anabaptists. As one of the few who had a university education, his theological thinking was more highly developed than most others. As well as preaching, he also wrote effectively and his writings remained influential. The most distinctive parts of his theology, apart from his understanding of church and state, was his tripartite *anthropology, and also his conviction that the justification given by Christ was imparted, imputed and an ontological change, when most thinkers at the time adopted only one of those positions.

His most important contribution to our understanding of Anabaptism was the preparation of an Anabaptist communion liturgy, which demonstrates much of his theology, and in particular the 'horizontal' aspect of the table, with the 'Pledge of Love' which forms a part of the service. This expression of mutual commitment among believers was characteristic of the Anabaptist sense of practical discipleship (see *Fellowship). The other major contribution for which he is noted is his motto: Die Wahrheit ist untodtlich ('Truth is immortal or unkillable').

Bibliography

T. Bergsten and W. R. Estep, Balthasar Hubmaier: Theologian and Martyr (Valley Forge, 1978); W. R. Estep, Balthasar Hubmaier (Nashville, 1978); H. W. Pipkin and J. H. Yoder, Balthasar Hubmaier: Theologian of Anabaptism (Scottsdale, 1989).

R. GOULDBOURNE

HÜGEL, FRIEDRICH VON (1852–1925)

Baron Friedrich von Hügel was one of the leading Roman Catholic intellectuals of his day and widely influential in cultured religious circles in England, where he settled after 1867. A man of the broadest intellectual interests, embracing philosophy, theology, history, spirituality and science, and of wide religious sympathies with diverse traditions, von Hügel was acquainted with leading thinkers of his day, notably the Roman Catholics George Tyrrell (1861–1909) and Maurice Blondel (1861–1949), and the Protestant historian and theologian Ernst Troeltsch. He was an early supporter of critical views concerning the OT and became associated with Roman Catholic modernism in the early part of the present century, although his own work was not condemned like that of others more central to that movement. His chief literary legacy, apart from a voluminous correspondence with scholars and those seeking spiritual counsel, is his book The Mystical Element in Religion (2 vols., London, ²1923), which, through a study of Catherine of Genoa (1447–1510), argues that the religious life needs to hold together emotional, institutional and intellectual elements. His thought is developed in a number of directions in his once widely known Essays and Addresses.

Bibliography

Works: The Mystical Element in Religion (London, 1908); Eternal Life (Edinburgh, 1912); Essays and Addresses (First Series: London, 1921; Second Series: London, 1926); The Reality of God (London, 1931).

Studies: L. F. Barmann, Baron Friedrich von Hügel and the Modernist Crisis (Cambridge, 1972); M. de la Bedoyère, The Life of Baron von Hügel (London, 1951); J. J. Kelly, Baron Friedrich von Hügel's Philosophy of Religion (Louvain, 1983); E. M. Leonard, Creative Tension: The Spiritual Legacy of Friedrich von Hügel (Scranton, PA, 1997); J. A. McGrath, Baron Friedrich von Hügel and the Debate on Historical Christianity (1902–1905) (San Francisco, 1993).

J. B. WEBSTER

HUMANISM (MODERN)

In the twentieth century, the term 'Humanism' (now a proper name) was adopted by an alliance of groups formerly known as secularists, rationalists, scientific naturalists, ethicists, universalists, free thinkers, atheists or agnostics. The first Humanist Manifesto, published in 1933 in the United States, was followed in 1941 by the formation of the American Humanist Association. H. J. Blackham, the leader of the Ethical Union in the UK, initiated international contacts which led to the formation of the International Humanist and Ethical Union following an inaugural congress in Amsterdam in 1952. The British Humanist Association was first formed in 1963 at a meeting at the Houses of Parliament chaired by Sir Julian Huxley. With the exception of Huxley, British Humanism has tended towards a more aggressive secularism, while American Humanism includes those (e.g. in the Universalist-Unitarian Church) who retain a certain religious or mystical feeling for life or the transcendent.

Although the membership of the Humanist organizations remains very small, the Humanist outlook or 'life-stance' is widespread in Europe and English-speaking cultures around the world. It has largely overtaken Christianity as the dominant assumption in the universities and the media and (except in America) in every part of society. Although it only emerged in the twentieth century, H. J. Blackham saw it as the culmination of a long European tradition with roots in Protagoras, Epicurus, Thucydides and Pericles, Lucretius and Renaissance Humanism. Voltaire, Rousseau and particularly Hume were formative, together with Thomas Paine and the Declaration of the Rights of Man during the French Revolution. In the mid-nineteenth century there was a more obvious movement of thought towards atheism in the writings of John Stuart Mill, Auguste Comte, Ludwig Feuerbach and George Eliot, but it was Darwin's theory of evolution which led to a significant pressure group led by T. H. Huxley, the grandfather of Sir Julian.

Huxley propagated the 'conflict thesis' that science and 'religion' had always been in opposition (see Science and theology) and campaigned for science to be given an equal place in education, which was then dominated by the Latin and Greek classics and the church. The propaganda that science was essentially 'agnostic' (Huxley's new word), rational and forward-looking, while 'religion' was authoritarian, dogmatic, superstitious and backward-looking was highly influential, largely thanks to the genius of writers such as Herbert Spencer, George Bernard Shaw and H. G. Wells. The intellectual attraction of the new Humanism has been powerfully articulated by leading philosophers such as Bertrand Russell, William James, John Dewey, A. J. Ayer and Antony Flew, along with leading scientists, such as Sir Herman Bondi, Sir Fred Hoyle, Francis Crick and Richard Dawkins, together with literary figures and journalists in Europe and the English-speaking countries.

Humanism may be summed up in four basic convictions (Humanists would refuse to think of them as 'dogmas'), which may be conveniently labelled *rationalism, naturalism, anthropocentrism and liberalism. Their rationalism begins from the belief that each individual human being must think for himself or herself and refuse to accept the authority of tradition. It is rationalism in the *empiricist tradition of *Locke and Hume, restricting knowledge to what may be known through the five senses. This leads to 'naturalism', meaning here 'secularism', the rejection of any supernatural, spiritual or transcendent realities (such as a god or gods or immortal souls) which cannot be empirically proved by the senses. That negative conviction (not fully shared by some American 'religious' Humanists) may also be expressed more positively as 'scientific naturalism', a commitment to modern science, and it leads on to the positive conviction of 'anthropocentrism', expressed in the chosen designation, 'Humanism'. 'Man is the measure of all things' (Protagoras). Perhaps this should rather be seen as the most fundamental conviction of all, since it is basic to the epistemological conviction that there is no authority higher than human reason. For Humanists, the highest value attaches to the human, to humanity, to being 'humane' and so also to the 'humanities'. The arts therefore are in effect the devotional exercises of what some (but not all) Humanists accept is in fact a kind of religion. The fourth conviction, democratic liberalism, emerges out of the others. In this, Humanists are not unique, but it can be seen how their passion for civil liberties, tolerance and human rights arises out of a history of being shunned and marginalized by a dominant Christianity.

Organized secular Humanism emerged at the height of the celebration of '*modernity', and with the development of a conscious 'post-modernity' which rejects the universal claims of rationalism and 'scientism', it remains to be seen whether secular Humanism can adapt. It also faces continuing claims that the only true humanism is Christianity.

See also: FAITH AND REASON.

Bibliography

J. Bequette, Christian Humanism: Creation, Redemption and Reintegration (Lanham and Oxford, 2004); H. J. Blackham, Humanism (London, 1968); A. Bullock, The Humanist Tradition in the West (Oxford and New York, 1985); O. Chadwick, The Secularization of the European Mind in the Nineteenth Century (Cambridge, 1975); D. W. Ehrenfeld, The Arrogance of Humanism (Oxford, 1981); R. W. Franklin and J. M. Shaw, The Case for Christian Humanism (Grand Rapids, 1991); J. Herrick, Humanism (Amherst, 2005); P. Kurtz, Living Without Religion (Amherst, 1994); idem, Humanist Manifesto 2000: A Call for a New Planetary Humanism (Amherst, 2000); J. I. Packer and T. Howard, Christianity: The True Humanism (Waco, 1985); D. Shepherd and K. Arisian, Humanism and Postmodernism (New York, 1994).

T. A. NOBLE

HUMANISM (RENAISSANCE)

The renaissance of interest in the art and literature of ancient Greece and Rome in the fifteenth century gave birth to what nineteenth-century historians called 'humanism'. The word was derived from umanista, a slang term used in the fifteenth century for a teacher of studia humanitatis (grammar, rhetoric, history, literature and philosophy) from Latin and Greek texts. The Renaissance was a new focus of interest in all things human, seen as a 'modern' rebirth of ancient culture in reaction to the *scholastic theology of the despised 'Middle Ages'. Francesco Petrarch (c. 1304–74) and Lorenzo Valla (c. 1406–57) initiated the new literary criticism, while Marsilio Vicino (1433–99) and Giovanni Pico del Mirandola (c. 1463–94) tried to hold this together with Christian faith. Some humanists, such as Machiavelli and later Montaigne, presented a fairly secular approach in their writings, but Renaissance humanism did remain largely Christian, and humanist scholars in northern Europe brought the new learning to the study of the Scriptures.

*Erasmus, the ‘prince of humanists’, emphasized that Christian theology should work from its original sources in Scripture, thus requiring both knowledge of the biblical languages and textual criticism to establish accurate texts. John Colet (c. 1466–1519) undertook a grammatical-historical interpretation of the biblical texts, Jacques Lefèvre d’Étaples (c. 1455–1536) produced a French translation of the NT, and Johannes Reuchlin (1455–1522) wrote Rudiments of Hebrew, thus initiating Christian Hebraic studies. Robert Estienne (1503–59) and John Froben (c. 1460–1527) became publishers, utilizing the new technique of printing. Some of the leading Reformers, including *Calvin, *Cranmer, *Melancthon and *Zwingli, benefited from a humanist education.

Bibliography

J. Hale, A Concise Encyclopaedia of the Italian Renaissance (Oxford, 1981); C. G. Nauert, Humanism and the Culture of Renaissance Europe (New Approaches to European History) (Cambridge, 2006).

T. A. NOBLE

HUMAN RIGHTS, see RIGHTS, HUMAN

HUME, DAVID (1711–76)

Such is Hume’s influence on philosophy in the English-speaking world of the twentieth century that he has been described as the founder of modern *philosophy of religion. He himself, in his general philosophy, can be regarded as a radical descendant of *Locke, using and developing the latter’s emphasis on the role of sense-experience (see *Empiricism) in knowledge to achieve *epistemological scepticism. Whatever the merits of such a characterization, Hume announced distinctive and independent theses which are still lively – for example, on the mistaken ascription of moral judgments to reason rather than feeling, and on the error of supposing that observation or inference establishes causal connections as matters of empirical fact.

Two aspects of Hume’s religious thought have commanded special attention. First, in the celebrated Book X of the Enquiry Concerning Human Understanding (1748) he challenged the reasonableness of belief in *miracles. The probability of their having occurred is less than the probability of false report; therefore one cannot claim a rational basis for belief in them. Hume’s definition of miracle, its relation to the laws of nature and his asseverations concerning scientific impossibility tempt one to conclude that he disallowed miracles even in principle. But, especially in the context of the entire Enquiry, this verdict has no safe warrant. Investigating the regulative grounds of assent to particular claims suffices to show that miracles cannot constitute the foundation of a credible religion.

Second, in the posthumously published Dialogues Concerning Natural Religion (1779), Hume challenged the validity of an argument from the world considered as an order to the existence of the one God of traditional Christianity. Not only does the argument fail, but it cannot remotely succeed in demonstrating God’s moral attributes as traditionally described. Hume’s classic discussion deals with a number of perennially significant issues in *philosophical theology, such as the problem of *evil and the coherence of *theism. However, in the context of the eighteenth century, demolishing the argument from ‘design’ in itself constituted a major threat to the grounds of theistic belief.

Some have maintained that Hume, in freeing Christianity from false dependence on ill-conceived ideas of ‘rationality’, has rendered a service to faith. But certainly there is little direct comfort for the religious believer to be found in his work. He may not have been an atheist, but his whole enterprise jeopardized traditional ways of speaking of or believing in God without providing a positive alternative obviously compatible with Christianity. His tribe, embodying both his spirit and his argumentation, lives on.

Bibliography

Works: Dialogues Concerning Natural Religion, ed. N. K. Smith (Edinburgh, 1947).

Studies: R. M. Burns, The Great Debate about Miracles: From Joseph Glanvill to David Hume (London, 1981); A. Flew, Hume’s Philosophy of Belief (London, 1961); J. C. A. Gaskin, Hume’s Philosophy of Religion (London, 1978); E. C. Mossner, The Life of David Hume (Oxford, 1980); P. Russell, The Riddle of Hume’s Treatise: Skepticism, Naturalism and Irreligion (Oxford, 2008); N. K. Smith, The Philosophy of David Hume (London, 1941).

S. N. WILLIAMS

HUS, JOHN (1372/3–1415)

Czech Reformer and martyr, Hus was a powerful preacher as well as a scholar and theologian. He held it as a basic truth that Scripture possesses unique authority as the 'law of God'. At the same time he considered the tradition of the church, especially the teaching of the early Fathers up to *Augustine, to be a source of doctrine, but with the proviso that it too was subject to the superior authority of the Bible. The same proviso applied to the declarations of church leaders at all times. Even laymen were entitled to challenge such declarations if they were inconsistent with Scripture. For this reason he firmly believed that the Bible should be made available in translation to the public.

This was the basis of his sharp criticism of the abuses of power and wealth by the church in his own day. It was these views, especially as expressed in his impressive book, De Ecclesia (The Church, 1413) that led to his condemnation and death at the hands of the Council of Constance in 1415. The *church in the real sense of the word is the whole company of the elect. This is the mystical body of Christ, whose only head is Jesus Christ. The pope cannot be head of the church in this sense. As an earthly institution, however, the Roman Church is a mixed company, since the 'foreknown' – the non-elect – belong to it. Office in the church does not of itself place anyone among the elect. This Augustinian understanding of the nature of the church implied that even the pope himself as well as the cardinals might belong to the 'foreknown' rather than the elect. Indeed, the stark contrast between the extravagant lives of these men and the poverty of Christ raised deep suspicions about their spiritual status.

The true church is wider than the communion of the Roman Church, and includes all those in the world who confess with Peter that Christ is the Son of the living God. This faith is the rock upon which the true church is founded. Hus understood faith in the Catholic sense as 'faith formed by love accompanied by the virtue of perseverance'.

If the pope emulates Christ's virtuous life, he is Christ's vicar. But his authority is spiritual, not civil. It is unfitting that any priest should exercise coercive power, and so Hus drew the conclusion that there is no justification for using violence to uproot heresy.

Hus accepted that there were seven sacraments, but called for a firmer emphasis on their spiritual character. Thus, with regard to *penance, he insisted that God alone can forgive sin and that the priest has authority only to declare God's forgiveness in absolution. He adhered to the doctrine of transubstantiation in the *Eucharist, but insisted that Christ's body is not present in a material way in the elements; it is a sacramental presence.

It is incorrect to think of Hus's teaching as a mere echo of *Wyclif's. He revered his predecessor but was a discriminating user of his books. Hus was a moderate Catholic Reformer, but is admired by Protestants because in his attitude to biblical authority, his passion for reform and insistence upon Christ's lordship over the church, he paved the way for the spiritual enlightenment that culminated in the Protestant Reformation.

Bibliography

Works: De Ecclesia, tr. S. H. Thompson (Boulder, 1956); The Letters of John Hus, tr. M. Spinka (Manchester, 1972).

Studies: H. Kaminsky, A History of the Hussite Revolution (Berkeley and Los Angeles, 1967); M. Spinka, John Hus (Princeton, 1968); J. K. Zeman, The Hussite Movement and the Reformation in Bohemia, Moravia and Slovakia (1350–1650): A Bibliographical Study Guide (Ann Arbor, 1977).

R. T. JONES

HYPER-CALVINISM

Hyper-Calvinism is a conservative form of traditional *Reformed theology that holds to the five points of Calvinism as formulated by the Synod of *Dort. In contrast with mainstream Calvinism, however, it denies the free offer of the gospel. Many Hyper-Calvinists also reject the historic Reformed doctrines of common *grace and duty faith (i.e. that it is the duty of all who hear the gospel to savingly believe in Christ). They contend that free offers, common grace and duty faith are *Arminian concepts and are incompatible with the Five Points. Their justification for their position is that God sincerely desires the salvation of only the elect, not all men. All Hyper-Calvinists have been supralapsarian, but not all supralapsarians have been Hyper-Calvinist (see *Predestination).

The movement is mainly associated with the Strict and Particular Baptists in England and the Protestant Reformed Church in America. It began in England around the year 1700. The first significant work was God's Operations of Grace, But No Offers of Grace (1707) by Joseph Hussey. The leading theologian has been John *Gill, whose Body of Divinity, The Cause of God and Truth and other works continue to be reprinted. Other leaders include John Brine, William Huntington, William Gadsby, Joseph Charles Philpot, B. A. Ramsbottom and George Ella. The English movement was much curtailed by Andrew *Fuller's The Gospel Worthy of All Acceptation (1785) and the ministry of C. H. *Spurgeon. Herman Hoeksema (1886–1965) has been the leading American exponent, as in his Reformed Dogmatics (Grandville, ²2004). Homer Hoeksema, David Engelsma and Herman Hanko have continued his tradition, which has been opposed by Cornelius *Van Til, John *Murray and others. The movement has always been a very small minority in the Reformed community.

Bibliography

C. D. Daniel, Hyper-Calvinism and John Gill (unpublished PhD thesis, University of Edinburgh, 1983); A. De Jong, The Well-Meant Gospel Offer (Franeker, 1953); D. Engelsma, Hyper-Calvinism and the Call of the Gospel (Grandville, ²1994); M. A. G. Haykin (ed.), The Life and Thought of John Gill (1697–1771) (Leiden, 1997); I. H. Murray, Spurgeon v. Hyper-Calvinism (Edinburgh, 1995); J. Murray, The Free Offer of the Gospel (Edinburgh, 2001); R. W. Oliver, History of the English Calvinistic Baptists, 1771–1892 (Edinburgh, 2001); P. Toon, The Emergence of Hyper-Calvinism in English Nonconformity, 1689–1765 (London, 1967).

C. D. DANIEL

HYPOSTASIS

Hypostasis is a Greek noun (plural hypostaseis) which became the standard designation in Eastern theology of a 'person' of the divine Trinity. Its nearest Latin equivalent was persona.

Hypostasis had a wide range of non-technical meanings (cf. its NT occurrences in 2 Cor. 9:4; 11:17; Heb. 1:3; 3:14; 11:1), but in philosophy and theology it denoted 'being, substantial reality', with reference either to the stuff or substance of which a thing consisted (cf. Heb. 1:3) or to its particularity. Against *Monarchianism, *Origen insisted that Father, Son and Spirit were eternally distinct hypostaseis. Until the later fourth century (e.g. in the Creed of Nicaea of 325), hypostasis was used almost interchangeably with ousia (see *Substance), but *Basil and his fellow-Cappadocians vindicated its appropriateness to designate the three objective presentations of God, while restricting ousia to the single Godhead. This differentiation broadly corresponded to Latin theology's one substantia and three personae – which bred confusion, since substantia was the etymological equivalent of hypostasis, not of ousia.

The difference between hypostasis and ousia is subtle, for both speak of single entities or beings. Ousia has more reference to internal essence or nature (God in respect of his Godness), while hypostasis more to the objective, concrete individuality of the three 'persons' (to which a closer Lat. counterpart would be subsistentia).

In *Christology, the Council of *Chalcedon (451) distinguished between the one hypostasis of Christ's incarnate being and the two physeis, 'natures' (divine and human), which were united in what *Alexandrian theologians called 'the hypostatic union'. (They had earlier used physis almost in the sense of hypostasis, for the single being of Christ.) After Chalcedon, debate continued on the integrity of Christ's human nature – whether it lacked a personal centre or focus and was strictly 'non-personal' (anhypostatatos), as theologians in the mould of *Cyril of Alexandria taught. (Some *Antiochene divines liked to ascribe a hypostasis to the human nature.) The one hypostasis affirmed by Chalcedon was normally interpreted as that of the divine Word.

A resolution of the difficulty was provided by Leontius of Byzantium (d. c. 543), whose life remains obscure, although he was probably a Palestinian monk who spent several years at Constantinople. He wrote against both *Nestorians and *Monophysites, using *Aristotelian categories in a new way in the service of Christological definition. According to the traditional interpretation, his basically Cyrilline teaching declared that Christ's humanity, although anhypostatatos, was enhypostatatos, 'in-personal, intrahypostatic', i.e. had its personal subsistence in the person of the Logos, while still preserving, as Chalcedon affirmed, its own characteristic properties. God incarnate thus encompassed within himself the perfection of human nature. This notion of enhypostasia (a form not found until much later; enhypostatos had earlier been used by Neoplatonists) was developed by *Maximus the Confessor and *John of Damascus.

A recent reinterpretation by D. B. Evans (Leontius of Byzantium: An Origenist Christology, Washington, 1970) claims that for Leontius both divine and human natures were enhypostatized, in the hypostasis of Jesus Christ which was not that of the Logos. This view (which makes him an Origenist in Christology, indebted to Evagrius Ponticus [346–99], a pioneer writer on monastic spirituality) has found some acceptance (e.g. J. Meyendorff, Christ in Eastern Christian Thought, New York, 1975) but much resistance (e.g. J. J. Lynch in TS 36, 1975, pp. 455–471, and B. Daley in JTS n.s. 27, 1976, pp. 333–369).

Bibliography

J. N. D. Kelly, Early Christian Doctrines (London, 1977); G. L. Prestige, God in Patristic Thought (London, 1959); H. M. Relton, A Study in Christology (London, 1917); M. Richard, Opera Minora, vol. II (Turnhout and Louvain, 1977), chs. on hypostasis and on Leontius.

D. F. WRIGHT

ICONOCLASTIC CONTROVERSIES

A series of debates about the place of *images (Gk eikones, icons) in worship which took place in Byzantium between 726 and 843. The first controversy began when the emperor, Leo III (717–41), issued a decree ordering the destruction of pictures in churches (726). His motives may have been partly religious, though they were certainly very mixed, and there is no evidence that the Islamic prohibition of image-worship had any effect on his thinking. Leo's policy was continued by his son Constantine V (741–75), and by Leo IV (775–80), but after Leo's death it was gradually reversed by his widow Irene, acting in the name of her son, Constantine VI (780–97). At the Seventh Ecumenical *Council, held at Nicaea in 787, iconoclasm (i.e. the destruction of icons) was condemned and outlawed.

The Council's decisions were strongly supported by the papacy, which had never approved of iconoclasm, but they were rejected by the Frankish Church at the Council of Frankfurt in 794. In 815, during the reign of Leo V (813–20), there was a renewed outbreak of what was now a heresy, which was not finally overcome until 842. The restoration of the images was formally proclaimed at the so-called Triumph of Orthodoxy, on 11 March 843, the first Sunday in Lent. Since that time, this Sunday has been specially commemorated in the Eastern Church.

Iconoclasm had great social and political implications, but it was fundamentally a theological controversy. The iconoclasts appealed to the second commandment, and to passages like John 4:24, as evidence to support their belief in a purely spiritual worship of God. Their opponents, the so-called iconodules (Gk douleia, service), accused the iconoclasts of denying the reality of the *incarnation. The great exponent of this view was *John of Damascus, who made the classical distinction between worship paid to God (latreia), honour paid to the saints (douleia), and veneration given to created objects (proskynēsis).

John argued that man was the *image of God, that Christ was the image of the invisible God and that the Christian's destiny was to be re-formed in the image of God's Son. Those who had met Jesus in the flesh had seen God, whether they had recognized that fact or not. To say otherwise was to fall into the heresy of *Arius, who had denied the divinity of Christ.

In the second period of iconoclasm, John's mantle was taken up by a monk of Constantinople, Theodore the Studite (759–826). Theodore argued that an icon was a true representation of the hypostasis* (i.e. person) of its subject, but that it had a different nature (ousia; see *Substance). An icon of Christ was thus able to bring the believer into direct contact with his person, but it was not an idol.

Theodore also championed the compulsory veneration of icons, claiming that they were a necessary part of Christian worship. This became the teaching of the Eastern Church after 842, but it has never really caught on in the West, even in those churches which use images in worship, although icons have become popular as objects for contemplation. It should be noted, however, that the Eastern Church does not tolerate statuary in worship, on the grounds that it is idolatrous. This is because the third dimension, which in an icon is believed to be the transcendent divine reality, is contained by statuary within the finite realm.

Bibliography

L. Brubaker, Inventing Byzantine Iconoclasm (Bristol, 2012); A. Bryer and J. Herrin (eds.), Iconoclasm (Oxford, 1977); A. Giakalis, Images of the Divine: The Theology of Icons at the Seventh Ecumenical Council (Leiden, 1994); John of Damascus, On the Divine Image (Crestwood, 1980); L. Ouspensky, The Theology of the Icon (London, 1977).

G. L. BRAY

IDEALISM

As a metaphysical doctrine, idealism is the view that all that really exists are minds and their ideas. Though it is possible to have secular versions of idealism (e.g. phenomenism), its most notable exponent, George *Berkeley, advanced a theistic version, a chief reason for which was to combat the allegedly atheistic consequences of John *Locke's doctrine of material substance, the view that the objects of the external world were substances possessing sets of primary and secondary qualities. If it is allowed that a thought is a mental image, it is possible to give a plausible idealist version of Christian theology, as Berkeley shows and Jonathan *Edwards and others appear to have held, but this can scarcely be regarded as the most natural view. For though God's decree or thought that x shall exist or happen is a necessary and sufficient condition of x existing or happening, it does not follow that x is itself only an idea in God's mind.

In the philosophies of *Kant and *Hegel, idealism is a consequence of Kant's 'Copernican revolution' – his view that the knowing mind contributes to the character of what is known. According to Hegel, reality develops historically in dialectical fashion towards the absolute idea, and the distinction between the knowing subject and a known object is a convenient and conventional one rather than one which corresponds to reality as it is.

The influence of transcendental or absolute idealism upon Christian theology is chiefly through versions of post-Kantian idealism. Denying, with Kant, any possibility of knowing God through either reason or revelation, idealism came to understand the Christian faith in immanent and largely ethical terms. The Christian gospel is not the proclamation of redemption from sin by the self-offering of the God-man, but a way of life consisting in observing the ethical teachings of Jesus of Nazareth in an effort to bring about the kingdom of God on earth. This outlook is characteristic of the theology of e.g. Albrecht *Ritschl.

Idealism became influential in England and the English-speaking world through the writings of S. T. *Coleridge and F. D. Maurice (see *Christian Socialism) in England and the Cairds (Edward, 1835–1908, and his brother John, 1820–98) in Scotland, and is one important source of theological *liberalism in Protestantism.

Kant gave prominence to the so-called moral proof of God's existence, but for him morality is severed from divine command, and stress is laid on human autonomy in devising and endorsing the moral law. Put in terms of Christian theology, in Kant's philosophy the creature assumes some of the roles of the creator, giving the world its character, and legislating the moral law.

In a less technical sense 'idealism' concerns the holding and propagating of ideals, as opposed to ideas. While holding out perfect conformity to the will of God, or to the *imitation of Christ, as ideals, much Christian theology has cautioned against the thought that such ideals are attained or attainable in this life, regarding this as *perfectionism, which fails to take the effect of indwelling sin, even in the regenerate, with sufficient seriousness.

See also: GERMAN IDEALISM.

Bibliography

A. C. Ewing, Idealism: A Critical Survey (London, 1969); P. H. Neujahr, Kant's Idealism (Macon, 1995); B. M. G. Reardon, From Coleridge to Gore (London, 1971); W. H. Walsh, Hegelian Ethics (London, 1969).

P. HELM

IDEOLOGY

According to Marx and Engels, the ideology of a particular historical era is the sum of the ideas of the dominant social class. This links to class struggle resulting from the division of labour. The mode of material production sets conditions to how history unfolds. Historical existence is 'life', which in turn determines 'consciousness'. Ideology conceals the contradictions within modes of production (e.g. unjust wages for socially valuable manual work), so that the oppressed will not have their consciousness opened to the need to transform reality. The criticism of ideology can free the consciousness of the oppressed classes from the dominant ideology, so that their new consciousness can come out of revolutionary practice. Marx did not say under what conditions such criticism was possible. The Leninist and Communist response was that within the proletarian class, the Party was conscious of its own history and created a competing ideology by its political and educational work. Lenin believed that historical conflicts passed through new ideologies. *Liberation theologian Gustavo *Gutiérrez contrasts ideology to utopia, which is 'a condemnation of the existing order' and a commitment to a new social consciousness and new types of relationships based on hope in Christ given by God. In speaking to political, social and economic issues, Christian theology has to be careful not to become captive to any ideology.

See also: MARXISM AND CHRISTIANITY.

Bibliography

G. Gutiérrez, Essential Writings, ed. J. B. Nicholoff (New York, 1996); K. Mannheim, Ideology and Utopia: An Introduction to the Sociology of Knowledge (London, 1966); K. Marx and F. Engels, The German Ideology (London, 1998 [1846]); V. Westhelle, 'Ideology', in DEM.

C. A. E. MOSELEY

IDOLATRY

The word 'idolatry' literally means 'the worship of images', deriving from two Greek terms: eidōlon, image; and latreia, worship or service. In its broader sense, idolatry means giving worship to anyone or anything other than God, but it is often associated with the false worship of an idol or the divine as represented by an image.

Idolatry in historical theology

Early Christians confronted the issue of idolatry in both the iconoclasm of Judaism and their Hellenistic cultural context. As far as is known, Christian art did not develop until after the NT era. The earliest artworks by Christians were wall paintings in the Roman catacombs from about the third century, but the crucifixion was not a regular symbol until centuries later.

On the whole, theologians of the early church and patristic era attacked idolatry. *Justin Martyr rejected all worship of idols on the basis that they were lifeless images created by immoral artisans that could not capture God's nature. *Tertullian considered idolatry the gravest of sins because it encompassed all others, and *Augustine critiqued idolatry in City of God. In an oft-quoted argument, Pope *Gregory the Great prohibited the adoration of images yet maintained that illiterate people could learn from them, so he did not forbid their making.

In the eighth and ninth centuries, idolatry became a central matter of dispute in the *iconoclast controversies over the use of *images in Byzantine worship. Around 725, Emperor Leo III prohibited icons because they could not represent Christ's divinity and prevented the conversion of Jews and Muslims. The use of icons was defended by *John of Damascus and Theodore of Studios, and they were reinstated by Empress Irene. The Second Council of Nicaea affirmed the iconodule position in 787, allowing icons on the basis of Christ's incarnation and the notion that in venerating an image, one venerates the person represented. After Leo V reintroduced the proscription against icons, they were finally restored under Theodora in 843 and affirmed by the Fourth General Council of Constantinople in 869. Ever since, icons have held an important place in *Eastern Orthodox worship.

Medieval theology drew a distinction between latria, worship due only to God, and dulia, veneration of the Virgin *Mary and the saints. *Thomas Aquinas regarded idolatry as unduly giving 'divine honour to a creature' (Summa Theologica, 2.2, 92.2, London, 1922, p. 172). The Protestant *Reformers of the sixteenth century, however, believed that the theology and worship of the church had been corrupted, and many of them called into question the place of images within worship, though they were far from uniform in their opinions.

In contrast to *Karlstadt's radical iconoclasm in Wittenberg, *Luther was more moderate. He allowed for images as long as they were not worshipped, stating that they were 'neither evil nor good, we may have them or not, as we please' (H. Lehmann [ed.], Luther's Works, vol. 51, Philadelphia, 1959, p. 86). Meanwhile, *Zwingli and *Calvin, in Zurich and Geneva respectively, held more strict positions, asserting that images were forbidden by Scripture and inevitably lead to idolatrous worship (see *Reformed theology). In addition, Calvin challenged the church to teach the uneducated better, rejected the distinction between latria and dulia, and restricted artistic representation to things 'which the eyes are capable of seeing' (John T. McNeill [ed.], Institutes of the Christian Religion, 1.xi.12, London, 1960, p. 112). In its articulation of the Catholic Counter-*Reformation, the Council of Trent reaffirmed the veneration of images.

Idolatry in systematic theology

Theological reflection upon the Christian understanding of and opposition to idolatry considers scriptural prohibitions from the OT, notably the first and second commandments (Exod. 20:3–6; Deut. 5:7–10) and narratives or prophetic warnings about the temptation to worship idols (Exod. 32; Judg. 8:22–27; Ps. 115:4–8; Isa. 44:6–20; Jer. 51:17–18), as well as NT admonitions concerning actual and metaphorical idolatry (Acts 17:16–31; 19:23–41; Rom. 1:22–23; 1 Cor. 8:4; 10:14; Gal. 5:19–21; Eph. 5:5; Col. 3:5; 1 Thess. 1:9; 1 John 5:21; Rev. 21:8). At the same time, the NT affirmations of God's self-revelation in the incarnate person of Jesus Christ (John 1:14; Phil. 2:5–11) and the declaration that Christ is the *image of God (2 Cor. 4:4; Col. 1:15–20; Heb. 1:3) have been interpreted to counter opposition to the use of images within *worship and to demonstrate true worship.

Idolatry is related to several theological doctrines: God's freedom and unrepresentable nature; *creation, in particular the juxtaposition of divine creation ex nihilo with human creativity; *Christology, regarding the implications of the *incarnation of Christ for the material world; pneumatology, concerning the inspiring presence of the *Holy Spirit; *ecclesiology, especially the legitimacy and function of images within worship; and *ethics, particularly questions related to artistic activity.

Bibliography

S. C. Barton (ed.), Idolatry: False Worship in the Bible, Early Judaism and Christianity (London and New York, 2007); G. K. Beale, We Become What We Worship: A Biblical Theology of Worship (Downers Grove, 2008); W. Brueggemann, Israel's Praise: Doxology against Idolatry and Ideology (Philadelphia, 1988); W. A. Dyrness, Reformed Theology and Visual Culture: The Protestant Imagination from Calvin to Edwards (Cambridge, 2004); C. M. N. Eire, War against the Idols: The Reformation of Worship from Erasmus to Calvin (Cambridge, 1986); P. C. Finney, The Invisible God: The Earliest Christians on Art (New York and Oxford, 1997); T. Hart, 'Protestantism and the Arts', in A. McGrath and D. Marks (eds.), The Blackwell Companion to Protestantism (Oxford, 2004); G. E. Thiessen (ed.), Theological Aesthetics: A Reader (Cambridge and Grand Rapids, 2004); R. Viladesau, Theological Aesthetics: God in Imagination, Beauty, and Art (New York and Oxford, 1999).

D. W. McNUTT

IGNATIUS OF LOYOLA (1491–1556)

Ignatius, a Spaniard, was the founder of the Society of Jesus (*Jesuits). Following his conversion from a military career to a determination to be a soldier of Christ, Ignatius went into retreat at Manresa (1522–23), and his meditations and mystical experiences at that time formed the basis for his Spiritual Exercises, which were complete by 1535 and became the major instrument in forming Jesuit *spirituality thereafter. It is in the Exercises that Ignatius' spiritual theology comes to clearest expression.

The Exercises provide instructions for a month of intensive, supervised retreat, with the object especially of discovering and committing oneself to God's particular will for one's life, or of renewing such a commitment. Following the fundamental meditations on the Kingdom of Christ and the Two Standards, in which the exercitant receives the call of Christ the King to enlist in his service in the battle against Satan, the Exercises focus on contemplation of the gospel history of Jesus, through which the exercitant encounters the living Christ and commits himself to discipleship following Christ's way of service to God and victory through the cross. Ignatius' spirituality is primarily one of service through love, in which, out of his realization of Christ's love for him, the Christian always asks, 'What more can I do for Christ?'

See also: REFORMATION, CATHOLIC COUNTER-

Bibliography

P. Caraman, Ignatius Loyola: A Biography of the Founder of the Jesuits (San Francisco, 1990); W. Meissner, Ignatius of Loyola: The Psychology of a Saint (New Haven, 1992); N. W. O'Malley, The First Jesuits (Cambridge, MA, 1993); H. Rahner, Ignatius the Theologian (London, 1968).

R. J. BAUCKHAM

IMAGE OF GOD

According to Gen. 1:26–27, men and women are both created 'in the image and likeness of God', a feature which distinguishes them from other creatures. In 1 Cor. 11:7–9 the apostle Paul elaborates on this by saying that the male is in 'the image and glory of God', but the female is 'the glory of the male'. This statement does not diminish the position of women or make them inferior to men, but explains that the image of God in them must be understood in relation to the image in men, for 'the head of the female is the male' (1 Cor. 11:3).

The Hebrew words šelem and dēmūt, translated into Greek respectively as eikon and homoousios, seem to have referred initially to statues put up to represent a king or governor. If this was the meaning intended in Genesis, the terms would imply that human beings have been appointed as God's representatives on earth, which would tie in with the statement that they have been given dominion over the creatures. This theme has always had a place in Christian theology, though the rediscovery of the original context in modern times has made it more prominent in recent theological thinking. Attempts have sometimes been made to differentiate the meaning of the two words, but nowadays it is generally accepted that in theological terms they are synonymous and refer to a single reality.

It must be said, however, that this was not the case in the early church, which regarded the image and the likeness as two quite different things. The general opinion was that the likeness of God had been lost at the *fall but that the image had been retained. By making this distinction, the Fathers were able to do justice to the divine qualities still present in the human race without diminishing the catastrophic effects of the fall. It was only in the sixteenth century, as the study of Hebrew revived, that theologians came to realize that the two terms were virtually identical. This meant that a new explanation of the effect of the fall had to be devised. Some theologians claimed that the image/likeness had been lost by Adam and Eve, but the majority held to an intermediate position, saying that the image was still present in fallen man though severely wounded, corrupted or ruined. In effect, this allowed them to reappropriate the patristic inheritance, and their interpretation still enjoys a wide currency today.

In recent times it has been pointed out that the term 'image of God' occurs infrequently in the Bible, a fact which has led some theologians to question its overall importance. However, as has often been pointed out, the phrase occurs at significant moments and its substance underlies virtually everything in Scripture, even when it is not mentioned specifically. Today most theologians regard it as fundamental for a Christian *anthropology, and the image of God remains a prominent theme in modern theological discussion. It has a particular relevance to questions relating to evolutionary theories, because of the implication that the human race is somehow fundamentally different from the animals. It is also important in the study of psychology because it asserts that we have a special relationship with the divine which seems to go beyond the purely physical aspect of human nature. The result is that the precise meaning of the term is a matter of debate among specialists in those disciplines as well as among theologians.

Given the doctrine's history, it is odd to note that nowhere in the Bible is there any suggestion that the 'image and likeness of God' suffered in any way from the fall of Adam. On the contrary, the prohibition against killing human beings in Gen. 9:5–6 is justified by appealing to our creation in God's image, and the same principle is invoked in Jas 3:8–9, where Christians are told not to curse other people because they have been created in the likeness of God. The image therefore appears to retain its power and authority even in fallen human beings. If this is so, there is no objective difference between the humanity of believers and that of unbelievers, both of whom continue to share the creation mandate.

The early Christians were impressed by the fact that the image of God appeared to be what distinguishes human beings from other creatures, and they were therefore inclined to identify it with the rational soul, which they regarded as something uniquely human and even intrinsically divine. This equation led *Augustine to suggest that the image of God was an image of the Trinity, and he proceeded to find a tripartite element in the human mind. This he described as ‘being, knowing and willing’ and as ‘memory, intelligence and act(ion)’, but either way, the inner processes of the mind were held to reflect the character and constitution of the triune God. Interestingly, Augustine’s reflections on this are still taken seriously today and he is sometimes hailed as the virtual founder of modern psychology.

Interesting as such theories are, there is no scriptural evidence for them and there are serious objections to them. For example, the equation of the image with the rational soul might lead some people to think that less intelligent or mentally handicapped people have ceased to be fully human (and might therefore be suitable candidates for euthanasia). It might also suggest that intellectuals are closer to God than others, and that Christians are more intelligent than non-believers. For all these reasons, theologians since the sixteenth century have preferred to locate the image of God elsewhere. Rather than focus on a particular part of human nature, they have generally preferred to see the whole man as created in the image of God, including even the body, which must also reflect the divine presence. The means by which the image is made known is the moral and spiritual awareness which human beings possess and which is not directly related to intelligence. As moral awareness was corrupted by the fall but not removed, it chimed in with *Calvin’s understanding of the image very well. This view is still found today, particularly (though not exclusively) in theologically conservative circles.

The spiritual dimension is more complex because it raises the question of whether the faith-relationship which Christians have with God can be regarded as a (partial?) restoration of the image which was lost or corrupted by sin. Though some have held this view, there is no biblical warrant for it and it creates a divide between Christians and others, including Jews, which is unwarranted by the evidence. However, the spiritual nature of human beings is expressed in the fact that all people, believers and unbelievers alike, have an inbuilt relationship with God. This relationship went wrong at the fall but it was not destroyed, and now every human being must take responsibility for it. In other words, creation in the image and likeness of God gives meaning to *sin and *guilt, which would not exist if we did not have to answer to God for our thoughts and behaviour. The image of God may thus be understood as the human capacity for relationship(s), which reflects the divine character but is not present elsewhere in creation. In this sense it comes close to the concept of ‘person’, and in recent years theologians have been exploring the extent to which the two terms can be regarded as synonymous.

The personal and relational nature of the divine image has naturally led to a new focus on the social or *covenantal dimension which the term is believed to express. According to this, human beings have been created for community, so the image of God cannot be regarded as primarily an individual possession. It is given to individuals, of course, but only in order to establish them in relationships for which they must take responsibility. Our primary relationship is with God in Jesus Christ, who on this view becomes the archetypal image of God (as in the theology of Karl *Barth), but the image has implications for all human relationships, which are established and maintained in and by Christ, the true image of the divine. Furthermore, our behaviour towards other people must reflect the fact that they too are created in the image of God, so that if we mistreat them we show disrespect to him.

This communitarian emphasis ties in very well with the concept of dominion (see *Creation) over the earth, which is given to the entire human race and not to a particular individual. It underscores the belief that all human beings are equal to each other and therefore entitled to a fair share of the world’s goods. It has the added advantage of being close to the original meaning of the word in Hebrew and can therefore be represented as a return to the biblical standpoint. Practically speaking, however, this approach has difficulty in coming to terms with the effects of the fall, which has distorted the pattern of human and divine relationships in ways which will not be put right until the end of time, when the entire creation will be renewed and restored.

Today, the concept of the image of God continues to have an important bearing on theological anthropology, particularly where ethical questions of life and death are concerned. Is a foetus, for example, created in the image of God? Does this belief make euthanasia murder, and perhaps even blasphemy? Would a cloned human being be made in God's image, and if not, what difference would that make? These questions and others like them have ensured that the question of the image of God is now at the interface of religious belief and modern science (see *Faith and science) and promises that there will be considerable discussion of what it really means in the foreseeable future.

See also: RIGHTS, HUMAN.

Bibliography

D. R. Alexander, Cloning Humans: Distorting the Image of God? (Cambridge, 2001); K. E. Børresen, Image of God: Gender Models in Judaeo-Christian Tradition (Minneapolis, 1995); G. L. Bray, 'The Significance of God's Image in Man', TynB 42, pp. 195–225; J. A. Clanton, In Whose Image? God and Gender (London, 1990); D. Keyes, Beyond Identity: Finding Yourself in the Image and Character of God (Carlisle, 1998); V. Lossky, In the Image and Likeness of God (New York, 1985); R. Ruston, Human Rights and the Image of God (London, 2004).

G. L. BRAY

IMAGES

Christian traditions differ substantially in their attitudes and practices with regard to the use of images and more generally the arts (see *Aesthetics) in Christian worship and life. Well-established pre-modern Christian traditions (Eastern Orthodox, Roman Catholic, to a certain extent Anglican and to a lesser degree Oriental churches) have used arts in Christian worship. They make use of a wide range of artistic expressions such as icons and frescoes; sculptures, woodcarving and monumental art (including architecture, mosaics, stained-glass work, floor-patterns, cross features); banners and symbolic colours, textiles and gestures; lights and smells; hymnody, a cappella singing and instrumental music; liturgical reading and dramatic expressions. Reformed, evangelical, holiness and radical Christian movements are much more constrained in drawing on artistic forms in worship.

In the context of cultures saturated by symbolic images of deities, the use of any representations of humans, animals or plants, whether carved or painted, had been prohibited by the Torah (Exod. 20:4–5). In other parts of the Hebrew Scriptures, however, images are mentioned and used by Hebrew heroes of faith (Moses in Num. 21:9; the Ark of the Covenant with the cherubim in Exod. 25:18–22; artistic decoration of Solomon's temple in 1 Kgs 6:18–35, etc.). In the intertestamental period, for pious Palestinian Jews, worshipping or venerating any material creation was idolatry – serving the creature rather than the creator. But, as the lively mosaic decorations of Jewish synagogues testify, the code was much less stricter in the diaspora.

While growing out of the Jewish spiritual matrix and synagogue patterns of worship, Christianity adapted its message to the diverse contexts of the expanding missionary outreach to the Gentiles. The early churches transferred their base from a Jewish minority, with a stricter code regarding images in worship and daily living, to a largely Gentile majority and its cultural patterns. Apart from the influence of Hellenistic culture on the development of early Christian worship, the use of images in worship can be seen also as a deliberate departure from Jewish ways. Images constituted a visible theological expression of a new and broader perspective on God and humanity and a moving away from all things Jewish. 'To the orthodox [in the later iconoclastic controversies], an iconoclast was simply one with a Jewish mind . . .' (J. Pelikan, The Christian Tradition, p. 201).

While there is no direct mention of imagery in the NT or in early Christian writing, there is sufficient evidence of its use in Christian worship practices from the paintings in catacombs, church mosaics and sarcophagi, some of which date from the late second century. The earliest Christian visual art had a symbolic and didactic rather than aesthetic function. After the period of persecutions of Christians in the Roman Empire was over, sacred images came to play an ever-increasing part in the church's spiritual practices. In the west of Europe the appropriation of images also embraced the use of statues. From the time of *Constantine 'the Great', Christian artistic expressions were looked upon as an evidence for Christianity being victorious. The artistic paraphernalia of the cathedrals served as an encyclopaedic display of theology, history, hagiography, morality, natural history, learning, crafts and trades.

The disproportionate use of images both in worship, in monasteries and in the private lives of Christian communities in the Byzantine Empire, as well as the pressure from the widespread popular movements hostile to the use of images (such as the *Monophysites, Paulicians and Bogomilians, and also Islam, which diminished the human side of the incarnation), led to the notorious *iconoclastic controversy that lasted for more than a century (726–843). The opponents of icons saw them as unscriptural and as a chief obstacle to missionary witness among the Jews and Moslems, and unleashed systematic persecutions against image-users, particularly against the monks who were the most zealous defenders of icons. In the West the opposition to the use of artistic expressions in the churches was almost non-existent.

The proponents of the use of sacred images claimed a fuller hold on the theological significance of the *incarnation: God had become visible by taking human nature. The high Christology of Col. 1.15–20 speaks of Christ as the image (icon) of the invisible God, having in himself the full nature of God and yet in truly human form. From this perspective, it was argued, there should not be any obstacle to the use of images of humans and of living nature, nor to the artistic creativity of humanity in the service of the true worship of God. The champions of the veneration of icons (monastic communities, *John of Damascus, Theodore of Studios and later *Thomas Aquinas) used the Christological argument of incarnation to carry on their theological apologia. The patristic backing for this position was found in the works of the Cappadocian Fathers, particularly of *Basil ‘the Great’ (of Caesarea), who thought that the honour paid to the image passed on to its prototype. So the use of icons is not worship of an image but an honour to and adoration of the archetype.

Due to the abuses which had grown up around the worshipping of icons and human objects (relics) in the Latin Church, the Protestant *Reformers, particularly the Swiss wing of the Reformation, fiercely opposed the use of images. They were followed in this by English Puritans and the descendants of the *Radical Reformation. The gradual turn from mystery to reason, alongside the Protestant and later the evangelical theological concern for the primacy of the biblical text (sola Scriptura), coupled with the widespread use of printing technologies in the early modern period, firmly established the pre-eminence of a word-centred means of worship in Protestant and evangelical communities – at the expense of non-verbal and artistic forms. There are, however, signs that this is changing. Current discussions about the relationship of creativity and imagination to spirituality are part of a larger debate about the relationship of theology to the arts and spiritual expressions of cultures.

See also: WORSHIP.

Bibliography

J. Begbie (ed.), Behold the Glory: Incarnation through the Arts (Grand Rapids, 2001); L. W. Hurtado, At the Origins of Christian Worship: The Context and Character of Earliest Christian Devotion (Carlisle, 1999); R. P. Martin, Worship in the Early Church (London, 1964); J. W. McClendon, Jr, Witness: Systematic Theology, vol. 3 (Nashville, 2000); L. Ouspensky and V. Lossky, The Meaning of Icons (Crestwood, 1999); J. Pelikan, The Christian Tradition: A History of the Development of Doctrine, vol. 2 (Chicago, 1974).

P. R. PARUSHEV

IMAGINATION IN THEOLOGY

Imagination has long been an orphan in Western philosophy and theology. *Plato disqualified all image-making activity as intrinsically deceptive: imaging pictures what is not really there, yielding neither knowledge nor truth. The King James Version of the Bible (1611) does not help matters by speaking of the imagination of the human heart as evil (Gen. 6:5; 8:21) and of those who fail to honour God as becoming ‘vain in their imaginings’ (Rom. 1:21).

The rehabilitation of imagination

In his Critique of Judgment (1790) *Kant distinguished the ability to picture images of things no longer there (the ‘reproductive’ imagination) from the ability to create order and unity – a sense of wholeness – out of diverse and unrelated experiences and ideas (the ‘productive’ imagination). The imagination here appears, like reason, as a cognitive faculty. Where reason explains the working of the world by means of scientific laws, however, the special remit of the imagination is to think in terms of relating parts to wholes. Science and logic think in the necessary terms of causality and inference, but the imagination thinks in terms of teleology, in terms of meaningful wholes.

*Schleiermacher linked the imagination to *aesthetic and religious feelings, in particular, to the taste for the infinite and the sense of dependence on the absolute. Theology is imaginative in the bad sense when it projects an image of some human ideal onto the heavens and calls it 'God'. Here aesthetic invention is *idolatrous and, as such, susceptible to *Feuerbach's critique that theology is really only *anthropology.

The imagination's stock has risen considerably in the eyes of philosophers thanks to its association with creative language. Indeed, the imagination comes into its own only when we consider its verbal rather than pictorial application. P. *Ricoeur argues that metaphors have a cognitive rather than a merely cosmetic function because they are paradigm instances of semantic innovation: metaphors redescribe reality, enabling us to explore unfamiliar territory in terms of the more familiar (e.g. light as wave or particle). Metaphors with staying power become scientific models, pictures that orient our thinking (e.g. the universe as mechanism; God as Father). Jesus' parables, to take another example, describe the kingdom of God in terms of ordinary life. Yet Jesus' imaginative lessons subverted the worldview of his hearers, redescribing reality not to gain scientific knowledge of its surface features, but to awaken hearts to its eschatological depths.

Narratives are another species of creative language that do more than convey information. Narratives 'configure' a series of events into a meaningful whole; they explain by 'emplotting' (Ricoeur). M. Nussbaum has made a compelling case for appreciating the unique contribution that literature can make in ethics, arguing that literary form is not separable from content, but an integral part of the search for and statement of truth.

To generalize: Where reason analyses and breaks things (and texts) up into their constituent parts, imagination synthesizes, making connections between things that otherwise appear unrelated.

Imagination and the Bible

D. Kelsey's Proving Doctrine: The Uses of Scripture in Recent Theology shows that it is not enough to affirm biblical authority; one must decide how to use the Bible (see *Scripture) in formulating and justifying doctrine. Kelsey argues that every theologian makes an 'imaginative construal', deciding to read the Bible as evinced a certain kind of wholeness (e.g. history, universal truth, myth, story, etc.).

Yet the difference between true religion and idolatry depends on grasping patterns in Scripture that are God-given rather than man-made. A Christian conception of the imagination will distinguish vain imaginings (mere human projections) from the virtuous imaginings in the Bible (divine *accommodations) that render the truth of the gospel in a variety of literary forms and canonical colours.

It takes imagination rightly to grasp the way in which God presents himself in and through the medium of the biblical texts. What faith hears in Scripture is neither a philosophy nor a system of morality but a gospel: good news from God about what God has done. The various books of the Bible comprise a vast theodrama, a divine comedy in which the triune God has the leading part and in which the plot advances via God's words and God's acts.

Theological interpretation and the theodramatic imagination

Beyond analytic exegesis, reading Scripture theologically further requires imagination, the faculty which makes sense of things, locating particular bits and pieces within larger patterns. Moreover, to the extent that theology serves a way of life, one needs the imagination if one is to locate everyday reality within a biblical pattern, that is, if one is really going to indwell the world of the biblical text. To live in such a way that the biblical world is one's primary interpretative framework is an imaginative, practical, and spiritual enterprise.

Ultimately, the theodramatic imagination discerns not only the pattern of meaningfulness in the Scriptures themselves (say, the typological connections between the old and new covenant persons and events) but the way in which the church's current situation fits into that same meaningful pattern. The church requires theodramatic imagination in order to see how it fits into the strange new (viz. eschatological) world of the Bible. Theology must not be content merely with stating truth, but must take every imagination captive to Scripture so that we can see, taste and judge the world as it is: made new in Christ.

Yes, there are vain imaginings. But this no more disqualifies the imagination from serving theology than the existence of logical fallacies disqualifies reason. A false picture of the imagination – as the power of conjuring up the unreal – has held us captive. We do more justice to the image of God in humanity and to the nature of Scripture itself when we view the imagination as the power of synoptic vision: the ability to synthesize heterogeneous elements into a meaningful pattern; the ability to see as whole what those without imagination see only as a meaningless jumble. Only those with an imagination nurtured from Scripture will discern theodramatic fittingness and so see God, the world and ourselves – as well as truth, goodness and beauty – as they really are, in light of their relation to the one in whom all things hold together: Jesus Christ.

See also: HERMENEUTICS; METHOD, THEOLOGICAL.

Bibliography

G. Green, Imagining God: Theology and the Religious Imagination (San Francisco, 1989); R. L. Hart, Unfinished Man and the Imagination (Freiburg, 1968); J. Hartt, Theological Method and Imagination (New York, 1977); J. McIntyre, Faith, Theology and Imagination (Edinburgh, 1987); M. Nussbaum, Love's Knowledge: Essays on Philosophy and Literature (Oxford, 1990); P. Ricœur, Figuring the Sacred: Religion, Narrative, and Imagination (Minneapolis, 1995); K. Vanhoozer, The Drama of Doctrine (Louisville, 2005); idem, Pictures at a Theological Exhibition: Scenes of the Church's Worship, Witness, and Wisdom (Downers Grove, 2016); M. Warnock, Imagination (London, 1975).

K. J. VANHOOZER

IMITATION OF CHRIST

The expression of this ideal of Christian discipleship has varied widely, and its meaning, possibility and validity have often been questioned. Yet whenever discipleship has been taken seriously, the ideal has re-emerged, prompting re-examination of its biblical foundation.

The imitation of Christ is implied throughout the Gospels and more explicitly taught in the epistles (cf. 1 Cor. 11:1; Phil. 2:5; Heb. 12:1–3; 1 Pet. 2:21; 1 John 2:6; 4:7–11). In Christian thought after the NT the theme can be traced from the *Apostolic Fathers onwards. Sometimes, as with *Francis of Assisi, it appears in literal form; more usually it features in devotion to the humanity of Christ in mystical theology. It continued in Catholicism after *Teresa of Avila as a theme of seventeenth-century French spirituality and inspired several later reformers and idealists, including Charles de Foucauld (1858–1916) and his heirs, the Little Brothers and Little Sisters of Jesus.

The work of this title, normally ascribed to Thomas à Kempis (i.e. from Kempen; c. 1380–1471), has had enormous appeal. Thomas was reared in the reforming piety of the Brethren of the Common Life, and spent his life in an Augustinian house near Zwolle. The title applies in fact only to the first chapter. The book as a whole is a guide to spiritual communion with God.

In Protestantism *Luther's difficulties with the doctrine have obscured *Calvin's acceptance of it. Luther did not find in the distinctions made in medieval spirituality between active and passive imitations of Christ a proper reflection of biblical teaching on *grace and *union with Christ. Declaring, 'It is not imitation that makes sons, but son-ship that makes imitators', Luther preferred to speak of conformity to Christ. He also emphasized individual Christian vocation against ideals of any fixed pattern of imitation, such as the *monastic life or the literal approach adopted by many radical Reformers (see *Reformation, Radical).

Despite Luther's influence, the ideal surfaced again whenever people like William Law or *Kierkegaard recalled believers to serious discipleship. Interpretation of the imitation of Christ in twentieth-century Protestant theology may be described as the combining of a partial assimilation of Kierkegaard and a reaction against *Schleiermacher and his successors for appearing to stress Christ the example at the expense of Christ the redeemer. This produced either significant yet unfinished movements towards a fresh understanding (*Bonhoeffer); qualified approval (*Barth); or rejection (*Bultmann).

Much recent NT exegesis has tended to play down imitation of Christ, resolutely interpreting 'imitation' as 'following' and 'obedience' alone (cf. W. Michaelis, 'mimeomai', TDNT IV, pp. 659–674). It may, however, be asked how much such interpretation has been affected by agnosticism about the historical Jesus or presuppositions about the *existential nature of faith. In Bultmann's case these clearly involve an emphasis on the words rather than the actions of Jesus and a tendency to see Jesus' connection with the believer solely in terms of isolated individual responses to commands. This not only eliminates practice of the virtues in imitation of Christ, it also leaves almost no content to the idea of Christian character, a position unknown in traditional *moral theology. Removal of imitation of Christ from *ethics or its confinement to mystical theology or individual *spirituality is also challenged by *liberation theology. This maintains that the imitation and following of Jesus should take its place in systematic theology as a source of knowledge in *Christology, for 'It is the real following of Jesus that enables one to understand the reality of Jesus' (J. Sobrino).

Bibliography

R. A. Burridge, Imitating Jesus (Grand Rapids, 2007); E. Cothenet, Imitating Christ (St Meinrad, IN, 1974); J. M. Gustafson, Christ and the Moral Life (New York, 1968); E. Malatesta (ed.), Imitating Christ (Wheat-hampstead, 1974); C. A. Snyder, Following in the Footsteps of Christ: The Anabaptist Tradition (London, 2004); E. J. Tinsley, The Imitation of God in Christ (London, 1960).

P. N. HILLYER

IMMANENCE, see GOD

IMMORTALITY

The term 'immortality', in its straightforward sense, means not being subject to *death. Because it has been the destiny of all human beings so far to have lived that their lives come to an end, it might seem uncontentious to say that human beings are not immortal. By all outward appearances human beings die and their bodies decay. 'Ashes to ashes, dust to dust' is the phrase commonly used in affirmation of this reality. Despite appearances, however, many cultures and religious traditions have claimed that human beings are, after all, immortal. There are three main variants to this belief, namely, reincarnation, immortality of the soul, and the Christian belief in resurrection.

Reincarnation is the belief that the soul of a dead person re-enters the world in the body of some other living organism in order to be punished for former sins or to continue the journey toward perfection. Of the three main variants of belief in immortality, reincarnation has been the least influential in Western culture.

While some ancient cultures apparently believed in an afterlife consisting of the shadowy existence of a replica of the body, it has been more common in Western thought to assert the immortality of a disembodied soul. Classical Greek philosophy, with the notable exception of *Stoicism, advocated such a view. *Plato, for example, offered several arguments in favour of the claim that human beings possess a soul that, in virtue of its incorporeality, is not subject to death. In the Phaedo, Plato has Socrates assert that 'the soul is immortal and imperishable, and our souls will truly exist in another world'. According to this view, our essential individual identity is not subject to death, but persists beyond the body's demise. *Aristotle, while rejecting Plato's arguments, attributed the quality of immortality to our 'active intellect', but it remains unclear precisely what this involves.

In the Renaissance and Enlightenment periods the newly discovered arguments of Arabic scholars against the immortality of the soul prompted a resurgence of interest among Western thinkers. *Descartes considered the denial of an immortal soul to be a grave error that would lead the individual from the paths of virtue. Like his Greek philosophical forebears, Descartes rested his belief in immortality on the independence of the soul from the body and upon its immateriality. David *Hume, by contrast, considered belief in immortality to be no more than wishful thinking, and offered a number of arguments in favour of the finality of death. The doctrine of immortality was defended by Immanuel *Kant, however, who claimed that immortality is a necessary postulate of practical reason. Without such a doctrine our sense of moral obligation would lack a coherent intellectual basis.

On account of Christianity's extensive interaction with the Greek philosophical tradition, the *dualistic thinking seen in Plato and Descartes has sometimes passed over into Christian thought. A dualistic conception of the human condition is evident in the Westminster Confession, for example, which in chapter XXXII reads, 'The bodies of men, after death, return to dust, and see corruption: but their souls, which neither die nor sleep, having an immortal subsistence, immediately return to God . . .'

A dualistic anthropology of this kind is theologically dubious. A stronger case can be made, both biblically and theologically, for a holistic conception of the person as a psychosomatic unity. Nor can Christian theology endorse the view that immortality is an intrinsic property of the soul or that survival of death is the natural outcome of human existence. God alone is immortal by nature, whereas God's creatures are finite and subject to death. Originating with *Athanasius (De Incarnatione 3–4), there has been some debate about whether human mortality is a consequence of the *fall or whether human beings even in their pre-lapsarian state were destined to die. Whatever one's view on that question, mortality is evidently a characteristic of our post-lapsarian human condition.

Christian faith holds that death is overcome through the *resurrection of Jesus Christ. The term 'immortality' has in this context been used to indicate that the death that we surely die is not the last word for those who live in Christ. The power of God to give life where there was none yet remains, and this, rather than the inherent immortality of the soul, is what is affirmed through Christian faith in the resurrection of the dead. Thus, the immortality that it may be possible to affirm theologically is not a natural property of human life, but is dependent on one's life in God. The 'life everlasting', affirmed in Scripture and in the Apostle's Creed, is a hope fulfilled only through the power of God to give new life to those who die in the Lord. It is further contended within Christian faith that death is the outcome of sin. Death can be overcome, therefore, only to the extent that *sin is overcome. Just because the soul is affected by sin, so it has no immunity from death. The total human being, mind, body and soul, is plunged into the bondage of death and has no hope for life beyond death except through the grace and mercy of God.

Whether the eternal life brought about through resurrection, and beginning with baptism, should be seen as a species of immortality has been a moot point in Christian tradition. With careful qualification one might speak of immortality as the outcome of resurrection, so that those who were once subject to death are no longer so, but the common use of the term immortality to designate a natural capacity to survive death encourages a more explicit distinction between immortality and resurrection. That is the view taken by Oscar Cullman, in a 1958 monograph on the subject, and more recently by Murray Harris and Jürgen

*Moltmann. Refuting the underlying dualism in the doctrine of the immortal soul, it is argued that what Christian faith promises is not the avoidance of death by some incorruptible part of us, but the resurrection of those who are wholly given up to death. Cullmann contends that immortality and resurrection are mutually exclusive. If the soul is immortal, there is no need for a resurrection, for the essential self does not die. Harris, while agreeing with Cullmann's basic point, is nevertheless willing to say that those who die in the Lord are raised to immortality. The Christian hope for life beyond death is grounded, not in anthropology, but in theology, not in assertions about the immortal nature of the soul, but in the love and mercy of the God who raised Jesus from the dead.

Bibliography

O. Cullmann, Immortality of the Soul or Resurrection of the Dead? (London, 1958); M. Harris, Raised Immortal: Resurrection and Immortality in the New Testament (Grand Rapids, 1985); J. Moltmann, 'The Immortality of the Soul or the Resurrection of the Body?' in The Coming of God: Christian Eschatology (ET, London, 1996).

M. A. RAE

IMPASSIBILITY, see GOD

IMPASSIBILITY OF GOD AND HUMAN SUFFERING

Impassibility is that divine attribute whereby *God is said not to experience inner emotional changes of state, whether enacted freely from within or affected by his relationship to and interaction with human beings and the created order. More specifically, impassibility denies that God can experience suffering and pain, and thus does not have feelings that are analogous to human feelings. Divine impassibility follows upon his immutability, in that, since God is changeless and unchangeable, his inner emotional state cannot change from joy to sorrow or from delight to suffering. Within contemporary theology and philosophy this divine attribute is frequently denied, the argument being that if God is impassible, he is then utterly devoid of love, mercy and compassion.

Biblical foundation

The Bible does not address the philosophical question of whether or not God is impassible. Nonetheless, within the OT, God reveals through his immanent actions within time and history that he is personal and loving. He is the one God who is Saviour, Creator and Sanctifier. These very same immanent divine acts also reveal that God transcends all else that exists, that is, he does not exist in the same manner as created reality. He is completely 'other', and so cannot be numbered among all else that exists. Thus, God is present and active within the created order of time and history as the one who, as the 'Wholly Other', transcends it, in that he exists distinct from and outside of the created order of time and history. Such revelation is the biblical basis for God's impassibility.

Because God exists in a manner unlike the manner in which creatures exist, God reveals himself, unlike creatures, to be wholly perfect. While creatures undergo change, and human beings, in particular, undergo emotional changes of state, God, because he is perfect, does not change and so does not undergo emotional changes of state either, that is, he is impassible. Therefore, he is unchangeably perfect in his passionate love.

Within this OT context, God, nonetheless, is seen as displaying a variety of emotions, such as groaning, suffering, anger and grieving. The traditional defence for God's impassibility, in the light of such passages, was to argue that the OT is using anthropomorphic language (see *Accommodation), and so cannot be taken literally. Therefore, God does not literally 'groan', 'suffer' or 'grieve'. While the OT is undoubtedly using anthropomorphic language, yet it is nonetheless attempting to say something that is actually true about God. The very superlative, extravagant, and even excessive, expression of the love, the compassion, the forgiveness and, indeed, the anger, accentuates that the one who displays all of this intense passion is someone who transcends what is beyond the merely customary and human. The Lord is 'God and not mortal'.

The Christian tradition

While the Fathers of the church inherit the term impassibility from Greek philosophy, they nonetheless interpret it, for the most part, from within a biblical understanding of God's transcendence. Because God differs from created reality, in that he is eternal and incorruptible, *Justin Martyr professes that Christians dedicate themselves to the 'impassible God' (Apologia, 1:13). Similarly, *Irenaeus argues that because God as Creator is unchangeably perfect, he is impassible (Adversus Haereses, 2:12, 1; 2:17, 3; 8). *Tertullian states that because God is eternal, and thus outside of time, he does not change or suffer (Adversus Marcionem, 1:3; 8). Yet, precisely because God is perfectly and unchangeably good, Tertullian holds that creatures experience this goodness in differing manners – anger toward sinners and mercy toward the repentant (Adversus Marcionem, 2:13). *Origen holds that one cannot interpret literally those passages which speak of God being subject to any humanlike emotion, for 'God must be believed to be entirely without passion and destitute of all these emotions' (De Principiis, 2:4, 4). Nonetheless, because the Father is moved by our sinful plight, Origen can also state that 'the Father is not impassible' (In Ezechielem Homiliae, 6:6). Origen is not contradicting himself. God is impassible in the sense that he does not undergo emotional changes of state, but he is not impassible in the sense that he is devoid of passionate love. It is precisely because of his unchanging and abiding all-consuming love that he comes to our aid. In attributing impassibility to God, then, the Fathers of the church are primarily denying of him anything that would place him within the changeable created order, which might suggest he could undergo emotional changes of state. Moreover, in their denial, they wish to enhance the absolute perfection of God's unchanging passionate love.

*Thomas Aquinas discusses God's impassibility within the context of perfect love. Because God's love is fully actualized, unlike the love of human beings, all facets of his love are similarly fully actualized. This love embraces goodness, kindness, mercy, compassion, justice, admonition, anger, correction, etc. God need not undergo passible changes in order lovingly to reprimand the sinner or be lovingly merciful to the repentant. Thus, God is merciful and compassionate, not in the sense that he 'feels' pain or suffering, but in the sense that his perfect love embraces those who suffer. His mercy is primarily expressed by acting to alleviate the cause of the suffering, something that even compassionate human beings are often unable to do. For Aquinas, God's omnipotence is ultimately expressed in his mercy, the alleviation of sin and death, and in the outpouring of grace and the bestowal of eternal life. The theologians of the later Middle Ages as well as the great theologians of the Reformation, such as Luther and Calvin, continued to uphold this common Christian biblical and theological tradition concerning God's impassibility.

Contemporary issues

From the later part of the nineteenth century to the present the majority of Christian theologians have come to deny the universal and continuous Christian tradition that God is impassible by specifically asserting that God must suffer. There are three reasons for this radical shift.

(1) The experience of immense *suffering within the world, especially as exemplified in the *Holocaust and similar horrendous events, ardently yearns for the consolation of knowing that God suffers in solidarity with those who unjustly suffer. An impassible God, it is asserted, is aloof to human suffering and thus indifferent.

(2) The Bible bears witness to a passible and so suffering God. As seen above, within the OT God is said to suffer with, on behalf of and because of his people. Moreover, through the incarnation, the Son of God must not only suffer as man but also as God. Equally in the crucifixion the Son not only suffers the loss of his Father, but the Father equally suffers the loss of his Son.

(3) Contemporary philosophy, as specifically exemplified in process philosophy, has fostered the notion that God's immanence within the world and its history demands that he changes and develops in relation to the world and its history (see *Philosophy and theology). Thus he experiences time and changeable emotional states such as suffering.

In response to this denial of God's impassibility, a number of points can be made. As seen above, to say that God is impassible is not a positive statement affirming that God is static, inert and lifeless, and so aloof and indifferent. Rather, it is a denial of those 'human' characteristics, such as change and corruptibility, or sinful passions, such as unjust anger and lust, that would make him less than fully loving. God is impassible precisely because he need not undergo passible changes of state that would make him more loving. God is pure and perfect love fully and dynamically actualized.

Because God possesses all his attributes fully actualized, he cannot suffer the loss of any these perfect goods and so he cannot experience the suffering due to their loss. If God did suffer, not only would his love not be perfect, but his love would also not be entirely altruistic and beneficent in the face of human suffering. He would now act so as relieve his own suffering.

While God is immanent within the world, he is immanent as the one who is wholly other than the world. Thus, while God is in the midst of evil, the evil of the created order does not reverberate back into his divine being and so cause him to suffer. If God did suffer, it would mean that he was a member of the created order, not the Creator, thus, as a suffering member of that order, would himself need to be freed from evil. He would no longer be the omnipotent God of mercy who could act so as to surmount the causes of suffering such as sin, death and damnation. Divine impassibility protects the biblical notion of God.

Similarly, a number of points can be made with regard to the suffering of Jesus. The church's doctrinal understanding of the *incarnation demands that, since the divine Son of God actually existed as man, all human attributes could truly be predicated of him. The Son of God as man hungered, cried, suffered and died; however, within his divine nature he remained impassible. In wanting to assert that the Son of God, within his incarnate state, suffers as God, contemporary theologians rob the incarnation of its authentic salvific value. What is important is that the Son of God experiences authentic human suffering in an authentic human manner and not that he experiences human suffering in a mitigated divine manner. It is the Son of God as man who offers his human life to the Father as a sacrifice for sin that is salvific. On the cross the Son of God as man may humanly experience being forsaken by the Father, but he equally trusts that he is not so forsaken and that the Father will come to his aid.

While Jesus, as the Son of God incarnate, is now gloriously risen from the dead, yet as head of his body, he continues to suffer in union with his body – the church. This is central to Paul's conversion experience. 'Saul, Saul, why do you persecute me? . . . I am Jesus, whom you are persecuting' (Acts 9:4–5; see 1 Cor. 12:26). This brings true consolation to human beings in the midst of their suffering, not that God suffers in his divine nature, but that Christ, who has conquered all evil, continues to suffer in union with his body so as to assure his people that they too will triumph with him. 'For as we share in Christ's sufferings, so through Christ we share abundantly in comfort too' (2 Cor. 1:5; see Rom. 8:17; Phil. 3:10; 1 Pet. 4:12; 5:1).

Bibliography

R. Bauckham, "Only the Suffering God Can Help": Divine Passibility in Modern Theology', Them 9, 1984, pp. 6–13; N. M. de S. Cameron (ed.), The Power and Weakness of God (Edinburgh, 1990); M. Dodds, The Unchanging God of Love (Fribourg, 1985); idem, 'Thomas Aquinas, Human Suffering, and the Unchanging God of Love', Theological Studies 52, 1991, pp. 330–344; P. Fiddes, The Creative Suffering of God (Oxford, 1990); T. E. Fretheim, The Suffering of God: An Old Testament Perspective (Philadelphia, 1984); R. Goetz, 'The Suffering God: The Rise of a New Orthodoxy', New Christian Century 103, 1986, pp. 385–389; G. Hanratty, 'Divine Immutability and Impassibility Revisited', in F. O'Rourke (ed.), At the Heart of the Real (Dublin, 1992); W. Hill, 'Two Gods of Love: Aquinas and Whitehead', Listening 14, 1979, pp. 249–265; John Paul II, Salvifici Doloris (1984); J. Lambrecht and R. F. Collins (eds.), God and Human Suffering (Louvain, 1990); J. Moltmann, The Crucified God (London, 1974); J. K. Mozley, The Impassibility of God: A Survey of Christian Thought (Cambridge, 1926); Thomas Aquinas, Summa Theologica, I.20; II–II:30 (New York, 1947); idem, Summa Contra Gentiles, I.89–91 (Garden City, 1955); T. G. Weinandy, Does God Suffer? (Edinburgh, 2000); H. R. Wheeler, Suffering, Human and Divine (New York, 1939).

T. G. WEINANDY

INCARNATION

Within *Christology (the doctrine of the person of Christ), the word 'incarnation' may be taken to refer particularly to the humanity of the Son of God. The word literally means 'enfleshment' and the idea that the Word or Son of God 'became flesh' appears most clearly in the NT in the Johannine literature (John 1:14; 1 John 4:2). While this focuses on the act or event of becoming flesh, the term is also used to refer to the resulting humanity of the divine Son or to his being as a human.

Since the Council of *Chalcedon (451), orthodoxy has always used the terminology it made official (see *Creeds), confessing the one 'Person' of Christ 'recognized in two natures' (divine and human) 'without confusion, without change, without division, without separation' (see *Hypostasis; *Substance). But more recently, while the term 'Person' is favoured in the current revival of *trinitarian thought, alternatives have been suggested to the term 'nature'. Recognizing that the Council intended to give certain parameters to be observed, ruling out unacceptable heresies rather than providing a positive and tight definition, it has been suggested, for example, that 'two natures' might be translated into 'two different terms of reference' (O'Collins). Some scholars have proposed that the NT suggests a lighter terminology, such as 'the divine identity of Jesus' (Bauckham) or divine presence 'in' or 'to' him (N. T. Wright).

Chalcedon was an attempt to accommodate the insistence of the *Antiochene theologians on the full humanity of Jesus within the insistence of the *Alexandrians that the one Person must not be divided. But full humanity requires that 'flesh' be understood (in opposition to *Apollinarianism) to include all aspects of humanity (particularly the intellectual and volitional dimensions) and not merely the physical, and modern Christology has been most concerned to emphasize, with the Antiochenes, Christ's full and true humanity.

Such an emphasis raises the question of whether, if Christ underwent the full range of human experiences, he was different from us in any way. Heb. 4:15 makes it clear that he 'has been tempted in every way – yet was without sin', while Paul speaks of his coming 'in the likeness of sinful man' (Rom. 8:3) or in 'human likeness' (Phil. 2:7). This has been taken to mean not that Christ was only 'like' a human being, but that he was a human being, only unlike us in the sense that sin was absent. Since *sin is held to be a defect in humanity and not something one has to have to be fully human, this is believed not to compromise his full humanity. Christ therefore was not different in that he was endowed with some superior 'religious' consciousness, but since divine and human, eternal and temporal existed together in him by virtue of the hypostatic union, he was different only in that he was God as a man.

Medieval theology wrestled with the idea of two different natures or realities co-existing in the same individual. How could two perfecta exist in the same place? Was there something about his humanity which added something to the pre-existent Son, and in that sense to God? Did the incarnation involve any risk to God? Was there even a possibility of the incarnate Son sinning against the Father? Cyril's doctrine of anhypostasia, which was affirmed at Chalcedon, asserted that the One Person (hypostasis) of the Word united to himself, not (an) to a distinct human person (hypostasis), but that human nature which was common to all. Later Leontius of Byzantium suggested the anhypostasia: that even though there was no second 'person' in Christ, the common human nature had its being in (en) the Person (hypostasis) of the Son of God.

The West resisted any idea that the humanity of Christ was 'nothing'. It was even demeaning to a perfect humanity to think that, even if there were something like two consciousnesses, they could be compared to two 'tracks' running (in Thomas Morris's model), one of which is not conscious of the information stored in the other, in which divine 'electrodes' were standing by ready to kick in should the one fail. Rather, as a man, Jesus grew to be supremely perfect, without sin, even if by nature sin was possible.

That of course is also a question. O'Collins thinks that it would demean the perfection of Christ's humanity if it were possible for him to veer from the path, and so he suggests that sin was only psychologically but not ontologically possible. Yet if God could suffer as a man, could he not also have sinned as a man? A perfect humanity needs to be tempted with a risk of falling if its overcoming is to be true. John 1:5 ('and the darkness has not overcome it') suggests that sin, suffering and even death were encountered by the God who was in Christ (2 Cor. 5:19), but that they did not enter into his being. *Duns Scotus' way was to insist that the humanity assumed by God was dependent on, but not overwhelmed by, the divine presence, as suggested by Col. 1:19 ('fullness indwelling').

One attempt to deal with the question of 'oneness and twoness' in Christ is *Thomas Aquinas's way of affirming the mystery by using the language of predication. 'It is truly the Son of God who truly is man and so suffers truly as man, but remained unaffected as God' (T. Weinandy, Does God Suffer?, p. 175). The union is such that, in the incarnation, God is man and suffers as man, not in a man; just as he did not turn into a man but acted as a man, not in a man, so immediate is the union. Similarly, *Barth, drawing on a long and honourable Christian *Platonist tradition, wrote how it was humanitas (humanity) not a homo (man) which is assumed. Yet with *William of Ockham he pointed out that Christ was a particular homo, not a universal humanitas who was dependent on God (as Duns Scotus agreed). An alternative would be to say that he is universal not as humanity, but because the Word or *Logos himself who identifies with that human being is the universal principle of everything, so that this particular man had universal significance.

Why did the incarnation happen? Would it have happened if there had been no sin in order that the one perfect creature should be shown to the world, or was it simply in order to remove sin? Did God already forgive humanity before sending his Son? Indeed, could God so love the world without having already forgiven it? Of course, the question is really about what happens to humanity, not to God, in God's reconciling of the world to himself. The notion that human beings are to grow up into Christ does not mean that as children they are innocent in nature only, needing a more perfect model to follow. The revelation of the divine Christ shines through the contradiction of sin and the need for *atonement.

Yet how did the incarnation happen? Given the principle of infinitum capax infiniti (the infinite is capable of the finite), but not vice versa, John 1:11 suggests enough of a compatibility between the Word and the human Jesus (according to Pannenberg), a full-blown self-emptying (kenosis as in Phil. 2:5–11), so that the pre-existent Word becomes limited and the humanity becomes 'Son' in being Father-centred. One should then speak of the 'obedience' of sonship as the overlap, coterminous with the obedience of faith (Rom. 16:26). Jesus did not lack personhood, but could be defined as being the Son to the Father in his living a life completely to God and in this way as fully obedient as Adam before the fall.

For the *Reformed tradition, there can be no loss of God's sovereignty in the incarnation. According to the doctrine sometimes known as the extra Calvinisticum, the Logos, while incarnate in Jesus of Nazareth, is also extra carnem, not contained in the flesh, but still upholding the universe. Thus Jesus is the Word and vice versa, because his humanity is elevated in the divinity rather than his divinity becoming lessened through kenosis* (see e.g. Karl Barth, CD IV.2.183). To this those who defend kenosis would argue that Jesus always had divine power, but that doing justice to a true humanity, let alone several biblical passages, demands that he was not always conscious of that power. Even if we think that Christ's kenosis reached down to the depths of hell, this was only a vision of the second death (see Rev. 20:14; 1 Pet. 3:22; 4:6; also Eph. 4:8–10). On the *descent to hell, *Bonaventura was not too far from *Calvin: 'In what concerns the pain of suffering, passio, Christ suffered more intensely in his sensibility. In what concerns the pain of co-suffering, compassio, he suffered more intensely in his spiritual nature. But the pain of his co-suffering was greater than the pain of suffering' (In III Sent Libros d.16, a.2). Christ was still divine even in the depths of his kenosis. What is essential to God is having the property of being omnipotent-unless-freely-and-temporarily-choosing-to-be-otherwise (S. Davis, 'Is Kenosis Orthodox?', in C. S. Evans [ed.], Exploring Kenotic Theology [Oxford, 2006]).

The post-Enlightenment problem was whether there could be such a thing as a metaphysical 'nature', whether divine or human. From Schleiermacher to some recent theologians, *Jesus was special because he was inspired to think, feel and act as a human dependent on God to the utmost degree. It is Jesus who needs to relate to the Father, not the Word who presumably is in touch with God the Father, and there cannot really be a relationship between two 'natures'. The Spirit draws Jesus to a realization of himself as the Word – into who he really is. The Spirit of God is present to Jesus in a complete, fully effective way, in a most intense manner. The uniqueness of Jesus is understood in terms of his vocation, mission, and appointment by God to be 'the firstborn of many'. Thus, Jesus was only the symbol of God and no metaphysical exchange took place. His uniqueness lay only in that to which he pointed, and Christ tells us only a little about who God is. Or, he is only the supreme instance of the paradox of grace given to all the saints (so John *Hick). With Karl *Rahner (Theological Investigations I), it all seems a bit much like a fusion of Spirit and spirit, especially when tied to his statement that the Word assumed all of human history, not just a 'static' humanity.

But as G. O'Collins has rightly said, a priori we do not know enough about God in order to rule that such a thing as incarnation is impossible. God coming to live as a human being in limitation and concreteness will always be a stumbling block.

Bibliography

K. Barth, CD IV.2; S. Davis, D. Kendall and G. O'Collins (eds.), The Incarnation (Oxford, 2002); C. S. Evans, The Historical Christ and the Jesus of Faith: The Incarnational Narrative as History (Oxford, 1996); J. Hick, The Metaphor of God Incarnate (London, 1993); T. Morris, The Logic of God Incarnate (Ithaca, 1986); G. O'Collins, Christology (Oxford, 1995); T. Weinandy, In the Likeness of Sinful Flesh: An Essay on the Humanity of Christ (Edinburgh, 1993); idem, Does God Suffer? (Notre Dame, 2000); N. T. Wright, Jesus and the Victory of God (London, 1996).

M. W. ELLIOTT

INDIAN CHRISTIAN THEOLOGY

There are three major strands in Indian Christian theology.

The dominant strand for many centuries was the reflection of converts from the upper castes of *Hinduism, principally Brahmins. There are no clear landmarks. The early churches in India, which claim to date their existence from the apostle Thomas, were in the Orthodox tradition. They broadly followed the theology of the *Eastern Orthodox churches and made some points in the debates with Rome. But being set in Indian soil made little or no difference to them. They were upper caste in membership and the church was treated as one of the higher castes. This tradition still continues.

In the seventeenth century the Jesuit Robert De Nobili (1577–1656) attempted in theory and practice to relate the Christian faith to the practice of the Indian caste system. He did not so much reflect theologically on Christianity and the caste system as attempt to come to terms with socio-religious realities.

Christian involvement in India from Western countries between 1600 and 1900 at first developed a largely negative attitude to Indian religions. The concern of Christian theology was to point out the errors and supposed irrationality of Hindu religions.

At the same time Orientalists from the West helped spark a renewal in Hinduism. Hindu leaders sought to encourage the best in their own religion, and some, such as Vivekananda (1862–1902), responded to the impact of Christian mission in India by taking Christ seriously as the revealer of God.

Christian leaders, who were all personal converts from the Brahmin upper castes, responded to this movement of renewal and reform in Hinduism. This marked the birth of Indian Christian theology. These upper-caste converts were also shaped by the liberal tradition in Western Christianity, which had responded to the *Enlightenment challenge that a supernatural God could not exist, by locating God solely in the individual's inner experience. It identified Christianity with personal religious experience. Indian Christian theologians then searched for parallels in Hindu *religious experience in seeking the most adequate terms to express Christian faith. Proponents of this method were Ram Mohan Roy (1772–1833), Brahmabandhab Upadhyaya (1861–1907) and P. Chenchiah (1886–1959).

A second major stream related Christian faith to the process of nation-building, in order to identify the role Christians should play in pre-independent and post-independent India. India became independent in 1947. Some leading Indian Christian theologians addressed the social and economic realities that confronted the new state. P. D. Devanandan (1901–62), M. M. Thomas (1916–96), K. M. George and J. R. Chandran took the lead. They urged Christian commitment to nation-building and to the ecumenical movement as a pledge and sign of Christian commitment to the unity of humankind. Christians could hardly argue for a united India if their own ranks were rent with division.

Evangelical Christians were slow to respond to these issues. But in the 1970s the formation of the Evangelical Fellowship of India's Committee on Relief and its involvement in both relief and development projects stimulated increasing theological work on the biblical basis of social involvement. Documents like the Madras Declaration on Evangelical Social Action reflect this.

A third stream is now emerging, in Indian Christian reflection from the context of the poor and the outcast. In previous centuries no theology has been done by converts from the lower castes of Hinduism and from poor people. This is especially striking since over ninety per cent of India's Christians come from this background. The Roman Catholic theologian Sebastian Kappen, though not from this background, has sought to identify with them.

A number of key issues have occupied Indian Christian theologians in the period since 1947. One major issue was how far Christianity was continuous with the experience and even the revelation of other religions. H. *Kraemer insisted that Christianity was totally discontinuous, but M. M. Thomas responded by speaking of a Christ-centred *syncretism. He pointed out that in every society Christianity took over and endorsed some aspects of the life and experience of society in order to communicate its meaning. By its very nature Christianity was syncretistic. The issue was whether this syncretism was centred on Christ. According to Thomas, an important way of harnessing all religions for the task of nation-building was the specific focus of humanization. He saw the Christian faith as providing a definite force for humanization and as a dynamic in dialogue with the vertical foci of other faiths pushing them in the direction of new horizontal relationships in concern for humanity.

J. N. Farquhar (1861–1929) had posited Christianity as the crown of Hinduism. Post-independence reflection did not accept this judgment. The most dominant thought came through Raimundo Panikkar (1918–2010) and M. M. Thomas who spoke of the hidden Jesus in Hinduism which found expression in Hindu compassion and justice. S. M. Samartha focused on *religious experience as a way of relating to other religions. He regarded dialogue as a method not of evangelism, but of relating in an open-ended pilgrimage where experience of different religions influences pilgrims in their search for truth and true religious experience.

A second major issue was how to witness to the *uniqueness of Christ in an atmosphere of religious universalism and philosophical pluralism. Hinduism finds everything in Christ prefigured in its own religious experience. So how could unique claims be made of Christ? Furthermore, Hinduism, while open to receive insights from all religions, is fundamentally centred on personal experience. It is therefore impossible to make objective judgments, since everyone's religious experience is equally valid. In this context how could someone claim that the experience of salvation through Christ is uniquely valid without appearing arrogant and thus undermining their very claim by their pride?

A third issue is whether it is proper to use Hindu categories to describe Christian faith. In Hindu mythology many gods appeared on earth as men, as avatars. Could the incarnation of Jesus be described in these terms? Could Hindu religious language be used for Christian realities without compromising Christian truth?

A fourth issue concerns the socio-economic context of India. How does the gospel contribute to building a united nation out of many fragmented groups? This issue was addressed at the time of independence when the Christians declined an offer by the government to have a certain number of parliamentary seats reserved for Christians elected by Christian constituencies. Their reason was that the Christian goal was not to be one sect among many, but to contribute in every group to the unity of the whole.

In the socio-economic sphere the church is also grappling with how to be a prophetic voice on behalf of the poor. Sixty per cent of India's population live below the poverty line. Should the church work with structures of the establishment, whether government agencies or business interests, to secure its own institutions which were founded to serve the poor but increasingly serve the rich? Or should the church work with action groups in the grass roots of society? Should the church encourage people to discover their identity as the creatures of God with equal rights to the earth's resources by the process of welfare provision or through political protest?

Important thinking has been done in this area by Roman Catholic theologians of the Jesuit Order. The Indian Social Institute, John Desrochers (Jesus the Liberator, Bangalore, 1976), Sebastian Kappen (Jesus and Freedom, Maryknoll, 1978), Desmond D'Alreo and Stanley Lourduswamy have contributed important perspectives which share much in common with *liberation theology from Latin America.

A fifth issue concerns the relationship between the church's role in the socio-economic spheres and its concern to challenge people to accept Christ. What is the true biblical relationship between social responsibility and evangelism? This issue specially focuses on whether the church should require people to renounce caste on becoming Christian or allow caste-churches to emerge.

A sixth issue is how to express Christian worship and communication in appropriate cultural forms (see *Contextualization). Can Hindu patterns of architecture, dance, worship and prayer express Christian devotion and worship, or does the fact that Hindu spirituality excludes the poorest people make it totally inappropriate? Would an outcaste person feel at home in Hinduized Christian worship? While Western forms of church practice may appear foreign in the Indian context, for many the only alternative to Hindu practices which completely excluded them has been a total break. Such people are now discovering that the Western practices themselves compromise biblical priorities in some aspects and are looking for new models. Important work is being done in this area by the Roman Catholic D. S. Amalorpavadass of the National Biblical Catechetical and Liturgical Centre in Bangalore, and by the Christian Arts and Communication Services in Madras.

In summary, the responses of Indian Christians to the Hindu religious reality have been described in a number of ways: (1) the cosmic Christ includes all the various pluralities of religious experience; (2) Christianity takes shape within a pluralistic environment and so becomes a Christ-centred syncretism; (3) Christ is the unknown force for justice within Hinduism; (4) Christ is the goal of the religious quest of Hinduism; (5) Hinduism is related to Christianity as its OT Scriptures; (6) Christianity is totally discontinuous with Hinduism; (7) the Hindu context produces a particular form of Christian, an Indian Christian; (8) Hinduism must be addressed with the question of the poor and marginalized as the question about religion which Jesus validated.

See also: CHRISTIANITY AND OTHER RELIGIONS.

Bibliography

R. Boyd, Indian Christian Theology (Madras, 1969); V. Samuel and C. Sugden, The Gospel among Our Hindu Neighbours (Bangalore, 1983); G. Shiri, Christian Social Witness (Madras, 1983); M. M. Thomas, The Acknowledged Christ of the Indian Renaissance (Madras, 1969); idem, Man and the Universe of Faiths (Madras, 1975); Tr 2:2 (1985) – issue on Caste and the Church.

C. M. N. SUGDEN AND V. K. SAMUEL

INDULGENCES, see MERIT

INFALLIBILITY AND INERRANCY OF THE BIBLE

A distinctive mark of *evangelical Christianity is belief in ‘the divine inspiration and infallibility of Holy Scripture as originally given and its supreme authority in all matters of faith and conduct’ (UCCF doctrinal basis). Some evangelicals use the term ‘inerrancy’: ‘The Bible alone and the Bible in its entirety, is the Word of God written, and therefore inerrant in the autographs’ (The Evangelical Theological Society). In practice, those who use the term ‘infallibility’ assert the truth of the doctrinal teaching of the Bible, whereas those who speak of ‘inerrancy’ include also historical and other factual information, although the boundaries between the positions are inevitably fuzzy.

Such terms express an understanding of the Bible long taken for granted in the church and held by many contemporary Christians. The two statements quoted were formulated to indicate how evangelical doctrine differs (1) from *Roman Catholic teaching that asserts the infallibility of church and pope alongside and sometimes even above the authority of Scripture; and also (2) from *liberal Protestant teaching that the Bible is one, fallible source of Christian truth alongside human reason and secular sources of knowledge.

Belief in the inspiration and infallibility or inerrancy of *Scripture may have two sorts of basis.

First, it can be regarded as an implication of accepting the divine authority of Christ and of the authors of Scripture as God’s agents mediating his revelation to humanity. Many biblical books were written by people who claimed to be, or who were believed to be, directly inspired by God; in particular, the books of the OT were treated as authoritative revelation by Jesus and his immediate followers. Having come to faith in Christ, we should accept his view of Scripture. The statement that ‘all Scripture is God-breathed’ (2 Tim. 3:16; cf. 2 Pet. 1:21) epitomizes this belief; its author was not saying anything unusual or controversial. Other biblical statements indicate a belief that the *Holy Spirit influenced what was written. Many texts purport to express what God was saying (‘the word of the Lord’) through revelations to prophets or other divinely accredited messengers. In addition to these examples of direct inspiration, God could and did work through human biblical authors in such matters as the recording of history (often using other sources) so that their ordinary human compositions were inspired and authorized by him. N. Wolterstorff has helpfully developed the concept of God giving his imprimatur to human compositions which expressed what he wants to say, although he recognizes that there must be something about such works that makes them apt for this purpose. Scripture, then, is fully trustworthy, since God is the omniscient God of truth and cannot lie; the doctrinal statements are true, the commands are binding, and the historical statements refer to events as they really happened.

Second, such belief may be supported by the claim that, wherever the Bible can be tested for factual accuracy, it passes the test; if so, it is probable (but beyond proof) that it is also true and reliable in matters of faith and ethical teaching (as well as in factual matters more generally). Clearly, to base belief exclusively on such testing of the Bible would be a dubious procedure, since it makes acceptance of the truth of the Bible dependent upon the shifting sands of historical and scientific investigations. If the Bible can be shown to be reliable where it can be tested, this would at most confirm faith, but it cannot be the basis of faith.

However, there are innumerable points where the trustworthiness of the Bible has been questioned. To this there are two types of response. One is to produce explanations of how statements in the Bible may be accurate despite appearances to the contrary (e.g. by offering ways of harmonizing different accounts of the same event or by producing historical evidence that corroborates a biblical account). Some such explanations are more ingenious than persuasive. The other approach is to insist that, although there is at present no solution, nevertheless one may be discovered in the future, and that in any case we should ‘honor God by trusting His assurance that His Word is true, despite these appearances’ (N. L. Geisler, Inerrancy, p. 501). Once this is said, however, it is clear that a belief in inerrancy is just that, a ‘belief’, and therefore not something that can be demonstrated in such a way as to carry conviction for people who are not believers.

The function of a belief in infallibility or inerrancy, therefore, is in-house. It is a confession of faith that what may be deduced about the nature of Scripture from its own testimony is that it is a reliable record of ‘divine disclosure’, thanks to its being ‘God-breathed’, and hence it functions as the supreme authority for Christian faith and practice.

Within evangelicalism there is a range of understanding of this character of Scripture. On the one hand, there is the position most powerfully articulated by *Warfield and expounded in 'The *Chicago Statement on Biblical Inerrancy' (accessible in Geisler, Inerrancy, pp. 493–502). Inspiration is the concursive activity of the Holy Spirit, that caused the various human authors to write what God wished them to say while writing freely in normal human ways; in no sense did the Spirit dictate what to say to them, although the results of inspiration are the same as if dictation had actually taken place.

But 'inerrancy' is a slippery term and needs some exposition. Scripture was written at particular times and places in the past and uses the appropriate modes of expression; for example, it may use approximations rather than precise measurements. Scripture may contain fictitious material intended as such and readily identifiable (e.g. the parables). Statements can be misunderstood if not read in their contexts. The parts must be interpreted in the light of Scripture as a whole. There is certainly development in understanding over the long period of composition (e.g. the recognition of the Son and the Holy Spirit as persons within the divine identity), even if there is no change in essential teaching. Although the old and new covenants stand in continuity with one another, some teaching has been abrogated; the sacrificial legislation in the OT is no longer binding now that Christ has offered the perfect, final sacrifice for sin. In this kind of way phenomena that might be thought to argue against inerrancy can be accommodated within the definition.

Over against 'inerrancy' stands the view of other scholars who hold equally firmly to the inspiration and authority of Scripture as 'infallible', but allow for the possibility that Scripture might not be wholly free from error, or who argue that the categories of errancy and inerrancy are inappropriate. Such scholars argue that (for example) the actual text of Scripture has not been preserved without errors in the copying of the manuscripts which makes it difficult, if not sometimes impossible, to reconstruct the original text, but they insist that the extent of such uncertainty is not sufficient to place the message of Scripture in any real doubt. But if readers have to live with this undeniable uncertainty in the transmitted text, some would question whether it is necessary to believe that absolute accuracy is necessary, or has actually been provided, in the teaching of the original text.

Within this infallibilist position there is a greater willingness to recognize that the genres and forms of the biblical texts may permit the inclusion of matter that is not literally historical (e.g. the early stories in Genesis) (see *Myth), and that the accepted practices of ancient authors might include greater freedom in interpretation and presentation than would be considered appropriate by contemporary historians. The composition of many books was an extended, complex process in which various individuals and communities were concerned, rather than being akin to the writing of a document by a single author (e.g. the book of Isaiah contains later additions to the work of the eighth-century prophet). It is arguable that a strict doctrine of inerrancy is threatened by death by a thousand qualifications.

Assessing these two views depends to some extent on the relative weights attached to a doctrinal, a priori approach that argues from what is perceived to be the teaching of Scripture on its own character and to an empirical approach that examines the actual phenomena in Scripture (e.g. the variations in the wording of sayings of Jesus in the Gospels).

The importance of the doctrine is undeniable. In the late nineteenth century it was developed particularly over against the growth of the kind of biblical criticism which hypothesized about the sources and dating of the biblical books (especially the OT) on various grounds, including the detection of alleged contradictions. The historicity of the recorded events that were held to be the locus or the proof of divine activity in history was assailed; if the Israelites never escaped from Egypt in the way described in Exodus, then this non-existent event could not have been a divine event. More importantly, if the details in the accounts of the resurrection appearances of Jesus appear to contradict one another, then the fact of the resurrection as God raising Jesus from the dead is also called into question. The fact that 'higher' criticism was largely carried on by opponents of orthodox, evangelical Christianity or of Christianity itself created a powerful reaction of fairly total rejection on the part of evangelicals. At the present time, controversy centres more on the validity of scriptural teaching on such matters as the sinfulness of homosexual practice or the status of adherents of other religions at the last judgment.

At the very least, all evangelicals would affirm that the inspiration of Scripture implies that it is fully adequate for the purposes for which God caused it to be written. As a collection of writings expressing what God considers it needful for us to know, it is fundamentally true, but this leaves open questions regarding the nature of its truth. Evangelicals need to be at the forefront in the task of biblical *hermeneutics, the science of understanding how to go about the interpretation of an authoritative text. Although, then, there is something of a spectrum of beliefs among evangelicals regarding just in what sense the Bible is trustworthy and infallible (or inerrant), there is a united acceptance that Scripture is the inspired word of God and its character is such as to make it the final authority in faith and conduct.

See also: REVELATION; SCRIPTURE, DOCTRINE OF.

Bibliography

G. C. Berkouwer, Holy Scripture (Grand Rapids, 1975); N. L. Geisler (ed.), Inerrancy (Grand Rapids, 1979); J. Goldingay, Models for Scripture (Grand Rapids and Carlisle, 1994); I. H. Marshall, Biblical Inspiration (London, 1982); J. Orr, Revelation and Inspiration (London, 1910); J. I. Packer, Fundamentalism and the Word of God (London, 1958); idem, 'Hermeneutics and Biblical Authority', Them 1, 1975, pp. 3–12, <http://www.biblicalstudiesorg.uk/article_herm_packer.html>; C. H. Pinnock, The Scripture Principle (Grand Rapids, 2006); B. B. Warfield, The Inspiration and Authority of the Bible (London, 1951); N. Wolterstorff, Divine Discourse (Cambridge, 1995).

I. H. MARSHALL

INFALLIBILITY, PAPAL, see PAPACY

INFANT BAPTISM, see BAPTISM

INFRALAPSARIANIAM, see PREDESTINATION

INSPIRATION, see SCRIPTURE

INTERCESSION OF CHRIST, see OFFICES OF CHRIST

INTERMEDIATE STATE

Given the Christian hope of the general *resurrection at the end of the age, the question necessarily arises of the 'state' of the dead in the intermediate time between their death and resurrection. If the future general resurrection is linked to the redemption of the cosmos (Rom. 8:18–23) in such a way that the resurrection body has its habitat within the new creation (Rev. 21:1–4), then some kind of personal continuity has to be posited between the moment of the individual's death and the future resurrection. Paul certainly teaches such a personal continuity in 2 Cor. 5 where he refers to the body as an 'earthly tent' and the expected resurrection body as a 'heavenly dwelling', and expresses the desire not to be 'naked', but to be 'further clothed'. Through the mixed metaphor of 'clothing' and 'dwelling', this passage certainly implies a personal continuity of the 'I', but does not name that as a 'spirit' or 'soul'. Christian tradition from the earliest days has used such language, however, and, influenced perhaps by Hellenistic and particularly Platonist anthropology, has generally understood that the human *soul will exist between death and resurrection in a bodiless state.

Further reflection on this has arisen in the light of the OT understanding of the state of the dead. Until the hope of the resurrection arose late in the OT period, the general belief was that the dead went forever to Sheol (Gk, Hades), a place of shadowy half-life, otherwise referred to as 'the grave' or 'the Pit'. It was not, however, originally thought of as a place of punishment. That concept emerged in Second Temple Judaism with the term Gehenna, a word coined from the valley of Hinnom outside Jerusalem where the rubbish of the city was burned, and a term used by Jesus (Matt. 5:22, etc.). References to Christ's preaching 'to the spirits in prison' (1 Pet. 3:18–22; 4:6) led to the belief that those of OT times, particularly the faithful, had been released from Sheol through Christ's *descent into hell between his death and resurrection. This later developed into the medieval notion of the 'harrowing of hell', resulting from the victory of Christ over the devil.

The question remained, however, as to what 'state' the OT saints presently enjoy along with those who have since believed in Christ, and the question was complicated by the rise of belief in *purgatory. This latter belief arose in the early centuries of the church as the answer to the question of how God dealt with post-baptismal sin. The belief that there was no forgiveness after the initial repentance, faith and conversion gave way to a belief that baptized Christians could be forgiven for later sin if they performed works of *penance, and this in turn led to the belief that Christians who did not complete such penance and who had not progressed sufficiently in *sanctification would be purged in 'purgatory' before final admittance to heaven.

The doctrines of penance and purgatory were rejected by the *Reformers, but the question still remained as to the 'state' of both believers and unbelievers in the intermediate period between death and resurrection. Luther and some Anabaptist groups tended towards belief in 'soul sleep'. The classic passage for that belief is in 1 Thess. 4:13–18, where Paul writes that those who are 'asleep' in Christ will not be left behind at the coming of the Lord. By contrast, John Calvin interpreted 'sleep' as simply a metaphor for death and was totally opposed to the notion of soul sleep, writing his first published work, Psychopannychia, to refute it. The souls of the elect enter immediately on death into the *kingdom of God. Christ 'receives them into paradise' (Institutes, III.25.6) and there they rest consciously, but do not sleep, until they enter into their full glory after the Last *Judgment. The reprobate 'are chained up like malefactors until the time when they are dragged to the punishment that is appointed for them'. Perhaps the classic passage which has been used to reject 'soul sleep' is the parable of the rich man and Lazarus (Luke 16:19–31), in which 'a great gulf' has been fixed between the blessed and the damned, but both are conscious. Scholars today, however, may question whether that conclusion may be drawn from what is evidently a story told to make a different point.

Where popular religion has lost the Christian doctrine of the resurrection and imagines instead a disembodied life forever in 'heaven', the question of the intermediate state does not arise. But as N. T. Wright has emphasized, Christians believe in 'life after life after death' and therefore some concept of the intermediate state seems to be required. A certain mystery remains and the focus of Christian *hope is not there but in the resurrection. Yet Christian theology has generally asserted that while the nature of the intermediate state may not be entirely clear, nor needs to be, those who are 'absent from the body' are 'present with the Lord' (2 Cor. 5:8), resting from their labours (Heb. 4:10; Rev. 14:13) until the Lord's coming. Protestant theology rejects, however, the idea of any direct communication with the dead in Christ, either in the form of prayers to the saints or the popular notion that those who are 'with the Lord' are able to observe our present life.

Bibliography

M. J. Harris, Raised Immortal (London, 1983); B. Hebblethwaite, The Christian Hope (London, 1984); S. Travis, Christ Will Come Again (London, 1997); N. T. Wright, Surprised by Hope (London, 2007).

T. A. NOBLE

INTERPRETATION, see HERMENEUTICS

INVOCATION, see EUCHARIST; SAINT

IRENÆUS (c. 130–c. 200)

A vigorous anti-heretical writer devoted to the biblical faith, Irenaeus, whose lifetime connected the sub-apostolic church to the old Catholic church, was a pivotal figure in the development of Christian theology. Coming from Asia Minor, where he heard Polycarp of Smyrna teach, and becoming a presbyter and then bishop at Lyons, he united Asian and Western theological traditions. Maintaining contacts with Rome, he attempted to mediate in the paschal (see *Easter) and *Montanist controversies in order to preserve the unity of the church, which was so important to his theology.

Irenaeus' Demonstration of the Apostolic Preaching elaborates catechetical instruction according to biblical history as the saving plan of God. Following a literal history of the mighty acts of God – beginning with creation and continuing through the events of Genesis, the Mosaic covenant, the taking of the Promised Land, the sending of the prophets, the coming of Christ, the sending of the apostles, and the general resurrection – the work treats the spiritual sense of Scripture in which OT prophecies are presented as testimonies to Christ's pre-existence, his divine and human nature, his virgin birth, miracles, passion, resurrection and calling a new people through the apostles.

The chief fame of Irenaeus rests on his Against Heresies. The first two books expound various *Gnostic systems and offer rational arguments against them. Books 3–5 undertake the refutation of Gnostic teachings from the apostolic writings and words of the Lord. Although primarily a theologian, Irenaeus was knowledgeable about philosophy and employed rhetorical devices in structuring his treatise.

One can interpret Irenaeus as a 'biblical theologian' for his emphasis on Scripture, creation, redemption and resurrection; or one can interpret him as a theologian of the developing Catholic tradition for his arguments from tradition, apostolic succession (see *Ministry), the importance of Rome, and *Mary as the new Eve. Since *Scripture and tradition had the same content for Irenaeus (i.e. the gospel), biblical theology is the substance of his thought. The 'Catholic' elements appear primarily as polemical arguments against the Gnostics and *Marcion. Likewise, the doctrines he emphasizes are those challenged by heretics.

Irenaeus argued for the unity of Scripture as the historical revelation of 'one and the same God' who had initiated different covenants with human beings. Thus the OT is in harmony with the NT, although the law of Moses is now superseded by the gospel of Christ. The historical pattern of *revelation was the prophets, Christ and the apostles; but the essential content throughout was Christ. Whereas the Gnostics interpreted the Bible according to their mythical views of reality, Irenaeus defended the interpretation of the Bible according to the 'canon (rule) of truth'. This consisted of summaries of the apostolic preaching as representing the proper content of Scripture. He argued that the correct understanding of apostolic teaching was preserved in the churches which went back to apostolic times and had personal acquaintance with the apostles (cf. E. Molland in JEH 1, 1950, pp. 12–28). Contrary to Gnostic claims to a secret tradition handed down from the apostles, Irenaeus insisted that the apostles would have appointed as bishops and presbyters those to whom they would have revealed any secrets. The succession in doctrine and life was transmitted from one holder of the teaching chair in each church to the next (not from ordainer to ordained). The consistency of the teaching in the churches of Irenaeus' day with the apostles' teaching was assured by its public character. Its correctness was further guaranteed by its agreement in each locality.

Irenaeus contributed to the explanation of the *Trinity the image of God's Word and Wisdom (Christ and the Holy Spirit) as the 'two hands of God'. The image expressed God's direct action in creation and revelation. The one God created all things out of nothing. God's providence exists alongside human free will. Adam was created as a child and so was easily deceived into sin.

The fully divine Son of God became Son of Man for human salvation. The incarnation through the virgin birth involved his assuming real flesh and retracing the steps of humanity in order to bring humanity to perfection in himself (recapitulation). His contact with every circumstance of human experience sanctified all ages and conditions of life. Christ's perfect obedience reversed the effects of the first Adam's disobedience, the blood of his death bringing forgiveness of sins and his resurrection a triumph over death, and so the devil was defeated.

Baptism brings regeneration and the gift of the Holy Spirit. The addition of the Holy Spirit to the human person, consisting of body and soul, restores the likeness of God lost in the first transgression. Salvation is progressively realized, a process to be completed only in the end-time. As the Spirit becomes accustomed to dwell in the flesh, so the person grows in the fullness of salvation, leading to communion with God and participation in immortality. The availability of grace to all, and the human freedom to respond to grace were important to his argument against Gnosticism.

The human creature in its wholeness, including the flesh, is saved. Thus Irenaeus' eschatology includes an earthly kingdom of the Lord at his second coming, a renewed material world and a literal resurrection of the flesh. The *millennial kingdom is the last stage of preparation for the ultimate perfection of the *vision of God.

The *eucharistic elements of bread and wine, by receiving the invocation of God, come to consist of two realities, one earthly and one heavenly. The human bodies nourished by the body and blood of the Christ become capable of the resurrection and eternal life.

The *church contains the deposit of truth, and in the church the Holy Spirit is found. The presbyters, including bishops, when they succeed to their teaching chairs, receive the apostolic teaching (the deposit of truth) to transmit to others. The church at Rome, as founded by Peter and Paul, was especially important to Irenaeus as preserving the apostolic tradition (see *Papacy). In a passage which has been given many interpretations (Against Heresies III.3.2) Irenaeus seems to say that all must agree with the church at Rome. Rome was a model of sound doctrine, and the agreement must be primarily with that sound doctrine preserved at Rome and secondarily with the church there as exemplary of the apostolic teaching (cf. J. F. McCue in TS 25, 1964, pp. 161–196).

Bibliography

Works: Against Heresies, Books 1–5, tr. A. Roberts and W. H. Rambaut, The Ante-Nicene Fathers, vol. 1 (Grand Rapids, 1987); St Irenaeus: Proof of the Apostolic Preaching, tr. J. P. Smith, Ancient Christian Writers, vol. 16 (New York, 1952).

Studies: R. Berthouzoz, Liberté et grâce suivant la théologie d'Irénée de Lyon (Paris, 1980); D. Farkasfalvy, 'Theology of Scripture in Irenaeus', RBén; 78 (1968), pp. 319–333; P. Foster and S. Parvis (eds.), Irenaeus: Life, Scripture, Legacy (Minneapolis, 2011); R. M. Grant, 'Irenaeus and Hellenistic Culture', HTR 42 (1949), pp. 41–51; idem, Irenaeus of Lyons (The Early Church Fathers) (London and New York, 1997); J. Lawson, The Biblical Theology of Saint Irenaeus (London, 1948); J. T. Nielsen, Adam and Christ in the Theology of Irenaeus of Lyons (Assen, 1968); W. R. Schoedel, 'Theological Method in Irenaeus', JTS 35 (1984), pp. 31–49; G. Vallee, 'Theological and Non-Theological Motives in Irenaeus's Refutation of the Gnostics', in E. P. Sanders (ed.), Jewish and Christian Self-Definition, vol. 1 (Philadelphia, 1980), pp. 174–185; G. Wingren, Man and the Incarnation: A Study in the Biblical Theology of Irenaeus (Philadelphia, 1959).

E. FERGUSON

IRVING, EDWARD (1792–1834)

Born and brought up in the small town of Annan in southern Scotland, Irving never lost a sense of the importance of close-knit communities founded on shared values. He studied at Edinburgh University, and was licensed to preach in 1815 by the Presbytery of Kirkcaldy, where he was a schoolmaster. Only in 1819, however, did he secure a ministerial post, as assistant to Thomas *Chalmers. The delay did much to fuel his disillusionment with contemporary Christianity and convince him to attempt something better. From 1822 he ministered to what became the National Scotch Church in London, but increasing criticism of his theology and practice led to his eviction by the trustees in 1832 and his deposition as a minister for heresy by the Church of Scotland in 1833. Thereafter he played a vital but subordinate role in what would become the Catholic Apostolic Church, although already ill with the consumption which killed him.

Irving has been seen as making contributions in three areas of theology: Christology, *eschatology and pneumatology (see *Holy Spirit). In each, his views proved controversial and continue to stimulate debate. But others also deserve attention.

In *Christology, Irving's passionate argument that Christ assumed fallen human nature, being upheld sinless (see *Sinlessness of Christ) by the indwelling Holy Spirit, has attracted attention from Catholic and Orthodox as well as Protestant and Pentecostal theologians. His motivation was pastoral, to give believers a Christ who could identify with them as their high priest, but it has been argued that the result was a somewhat confused account, alleged by some to verge on *Nestorianism. Set against contemporary evangelical failure to do justice to the humanity of Christ, it may be seen as a timely corrective, however.

It is arguable that Irving's pessimistic assessment of the contemporary church and of the prospects for Christendom was given considerable force by his friendship with *Coleridge. At any rate, he did much to popularize premillennial (see *Millennium) thought in evangelicalism, though this also served to accelerate the movement's fragmentation. He was the leading light in the Albury conferences on prophecy (1826–30).

Well before his 'charismatic' years, Irving as a *Romantic was developing a fuller theology of the Holy Spirit. Influenced by his assistant A. J. Scott (1805–66), Irving came to believe that miracles should still be occurring, and that the charismata had not been finally withdrawn from the church (see *Charismatic theology/movement). Perhaps the most fateful aspect of this was his exposition of the Gospel miracles as performed by Jesus as man in the power of the Spirit, which encouraged some to expect such things to occur in the ministry of contemporary churches. The ‘manifestations’ in Scotland and London from 1830 were a direct result.

Other areas of Irving’s thought also call for comment. In 1824 he preached a lengthy sermon on behalf of the London Missionary Society, the first part of which appeared in 1825 as For Missionaries after the Apostolical School. He argued that the contemporary emphasis on doing *mission through voluntary parachurch bodies lost sight of the fact that God’s appointed mission agency remained the church, and that its emissaries should go forth like the Twelve and the Seventy, without visible human means of support. His thinking was reflected by early protagonists of the ‘faith mission’ movement, some of whom had read this work.

A somewhat neglected aspect of his thought is that of theology as ‘public truth’, and the duty of Britain as a nation in covenant with God to make due acknowledgment of its dependence on God and to frame its laws and its practice in areas such as economics and education in line with the word of God (see *State). This led him to some forthright social critique, especially earlier in his ministry. Especially after the Emancipation Act (1829), giving civil rights to Catholics, he argued that the covenanted nation had become an apostate nation, ripe for divine judgment.

Irving’s theology should be taken as a whole. This relates to his sense of calling as a pastor, responsible to ensure the provision of a balanced diet for his flock. In assessing his thought, three points should be made regarding how he did theology. First, Irving came to fame as a preacher, perhaps more for the style than the content of his sermons. He regarded preaching as the lynchpin of his ministry. His early claim to pioneer new styles of communication, the ‘argument’ and the ‘oration’ (For the Oracles of God, 1823), was not maintained, but he did consider that his preaching ranged far more widely in divine truth than that of his contemporaries, especially the evangelicals. Many of his doctrinal works began life as lengthy series of sermons, a fact which should be borne in mind when reading them. Secondly, he was a pastorally driven theologian. For all his early love of theoretical speculation, Irving’s concerns were essentially practical. At Annan in 1833, he asserted that his Christology (for which he was on trial) was motivated by concern for the sanctification of his flock. Thirdly, we may call Irving a practitioner. He early came to be recognized as a man of integrity who sought to live out his faith in every aspect of his life. As one memorial tribute asked, ‘If it is the written Word of God, shall it not be the acted Word too?’

Twentieth- and twenty-first-century debate on Irving has sometimes taken one or another aspect of his thought and studied it in isolation. Furthermore, his early death means that we are left with multiple suggestions about ‘what might have been’, his thought being capable of application in widely differing directions. More recently, attention has been given to the Romantic strain in his thought, e.g. in his emphasis on supernatural divine action. Although born on the same day as the poet Shelley, he took Romantic ideas in a very different direction, an indication of the likely fruitfulness of further study of early nineteenth-century Romantic thought about religion and *spirituality. He remains a controversial figure.

Bibliography

Works: Preliminary Discourse to the Work of Ben Ezra (London, 1827); Collected Writings, 5 vols. (London, 1864–6); Prophetical Works, 2 vols. (London, 1867/70).

Studies: P. Elliott, Edward Irving: Romantic Theology in Crisis (Bletchley, 2014); T. Grass, The Lord’s Watchman: A Life of Edward Irving (Bletchley, 2011); G. Macfarlane, Christ and the Spirit: The Doctrine of the Incarnation According to Edward Irving (Carlisle, 1996).

T. GRASS

ISLAM AND CHRISTIANITY

Islam has had continuous and wide-ranging contact with Christianity throughout its history. Arabia, the cradle of Islam, was surrounded by Christian countries and civilizations. To the north and west were Syria (see *Syrian Christianity), Egypt (see *Coptic Christianity) and Palestine (all part of the Byzantine Empire), while to the south and east were Ethiopia and her colonies (such as the Yemen). Biographical accounts record that Muhammad (c. 570–632), the founder of Islam, had early contact with both groups. Furthermore, there were Arab Christian individuals and settled communities in Arabia itself with which the earliest Muslims interacted.

The Qur'anic view of Christians and Christianity is ambiguous. On the one hand, it recognizes particular qualities such as humility (5:85) and a degree of commonality (2:136; 29:46). But the Qur'an also includes a fundamental polemic directed against certain basic Christian beliefs, such as the divine sonship of Jesus Christ (see *Christology) and the doctrine of the *Trinity. This sets the stage for more pointed pronouncements in the Hadith, where Muhammad is reported to have said, '[H]e who amongst the community of Jews or Christians hears about me, but does not affirm his belief in that with which I have been sent and dies in this state [of disbelief], he shall be but one of the denizens of Hell-Fire' (Sahih Muslim, Bk 1, Ch. 71, No. 284). Such a critique informed early contacts between Muslims and Christians, with Christian apologists from this period, such as *John of Damascus and later Timothy of Baghdad (eighth to ninth centuries), attempting to respond to this early Islamic polemic.

The enlargement of the territorial domains of Islam to the north and west of Arabia came primarily at the expense of Christianity, especially Byzantine Christianity. The years between the death of Muhammad (632) and the First Crusade (1096) witnessed rapid and extraordinary military expansion by Muslims throughout the Middle East, North Africa and the Iberian peninsula, resulting in a series of Muslim empires. Christians, Jews and others became subject peoples, or dhimmis. They were divided into millats (or communities) which corresponded to the different Christian sects (Melkite, Jacobite or *Nestorian).

The Christian experience under Islamic Empire was mixed. Some more enlightened Caliphs promoted individual Christians to positions of prominence within the Islamic bureaucracy. In this way, Christians made a significant contribution towards the development of classical Islamic civilization, transmitting classical Hellenistic learning (particularly science, medicine and philosophy) to the Muslim Arabs. This learning was then brought to Western Europe through Muslim Spain.

However, some oppressive Caliphs destroyed churches, humiliated and killed Christians. Overall Christian dhimmis were second-class citizens within the Islamic realms, due in large part to attitudes engendered by negative references to non-Muslims within the Islamic sacred texts, and to prescribed roles within Islamic law.

The Crusades represented a Christian military response to over 450 years of retreat and territorial loss in the face of Islamic expansion. Many of the images of Christianity in the Muslim mind today date from this period, with Muslim memories of the bloody Crusader conquest of Jerusalem in 1099 preserved in popular culture and media. Even during the Crusades, however, there were Western Christians such as Raymond *Lull and *Francis of Assisi who advocated a peaceful approach to Islam.

The European colonial period and the advent of the Western missionary movement brought increased Christian-Muslim contact. From the seventeenth to the twentieth centuries European powers built empires to rival the great Muslim empires of earlier times. European colonial expansion opened the way for the establishment of new churches in Muslim lands for the first time since the rise of Islam. Simultaneously, Ottoman Turkish colonial expansion into Eastern Europe was accompanied by Islamic missionary activities, leading to conversion of some southern European communities, such as Albanians, to Islam.

Doctrine

In doctrinal matters there are certain areas of convergence between Islam and Christianity: belief in a Creator God; prophets; final judgment. However, there are also key areas of significant doctrinal difference, including the following:

(1) The Islamic rejection of the doctrine of original sin. Muslims generally believe that human beings are born innocent but weak. Although human beings are regarded as able to *sin, there is no general belief in the human disposition to sin.

(2) The doctrines of the Trinity and the deity of Christ. The differences in these areas are encapsulated by the late Pope John-Paul II, who wrote that the God of Islam 'is ultimately a God outside of the world, a God who is only Majesty, never Emmanuel, God-with-us . . . There is no room for the Cross and the Resurrection. Jesus is mentioned, but only as a prophet . . . not only the theology but also the anthropology of Islam is very distant from Christianity' (Crossing the Threshold of Hope, London, 1993, p. 93).

(3) *The rejection of the Christian doctrine of the atonement and a radically different view on the means of attaining a right relationship with God. Orthodox Muslims usually hold that the Qur'an denies the death of Christ (3:55; 4:157), teaching that he was raised bodily to heaven at the time of his arrest. Muslims therefore consider a right relationship with God derives from obedience to his will as revealed in the Qur'an and subsequent prophetic tradition and law.

(4) The integrity of the Christian Scriptures. Muslims often claim that the Jews and the Christians have altered their Scriptures and that this accounts for the disagreement between the Bible and the Qur'an, but some commentators hold only that Jews and Christians have falsified the true interpretation of the text. The question of the reliability of the Scriptures is thus raised at an early point in Christian-Muslim encounter.

(5) The nature and authenticity of Muhammad's religious experience. This is also a controversial area, with Muslims calling Christians to accept the prophetic status of Muhammad and the authority of the Qur'an, and Christians responding that given an anti-Christian polemic within the Islamic sacred texts and the Islamic rejection of the doctrine of atonement, acceptance of Muhammad and the Qur'an would be tantamount to abandoning the Christian faith.

Modern-day relationship

Muslim-Christian relationships today vary according to location. In some countries Muslims and Christians live happily side by side, interacting positively and fully. However, discrimination against Christian minorities living in Islamic majority countries increased in the late twentieth century, due to the legacy of dhimmi teachings within Islamic legal codes, given a new lease of life by the resurgence of political Islam.

Many Muslim-majority governments have increased the influence of Islamic shari'ah law on state legal systems, even creating specific departments promoting Islamic values and teachings. At the same time, non-Muslims are commonly forbidden by law to engage in mission among Muslims, with such policies justified by reference to Islamic sacred texts and law which emphasize the exclusivist claims of Islam. This has sometimes had an impact on Christian worship, with Christian minorities having difficulty gaining authorization for church construction and repair in some Muslim countries.

Such developments have led to a significant outflow of Christians from the Muslim world, especially from the Middle East, seeking greater opportunities and freedoms in Western countries. This exodus has accelerated as a result of increased tension between Islam and the West in the wake of the 9/11 attacks of 2001 and the subsequent wars in Afghanistan and Iraq.

While Christians have been leaving Muslim countries at an increasing rate, Muslim minorities have grown rapidly in Western countries during the last quarter of the twentieth century, benefiting from the religious freedom of those countries. In 1975, the Muslim community in Britain numbered just 400,000; in 2006 this figure had grown to over 2 million. Similar growth can be seen in other Western countries such as France, Germany, Denmark, Holland, Australia, Canada and the United States. With Muslim community growth has come rapid and widespread construction of mosques and Islamic community centres. There is thus a situation of asymmetry between the experiences of Christian minorities in Muslim-majority countries and Muslim minorities in Western, majority-Christian countries.

Muslims believe that they have a serious obligation to conduct da'wah (invitation) to Islam, and do so with great energy in Western countries. It is important for Christians to affirm that they too have an obligation to share the good news of Jesus Christ, his person, work and teaching, with everyone, including Muslims. In the work of commending the gospel to Muslims, Christian apologists to Islam need to call upon a wide spectrum of theological scholarship. They need to take account of critical research on the Bible as Muslim interlocutors are quite likely to be aware of it; they also need to familiarize themselves with emerging critical research on the sacred literature of Islam. Christians engaging with Muslims also need to express the doctrines of the Trinity, the incarnation and the atonement in ways which are both faithful to Scripture and Christian tradition as well as comprehensible to a Muslim. Furthermore, Christians need to be aware of contemporary social issues and the distinctive Christian response to them, as well as the whole range of responses which may be found in the Muslim world.

See also: ARAB CHRISTIAN THOUGHT.

Bibliography

K. Cragg, Muhammad and the Christian: A Question of Response (London, 1984); M. Durie, Revelation? Do We Worship the Same God? Jesus, Holy Spirit, God in Christianity and Islam (Mt Gravatt, 2006); S. Masood, The Bible and the Qur'an (Carlisle, 2001); C. Moucarray, The Search for Forgiveness: Pardon and Punishment in Islam and Christianity (Leicester, 2004); B. Musk, Kissing Cousins? Christians and Muslims Face to Face (London, 2005); M. J. Nazir-Ali, Conviction and Conflict: Islam, Christianity and World Order (New York, 2006); P. G. Riddell, Christians and Muslims: Pressures and Potential in a post-9/11 World (Leicester, 2004); P. G. Riddell and P. Cotterell, Islam in Conflict (Leicester, 2003); P. Sookhdeo, Islam: The Challenge to the Church (Pewsey, 2006); R. Spencer (ed.), The Myth of Islamic Tolerance: How Islamic Law Treats Non-Muslims (New York, 2005); B. Ye'or, Islam and Dhimmitude: Where Civilisations Collide (Lancaster, 2002).

P. G. RIDDELL AND M. J. NAZIR-ALI

JAMES, WILLIAM (1842–1910)

William James was a prominent American philosopher and psychologist who made a substantial contribution to the study of *religion. In The Varieties of Religious Experience (1902) he developed an empirical and scientific approach to religion. This meant, first, that there is no essence of religion, for religious phenomena are irreducibly diverse. However, this approach also meant distinguishing the central aspect of religion from the peripheral aspects. For James, the central aspect is what he called 'personal religion', which is the feelings and acts of individuals as they experience themselves in relation to what they understand to be divine. The peripheral aspect consists of the institutional and doctrinal sides of religion, which, in James's conception, are rooted in personal religion and, as its residual effects, are definitely secondary to it. They emerge when the experiences of deeply religious individuals (such as the founders of religious traditions) are translated into forms that are more accessible to people with less profound experiences. As a result, religious institutions and doctrines are valid only in so far as they are expressions and interpretations of personal religion.

Besides his contribution to the empirical study of religion, James wrote substantially on the topic of belief (especially in The Will to Believe, 1897). James sought to defend the propriety of religious belief in the face of *rationalists who insisted that belief should always be withheld whenever the available evidence is not fully compelling. In response, James argued that in religion we are faced with options that are forced and momentous. They are forced because there is no possibility of not choosing (since withholding belief is equivalent to unbelief). They are momentous because they bear on the things that are most significant to human existence. Additionally, James noted, our beliefs do not rest upon evidence and logic alone. He asserted that our 'passional nature' plays an important and valid role in belief-formation. Consequently, we are epistemologically justified in believing in God once the demands of our passional nature are taken into account.

James's own theology was in keeping with his pragmatic theology. Although he believed in the existence of a divine being, he held that such belief is important and valid because it best accords with the rest of our beliefs and best helps us make sense of the totality of our experience. In other words, we accept belief in God as true because it promotes the good life of ethical activity, hope and intellectual coherence.

Bibliography

Works: The Meaning of Truth (1975); Pragmatism (1975); The Will to Believe and Other Essays in Popular Philosophy (1979); The Varieties of Religious Experience (1985); all in The Works of William James, 18 vols., ed. F. Burkhardt (Cambridge).

S. M. POWELL

JANSENISM

Jansenism was a movement of theological and disciplinary renewal within *Roman Catholicism during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, mainly in France, but also in the Low Countries and northern Italy. It takes its name from Cornelius Jansen (1585–1638), a Flemish theologian whose work on Augustine's theology of *grace, the Augustinus (1640), was posthumously condemned by the Vatican (1653) because of its seemingly severe reading of human incapacity before God. Several French theologians favourable to Jansenius' emphases (e.g. Duvergier de Hauranne ['Saint-Cyran'], Antoine Arnauld, Pierre Nicole and Blaise *Pascal) became the actual leaders of the movement. Controversies first focused on monastic and spiritual discipline (tied especially to the convent of Port-Royal), and soon flowered into a full-blown effort to renew the ecclesial life of France. The Jansenists' grace-centred theology gave rise to a unique commitment to Scripture as divine narrative moulding the church's history, and encouraged pioneering work in biblical catechesis, historical research, missionary theory, liturgical renewal and finally ecclesiological reflection. These efforts in turn influenced eighteenth-century struggles for social reform and religious freedom.

Jansenism is often divided into three main periods. First, the initial work of Saint-Cyran and Arnauld, which revolved around the idea of a morally decadent church and the nature of God's healing of the human heart. An ongoing aspect of this period was open conflict with *Jesuits over issues of moral rigour, penitential demand, and missionary practice, with Jansenists generally defending non-accommodationist positions with respect to Christian teaching and local culture. (These controversies, and later political ones, contributed to the eventual expulsion of the Jesuits from France in the mid-eighteenth century.) The second period was one of energetic and imaginative resistance following the condemnation, in the Bull Unigenitus (1713), of Pasquier Quesnel's works of scriptural commentary, which maintained a strict reading of grace over works, and was viewed by the Vatican as crypto-Protestant in orientation. French clergy were asked to subscribe to the papal condemnation, a demand that most Jansenists rejected. This period, known as Appellancy after those Jansenists who 'appealed' to a General Council to resolve their dispute with Rome, was highlighted by the work of scriptural theologians like J.-J. Duguet and J.-B. le Sesne de Ménilles d'Etémare, and included widely publicized episodes of charismatic holiness, gifts and symbolic convulsions, punctuated by the experience of persecution.

Finally, Jansenist conflicts with authority converged with the widening political reform movement of both church and state that culminated in the Synod of Pistoia (1786), and gave rise to the vagaries of the Constitutional Church of the French Revolution. During this time, many Jansenists became aligned with forces seeking greater national control over their churches vis-à-vis the Vatican (cf. the 'Gallicans' in France). Already in 1724, a formal schism between the diocese of Utrecht (Holland) and Rome had taken place when, after several years of estrangement between the two parties, a Jansenist bishop was consecrated without Vatican approval. (This schism has continued and, with later groups joining it after the First Vatican Council, has taken the form of the Old Catholic Church.) Some Jansenists were also active in pressing for those civil liberties that would protect individual conscience. The career of Henri Grégoire (1750–1831), Jansenist priest, revolutionary leader, advocate of civil liberties for Jews and Africans, bishop in the Revolutionary Constitutional Church, courageous opponent of Jacobin anti-Catholicism, and finally irreconciled but popularly embraced exile from the restored Roman church in France, captures the final evolution and integration of Jansenism into the new conflicts of modern political life. As a self-defined movement, however, Jansenism disappeared in the destruction of the Revolution, many of its elements merging into general attitudes of nineteenth-century French Catholicism, or taken over by liberal politics, or waiting for vindication in aspects of Second Vatican Council reforms.

As a theology, Jansenism's radical *Augustinian reading of original *sin and grace was distinguished from Protestant attitudes by its foundational commitment to the embodied life of the Church Catholic. Its strong and mystical *predestinarianism, according to which only a few are saved even though unknown to all but God, meant that the church's forms and structures, granted by God, assumed an obligatory weight within history. In contrast to the Utrecht and Revolutionary schisms, most Jansenists refused to break with Rome, and deliberately submitted to the sanctions and persecutions of the institutional church, adopting a profound spirituality of the cross, of patience and of self-giving. Precisely their sense of historical uncertainty and mystery meant that Jansenists clung to the particularities of the Christian faith, especially in its scriptural, liturgical, moral and missionary witness. This outlook founded Jansenism's paradoxical merging of a theology of total grace with unparalleled efforts at lay formation within the church.

Bibliography

L. Cognet, Le Jansénisme (Paris, 1968); W. Doyle, Jansenism: Catholic Resistance to Authority from the Reformation to the French Revolution (London, 2000); C.-L. Maire, De la Cause de Dieu à la Cause de la Nation: Le Jansénisme au XVIIIe Siècle (Paris, 1998); E. Radner, Spirit and Nature (New York, 2002); C. A. Saint-Beuve, Port-Royal (Paris, 1953 [1840–59]); A. Sedgwick, Jansenism in Seventeenth-Century France: Voices from the Wilderness (Charlottesville, 1977); A. G. Sepinwall, The Abbé Grégoire and the French Revolution: The Making of Modern Universalism (Berkeley, 2005); D. Van Kley, The Religious Origins of the French Revolution (New Haven, 1999).

E. RADNER

JAPANESE THEOLOGY

The 'Christian century in Japan', beginning with the arrival of Francisco Xavier, a Jesuit missionary, was tragically closed in 1549 with prohibition of the Christian faith and total isolation from Western culture, without having produced any academic theology despite the temporary success of the Catholic mission. Since the country was reopened in the late nineteenth century, however, we have seen a wide spectrum of theological reflections, ranging from syncretistic liberalism to a more biblical conservatism.

Many of the early Christian leaders in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, having a 'Samurai' (warrior) background, reveal a more or less Confucian ethos. Most conspicuous were Kanzo Uchimura, the founder of the unique 'Mu-kyokai (non-Church) movement', advocating an uninstitutionalized church; Danjo Ebina, who accepted liberal theology imported from the West; and Masahisa Uemura, who defended orthodoxy against Ebina.

This last evangelical line was taken up by Tokutaro Takakura, who argued that Catholicism and modernism are an amalgam of paganism and the Bible. It appears that Takakura paved the way for the later emergence of dialectic theologians like Yoshitaka Kumano, Kuwata Hidenobu and Yoshio Yoshimura. Liberalism, on the other hand, was pursued by those who tried to produce a 'Japanese Christianity' influenced by Shinto. Another stream was a socialistic movement whose advocates claimed social love to be the highest form of redemptive love.

In the mid-twentieth century, a Catholic theologian, Soichi Iwashita, laid a foundation for medieval studies, and his student, Yoshihiko Yoshimitsu, proposed Neo-*Thomism as one answer to decaying modernism.

One of the most notable theologians after the end of the Second World War was Kazoh Kitamori, who proposed his 'Pain of God theology' (see *Impassibility of God and human suffering), which came to be highly valued because of its originality. He criticized Barth's infinite qualitative distinction between God and man and yet refused liberal ideas of God's love which excludes his pain. Another creative attempt was the so-called 'Water Buffalo Theology' of Kosuke Koyama, who translated the Christian faith into terms understandable to Thai farmers. A more recent effort to achieve a much-needed theological reformulation was made by Nozomu Miyahira, who explained the Trinity in terms of the Japanese traditional idea of sankan ichiwa which means 'three betweenesses, one concord'.

The most urgent theological agenda in Japan today is the confirmation of God's sovereignty over the Japanese nation and the emperor, and the establishment of a Christian theology of religion in the face of predominant traditional religions and religious pluralism.

See also: ASIAN CHRISTIAN THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

Y. Furuya and H. Ohki, Nihon no Shingaku (Japanese Theology) (Jordan-sha, 1989); Y. Furuya et al., Nihon no Shingakushi (A History of Japanese Theology) (Jordan-sha, 1992); C. Germany, Protestant Theologies in Modern Japan (International Institute for the Study of Religions, 1965); S. Ono, Nihon Purotesutanto Kyokaishi (A History of Japanese Protestant Churches) (Seikeijusanjo, 1986).

K. UCHIDA

JASPERS, KARL, see EXISTENTIALISM

JENSON, ROBERT W. (b. 1930)

Robert Jenson has been described as 'America's theologian'. Influenced by Jonathan *Edwards, the American Norwegian is among the foremost theologians of his day. A 'theologian of culture', Jenson's theology covers a wide array of disciplines, issues and art-forms.

First trained at Luther College, Jenson taught in Oxford, Gettysburg, Minnesota and Princeton, publishing over twenty-five monographs and hundreds of essays and articles. Describing himself as a 'theologian of the one church', he co-founded Pro-Ecclesia, a journal dedicated to Catholic and Evangelical theology.

Having completed his doctoral research on Karl *Barth, under Peter Brunner, the systematic style and scope of Jenson's work reflect the grand tradition of G. W. F. *Hegel. Refusing to blindly accept the language of Western philosophy, particularly when influenced by Greek religion, Jenson's metaphysics are rooted in the biblical narrative and gospel story.

'Who is God?' Regularly returning to this question, Jenson's answer proves persistent. God is whoever raised Jesus from the dead. This discovery leads to a triple identification. As Father, Son and Holy Spirit, the triune God assumes the revelatory lead role in the biblical drama. The coalescence of biblical exposition and *trinitarian doctrine comprise Jenson's contribution to twentieth-century theology's trinitarian revival.

Jenson's trinitarian commitments and systematic approach are evident in his treatment of time and the church. Dismissing the notion of 'timelessness' as the erroneous import of Greek philosophy, Jenson posits a biblical alternative. Not timeless but eternal, God's triune life comprises a unique and unending temporality. Thus, in creation, God makes time for us. Certain critics allege that this leads to *pantheism, or *panentheism.

Unperturbed, Jenson's ecclesiology proves similarly immanent. In his radical ecumenist rendition of Luther's totus Christus, Jenson proclaims the church as the presence of the resurrected Christ in time and space. This claim alone underlines the courage, drama, relevance and importance of Robert Jenson's work.

Bibliography

Works: Story and Promise: A Brief Theology of the Gospel about Jesus (Philadelphia, 1973); Essays in Theology of Culture (Grand Rapids, 1995); Systematic Theology: The Triune God, vol. 1 (New York, 1997); Systematic Theology: The Works of God, vol. 2 (New York, 1999).

Studies: C. E. Gunton, Trinity, Time, and Church: A Response to the Theology of Robert W. Jenson (Grand Rapids, 2000).

R. ROOK

JEROME (c. 347–420)

Jerome was baptized as a young man into the church at Rome. He retained a lifelong attachment to the Roman church, though he spent his last years in the East.

Early on, Jerome attempted to lead a solitary, monastic life in the desert, but found the isolation uncongenial. He remained, however, a keen exponent of the ideals of virginity and a modified *asceticism. Through this and his reputation as a biblical scholar Jerome won the admiration of a group of pious aristocratic Roman women to whom he acted as teacher and counsellor.

Jerome's greatest achievement lay in biblical translation. A vigorous advocate of reference to the original languages, he completely revamped current Latin translations. The fruit of this work was the Vulgate. Jerome's attempts, however, to restrict the OT canon to what was written in Hebrew (see *Scripture) met with no response until the *Reformation.

Alongside this, Jerome embarked on a series of commentaries, particularly on OT prophets. These contain invaluable comments on philological and topographical matters, but rarely give much theological insight. Nor did Jerome contribute significantly to contemporary theological debates, to which he invariably brought an acrimonious taste. His anti-Origenism seems to have been determined more by personal circumstances than by considered theological reflection, since in his early days he had greatly admired *Origen's vast scholarship. A similar verdict applies to Jerome's anti-*Pelagianism, for Jerome does not reveal much understanding of the theological issues at stake.

Bibliography

J. N. D. Kelly, Jerome: His Life, Writings, and Controversies (Peabody, 1998); S. Rebenich, Jerome (London and New York, 2002).

G. A. KEITH

JESUIT THEOLOGY

Among the 'Rules for Thinking with the Church', which *Ignatius Loyola, the founder of the Jesuits, added to his Spiritual Exercises after encountering Protestantism at Paris, is the injunction 'to praise both positive and *scholastic theology'. 'The positive doctors' such as *Augustine, *Jerome and *Gregory the Great promote the love and service of God, and 'the scholastic doctors' such as *Thomas Aquinas, *Bonaventura and Peter *Lombard 'define and explain for our times the things necessary for eternal salvation, and refute and expose all errors and fallacies'. Ignatius' Constitutions (finalized 1550–51) name *Aristotle as the Jesuits' authority in philosophy, and Thomas in scholastic doctrine. Their adoption of Thomas (see *Thomism and Neo-Thomism), confirmed by the order's Ratio Studiorum (Scheme of Study) in 1598, helped to make him Catholicism's dominant theologian, displacing Peter Lombard. On certain topics Thomas's opinions were declared to be not binding. In particular, the minority (Scotist) belief in *Mary's immaculate conception was espoused by the Jesuits, who subsequently proved ardent Mariologists. The early generals of the order, especially Claudius Aquaviva (1543–1615), were concerned to ensure 'solidity and uniformity of doctrine' in its varied teaching activities.

Although Ignatius had declared that 'the scholastic doctors, being of more recent date, . . . have a clearer understanding of the Holy Scripture and of the teachings of the positive and holy doctors', the Jesuits' polemical engagement with *Protestantism and later Jansenism demanded increasing attention to the branches of 'positive' theology, especially the Bible, the Fathers and church history. The Dutchman Peter Canisius (1521–97) produced a widely used Catechism (Summa Doctrinae Christianae, 1554) and worked tirelessly against Protestantism in Germany and beyond, but the prolific and learned *Bellarmine was the Jesuits' supreme anti-Protestant controversialist. They had powerful centres of study at Louvain, Paris (Collège de Clermont), Cologne, Ingolstadt, Würzburg, Vienna, Prague, Alcalá, Valladolid, Cracow and elsewhere, and their ranks included a remarkable number of weighty theologians and scholars, such as Francisco de Toledo (1532–96, scholastic), Jakob Gretser (1562–1625, historical-patristic controversialist), Peter de Fonseca (1528–99, 'the Portuguese Aristotle'), and Leonhard Lessius (1554–1623, dogmatic and moral theologian).

Ignatius' 'Rules' had warned against detracting from free *will and good works by speaking too much of *predestination and *faith. From 1613, by a decree of Aquaviva, the Jesuits' official teaching on grace became what was known as 'Molinism', from the Spaniard Luis de Molina (1535–1600). His Concordia . . . (Harmony of Free Will with the Gifts of Grace, 1588) taught that the efficacy of grace lay not 'intrinsically' in the gift itself, but in the divinely foreknown co-operation with it of human free will. Efficacious grace, distinguished from sufficient grace, was defined as the grace to which a person consents. Francisco de Suárez (1548–1617), perhaps the greatest of Jesuit theologians, spoke of this as 'congruism'. God bestows gratia congrua (i.e. grace 'congruent' with its profitable use by the recipients), which is foreknown by God's special knowledge (scientia media). This obviously anti-Protestant position provoked a sharp dispute with the *Dominicans, who were more faithful Thomists in following Augustine on the primacy of (irresistible) grace. A special congregation at Rome (De Auxiliis, 1597–1607) ended with toleration of both viewpoints, but subsequently the Jesuit one has more generally prevailed in the Roman church.

In the mid-seventeenth century the Jansenists accused the Jesuits of *Pelagianism and *Semi-Pelagianism. Jesuits were to the fore in the campaigns against *Jansenism. The French patristic experts, Denis Petau (Petavius, 1583–1652) and Jean Garnier (1612–81), contested Jansenist interpretations of Augustine and the Pelagian movements. About a century earlier the teaching of Michel Baius of Louvain (1513–89) represented in effect an anticipation of Jansenism, and was condemned by Jesuits like Bellarmine and Lessius.

Jansenists also criticized the Jesuits' zeal for *papal supremacy, which went back to Ignatius himself. Two of his original associates, Diego Lainez (1512–65) and Alonzo Salmeron (1515–85), contributed effectively to the Council of *Trent as (anti-conciliarist) 'theologians of the pope'. Canisius was also active at Trent. Lainez insisted that bishops possessed their power of jurisdiction immediately from the pope, not from Christ. Later Jesuits were forceful in preparing for the definition of papal infallibility at the First *Vatican Council (1870). They were essentially ultramontane and anti-Gallican theologians. Early Jesuits also accorded to the pope an 'extraordinary and indirect' power in the temporal realm. This belief was an element in the justification of lawful rebellion and tyrannicide advanced by Juan de Mariana (1536–1623), Bellarmine, Suárez and other Jesuits (along lines similar to contemporary Calvinists). Such political theology brought damaging accusations of sedition upon Jesuits in England and France in particular.

Jesuits also developed *ascetic theology and spirituality, based on Ignatius' Spiritual Exercises. In India and the Far East, Jesuit missionary pioneers like Matteo Ricci (1552–1610) and Robert de Nobili (1577–1656) were adventurous in the theology as well as the practice of mission (see *Missiology). Jesuit moral theology has given too great a place to casuistry, and has earned the order a degree of notoriety. Its stress on 'responsibility' meant that one could not culpably sin without knowledge of what one was doing, and hence 'good faith' was always a valid excuse. Its 'probabilism', developed by Suárez and others and condemned by the Jansenists as 'laxism', in effect removed a moral obligation as soon as any serious doubt arose on informed and conscientious reflection. It was based on the principle that, in any doubtful case, it was lawful to follow a merely probable course of action contrary to the established norm, even if a more probable opinion favoured the norm itself. The system was subject to extended controversy in Catholic moral theology.

The golden age of the Society of Jesus was its first century, when it was a major factor in the reinvigoration of post-Reformation Catholicism (see *Reformation, Catholic Counter-). Although a prey to controversies, and suppressed by Rome from 1773 to 1814, it remained a bastion of scholastic orthodoxy and fidelity to the papacy. As recently as 1916 the general of the order promulgated an instruction On Increasing Devotion to the Teaching of St Thomas in the Society. Although a few years earlier George Tyrrell (1861–1909) had been expelled from the order for his Catholic *modernism, it was not until Teilhard de *Chardin and the Second Vatican Council that the traditional image of Jesuit theology markedly changed. Jesuits remain at the centre of Catholic theological endeavour, with their own universities (e.g. the Gregorian at Rome) and numerous periodical publications, but their ranks have included some of Catholicism's most controversial, as well as most important, modern theologians – *Lonergan, *Rahner, the Dutchman Piet Schoonenberg (1911–99), the Latin American *liberation theologian Juan Luis Segundo (1925–96), Josef Jungmann (1889–1975), theologian of liturgy Henri de Lubac (1896–1991) and Jean Daniélou (1905–1974). With few exceptions (e.g. Jean Galot), Jesuit theologians can no longer be characterized straightforwardly as defenders of traditional orthodoxy.

Bibliography

X. le Bachelet et al., in DTC 8 (1924–25), cols. 1012–1108; G. E. Ganss (ed. and tr.), Ignatius of Loyola: Spiritual Exercises and Selected Works (New York, 1991); J. de Guibert, The Jesuits: Their Spiritual Doctrine and Practice (Chicago, 1964); D. Mitchell, The Jesuits: A History (London, 1980); J. W. O'Malley, The First Jesuits (Cambridge, 1993).

D. F. WRIGHT

JESUS

Jesus is the personal name of the man Jesus of Nazareth, known to Christians as Jesus the Messiah (Christ). For Christian faith he is not only a real historical figure of the past, but also, by virtue of his *resurrection and exaltation to divine lordship (see *Ascension and heavenly session of Christ), the living person in whom Christians believe. For classical Christian theology, Jesus is the incarnate Son of God, that is, the divine Son or *Logos, the second person of the *Trinity, incarnate as a human being (see *Christology, *Incarnation). As Jesus, the divine Son lived a fully human life and now retains in heaven his full humanity, glorified as ours will be in the new creation.

The name Jesus, itself a common Jewish name (Yeshua) in first-century Palestine, directs our attention to the human, historical and particular identity of the Jewish man of Nazareth, who lived and died and rose from the dead as the Gospels relate. This article will therefore focus on this human particularity of Jesus, which can easily be obscured when theological discussion focuses on the incarnation as God become 'man' or human in a general sense, rather than as God become this particular man, Jesus.

Jesus in classical Christology

Following a long process of reflection and controversy, the Fathers at the Council of *Chalcedon defined the orthodox understanding of the person of Jesus Christ in a definition that became normative for mainstream Christian theology thereafter. It spoke of the personal unity of ‘one and the same Son and only-begotten God the Word, Lord Jesus Christ’, in whom are united two natures, divine and human, each complete, neither confused nor divided but united, such that the one person is both ‘truly God’ and ‘truly human’. The completeness of the humanity is specified as ‘consisting of a rational soul and body’, ruling out the view that Jesus was a divine mind in a human body. Jesus is said to have participated in the same common human nature as all of us (‘of one substance with us as regards his humanity’), like us in all respects except sin. Of his particular human story, the definition refers only to his birth from *Mary.

The Council’s insistence on the full integrity of both natures is an essential warning against the all-too-common tendency to think of the divinity and the humanity of Jesus as, so to speak, competitive, as though the more human he was the less divine he could be, and vice versa. It is also of great soteriological importance. The Fathers often used the slogan, ‘He became what we are in order that we might become what he is’, or ‘He became human so that we might become divine.’ They meant that the divine Son assumed humanity so that we humans could come to share the life of God. For this purpose it was essential that he assumed complete humanity, became all that it means to be human. Had he assumed, for example, only a human body, only human bodies would have been redeemed, not human minds.

The particular philosophical cast of the Fathers’ thinking inclined them to think of Jesus’ humanity in terms of general human nature, and to neglect the fact that to be a human being one must not only share human nature in general, but also be a particular human with a unique history. Of course, nothing they say denies that, and it is important that, like any abstract statement of Christology, their definition was not meant to stand alone, but to serve as a framework within which to read the Gospels and to tell the story of Jesus. The Tome of Leo, one of the Christological treatises that the Council authorized as orthodox, does root its understanding of the two natures in the particularities of the Gospel story.

The ‘Jesus of history’ and the ‘Christ of faith’

For Christian faith and theology down to modern times, Jesus Christ was without question the Jesus of the Gospels. The one and only real Jesus was both a historical person, whose story was told reliably in the Gospels, and the exalted Lord, who was the object of faith and worship. But the development of critical historical study of the Gospels in nineteenth-century Europe set this in question, and the result was the Quest for the *Historical Jesus, which aimed to reconstruct the life and personality of Jesus on the basis of a solely historical enquiry.

Much of the impetus for the quest in nineteenth-century Germany came from the desire of *liberal Protestant scholars to discover a Jesus different from the dogmatic Christ of the church’s faith, a non-supernatural Jesus who would be a more credible figure on which to base their understanding of Christianity. This historical Jesus was primarily a teacher of ethics who taught, in Adolf von *Harnack’s phrase, ‘the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man’. Albert *Schweizer’s definitive survey of the quest up to 1906 exposed its tendency to produce a Jesus who expressed the ideals of the scholars who reconstructed him, and Schweizer himself proposed instead an apocalyptic Jesus utterly strange to late nineteenth-century culture. The quest has continued in other forms down to the present day. Many scholars, especially in the British tradition, have taken a relatively high view of the value of the Gospels as historical sources and portrayed a historical Jesus not seriously at odds with the Jesus of the Gospels, while others, including recently those associated with the Jesus Seminar in the USA, have been much more sceptical of the historicity of the Gospel traditions.

A fundamental problem in the quest has been the assumption that, in order to get to the ‘real’ Jesus, we have to strip away the interpretations, deriving from early Christian faith, that permeate the Gospels. The whole enterprise was criticized especially by Martin *Kähler and Rudolf *Bultmann. While Bultmann denied we could know anything about Jesus relevant to faith, Kähler argued that the ‘Christ of faith’ of the early Christians was in fact rooted in the history of Jesus, so that the attempt to prise history and faith apart was misleading. Some recent scholars, such as Dunn and Bauckham, have argued that the faith of the first disciples is our way of access to the historical Jesus, not a barrier to be jumped. In this way historical study of the Gospels can illuminate the human, historical particularity of Jesus that is essential to Christian faith and theology. One particular gain from historical study of Jesus since 1970 has been to highlight his Jewishness and his rootedness in Jewish tradition, so obvious in the Gospels but much neglected in Christian history, including earlier phases of the quest.

Jesus in the Christology of the NT

In the nineteenth-century liberal Protestant view, the purely human 'historical Jesus' was obscured by his transformation into a divine figure, an object of faith and worship, for which Paul was held largely responsible. This view is still widely held, especially outside NT scholarship. More recently, however, it has become clear that Jesus was an object of faith and worship as far back as we can trace early Christian tradition, and such worship cannot be ascribed to a lapse from Jewish monotheism as Christianity moved into a pagan environment (see *Judaism and Christianity).

A more plausible view is that the earliest Christians took the quite deliberate step of including Jesus in the identity of the one God of Jewish *monotheism. In early Jewish theology, dependent on the Hebrew Bible, the uniqueness of the God of Israel was often defined by saying that he is the only Creator of all things and the only sovereign Ruler over all things. The first Christians believed that the risen Christ had been exalted to sit with God on the divine throne from which God rules creation (Ps. 110:1, used to make this point, is the OT text most quoted in the NT). That amounted to claiming that he belongs to the unique identity of the God of Israel. Associating the pre-existent Christ with God in the uniquely divine work of creation was a step that evidently soon followed (1 Cor. 8:6), making even clearer the inclusion of Jesus in the divine identity.

This understanding of Jesus' divinity did not eclipse his particular human identity, which for early Christians was axiomatic. Rather, Jesus' particular identity was seen to belong to the identity of God, without any loss to the former. The Jesus who was exalted to God's throne was precisely the Jesus whose story the Gospels tell.

The particular human identity of Jesus

A key task of Christology is to maintain the particularity of Jesus along with his universal significance. There is a perennial temptation to make the latter intelligible by reducing the former. Jesus then becomes a generalized notion of ideal humanity or of divine presence in human life, and the specific features of Jesus of Nazareth fall away. Especially since the *Enlightenment many thinkers have supposed that only what is universally discernible can be of universal significance. Gotthold *Lessing famously stated that contingent facts of history cannot be the basis for 'necessary truths of reason'. Christian faith, however, finds the universal significance of Jesus in, not despite, his historical particularity as the figure the Gospels portray. Since human identity is not static but formed by the dynamics of a particular life and particular relationships, we should think of it as a narrative and relational identity. Just such an identity is narrated in the Gospels. Who Jesus is, as the particular first-century Jewish man he was, happens in the story of his life, death and resurrection, and in the relationships he had, especially with God his Father. The Gospels, therefore, give us the historical particularity of Jesus narrated in such a way as to show his universal significance.

So in what way can we find the universal significance of Jesus in his historical particularity? We should think first of the early Christian proclamation of Jesus as Messiah, which was the earliest expression of his universal significance. In his messianic identity Jesus is the one man to whom God has given a unique vocation to reveal God and to bring *salvation, the *kingdom of God, to Israel and to all the nations. In this sense his identity includes a unique task, undertaken for the sake of all people, which takes place in the events of his life as the Gospels narrate them. This messianic identity also includes a unique relationship with God. Jesus knows God as his Father in a very special way that entails his own *sonship to God as something unique. From the perspective of his exaltation we can see that this relationship was divine sonship: it was his own Son that the Father sent to complete his purpose for all humanity. The one who in the Gospels acts and speaks for God and reveals God is himself God.

Relationships are the way in which a particular human can transcend his or her particularity without losing it. Jesus was not only uniquely related to the one God, but also uniquely related to his fellow-humans. Jesus has often been seen, as in Paul's parallel between *Adam and Christ (Rom. 5:12–21), as the representative of all humanity before God. But this representative role may seem to imply only generic humanity unless we can relate it to the particular history of Jesus in the Gospels. One way of doing so is the notion of Jesus' loving identification with other men and women.

This can be understood not simply as an abstract identification of himself with humanity in general, but as something that occurred in Jesus' actual relationships with other people, as he empathized with them, took part in their lives, lived his own life for their sake, and in the end suffered for identifying with their cause. This identification with others was limited in the sense that it was with the actual men and women Jesus encountered in his earthly life, but not in the sense that Jesus called a halt to it and excluded anyone from his love. So it was in principle unlimited and potentially universalizable. This potential universality became actual by means of his resurrection and his post-resurrection presence in the *Holy Spirit. Hence Paul, whom Jesus never knew, can say that 'the Son of God loved me and gave himself for me' (Gal. 2:20).

These two forms of unique relationship – Jesus' unique identification with his Father's will and his potentially unlimited, loving identification with other men and women – together make him the one who embodies God's loving identification with all men and women. This way of understanding the matter recognizes Jesus as a man who is unique in his universal significance without abolishing his particularity. Rather, his universality is found in the actual ways he communicated God's loving presence to actual men and women. It is found in his dealings with Martha and Peter, with the paralytic and the Gerasene demoniac, with the high priest's slave and the penitent thief, and no generality can replace the stories of these concrete relationships in Jesus' particular human story. This particular story is not just an illustration of God's *love for all humanity, but is actually the way in which God brings his love for all humanity into actual human lives.

This way of finding Jesus' universality in his loving identification with others frees us from a certain sort of problem about the universal relevance of Jesus that frequently recurs in Christology. A good illustration is the argument of Christian feminists who find Jesus' maleness a problem. How can Jesus as a man be the human figure of supreme religious relevance to women? But Jesus' maleness is one aspect of his particularity. There are comparable problems in the fact that Jesus was a Jew and not a Gentile, an unmarried man who had no experience of sexual love or of parenthood, a person with no physical or mental disabilities, a young man who died before experiencing old age. How can Jesus be the figure of supreme religious significance for Gentiles, married people, parents, disabled people, elderly people? If Jesus' universal significance has to mean that he lived, in his own human significance, all the diversity of human experience, then he could not be a particular human person, only a kind of cipher, a symbolic Everyperson with whom everyone can identify because he is specifically no-one. But if Jesus is universally relevant through his loving identification with others, then his particularity is no problem. Jesus practised the kind of love that transcends all barriers between people and all the varieties of human experience and really identifies with the experience of others. The evidence of Christian history is that people of both sexes, all ages, all races and cultures and conditions, have experienced Jesus' loving identification with them. They have found it in the particularity of the man who lived the story presented in the Gospels.

The particularity of God in Jesus

The biblical *God reveals himself by making himself identifiable in the world. He comes out of his infinite mystery and gives himself a particular identity in the world, as the God who has done such-and-such or the God of so-and-so or the God who dwells somewhere-or-other. He is known as the universal God in relation to all worldly reality: the God who created all things and is sovereign over all things. But God also makes himself more specifically identifiable through relationship to particular worldly realities – events which are particular acts of God, places where God appears or dwells, people to whom God relates in specific ways. In an important sense God particularizes himself and gives himself a particular identity by which he may be known. By relating to the patriarchs and entering into covenant with them, God becomes the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. By bringing Israel out of Egypt, giving Israel the Torah, by giving Israel the land, and by being accessible to Israel in the temple, God becomes the God of his people Israel. This particular identity enables him to be known, not in abstraction, but in encounter and relationship.

From this OT perspective, the incarnation of God as Jesus the Jew from Nazareth is in significant continuity with the way God revealed himself to Israel. Just as God's identity as the God of Israel is a narrative identity that takes place in the story of Israel, so the incarnation means that God is known in the particular story of Jesus, which the NT presents as the continuation and climax of the OT story. But in the latter case God particularizes himself in an even more radical way, not just as closely related to Jesus, but as the particular man Jesus. God's definitive *revelation, his identity for us, is now Jesus. Jesus, in his human, historical particularity, is the identity God has given himself in the world, by which he can be known. Finally, we should note that this form of revelation is at the same time salvific. In the history of Jesus God gives himself for human salvation. His love reaches us and reconciles us, overcoming sin, through Jesus' ministry of identifying love, his death for the sake of all, and his resurrection on behalf all. Only in this particular story is Jesus the visible image of the invisible God.

Bibliography

R. J. Bauckham, 'Jesus the Revelation of God', in Paul Avis (ed.), Divine Revelation (London and Grand Rapids, 1997), pp. 174–200; idem, Jesus and the God of Israel (Milton Keynes, 2008); M. Bockmuehl (ed.), The Cambridge Companion to Jesus (Cambridge, 2001); J. D. G. Dunn, Jesus Remembered (London 2003); C. S. Evans, The Historical Christ and the Jesus of Faith (Oxford, 1996); D. F. Ford and M. Higton (eds.), Jesus (Oxford, 2002); H. W. Frei, The Identity of Jesus Christ (Philadelphia, 1975); L. W. Hurtado, Lord Jesus Christ (Grand Rapids, 2003); G. O'Collins, Jesus: A Portrait (London, 2008); J. Pelikan, Jesus through the Centuries (New Haven, 1985); G. Theissen and A. Merz, The Historical Jesus (London, 1998); N. T. Wright, Jesus and the Victory of God (London, 1996).

R. J. BAUCKHAM

JEWEL, JOHN (1522–71)

Born in Devonshire, John Jewel was educated at Oxford, where he became Reader of Humanities and Rhetoric. He was ordained a priest in 1551. When Mary Tudor (r. 1553–58) as queen attempted to restore Catholicism in England, Jewel lost his Readership and fled to the Continent.

Jewel returned to England in March 1559 after the accession of Elizabeth I and was appointed bishop of Salisbury on 27 July 1559. As the first major apologist for the reformed Church of England (see *Anglicanism), Jewel wrote the Apology of the Church of England (1562, 1564) and his far more voluminous Defense of the Apology (1567, 1570). The central argument running through both these works is that the reformed Church of England was established upon the Scriptures, the first four ecumenical councils, the early Fathers, and the example of the primitive church. In enacting the Elizabethan Settlement, England returned to the ancient and apostolic church. This for Jewel provided the framework in which he defended the right of a national church to regulate matters of doctrine and worship by means of its own regional and national synods apart from general councils and the duty of the godly prince to initiate national ecclesiastical reform. Jewel died while on episcopal visit on 23 September 1571.

Bibliography

Works: An Apology of the Church of England, ed. J. E. Booty (New York, 2002); Works of John Jewel, Bishop of Salisbury, ed. J. Ayre (Cambridge, 1850).

Studies: J. E. Booty, John Jewel as Apologist of the Church of England (London, 1963); G. W. Jenkins, John Jewel and the English National Church: The Dilemmas of an Erastian Reformer (Burlington, 2006); W. M. Southgate, John Jewel and the Problem of Doctrinal Authority (Cambridge, 1962).

A. A. GAZAL

JEWISH-CHRISTIAN RELATIONS

Judaism and Christianity 'encounter' one another textually. There is also a tradition of organized, institutional relations. More common are interactions between Jews and Christians as historical actors, which shape individuals' perceptions of each other's (and their own) faiths. Some Christians actively seek dialogue with Jews, hoping to explore Christianity's 'roots' or to address the history of Christian anti-Judaism. Conversely, Jews may engage Christians because they are conscious of living in a predominantly Christian culture, and hope to prevent future conflicts. Recently, some Jews have made theological space for Christianity, welcoming the fact that through it, millions of people relate to Israel's God.

Ancient agendas influence contemporary Jewish-Christian relations. Arguably, Judaism is Christianity's point of departure, both theologically and historically speaking. The early Jesus movement decided that observance of the commandments was not required of Gentiles. Church Fathers extended and consolidated this position, regarding faith in Jesus Christ as alone capable of reconciling people to God. For centuries, Christianity was ambivalent, dismissing Judaism as redundant but affording Jews some protection, since they were the Scripture's first guardians. In contrast, once Christianity had become fundamentally Gentile, Judaism found it to be of little doctrinal interest.

It is only really since the *Holocaust that many churches have re-evaluated their approach to Judaism: Nazism depended on *race theory for its notion of the biologically inferior Jew, but centuries of anti-Judaism had meant that few Christians included Jews within their sphere of care and concern. Much post-war dialogue focuses on commonalities between Judaism and Christianity, emphasizing Jesus' Jewishness and arguing that his death admitted Gentiles into the God-Israel *covenant or created a new parallel covenant for them, but did not signal the end of God's relationship with Jews. Joint mission is explored as a replacement for Christian mission to Jews. Such ideas inform statements like Nostra aetate (1965) and subsequent Catholic documents, and the Jewish text, Dabru emet (2000). Of course, some Christian groups hold to supersessionism and *conversionary mission. Orthodox Jews regard Judaism as the unique embodiment of a divinely revealed teaching. However, belief that Judaism and Christianity are essentially different does not preclude positive relations (even as it creates problems for theological discourse), which may then explore social, political matters.

As previously, future relations will be influenced by historical contingencies as much as theology. The post-Holocaust reconstruction of relations is still in its infancy, and questions such as the place of Messianic Jews/Hebrew Christians (Jews who believe that their Jewishness is completed in their accepting of *Jesus as Messiah, and that there should be now, as in the earliest period, a distinctive Jewish Christianity) remain largely untouched. Many churches are becoming increasingly less Eurocentric, and in future this may influence their interest in Jewish-Christian relations. Judaism is affected by high rates of intermarriage and disputes over conversion procedures. If dialogue is to stay relevant to the experience of actual Jews and Christians, it must recognize the contemporary contestedness of Jewish identity.

The story of Jewish-Christian relations does not make for easy reading. But in recent decades, dialogue has chipped away at the heritage of mistrust and opposition, opening up avenues of genuine reconciliation.

See also: ISRAEL; JUDAISM AND CHRISTIANITY; ZION.

Bibliography

T. Frymer-Kensky, P. Ochs, D. Novak, D. F. Sandmel and M. A. Signer (eds.), Christianity in Jewish Terms (Boulder, 2000); E. Kessler and N. Wenborn (eds.), A Dictionary of Jewish-Christian Relations (Cambridge, 2005); E. Kessler and M. J. Wright (eds.), Themes in Jewish-Christian Relations (Cambridge, 2005); M. Saperstein, Moments of Crisis in Jewish-Christian Relations (London and Philadelphia, 1989); M. Shermis and A. E. Zannoni (eds.), Introduction to Jewish-Christian Relations (New York and Mahwah, 1991).

M. J. WRIGHT

JOACHIMISM

Joachim of Fiore (c. 1135–1202) developed an elaborate and very influential theological interpretation of *history and the future, which he expressed both in exegetical writings and in symbolic pictures (figurae). He understood the development of history in terms of the activity of the Trinity (in history) so that history reflects the trinitarian relationships. As the Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son, so an age (status) of the Spirit will develop out of the OT age of the Father and the NT age of the Son. Among many other ways of thinking of this third age of the Spirit, Joachim identified it with the *millennium of Revelation. Unlike some of his radical followers, he did not hold that the NT gospel of Christ would be superseded in the age of the Spirit, but that the full spiritual meaning of both testaments would be realized in this period of peace and contemplation before the end of history. Joachim's thought constituted a revolution in medieval *eschatology: for the first time in medieval Christianity he made it possible to envisage progress of a theologically significant kind within the future history of this world. If the subtlety of his theology was lost on many of his followers, the potent expectation of a third age of the Spirit inspired many people in the late medieval period (especially the Spiritual Franciscans), in the sixteenth century (both Catholics and Protestants), and even down to modern times.

Bibliography

E. R. Daniel, Abbot Joachim of Fiore and Joachimism: Selected Articles (Farnham, 2011); B. McGinn, The Calabrian Abbot: Joachim of Fiore in the History of Western Thought (New York, 1985); M. Reeves, Joachim of Fiore and the Prophetic Future (London, 1976); idem, The Influence of Prophecy in the Later Middle Ages (London, rev. edn, 1993); D. C. West (ed.), Joachim of Fiore in Christian Thought (New York, 1975); A. Williams (ed.), Prophecy and Millenarianism (London, 1980).

R. J. BAUCKHAM

JOHN OF DAMASCUS (c. 652–c. 750)

Born and raised in Damascus in an eminent Christian family called Mansur, John at first assumed high civil office, but later (after the eruption of Emperor Leo Isaurian's *iconoclastic policy) joined his adopted brother Cosmas as a monk at the monastery of St Saba near Jerusalem. He was ordained to the priesthood and devoted the rest of his life to writing books and composing church hymns for which he has become most famous. Some of these hymns are used in English today, e.g. 'Come, Ye Faithful, Raise the Strain' and 'The Day of Resurrection! Earth, Tell It out Abroad'. John defended the use of icons and as a result was personally condemned by the iconoclastic Synod of 754. He died at a very advanced age, most probably some time before the Seventh Ecumenical Synod (Nicaea II, 787), which reinstated him in the church and acknowledged his contribution. Later generations called him Chrysorroas, 'gold-pouring', because of his erudition and his inspiring hymns.

It was at St Saba, where one can still see his cell, that John wrote most of his works, using material from earlier authors but arranging it in a superbly methodical and original way. They were translated into various languages and utilized by many authors (e.g. Peter *Abelard and *Thomas Aquinas in the West and practically all systematic theologians in the East). The Greek Life divides them into four categories, the 'melodic hymns', the 'panegyric orations', the 'sacred Bible and divinely inspired tablet' (i.e. his most important systematic/dogmatic work, The Fountain of Knowledge) and the 'treatises on the icons'. Modern patristologists divide them into exegetical, dogmatic, antiheretical, polemical, ethical, homiletical, hagiographical and poetical.

As a theologian, John of Damascus was a traditionalist who wanted to follow the Scriptures and the accredited Fathers, because he saw both as inspired by the Holy Spirit. He was interested in particular theological questions and issues, but he was supremely a systematician who wanted to supply a comprehensive summa of theological knowledge. Thus he covered almost all theological topics both broadly and in detail. He made use of philosophy in an eclectic manner, making a clear distinction between true (psychical) and false (demonic) philosophical knowledge and holding that philosophy was related to theology as a servant was related to a queen. He held that God is transcendent in his being and immanent in his grace, i.e. his creative and redeeming acts through which are revealed respectively the divine attributes (eternity, immutability, majesty, etc.) and the divine persons (the three hypostaseis of the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit). Following the doctrine of the Greek Fathers and especially of the Cappadocians (see *Basil of Caesarea, *Gregory of Nazianzus, *Gregory of Nyssa), he always began with the *Trinity and moved to the unity of the Godhead which he expounded in terms of communion (koinōnia), while always retaining the priority of the Father who begets the Son and projects (ekporeuein) the *Holy Spirit. The world, consisting of spiritual and material creatures without any *dualism (anti-*Manichean), is contingent and destined to last in order to reveal God's plans, especially through the activities of *angels and men. Yet a free *fall (he decisively opposed Muslim *predestination) from goodness into evil led to the frustration of this destiny and caused slavery and death. Some angels have been turned into demons, and human beings have fallen into *sin, which is not only a loss of God's grace, of life and understanding, but also subjection to corruption and death through procreation. The solution to these problems is given in Christ the Saviour. For John of Damascus, Christ is in his person not a deified man but an 'inhominate' God, consisting of two natures, the divine and the human, resembling every human being in consisting of two parts, one immaterial and another material, but differing from them in not forming 'another out of the two' but remaining 'one in the two'. In this John followed both Chalcedonian orthodoxy and post-Chalcedonian clarifications, especially Leontius of Byzantium's doctrine of enhypostasia (see *Hypostasis) and *Maximus the Confessor's and the Sixth Ecumenical Synod's 'two natural energies and wills' which remain distinct though harmonized, whereby he exposed both errors, the *Nestorian and the *Monophysite (see *Christology). Christ's saving work comprises his teaching, his life and his sacrifice on the cross with its outcome in his resurrection, ascension and final parousia, which become gifts offered to, and ends to be freely attained to by, believers through the reception of the sacraments and the response of personal faith and works respectively.

For John of Damascus, Christian works were summed up in the Christian *ascetic ideal of the renunciation of 'the world'. Closely connected with this emphasis on Christian works was the doctrine of the final judgment which is to follow after the general bodily resurrection of all human beings (forcefully asserted in his work Against the Manichaeans), as well as the memorial services and prayers for the dead which were of particular benefit for the living. John regarded the Virgin *Mary and the *saints as living epistles of the saving truth of Christ ('friends of Christ' and 'children of God'), with whom they were to be honoured and exalted but not worshipped. This point became clearer in his defences of the use of icons, whereby he affirmed, not only that 'the veneration of honour given to the icon goes to the prototype', but also that there was a crucial distinction between veneration of honour given to the icons (proskynēsis, timē) and true worship (latreia) offered only to the Trinity. But as with his doctrine of Mary and the saints, so also with his doctrine of icons, John had Christ as his focus and aimed at expounding the appropriation of Christ's gift of salvation by human beings. This was probably why, like most of the Eastern Fathers, he did not develop any explicit doctrine of the church.

Bibliography

Works in ET: NPNF, vol. ix; M. H. Allies, St John Damascene on Holy Images Followed by Three Sermons on the Assumption (London and Philadelphia, 1898); D. Anderson, St John of Damascus, On the Divine Images (New York, 1980); F. C. Chase, St John of Damascus' Writings in FC 37.

Studies in English: D. Ainslee, John of Damascus (London, ³1903); B. Altaner, Patrology (Freiburg, 1960), pp. 635–640; P. M. Baur, The Theology of St John Damascene's 'De Fide Orthodoxa' (Washington DC, 1951); F. Cayré, Manual of Patrology and History of Theology (Paris, Tournai, Rome, 1940), pp. 326–339; A. Fortescue, 'John of Damascus', in The Greek Fathers (London, 1908), pp. 202–248; J. H. Lupton, John of Damascus (London, 1882); V. A. Michell, The Mariology of St John Damascene (Kirkwood, 1930); D. J. Sahas, John of Damascus on Islam (Leiden, 1972).

G. D. DRAGAS

JOHN OF THE CROSS, see MYSTICAL THEOLOGY

JOY

Joy is an essential ingredient of all true Christianity as it was a conspicuous feature of Hebrew religion at its best. The basis of Christian joy lies in the main theological doctrines of the faith. This necessitates viewing the subject through clear theological lenses, which will include *creation, the *Trinity, *Jesus, *salvation, humanity and *sin, the *church and *eschatology.

Joy forms the bookends that stand at either end of biblical revelation. It begins with God's delight in his good creation and ends with the beatific vision of redeemed humanity seeing the face of God. Between them spreads a tangled history of joy shattered through human sinfulness and joy restored at great cost through the redeeming work of Christ.

Throughout history Christians have approached the subject of joy via many different routes; these might be narrowed down to three broad categories: contemplative, Reformed or evangelical, and charismatic. Each strand of Christian spirituality has its own distinctive contribution to make to our theological understanding of joy.

Contemplative

*Augustine provides an early expression of Christian joy in contemplating God: 'My God, I give thanks to you, my source of sweet delight, and my glory and my confidence' (Confessions, 1.XX 31). This strand is also reflected in the writings of medieval mystics (see *Mysticism), such as *Hildegard of Bingen and *Teresa of Avila, who derived joy from contemplating the character of God and his works in creation. The contemplative tradition can also be observed in the growing influence of Orthodox *spirituality. Its celebration of the whole of life can be seen as an echo of the joy that exists within the Trinity: a joy that explodes into life in creation, redemption and the climax of history.

Reformed/Evangelical

The Reformed view is echoed in the comment that: 'Joy is not an isolated or occasional consequence of faith, but is an integral part of the whole relation to God' (Hendry). The Westminster Shorter Catechism is unequivocal: 'Man's chief end is to glorify God, and to enjoy him forever.' Barth describes the glory of God as beauty. This is the beauty of one who is the source and giver of joy. 'The beautiful in God is what makes us rejoice in him' (Moltmann). One of the major expressions of the Reformed view of joy is the massive meditation on 1 Pet. 1:8 in Jonathan Edwards' The Religious Affections. Published in the eighteenth century, this work continues to have an impact through the contemporary writing of authors like John Piper, with his ideas of desiring God and 'Christian hedonism'. Edwards has also been used as a resource in the charismatic movement.

Charismatic/Pentecostal

Although Pentecostal type groups have emerged throughout twenty centuries of church history, the twentieth century was particularly marked by the joyful vitality and growth of first the Pentecostal and then the *charismatic movements. The charismatic/Pentecostal movements have had in the past century a truly global impact; their emphasis on joy in the Holy Spirit has been reflected in a fresh explosion of new church structures, new songs and a renewed zeal for communicating the gospel. Joy finds expression in a new attitude to life as a whole and in revitalized *worship.

David F. Ford is one contemporary writer who has managed to successfully combine the contemplative, Reformed and charismatic strands of joy. He has done so by utilizing their complementary contributions in a way that restructures our understanding of what it means to have joy in God. Joy refocuses and reshapes our lives so that we can rediscover our centre in God. In this way we regain our intended shape as image-bearers of the blessed Trinity.

Bibliography

Augustine of Hippo, Confessions tr. H. Chadwick (Oxford, 1991); J. Edwards, Religious Affections, vol. 2 in Works of Jonathan Edwards (Yale, 1977); D. F. Ford, The Shape of Living (London, 1997); idem, Self and Salvation (Cambridge, 1999); J. Piper, Desiring God: Confessions of a Christian Hedonist (Leicester and Downers Grove, 2004).

J. D. WOODS

JUDAISM AND CHRISTIANITY

To speak of Judaism and Christianity might be taken to suggest that there are two comparable entities founded on similar principles. Only from the late eighteenth century did Jews conceptualize observances and communal organization along the lines of what may be called '*religion'. The task in hand was to make themselves acceptable to a society which, notably in France and the German principalities, privileged the Christian traditions adhered to by the majority of the population. Thus the Jewish community became a religious organization alongside Christian churches, its organizational structure partly copied from the churches, but retaining distinctly Jewish characteristics.

Before emancipation (1792 onwards), Jewish communities in Europe were founded on the basis of contractual arrangements with the relevant local or provincial authorities and/or on *canon law. Christians regarded the members of these Jewish communities as 'foreigners', and even Jews accepted that they were admitted for a particular purpose and could be expelled. Indeed, some have cast this period of Jewish history in Europe as a long list of expulsions and persecutions at the hand of Christian communities and authorities. This perspective may be extended into the modern era. Even with emancipation, persecutions did not come to an end, but rather, with the development of modern racist anti-Semitism, took a different turn, the consequences of which can be observed in the *Holocaust.

Jews in Europe understood their own communities as much as an ethnic entity as a community of faith. Faith in a set of doctrinal propositions did not determine membership in the Jewish community. Jews were born into the Jewish community and, unless converting to another faith, did not, and often could not, leave the Jewish community. While individuals propagating positions deemed contrary to the unity of the community could be cast out as heretics, these bans were localized judgments of limited duration. Hence, Jewishness can be conceived as an ethnicity (see *Race), and has also been cast in terms of belonging to a people or, in its modern sense, a nation.

Christian conceptualizations of Jews are as old as the beginnings of the church. The primary problem of the largely Jewish early church was not its attitude to Jewish religious backgrounds, but rather the question of Gentiles becoming believers in the God of Israel and in the Jewish Messiah. Must Gentiles become Jews in order to become followers of Jesus, with all that this entails in terms of the observance of Jewish law? In Gal. and Rom., Paul evaluates the ways in which Christians of Jewish origin and the increasing number of Gentile Christians can successfully live together. Acts 15:1–29 suggests the danger of a split between a community comprised mainly of Jewish Christians and communities outside of the land of Israel whose members are mainly Gentile. Paul also develops a theological foundation for the relationship between Jews and Gentiles in Rom. 9–11 which, in recent theology, has given biblical foundations to *covenant theology.

Recent scholarship on the ‘parting of the ways’ of church and synagogue suggests that this was a long process extending into the fifth century. During the first five centuries both the Christian and Jewish communities developed the principles on which their respective observances and organizational structures for the following thousand years were founded, and which in significant respects survive today, even after the separation between Constantinople and Rome, the transformations of *Reformation, *Enlightenment and *secularization, and in spite of the development of distinctly modern Jewish movements. Polemics between communities abound in the early centuries of the church and, with Christianity’s rise to dominance during Constantine’s reign, became integral to parts of Christian theology. NT texts can be read as embodying polemics against certain Jewish practices and communities, but their history of interpretation contains strong anti-Semitic currents, in particular where references to ‘the Jews’ are applied to Jews at all times. *Augustine’s interpretation of Jews as ‘witness people’ whose existence demonstrates the glory of Christ and the salvific power of Christianity became central to church teaching. While this interpretation ensured the possibility for Jewish communities to live as tolerated minorities in Christian society, it also contributed to the restrictions placed on Jewish communities. Christian persecution of Jews, tolerated by the church, found theological justification in the accusation of Jews as ‘Christ killers’, leading to the accusation of deicide. On the one hand, Jewish communities often enjoyed the protection of Gentile authorities. On the other, Christian persecution, whether by the masses such as during the Crusades or of monarchs such as Ferdinand and Isabella of Spain, led to the massacre of whole communities (e.g. in the Rhineland during the Crusades from 1096 onwards) and the murder or expulsion of Jews who did not submit to forced conversions from much of Western Europe (e.g. expulsion from Spain in 1492). The ‘Pale of Settlement’, encompassing much of Poland, Belorussia, the Ukraine and parts of Western Russia, became home to the largest population of Jews in northern Europe. There Jews found a geographical and social space of relative autonomy and freedom that allowed some economic prosperity (while many continued to live in poverty) and scholarly excellence, though interrupted by pogroms (notably in 1648 by Cossacks under Bogdan Chmielnicki). A sharpening of nationalism and anti-Semitism at the end of the nineteenth century, the Russian Revolution of 1917, and the Holocaust brought this period of Jewish life in Europe to an end.

After the Holocaust, some churches reflected on the close connection between Christian teachings about Jews and the medieval and modern racist anti-Semitism. Some churches, in particular in Europe and North America, have revised their interpretation of continued Jewish communal and religious life alongside Christian communities. Jews are no longer perceived as representing a rival option of salvation which dispenses with the need for Christ and which thus may be seen as challenging the efficacy of the Christian message. Rather, this kind of Christian theology has begun to speak of Jewish religious life in an affirmative way. Drawing heavily on Rom. 9 – 11, theories of a single and double covenant theology developed, both of which suggest that Jews have no need of being drawn into a relationship with God through Christ, since the covenant of Sinai on which the Jewish relationship with God is founded is still valid. *Vatican II's Nostra Aetate 4 affirm the continuing validity of the Jewish relationship with God and, along with statements of individual local Protestant denominations, reject Christian mission to convert Jews to Christianity. At the same time, Christians as individuals as well as representatives of churches have begun to develop a Christian-Jewish dialogue which aims to foster better understanding between Jews and Christians and to aid the Christian re-evaluation of its interpretations of Jews.

Such change to Christian theological thought and practice is located on the margins of the churches and embraced by few. The majority of the Christian community remains untouched by these developments. This may be due to theological objections to such enterprises or a perceived irrelevance of Christian-Jewish relations to their particular context. In particular, conservative Christian circles in both Catholic, Protestant and Orthodox churches object to changes to traditional Christian teaching about Jews, as this would challenge *salvation-historical doctrine.

See also: ISRAEL; JEWISH-CHRISTIAN RELATIONS; RABBINIC THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

C. E. Braaten and R. W. Jensen (eds.), Jews and Christians: People of God (Grand Rapids, 2003); P. M. van Buren, A Theology of the Jewish-Christian Reality, Part I–III (San Francisco, 1981–8); N. Cohen (ed.), Essential Papers on Jewish-Christian Relations in the United States (New York, 1990); D. Cohn-Sherbok (ed.), The Future of Jewish-Christian Dialogue (Lewiston, 2000); A. T. Davies (ed.), Antisemitism and the Foundations of Christianity (New York, 1979); E. J. Fisher (ed.), Visions of the Other: Jewish and Christian Theologians Assess the Dialogue, Studies in Judaism and Christianity (New York, 1994); S. R. Haynes, Jews and the Christian Imagination: Reluctant Witnesses (Basingstoke and London, 1995); G. I. Langmuir, History, Religion and Antisemitism (Berkeley, 1990); M. Perry and F. M. Schweitzer (eds.), Jewish-Christian Encounters over the Centuries: Symbiosis, Prejudice, Holocaust, Dialogue, American University Studies Series IX: History, vol. 136 (New York, 1994); M. Saperstein, Moments of Crisis in Jewish-Christian Relations (London and Philadelphia, 1989); M. Shermis and A. Zannoni (eds.), Introduction to Jewish-Christian Relations (1991); G. Wigoder, Jewish-Christian Relations since the Second World War (Manchester and New York, 1988).

K. H. HOLTSCHNEIDER

JUDGMENT OF GOD

God's judgment reflects the character of God himself in relation to creation and all human history. This judgment has been initiated and revealed in Jesus Christ, bringing God's *kingdom into history, a kingdom to be finally and totally implemented at the last judgment or second coming of Christ. The NT sees human history existing between these two moments of judgment, with an era of divine forbearance until the final judgment, related theologically as 'realized' and 'thoroughgoing' *eschatology. The relation between these points is *Jesus Christ, 'the judge judged in our place' at Calvary and raised victorious over sin and death (K. Barth, CD, 4.1), in whose light all will be judged at the end of their lives. Barth argues that Jesus Christ destroyed sin by his great sacrifice at Calvary, passing judgment on it victoriously, and the last judgment is where the absolute destruction of *sin takes place, the completion of this judgment. The dead are raised to judgment, for eternal life or death, the moment transcending therefore our space and time continuum. The human race will be judged by its attitude to Christ and his revelation of God's holy love, shown by the episode of the repentant thief on the cross (Luke 23:42).

Judgment of holy love

The judgment on sin revealed and enacted at Calvary shows the truth of *Calvin's view that this bearing of human judgment by God the Son flows from holy *love (Institutes, II.XVII. 2). Divine judgment is the divine attitude to sin; a wider category than just moral wrong according to human standards, God's judgment attends to the heart and to the full circumstances of a person. A person is judged according to their deeds and to what the whole person has become as a result. Divine forbearance in judging is a permeating theme in the Bible. God's verdict is given at the end of a life, and this verdict is in a sense also the verdict of the person being judged: 'This is the verdict [judgment]: Light has come into the world, but men loved darkness instead of light' (John 3:19).

Rudolph Bultmann's 'demythologizing' existential interpretation of eschatological judgment stresses exclusively an inward aspect of self-judgment in the light of Jesus in the here and now, but he makes the mistake of rejecting an objective final divine judgment. We can harden our hearts, or open our hearts to God, and according to the parables of Jesus strict religiosity can lead to a deadening and anthropocentric moralism, whereas a genuine sense of our own unholiness is mandatory for the disciple who trusts solely on God's mercy, exemplified in the parable of the Pharisee and the tax collector (Luke 18:9–14). Divine judgment is therefore 'relational' in Christian theology, not a matter of detached rejection or acceptance: rather the relationship is already one of judgment or *grace, of our rejection of or trust in God, a theme linked to Abrahamic faith and hence the unevangelized (Rom. 4:3). The gospel teaches that Christ crucified and risen is the true anchor for such trust. The disciple shares in the identity and human status of the second *Adam or remaker of humanity, dead to sin and alive in a new resurrection life (Rom. 8:1). Barth points out that the presupposition of divine judgment is divine love: 'His love lives and rules before and over and even in His judgment. Thus even as the ineluctable judgment of wrath, which is the form it necessarily takes, is the instrument of His love' (CD, II.2, 735).

The justice of divine judgment

God cannot be true to his own being simply to 'excuse' wrongs. Our actions matter and cannot be overlooked in a moral universe. Liberal theology has contested the need for divine judgment to be enacted since God is love, anticipated by Heinrich Heine's dying words in 1856: 'Of course God will forgive me, that's his business.' The response to this by theologians such as *Forsyth and *Barth has been that God is holy and cannot implicitly connive at wrong by overlooking it; to do so is not love in any deep sense. Sociologist Peter Berger makes one of his 'signals of transcendence' 'the argument from damnation', that is, the human sense of the need for 'a retribution that is more than human' in the case of monstrous evil, such as Nazi mass murder (A Rumor of Angels, New York, 1970, p. 87). This kind of example of evil evacuates the indulgent liberal view of divine judgment, having no theological depth in terms of divine holiness or human sin. The truth of divine judgment on human wrong is necessary in a moral universe, upholding the goodness of God, respecting the dignity of humanity. Doctrines of heaven and hell arise from this.

Christ enacts and bears divine judgment as the suffering servant, absorbing human sin and dealing with the human predicament in every dimension, including that of justice and responsibility. Objectively and subjectively, Jesus' painful and unjust death expresses divine judgment on human sin, unmasking it and triumphing over evil in history (see *Atonement).

Judgment in and on history

Judgment emerges as both a point of final verdict in the comings of Christ, and also a process at work in the world, whereby God allows humanity to suffer the spiralling consequences of sin (Rom. 1) and become aware of the need for *salvation. Into this maelstrom of human sin came Jesus Christ to reveal and enact decisive divine judgment, and after Calvary the Spirit convicts the world of 'guilt in regard to sin and righteousness and judgment' (John 16:7). The last judgment is still to happen, and yet has been anticipated in Christ, 'who will judge the living and the dead' with true authority. We are bidden not to judge others, but leave judgment to God (Job; Luke 13:4).

A major twentieth-century emphasis has been to put God into the dock of judgment on the grounds of mass suffering of two world wars and the *Holocaust, stressing God's fellow-suffering rather than undergoing of judgment for sin (see *Impassibility of God). The NT weaves these two themes together: innocent suffering is taken into God's mercy by Jesus, who identifies himself as the suffering servant of Isa. 53 (Mark 14:24); God passes judgment on sin through his bearing of injustice and suffering in Christ.

This has been interpreted as the process of 'the creative suffering of God' (P. S. Fiddes), the notion that God waits for his wayward creation to return to him, a painful process grieving the heart of the divine revealed at Calvary, shocking us into transforming self-judgment. The sovereign act of judgment upon history becomes a process immanent with it, drawn by divine persuasion. J. A. T. Robinson's In the End, God argued that nothing finally will be able to resist God's love, and so all will be saved, a kind of *universalism akin to the Eastern Orthodox doctrine of apokatastasis, the idea that all will be cleansed through the fire of divine judgment. The last judgment will totally eradicate all evil (including the *devil) that has not responded to Christ's love and challenge to repent. Christ's *resurrection, including yet transcending time, is linked theologically with this moment of destroying all evil and delivering the kingdom to the Father (1 Cor. 15:24).

Bibliography

K. Barth CD, II/2, 39; 4.1, 59; J. Calvin, Institutes, Book II (ET, London and Philadelphia, 1960 [1559]); P. S. Fiddes, Past Event and Present Salvation (London, 1989); P. T. Forsyth, The Justification of God (London, 1917); C. S. Lewis, The Great Divorce (London, 1946); J. Moltmann, The Crucified God (ET, Minneapolis, 1974); W. Pannenberg, Jesus, God and Man (Philadelphia, 1970); J. A. T. Robinson, In the End, God (Cambridge, 1968).

T. BRADSHAW

JULIAN OF NORWICH (c. 1342–c. 1416)

We know little about Julian's life: she tells us she was 'a devout woman', living as a recluse at Norwich. She was born in c.1342, fell seriously ill at the age of thirty, and believed herself to have been granted a series of revelations, or 'shewings'. She spent the rest of her life reflecting on what they meant, eventually writing first a short and later a longer version of what in the text is called 'A Revelation of Love', but which later came to be called Showings or Revelations of Divine Love. Both versions begin with the suffering of Christ on the cross: Julian sees the passion of Christ as the key, not just to understanding her own *suffering, but to making sense of the world as a whole. For her, the God we see revealed in Christ is our mother by virtue of God's loving, nurturing and suffering love for us. By that love alone we are set free from the power of both sin and evil. Her theology is profoundly Pauline and Christ-centred, rooted in a lifelong contemplation of the NT and its relevance to the sufferings of her own day: she was born when the Black Death was at its height, hence her relevance to a post-Holocaust age.

See also: MYSTICISM; SPIRITUALITY.

Bibliography

Works: Showings, tr. E. Colledge and J. Walsh (New York and London, 1978).

Studies: D. N. Baker, Julian of Norwich's Showings: From Vision to Book (Princeton, 1994); G. Jantzen, Julian of Norwich (London, 2000); G. Mursell, English Spirituality, vol. 1 (London, 2001).

G. MURSELL

JÜNGEL, EBERHARD (b. 1934)

Jüngel is emeritus professor of systematic theology at the University of Tübingen, and a leading contemporary Protestant theologian. He has published widely on the NT, historical and dogmatic theology, and philosophy of religion. His work is deeply influenced by Ernst Fuchs' (1903–83) theories of language and by *Barth's rigorous Christocentrism. Three main areas of theological concern can be identified. (1) Jüngel expounds an incarnational and trinitarian understanding of God, rooted in God's humble self-identification with the crucified Christ. Much of his work is preoccupied with the theological and ontological implications of Calvary. (2) He uses the motif of justification to develop an *anthropology emphasizing man as receptive and relational rather than self-realizing. (3) He has tried to rephrase *natural theology as a theology of the natural, that is, as an exploration of the universal implications of God's particular self-revelation. All three themes contribute to a theology whose intention is to give an account of the proper distinction between the human God and his human creation. Jüngel has also published perceptive studies of Barth, essays on analogy, metaphor and ontology, and a book on death.

Bibliography

Works: Death (ET, Edinburgh, 1975); The Doctrine of the Trinity (ET, Edinburgh, 1976); God as the Mystery of the World (ET, Edinburgh, 1983).

Studies: P. DeHart, Beyond the Necessary God: Trinitarian Faith and Philosophy in the Thought of Eberhard Jüngel (Atlanta, 2000); D. Nelson, 'The Indicative of Grace, the Imperative of Freedom: An Invitation to the Theology of Eberhard Jüngel', Dialog 44:2 (2005), pp. 164–180; J. B. Webster, Eberhard Jüngel: An Introduction to His Theology (Cambridge, 1986); idem, The Possibilities of Theology: Studies in the Theology of Eberhard Jüngel (London, 2006).

J. B. WEBSTER

JUSTICE, see RIGHTEOUSNESS

JUSTIFICATION

The doctrine of justification pertains to the reconciliation (see *Atonement) that has been effected between God and humanity through the person and work of Jesus Christ. This reconciliation is for those in the church a present reality and for those outside a possibility. As such it is a central doctrine. Luther stated that '... where this article is upheld so is the church, and where this article is overthrown so is the church' (WA 40/3. 352.3). Eighteenth-century Protestantism echoed this sentiment, stating that justification was the 'article upon which the church stands and falls' (articulus stantis et cadentis ecclesiae). Likewise, in the twentieth century, ecumenical dialogues saw agreement on this doctrine as a possible foundation for greater unity.

Historical development

Early church

The doctrine of justification was not a topic of extensive theological debate in the early church. The concept was primarily discussed within exegetical contexts. Of particular interest is the way in which some of the Greek Fathers developed a doctrine of free choice (autexousia). For them humanity was free to choose good or evil over against the Stoic concept of fatalism (cf. *Justin Martyr, II Apology, ch. 7).

This concept was further advanced by Pelagius, a British monk, during the late fourth century, whose theology led to a larger-scale discussion about the forgiveness of sins and whether it came about by grace or by natural moral effort.

Augustine

It seems that Pelagius believed that human beings were created good and that God, through the law, had given humanity all that it needed to live a holy life. Thus *Pelagianism became known as advocating the idea that one could take the initial steps toward *salvation apart from a special gift of grace, thus emphasizing the free will of humanity in salvation. In opposition to this theology, *Augustine developed his theology of *grace. It is important to note, that Augustine, the fountainhead of Western theology, was concerned with articulating a sound theology of grace rather than a theology of justification (see D. Wright, 'Justification in Augustine', in McCormack [ed.], Justification in Perspective, pp. 55–72). It is his theology of grace that laid the foundation for later discussions on justification.

Augustine's theology of grace has three important emphases that provided the foundation for later discussions about justification. (1) It is associated with his doctrine of election based on God's eternal decree of *predestination. For Augustine grace was God's complete freedom to act without any external necessity. God's freedom established his sovereignty. Predestination, therefore, was 'God's arrangement of his future works in his prescience, which cannot be deceived and changed' (PL 45:1019). In this way predestination was a necessary precursor for the gift of grace. (2) In Augustine's thought, *faith was seen as a gift of God's grace. This gift of justifying faith was defined by Augustine as faith which is operative through love (Gal. 5:6). *Love plays a pivotal role in his thought. He once stated: 'Love begun is righteousness begun; love developed, righteousness developed; great love, perfect righteousness; love out of a pure heart and a good conscience and faith feigned' (PL 40:286). (3) Lastly, via propagation from Adam all humanity was born with original *sin, which resulted in a corrupt freedom. This corruption could only be healed by grace. Only then could a person choose to love God and only then because God first loved them.

In addition, Augustine's theology of grace was developed within a sacramental framework.

Thus he spoke of the *sacraments as the main channels of grace, that is, the sacraments of the church mediated grace to believers. ‘There is no other valid means of making Christians and remitting sins, except by causing men to become believers by the institution of Christ and the church, and through the sacraments’ (CSEL 60:149).

It was within this wider context of grace that Augustine occasionally spoke of justification (Lat. iustificatio, iustificare). Thus, he primarily understood it to mean ‘to make righteous’, so that in his treatise The Spirit and the Letter he stated: ‘What else does “having been justified” mean than “having been made just”, that is, by the one who justifies the ungodly, so that from being ungodly one becomes righteous?’ (PL 44:228). This transformative view of justification was predominant in his thought; however, as the Reformers would highlight, Augustine’s thought was broad enough that he did not exclude a declarative view of the forgiveness of sins from justification.

Middle Ages

Following Augustine the Middle Ages developed an elaborate sacramental theology within which the doctrine of justification found its home. As Alister McGrath states: ‘The characteristic medieval understanding of the nature of justification may be summarized thus: justification refers not merely to the beginning of the Christian life, but also to its continuation and ultimate perfection, in which Christians are made righteous in the sight of God and of humanity through a fundamental change in their nature, and not merely in their status’ (Iustitia Dei, p. 59). Within this setting justification was most clearly seen as a transformative progression in grace. A person began their progression in justification first as a child who was baptized, then their grace was strengthened through confirmation and the participation of the Lord’s Supper. If this person then sinned, their progression in grace was halted and they would have to be reintroduced to grace through the sacrament of penance. This cycle of being in a state of grace or sin dominated one’s religious life.

Thus it was during this time that an intricate theology developed around *penance and the question: ‘What must I do to be saved?’ After someone committed a sin, what then was required for the restoration to grace? The medieval school of the via moderna constructed a covenantal theology, which held that God had ordained that all that was necessary for a person to be saved was ‘to do only what they are capable of’ (facere quod in se). Accomplishing ‘what one was capable of’ was seen as an initial move toward receiving grace, and this initial move was then accepted by God as worthy of the forgiveness of sins.

This initial step was spoken of as a *merit of congruity, or a half-merit (i.e. merits that were not worthy of grace in and of themselves but are merits only because God’s covenant ordained to accept them as such). After one was infused or imparted grace one progressed in merits of condignity (i.e. merits stemming from grace that are accepted as having merit to save). This intricate system of merit was advanced via the papal bull Unigenitus (1343), which established the idea of a treasury of merit from which merit could be borrowed through the church by means of indulgences. From this point on an elaborate system of merits was established so that the Christian life was seen as a progression of accumulating more and more merit, until in *purgatory one accomplished perfect satisfaction for one’s sins. This process was theologically understood as justification.

Reformation

*Luther devised his theology of justification in response to this theology of merit. In the system of merit, he emphasized the declarative aspect of the forgiveness of sins based on Augustine’s theology of grace. The forgiveness of sins was not earned but given. For Luther justification came about by faith alone (sola fide) and not by works. With the aid of Philipp *Melancthon, Luther developed a forensic understanding of justification that held negatively that a person’s sin was no longer held against them (i.e. it was not imputed to them as sin), and positively that Christ’s merits (an alien *righteousness) were imputed to them (i.e. Christ’s saving work was credited to the believer). On this account, the Lutheran doctrine of justification has been often explained by the phrase simul iustus et peccator – a Christian is at one and the same time a sinner and righteous. ‘What then? Are we sinners? No, rather we are justified, but by grace.’ Righteousness is not situated in those qualitative forms, but in the mercy of God. In fact, if you take mercy away from the godly, they are sinners, and really have sin, but it is not imputed to them because they believe and live under the reign of mercy, and because sin is condemned and continually put to death in them' (LW 32, p. 208). This dialectical teaching overthrew the penitential cycle of the medieval church based on a cycle of being in a state of sin and then a state of grace. Thus the majority of Reformers held that a Christian was in both states at once – there is no fluctuation between being sinful and righteous; justification was an event of God's grace rather than a process (see *Reformation theology). It should be noted that in Luther studies, the twentieth-century Finnish school has brought to light the more transformative elements in Luther's thought, sometimes in terms of theosis.

Though not characteristic of the early days of the Reformation, the Reformers gradually spoke of the transformation that develops from justification as *sanctification. Thus what the medieval church held together in the doctrine of justification (i.e. forgiveness of sins and moral transformation or progression), the Reformers began to distinguish. As Anthony Lane explains, justification and sanctification are like the two legs of a pair of trousers: they are distinguishable but cannot be separated (A. N. S. Lane, Justification by Faith, p. 18).

During the sixteenth century the *Roman Catholic Church responded to this Reformation doctrine of justification and its forensic leanings at the Council of *Trent. At the sixth session (1547) of this council they rejected the Reformation teaching of sola fide and insisted on the imparted nature of grace rather than an imputed understanding of justifying grace. Hence, the Catholic Church focused on the transformative element of justification, seeing it more as a process than an event. This dichotomy between event and process, declaration and transformation, Protestant and Catholic, has characterized much of the modern understanding of justification to the present day.

Current issues

Ecumenical movement

In Hans *Küng's work Justification: The Doctrine of Karl Barth and a Catholic Reflection, he argued that the Roman Catholic and Protestant positions over justification were actually compatible. This work acted as a catalyst for larger cross-confessional dialogues over the topic of justification. The largest and most successful of these dialogues has been between the *Lutheran Church and the Catholic Church. On 31 October 1999 the Lutheran World Federation and the Roman Catholic Church signed the Joint Declaration on the Doctrine of Justification. In this document both sides affirmed that the condemnations of the sixteenth century no longer applied and stated, 'Together we confess: By grace alone, in faith in Christ's saving work and not because of any merit on our part, we are accepted by God and receive the Holy Spirit, who renews our hearts while equipping and calling us to good works' (Joint Declaration, para. 15). This agreement has led to a greater healing of the division between Protestants and Catholics.

New perspective

Concurrent with the ecumenical dialogues, NT scholars were rigorously investigating first-century Judaism, and these investigations began to change certain scholars' views about Paul's thought in regard to the law (esp. E. P. Sanders, James Dunn, N. T. Wright) (see *Law and gospel). Rather than seeing the works of the law as moral works, this new school tends to understand that when Paul refers to the works of the law he is referring to the laws that defined a Jew over against a Gentile. The way in which one understands Paul's understanding of the works of the law is pivotal for understanding what Paul means by justification. The verdict is still out on this new perspective; however, it has reinvigorated Pauline studies as well as theologians' views on justification.

With the various ecumenical dialogues and new investigations into Paul's theology the new debate over the doctrine of justification is providing opportunities for reconciliation between brothers and sisters of different denominations. We need no longer speak of either or, but both and, as Karl Barth eloquently stated: 'There is no room for any fears that in the justification of man we are dealing only with a verbal action, with a kind of bracketed "as if", as though what is pronounced were not the whole truth about man. Certainly we have to do with a declaring righteous, but it is a declaration about man which is fulfilled and therefore effective in this event, which corresponds to actuality because it creates and therefore reveals the actuality. It is a declaring righteous which without any reserve can be called a making righteous' (CD IV.1, p. 95).

See also: GUILT AND FORGIVENESS.

Bibliography

H. G. Anderson, T. A. Murphy and J. A. Burgess (eds.), Justification by Faith: Lutherans and Catholics in Dialogue VII (Minneapolis, 1985); D. E. Aune (ed.), Rereading Paul Together: Protestant and Catholic Perspectives on Justification (Grand Rapids, 2006); K. Barth, Church Dogmatics, tr. by G. W. Bromiley and T. F. Torrance, IV/1 (Edinburgh, 1956); J. D. G. Dunn, Jesus, Paul and the Law: Studies in Mark and Galatians (London, 1990); M. Husbards and D. J. Treier (eds.), Justification: What's at Stake in the Current Debates (Downers Grove, 2004); R. Jensen, 'Justification as a Triune Event', in Modern Theology 11 (1995), pp. 421–427; Joint Declaration on the Doctrine of Justification (Grand Rapids, 2000); E. Jüngel, Justification: The Heart of the Christian Faith, tr. by J. Webster (Edinburgh, 2001); H. Küng, Justification: The Doctrine of Karl Barth and a Catholic Reflection, 2nd edn (London, 1964); A. N. S. Lane, Justification by Faith in Catholic-Protestant Dialogue: An Evangelical Assessment (London, 2002); M. Luther, Kritische Gesamtausgabe (Weimar, 1883–); idem, Luther's Works, J. Pelikan and H. T. Lehmann (eds.) (St Louis, 1955–76); T. Mannermaa, Christ Present in Faith: Luther's View of Justification (Philadelphia, 2005); B. L. McCormack (ed.), Justification in Perspective: Historical Developments and Contemporary Challenges (Grand Rapids, 2006); A. E. McGrath, Iustitia Dei: A History of the Christian Doctrine of Justification, 3rd edn (Cambridge, 2005); A. B. Ritschl, A Critical History of the Christian Doctrine of Justification and Reconciliation (Edinburgh, 1871); W. G. Rusch (ed.), Justification and the Future of the Ecumenical Movement: The Joint Declaration on the Doctrine of Justification (Collegeville, 2003); E. P. Sanders, Paul and Palestinian Judaism: A Comparison of Patterns of Religion (Philadelphia, 1977); N. T. Wright, Justification: God's Plan and God's Vision (Downers Grove, 2009); idem, What St. Paul Really Said (Oxford, 1997).

B. LUGIOYO

JUSTIN MARTYR (c. 100–162/7)

Justin is perhaps the most significant Greek-speaking *apologist of the second century.

Autobiographical statements and material from Eusebius' History suggest he was born at Flavia Neapolis (near Shechem) into a pagan family c. 100. Justin recounts how, after investigating different pagan philosophies, an old man instructed him in true philosophy, Christianity. Justin probably taught in Rome on two occasions, and was martyred 162–7 under Marcus Aurelius, possibly because of the enmity of his Cynic opponent, Crescens.

Many works are attributed to him, but only the First and Second Apologies and the Dialogue with Trypho can be assigned with confidence. The Apologies and the Dialogue have different targets, the former dealing with the position of Christians within a pagan society and the latter the relationship between Christian and Jewish beliefs.

The First Apology is in form an appeal for justice from the emperor Antoninus Pius, and the Second an address to the Romans. In the Apologies, Justin employs arguments which became typical of Christian *apologetic. He argues that Christians should not be persecuted for the 'name alone', but only for specific crimes. He contrasts Christian moral life with pagan immorality, and trenchantly criticizes the immorality of Greco-Roman mythology, arguing that pagan religion is demonic deceit.

In the Dialogue two key strategies emerge: the OT law was not a path to salvation, and OT prophecy refers to Christ. Justin characteristically construes OT theophanies as appearances of the Son, an interpretation that persisted until *Augustine, and has followers today.

Justin is associated with a positive evaluation of pagan philosophy and his idea of the logos spermatikos, at work in all human beings. In fact Justin weighs this work, and its results in pagan philosophy, against the revelation of the divine Word in Jesus, which alone he sees as complete. Hence his stance that Christianity is the true philosophy.

Bibliography

Works: The Apologies of Justin Martyr, ed. A. W. F. Blunt (Eugene, 2006); Dialogue with Trypho, eds. M. Slusser and T. Halton (Washington DC, rev. edn, 2003).

Studies: R. M. Grant, Greek Apologists of the Second Century (London, 1988).

M. OVEY

KÄHLER, MARTIN (1835–1912)

Kähler was a German Protestant theologian who studied law at the University of Königsberg and theology at the universities of Heidelberg, Tübingen and Halle. Following a brief time at Bonn (1864–67), he served as professor of systematic theology and NT exegesis at Halle (from 1879). His magnum opus was a three-volume work on Christian doctrine (Die Wissenschaft der christlichen Lehre, 1883–87), but the work for which he is remembered today is a small booklet entitled The So-called Historical Jesus and the Historic Biblical Christ (tr. with intro., C. E. Braaten, Philadelphia, 1964; Der sogenannte historische Jesus und der geschichtliche, biblische Christus, 1896), in which he rejected the terms of reference of the liberal ‘quest of the *historical Jesus’ with its implied separation of faith from history, of the *Jesus who lived from the church’s kerygma concerning him. The attempt to get behind the data of the Gospels to the ‘real Jesus’, he argued, is futile. He raised critical, dogmatic and apologetic objections to the work of the liberal ‘questers’. Their critical basis was flawed by their assumption that the Gospels give us the material necessary to construct a coherent, developmental life of Jesus; they were never intended to give us this. Theologically, they mistakenly presupposed that Jesus was a mere man like themselves. And, apologetically, they made the faith of the ordinary Christian believer the captive of the latest results of scholarly opinion, rather than allowing him direct access to the object of his faith, the historic Jesus portrayed in the Gospels and proclaimed by the apostles. The united confession of the early church that ‘Jesus is Lord’ was no mere theological construction, but was firmly rooted in history.

Bibliography

C. E. Braaten, ‘Martin Kähler on the Historic, Biblical Christ’, in Braaten and R. A. Harrisville (eds.), The Historical Jesus and the Kerygmatic Christ (Nashville, 1964), pp. 79–105; Braaten and Harrisville (eds.), Kerygma and History (Nashville, 1962); A. E. McGrath, The Making of Modern German Christology, 1750–1990 (Grand Rapids, 1994); D. K. McKim, Dictionary of Major Biblical Interpreters (Downers Grove, 2007).

W. W. GASQUE

KANT, IMMANUEL (1724–1804)

For many years professor of logic and metaphysics at the University of Königsberg, East Prussia, Kant is now seen as a seminal figure of the *Enlightenment period. His immense influence on the whole range of human enquiry, including theology, stems out of his distinctive understanding of the nature of human knowledge and belief.

The background to Kant’s thinking here was the development of two philosophical traditions: British *empiricism and Continental *rationalism. The former, in its understanding of the nature of human belief, placed a primary emphasis on experience. The latter stressed the importance of innate principles and ideas within the human mind. Kant at once unites, and stands at the climax of, both traditions. Thus he affirms the importance of sense-organ experience in human knowledge. But Kant also argues that the human mind is not a wholly passive receptor of these sense experiences. On the contrary, the mind is constantly active in organizing and classifying the raw materials of experience. In this way the human mind imposes on experience its own distinctive categories and concepts. (These ‘Forms of Intuition’ or ‘Pure Ideas’ are what Kant terms the synthetic a priori dimension of human understanding.) Here, however, an obvious question arises: If we are constantly imposing our own ideas and categories on the world of experience, is this not a source of distortion and prejudice? We may constantly wear red-tinted spectacles. If so, then everything without exception will appear to be red. But this does not mean that the whole of reality is actually red.

It is, in effect, Kant’s response to this problem which constitutes his most important contribution to philosophy. Kant maintains that we cannot know things in themselves: all knowledge is from a certain perspective and through a particular mode of understanding. But he also argues that, whilst the human mind does impose its own forms of understanding on the world, nevertheless, the world must be of a certain character in order to receive these forms of understanding.

An example here is his teaching about causality. The Scottish philosopher, David *Hume, had argued that sense-experience could, by itself, never furnish us with the idea of causal connection, but only that of constant conjunction. (For example, we never have a genuine sense-experience of the actual causal relationship between the hot stove and the boiling water. All we ever experience is the constant conjunction or co-existence of these two events.) So where does the idea of causality come from? Hume's answer had been that the mind is psychologically (a-rationally) predisposed to make the step from constant conjunction to causal connection. But, he provocatively urges, the fact that human beings happen to have these particular psychological tendencies does not mean that the material world is actually of a certain character. This is the basis of Hume's scepticism.

Kant's philosophy of knowledge is best understood by reference to the way in which it departs from Hume's at this crucial point. For Kant's fundamental position is this: our actual experience of nature (and in particular the orderliness, regularity and consistency which characterizes this experience) must entail a world to which causal laws are applicable. Only a certain sort of a world would be able to receive our causal pre-understandings. An order of reality characterized by natural anarchy and unqualified random chance could never conform to our fundamental categories of cause and effect. There is philosophical disagreement as to just how much Kant has established here. Nevertheless, the departure from Hume is clear. For Kant, the idea of causation is established as an authentic part of rational human judgment because it is a belief – alongside other fundamental beliefs about the material world – which expresses the conditions of the possibility of experience.

But if for Kant this philosophical approach establishes the possibility of a distinctive knowledge of the material world, it also confirms our inability to know anything beyond it: to know of God, the soul or life beyond death. This is the case since, for Kant, there is no theological proposition whose truth is necessary in order to explain the character of the experiences which we actually have. (In saying this, Kant had already dispelled, to his own satisfaction, the traditional proofs of God's existence. See *Natural theology.) For Kant, the essential problem with religious knowledge is not a shortage of raw data (as a detective might despair of a lack of clues). Rather, it is that the infinite God must forever elude our pre-understandings. He is beyond our limited conceptual apparatus, and thus we cannot in any substantial sense know him. The categories through which we apprehend the world of sense-experience are simply inappropriate for the infinite, the non-conditioned, the eternal metaphysical. And thus in religion, demonstrative reason must give way to practical faith.

The implications for theology here were obviously immense. If God is, in the strictest sense, unknowable, then the proper object and study for theology is not God, but man's religious states and sentiments and their individual and communal expressions. Theology becomes anthropocentric. (Witness, for example, the direct impact of Kant's thinking on *Schleiermacher's theology.) Similarly, within such anthropocentrism, the Scriptures will be seen as a descriptive record of human religious experience, but as having no authority beyond this.

What then is practical faith? And is it wholly divorced from reason? While, for Kant, human beliefs about God, transcendence, human free-will, the soul and immortality are not within the scope of demonstrative reason, they are practical presuppositions of the moral life. Kant does not (contrary to what is sometimes stated) argue here that God is the only possible source of moral judgments – of an objective morality. Rather he argues that to be committed to the moral life is to make the practical presupposition of a beneficent being of sufficient power to unite full virtue and happiness (that is, to bring about the summum bonum), and also of a future state in which the soul will enjoy this union.

The idea (anticipated by Hume) that our minds are constantly imposing their own pre-understandings on to the successive items of experience is today part of common intellectual currency. Thus, for example, it is an idea which is central within the present debates about biblical interpretation (cf. *Hermeneutics). It is also, to cite just two further examples, a key concept in the sociology of knowledge and in much of our thinking about personal relationships. Furthermore, it is a conception which, not least through the writings of the later *Wittgenstein, continues to play a significant part in formal philosophy. All of this testifies to the considerable historical importance of Kant's contribution to human thought. As a figure of the Enlightenment, his self-sufficient reliance on human understanding and reason separates him sharply from the most fundamental principles of Protestantism. But it would be unwise to underestimate his influence on the modern mind.

Bibliography

Works: A Critique of Pure Reason, tr. N. Kemp Smith (London, 1929); The Critique of Practical Reason, tr. T. K. Abbott (London, 1909).

Studies: C. D. Broad, Kant: An Introduction (Cambridge, 1978); S. Körner, Kant (Harmondsworth, 1955); D. J. O'Connor (ed.), A Critical History of Western Philosophy (New York, 1964); R. Scruton, Kant: A Very Short Introduction (Oxford, 2001); T. K. Seung, Kant: A Guide for the Perplexed (London, 2007).

M. D. GELDARD

KARLSTADT, ANDREAS BODENSTEIN VON (1486–1541)

Andreas von Karlstadt was a leading German Reformer whose very popular writings championed lay discipleship. Trained in arts, law and theology, the Wittenberg professor was won over to Luther's understanding of grace by 1517, but moved in a more radical direction. He respected OT revelation and German mysticism, with its emphasis on resigning oneself wholly to God, and on the work of the Spirit in the 'abyss' of the soul. At the famous Leipzig Disputation of 1519 he stood side by side with *Luther and during the former's enforced absence after the Diet of Worms effectively took over the leadership of the reforming movement in Wittenberg. Impatient of compromise, he abolished the Mass and urged the removal of statues and paintings from the churches. He also came to reject infant baptism and the real presence in the Lord's Supper (see *Eucharist). When the Peasants' War broke out in 1524, Karlstadt was caught between the fronts, deploring its violence, but identifying himself with the poor. In later life he taught and preached in Zurich and Basel. His passion for inward faith foreshadowed many of the concerns of *Pietism.

See also: REFORMATION THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

E. J. Furcha (ed.), The Essential Carlstadt (Scottsdale, 1995); R. J. Sider, Andrew Bodenstein von Karlstadt: The Development of His Thought (Leiden, 1974).

P. C. MATHESON

KÄSEMANN, ERNST (1906–98)

A student of *Bultmann, Käsemann was professor of NT successively in Mainz, Göttingen and Tübingen, and was also identified with the German *Confessing Church during the Third Reich. His main achievements have been significant and necessary modifications in the dominant Bultmannian hypothesis.

(1) He initiated the so-called 'new quest for the *historical Jesus', pointing out that to have the 'Christ of faith' without historical anchorage led to potential *docetism. He still insisted, however, on the importance of demythologizing (see *Myth) the Gospels as the necessary corollary of *justification by *faith alone. (Faith must not be based on history, according to the Bultmannian school, lest it turn into a 'work': see 4. below.)

(2) He argued that *apocalyptic, not *Gnosticism, was the 'mother of early Christianity', i.e. that Christianity, including *Paul's theology, was essentially Jewish in origin.

(3) He argued that 'the righteousness of God' was not, as in Bultmann (and, so he claimed, in Luther), a status or attribute given by God to people, but God's own 'salvation-creating power'.

(4) He understood Paul's theology as revolving around the 'justification of the ungodly' as opposed to an immanent process of developing *salvation-history (which he saw, embryonically, in Luke).

He was active in World Council of Churches circles, speaking on ecclesiology and the political implications of the gospel (see his Jesus Means Freedom). In 1977 he left the Lutheran church to become a Methodist following a dispute over student protest in Tübingen, but later returned. Alongside shorter works on Hebrews and John, his magnum opus is the commentary on Romans (1973: ET, London and Grand Rapids, 1980), for which he prepared with three volumes of essays on NT theology, particularly that of Paul. A collection of essays in his honour was published in 1976 under the title Rechtfertigung ('Justification'), edited by J. Friedrich et al. (Tübingen).

Bibliography

R. Harrisville and W. Sundberg, The Bible in Modern Culture: Theology and Historical Critical Method from Spinoza to Käsemann (Grand Rapids, 2002), pp. 238–261; R. P. Maran, 'Ernst Käsemann', in D. K. McKim (ed.), Historical Handbook of Major Biblical Interpreters (Downers Grove, 1998), pp. 500–505; R. Morgan, The Nature of New Testament Theology (London, 1973), pp. 52–65; D. V. Way, The Lordship of Christ: Ernst Käsemann's Interpretation of Paul's Theology (Oxford, 1991); N. T. Wright, Pauline Perspectives (London, 2013; idem, Paul and His Recent Interpreters (London, 2015), pp. 46–57, 145–150.

N. T. WRIGHT

KEBLE, JOHN (1792–1866)

John Keble, son of an Anglican gentleman-parson living in Gloucestershire, was educated at Oxford, where he became a fellow of Oriel College (1811–23). While in Oxford, Keble became a beloved figure, and was renowned for his good nature and wisdom even more than for his undoubted academic brilliance. Unusually, he regarded his tutorial role as a 'species of pastoral care' and before long was ordained and left Oriel, first to help his father and then in 1836 to take up what he felt was his true calling, the curacy of a small parish in Hursley, Hampshire, which he held until he died.

When a volume of Keble's devotional verses for Sundays and Holy Days entitled The Christian Year was published in 1827, it became extremely popular, and some of the poems are still used as hymns today. From 1831 until 1841, Keble was Professor of Poetry at Oxford; this led to his preaching the Assize Sermon in 1833, published under the title National Apostasy. His concept of the catholic and apostolic church in this sermon seemed startlingly new to most contemporary Anglicans, but to Keble himself, bred in the tradition of the *Caroline Divines, it was something dear and familiar. The sermon quickly became famous, and is widely considered to have initiated the revival in the Anglican Church known as the Oxford Movement (see *Anglo-Catholic theology). For the rest of his life, John Keble endeavoured to reaffirm what he regarded as the supreme importance of the sacraments and liturgy within *Anglicanism.

Bibliography

Works: Many editions of The Christian Year (1827); Lyra Innocentium (1846); Sermons Academical (1848); Life of Bishop Wilson (1863); Sermons Occasional and Parochial (1867).

Studies: G. Battiscombe, John Keble: A Study in Limitations (London, 1963); K. Blair (ed.), John Keble in Context (London, 2004); J. T. Coleridge, A Memoir of the Rev. John Keble, M.A., 2 vols. (Oxford, 1869); W. Lock, John Keble (London, 1895); G. Rowell, The Vision Glorious (Oxford, 1983); C. M. Yonge, Musings over the 'Christian Year' and 'Lyra Innocentium', Together with a Few Gleanings of Recollections of the Rev. John Keble, Gathered by Several Friends (Oxford, 1871).

M. M. SZURKO

KENOTICISM

Kenoticism, from the Gk kenōsis, meaning (self-) 'emptying' (used in Phil. 2:6–7), refers to a number of related *Christological theories concerning the status of the divine in the incarnate Christ. While the term is found in a number of patristic writers and formed a key point of controversy between the Lutheran theological faculties of Tübingen and Giessen in the seventeenth century, kenoticism is usually associated with a group of German theologians in the mid-nineteenth century: G. Thomassius (1802–75), F. H. R. von Frank (1827–94) and W. F. Gess (1819–91) and a group of British theologians in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries: Charles *Gore, H. R. *Mackintosh, Frank Weston (1871–1924), P. T. *Forsyth and O. C. Quick (1885–1944).

The German kenoticists took the idea of self-emptying beyond its usual bounds of voluntary self-restraint of the divine nature by the God-man (the position of the Giessen faculty). Instead, they believed that the divine *Logos limited itself in the act of *incarnation. The actual theories varied. Thomassius separated the metaphysical attributes, omnipotence, omnipresence and omniscience, from the moral attributes, love and holiness. The Logos gave up the former while retaining the latter. Other German kenoticists (Frank and Gess), however, took more radical positions, which stripped Jesus of any of the attributes of divinity and called into question the use of the term 'incarnation'.

The British kenoticists had a more positive orientation. Although often accused of developing kenoticism simply as a means of accommodating the results of biblical criticism by admitting the possibility of human ignorance in Jesus, it would be more true to say that British kenoticists, under the impact of a more historical reading of the Gospels, came to the conclusion that traditional Christologies did not do justice to Jesus' human life. Thus, it was the Gospel records of the human and limited consciousness of Jesus that the British kenoticists asserted over the strongly *docetic dogmatic tradition. Among the individual kenoticists the actual manner in which the divine self-emptying was believed to have occurred varied, but in general the emphasis was on the gracious character of the divine condescension and not on the precise metaphysical explanation of the act.

The current status of kenoticism is difficult to assess. On the one hand, although kenoticism is not a popular way of expressing the nature of the incarnation among conservative Christians, it should be noted that many of the major themes of the British kenoticists have been incorporated into modern evangelical Christologies. The reality of Jesus' temptations, his single (as opposed to double) consciousness, and the depth of pathos of the cry of dereliction from the cross are universally affirmed today. In the nineteenth century these were often considered part of the kenoticists' heretical innovations. On the other hand, modern evangelicalism is justifiably sceptical of any metaphysical speculation concerning the process of incarnation and sees the use of kenotic language as almost always inviting such speculation.

Bibliography

P. Dawe, The Form of a Servant: A Historical Analysis of the Kenotic Motif (Philadelphia, 1963); C. S. Evans (ed.), Exploring Kenotic Christology: The Self-Emptying of God (Oxford, 2006; Vancouver, 2010); P. T. Forsyth, The Person and Place of Christ (London, 1909); O. C. Quick, Doctrines of the Creed (London, 1938).

B. E. FOSTER

KERYGMA, KERYGMATIC THEOLOGY

The Greek word kērygma is usually translated proclamation, preaching or announcement and, outside of the NT, it was used generally of a public notice proclaimed by a herald whereby that which was announced became effective by the act of announcing it.

The usage of the word within the NT makes no distinction between the act of proclamation and the content of that proclamation, though C. H. *Dodd and others have tried to trace a single core of content in the *gospel proclamation of the primitive church as recorded in the sermons and letters of the NT. Though one may presume a unanimity among the writers of the NT concerning the essential elements of the gospel message, there is little evidence of any fixed or definitive “*creed’ to which the proclamation of the primitive church invariably conformed. In this sense, the content of the kerygma as recorded in the NT must be discerned from each specific context of proclamation.

However, the word ‘kerygma’ has acquired a more specific philosophical and technical significance in modern theology through its usage by Rudolf *Bultmann. Bultmann suggested that the writing of the NT documents occurred within the context of the proclamation of the primitive church, and therefore the documents themselves were kerygmatic in character. He then argued that it is both inappropriate and futile to probe behind this kerygma of the primitive church as recorded in the NT documents in order to discern the underlying historical data. The attempt to legitimize the kerygma in historical terms was considered by Bultmann to be symptomatic of a lack of *faith; the quest to discover the “*historical Jesus’ behind the ‘Christ of faith’ had to be dismissed as invalid. Bultmann then considered that, since the kerygma of the NT is expressed in the terms of a primitive worldview, this kerygma had to be demythologized (see *Myth) and reinterpreted in the terms of an *existentialist philosophy. This stretching of the term ‘kerygma’ and the resultant wedge that was driven between the ‘Jesus of history’ and the ‘Christ of faith’ was both unhelpful and misleading. It is hard to avoid the conclusion that through this process of demythologization and an existentialist reinterpretation of the kerygma Bultmann had arrived at a ‘different gospel’ (Gal. 1:6).

Bultmann’s hermeneutic developed from the seed-bed of *dialectical theology which is sometimes itself referred to as kerygmatic theology and which was characteristic of the early writings of Karl *Barth. In reaction to the *liberalism of nineteenth-century German theology, Barth proclaimed the radical discontinuity between God and man. The authentic subject of theology is not man and his religion, but God and his word: the word that demands obedience; the word that authenticates itself; the word that does not therefore require historical legitimization. Though Barth in his Church Dogmatics continues to reject any authentication of God's word by means of historical criticism, he avoids the dualism implicit in Bultmann's distinction between the 'Jesus of history' and the 'Christ of faith' and also rejects Bultmann's process of demythologization: the *resurrection of Jesus Christ is a real event of space and time, albeit an event which will not yield to the scrutiny of positivistic historical science.

Bibliography

H. W. Bartsch (ed.), Kerygma and Myth, 2 vols. (London, 1953, 1962); R. Bultmann, Theology of the New Testament, 2 vols. (London, 1952, 1955); C. H. Dodd, The Apostolic Preaching and Its Developments (London, 1936); M. D. Gibson, 'Does Jesus Have a Say in the Kerygma? A Critical Remembrance of Bultmann', SJT 58, 2005, pp. 83–103; V. A. Harvey, The Historian and the Believer (London, 1967); J. I. H. McDonald, Kerygma and Didache: The Articulation and Structure of the Earliest Christian Message (Cambridge, 1980).

J. E. COLWELL

KESWICK, see HIGHER-LIFE THEOLOGY

KIERKEGAARD, SØREN AABYE (1813–55)

In philosophical terms Kierkegaard can be seen as the father-figure of *existentialism. He consciously opposed *Hegel's philosophy, stressing by contrast the role of individual decision and active engagement with truth within the confines of concrete, finite existence. Truth must be true 'for me'. In religious terms, he saw the purpose of his writings as that of showing what it meant to be a Christian. This was very different from being a 'name-Christian' in the Danish state church of his day. In theological terms he rejected an over-intellectualist notion of *faith and reflected extensively on the role of ethical decision and a stage of faith which might be said to transcend it.

Kierkegaard was born and educated in Copenhagen. Three sets of events or relationships have special importance for an understanding of his writings.

(1) He grew up under the shadow of a dominating father who was himself plagued by a sense of guilt. Mikael, the father, believed that his own act in childhood of cursing God could never be forgiven. He exacted high standards of academic success from Søren, who tried his best to please his father in this dismal atmosphere of duty, anxiety and guilt. But Søren was deeply shocked when he discovered that his father was not the morally upright man he had assumed him to be. His authority figure collapsed and now he sought to discover what it meant to live as and for himself. For a period he experienced moral decline, but self-discovery led on further to an experience of repentance and faith.

(2) Kierkegaard resumed his studies, and had begun pastoral ministry in the Lutheran Church when he fell deeply in love with Regine Olsen. But as soon as they became engaged, he was filled with a sense of utter unworthiness. He felt compelled to withdraw both from the engagement and from the life of a Lutheran pastor. He interpreted his 'sacrifice' of Regine in terms of the divine call to Abraham to sacrifice Isaac. For Abraham to slay the son of promise was on one level paradoxical and a suspension of the ethical. Nevertheless, God's call took precedence over the seemingly rational and ethical. For him, the broken engagement was the way of authentic discipleship in all its loneliness and contradiction of convention.

(3) Kierkegaard now lived a withdrawn life. He began to write prodigiously, producing more than twenty books in the twelve remaining years before his premature death. A third event, however, contributed even further to his distress. He attacked the low standards of a satirical paper The Corsair, and the paper responded by making Kierkegaard effectively the object of public ridicule. Its devastating caricature made him the laughingstock of Denmark. He interpreted this as the price for authentic Christian obedience, and set this in contrast to the easygoing pseudo-faith of 'name-Christians' in the Danish church.

Individualism

Kierkegaard's life seemed to turn on a radical contrast between authentic individual first-hand faith and the inauthentic acceptance of second-hand values. Kierkegaard saw this contrast in religious terms. He writes: 'The most ruinous evasion of all is to be hidden in the crowd in an attempt to evade God's supervision . . . in an attempt to get away from hearing God's voice as an individual' (Purity of Heart Is to Will One Thing, London, 1961, p. 163). Each one, he continues, 'shall render account to God as an individual'. In modern secular existentialism this principle has become a largely negative one, as it is traced through *Nietzsche to Camus and Sartre. Authentic existence is seen in terms of throwing off the conventions of Western bourgeois society and its predetermined expected roles. But Kierkegaard's criticisms were directed towards a second-hand claim to Christian faith: 'Christianity has been abolished by expansion – by these millions of name-Christians . . .' (Attack upon 'Christendom', London, 1944, p. 237). The notion of a 'Christian' state, for example, is 'shrewdly calculated to make God so confused in his head by all these millions that He cannot discover that He has been hoaxed, that there is not one single Christian' (ibid., p. 127). In the venture of faith the individual stands alone before God. Kierkegaard chose for his own epitaph only the words: 'That Individual'. He paid a price for his individualism. In his isolation from the church, his faith was always shot through with agonizing doubt, though he saw this as a mark of its authenticity.

Participation and subjectivity

It is impossible simply to acquire *truth passively from others, because the appropriation of truth involves active engagement with truth on the part of the individual human subject. It is crucial to Kierkegaard's position that 'everyone who has a result merely as such does not possess it; for he has not the way' (The Concept of Irony, London, 1966, p. 340). Actively to become engaged in decision, struggle and response is what Kierkegaard calls 'the task of becoming subjective'. Subjectivity, in his use of the term, does not mean the arbitrary elevation of personal opinion over the claims of objective evidence. He defines subjectivity as 'being sharpened into an "I" rather than being dulled into a third person' (Journals, London and Princeton, 1938, p. 533). 'The objective accent falls on WHAT is said; the subjective accent on HOW it is said . . . Thus subjectivity becomes the truth' (Concluding Unscientific Postscript, Princeton, 1941, p. 181).

Finitude and indirect communication

Kierkegaard ironically called Hegel's philosophy 'the System'. He attacked Hegel for claiming, in effect, that reality can be viewed 'eternally, divinely, theocentrically', when in fact the philosopher is 'only a poor existing human being not competent to contemplate the eternal either eternally or divinely or theocentrically' (ibid., p. 190). Kierkegaard would not have followed secular existentialists in effectively reducing truth to a matter of 'viewpoints'. But he insisted that the communication of truth proceeds indirectly or dialectically. Truth is not to be presented on a plate, as if it can be reduced to the dimensions of a single package. In his earlier writings Kierkegaard wrote under pseudonyms, leaving the reader to judge between competing perspectives in such a way that truth was perceived through struggle, engagement and decision. Truth cannot be 'surveyed' from a comfortable armchair, situated somewhere beyond or above the confines of human finitude. 'Truth becomes untruth in this or that person's mouth' (ibid., p. 181).

Bibliography

Works: Kierkegaard's Writings, H. V. and E. H. Hong (tr. and eds.), 26 vols. (Princeton, 1978–2000).

Studies: L. C. Barrett, Kierkegaard (Nashville, 2010); N. J. Cappelørn, H. Deuser, et al. (eds.), Kierkegaard Studies Yearbook 1996– (Berlin and New York, 1996–); C. Carlisle, Kierkegaard: A Guide for the Perplexed (London, 2006); C. S. Evans, Kierkegaard on Faith and the Self: Collected Essays (Waco, 2006); M. J. Ferreira, Love's Grateful Striving: A Commentary on Kierkegaard's Works of Love (Oxford, 2001); J. Garff, Søren Kierkegaard: A Biography, tr. Bruce Kirmmse (Princeton, 2005); A. Hannay, Kierkegaard: A Biography (new edn), (Cambridge, 2003); A. Hannay and G. Marino (eds.), The Cambridge Companion to Kierkegaard (Cambridge, 1998); H. V. Hong and E. Hong, The Essential Kierkegaard (Princeton, 2000); B. Kirmmse, Encounters with Kierkegaard (Princeton, 1996); G. Pattison, The Philosophy of Kierkegaard (Montreal, 2005); R. L. Perkins (ed.), International Kierkegaard Commentary (Macon, 1978–).

A. C. THISELTON

KINGDOM OF GOD

An expression found mainly in the Synoptic Gospels, where it is presented as central to the teaching of *Jesus. It (or one of its variants) occasionally occurs in other parts of the NT but not in the OT, although the underlying theme is fundamental to the entire biblical narrative. God is presented throughout Scripture as a King because he is the Creator of the universe to whom everything and everyone owes allegiance. In its early years, Israel was God's earthly kingdom in the sense that the Israelites did not have a recognized human ruler, though this eventually gave way to a kingdom along contemporary Near Eastern lines. After an unhappy start, this kingdom was blessed by God in the person of David, who was assured that his descendants would reign 'for ever' over the Lord's people. This promise plays a significant role in the NT, where Jesus' descent from David is recorded as a fundamental element of his mission and ministry.

That God remained the ultimate ruler of Israel, and indeed of the entire world, is frequently recalled in the OT, particularly in post-exilic eschatological prophecy. At a time when the Jews were subject to a series of foreign rulers and had little hope of regaining their freedom, the divine message was clear: the Lord was on his heavenly throne and would one day reveal himself as the ruler in *Zion. At that time all nations and kings on earth would be drawn to him and submit to his rule.

Jesus proclaimed the coming of the kingdom in and through him. Some people evidently thought that he would rebel against the Romans and re-establish the Davidic monarchy in its original form, but although Jesus claimed the Davidic inheritance, he did not interpret it in that way. In his teaching, the kingdom of God involved the forgiveness of sins and the restoration of the broken relationship between man and God (see *Atonement). This he accomplished in his death and resurrection, and his *ascension into heaven was the claiming of his kingdom in this sense. Seated at the right hand of God the Father, the glorified Christ is now the ruler of the universe, and by the sending of his Holy Spirit he is now making his rule felt in the hearts and minds of those who believe in him.

However, it must also be said that his vision of the kingdom was largely *eschatological, conforming in this respect to the picture already familiar from the OT. Jesus performed healing miracles as signs of the coming kingdom, and the picture we have of it is that when it arrives in its fullness all sickness, disability, poverty and ignorance will be swept away. Whether, and to what extent, the kingdom of God has already arrived on earth is the great theological question which forms the substance of contemporary debate.

The first Christian to develop a detailed theology of the kingdom was *Augustine (354–430). Motivated by criticisms that the fall of Rome was due to the abandonment of the ancient gods and the acceptance of Christianity as the state religion, Augustine wrote a massive history of the world in which he claimed that there was an age-old struggle between two kingdoms (or 'cities' as he called them) – the city of God and the city of this world. The latter took the form of empires and states which flourish for a time but which are inevitably overcome and disappear. The former, however, remains constant and will grow stronger until the end of time, when it will be revealed in its fullness. The city of God is present in the *church but is not identical with it, since the church too is a mixed body which contains both believers and unbelievers. This subtle analysis was simplified in later centuries, and for practical purposes, the church came to be regarded as in essence the kingdom of God on earth. As such, it not only claimed a special status in secular society, but regarded itself as superior to it. Secular rulers were expected to submit to the church as the voice of God, church officials and property were exempted from secular jurisdiction, and many aspects of life, which were regarded as primarily 'spiritual' (e.g. matrimony), were removed from the secular courts and treated as religious questions (see *Christendom).

It was only with great difficulty that secular rulers were able to assert their rights against such a church, but the sixteenth-century Reformation gave them their opportunity as many broke with Rome and established national churches of which they were the temporal rulers. This committed them to furthering the cause of the kingdom of God in their own earthly jurisdictions, and great efforts were made to ensure that the law of the state conformed to the teachings of the Bible. The observance of Sunday as an official day of rest was a prime example of this, and in Protestant countries at least, it became a prominent symbol of the dominant religious culture. It also led to the establishment of free schools, of workhouses for the poor and even of hospitals. How far the drive to establish a 'godly commonwealth' (as this kind of Christian state was often termed) ought to go was one of the main issues of debate in seventeenth-century England, where a persistent and dedicated minority, known today as *Puritans, did everything it could to establish the kingdom of God on earth. Unfortunately, the Puritans disagreed among themselves about the precise form their godly society should take and this weakened their cause. They were further hindered by the fact that sin could not be eradicated, especially when only a minority of the population was truly chosen by God. Efforts to restrict the government to the so-called 'saints' were doomed to fail, and in the end the Puritan experiment became a dictatorial tyranny under Cromwell, suppressing everything which did not agree with its own vision.

Nevertheless, the long-term effect of Puritanism was to establish that a secular *state whose laws were fashioned in accordance with Scripture was effectively a kingdom of God, to which not only ordinary Christians but even the kings themselves owed allegiance. A king who betrayed his trust by claiming to be above the law could be deposed, something which actually happened in 1688 (in England) and again in 1776 (in America). Those who rebelled were often convinced that they were re-establishing the kingdom of God in its purest form, and the virtual identification of this type of state with God's rule remained a commonplace of political and theological discourse until the twentieth century. Yet the close alliance between church and state continued in European monarchies. Membership in the Church of England was regarded as essential in principle to full participation in national life well into the nineteenth century, while in the newly established German Empire, the *Ritschlian school tended to identify the kingdom of God with economic and social progress and particularly (by implication) with advanced German culture.

Change came in continental Europe when the confessional states established after the Reformation came crashing down in the First World War and its aftermath. After 1918 theologians like Karl *Barth and Emil *Brunner began to speak of the 'post-Constantinian era', which forced them to reassess not only church-state relations but the whole meaning of the 'kingdom of God' as this was found in the NT. The events of 1939–45 only confirmed them in this view, and from an attitude of general conformity to the traditional link between 'throne and altar' many theologians turned to radical opposition to the established order. In some cases this led them to espouse revolutionary doctrines and to support 'freedom struggles' in different parts of the world as the true manifestation of God's kingdom on earth (see *Liberation theology).

The naivety of this was gradually exposed as revolutionary regimes became tyrannies and various liberation movements were shown to be far less noble in practice than in theory, but the view that the 'kingdom of God' is somehow opposed to earthly states has remained and continues to provide the chief motivation for much modern thinking on this subject. The English-speaking world, always more conservative than continental Europe, and relatively unscathed by the troubles of the twentieth century, has been slower to embrace this new model. There is still a powerful element, especially in the United States, which adheres to the earlier view that the secular state is the kingdom of God as long as it is ruled by godly people. This explains why the religious views of the president and other top officials are so important in a country where church and state are formally separate.

The collapse of the traditional order in Europe coincided with, and to some extent provoked, a revival of interest in the biblical concept of the kingdom of God. It came to be recognized once more that not only was this a fundamental part of Jesus' teaching, but that the coming of the kingdom was essentially an eschatological event, which is heralded in the present and will be fulfilled at some point in the future. Today almost everyone accepts these basic points, but there are divergent ways in which they are interpreted. Some evangelicals continue to emphasize the 'spiritual' interpretation of the kingdom, associating it primarily with personal conversion to Christ and world evangelization (see *Evangelical theology). These people are often criticized for neglecting the social dimension of Christian witness, but although they certainly tend to hold conservative political views, the charge is unfair. Christians of this kind have often been in the forefront of social mission, both in the developing world and in the inner cities, and have not been afraid to strike out on their own when their consciences have dictated it.

Others see the 'kingdom of God' in essentially social and political terms (see *Social gospel) and spend a good deal of time and effort in campaigning for various causes, ranging all the way from supporting political prisoners and refugees on the one hand to supporting environmental conservation on the other. In their eyes, the kingdom of God comes when peace and justice prevail on earth. The main difference of opinion among them is between those who are pacifist in their outlook and those who are activist. Pacifists like the late John Howard *Yoder remain vocal, but in recent years it is the activists who have gained the upper hand, going so far as to advocate the invasion of 'rogue states' and the imposition of 'regime change' on countries which have failed to respect the international order based on their principles. The main criticism of such efforts is that they tend to submerge specifically Christian values and affirmations in a desire to co-operate with people of many different beliefs. The intentions may be good, but in the end a Christian vision of the world and its future cannot be sustained by people who are not themselves Christians, and the attempt to do so runs the risk of being rejected by the latter as another form of 'imperialism'. Whatever else may be said of it, the kingdom of God will not come without an explicit recognition of his *sovereignty, a fact which people of this tendency are liable to forget.

There has been a good deal of theological writing on the subject of the kingdom of God, but how influential it has been in shaping people's approaches is uncertain. Biblical scholarship which seldom ventures beyond the pages of the NT has had little impact on modern discussion. Those like Oliver O'Donovan, who adopt the 'spiritual' perspective, are more likely to be guided by their own consciences than by a specific theological programme, and their writings on the subject tend to be theoretical proposals for political action which make little impact on those who would be expected to implement them. Others may claim to have been influenced by the writings of men like Abraham *Kuyper and Reinhold *Niebuhr, but how far this is really true may be doubted. Perhaps the main difficulty is that it is always hard to turn theory into practice, and the latter may not look much like the former once it is implemented. Nevertheless, it can be said with some confidence that the expectation of the coming of the kingdom of God is alive and well in modern theology, despite the many differences of approach, and that Christians today feel obliged to justify their thoughts and actions in the light of this concept to a degree which is perhaps unprecedented in Christian history.

Bibliography

M. Erdmann, Building the Kingdom of God on Earth (London, 1999); L. Green, Urban Ministry and the Kingdom of God (London, 2003); R. A. Horsley, Jesus and Empire: The Kingdom of God and the New World Order (Minneapolis, 2003); M. L. Humphries, Christian Origins and the Language of the Kingdom of God (Carbondale, 1999); P. Johnson and C. Sugden, Markets, Fair Trade and the Kingdom of God (Oxford, 2001); O. O'Donovan, The Desire of the Nations: Rediscovering the Roots of Political Theology (Cambridge, 1996); A. Robertson, Manifesto for a Revolution: The Kingdom of God on Earth (Manchester, 2000); M. W. G. Stibbe, The Kingdom of God and Human Society (Edinburgh, 1993); J. H. Yoder, The Politics of Jesus (Grand Rapids, 1972).

G. L. BRAY

KIRK, KENNETH E., see ANGLO-CATHOLIC THEOLOGY

KNOWLEDGE OF GOD

To arrive at an adequate definition of the term 'knowledge of God', we must consider what it means to know generally, and what it means to know an object which is qualitatively distinct from every other. These considerations are related because the idea of God entails the notion that the world of knowable objects, including knowing human subjects, is constitutively related to God as its Creator. Christians may infer from this that knowing, an essentially relational enterprise, reflects the triune character of God. If biblical passages suggesting that God's knowledge is eternal are read in light of trinitarian doctrine, God's eternal life may be depicted as a perichoresis of knowing and being known (Matt. 11:27; 1 Cor. 2:11). The work of creation manifests the noetic character of the triune life (Prov. 8:30; John 1:3) in which creatures live, move, know and are known (Acts 17:28; 2 Pet. 1:3-4; cf. F. LeRon Shults, Reforming the Doctrine of God, Grand Rapids, 2005, pp. 205-234).

All knowing occurs in relations between knowers and objects of knowledge, where-in knowers are informed by their objects.

Whether knowing happens thus depends on whether the relation between a knowing subject and the object to be known is appropriate to the character of the object. For example, a frog may arguably be known truly by a subject who relates to it via dissection, while a person will never be truly known in such a relationship. In that objects of knowledge exercise authority over knowing subjects, Colin Gunton noted that all *truth, true knowing, is a species of *revelation. Gunton did not mean that knowers passively receive data, but rather that an active knower is acted upon; knowing requires a subject's thinking to become object-shaped. Perhaps, therefore, knowing is most adequately thought of as a dialogical enterprise involving moments of discovery and disclosure.

This understanding of knowledge generally bridges the conceptual separation between 'natural theology', which is sometimes taken to suggest that knowledge of God is a product of human activity, and gracious or 'revealed theology', which can be taken to mean that human knowledge of God occurs without human participation. The terms 'nature' and '*natural theology', and their juxtaposition with '*grace' and 'revealed theology' have the unfortunate tendency of suggesting that a modicum of theological knowledge is either a datum of human nature conceived apart from its relation to God's creative activity, or a product of autonomous human endeavour, such as extracting evidence of God's existence from nature and/or history.

Materially, however, this is not the case, for as Wolfhart Pannenberg suggests, even so-called natural knowledge of God is due to the activity of God's *Spirit. All knowing involves activity on behalf of the knowing subject and the object known. When the object of knowledge is God, the knowing subject, the subject's capacity for knowing, and the content of the subject's knowledge are constitutively dependent upon God's revealing activity in creation and redemption. This holds true whether the knowledge of God is 'natural' or 'revealed'. Both forms of theology involve divine and human activity, and the distinction between divine and human agency in either form of theology is the qualitative difference between finite knowing and the infinite knowledge of God on which it is dependent. Pannenberg writes in this regard:

The founding of theology on divine revelation is not a determination that is foreign to its nature, as the later distinction between natural and revealed theology might seem to imply. Instead, the knowledge of God that is made possible by God, and therefore by revelation, is one of the basic conditions of the concept of theology as such. Otherwise the possibility of the knowledge of God is inconceivable. It would contradict the very idea of God (Systematic Theology, p. 2).

According to this view, natural and revealed theology differ in the relative significance they attribute to the creative and redemptive moments of God's revelation. Natural theology focuses on general revelation in *creation, while revealed theology prioritizes special or specific revelation in the history of *redemption. The terms general and specific revelation have been used to express two biblical understandings of God's revealing activity. Natural theology and gracious or revealed theology attempt to describe the noetic implications of these biblical understandings. General revelation expresses the biblical view that God's activity in creation is available to all persons (Ps. 19:1; Rom. 1:19–20). Special or specific revelation, on the other hand, refers to the biblical teaching that God is known only by *Jesus Christ and those to whom Jesus Christ discloses God (Matt. 11:25–27; John 1:18).

Natural theology, which holds that all humans know God 'naturally', is one way of conceiving the noetic implications of Scripture's view that God is disclosed in and through God's creative activity. According to this theory, knowledge of God grounded in general revelation is true knowledge, but is insufficient for *salvation, and needs to be completed by knowledge grounded in God's specific revelation in Jesus Christ. This conception of the relation between knowledge grounded in creation and that disclosed in the history of redemption has proven unsatisfactory to a number of influential thinkers who have proposed alternative views of the relationship. H. Richard *Niebuhr's typology concerning the relation between Christ and culture gives a sense of the range of available options for construing the relation between natural knowledge (nature) and revealed knowledge (grace). There are five types: (1) grace against nature; (2) the grace of nature; (3) grace above nature; (4) grace and nature in paradox; and (5) grace as the transformer of nature.

Niebuhr argued that the first two types are extremes to be avoided. Natural theology resembles the third type, which emphasizes continuity between creation and redemption, while recognizing that grace also transcends nature. The fourth type places great stress on the discontinuity between grace and nature in its present sinful state, and tends to portray creation and redemption as separate divine activities. The final type, which Niebuhr favoured, mediates between the third and fourth.

If type three focuses on the distinction between the infinite and the finite and asks how much knowledge of the infinite God finite objects are capable of mediating, types four and five are more concerned with the noetic effects of *sin. According to the fourth type, sin destroys the ability to know God from creation, while the fifth holds that knowledge of God from creation remains but is distorted and in need of transformation. No ideal type is likely to capture the complexities of any actual proposal, but theological positions fall nearer or farther from one or another of the types. Natural theology, and its most nuanced representative, *Thomas Aquinas, falls somewhere nearer type three than either the fourth or fifth type. Emil *Brunner sought to approximate the fifth type in his Nature and Grace, but in No!, Karl *Barth depicted it as an expression of the third type, and defended a position that is nearest to the fourth type. That has recently been defended by Stanley Hauerwas's *Gifford Lectures.

Protestant *Reformers, such as Martin Luther and John Calvin, seemed to operate between the idea that grace and nature exist in a paradoxical relation and the notion that grace transforms or converts distorted nature. *Luther leaned toward the fourth type, while *Calvin gravitated toward the fifth. Both men affirmed a twofold knowledge of God, but described the two ways of knowing and the relation between them differently. Luther spoke of general and specific knowledge, but depicted general knowledge (the knowledge that God exists, is the world's Creator, is righteous and will judge the wicked) as a worthless way of knowing because it does not include any understanding of God's intention for our lives. He reserved the designation 'true and proper knowledge of God' for knowledge of 'what God proposes concerning us, what he wants to give and do, so that he might deliver us from sin and death' (Commentary on Galatians, in Alister E. McGrath (ed.), The Christian Theology Reader, Malden, ³2007, pp. 98–100).

Calvin, on the other hand, distinguished between knowledge of God as the Creator and knowledge of God as the Redeemer, but did not regard knowledge of God the Creator as synonymous with so-called natural or general knowledge. Calvin began with knowledge of God as Creator not only because it is disclosed in creation, but also because Scripture teaches us that God is our Creator before it describes God as our Redeemer in Christ. Thus for Calvin, the first way of knowing God is disclosed by general and specific revelation. However, despite the clarity of revelation, humans cannot know God the Creator truly because sin clouds our ability to read either revelatory source rightly; that is, unless and until we receive knowledge of God as the Redeemer in Christ. Calvin writes in this respect that 'since we have fallen from life into death, the whole knowledge of God the Creator that we have discussed would be useless unless faith also followed, setting forth for us God our Father in Christ' (Institutes, 2.6.1). Knowing God as the Redeemer in Christ through the Holy Spirit transforms our noetic relation to creation and Scripture, and therefore to God as our Creator.

Perhaps this is also what Luther had in mind when he wrote, 'God does not want to be known except through Christ', but his negative assessment of the objective value (rather than merely its efficacy given the reality of sin) of general knowledge, and his notion that God's will for us is disclosed exclusively in Christ, suggests a paradoxical more than a transformational view of the relation between nature and grace. Ultimately, however, this difference between Luther and Calvin is less significant than their common conviction, which was also shared by Aquinas, Brunner and Barth, that receiving the gracious disclosure of God in Jesus Christ is essential to the discovery of a right (noetic) relationship to God.

See also: EPISTEMOLOGY; GOD.

Bibliography

E. A. Dowey, Jr, The Knowledge of God in Calvin's Theology (Grand Rapids, 1994); C. Gunton, A Brief Theology of Revelation (Edinburgh, 1995); S. Hauerwas, With the Grain of the Universe: The Church's Witness and Natural Theology (Grand Rapids, 2001);

W. Pannenberg, Systematic Theology, vol. 1 (Grand Rapids, 1991); R. Sokolowski, The God of Faith and Reason: Foundations of Christian Theology (Washington DC, 1995); P. R. Sponheim, God – The Question and the Quest: Toward a Conversation Concerning Christian Faith (Philadelphia, 1985); Thomas Aquinas, Summa Theologiae: A Concise Translation, ed. T. McDermott (Allen, 1989).

J. R. WILSON

KNOX, JOHN (c. 1514–72)

The principal theologian and architect of the Reformed Kirk of Scotland, Knox was born at Haddington and educated at St Andrews University, possibly under John Major (1467–1550), an advocate of *scholasticism and conciliarism. Following his ordination in 1536, Knox held minor posts as a notary and a tutor. Shortly after his conversion to *Protestantism he came under the influence of George Wishart (c. 1513–46), from whom he learned an amalgam of *Lutheran and *Reformed ideas, including the views of Martin *Bucer on the Lord's Supper (see *Eucharist). Knox's conception of his calling as a prophet also dates from this period. While supporting a group of Protestant rebels in the castle at St Andrews, he was captured by the French and enslaved on a French ship. During his imprisonment he prepared a summary of the compendium of Lutheran thought by Henry Balnaves (d. 1579). Thus by 1549, when he was released and returned to England, Knox's theology was characterized by its eclectic fusion of the principles of Lutheran and Reformed thought, particularly with respect to the doctrines of *justification and the Lord's Supper.

In England Knox's preaching at Berwick, near the Scottish border, attracted so many Scots that the government became nervous. He accepted an invitation to preach to Edward VI's court, but declined an offer to become Bishop of Rochester. During the revision of the first Book of Common Prayer, he was instrumental in the inclusion of the 'Black Rubric', which stipulated that kneeling during Communion did not imply transubstantiation. When the Catholic Mary Tudor became queen in 1553, Knox struggled with his conscience over the duty of martyrdom before deciding he should flee the country. His years of exile were spent at Frankfurt, where he lost a battle to continue reforming the second Book of Common Prayer, and Geneva, where he was influenced by John *Calvin. At Geneva he wrote a series of tracts on political disobedience to idolatrous rulers, particularly the well-known First Blast of the Trumpet Against the Monstrous Regiment of Women, which generally denied the right of females to rule, excepting only those rare individuals such as the Hebrews' Deborah who had a divine calling. In these political tracts he developed the revolutionary view that common people had the right to overthrow a tyrannical and idolatrous sovereign (see *Revolution, theology of). During his exile he also wrote a lengthy and tendentious defence of the Calvinist doctrine of *predestination against the work of an unknown Anabaptist.

Knox's exile was interrupted in 1555–6 by a return to Catholic Scotland, where he was fortunate to escape a charge of heresy. A group of Protestant lords invited him to return in 1559, and his preaching and leadership in the ensuing year was a major factor in the success of the Scottish Reformation. With a select group of colleagues, he helped draft the *Scots Confession of Faith (1560), a classic of Reformed Protestantism, and the Book of Discipline, with its pattern for church government and an ambitious blueprint for educational reform. After Mary Stuart returned to Scotland in 1561, Knox confronted her in three emotionally charged interviews in which he uncompromisingly condemned idolatry. His years in Scotland were characterized by major theological controversies with Catholics, the first with Ninian Winzet (c. 1518–92) over ordination and the second with Quintin Kennedy (1520–64) over the Mass. Knox's greatest achievement in these years was the writing of his History of the Reformation of Religion within the Realm of Scotland (ed. W. C. Dickinson, 2 vols., Edinburgh, 1949). The status of Protestantism in Scotland was assured when Mary Stuart abdicated in 1567 and Knox preached the coronation sermon for her infant son, James VI.

See also: REFORMERS, SCOTTISH.

Bibliography

Works: Works, 6 vols., ed. D. Laing (Edinburgh, 1846–52); John Knox: Political Writings, ed. M. Breslaw (Cranbury, 1986).

Studies: R. L. Greaves, Theology and Revolution in the Scottish Reformation: Studies in the Thought of John Knox (Grand Rapids, 1980); R. G. Kyle, The Mind of John Knox (Lawrence, 1984); R. K. Marshall, John Knox (Edinburgh, 2000); R. A. Mason (ed.), John Knox and the British Reformation (Aldershot, 1998); W. S. Reid, Trumpeter of God (New York, 1974); J. Ridley, John Knox (Oxford, 1968).

R. L. GREAVES

KOINONIA

This English transliteration of the NT Greek term often translated ‘fellowship’ is in common use in *ecumenical theology, particularly in discussions involving Roman Catholics and Anglicans. It is presented as the key concept underlying the Agreed Statements of the Anglican-Roman Catholic International Commission on the Eucharist, ministry and ordination, and authority in the church (The Final Report, London, 1982). In ecumenical circles, a definitive statement was produced by the World Council of Churches at its 1991 Canberra assembly: The Unity of the Church as Koinonia: Gift and Calling. The meaning of koinonia is near to ‘communion’, a relation between individual Christians or Christian communities resulting from their common participation in one and the same reality. ‘Koinovnia with one another is entailed by our koinonia with God in Christ.’ It has thus become the controlling model for understanding the nature of the church, which is not the case in the NT. Its currency, often with a somewhat fluid meaning, attests the prevalence of the notion of the church as ‘mystery’ over more institutional or social approaches to the church. A somewhat comparable concept in Eastern Orthodoxy is sobornost*.

Bibliography

T. F. Best and G. Gassmann (eds.), On the Way to Fuller Koinonia (Geneva, 1994); B. C. Butler, The Church and Unity (London, 1979); A. Dulles, Models of the Church (Garden City, expanded edn, 2002); L. F. Fuchs, Koinonia and the Quest for an Ecumenical Ecclesiology (Grand Rapids, 2008); C. Hill, ‘Seeking the One, Holy, Catholic and Apostolic Church: Do Bishops Exhibit or Obscure It?’, in P. Avis (ed.), Paths to Unity: Explorations in Ecumenical Method (London, 2004); J.-M. R. Tillard, in Dictionary of the Ecumenical Movement (Geneva, 2002).

D. F. WRIGHT

KOREAN THEOLOGY

Korean Christianity has two main branches: the more liberal branch that focuses on social activism and writes theology reflecting Korea’s social context of suffering, and the more conservative evangelical branch that writes theology from a biblical viewpoint but is sympathetic to the spiritual and social needs of Koreans.

The most distinctive contribution to theology is minjung theology. Minjung means theology of the masses. It is political, a people’s theology of *liberation, and is about people who are dominated by oppressive political power. It reflects the cultural milieu of Koreans as they have prevailed over oppression and suffering. It involves ‘han’ (righteous anger), something felt by an oppressed people.

There are numerous theologies suggesting various themes for Korean theology, such as the Yin-Yang way of thinking in theology, God as a fellow-sufferer, ‘trace of the Trinity’ theology based on the Korean myth of origin (the Tangun myth), some process theology based on the thinking of Alfred North Whitehead and Korean Confucian-Christian theology, with an emphasis on filial piety, the Confucian concept of social relations as the basis of its hierarchical understanding of social structure.

See also: ASIAN CHRISTIAN THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

Commission on Theological Concerns of the Christian Conference of Asia (ed.), Minjung Theology: People as the Subjects of History (Maryknoll and London, 1981); D. J. Elwood (ed.), Asian Christian Theology (Philadelphia, 1980); J. C. England (ed.), Living Theology in Asia (Maryknoll, 1981); Bong Rin Ro and R. Eshenaur (eds.), The Bible and Theology in Asian Contexts: An Evangelical Perspective on Asian Theology (Seoul, 1984).

R. STULTS

KRAEMER, HENDRIK (1888–1965)

Kraemer was a Dutch layman who deeply influenced international missionary thinking in the period 1930–60. After the early death of his father and mother he was sent to a diaconal orphanage. There he began to study the Bible and, at the age of fifteen, went through a deep spiritual experience which led him to the Christian faith and into the Christian church. He first received training as a missionary, but then went on to study Indonesian languages, and in 1922 was sent to Indonesia in the service of the Dutch Bible Society. Here he obtained a wide and deep knowledge of Javanese mysticism and Indonesian Islam. He greatly assisted the Indonesian churches in their struggle for independence.

In 1928 he attended the International Missionary Conference at Jerusalem and participated in the discussion about the relationship between the Christian faith and other world religions. At the invitation of the International Missionary Council, he wrote as a study guide for the Third World Missionary Conference held at Tambaram, India, in 1938, The Christian Message in a Non-Christian World (London, 1938). In a way this was a reply to the report Re-thinking Missions of the Laymen's Foreign Mission Inquiry (1932), which asserted that the aim of missions is 'to seek with people of other lands a true knowledge and love of God, expressing in life and word what we have learned through Jesus Christ'. In his own book Kraemer strongly emphasized the radical discontinuity between 'biblical realism' and non-Christian *religious experience. Acknowledging that our Christian *religion also stands under the judgment of God, he maintained that the Christian *revelation is incomparable and absolutely sui generis, because it is 'the record of God's self-disclosing and re-creating revelation in Jesus Christ . . . giving the divine answer to this demonic and guilty disharmony of man and the world'. He did not deny the reality of 'general revelation', but for him this revelation did not lead to true religion, but was itself an object of faith, because it could be discovered only in the light of the 'special revelation' in Christ. Co-operation with non-Christian religions and a combined search for further truth, therefore, would mean a betrayal of the word of God.

In 1937 Kraemer was appointed professor of the science of religion at Leiden. During the Second World War he was imprisoned as a hostage by the Germans. After the war he was very active in the reorganization of the Netherlands Reformed Church. Largely due to his influence the new church order mentioned missions as an essential element of the life and work of the church. From 1948 to 1958 he served as the first director of the Ecumenical Institute at Bossey, near Geneva.

Kraemer was one of the most influential missionary and ecumenical thinkers of the twentieth century. Other important books of his published in English are: Religion and the Christian Faith (London, 1956); The Communication of the Christian Faith (Philadelphia, 1956); A Theology of the Laity (London and Philadelphia, 1956); World Cultures and World Religions: The Coming Dialogue (London, 1958).

See also: CHRISTIANITY AND OTHER RELIGIONS; MISSIOLOGY.

Bibliography

C. F. Hallencreutz, Kraemer towards Tambaram: A Study in Hendrik Kraemer's Missionary Approach (Uppsala, 1966); idem, New Approaches to Men of Other Faiths, WCC Research Pamphlet no. 18 (Geneva, 1970); A. Th. van Leeuwen, Hendrik Kraemer, Dienaar der Wereldkerk (Amsterdam, 1959); T. S. Perry, Radical Difference: A Defence of Hendrik Kraemer's Theology of Religions (Waterloo, 2001).

K. RUNIA

KÜNG, HANS (b. 1928)

A Swiss Roman Catholic theologian, who has taught at Tübingen since 1960. Küng's theological work has been dominated by three main concerns: *apologetics, *ecumenism and reform in the Roman Catholic Church. He sees his most important task as a theologian to be that of using all the resources of modern theology to present the Christian gospel as a credible and relevant message for the modern world. Especially in his On Being a Christian, which he called 'a kind of small "Summa" of the Christian faith', but which for all its theological weight was aimed at and achieved a very wide readership, Küng expounded a Christianity centred on the historical Jesus as its distinguishing feature, and a Christian faith compatible with modern critical rationality and the aspirations and achievements of modern *humanism. Jesus is presented as the true man who makes it possible for modern men and women to live in a genuinely human way. Further works on the existence of God and life after death have continued Küng's apologetic work.

His ecumenical concerns go back to his first book, in which he attempted the tour de force of reconciling the Protestant and Roman Catholic doctrines of *justification by comparing the teachings of the Council of *Trent (see *Roman Catholic theology) and Karl *Barth on this classic point of denominational division. His ecclesiological studies also demonstrate a strong ecumenical concern, and in general it could be said that Küng's theological approach results in an ecumenical, rather than specifically Roman Catholic, theology. It belongs to the 'evangelical Catholicity' or 'Catholic evangelicity' which is obligated to the whole church but brings everything to the 'evangelical' test of the gospel, which is Jesus himself as the criterion of Christian faith.

Since the point in the Second *Vatican Council when it seemed to Küng that the progressive direction initiated by Pope John XXIII was being frustrated by the reactionary authoritarianism in the church, he has seen himself in the role of 'his Holiness's loyal opposition'. His reforming critique of the church is based on the twin principles of the normative priority of the historical Jesus and the NT gospel over all subsequent developments of the tradition, and the need to be open to the critical rationality and liberal attitudes of the modern world. These principles characterize much recent progressive Roman Catholic theology, but Küng's radical, often polemical and provocative application of them makes him virtually a Protestant in conservative eyes.

Criticism of his theology focused on his *Christology, since in On Being a Christian he interpreted the ontological Christology of incarnational dogma in purely functional terms, and on his explicit denial of the dogma of ecclesiastical (not only papal) infallibility. In the latter case, his deliberate rejection of the teaching of the First and Second Vatican Councils and his demand for frank recognition that the church has unequivocally erred in doctrinal statements in the past, constitute a radical break with the principles and method of traditional Roman Catholic theology. Protracted investigations of his work by the Congregation for the Doctrine of Faith led in 1979 to the Vatican's withdrawal of his canonical mission, i.e. his authorization to teach as a Catholic theologian. In recent years, Küng's work has focused on the relationship between Christianity and other world faiths (see *Christianity and other religions). He also played a major role in drafting a 'global ethic', which could be subscribed to by members of all faiths.

Bibliography

Works: Justification (London, 1965); The Church (London, 1967); Infallible? (London, 1971); On Being a Christian (London, 1977); Does God Exist? (London, 1980); Eternal Life? (London, 1984); Christianity and the World Religions (London, 1987); Judaism (London, 1992); Christianity and Chinese Religions (London, 1993); A Global Ethic for Global Politics and Economics (London, 1997); Disputed Truth: Memoirs, 2 vols. (London, 2008–9).

Studies: K.-J. Kuschel and H. Häring (eds.), Hans Küng: New Horizons for Faith and Thought (London, 1993); C. M. LaCugna, The Theological Methodology of Hans Küng (Chico, 1982).

R. J. BAUCKHAM

KUYPER, ABRAHAM (1837–1920)

The son of a Dutch Reformed Church minister, Kuyper was born in Maasluis, the Netherlands. At the University of Leiden he distinguished himself as a brilliant student and strong advocate of liberalism. During his first pastorate, in the small fishing village of Beesd, Kuyper experienced an evangelical conversion after reading the English novel The Heir of Redclyffe by Charlotte Yonge. Influenced by the simple, Calvinist piety of his parishioners, he renewed his study of theology to become the leader of the Dutch neo-Calvinist movement.

Kuyper wrote hundreds of books and articles, the majority of which have never been translated into English, on topics as diverse as art, politics, literature, philosophy and social issues. In all of these he sought to develop a consistent Christian world-and-life-view. He founded two newspapers, the weekly religious magazine De Heraut ('The Herald') and the daily newspaper De Standaard ('The Standard').

In 1874 he entered the Dutch parliament as a representative for the newly founded AntiRevolutionary party which, following the lead of Groen van Prinsterer (1801–76), was opposed to the principles expressed by the French Revolution and political liberalism. He became prime minister in 1900, but lost office in 1905 largely because of his controversial handling of the bitter railway strike of 1902. From 1908 to shortly before his death in 1920 he was a member of the Dutch Second

Chamber of Parliament and continued to edit De Standaard.

Kuyper was active in the 'Christian school struggle' and fought for state aid for private Christian schools. He founded the Free University of Amsterdam in 1880 and led a successful secession from the State Church to found the independent Gereformeerde Kerk (Reformed Church) in 1886.

Theologically, Kuyper developed *Calvin's teachings about common *grace to provide a basis for Christian social action. He also placed great emphasis on the importance of the *kingdom of God, an idea he seems to have picked up from F. D. Maurice (1805–72; see *Christian Socialism). His greatest contribution is in his development of the notion of 'sphere-sovereignty' which is similar to Michael Novak's and Peter Berger's (b. 1929) idea of 'mediating structures' as a basis for the development of religious, social and political pluralism. Many contemporary Christian movements can be traced to Kuyper's work. Probably the best-known evangelical to be influenced by Kuyper is Francis *Schaeffer whose work helped popularize some of Kuyper's ideas with, amongst others, the so-called 'Moral Majority' in America. However, left-wing Christian activists have also been influenced by Kuyper, and in North America there is a growing interest in his work.

See also: DUTCH REFORMED THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

Works: Lectures on Calvinism (Grand Rapids, 1898); Principles of Sacred Theology (Grand Rapids, 1898); The Work of the Holy Spirit (Grand Rapids, 1900).

Studies: P. S. Heslam, Creating a Christian Worldview: Abraham Kuyper's Lectures on Calvinism (Grand Rapids and Cambridge, 1998); T. Kuipers (ed.), Abraham Kuyper: An Annotated Bibliography, 1857–2010 (Leiden, 2011); F. Vandenberg, Abraham Kuyper (Grand Rapids, 1960).

I. HEXHAM

LACUGNA, CATHERINE MOWRY (1952–97)

LaCugna was a feminist *Catholic systematic theologian. While on the faculty of Notre Dame she produced a significant contribution to the ongoing renewal of trinitarian thinking, God For Us: The Trinity and the Christian Life (1991). The main thrust of her claim could be paraphrased as follows: at the heart of the doctrine of the *Trinity is the mystery of God's *love that has come to us 'in the face of Christ and the activity of the Spirit'. This mystery of God reaching out to the creature means that God's life does not belong to God alone; God exists 'for us', and thus, God's life is our life. The mystery of triune love is the mystery of salvation where our lives are now lived together as God lives. As the Spirit of God reaches out and gathers us up into the body of Christ and incorporates us into the koινωνia of the triune God, we are made to 'live from and for God, from and for others'. The triune God is 'God for Us' and this makes the doctrine of the Trinity the church's most 'practical doctrine with radical consequences for Christian life'. Critics (e.g. Colin *Gunton) have asked whether LaCugna's virtual rejection of any doctrine of the immanent Trinity does not deny God's grace and fall into a kind of *pantheism.

Bibliography

Works: God for Us: The Trinity and Christian Life (San Francisco, 1993).

Studies: C. E. Gunton, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit (London, 2003); R. E. Olson and C. A. Hall, The Trinity (Grand Rapids, 2002).

K. S. MCCORMICK

LAITY

The term 'laity' has travelled a long way from its simple biblical meaning of people, crowd, or people of God. The original term is indiscriminate and inclusive. All who come to Christ are the laos of God. People of every tribe and nation gather to Christ.

The radical nature of Christianity in not having a priesthood as some kind of intermediary between God and humankind is breathtaking among religions. The Jewish priesthood was limited, and stood beside God's revelation through the law and the prophets. *Jesus more fully rejected a priesthood, showing the directness of each person's relationship with God. He was the only way to peace with God, and priests were out of business. Christ's ironic but complete identification of the temple with his own body showed the end of the priestly class and the new birth of the laos of God.

Gradually, however, the priesthood reasserted itself from among a range of offices like teacher, elder, prophet, evangelist and pastor, servant roles in the Christian community. The threefold structure of bishop, presbyter and deacon emerged soon after the NT books were written. The presiding role of the bishop or presbyter at the Lord's Supper developed into a sacerdotal act. Within this conception, linked to imperial and feudal structures, the people of God became passive recipients of this and other *sacraments. The laity became non-priests, though this was mitigated by a series of Catholic orders emphasizing different kinds of Christian service and obedience.

The medieval development of a distinct order of 'clergy' was blown open in the Reformation by the rediscovery of direct *salvation by God's *grace though human *faith. The sacramental monopoly of the priesthood, including indulgences and priestly mediated salvation, was challenged. Luther and Calvin emphasized the *vocation of all Christians. Lutherans, Anglicans and others retained ministers or pastors as overseers of churches and modified the sacramental nature of the Eucharist, while retaining a distinction between the clergy or priesthood and the laity.

However, various *Anabaptist groups broke much more radically with this priestly/lay polarity and recognized the status of Christians as invited friends of Jesus (the *Quakers), as people living under the rule of Christ (*Mennonites) or just as people of faith. Within this tradition there was a growing sense of the multiform ministries that occur among the people of God, involving not just institutional church activities like teaching and pastoring, but broader callings to service like building, farming, family, science, education and peace-making. The renewed sense of Christian community – sharing faith, love and values – marked this development.

A similar move took place within the *Reformed tradition. As well as callings to minister and preach, the wider callings of the laity to marriage, *family, *work, business, the magistrate, politics and education were recognized. Here all of life is lived before God and in discipleship to Christ, and the difference in callings between clergy and laity are obliterated by acting in conformity to the will and purposes of God, reclaiming the creation for obedience to God. These Reformed traditions firmly closed the church doors outside Sunday, so that prayer and worship would take place in the home and all work and employment would be done as service to God.

The *Pentecostal movements of the twentieth century were laicized. Though they still sometimes had ministers or pastors, the direct work of the Holy Spirit in the lives of Christians was in no way mediated by ministers, and those who carried the gospel needed no pattern of ordination. In *Charismatic movements, patterns of leadership are shaped by spiritual fruit and maturity rather than through ordination.

Churches who retain priests and ministers have responded in three ways. First, they acknowledged a range of lay ministries which could be incorporated into the activities of the institutional church. Second, they deconstructed the role of the priesthood into different sacramental, pastoral, preaching, organizational and other tasks. Third, they increasingly professionalized these roles. Nevertheless, the priestly/lay distinction is often challenged in the modern West and lay initiatives are shaping the church worldwide.

See also: CHURCH GOVERNMENT; MINISTRY; PRIESTHOOD OF ALL BELIEVERS.

Bibliography

Church of England General Synod, All Are Called: Towards a Theology of the Laity (London, 1986); D. Clark, Breaking the Mould of Christendom: Kingdom Community, Diaconal Church and the Liberation of the Laity (Peterborough, 2005); Y. Congar, Priest and Lay-man (London, 1967); C. Cross, Church and People, 1450–1660; The Triumph of the Laity in the English Church (London, 1976); R. Etchells and G. Carey, Set My People Free: A Lay Challenge to the Churches (London, 1995).

A. STORKEY

LAMBETH QUADRILATERAL, see ANGLICANISM

LATERAN COUNCILS

The Lateran Palace in Rome had been a convenient place for ecclesiastical gatherings from the fourth century (when it became the official residence of the bishop of Rome). Five *councils held there from the twelfth to the sixteenth century are regarded as ecumenical councils by the *Roman Catholic Church. The First Lateran Council (1123) was concerned with relationships between the church and the Holy Roman Emperor; the Second (1139) with healing a schism that had arisen with the election of an antipope. These two councils also formalized the ban on clerical marriage within the Roman Church. The Third Lateran Council (1179) addressed similar concerns again: another antipope had been elected, and was supported by the emperor. It also condemned various heretical groups, including the Cathars (see *Albigenses).

The Fourth Lateran Council (1215) was called to address the relative failure of the Crusades. It followed the Third Council in placing restrictions on Jews and Muslims within Europe (requiring, for instance, the wearing of distinctive clothes to mark them out as non-Christian). Canon 21 required auricular confession at least annually from all Catholics; this, however, was a regulation of a customary position, not something new. It is the most interesting of the Lateran Councils theologically: the first Canon defined transubstantiation as dogma (see *Eucharist), and offered the definitive statement of the Western position on the procession of the Holy Spirit; the second Canon condemned *Joachim of Fiore's trinitarian theology, suggesting that Joachim taught that the unity of the three Persons of the *Trinity was merely collective and not substantial.

The Fifth Lateran Council (1512–17) was preceded by extensive dispute on the relative powers of councils and *popes, with some on the conciliarist side hoping that a new council could adequately address the perceived abuses in the church. In the event, its decrees were rather limited, and any proposals for reform were rapidly overtaken by events: mere months after it closed, Martin *Luther proposed his Ninety-Five Theses, and the question of the reform of the church took on a new, and highly political, character.

Bibliography

H. J. D. Denzinger, Enchiridion Symbolorum (Würzburg, 1854), contains extracts from the decrees of all five councils; full texts are only available in older editions which texts (particularly in the case of the Fourth Lateran Council) are often based on inadequate manuscript traditions.

S. R. HOLMES

LATITUDINARIANISM

This term describes the attitudes and opinions of those in the English church of the late seventeenth and eighteenth centuries who sought a pattern of religious belief and experience free from what were perceived as the opposing extremes of *Puritan fanaticism and High Church extremism. As the name suggests, it was characterized by breadth and variety, but its most salient features were the appeal to reason as authoritative in religious questions, the pursuit of *toleration and irenicism in theological and ecclesiastical debate, and a deep-seated horror of 'enthusiasm'. The movement marks the emergence of that tendency to liberal and pluralistic opinions which is so characteristic of the broad middle ground within the Church of England (cf. *Anglicanism).

The origins of Latitudinarianism can be traced back to Richard *Hooker's appeal to the light of reason as a supplementary authority to the Bible, which was taken up in the early seventeenth century by divines such as William Chillingworth (1602–44). The original Latitudinarians were a group including Chillingworth who were associated with Lord Falkland at Great Tew in Oxfordshire during the 1630s. The term was also applied to the *Cambridge Platonists of the Interregnum because of their breadth of sympathy and rejection of the personal animosities which characterized Puritan controversial theology. However, the term is most commonly used today of a wide group of leading churchmen of the late seventeenth century, many of whom were disciples of the Cambridge Platonists, but who neglected their *mysticism and emphasis on *religious experience in favour of their appeal to reason as 'the candle of the Lord' in the soul. And even in this respect the Latitudinarians were less than completely faithful to their mentors, for where the Platonists saw reason as a divine light permeating the whole personality, they tended to identify it with common sense. As a result, by comparison, they appear worthy, but pedestrian and pragmatic.

The background to the emergence of Latitudinarianism was the low level of personal morality characteristic of Restoration court circles, and the rise of natural science in the intellectual world. In this context its adherents appealed to reason as a defence against what they saw as the unbridled 'enthusiasm' of the dissenting sects. As the counterpart of the new natural science they emphasized *natural theology and the ability of the rational mind to grasp the fundamentals of religion without recourse to *revelation, and this led to a tendency to formulate the faith in minimal terms. For them the basic religious motivation was the hope of immortality, and on this foundation they erected a utilitarian appeal to moral behaviour, commending religion for its advantages, as in John Tillotson's (1630–94) sermon The Wisdom of Being Religious (London, 1664). They were opponents of all kinds of superstition and of the dogmatism which had characterized the Calvinist theology of the preceding age. Theological complexity was regarded with suspicion as a plot by divines to keep simple people from perceiving the truth, and they cultivated a preaching and writing style of dispassionate simplicity. Their preaching lacked the drama of the Puritan pulpit, but appealed to an age that had grown weary of religious controversy. Pastoral care was a high priority, though its substance was of a piece with their whole approach. They knew something of the inwardness of religion, though they rejected the public expression of emotion. Like the Platonists before them, they passed on to succeeding generations less than all that they were, and their evacuation of feeling from religion was an important contribution to that emotional starvation which made the Evangelical Awakening of the mid-eighteenth century so cathartic an experience for so many.

Bibliography

G. R. Cragg, From Puritanism to the Age of Reason (Cambridge, 1950); idem, Reason and Authority in the Eighteenth Century (Cambridge, 1964); N. Sykes, From Sheldon to Secker (Cambridge, 1959); B. Willey, The Eighteenth Century Background (Harmondsworth, 1972).

D. D. SCEATS

LAUSANNE COVENANT

In July 1974 an International Congress on World Evangelization, convened under the leadership of the evangelist Dr Billy Graham (b. 1918), was held at Lausanne, Switzerland. At the end, the vast majority of the 2,700 participants put their name to a document called the Lausanne Covenant.

The Covenant is a statement of intent concerning the unfinished task of *evangelization. It consists of fifteen paragraphs affirming God's purpose to create a special people for himself, Jesus Christ as the world's only Saviour, the nature and urgency of evangelism, Christian social responsibility, evangelism across cultures, *human rights (particularly religious freedom), the Holy Spirit in evangelism and the hope of Christ's return. Its evangelical thrust is underlined in a paragraph on the authority and power of the Bible.

The document was originally drawn up from statements in the main speakers' papers and revised in the light of the participants' contributions, especially those from a Majority World perspective. The title 'covenant', rather than 'declaration', is meant to emphasize commitment to the task of world evangelization.

The Covenant's significance lies in the breadth of its vision of the church's missionary task, its courage in handling controversial issues, its ability to combine different evangelical traditions and its subsequent extensive reception by the evangelical constituency worldwide as a fresh theological charter, expressing basic convictions about the church's multiple task in a changing world.

The conference gave rise to a continuing movement, the Lausanne Committee for World Evangelization, which convened a second major congress at Manila in 1989. The resulting 'Manila Manifesto' reaffirmed the groundbreaking commitment made at Lausanne to social responsibility as an integral part of the evangelistic task. Many other smaller-scale consultations have taken place, focusing on such topics as outreach to particular ethnic groups and faith communities, cultural contextualization of the gospel, and the quest for social justice.

Bibliography

J. D. Douglas (ed.), Let the Earth Hear His Voice (Minneapolis, 1975); K. Lundström, Gospel and Culture in the World Council of Churches and the Lausanne Movement (Uppsala, 2006); A. Nichols (ed.), The Whole Gospel for the Whole World: The Story of Lausanne II Congress on World Evangelism, Manila 1989 (Charlotte, 1989); C. R. Padilla (ed.), The New Face of Evangelicalism (London, 1976); J. R. W. Stott, The Lausanne Covenant: An Exposition and Commentary (Minneapolis, 1975); idem (ed.), Making Christ Known:

Historic Mission Documents from the Lausanne Movement, 1974–1989 (Carlisle, 1997).

J. A. KIRK

LAW

Law, understood theologically, is the expression of the commands of God to his people, which demonstrate the will of God concerning all major aspects of life. It is therefore a moral concept as opposed to a merely social one. The moral law of God is summarized in the Decalogue.

All major evangelical theologians historically have accepted that no human being has ever perfectly fulfilled the precepts of the divine law, due to having their hearts corrupted by the condition of original *sin and therefore turned away from the worship and love of God. Jesus Christ alone, as the incarnate Son of God, perfectly fulfilled the law.

Legalism and antinomianism

*Jesus Christ came ‘not to abolish the Law or the Prophets . . . but to fulfil them’ (Matt. 5:17). The law pointed to his *incarnation and saving work, and was perfectly fulfilled by his obedience to the Father in all aspects of his life, death (see *Atonement) and *resurrection. Thus Christ is the New *Adam who perfectly fulfils the will of God. Two types of attitude threaten any Christian approach to law, namely legalism and *antinomianism.

The history of Christianity demonstrates that there is a recurrent danger for some people to consider that Christ came to abolish the divine law codified in the Decalogue, thus making a libertarian attitude central to Christian moral reasoning and living. This is known as antinomianism. The tendency is often criticized for substituting inspiration by the Spirit for obedience to the law. While such criticism has some basis, it is also necessary to recall that the role of the Spirit as the Spirit of Christ is to work in the hearts of believers to bring them closer to the will of God. Antinomianism needs to be judged from a theological framework that is properly rooted in acceptance of all three persons of the Trinity, without omitting to understand the role of the *Holy Spirit in the discernment of the will of God and the conduct of the Christian life. Otherwise the resulting criticism risks being merely a legalistic one.

Legalism is typically defined as people’s tendency to attempt to fulfil the requirements of divine law (and even perhaps believe that they are capable of fully doing so) in order to be acceptable in the sight of God. Some theologians argue that Paul does not attack legalism in his letters to the Galatians and the Romans, rather that he challenges nomism. This can be characterized as the sense that the people who have been saved by God through his *grace must follow the law of Moses. This implies that the Jewish Christians portrayed in Acts as wishing to retain Jewish circumcision for males are nomistic. In turn some early Christians, some of them Jewish converts, accused Paul of ‘antinomianism’, saying that his gospel invited people to abandon moral restraints perceived to be unnecessary to the Christian life. In response, therefore, Paul said that people had been freed to live under the lordship of Christ and in the power of the Spirit (see *Sanctification). To clarify then, legalism is definable as the tendency for humans to attempt to make themselves just in the eyes of God through doing the works of the law, i.e. doing so without reliance on the Spirit that is given by Christ to believers. This tendency is known especially within the Protestant tradition since Martin Luther as ‘works-righteousness’. It is evident that the controversies over legalism and nomism are still relevant for *Jewish converts to Christianity both in Israel and globally today. Arguably, they may also be relevant to converts from *Islam to Christianity, given the centrality of law to traditional Islam, and the affinities between Islamic law and ancient Jewish law.

The Christian concept of natural law

The early Church *Fathers used Paul’s claim that the Gentiles had ‘the law written on their hearts’ (Rom. 2:15) as validating their case for Christian adoption of classical Greek and Roman notions of natural law. Gentiles are described by Paul as having some knowledge of the attributes of God through creation (this is taken by most historic theologians to be “*natural theology”). The law of God written on the hearts of Gentiles has been understood by most Christian theologians as corresponding to classical notions of natural law. However, they did not honour God and their hearts were ‘darkened’, the consequence being unwillingness to obey the law of God.

The major Christian formulation of natural law theory was made in the thirteenth century by the Italian theologian *Thomas Aquinas. For Thomas, natural law is the first way in which humans as rational creatures participate in eternal law, which is divine *wisdom. When God created humans, he ordained for them an end which is harmonious with their nature. The law of human conduct is deemed natural because it is implanted in human nature by God, and because it is accessible to humans through the natural medium of reason (as opposed to the supernatural medium of *revelation). Thus the precepts of natural law according to Thomas are both universally binding and universally knowable. The *Reformers also worked with a Christianized concept of natural law, though *Calvin in particular emphasized that the rational faculty is corrupted by original sin and requires redemption through the work of the Holy Spirit. It is necessary to distinguish between pre-modern appeals to natural law insofar as it was seen within the doctrines of *creation and *Christology, and modern appeals that rely on scientific and evidence-based approaches. The latter involve an inductive approach that looks for common themes across faiths and cultures in order to formulate a theory of natural law acceptable in multi-faith and secular societies (see *Christianity and other religions). They tend to appeal to a doctrine of God as Creator but not as Redeemer.

Uses of the law in the Magisterial Reformers

The Magisterial Reformers John Calvin and Philipp *Melancthon taught that the law has three uses: theological, civil and didactic. According to Calvin, they were articulated in the Decalogue and mediated by Christ. The three uses of the law according to Calvin are as follows. First, the pedagogical use of the law is that it demonstrates divine righteousness by reflecting the sinful nature of humanity to humans, making us aware of our condition and that we are condemned for this. The second use of the law is the civil use of the law, to restrain evil in society. The Mosaic law was given partly for this reason. The Pauline injunction that the state be 'a terror to bad conduct' (Rom. 13:3–4) exemplifies this use of law as statute law. For Martin *Luther, the number of true Christian believers in the European states of his time (the sixteenth century) was small, therefore the state could and should not assume that the population which it governed would always obey the divine and natural law embedded in its statutory laws. The third use of the law according to John Calvin relates to believers, and is its principal use as the moral law. From it believers learn each day what God's will is for their lives and how they may please him. The law is thus the instrument which the Holy Spirit uses in the sanctifying of the people of God. For the contemporary Anglican theologian Oliver *O'Donovan, it is best to use the term 'law' only to refer to the law of Moses given to Israel, and 'positive community law'. This can facilitate recognition that the 'third use of the law' refers to Christian moral teaching.

Theological matters arising in engagement with state and society

From the early church on, Christians have differed on matters such as whether the *state should enact laws based on Christian moral reasoning, ultimately based on Christian theology and anthropology. In Calvinist terms, this is a disagreement about the second use of the law. In AD 313 the Edict of Milan was passed under Constantine I, granting freedom of religion to all religions within the Roman Empire, including Christianity. By the end of the century the practice of non-Christian religions was illegal. During that time the Roman state passed a number of laws which were based upon a Christian understanding of law and anthropology, including rendering abortion illegal. Some of these laws built upon existing Roman laws which were perceived as coextensive with Christian theological ethics. Jurisprudence and legal reasoning were practised within a Christian framework in Western countries down until the late eighteenth/early nineteenth century. Christian attitudes to the establishment of the church, i.e. its closeness to the state authorities in terms of its rights and responsibilities, are related to diverse Christian attitudes to law as well as government. The matter is ultimately theological and not merely political in the classical sense. Establishment is an arrangement that stems from a theological and social worldview where monarchy was the main accepted form of government, where seeing Christ as King posed little problem, and where democracy was either non-existent or seen as morally inferior. Such a worldview can accept without too much difficulty the idea of divine law as the basis of jurisprudence and statute law. The wars of religion, fought between different Christian states in Western Europe in the seventeenth century, provoked many theological minds to attempt to base Christian natural law theory on a rational basis as much as on a theological one. The foremost exponent of this was the Dutch *Arminian thinker Hugo *Grotius.

The relationship between law and morality is central to a theological understanding of law.

The traditional Christian approach has been to work within the classical tradition of natural law theory. The historicist view of law is that law is the expression of the common consciousness of a nation forged by its history. This is a view often held by conservative political thinkers. *Positivist theories of law base law in 'the rules issued or sanctioned by the State without intrinsic moral connotations'. Human rights theories of law are interpreted by some scholars as a secularization of older Christian natural law and natural right theory. Other Christians, however, see human rights law as anti-Christian and atheistic, in that it does not protect human life from beginning to end given that it tends to favour the 'pro-choice' stance on abortion and euthanasia. Human rights law is also criticized by some Christians as tending to privilege the rights of the individual over the right of the community, thus endangering the common good and the welfare of future generations.

The current international growth of *Islam, including the increasing public presence of Muslims in Western post-Christian countries, poses challenges and opportunities for revisiting Christian theological understandings of law. Key issues include the status and treatment of women, the limits of state law in handling personal morality, especially sexual behaviour, freedom to proselytize, freedom to convert and leave a religion, and freedom to practise and also criticize religious beliefs.

Bibliography

M. Cromartie (ed.), A Preserving Grace: Protestants, Catholics, and Natural Law (Washington DC, 1997); J. Ellul, The Theological Foundations of Law (ET, New York, 1960); J. M. Kelly, A Short History of Western Legal Theory (Oxford, 1992); E. F. Kevan, The Grace of the Law: A Study in Puritan Theology (London, 1964); F. Klug, Values for a Godless Age: The Story of the United Kingdom's New Bill of Rights (London, 2000); Byung-Ho Moon, Christ the Mediator of the Law: Calvin's Christological Understanding of the Law as the Rule of Living and Life-Giving (Milton Keynes, 2006); O. O'Donovan, Resurrection and Moral Order: An Outline for Evangelical Ethics (Leicester, 1994); S. J. Pope, 'Natural law and Christian Ethics', in R. Gill (ed.), The Cambridge Companion to Christian Ethics (Cambridge, 2001), pp. 77–95; J. Witte, Law and Protestantism: The Legal Teaching of the Lutheran Reformation (Cambridge, 2002).

C. A. E. MOSELEY

LAW AND GOSPEL

The *law is God's holy will for human life, and the *gospel is the good news of the reconciliation of the world to God in Jesus Christ (see *Atonement). Christian theology traditionally treats both as forms of the eternal word of God. The relationship between law and gospel constitutes a major point of emphasis in biblical exegesis, doctrine, preaching, ethics and the Christian life, and is handled diversely in Christian history and doctrine.

In the sixteenth century, Martin *Luther recognized several errors in medieval theology that made law and gospel virtually identical and turned the gospel into 'the new law'. In this format *justification became contingent upon both faith and works, thereby hindering the assurance of faith and causing corruptions in the functioning of the church. In response, Luther emphasized an ongoing relationship of contrast, or dialectic, between law and gospel based on justification by *faith alone, making possible the assurance of *salvation and demanding the reformation of certain church practices.

Following the thrust of Luther's thought, the Reformation generally recognized the law as God's will for creaturely life that Adam voluntarily obeyed (see *Reformation theology). As a result of Adam's sin (see *Fall), humanity became corrupt in its very nature and was unable to fulfil the law, which now came in between humanity and God as a witness to God's wrath and *judgment of *sin. The law subsequently given to Moses was an expression of God's will for his chosen people, Israel, serving as their tutor until the fulfilment of the covenant promise given to Abraham. Although Israel served other gods and abused the law, God kept the covenant promise in Jesus Christ, who served as the mediator between God and humanity by perfectly fulfilling the law and bearing humanity's punishment for sin as an atoning sacrifice. Accordingly, the Reformers stressed justification by faith in Christ alone, apart from works, and the imputation of Christ's *righteousness to the believer.

While the Reformers stressed the fulfilment of the law by Jesus Christ, they maintained an understanding of the law as God's word and eternal will in perceiving three uses for the law. First, the law has a civil or political use in which it is understood to provide for societal order and restrain sin. Second, the law has a theological use, which reveals sin and functions as a tutor leading to Christ through *repentance. Third, the law serves as a guide to the Christian life. Following *Calvin, the Reformed maintain a reverse ordering of the first and second uses given above and place greater weight on the third use than the Lutherans, although it is now recognized that Luther articulated a role for the law in the Christian life.

*Lutheran theology stresses the dialectical nature of the law and gospel relationship, often using it as an organizing principle governing theology. Thus, the law and gospel dialectic is often used as a rubric for mediating between the natural and revealed knowledge of God, reason and faith (see *Faith and reason), or philosophy and theology. It is foundational for the doctrine of the two kingdoms and an essential element in Lutheran homiletics. Several forms of philosophical existentialism have employed aspects of the Lutheran law and gospel dialectic.

*Reformed theology typically places law and gospel within a covenantal scheme, either as a distinction of administration within the *covenant of grace, or in the relationship between a covenant of works given to Adam and covenant of grace established by Christ. While the use of law and gospel is often implicit in Reformed thought, it is nonetheless a foundational distinction.

The nature of the law and gospel relationship is a continual subject of debate and was considered by Luther to be the essence of theology. A particularly important aspect of this task has been the determination of the nature and purpose of the law. The relationship between the revealed or Mosaic law to natural law and the law written on the heart, as well as the nature and unity of the ceremonial, civil and moral elements of the Mosaic law have all been determinate elements for comprehensive treatments of law and gospel in Christian theology.

Karl *Barth argued for the order 'gospel and law' based on their mutual unity as God's word, emphasizing that the gospel determines the law-gospel relationship because the law is only properly known as God's word in its fulfilment by Jesus Christ. Although Barth also maintained a usage for the traditional order and expressed an infinite difference between law and gospel, his view has been criticized for being overly harmonizing. Barth's position on gospel and law has profound ramifications for his theology, especially in his doctrine of God, anthropology, sin and his placement of ethics within dogmatics.

The two most notable errors deriving from an improper balance between law and gospel are legalism and *antinomianism. Legalism or moralism can occur through improper or excessive stress on the place and role of the law in justification and sanctification. It can undermine justification by faith, Christian *assurance, and lead to excessively individualistic and introspective piety.

Antinomianism in its classical form emerged when an associate of Luther and Philipp *Melancthon, John Agricola (c. 1494–1566), insisted that the preaching of repentance belonged to the gospel because the law could not justify. Rather, the law had been fulfilled by Christ, was not to be preached prior to the gospel and was not a guide to the Christian life. Agricola's teaching explicitly rejected the law as a form of the word of God, and therefore the entire dialectic of law and gospel, although he maintained a political use for the Decalogue. Both legalism and antinomianism have appeared and been combated at various times in the history of the church and are continuing but unavoidable dangers for theology.

*Dispensationalism treats law and gospel as strictly antithetical, placing them in the distinct dispensations of Israel and the church. Most modern dispensationalism teaches that while justification is by grace in every dispensation, the Mosaic law served a binding regulatory function for Israel's sanctification that is not binding on the church. Consequently, the law is not a guide for the Christian life; rather, the 'law of Christ' is written on the heart of the believer. However, as a biblical revelation of God's holy nature, the law points out sin and the need for grace, but is itself antithetical to grace.

*Liberal theologies often avoid both the traditional dialectical and covenantal notions by implicitly treating law and gospel as progressive stages or contrasts in humanity's religious perception. Higher forms of religion emphasize God's affirming love and offer emancipation from primitive legalism. Such notions are frequently related to abandonment or relativizing of the OT, rejection of the law as God's word and the approach to theology from the standpoint of religion in general, instead of *revelation.

Study and examination of the distinction and unity of law and gospel is an essential task for the church in its exegesis, theology, ethics and preaching. While the task of defining the relationship between law and gospel should rely heavily on the contributions of systematic and historical theology, it is foremost a task of biblical exegesis and should at its base represent an interpretation of the entirety of Scripture.

Bibliography

K. Barth, 'Gospel and Law', in God, Grace and Gospel (Edinburgh, 1959); I. U. Dalferth, Theology and Philosophy (Oxford and New York, 1988); C. H. Dodd, Gospel and Law (Cambridge, 1951); G. Ebeling, Word and Faith (London, 1963); G. Forde, The Law-Gospel Debate: An Interpretation of its Historical Development (Minneapolis, 1969); S. Gundry (ed.), Five Views on Law and Gospel (Grand Rapids, 1996); E. Jüngel, 'Gospel and Law', in Karl Barth: A Theological Legacy (ET, Philadelphia, 1986); B. Lohse, Martin Luther's Theology (ET, Edinburgh, 1999); O. Weber, Foundations of Dogmatics, vol. 2 (ET, Grand Rapids, 1983); T. Wengert, Law and Gospel: Philip Melancthon's Debate with John Agricola of Eisleben over Poenitentia (Grand Rapids, 1997).

D. A. GILLAND

LAW, WILLIAM (1686–1761)

William Law was an Anglican devotional writer and mystic. Born in Northamptonshire and educated at Cambridge, his promising academic and ecclesiastical career was cut short in 1716 by his Jacobite and nonjuring sympathies. His early writings attacked the Latitudinarian theology of Benjamin Hoadly and the *deism of Matthew Tindal, but he gradually turned from polemics to *mysticism. His best-known work, A Serious Call to a Devout and Holy Life (1728), urging total devotion to God, was greatly admired by John *Wesley. From the mid-1730s, however, Law came under the influence of Jacob *Boehme, and his earlier High Church orthodoxy and rigorous asceticism were overlaid, if not replaced, by a strand of theosophy emphasizing the mystical way as the path to union with God. This led to a breach with Wesley in 1738.

Law's later works, The Spirit of Prayer (1749 and 1750) and The Spirit of Love (1752 and 1754), provoked Wesley's A Letter to the Revd Mr Law (1756), accusing him of denying God's omnipotence and justice, and misunderstanding justification and the new birth. In 1740 Law returned to his birthplace of King's Cliffe, living a life of charity, celibacy, prayer, study and writing in a household community of three: himself, Hester Gibbon (sister of his former pupil Edward and aunt of the historian) and the widowed Mrs Elizabeth Hutcheson.

Bibliography

J. H. Overton, William Law, Nonjuror and Mystic (London, 1881); I. Rivers in Oxford Dictionary of National Biography (Oxford, 2004); A. K. Walker, William Law: His Life and Thought (London, 1973).

M. WELLINGS

LAYING ON OF HANDS

In Christian practice the laying on of hands has several resonances, theologically rooting back to *Jesus' empathy, healing and empowerment with the Spirit; Jesus refocuses the Hebrew traditions he inherited. Touching signifies care, compassion and love. As *Wittgenstein would say, such sympathetic action is a form of life, not to be explained in terms of anything else, just a given practice common to humanity. It is an instinctive human and pastoral gesture, and it has wide scriptural warrant as a gesture of blessing, healing, caring, commissioning for Christlike service in his church, and empowering for membership of this body. Theologically, the role of the *Spirit is never absent from this Christian gesture. We might use the distinction between synchronic and diachronic: the Spirit and Jesus emphasized respectively.

It is clearly a sign of blessing in the OT (Gen. 48:17) and of commissioning for a role or task, which is where it finds its great emphasis in the NT. Jesus blesses (Matt. 19:13) and heals (Mark 6:5) using the laying on of hands with prayer. In Acts we find the laying on of hands used with prayer for commissioning for apostolic preaching (Acts 13:2–3), along with a deep sense of the Holy Spirit’s agency at work, or indeed of receiving the Spirit (Acts 8:18) or ‘spiritual gifts’ (2 Tim. 1:6).

Churches practising the rite of *confirmation as part of commitment as disciples invariably use the laying on of hands, and call on the Holy Spirit’s empowerment and gifts. The theological signification of laying on of hands for Christianity therefore brings together divine blessing and commissioning in the power of the Spirit. *Tertullian and *Cyprian witness to a distinctive and influential model for the structure of Christian initiation, in which water *baptism is followed by anointing and by hand-laying and then receiving the Eucharist, the components being considered as a whole. Tertullian is emphatic that it is at the laying on of the hand that the Spirit is given, although he like other early writers talks of the rite, water baptism and confirmation, as a whole.

Ordination to pastoral *ministry has come almost universally to involve this practice of laying on of hands, some denominations also valuing the sense of continuity down the generations of church ministry. Ordination has been linked to the gesture since 200. As historians and theologians such as *Schillebeeckx argue, the ordained ministry had a pastoral emphasis for the first millennium of church history, only then acquiring the notion of a special power, potestas, given by the laying on of bishops’ hands in asserted succession back to Peter and Jesus. The gesture of laying on of hands clearly signifies corporate pastoral service rather than bestowing a separate power to an individual over the community. At ordination the whole community is acting in Christ to commission for Christlike service.

This Christian practice is best interpreted always Christologically: whether in healing, caring, commissioning, praying for or blessing, this is the act of Christ helping and supporting his flock, exercising his ministry through others and graciously bestowing the Spirit in the particularities and exigencies of life. Ultimately, the laying on of hands is an act representative of the whole Christ-indwelt community.

Bibliography

J. K. Coyle, ‘The Laying on of Hands as Conferral of the Spirit’, in E. A. Livingstone (ed.), Studia Patristica 18 (Louvain 1989); G. W. H. Lampe, The Seal of the Spirit (London, 1952); J. V. Taylor, The Go-Between God

(London, 1972); C. H. Turner, Χείρτόνιά in JTS 24, 1922–3, pp. 496–504.

T. BRADSHAW

LEGALISM, see LAW AND GOSPEL

LEIBNIZ, GOTTFRIED VON (1646–1716)

German mathematician and philosopher. According to Leibniz, the full definition of anything involves describing all things from its unique standpoint; each thing is an independent ‘monad’ ‘mirroring’ the rest. The highest monad, and creator of all others, is God.

Leibniz produced classical versions of the arguments for the existence of God (adding one of his own from the ‘pre-established harmony’ needed to ensure that the monads mirror one another accurately; see *Natural theology), and a famous rebuttal of antitheistic arguments from *evil, holding that this is the best of all possible worlds, at least in being the best possible sequence of events moving towards perfection, even if it is not perfect yet; evil elements in it are essential ingredients in the whole. He was the first to use the word ‘*theodicy’.

Leibniz was also the promoter of unsuccessful schemes for reunion between Catholic and Protestant churches, and between Calvinists and Lutherans. Later he drifted towards a more purely ‘natural’ religion, and declined the assistance of any minister at his deathbed.

Bibliography

Works: Only some are available in English. L. Strickland (ed.), The Shorter Leibniz Texts (London, 2006); R. S. Woolhouse and R. Francks (eds.), Leibniz: Philosophical Texts (Oxford, 1998).

Studies: S. Brown, Leibniz (Brighton, 1984); N. Jolley (ed.), The Cambridge Companion to Leibniz (Cambridge, 1994); B. C. Look (ed.), The Continuum Companion to Leibniz (London, 2011); B. Mates, The Philosophy of Leibniz (New York and Oxford, 1986); G. M. Ross, Leibniz (Oxford, 1984).

R. L. STURCH

LEIDEN SYNOPSIS

The Synopsis purioris theologiae (1625) is a theology textbook explaining and defending mainstream *Reformed orthodoxy as it stood after the Synod of *Dort (1618), in the form of fifty-two theological disputations. It is known as the Leiden Synopsis after the four professors of theology at Leiden who co-authored it: J. Polyander, A. Waleus, A. Thysius and A. Rivetus. These academic disputations were presented at Leiden by students of the authors, under their close supervision and authority, and with their editorial control and additions (thus such disputations were considered ultimately the work of the supervisor).

The work follows a traditional 'common-places' arrangement, moving from discussion of the nature of theology, Scripture and the triune God, to creation, humanity, Christ, salvation, the church and the last things. There are in addition disputations throughout, more or less flowing from this topical arrangement, which address issues hotly contested among the various confessional blocs. The Synopsis was quite popular, going through five editions in the seventeenth century.

Bibliography

Polyander et al., Synopsis purioris theologiae, disputationibus quinquaginta duabus comprehensa, ed. H. Bavinck (Leiden, 1881); Synopsis of overzicht van de zuiverste theologie (Dutch tr., Enschede, 1964).

Studies: G. P. van Itterzon, Het gereformeerd leerboek der 17de eeuw ('s-Gravenhage, 1931).

B. E. ELLIS

LEO THE GREAT

Leo, who held the office of pope from 440 to 461, magnified the *papacy in various ways. Not only did he see himself as the successor to Peter, but he believed that Peter actually spoke through all he preached or wrote. Hence he expected all his statements as pope to be accepted without question. On the political front he obtained from the Emperor Valentinian III (425–55) effective jurisdiction over the Western Empire. If any bishop resisted papal authority, the pope could now resort to secular authority. Leo also added the decretals of his predecessors to Western *canon law, of which he became the effective guardian.

Leo enhanced his political standing by his achievements in negotiation with Rome's enemies, the Huns and the Vandals. Again, he boosted the city of Rome's own Christian tradition by claiming Peter and Paul as its patrons in succession to Romulus and Remus.

Leo made a significant contribution to the Eastern *Christological controversies of his time. Shortly before the 'Robber Council' of Ephesus in 449 Leo came out decisively against Eutyches (see *Monophysitism) and wrote a Tome to Bishop Flavian of Constantinople (d. 449) to confirm him in his stance against Eutyches. Leo hoped that the promulgation of his own doctrine would render a general council unnecessary, but it was not to be. At Ephesus Leo's Tome was not even read, and the supporters of Eutyches held the day. Leo immediately pressed for the decisions of this council to be overthrown. Circumstances following the death of Theodosius II (in 450) favoured this. A new general *council was held at *Chalcedon in 451, where the Tome was acclaimed among other documents as an orthodox statement.

The Tome was designed to refute Eutyches, whom Leo understood to be denying that it was real human flesh which Christ derived from *Mary. Leo, by contrast, held that Christ had to assume true human nature if he was to restore to humanity by his divine power that which it had once lost through sin. It was equally vital that Christ should have lost nothing of his divinity. In the one person of Jesus Christ each of the two natures retained its own natural properties unimpaired, and yet they always acted in concert with one another. Not surprisingly, this aspect of the Tome raised misgivings at Chalcedon among Illyrian and Palestinian bishops, who thought Leo was guilty of the *Nestorian error of dividing the natures and seeing in Christ two persons. This undoubted ambiguity in the Tome may be explained by its immediate purpose – to answer Eutyches. Elsewhere Leo disowned Nestorianism, which he interpreted as a form of *adoptionism. Thus Leo would stress the indivisible connection which was achieved when the two natures came together in Jesus Christ. But the fact remains that Leo did not explain the unity of Christ's person as well as he did the manifestation of the two natures in the life of the incarnate Christ.

Bibliography

T. G. Jalland, The Life and Times of St Leo the Great (London, 1941); J. N. D. Kelly, Early Christian Doctrines (London, 1977).

G. A. KEITH

LEONTIUS OF BYZANTIUM, see
HYPOSTASIS

LESSING, GOTTHOLD EPHRAIM (1729–81)

A pioneer in modern German drama, Lessing was one of the most elusive and seminal religious thinkers of his age. Even in its essentials, his thought has been interpreted in widely varied and incompatible ways. Lessing apparently sought to adopt a theological stance that avoided the deadlocked rationalism and orthodoxy of his day, but he can be regarded either as crypto-rationalist or as providing an alternative non-rationalist position to that held by the orthodox. There are at least two reasons for these, and other, discrepant verdicts. First, Lessing was a subtle author whose real views, it has been maintained, defy easy access. Secondly, he did not obviously correlate his main ideas coherently and gave no comprehensive, systematic account of them. One may therefore put it in terms which he himself applied to religion: it is the spirit of Lessing's enterprise, not the letter of his writing, that guides us best in the interpretation of his thought.

Such thought gains its unity, in part, from its preoccupation with a set of questions, namely, those that cluster around the issue of religious truth and how it is apprehended. In particular, Lessing propounded several theses on the general relation of *religion and *history, of which the following are among the most significant. (1) The Bible, including its historical record, is open to critical investigation. Lessing momentarily published the Wolfenbüttel Fragments of H. S. Reimarus' (1694–1768) work between 1774 and 1778 and vindicated at least the critical principle adopted by the latter in his attack on the orthodox approach to the Bible. (2) True religion antedates its literary expression and furnishes us with a spiritual criterion for assessing the force of the 'letter'. Hence it is not the historical account that actually authorizes our religious beliefs. (3) Historical testimony is technically 'uncertain' in the sense that, at its most reliable, it cannot warrant our absolute conviction. Its credibility therefore does not establish its religious authority. (4) Historical truths are, logically, of a different order from 'necessary truths of reason'. The former are contingent (an event, for example, might not have happened); the latter are necessary (their contradictories cannot be supposed). (5) History is process, and the communication or apprehension of religious truth can vary with its change. Revelation can be conceived as the education of the human race so that eventually it may be possible to comprehend the truths of morality and religion without recourse to earlier, partial ways of apprehension.

Certainly, such theses may be described differently, related in different ways and supplemented with others of note. Furthermore, their abstract statement fails to capture the fluid, suggestive, thrusting style of their author. Lessing appears to have deemed orthodoxy totally unrealistic in its religious foundations and rationalism quite ineffective by its failure to break new ground. It is hard to chart with precision the direct or indirect influence of Lessing's thought, but the various ways in which he organized the issue of *faith and history continue to command attention. When Lessing wrote that the endeavour to find truth is preferable to its possession in itself, it may reveal much of the man and his thought: in the spirit of this, one is perhaps more intellectually indebted to him for his attempts than his accomplishments.

Bibliography

H. E. Allison, Lessing and the Enlightenment (Ann Arbor, 1966); K. Barth, Protestant Theology in the Nineteenth Century (London, 1972); H. Chadwick (ed.), Lessing's Theological Writings (London, 1956); B. Fischer and T. C. Fox (eds.), A Companion to the Works of Gotthold Ephraim Lessing (Woodbridge, 2005); L. P. Wessell, G. E. Lessing's Theology: A Reinterpretation (The Hague, 1977).

S. N. WILLIAMS

LEVINAS, EMMANUEL (1906–95)

Levinas was a twentieth-century philosopher, born in Lithuania and naturalized a French citizen in 1930. He studied with Martin *Heidegger and Edmund Husserl in Strasbourg, where he also began a lifelong friendship with the philosopher Maurice Blanchot. He was drafted into French military service in 1939, but his army unit was routed and he was taken prisoner. Levinas spent most of the Second World War in a Nazi labour camp. After the war Levinas learned that his parents and brothers had been murdered by Nazi soldiers, though his wife and daughter survived in hiding. His philosophical work, which had begun to move away from Heidegger before the war, did so dramatically afterwards. In 1947 Levinas published his first book, Existence and Existents, much of which was handwritten during his time in the Nazi stalag. He spoke and wrote very little about his wartime experiences, though they exerted significant influence on his philosophy.

His first major work, Totality and Infinity, appeared in 1961 and presents a serious challenge to the history of philosophy. Levinas claims that philosophy has failed to realize that the relation with the other person exceeds the totality of *being. The encounter with the face of the other is a transcendent event, an encounter with the holy. For this reason *ethics should have the first and last word in philosophy. Levinas challenges philosophies of totality, from Parmenides to *Hegel, which he claims remain philosophies of the self. The other person summons from beyond any philosophical construction, before the construction of any system of ethics. For Levinas, responsibility precedes reason, metaphysics, philosophy and cognition.

Levinas gives preference to the face of *suffering, echoing biblical concern for the widow, the orphan and the stranger. He utilizes *religious language to express philosophical concepts and also wrote explicitly religious reflections on the Jewish Talmud. These essays often served to incubate ideas that later appear in his explicitly philosophical writings. Key ideas about holiness, goodness, time and radical responsibility first appear in readings of the Talmud.

Levinas's second major book, Otherwise than Being or Beyond Essence, appeared in 1974. Here Levinas presses obligation to even higher registers. Responsibility to the other is expressed as primordial summons, a calling to holiness and sacrifice that is older than time itself. His final works explore the dynamics of time and language in light of this infinite and original debt to the other person and to God.

Bibliography

Works: Time and the Other (Pittsburgh, 1947); Existence and Existents (Pittsburgh, 1947); Totality and Infinity (Pittsburgh, 1961); Otherwise than Being or Beyond Essence (Pittsburgh, 1974).

Studies: A. Peperzak, Beyond: The Philosophy of Emmanuel Levinas (Evanston, 1997);

D. Perpich, The Ethics of Emmanuel Levinas (Stanford, 2008).

E. SEVERSON

LEWIS, CLIVE STAPLES (1898–1963)

Born in Belfast, Lewis took a triple First at Oxford, and after a short time teaching philosophy became Fellow of Magdalen College and University Lecturer in English. He had abandoned Christian belief in adolescence, but was converted to *theism in 1929 and to Christianity two years later. For an account of his life up to conversion, see his Surprised by Joy (London, 1955). He was for many years the centre of a group of friends, the 'Inklings', which included the writer and lay theologian Charles *Williams and J. R. R. Tolkien (1892–1973), author of The Lord of the Rings. From 1954 he was Professor of Medieval and Renaissance English at Cambridge.

Lewis was a prolific writer, whose specifically Christian writings fall mainly into three classes. His fiction includes a series of three 'science fantasy' novels (Out of the Silent Planet, Perelandra – later retitled Voyage to Venus – and That Hideous Strength), a retelling of the myth of Psyche (Till We Have Faces) and his seven 'Narnia' books for children. In them Christian themes are introduced unmistakably and yet naturally; Lewis hoped that by setting them in new contexts he could help readers see them as they were, not spoilt by 'stained-glass and Sunday school associations'.

Avowedly *apologetic works include the broadcast talks collected in Mere Christianity, the studies The Problem of Pain and Miracles, and the allegorical Pilgrim's Regress. Here Lewis sought, without limiting himself to any one philosophical or theological position, to defend the common ground of traditional Christian orthodoxy, blending logical argument with insight into the workings of the human mind (especially the *conscience) and leading on to the transformed worldview that follows conversion.

Of his writings on the Christian life, the best known is The Screwtape Letters (from a senior devil to a novice tempter, advising on traps for the patient's soul). Letters to Malcolm, closer to theology proper than most of his work, deals with problems raised by *prayer. The Four Loves analyses in turn affection, friendship, eros and charity and the part they play in natural and Christian lives. Reflections on the Psalms is not a commentary but an exploration of Christian use of the psalter.

Lewis was probably the best-known apologist of his day, and his popularity continues. His works are characterized by his command of lucid and enjoyable English, enough philosophy to make his arguments coherent and persuasive without becoming technical, and his ability to lead his reader from the everyday, even the humorous, to hints of glory. His appeal was chiefly to the imagination and the intelligence, but though he seldom went very deep (except perhaps in A Grief Observed, written after his wife died), the fact that there were depths beyond was always made clear.

Bibliography

H. Carpenter, The Inklings (London, 1978); D. C. Downing, The Most Reluctant Convert: C. S. Lewis's Journey to Faith (Downers Grove, 2002); B. L. Edwards (ed.), C. S. Lewis: Life, Works, and Legacy, 4 vols. (Nestport, 2007); J. Gibb (ed.), Light on C. S. Lewis (London, 1965) (essays by friends and pupils); R. L. Green and W. Hooper, C. S. Lewis (London, 1974); A. Jacobs, The Narnian: The Life and Imagination of C. S. Lewis (San Francisco, 2005); W. H. Lewis (brother) (ed.), Letters of C. S. Lewis (London, 1966); M. Mühling, A Theological Journey into Narnia: An Analysis of the Message Beneath the Text (Göttingen, 2005); V. Reppert, C. S. Lewis's Dangerous Idea: In Defense of the Argument from Reason (Downers Grove, 2003); S. Schwartz, C. S. Lewis on the Final Frontier: Science and the Supernatural in the Space Trilogy (Oxford, 2009); C. Walsh, The Literary Legacy of C. S. Lewis (San Diego, CA, 1979); G. Watson (ed.), Critical Essays on C. S. Lewis (Menston, 1992); E. J. Wielenberg, God and the Reach of Reason (Cambridge, 2007).

R. L. STURCH

LIBERAL EVANGELICALISM

The term 'liberal evangelicalism' came to prominence at the beginning of the twentieth century, when it defined a 'progressive' or 'modernizing' network of evangelical clergy within the Church of England. It was subsequently applied to evangelicals from a range of denominations.

In the later 1800s Anglican evangelicals found themselves challenged on two key fronts. On the one hand, *liberals were commending higher criticism, embracing Darwinian evolution and rejecting *substitutionary *atonement – trends which many evangelicals saw as heretical. On the other, *Anglo-Catholics were promoting forms of worship which traditional evangelicals rejected as 'ritualistic'. However, not all evangelicals reacted with such hostility. Some emerged who thought it possible and indeed desirable to review historic evangelical interpretations in the light of modern scientific and cultural insights, and who were open to more liturgical forms of devotion. One such was A. J. Tait, who in 1906 gathered like-minded clergy into a 'Group Brotherhood' which included F. S. Guy Warman, later Bishop of Manchester. The Group soon attracted high-profile churchmen like T. Guy Rogers, E. W. Barnes and Cyril Bardsley. While 'clinging to the fundamental spiritual truths of Evangelicalism', the Group's manifesto declared that 'old doctrines had to be set forth in modern language'.

Following the 1914–18 war the Group Brotherhood was reconstituted as the Anglican Evangelical Group Movement, and enjoyed significant growth. Several AEGM figures contributed essays to the landmark volumes: Liberal Evangelicalism (1923), and The Inner Life: Essays in Liberal Evangelicalism (1925). By this time, the Movement had acquired its most dominant advocate: Vernon F. Storr was a Canon of Westminster Abbey and personified the AEGM's resolve to engage constructively with the wider church. However, Storr provoked controversy when suggesting that the Bible's spiritual value had been enhanced by critical scholarship, and that it was not wholly free from errors. He agreed with Rogers that modern evangelicals had become 'dissatisfied with some of the older and cruder penal substitutionary theories of the Atonement', and emphasized moral influence theories instead. Meanwhile Barnes championed theistic evolution, in opposition to the many traditional evangelicals who maintained a creationist view (see *Creation and evolution). Liturgically, Rogers, F. T. Woods and others embraced the 'catholic' eastward position at Communion, while a number of AEGM members replaced their 'Protestant' cassock and preaching scarf with an alb and stole. Retreats and non-Protestant traditions of prayer were also encouraged.

Unsurprisingly, these moves led to division. In 1922 conservatives within the Church

Missionary Society broke away to form the Bible Churchmen's Missionary Society. In 1928 the AEGM launched an annual conference at Cromer, as an alternative to the more traditional Keswick Convention (see *Higher-life theology). These Anglican tensions were reflected in other contexts. The interdenominational Student Christian Movement came under liberal evangelical influence, and in 1928 the Inter-Varsity Fellowship was formed by those convinced that it had compromised the gospel. The contours of evangelicalism developed somewhat differently in the USA, but the growing divergence of fundamentalism from 'neo-evangelicalism' there bore echoes of what was happening in England.

Storr's death in 1940, and the move of Barnes, Charles *Raven and others into full-blown liberalism led to the decline of the AEGM: the last Cromer convention took place in 1948. 'Liberal evangelical' is not a designation many would own now, and continuities between it and more progressive forms of evangelicalism today are not direct. Both the centrist neo-evangelicalism of Billy Graham, Carl *Henry or John Stott and more 'open', 'radical' or 'left-wing' forms of evangelicalism might accept biblical criticism, assimilate evolution, engage positively with contemporary culture and cooperate with Catholics. Yet unlike many liberal evangelicals of the 1920s and 1930s these constituencies would characteristically still affirm the primacy of Scripture and substitutionary (if not necessarily penal) accounts of the atonement. This may change, but as things stand, the legacy of liberal evangelicalism is seen as much in thoroughgoing liberal and 'post-evangelical' approaches as it is in groupings that would still identify themselves as evangelical.

Bibliography

O. R. Barclay, Whatever Happened to the Jesus Lane Lot? (Leicester, 1977); D. W. Bebbington, Evangelicalism in Modern Britain: A History from the 1730s to the 1980s (London, 1989), ch. 6; I. M. Randall, Evangelical Experiences: A Study in the Spirituality of English Evangelicalism, 1918–1939 (Carlisle, 1999), ch. 3; G. T. Rogers et al., Liberal Evangelicalism: An Interpretation (London, 1923); idem, The Inner Life: Essays in Liberal Evangelicalism (London, 1925); M. Wellings, Evangelicals Embattled: Responses of Evangelicals in the Church of England to Ritualism, Darwinism and Theological Liberalism, 1890–1930 (Carlisle, 2003).

D. H. K. HILBORN

LIBERAL THEOLOGY

The adjective 'liberal' comes from the Latin word for 'free' and so was applied in ancient times to the 'liberal arts', those educational pursuits of 'free men' who were not slaves. But in the early nineteenth century, it came to apply to those who favoured democratic government in the tradition of the French revolutionaries, or at least favoured representative parliamentary government on the Anglo-Saxon model. It acquired the meaning of 'forward-looking' (in contrast to 'conservatives' who wanted to conserve the best of the past) and strongly emphasized the liberty of the individual over against the community and the state.

It was first applied in theology to the heirs of F. D. E. *Schleiermacher, who were thought to be 'liberal' in the sense that they were forward-looking and willing to re-articulate the Christian faith in a way which appealed to the modern age. Schleiermacher, called 'the father of liberal theology', did this by thinking of Christian faith as one example or development (albeit the most 'advanced') of "religion", that subjective 'feeling' or 'consciousness' of the divine and the eternal found in all humanity. In contrast, *Hegel and his heirs saw the Christian faith as a pictorial version of his *idealist metaphysics in which God (Geist, meaning 'mind' or 'spirit') realized itself in the history of the world. Towards the end of the nineteenth century, this classic German *liberalism was represented by the *Ritschlian school which followed Schleiermacher in rejecting *metaphysics, but prioritized the ethical. In Adolf von *Harnack, their focus on the 'kingdom of God', understood as a historical movement for social reform, led to a denial of the orthodox doctrines of the atonement, the incarnation and the Trinity. In the United States, Walter *Rauschenbusch's "social gospel" optimistically saw social progress dealing with sin and evil and ushering in the *kingdom of God through following the moral teaching of Jesus. Other-worldly notions were dismissed.

The First World War brought the demise of this classic liberalism. The 'dialectical' theology of Barth, Brunner, Bultmann and *Gogarten strongly reacted against it in favour of a 'theology of the word'. But in fact many of the characteristic notes of classic nineteenth-century liberalism survived. *Barth and *Brunner returned to the doctrines of incarnation, Trinity and atonement and the doctrines of the Reformation, but they remained suspect to some conservatives because they did not adopt the full intellectual system of *scholastic post-Reformation Protestant 'orthodoxy'. They were dismissed by some as 'neo-orthodox', along with Reinhold *Niebuhr. Niebuhr's strong emphasis on sin and evil in his Nature and Destiny of Man (1941) led him to reject the optimism of classic liberalism, but his theological method was more akin to it than was Barth's focus on biblical revelation.

In the 1950s and 1960s the survival of the approach of liberal theology was even more evident in the thought of Rudolf *Bultmann. Although he had rejected classic liberalism, the historicism seen in Harnack, *Troeltsch and Rauschenbusch issued in his extreme historical scepticism about the Gospels and his classifying any talk of miracles, angels or demons, or indeed of God's action in the world as '*myth'. When the NT was '*demythologized', however, its core message remained, and this proved to be virtually identical to the *existentialist philosophy of Bultmann's colleague, Martin *Heidegger. To be 'justified by faith' (Bultmann was a Lutheran) was to live deciding authentically to embrace the future and reject the dead old historical past.

Paul *Tillich similarly adopted an existentialist stance, but whereas Bultmann was an NT scholar, Tillich was a philosophical theologian and articulated a method of 'correlation'. Human philosophy and culture posed the great questions of human life, and Christian theology supplied the answers. God was to be thought of not as a person 'up there', but as the ground of our *being, and all religion was a matter of 'ultimate concern'. Popular versions of the theologies of Bultmann and Tillich appeared in John A. T. *Robinson's Honest to God (1963). John *Hick moved from the more conservative position of his youth to a gradually more 'liberal' one, eventually letting go of the doctrine of the incarnation as an editor of The Myth of God Incarnate (1977), and adopting a fully pluralist and universalist position (God Has Many Names, 1980).

Although this tradition is mainly Protestant, Roman Catholic theologians such as Hans *Küng are frequently identified as 'liberal'. And while the term is more strictly applied to the largely German nineteenth-century schools, some features characterize the whole tradition from Schleiermacher to Tillich and Hick.

First, the broader liberal tradition had an *apologetic motive. Its aim (as the title of Schleiermacher's major work put it) was to commend 'religion' to its 'cultured despisers'. It arose therefore in response to the attack on Christian faith by the *Enlightenment and tried to adapt Christian theology to meet the challenge of '*modernity'. It might therefore be better termed 'modernist'.

Secondly, it was characterized throughout by the method of correlation which was most clearly articulated by Tillich. It was therefore essentially *anthropocentric rather than theocentric, and often appeared to be concerned more with human well-being and 'self-understanding' than with the glory of God. While it had commendable social concern, it often tended to come down to a 'private' or individualistic religion which fitted the individualism characteristic of the era of modernity. While an early optimism was abandoned, a tendency to emphasize human need rather than human sin and the fall persisted.

Thirdly, in line with this strong human and even *humanist concern, it was characterized by a strong *historicism. In line with modern philosophy and what was seen as scientific method, the Christian faith had to be explained historically along with all 'religion' in terms of a closed continuum of cause and effect. The transcendence of God was sacrificed to an accent on immanence which sometimes verged on *pantheism or at least panentheism.

Fourthly, this led to radical revision of Christian theology, rejecting not only the rigid scholasticism of Protestant *orthodoxy, but the Reformation doctrine of substitutionary *atonement, and even the patristic and creedal doctrines of incarnation and the Trinity. Miracles, including the central *miracle of the resurrection, were regarded as contrary to 'modern science'. Attempts were made by some to develop a non-incarnational Christology, but at best these often fell short of affirming the full deity of Christ, and frequently developed into *universalism and pluralism.

Fifthly, the Christian *Scriptures were merely human products, inspired only in the same sense that all great literature was said to be 'inspired', a resource for faith, but to be corrected in the light of human reason and experience.

Liberal theology today is often said to be in decline as ‘modernity’ gives way to ‘*post-modernity’. The so-called ‘postliberalism’ of George *Lindbeck and Stanley Hauerwas classifies it as an ‘experiential-expressive’ model in opposition to the ‘cognitive-propositionalist’ model of ‘conservative’ theology, and advocates instead a post-liberal ‘cultural-linguistic’ model. It remains to be seen, however, whether this is a genuine departure from liberalism, or whether this simply replaces an individualistic human focus with a community-based one. The question is whether any theology can escape liberalism if it makes no cognitive claims to speak of the true and living God.

Bibliography

G. Dorrien, The Making of American Liberal Theology: Imagining Progressive Religion, 1805–1900 (Louisville, 2001); D. F. Ford (ed.), The Modern Theologians: An Introduction to Christian Theology in the Twentieth Century (New York and Oxford, 2005); S. J. Grenz and R. E. Olson, 20th-Century Theology (Downers Grove, 1992); A. I. C. Heron, A Century of Protestant Theology (London, 1980); N. Murphy, Beyond Liberalism and Fundamentalism: How Modern and Post-modern Philosophy Set the Theological Agenda (Valley Forge, 1996).

T. A. NOBLE

LIBERALISM, GERMAN

The roots of nineteenth-century German liberalism are mainly to be found in the eighteenth-century *Enlightenment, the French Revolution, and the *romanticism and *idealism of the turn of the century. The philosophical and political ideas generated during this period permeated both secular and ecclesiastical thinking, producing a growing reaction against traditional institutions and beliefs.

Within the circle of theological liberalism one must distinguish between liberalism of doctrine and liberalism in biblical scholarship. The former was an undermining or denial of the traditional doctrines of the Christian faith, while the latter challenged the authenticity, historicity and divine inspiration of the Bible. These two forms of liberalism were generally connected in varying degree, yet one might hold one without necessarily holding the other.

In the realm of Christian doctrine, German liberalism may be traced back to *Kant and *Lessing, but above all to *Schleiermacher, who drastically reinterpreted the fundamental doctrines of Christianity from an anthropocentric viewpoint. For Schleiermacher, theology must begin from human ‘religion’ which resulted from a universal ‘God-consciousness’ or ‘feeling of dependence’. For Christians it was the absolute God-consciousness of Jesus, impressed upon the Christian community, which constituted his redemptive work. Classical *Christology and the doctrine of the *Trinity were all but dismissed as speculation irrelevant to true piety.

The first serious challenge to the authenticity of the NT writings was *Strauss’s Life of Jesus in 1835. With this book Strauss proclaimed that the *supernatural elements of the gospel history were unhistorical ‘*myth’. In this same year appeared Peter von Bohlen’s (1796–1840) commentary on Genesis and Wilhelm Vatke’s (1806–82) Biblischen Theologie, both of which demonstrated that Strauss’s non-supernatural approach could also be applied to the OT. These works evoked a flood of literature dealing with the Bible and its reliability. In the forefront came the *Tübingen School, which from a non-supernatural theological and historical perspective examined the history of the early church and determined the dating and authorship of each book according to its own particular ‘tendency’. The Gospels were all pronounced to be productions of the second century, and apart from Romans, 1 and 2 Corinthians, Galatians and Revelation, no book was authentic.

In the realm of the OT came the documentary theory in which the Pentateuch was divided up into at least four different sources or documents, all thought to have originated at different times several centuries after Moses. This hypothesis was fully developed by Karl Heinrich Graf (1815–69), Abraham Kuenen (1828–91) and Julius Wellhausen (1844–1918), who brought it to its dominant position at the end of the nineteenth century.

Implicitly underlying the whole critical investigation of the Bible was the idealistic philosophy which developed from the Enlightenment in the second half of the eighteenth century and culminated in the writings of J. G. Herder (1744–1803), *Hegel, J. G. *Fichte, F. W. J. von Schelling (1775–1854) and J. W. von Goethe (1749–1832). God was conceived as an Absolute Spirit manifested in many different forms and ways, but chiefly as immanent in nature and revealed in history and humanity. This *revelation was thought of as a general revelation throughout history in all peoples and cultures, and not as special and miraculous revelation to one particular nation, i.e. Israel. Thus the Jewish religion was regarded simply as one natural religion among others, its myths and folklore parallel to that of other primitive cultures, with its development from simple beginnings to a complex priestly cultus following a pattern which could be traced more or less clearly in the history and culture of every nation. And just as the Tübingen School had fitted the NT books into Baur's historical perspective, so the OT scholars fitted the literature of Israel into this evolutionary scheme of religion, determining the date and provenance of every part and section according to how its 'tendency' best fitted into the predetermined historical and religious framework.

Following Strauss's Life of Jesus came a host of other works of the same genre, each advocating the author's own interpretation of Jesus' life – G. H. A. von Ewald's (1803–75) rationalistic portrayal (1855), K. T. Keim's (1825–78) tedious three-volume account (1867–72), Strauss's New Life of Jesus (1864), and J. E. Renan's (1823–92) sentimental embellishment (1863) – to name only the most widely read. By the 1880s these and a host of lesser works were being eagerly translated into English. In Great Britain it was primarily this scholarship which was regarded as liberal. Only in the 1880s and 1890s did liberalism come to possess the narrower sense originating with *Ritschlian theology.

In the 1880s the Ritschlian school became the dominant influence in the realm of dogmatics, and it was the liberalism of this school which largely determined non-orthodox theology until the First World War. For Ritschl the *kingdom of God was an ethical and moral kingdom which would develop and grow to maturity, with Jesus as the great example for humanity to follow. Sin was not the radical evil of the will, but rather ignorance which could be corrected by moral upbringing and education. For Ritschl's pupil W. *Herrmann, the portrait of Jesus contained in the Gospels provided man with the example to which he himself should aspire. For A. *Harnack, Jesus himself did not even belong in the gospel: 'Not the Son, but the Father only, belongs in the gospel, as Jesus proclaimed it.' For others Jesus was merely a great moral teacher who taught a purely ethical kingdom of goodness, kindness, tolerance and love for one's neighbour. His death was regarded not as an atonement for sin – that was a relic of primitive Judaism – but as a wonderful example of moral fortitude and resolution. Above all, liberalism desired an undogmatic form of Christianity, free from the constricting trammels of the traditional doctrines and creeds, while still retaining an outward vestige which might pass for orthodoxy.

Such was the essence of German liberalism at the turn of the nineteenth century. There were other movements which denied the authenticity of the Scriptures, such as the *history-of-religions school, but these were not necessarily identified with the doctrinal liberalism of the Ritschlians. For the orthodox, however, who regarded all non-orthodox literature as liberal, unbelieving or atheistic, fine distinctions between these various viewpoints were not of great significance.

Two main causes led to the decline of theological liberalism in Germany. The first was the onslaught of the rationalists during the decade preceding the First World War. Led by Albert Kalthoff (1850–1906) and Arthur Drews (1865–1935), who argued that Jesus had never lived, the rationalists regarded the liberal view of Jesus as a compromise between the supernatural Jesus of orthodoxy and their own rationalistic explanations. Either one or the other, but not half and half! Thus ensued a long and acrimonious controversy in which many flaws in the liberal viewpoint were exposed.

The second cause was the First World War itself, which shattered the liberal idea of a civilization growing upwards in goodness and perfection. It became evident that the world was not getting better. The evil which was laid bare struck a mortal blow against the old liberal idea that evil was only ignorance which might be corrected by education. After the war came Karl *Barth, who radically opposed the pre-war liberal theology, and proclaimed that the God of the Bible must not be confused with human ideas about God. Yet while it is true that doctrinal liberalism received a severe check, liberalism in biblical scholarship continued unabated in the demythologization (see *Myth) programmes of the *Bultmannians. Doctrinal liberalism also took new forms in major thinkers such as *Tillich, who continued the apologetic intention of the German liberal tradition to commend 'religion' to its 'cultured despisers' and helped to make it dominant for a time in America. By the end of the twentieth century, however, the liberal tradition, aiming to correlate theology with 'modern' thought, appeared to many to be outmoded by the rise of '*postmodernism'.

Bibliography

A. I. C. Heron, A Century of Protestant Theology (Guildford and London, 1980); H. R. Mackintosh, Types of Modern Theology: Schleiermacher to Barth (London, 1937); B. M. G. Reardon, Liberal Protestantism (London, 1968); C. Welch, Protestant Thought in the Nineteenth Century, vol. 1: 1799–1870 (New Haven, and London, 1972).

H. HARRIS

LIBERATION THEOLOGY

The name 'Liberation theology' was first coined by Catholic theologians from Latin America in the 1970s. Their initial vision of theology as a way of reflecting on the Christian faith 'from the perspective of the poor' was adopted by a variety of theological movements such as *Black, Hispanic and Amerindian theologies in the United States, anti-apartheid theologies in Africa, and *feminist theologies elsewhere. In its origins, the concept of 'liberation' had political and cultural connotations reflecting the revolutionary attempts radically to change the social structures in Latin America following the Cuban revolution (1959). As some Catholic clergy, bishops and lay people adopted that revolutionary stance, when they reflected about their faith they found biblical and historical motifs that related to it. According to Gutiérrez, 'The theology of liberation offers us not so much a new theme for reflection as a new way to do theology. Theology as critical reflection on historical praxis' (A Theology of Liberation, 1988, p. 12). Theology becomes a second act after Christians make a political choice and act accordingly. From that perspective every theology is also to be understood as a product of historical circumstances.

Historical context

Latin American nations became independent from Iberian colonialism between 1810 and 1824. The Roman Catholic Church, which had been imposed through military conquest, was a key component of the colonial structure and *scholastic theology provided an ideological explanation for the role of Christians in society. The modern creed of the independence leaders taken from the French and American revolutions was condemned by the church, which remained as a conservative force. Scholastic theology became irrelevant to the cultural life of these societies and unable to stand the onslaught of *positivism in the nineteenth century and *Marxism in the twentieth. In the early nineteenth century *Protestantism arrived in Latin America and saw itself as a transformative force in society, its theology being more akin to the ideas of liberalization, democracy and progress. However, Latin American theologies of liberation have been predominantly a Roman Catholic phenomenon that emerged as an outcome of transformative processes within that church.

The first conference of bishops (CELAM I, 1955) in Rio de Janeiro opened doors for Catholic missionaries from Europe and North America to help the church that felt threatened by the growth of communism and Protestantism. The new wave of missionaries after the Second World War became concerned with the social conditions and the decline of the church, and though at first influenced by the anti-communist stance of the Cold War, their encounter with the appalling conditions of the poor brought a change of mission practice in a twofold direction. Europeans applied social analysis to understand church and society, and North Americans became activists in a variety of grassroots actions for the poor. Their approach coincided with the change of political outlook and alignment of Catholic lay leaders, especially those related to the Catholic Action movement of workers and students, such as Brazilian Paulo Freire (1921–97). Active involvement in these processes was part of the formative experience of theologians such as Juan Luis Segundo (1925–96) from Uruguay and Gustavo *Gutiérrez from Peru. Their ideas became influential at the time of the second Conference of Bishops in Medellín, Colombia (CELAM II, 1968), which was an effort to apply *Vatican II to Latin America. Key concepts and vocabulary of these theologians were adopted by the hierarchy in the final documents they issued, and the church called her new position a 'preferential option for the poor'.

According to Gutiérrez, liberation theology came as reflection on that new practice, but it was to be done 'in light of God's Word'. The French Bible-centred pastoral renewal was influential in many of the missionary priests from Europe, and the use of biblical scholarship and biblical categories also became a new source of theological reflection within Catholic circles, as a result of Vatican II. Influential theologians such as Marie-Dominique Chenu (1895–1990), Yves Congar, Johannes Baptist Metz and Karl Rahner had pioneered an approach sanctioned later by Conciliar decrees. This placed the Bible as the chief source of theology, and as the centre of the curriculum for the training of priests. In the use of biblical material and motifs, theologians of liberation that represented this new moment in Catholicism were Severino Croatto (1930–2004), Leonardo Boff, and Porfirio Miranda (1924–2001).

There was also interaction between Catholic liberation theologians and some Latin American Protestants related to the ecumenical movement, such as Emilio Castro (b. 1927) from Uruguay, José Míguez Bonino from Argentina and Rubem Alves (1933–2014) from Brazil, all of whom adopted liberation perspectives. In 1978 Alan Neely surveyed Protestant antecedents of liberation theologies, one of them being the study carried out by the WCC about churches in situations of rapid social change, which reached its peak in a conference about 'Christians in the Technical and Social Revolutions of Our Time' (Geneva 1966). The theological contributions of Harvey Cox (b. 1929), Paul Lehmann (1906–94) and Jürgen Moltmann were influential in this process. It was understood that unjust structures and oppression in society had a dehumanizing effect contrary to God's design, and that God's action in history was aimed at humanization, 'to make and to keep human life human'. Consequently, Christians were called to take part in the historical process of the twentieth century, in which revolution represented the cutting edge of humanization. This agenda was to be implemented by the movement Church and Society in Latin America (ISAL), which first publicized the writings of Rubem Alves, Paulo Freire and Richard Shaull (1919–2002). Alves' book A Theology of Human Hope (1969) represents a Latin American interpretation of Barth, Bultmann, Cox, Lehmann and Moltmann that preceded by two years the original Spanish edition of the classical book of Gustavo Gutiérrez, A Theology of Liberation (1971, ET 1973).

Theological method

Both Míguez Bonino (1975) and Gutiérrez (1988) in their classic overviews emphasize the fact that for liberation theology the starting point is the committed action of the Christian people. In this theological itinerary, Christians first perceive God moving in history to bring liberation for the poor (see Poverty and wealth), and consequently throw their lot with him in obedience; secondly, they go to Scripture or to Christian tradition in order to read, understand and expound the Christian faith. Only from the ground of commitment does one have access to the reality of biblical truth, because, as Míguez Bonino says, 'There is no truth outside or beyond the concrete historical events in which men are involved as agents. There is, therefore, no knowledge except in action itself, in the process of transforming the world through participation in history' (Doing Theology in a Revolutionary Situation, 1975, p. 88). Croatto argues that this corresponds to a pattern found in the Bible itself, in which the biblical message wells up from the salvific happening. This determines a method in which 'I do not first carry out an exegesis of the biblical passage and subsequently relate it to the facts of our world or our oppressed continent. Rather, the facts must be and are prior to my interpretation of the biblical Word' (Exodus: A Hermeneutics of Freedom, 1981, p. 11).

For these theologians, in Latin America praxis meant involvement in the cause of social and political liberation as defined by a Marxist analysis of history and of social reality. In 1975 Míguez Bonino stated that 'the thought of these men is characterized by a strict scientific-ideological analysis, avowedly Marxist. This is clearly seen in their way of relating praxis and theory and in their insistence on the rationality, conflict and radical nature of the political realm. It can also be seen in the recognition of class struggle' (Doing Theology, p. 71). Therefore Marxism offered a tool for social analysis and a view of history permeated by a messianic and eschatological bent involving what Míguez Bonino called 'a certain discernment of the future' (ibid., p. 35). Class struggle was the key to understanding current social reality, and the coming of an end to that struggle was to be achieved in the classless society that revolution would bring. Gutiérrez, Míguez Bonino and Hugo Assman (1933–2008) were explicitly critical of *capitalism, and rejected political options that could be described as 'developmentalism', 'reformism' or a third way between Marxist socialism and capitalism. Gutiérrez stated, 'The goal is not only better living conditions, a radical change of structures, a social revolution; it is much more: the continuous creation, never ending, of a new way to be human, a permanent cultural revolution' (Theology of Liberation, 1988, p. 21).

The use of Marxism in liberation theology has been criticized by Catholics such as James V. Schall and Michael Novak, and by evangelicals such as Emilio Núñez and others. This was also the main thrust of official criticism from the Vatican in the Instructions of the Sacred Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith (1984, 1986), issued by Cardinal Joseph *Ratzinger. In response to it some liberation theologians clarified and refined their position. In his responses to criticism from the Vatican, Gustavo Gutiérrez was explicit about the limits he had set to his own use of Marxism. He argued that some Marxist elements were part of the social sciences used for analysis, and he pointed to the fact that CELAM in their assemblies of Medellín and Puebla did the same: 'Social analysis has been a resource in order to know a situation and not for the study of matters considered more strictly theological' (Gutiérrez, 1984, p. 83).

The collapse of the socialist world symbolized by the fall of the Berlin wall in 1989 affected the validity of the Marxist theoretical construct that had guided the liberation theology method. However, the rise of neo-liberalism and a new world order shaped by it did not bring an end to poverty and injustice in the world. Even in Latin America the context from which liberation theologies had risen continues to be a challenge to the Christian conscience. The most recent work of Gutiérrez in his massive book, Las Casas: In Search of the Poor of Jesus Christ (1993), studies the development of the theology of *mission that backed the Spanish conquest of America and contrasts it with the theology of the Dominican Bartolomé de las Casas that proposed a different missionary approach. It is an effort to prove that liberation theology is in line with a form of theology that has been present in Christian history, and that it is not an outcome of Marxism. Theologians such as José Comblin and Leonardo Boff have continued to work along similar lines.

Liberation theologies outside Latin America emphasized the common situation of oppression in their origins, but in some cases dismissed the use of Marxism. Thus Black American theologian J. Deotis Roberts (b. 1927) says that 'It is rather easy for black theologians to enter into dialogue with Latin American liberation theologians because both are tuned in on an oppressed human situation' (A Black Political Theology, 1974, pp. 205–206). But he also contrasts the Catholic milieu, the reaction against totalitarian governments and the influence of Marxism in Latin America, with the context of Black theology which is mainly Protestant, comes from a pluralistic society, and faces the specific question of *race. Moreover, 'Black theologians are not bound by church dogmas; neither do they seek church approval for their reflection' (ibid., p. 207). Roberts also emphasizes the intense and lively spirituality of the Black church within which Black theology was born and the North American experience of reconciliation to which it was related.

Theologies from other cultures have taken cues from liberation theologies but have also criticized it. Aloysius Pieris, a Jesuit from Sri Lanka, stresses the validity of the great religions and rejects the Marxist criticism of religion. For him, 'This Afro-Asian critique of Marxist occidentalism is also an implicit judgment on the militant stream of Latin American theology, which maintains a methodological continuity with Western Marxism and a cultural continuity with European theology' (in V. Fabella and S. Torres, Irruption of the Third World, 1983, p. 119). On the other hand, in his book Mañana (1990), historian Justo L. González (b. 1937) articulated a Christian theology from a Hispanic perspective in the United States. Using perceptions from liberation theologies, he stresses the *contextual nature of every theology and the need to make room for perspectives that come from minorities that are not always given a voice in the dialogue within the churches and the academic world. From an intentional evangelical stance, Orlando Costas (1942–87) offered a similar reflection in Liberating News (1989).

Some key themes

What comes closer to a systematic exposition of liberation theology is the book Mysterium Liberationis (1993), edited by Ignacio Ellacuría and Jon Sobrino. Its method and hermeneutical approach are better perceived in some of the themes that have been privileged by these theologians: poverty and Christian praxis, Christology and history. Christian praxis, which is the starting point of doing theology, is to be understood with help from the social sciences. The so-called 'option for the poor' taken by some Catholics in Latin America is seen as a pastoral and political alignment, because biblical categories cannot be applied to our contemporary situation without the mediation of the social sciences. 'The poor' is not a vague term, but it points out to the existence of social classes and social struggles. For Gutiérrez, 'Poor and oppressed people are members of a social class which is overtly or covertly exploited by another social class. The proletariat is simply the most belligerent and clear-cut segment of this exploited social class' (in R. Gibellini [ed.], Frontiers of Theology in Latin America, 1979, p. 8). The poverty of the poor demands a new praxis, which rather than engaging in acts of generosity to alleviate their plight, must be 'a compelling obligation to fashion an entirely different social order' (ibid., p. 8).

The 'hermeneutics of liberation theologies may be better perceived in their Christological and ecclesiological proposals. The 'Christology of Jon Sobrino, from Spain and El Salvador, intentionally starts from the biblical text rather than from the dogmatic statements of the church, and seeks to focus on the historical Jesus in order to provide a basis for Christian action: 'The course that Jesus took is to be investigated scientifically, not just to aid in the quest for truth but also in the fight for truth that will make people free' (Christology at the Crossroads: A Latin American Approach, 1978, p. 35). Reading the texts of the Gospels, with due attention to their social and political context, Sobrino emphasizes the political dimension of the death of Jesus as the historical outcome of the kind of life he lived, and his suffering for the cause of justice which becomes the central challenge for discipleship today. Accepting the validity of this approach, which provides a fresh understanding of the biblical text, René Padilla (b. 1932) has criticized it for overemphasizing the political significance of Jesus' death and not paying enough attention to its soteriological significance, which is also an important part of the text (in V. Samuel and C. Sugden, Sharing Jesus in the Two Thirds World, p. 28).

An 'ecclesiology carrying the logic of liberation theologies was explored especially by the Brazilian, Leonardo Boff, who has tried to articulate the experience of the basic Christian communities, the grassroots small groups in which poor people started to revive their Catholic faith, relating it to their daily experience in Latin America. For Boff 'A true "ecclesiology" is in progress throughout the world, a Church being born from the faith of the poor' (Church: Charisma and Power, 1985, p. 9). The concept of the church as the people of God that was emphasized in Vatican II, has been an incentive for new pastoral practices, but according to Boff, 'true ecclesiology is not the result of textbook analysis or theoretical hypothesis; it comes about as a result of ecclesial practices within the institution' (ibid., p. 1). Boff has been very critical of hierarchical authoritarianism and clericalism that he sees practised in the Catholic Church, and proposes 'new ministries and a new style of religious life incarnated in the life of the people' (ibid., p. 10). He argues that the key elements in his proposals that come from praxis are characteristics of the model of church life that we also find in the NT, and on the basis of the biblical data he questions some dogmatic assumptions.

The new way of understanding history derived its critical dynamism from the Marxist concept. Application of class analysis and emphasis on the social role played by the institutional churches brought a new reading of their history that had a shocking effect, especially when used for a critical understanding of missionary action within the frame of European imperial expansion after the sixteenth century. From that perspective both Catholic and Protestant missionary work has been criticized, provoking what Míguez Bonino calls a crisis of conscience 'when Christians discover that their churches have become the ideological allies of foreign and national forces that keep the countries in dependence and the people in slavery and need' (Doing Theology, p. 17). Historians who have adopted the liberation perspective, such as Enrique Dussel (b. 1934) from Argentina and Eduardo Hoornaert (b. 1930) from Brazil, have modified the Marxist view, turning it more into a new outlook 'from the perspective of the poor' (Dussel, 1981; Hoornaert, 1988).

What Gutiérrez calls the 'irruption of the poor' would be part of the general movement of history towards liberation in which he distinguishes three levels: 'liberation from social situations of oppression and marginalization', 'a personal transformation by which we live with profound inner freedom in the face of every kind of servitude', and 'liberation from sin, which attacks the deepest root of all servitude' (Theology of Liberation, p. xxxviii). In other theologians, awareness about the irruption of the poor in history has become part of the agenda of a theology of the Christian mission that must interpret the significance of the growth and flourishing of the Christian faith in the southern hemisphere parallel to the decline of Christendom in Europe. It brings to the debate the *eschatological question which for Gutiérrez has been expressed in his insistence upon the concept that there is no sacred history within a world history, but only one history 'one human destiny, irreversibly assumed by Christ the Lord of history' (ibid., p. 86).

The publication of a revised edition of the classic work of Gustavo Gutiérrez, fifteen years after the first, was an occasion to see the wide repercussions of this theology around the world, and the form in which it has been incorporated in a variety of church and missionary situations. Within Protestantism there were efforts to demonstrate that in spite of its Catholic origins liberation theologies incorporate some of the main tenets of the Protestant Reformation, but there are also critical approaches, coming especially from evangelicals, that point to important and insurmountable differences.

See also: ROMAN CATHOLIC THEOLOGY; REVOLUTIONARY THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

R. Alves, A Theology of Human Hope (St. Meinrad, 1969); L. Boff, Church: Charisma and Power: Liberation Theology and the Institutional Church (New York, 1985); J. M. Bonino, Doing Theology in a Revolutionary Situation (London and Philadelphia, 1975); J. Comblin, Called for Freedom: The Changing Context of Liberation Theology (Maryknoll, 1998); O. E. Costas, Liberating News: A Theology of Contextual Evangelization (Grand Rapids, 1989); J. S. Croatto, Exodus: A Hermeneutics of Freedom (Maryknoll, 1981); E. Dussel (ed.), The Church in Latin America 1492–1992 (London, 1992); I. Ellacuria and J. Sobrino (eds.), Mysterium Liberationis (Maryknoll, 1993); M. H. Ellis and O. Maduro (eds.), The Future of Liberation Theology: Essays in Honor of Gustavo Gutiérrez (Maryknoll, 1989); S. Escobar, Changing Tides

(Maryknoll, 2002); idem, Liberation Themes in Reformational Perspective (Sioux College, 1989); V. Fabella M. M. and S. Torres (eds.), Irruption of the Third World (Maryknoll, 1983); R. Gibellini (ed.), Frontiers of Theology in Latin America (Maryknoll, 1979); J. L. González and O. González, Christianity in Latin America: A History (Cambridge, 2008); G. Gutiérrez, We Drink from Our Own Wells: The Spiritual Journey of a People (Maryknoll, 1984); idem, A Theology of Liberation, rev. edn (Maryknoll, 2nd 1988); idem, The Truth Shall Make You Free (Maryknoll, 1990); E. Hoornaert, The Memory of the Christian People (Maryknoll, 1988); A. P. Neely, Protestant Antecedents of the Latin American Theology of Liberation, Thesis, American University, Washington (Ann Arbor, 1977); M. Novak, Will It Liberate? Questions about Liberation Theology (New York, 1986); E. A. Núñez C., Liberation Theology (Chicago, 1985); J. D. Roberts, A Black Political Theology (Philadelphia, 1974); Sacred Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, Instruction on Certain Aspects of the 'Theology of Liberation' (Boston, 1984); idem, Instruction on Christian Freedom and Liberation (Boston, 1986); V. Samuel and C. Sugden (eds.), Sharing Jesus in the Two Thirds World (Grand Rapids, 1983); J. V. Schall SJ, Liberation Theology in Latin America (San Francisco, 1982); D. S. Schipani (ed.), Freedom and Discipleship: Liberation Theology in Anabaptist Perspective (Maryknoll, 1989); P. E. Sigmund, Liberation Theology at the Crossroads (New York, 1990); C. Smith, The Emergence of Liberation Theology: Radical Religion and Social Movement Theory (Chicago, 1991); J. Sobrino, Christology at the Crossroads: A Latin American Approach (Maryknoll, 1978); R. S. Sugirtharajah (ed.), Voices from the Margin: Interpreting the Bible in the Third World (Maryknoll, 1991).

S. ESCOBAR

LIMBUS

In Roman Catholic theology this word (Lat. limbus, 'order, hem, edge') denotes the region on the border of hell thought to be inhabited by those who do not experience the pangs of hell or the joys of heaven (or *purgatory). On this view limbus (cf. Eng. 'limbo') is the abode of two categories of the dead. (1) Those who on earth never gained the use of reason and were not baptized, whether infants (limbus infantium, ‘the limbo of infants’) or the mentally incompetent. Although they were innocent of personal *guilt, their original sin had not been removed by *baptism. According to Pope Innocent III (1160–1216), the punishment of original sin is deprivation of the beatific vision of God. Some writers maintain that such infants are in some way conscious of their permanent exclusion from eternal beatitude; others believe that they are unaware of this loss or are in a state of natural happiness such as Adam enjoyed before the *fall. (2) OT saints prior to their liberation by Christ on his ‘*descent into hell’ and their ascent into heaven (see *Eschatology) (limbus patrum, ‘the limbo of the fathers’, sometimes referred to as sinus Abrahae, ‘Abraham’s bosom’, based on Luke 16:22). In 2007, Pope Benedict XVI (see *Ratzinger, Josef) authorized the publication of a report by a commission which allowed that there were grounds for hope that unbaptized infants would be saved and that ‘the theory of limbo’ was a ‘possible theological hypothesis’ rather than a formal ‘dogmatic definition’ of the *Roman Catholic Church.

Bibliography

P. Gumpel, ‘Limbo’, SM III, p. 319; International Theological Commission, The Hope of Salvation for Infants Who Die without Being Baptised (Rome, 2007).

M. J. HARRIS

LINDBECK, GEORGE (b. 1923)

George Lindbeck is an American Lutheran theologian, who until 1993 taught at Yale University. After attending the Second *Vatican Council as an observer, he became a prominent commentator on Roman Catholicism and a prolific contributor to *ecumenical debates. Although he is most often mentioned in connection with the rise of *postliberal theology, his work in that regard was largely a by-product of his ecumenical work.

In The Nature of Doctrine (1984), Lindbeck asked what account of doctrine would make sense of ecumenical debates in which long-separated partners reached doctrinal agreements, and yet claimed to remain faithful adherents of traditions that had previously found each others’ views unacceptable. He rejected both the ‘cognitive-propositional’ view that sees doctrinal statements as straightforward factual claims, and the ‘experiential-expressive’ view that sees them as the expressions of one’s religious consciousness. He suggested instead that religions or denominations should be seen as analogous to communities with distinctive languages, and doctrinal statements as analogous to grammatical rules for these languages – a view he dubbed the ‘cultural-linguistic’ approach.

Controversially, Lindbeck claimed that doctrinal statements need not be understood as themselves making direct truth claims. Rather, it is the lives that are governed by doctrinal rules that should be thought of as truth-claiming. So the Nicene *Creed’s claim that the Father and the Son are of one substance is not itself a direct claim about the being of God. Rather, it states a rule for Christian life, insisting that all Christian practices that refer to the Father must treat him as the Father of Jesus Christ. Nevertheless, Lindbeck claims that lives governed by this and other doctrinal rules do indeed witness truly to God.

According to this view, the conceptual vocabulary used in a doctrinal statement is not necessarily crucial. The Nicene Creed, for example, does not mandate the adoption of substance metaphysics. Doctrinal statements that employ very different conceptualities and appear to be at variance can be found in ecumenical debate to encode identical or similar rules.

Much of Lindbeck’s later work argued that Christian reading of Scripture should be guided by a new doctrinal rule: it should avoid all *supersessionism in which the church is read as the fulfilment of which the people of Israel was the shadow. Rather, the church and Israel should be seen as two forms of the people of God, and Jesus Christ as the true fulfilment to which they both point. The church is, for Lindbeck, a transformative movement witnessing to this fulfilment in Christ within a people of God now made up of Jew and Gentile; it has not taken Israel’s place as the recipient of God’s promises.

Bibliography

Works: The Nature of Doctrine (Philadelphia, 1984); ‘The Story-Shaped Church’, in G. Green (ed.), Scriptural Authority and Narrative Interpretation (Philadelphia, 1987); The Church in a Postliberal Age, ed. J. J. Buckley (Grand Rapids and Cambridge, 2002).

Studies: M. A. Higton, 'Reconstructing the Nature of Doctrine', Modern Theology 30 (2014), pp. 1–31; B. D. Marshall (ed.), Theology and Dialogue (Notre Dame, 1990); P. Ochs, 'George Lindbeck and the Church as Israel', in Another Reformation (Grand Rapids, 2011), pp. 36–62; T. R. Phillips and D. L. Okholm (eds.), The Nature of Confession (Downers Grove, 1996).

M. HIGTON

LITURGICAL THEOLOGY

Although the concept has always probably existed in liturgical churches (those which use settled forms of corporate *worship, including settled forms of the spoken texts), liturgical theology has attracted wider interest only during the last half-century, owing to the growing interest in liturgy itself. It is an attempt to provide a theological interpretation of traditional forms of liturgy, not merely a devotional or historical interpretation, and to understand what theological significance has been attached by Christians to the liturgy they have offered. More specialized than the theology of worship in general (which includes non-liturgical worship), it also follows a different method. It begins not from the Bible, tracing the development (good and bad) of biblical principles in and from historical practice, but from historical practice, examining how, and how far, this can be understood in terms of biblical principles. In addition, it explores the relationships between liturgical worship and dogmatic theology.

The primitivist view that Christian worship should as far as possible reproduce NT practice unchanged allows no validity to the historical development of worship, and therefore none to liturgical theology. The *Lutheran, *Anglican and (to some extent) Calvinist (see *Reformed theology) approach is different, however, taking history seriously and making allowance for changed conditions, but seeking fully to implement biblical principles in the context of those changed conditions. On this view, the development (for example) of daily services, services for marriage and burial, particular texts for these services and others, and a calendar of annual festivals, is not invalidated merely by showing that they did not exist in biblical times, but only by showing that they do not accord with biblical principles.

Jewish synagogue practice of the first century, in which Jesus and his disciples shared, appears to have included many features which neither go back to the OT nor are mentioned in the NT. It is this pattern of worship which was refashioned but not abolished by the impact of the *gospel, and evolved into historic Christian practice. Its origins, therefore, are good, and, just as it is the true task of liturgical revision to reform it by the teaching of the Bible, so it is the task of liturgical theology to interpret it by the teaching of the Bible, in order that it may be understood and used in the most edifying way.

See also: DOXOLOGY; LITURGY.

Bibliography

J. J. von Allmen, Worship: Its Theology and Practice (ET, London, 1965); S. Chan, Liturgical Theology (Downers Grove, 2006); D. Fagerberg, Theologia Prima: What Is Liturgical Theology? (Mundelein, 2004); A. Kavanagh, On Liturgical Theology (New York, 1984); A. Schmemmann, Introduction to Liturgical Theology (ET, London, 1966); G. Wainwright, Doxology: A Systematic Theology (London, 1980).

R. T. BECKWITH

LITURGY

Inheritors of the Reformation have lived with a commonly held distinction between 'liturgical' worship and 'free' worship. Typically, this distinction marked the difference between those churches that relied upon centrally agreed liturgical texts (e.g. Roman Catholicism, Anglicanism and Orthodoxy) and churches that were free to generate their own local orders of worship (e.g. Congregational and Baptist). This distinction continues to shape contemporary discussions, for example in the way that charismatic worship is often portrayed as 'free' in comparison with the 'liturgical' worship of the historic denominations. However, maintaining a sharp distinction between these two terms has become increasingly difficult. One of the fruits of the ecumenical conversations fostered by the twentieth-century liturgical movement has been the recognition that free worship has liturgical habits, such as various forms of repetition and the often unacknowledged deep patterns within public worship. Similarly, liturgical worship is more than a recitation of a 'text' and may contain a considerable amount of flexibility (such as the directions to those who lead intercessory prayer to use set or ‘other suitable words’).

The word ‘liturgy’ is derived from the Greek leitourgia which referred to the work of the citizens’ assembly in the ancient Greek city states, particularly Athens, where it connoted the representative task of citizen-legislators. It was a term that described ‘good works’ done for the benefit of the wider community. Leitourgia was used in the LXX to describe the service of OT priests and Levites, and it also came to be used of Christian acts of worship, especially the *Eucharist. Eastern Orthodox churches have retained this tradition and use the term ‘the Liturgy’ to refer specifically to the Eucharist. However, the term is used more generally to refer to the action of public worship as ‘the work of the people’. This frames the practice of public worship, which will include varying degrees of set forms of words and actions, as primarily an activity of the *church in service to God and also for the world. As such, ‘at the heart of liturgy is an understanding of public worship that goes beyond the personal encounter with God (without denying it) to the corporate drama of being the people of God’ (M. Earey, Liturgical Worship, p. 18). The importance of liturgical patterns for the church can be summarized under three headings:

Liturgy and the Bible

There is a very close relationship between the Bible and the worshipping assembly; the NT letters, for example, were written in order to be read aloud in the receiving churches. Liturgy helps the church engage with the Bible at a number of levels. The public reading of the Bible has been traditionally organized by the use of a lectionary (designated Bible passages [‘lections’] ordered according to each Sunday or weekday). This allows exposure to the breadth of the biblical message. A sermon focuses the congregational response to the Bible reading. The Bible also informs the language of prayer used by the church, the most obvious example being the ancient tradition of incorporating psalms in public worship, which may be used for congregational song or in responses (such as ‘O Lord open our lips’; R: ‘And our mouth shall proclaim your praise’, Ps. 51:15).

Liturgy and tradition

Liturgy is a vital carrier of tradition, the practices and associated beliefs that centre the church upon God’s loving action in Christ.

*Baptism and Eucharist (also known as Holy Communion, Mass, the Breaking of Bread or the Lord’s Supper) are the two most prominent practices of the tradition. The term ‘ordinance’, preferred by some Christians, roots the regular practice of the welcoming of new Christians and celebration of the gift of Christ at the table in faithful obedience to the command of Christ (Matt. 28:19 and 1 Cor. 11:23–25); the alternative term ‘*sacrament’ locates these practices in the gift of God, who creates and sustains the church in and through Christ by the Spirit.

Liturgy and doctrine

The public assembly is the place where the content of the Christian vision of God is embodied and affirmed. The Orthodox tradition has affirmed that all true theology is ‘doxology’; the term ‘orthodoxy’ means giving right glory to God. One obvious example of this is the inclusion of creedal formulae in liturgy. The Apostles’ *Creed was used originally by baptismal candidates as an affirmation of faith, and the *Nicene Creed was introduced into worship after the fourth century as a way of countering the continuing threat of Arianism. In worshipping traditions that have not used creeds, such as the Nonconformists, the doctrinal content of the faith is very often celebrated in congregational song. When John Wesley wrote his ‘Preface’ to the first Methodist hymn book in 1779, he declared that the book ‘is large enough to contain all the important truths of our most holy religion’.

See also: DOXOLOGY; LITURGICAL THEOLOGY; WORSHIP.

Bibliography

S. Burns, SCM Study Guide to Liturgy (London, 2006); M. Earey, Liturgical Worship: A Fresh Look, How It Works, Why It Matters (London, 2002); C. Ellis, Gathering: A Theology and Spirituality of Worship in Free Church Worship (London, 2004); J. R. K. Fenwick and B. D. Spinks, Worship in Transition: The Liturgical Movement in the Twentieth Century (Edinburgh, 1995); M. C. Ross, Evangelical Versus Liturgical? Defying a Dichotomy (Grand Rapids, 2014); F. C. Senn, Introduction to Christian Liturgy (Philadelphia, 2012); J. H. S. Steven, Worship in the Spirit: Charismatic Worship in the Church of England (Paternoster, 2002).

J. H. S. STEVEN

LLOYD-JONES, DAVID MARTYN
(1899–1981)

Although born in Wales, Lloyd-Jones completed his education at Marylebone Grammar School and St Bartholomew's Hospital, London. A distinguished career as a physician lay before him when, after severe inner struggle, he committed himself to the Christian ministry in 1926. Following a notable pastorate at Aberavon (1927–38), he was called as colleague and then successor to G. Campbell Morgan (1863–1945) at Westminster Chapel, London. He played an early leadership role in the Inter-Varsity Fellowship (now UCCF) and was also involved in the founding of such new evangelical agencies as the Evangelical Library, the London Bible College and the International Fellowship of Evangelical Students.

While he gave much time to helping students, ministers and missionaries, the pulpit was Lloyd-Jones's most important work. By authoritative exposition and application of the Scriptures he sought to restore the true nature of *preaching, rejecting the prevalent opinion that scientific knowledge had outmoded commitment to the inerrancy of Scripture (see *Infallibility). He saw faith in the word of God and dependence upon the Holy Spirit as the foremost needs in contemporary Christianity, and regarded human unbelief as moral rather than intellectual (see his Truth Unchanged, Unchanging, London, 1951). He reintroduced consecutive expository preaching, with subsequent publications on The Sermon on the Mount (London, 1959–60), Ephesians (Edinburgh, 1974–82), II Peter (Edinburgh, 1983) and Romans (London and Edinburgh, 1970–). But the majority of his preaching was evangelistic as he itinerated constantly for over fifty years (including Europe and the United States in summer vacations). Thoroughly committed to *Calvinistic Methodism, Lloyd-Jones's ministry did not harmonize with the prevailing religious ethos in Wales or England, and while constantly helping many evangelical agencies, his convictions on the importance of *Reformed theology kept him from any full identification. He was, however, closely involved with a resurgence of interest in Reformed theology commenced through the IVF, the Puritan Conferences and the Banner of Truth Trust (subsequently to be his principal publisher).

In his later years, faced with a general decline of Christianity in England, Lloyd-Jones called for the priority of evangelical unity above denominational loyalties. He did not propose a new denomination, but urged the importance of the true unity of churches (which he hoped to see expressed in the British Evangelical Council) and warned that evangelical neutrality to the *ecumenical movement was contributing to the spread of low views on saving faith.

Resigning from Westminster Chapel in 1968, he remained active in preaching and in the preparation of sermons for publication until shortly before his death. By his preaching and books he profoundly influenced the whole English-speaking world, as one who stood in the tradition of the Reformers and *Puritans, *Whitefield, *Edwards and *Spurgeon. Emil *Brunner once described him as 'the greatest preacher in Christendom today'.

Bibliography

With the works above, Preaching and Preachers (London, 1971) gives invaluable insight into his views of the ministry. Biography: C. Catherwood (ed.), Chosen by God (Crowborough, 1986); I. H. Murray, D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones: The First Forty Years, 1899–1939 (Edinburgh, 1982); idem, D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones: The Fight of Faith, 1939–1981 (Edinburgh, 1990).

Studies: A. Atherstone and D. Ceri Jones (eds.), Engaging with Martyn Lloyd-Jones (Nottingham, 2011); J. Brencher, Martyn Lloyd-Jones (1899–1981) and Twentieth-Century Evangelism (Carlisle, 2002); M. A. Eaton, Baptism with the Spirit: The Teaching of Martyn Lloyd-Jones (Leicester, 1989); J. Peters, Martyn Lloyd-Jones: Preacher (Exeter, 1986).

I. H. MURRAY

LOCKE, JOHN (1632–1704)

John Locke combined a career in academic work at Oxford where, technically a physician, he collaborated with natural scientists (Boyle and Newton) and became physician-secretary to Lord Shaftesbury in London from 1667 and secretary of the Board of Trade which included some time researching persecuted Protestantism in France. He was forced into exile in Holland for his anti-catholicizing activities and spent formative years there, writing An Essay Concerning Human Understanding, until his vindication and return with William and Mary in 1688. The last decade of his life was marked by essays on toleration and serving once more on the Board of Trade.

For Locke the contrast with the strong Calvinism (see *Reformed theology) of many of his contemporaries regarding toleration and inwardness was a conscious one, and showed the impact of *Grotius (from whom the emphasis on faith as freely chosen) and *Descartes. More so than for the latter, 'the self' was central, but reason still allowed that objective, 'necessary' truths would come to mind. Reason was not just for science, but also for belief. No-one could really be certain of one's salvation, since one could be deceived. Coercion was antipathetic to belief, whether from divine or human pressure. Belief in the Messiah could not be enforced, since belief is a matter of will and not for anyone else's sake. However, atheism was dangerous for losing the transcendent and should be silenced. Locke was also influenced by Chillingworth and then by his contemporary and friend Archbishop Tillotson (d. 1694). The source of all truth is ultimately experience – Locke was an empiricist as against those (rationalists) who thought that truth began in the mind – and that includes much of what we find in the Bible.

Locke's Reasonableness of Christianity as Delivered in the Scriptures was published anonymously in 1695. He stood against Bible proof-texting, and preferred the simple sense of Scripture with a lighter amount of dogmatic complexity. Putting the life and teachings of Jesus (less so his miracles) as the centre of authority for Christian teaching, he relegated the NT epistles to a lower place. The test for being a Christian was simply to be able to say that Jesus was the Messiah of the one true God who would as resurrected return to judge/rule the world. That may be all one has to believe, but there is a lot more to be done by the Christian. From the premise that all have capacity for abstraction which distinguishes us from beasts, his Essay Concerning Human Understanding concluded: 'They have light enough to lead them to the knowledge of their Maker.' Yet in Reasonableness he notes that we wrongly take for granted the Christian *revelation and its great impact on civilization and mistake its contribution for some sort of innate knowledge. He thought of 'revelation' as Jesus' clarifying of the moral law without giving absolute moral certainty to us but also popularizing theology for the benefit of us all, not just labourers. For morality is too hard for unaided reason. Yet there is a capacity for moving towards knowledge of the moral and the divine, towards revelation's fullness.

Belief in the natural equality of humankind meant that he argued that the state should enforce a less radical charity (e.g. finding work for the poor). Jesus and Paul were the main influences on Locke here. Equality as its foundation comes before utility. Locke built on scriptural proofs as well as on natural law. He stressed that both Adam and Eve in the beginning shared dominion; God predicted but did not cause Eve's distress in her loss of immortality, which was not punishment.

Bibliography

J. Dunn, Locke: A Very Short Introduction (Oxford, 2003); P. Helm, 'A Forensic Dilemma: John Locke and Jonathan Edwards on Personal Identity' in P. Helm and O. D. Crisp (eds.), Jonathan Edwards: Philosophical Theologian (Aldershot, 2003); V. Nuovo (ed.), John Locke and Christianity: Contemporary Responses to the Reasonableness of Christianity (South Bend, 1997); idem (ed.), John Locke: Writings on Religion (Oxford, 2002); P. L. Quinn, 'Disputing the Augustinian Legacy: John Locke and Jonathan Edwards on Romans 5: 12–19', in G. B. Matthews (ed.), The Augustinian Tradition (Berkeley, 1999); A. Sell, John Locke and the Eighteenth Century Divines (Cardiff, 1997); J. Waldron, God, Locke and Equality: Christian Foundations of John Locke's Political Thought (Cambridge, 2002); N. Wolterstorff, John Locke and the Ethics of Belief (Cambridge, 1996); idem, 'Locke's Philosophy of Religion', in The Cambridge Companion to Locke (Cambridge, 1994).

M. W. ELLIOTT

LOGIC IN THEOLOGY

Logic is the study of the conditions of valid inference and the methods of proof. In its broadest sense it concerns the structures and principles of reasoning and sound argument. Logic is relevant to every area of life where argument is used. Its methods distinguish between correct and incorrect reasoning, good and bad arguments. Logicians are interested in the form of the argument rather than the content, so there is no requirement that a logically valid argument be based on true premises. If the premises are false, the argument may still be valid. In examining the relation between the premises of an argument and its conclusion, there are two main forms of inference. Deduction implies a necessary relation, so that acceptance of the premises means accepting the conclusion. Induction implies only a probability in the relation between premises and conclusion. Deductive logic rests on the principle of non-contradiction and is concerned with validity rather than truth. Inductive logic is more concerned with the standards of reasoning used in empirical and scientific reasoning, where what is reasonable or probable is not based on avoiding contradiction.

If logic is concerned with form, then it is neutral and simply a tool to enable proper argument to take place. Varieties of logical systems and notations seem, however, to suggest some assumptions about the nature of reality and need to be examined on that basis.

Theologians use arguments in the discussion and presentation of the Christian faith. Accordingly, it is crucial that they understand and use logical means properly, to avoid contradictions and to present the truth of what is claimed by valid argumentation. Medieval theologians used various deductive and inductive arguments of the ontological and cosmological variety to prove the existence of God (see *Natural theology). They argued deductively that, from an acceptance of the concept of God as 'that than which nothing greater can be conceived', God must necessarily exist, for to exist is more perfect than not to exist. This led to a philosophical debate over the nature of existence, necessity, perfections, concepts and their relation to reality. Cosmological arguments argued inductively from features of our experience of the world, such as motion, causation, being, values or purpose to a source of these things, which was called God. The critique of these arguments centred on the relationship between each premise in the argument and its claimed relationship to the conclusion. It was argued that these arguments made an illicit leap from experience of this world to a transcendent realm.

Modern theology has revitalized the proofs of God's existence, but uses logical argument more to defend theology from philosophical attacks. These attacks stress the contradictions in theology, whether in the nature of God or in our talk about God, Christ, the Spirit and other doctrines. The task of the Christian theologian is to clarify the nature of the premises, the validity of the conclusions and the truth of the claims made by Christians using both deductive and inductive reasoning.

See also: FAITH AND REASON.

Bibliography

G. J. Dorrien, Kantian Reason and Hegelian Spirit: The Idealistic Logic of Modern Theology (Oxford, 2012); E. J. Lemmon, Beginning Logic (London, 1965); S. E. Toulmin, The Uses of Argument (Cambridge, 1958); J. C. Puddefoot, Logic and Affirmation: Perspectives in Mathematics and Theology (Edinburgh, 1987); N. Wolterstorff, Reason within the Bounds of Religion (Grand Rapids, 1984).

E. D. COOK

LOGICAL POSITIVISM

There are two main sources of logical positivism. The first is David *Hume and *empiricist philosophy with its emphasis on sense experience leading to certainty about matters of fact, which it contrasted to relations of ideas which told nothing about the real world. The second is Auguste Comte (1798–1857), who coined the word '*positivism' to cover six features of things: being real, useful, certain, precise, organic and relative. His desire was to apply a scientific attitude not only to science but also to human affairs. These came together in the Vienna Circle of the 1920s and 1930s, whose main members were M. Schlick (1882–1936), R. Carnap (1891–1970), O. Neurath (1882–1945), F. Waismann (1896–1959), with *Wittgenstein and K. Popper (1902–94) on the fringe, and C. G. Hempel (1905–97) and A. J. Ayer (1910–89) as allies. The general aim was to develop and systematize empiricism using tools and concepts derived from logic and mathematics, especially from the early works of Wittgenstein and Bertrand Russell (1872–1970).

The approach was highly critical of theology and *metaphysics as meaningless. Their statements were either nonsense or interpreted like those of ethics and aesthetics as expressing feelings, attitudes or matters of taste. The Vienna Circle focused on the nature of meaning and developed the '*verification principle'. This stated that a statement or proposition was meaningful only if it were verifiable by sense experience. Thus for a statement to have a truth value, it must be known what would count for or against it in terms of sense experience; if it could not be tested by sense experience, it was dismissed as meaningless. The positivist, following the empiricist, divided knowledge into either (1) relations of ideas which were tautologies, like the truths of mathematics and logic, and were true by definition but uninformative, or (2) matters of fact which were known only by sense experience. Theology and metaphysics were neither and their statements were therefore meaningless.

The positivists ran into problems over the status of the principle of verifiability and whether the aim was verification in principle or practice, in a strong or weak sense. Popper turned to falsifiability as a better test for scientific laws, while Carnap and Ayer tended to stress testability or confirmability. Much of their debate was over attempts to preserve the notion of verification, but this tended to lose ground in view of the struggle over the exclusion of scientific laws and historical propositions. Logical positivism stressed the underlying unity of science and the strong belief that reality could be fully expressed by translation into statements about physical objects or sense experience, and that this would ultimately have the form of logic or mathematics. The role of philosophy was not to establish philosophical doctrines, but to elucidate meaning or call attention to the lack of meaning. With the failure of the strict notion of verification, there tended to be a drift towards less dogmatic forms of linguistic and conceptual analysis (see *Religious language). Nevertheless, the themes of meaning, verification, anti-metaphysics and unified science have continued to exercise a powerful influence on modern philosophy, and provided a major challenge to religion and theology through the work of Ayer and A. Flew (1923–2010).

Bibliography

A. J. Ayer, Language, Truth and Logic (London, 1946); idem (ed.), Logical Positivism (London, 1959); R. B. Braithwaite, An Empiricist's View of the Nature of Religious Belief (Cambridge, 1955).

Critiques: H. D. Lewis (ed.), Clarity Is Not Enough: Essays in Criticism of Linguistic Philosophy (London, 1963); E. L. Mascall, Words and Images (London, 1957); I. T. Ramsey (ed.), Christian Ethics and Contemporary Philosophy (London, 1966); A. Richardson and T. Uebel (eds.), The Cambridge Companion to Logical Positivism (New York, 2007); S. Sarkar, The Legacy of the Vienna Circle: Modern Reappraisals (New York, 1996).

E. D. COOK

LOGOS

The Greek term logos can mean word, discourse or reason. In John 1:1–18, Jesus Christ is the incarnation of the pre-existent divine Logos (Word). Logos is the intermediary through whom God created the world and reveals himself to humanity. The way John used the word logos has interesting parallels in Greek philosophy, but it also has its own distinctives.

The *Stoics (c. 300 BC onward) understood logos as the active principle, the dynamic reason or plan, the 'divine' fire, which organizes and gives forms to passive unformed matter. Likewise, the soul of man, understood as an emanation from the 'divine' logos (logos spermatikos), pervades the body, giving it form, organization and character. The presence of logos in humans enables them to comprehend reality. The logos in its entirety permeates the universe and could be described as God (*pantheism) or the soul of the universe (*panentheism). But logos for the Stoics was not a personal being and could be thought of as a material substance – a fiery vapour pervading matter and organizing it.

*Philo borrowed ideas about logos from the Stoics, but believed in the personal God of Israel. He fused these ideas with *Wisdom theology (Prov. 8) and the idea of God creating the world by his word in the OT, and suggested that logos is God's agent in *creation and its government. The 'divine' logos is the thoughts in God's mind which are projected into formless matter, making it a real and rational universe. The logos is also the means by which the human mind comprehends God. Philo's understanding of logos is closer to John's prologue than the Stoics by virtue of his belief in the personal God. But to him logos was not a personal being.

It was in this milieu of Hellenistic Judaism and Greek Stoicism that the author of John chose to use the word logos to convey some important aspects of the divine Son of God to his audience – his role as the agent in creation and his giving light to humanity, which have echoes both in the Stoics and Philo. But the author radically transformed the former meanings by acknowledging the Logos' personal being, his eternity and his full divinity. Furthermore, he declared that the Logos has become a true member of humanity (flesh), and his presence on earth, characterized by grace and truth, reveals the glory of the Father.

In the post-NT writings, the logos concept was used to articulate the relationship between the Son and his Father, in particular their oneness in eternity and in time (see *Christology; *Trinity). The apologist Justin understood (1) logos as the Father's immanent thought or rationality before creation (cf. logos endiathetos in Stoicism), and (2) logos as the expression of the Father's thought in creation (cf. logos prophorikos in Stoicism and the parallels in Philo). Justin used the analogy of the unity of the speaker, his thought and his word to illustrate the Father's unity with the Son/Logos in eternity and in time. He also affirmed that the Logos is numerically distinct from the Father who communes with him. However, the notion of the Logos as the Father's immanent thought and expressed speech does not sit easily with this notion of numerical distinction and personal communion. One's awareness of one's thought and speech cannot be construed as communing with another. The speaker-thought-speech model, borrowed from Stoicism, though illuminating some aspects of the divine relationship between the Father and the Son, admittedly has its own limitation and therefore cannot be taken too far (see a similar difficulty in Karl Barth, CD, I.1, pp. 295–314; critiqued in D. So, Jesus' Revelation of His Father, pp. 60–64). The question of the unity and distinction between the Father and the Son (and the Spirit), i.e. the mystery of the Trinity, remained to be saluted and enquired into through the first few centuries and beyond.

Justin also spoke of logos spermatikos (seminal logos), which before the coming of Christ was present in human beings and enabled them to perceive some fragmentary aspects of truth. It has been seen that some aspects of logos in Stoicism and Philo bear fragmentary resemblance to the divine personal Logos in John's prologue. Could this resemblance be genuinely accounted for by Justin's suggestion? This question in its generalized form (cf. Justin) has *missiological implications. Related to this is another missiological question. The creative use of Logos by the author of John for his own purpose witnesses to his wisdom and his understanding of the audience's culture and linguistic concepts which bore some contact points for easing the entry of the gospel. Could this kind of creative use of some elements in the linguistic concepts of the local/target cultures be useful in contemporary missiological endeavours?

Bibliography

K. Barth, CD I.1; P. Cotterell, Mission and Meaninglessness (London, 1990); A. Debrunner et al., in TDNT IV, pp. 71–136; G. Fries et al., in NIDNTT III, pp. 1081–1117; J. N. D. Kelly, Early Christian Doctrines (London, ⁵1977); G. E. Ladd, A Theology of the New Testament (Grand Rapids, 1974); G. L. Prestige, God in Patristic Thought (London, 1952); D. W. K. So, Jesus' Revelation of His Father: A Narrative-Conceptual Study of the Trinity with Special Reference to Karl Barth (Milton Keynes, 2006).

D. W. K. So

LOISY, A. F., see MODERNISM, CATHOLIC

LOMBARD, PETER (c. 1100–59)

Peter Lombard was born in the Novara region of Lombardy. He studied at Bologna, Reims and Paris universities. From c. 1140 he taught at Paris. In 1158 he became bishop of Paris, where he died the following year.

Twenty of Peter's sermons survive, together with commentaries on the Psalms and on Paul's letters, the latter written between 1139 and 1142. But he is remembered primarily for his Four Books of Sentences (Sententiarum Libri Quatuor). They cover the Trinity, providence and evil (Book I), creation, sin and grace (Book II), incarnation, redemption, virtues and commandments (Book III), sacraments and the four last things (Book IV). In this work Peter discusses various theological questions and resolves them by reference to the Bible, the Fathers (especially *Augustine) and other later authorities. He quotes extracts (sententiae, 'sentences', meaning maxims or opinions) and uses reason, dialectic and *logic to arbitrate between them. In this he was following the methods of the *canon lawyers (such as Gratian) which had been applied to theology by Peter *Abelard. But while Abelard had run foul of authority, Lombard was to meet with general approval. *Bernard of Clairvaux, who had hounded Abelard, commended Lombard. While Lombard used Abelard's methods, he combined them with a respect for authority uncharacteristic of Abelard. His aim was not to introduce new ideas, but simply to decide the truth on the basis of the established authorities.

In one area Peter did break new ground – in the theology of the *sacraments. He was probably the first to give what is now the standard Roman Catholic list of seven sacraments. The concept of seven sacraments met with rapid approval, seven being the perfect number. But not all agreed with Peter as to which seven rites should be included in the number. In due course Peter's list prevailed and it was defined as orthodoxy by the Council of Florence in 1439. Peter's limitation of the number of sacraments to seven was based on the distinction between a sacrament proper, supposed to have been instituted by Jesus Christ himself, and other less important rites, called sacramentals. Peter also argued that a sacrament is not simply a 'visible sign of an invisible grace' (Augustine), but also the effective cause of that grace. Here again, Peter's view prevailed.

Peter's theology did not meet with immediate acceptance. At first the orthodoxy of his teaching on the doctrines of the Trinity and the person of Christ was questioned, by *Joachim of Fiore (c. 1135–1202) among others. But at the Fourth Lateran Council in 1215 Lombard was fully vindicated and this encouraged the use of his Sentences. They became the standard theological textbook until the time of the Reformation and beyond. For centuries, writing a commentary on Lombard's Sentences was a standard part of the preparation for a doctorate in theology. Not inappropriately, Peter came to be known as the 'Master of the Sentences'.

Bibliography

Works in PL 191–192; Libri IV Sententiarum, 2 vols. (Quaracchi, ²1916). Selections in ET in E. R. Fairweather, A Scholastic Miscellany: Anselm to Ockham (LCC 10; London, 1956), and R. McKeon, Selections From Medieval Philosophers, 2 vols. (New York, 1929–30).

Studies: M. L. Colish, Peter Lombard (New York, 1994); P. Delhaye, Pierre Lombard: sa vie, ses oeuvres, sa morale (Montreal and Paris, 1961); J. de Ghellinck, 'Pierre Lombard' in DTC 12, cols. 1941–2019; E. F. Rogers, Peter Lombard and the Sacramental System (New York, 1917);

P. W. Rosemann, Peter Lombard (Oxford, 2004); idem, The Story of a Great Medieval Book: Peter Lombard's 'Sentences' (Peterborough, Ontario, 2007).

A. N. S. LANE

LONERGAN, BERNARD (1904–84)

After teaching in his native Canada (1940–53), Lonergan, a *Jesuit theologian, was professor of theology at the Gregorian University in Rome until his retirement in 1965, after which he lived in North America. His life work was the study of intellectual enquiry in general and theological *method in particular. In his early works on specific Christian doctrines he was beginning to develop his method, and his work on *Thomas Aquinas also prepared the way for his own study of method. In Insight (1957; London, ³1983) he studied the structure of human understanding in all fields of knowledge, and then, especially in Method in Theology (London, 1972), he applied his thinking to theological method.

Lonergan pursues a 'transcendental method' of reflecting on the activity of knowing, an enquiry into enquiry. This reveals a basic cognitional structure common to all human knowing in all areas of knowledge. There are three operations (experience, understanding and judgment) involved in all knowledge, and a fourth (decision) in which we decide to act on what we know. The activity of knowing can thus be summed up in Lonergan's four 'transcendental precepts': be attentive, be intelligent, be reasonable, be responsible. Through the transcendental method of reflecting on this dynamic structure of all knowing, there takes place a heightening of consciousness and a move to interiority, 'a personal appropriation of one's own rational self-consciousness', which Lonergan calls intellectual conversion.

In a very complex discussion, Insight moves from cognitive analysis through *epistemology to *metaphysics and a kind of *natural theology. The three steps involved in knowing take one beyond naive realism and *idealism to the kind of critical realism which is implied in the combination of the three steps. Knowledge is objective knowledge of reality, and reality is intelligible. Humanity's unrestricted desire to know intelligible reality points towards God.

In his work on theological method, Lonergan takes up his scheme of mental operations, but also divides the theological task into eight 'functional specialties'. These are not the usual subject specializations of theology (OT studies, patristics, etc.), but 'distinct and separate stages in a single process from the data to ultimate results'. There is a sequence of specialties in two phases. Those of the first phase (research, interpretation, history, dialectic) are concerned with understanding religion in the past: assimilating and assessing the tradition. Those of the second phase (foundations, doctrines, systematics, communications) are concerned with contemporary appropriation, interpretation and communication. All four levels of mental operation (experience, understanding, judgment, decision) operate in each specialty, but in each they operate to achieve the end proper to one level. Thus (in the first phase) research corresponds to experience, interpretation to understanding, history to judgment, and dialectic to decision.

Of special interest is the transition from the first phase to the second, through dialectic and foundations. Dialectic sorts out and clarifies the fundamental conflicts which arise in and from the religious tradition, and which can be decided or overcome only on the basis of a fundamental intellectual, moral or religious outlook. Such an outlook results from conversion (intellectual, moral or religious) and is expressed in the fifth specialty, foundations. Thus whereas the specialties of the first phase do not presuppose conversion, those of the second do. A personal appropriation of the tradition is required for its contemporary mediation.

In delineating this series of interdependent stages in a single process of theological work, Lonergan aims to unify the whole area of theological endeavour and to provide 'a framework for collaborative creativity'. His method as such is not *confessional, but *ecumenical, in that it provides a methodological framework for the study and assessment of all religious traditions, but in a properly theological, not merely *phenomenological, way. Lonergan has found enthusiastic disciples, but the results of his method remain to be seen.

Bibliography

Works: Collection (London, 1968); A Second Collection (London, 1974); The Collected Works of Bernard Lonergan, 25 vols. projected (Toronto, 1990–).

Studies: P. Corcoran (ed.), Looking at Lonergan's Method (London, 1975); F. E.

Crowe, Lonergan (Collegeville, 1992); idem, Developing the Lonergan Legacy (Toronto, 2003); P. Lambert and P. McShane, Bernard Lonergan: His Life and Leading Ideas (Vancouver, 2010); H. A. Meynell, An Introduction to the Philosophy of Bernard Lonergan (London, 1976); M. C. O'Callaghan, Unity in Theology: Lonergan's Framework for Theology in Its New Context (Lanham, 1983); D. Tracy, The Achievement of Bernard Lonergan (Freiburg, 1970).

R. J. BAUCKHAM

LORD, see CHRISTOLOGY; GOD; JESUS

LORD'S DAY, see SABBATH

LORD'S SUPPER, see EUCHARIST

LOSSKY, VLADIMIR (1903–58)

Vladimir Lossky was born in 1903, the son of the Russian philosopher, Nicolas Lossky. He studied at the University of St Petersburg, and then, after the expulsion of the intellectuals in 1922, in Prague and at the Sorbonne. He spent the rest of his life in France, after the Second World War attached to the Centre National de la Recherche Scientifique, working on a thesis on the medieval theologian and mystic, Meister Eckhart, which found expression in his largest work, published posthumously in 1960. Among the émigrés in Paris, he was unusual in remaining loyal to the Moscow Patriarchate, despite the compromises forced on it by the Communist regime, and was involved in its condemnation of *Bulgakov's sophiology. He was a founder member of the Confrérie de Saint Photius, and after the war the Institut Saint-Denis, both of which sought to make the insights of Orthodox theology accessible in the West. His most important contribution to Orthodox theology was his book, The Mystical Theology of the Eastern Church, published in 1943; there are also various articles and short books, including a work that he co-authored with Leonid Ouspensky, The Meaning of Icons (1952), but his contribution to theology was cut short by his early death in 1958. Despite this, he is one of the greatest Orthodox theologians of the twentieth century. His work explores what *Florovsky called the ‘Neo-patristic synthesis’, and his principal contribution was, perhaps, his understanding of the centrality of *apophatic theology, understood not simply as knowing God through denial (apophasis) of the attributes asserted of him, but rather as the ‘repentance of the human person before the face of the living God’. Understood like this, theology became ‘mystical theology’, in which the contrasts between theology and spirituality, thought and life, individual experience and corporate worship, are transcended.

See also: EASTERN ORTHODOX THEOLOGY; RUSSIAN ORTHODOX THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

Works: The Mystical Theology of the Eastern Church (ET, London, 1957); In the Image and Likeness of God (ET, Crestwood, 1957); The Vision of God (ET, London, 1963); Orthodox Theology: An Introduction (ET, Crestwood, 1989); Seven Days on the Roads of France: June 1940 (Yonkers, 2012).

Studies: O. Clément, Orient-Occident Deus Passeurs: Vladimir Lossky, Paul Evdokimov (Geneva, 1985); R. Williams, ‘Lossky, the Via Negativa and the Foundations of Theology’, in R. Williams, Wrestling with Angels: Conversations in Modern Theology, ed. M. Higton (London, 2007).

A. LOUTH

LOVE

The triune love

The statement from 1 John 4:16, that *God is love, is the natural beginning of any theology of love. The standard Western articulation of this idea comes primarily from *Augustine, who understood love to be God’s nature. Augustine borrowed from Neo-Platonism the idea of God as being itself, and as such the divine love is thought to pervade all things. All creation participates in the being of God, and thus all human love is love ‘in God’.

Although Augustine understood God as Father, Son and Spirit, his philosophical influences led him to still conceive of God as a single subject. Only in the twentieth century has a more robust conception of the *Trinity been recovered in Western theology, beginning with the thought of Karl *Barth. For Barth, ‘God is’ means ‘God loves’, and the very being of God as the mutuality of Father, Son and Spirit is already love. There is no outside other that can contribute to the love of the divine life. Hence God’s love for the creature is absolutely free.

Wolfhart *Pannenberg goes even further in articulating the intra-trinitarian relations which identify God as love. For him, the Father loves the Son and the Son responds to this love by being obedient to the Father, that is, by *faith. This dynamic is mediated by the *Holy Spirit, who has often been conceived in the tradition since Augustine as the bond of love between Father and Son (e.g. Peter *Lombard). Furthermore, like Augustine, Pannenberg conceives of God closely with being, particularly as the all-determining reality. Since this reality, the Trinity, is love, Pannenberg concludes that God’s love pervades all cosmic processes. This he understands as the work of the Spirit.

Perhaps the chief insight to be gained from these and other recent theologians is that love is not a static substance, but a category of power and activity. It is inherently eventful, hence the giving and being given to among the persons of the Trinity can be understood as an articulation of the biblical assertion that God is love.

Key to this activity of love is the aspect of faithfulness. The Son’s love for the Father is expressed in his faith in and obedience to the Father (cf. John 10:17). We can also say that the Father’s love for the Son is expressed in faithfulness to the Son, quintessentially in his resurrection of the Son. This dimension of mutual faithfulness is also significant for all other relations of love.

The triune love for us

It has been maintained throughout the Christian tradition that God’s love for creatures precedes all human love, including both love for God and love for others. This is professed already in the biblical statement of 1 John 4:19 that ‘we love because he first loved us’. Meditating on John, Augustine asserts that our reconciliation to God in *salvation does not initiate God’s love for us. Rather, we were reconciled to him who already loved us. Moreover, God’s love is the origin and condition of all creaturely life. This is only a logical conclusion from our earlier discovery that God’s love for the creature comes from the freedom of the triune life. Creation is already an act of divine love.

The *Reformers concentrated on the undeserved *grace of God to people. Love cannot be earned, and there is no human ability or power to secure the love and grace of God. It is pure gift. Here they followed Paul's emphasis on divine love as redemption from sin. For Luther and Calvin, this grace is mediated chiefly by church and sacrament.

According to Moffatt, that *Jesus is called the Father's 'Beloved' in the Bible means that he is meant to represent the Father's love to creation. Williams suggests that the mutual love of Father and Son is the pattern of communion between God and humanity. God's love for us is the Father's love for the Son, as is seen in Jesus' love for others. For Barth, God's love to creation comes chiefly in the gift of *Christ to us by the power of the Spirit.

Here as well we can understand the love of God for creatures as faithfulness. In the Hebrew Scriptures this is understood chiefly through the *covenant. That this is initiated by God is simply an expression of the fact that he loved us first, and his keeping of the covenant in spite of consistent disobedience on the part of Israel shows his love as faithfulness. This commitment to creation is manifested climactically in Christ, whose love for sinners simply is the love of the Father for the world. As demonstrated in the idea of Jesus as the 'first fruits', the resurrection of the Son is not only an act of faithfulness between the Father and the Son, but also between the Father and all of creation.

Our place in the triune love

Love for God

The biblical command to love God (e.g. Deut. 6:5 and Mark 12:29–30) is obviously the basis for any theology of love for God. Most of the Western tradition adopted Augustine's understanding of eros in articulations of love for God. This was drawn from Plato and conceived of love for God as a striving after the supreme good. In NT times, however (a few centuries after Plato), eros had been associated more with lust in the surrounding Greco-Roman world, which is one reason why NT authors avoid its use. For them agape was the preferred term, and referred to the free gift of God in the sending of the Son.

In modern theology there has been a turn toward conceiving of love for God chiefly as faith. For Barth, love for God is to keep his commandments (cf. 1 John 5:3), but this is in the context of choosing God to be our Lord, of grasping our future, which is God himself. Pannenberg also prefers faith to love when it comes to our relation to God, but articulates this in a more trinitarian way. For him and others, we love God by letting him be God to us in the same way that Jesus let the Father be God to him. This is made possible by the power of the Spirit, through whom we share with Jesus his sonship to the Father. In this sense we are his brothers and sisters (Heb. 2:11). This, we might say, is a fuller articulation of what the NT means by agape with regard to our love for God, since our love is a faithful response to the gracious sending of the Son.

Love for neighbour

Many theologians insist that the primary way in which we share in the Father's love of the Son is to love our neighbours. This is against the tendency in some circles to separate the two main commandments which Jesus gives: to love God, and your neighbour as yourself. 1 John is rather simple: to love God is to lay down your life for others. This is really by the power of the Spirit, by whom we abide in God. Hence the first among aspects of the fruit of the Spirit is love (Gal. 5:22).

The unity of love for God and love for others is expressed in the distinction between faith and love. Pannenberg suggests that faith is how we relate to God, and love is how we relate to others. They are two sides of the same coin, if you will. Here we are given a new opportunity for eros, for in its classical sense this denotes a deep desire for a perceived good. All human loves, however much they can be perverted, are expressions of desire, for true love of another cannot be coerced. The agapic eros which characterizes Christian love simply affirms the desirability of the neighbour, both by us and in the eyes of God.

Yet even here the aspect of faithfulness is paramount. Not only is (agapic) love for neighbours an act of faith in God, but (erotic) love requires the kind of desire which stands with the neighbour through the unpredictability of time. Such is the love of God for us, that he is faithful in spite of disobedience and change. Sharing in the Father's love for the world, then, means continuing to love in spite of the neighbour's response to that love. It is a faithful love which awakens love from the neighbour in turn where there was not before.

See also: LOVE OF GOD.

Bibliography

K. Barth, CD I.2; J. Burnaby, Amor Dei (Norwich, 1990 [1938]); J. Moffatt, Love in the New Testament (New York, 1930); G. Newlands, Theology of the Love of God (London, 1980); W. Pannenberg, Systematic Theology, vol. 3 (ET, Grand Rapids, 1998); F. L. Shults, Reforming the Doctrine of God (Grand Rapids, 2005); D. D. Williams, The Spirit and the Forms of Love (Washington, 1981).

A. R. MILLS

LOVE OF GOD

The love of God is less a discrete locus of theology than a theme that pervades all aspects of the doctrine of God: essential attributes, interpersonal relations of the Trinity, and God's relation to the world. Its familiarity breeds not contempt but confusion when attempts to explain it begin in human experience rather than the history of *redemption. Western culture's tendency to sentimentalize love has encouraged contemporary theologians to associate it with suffering rather than sovereignty, where it properly belongs, but only when we let the acts of Father, Son and Spirit define both love and divine *sovereignty.

Biblical theology

First things first: the 'love of God' in Scripture usually refers to God's love for humanity rather than human love for God. A human being has love but God is love (1 John 4:8). Humans can 'love' non-personal things like music and mashed potatoes, but God loves persons.

God shows his love to Abraham by establishing an everlasting *covenant that includes a gift of land and a promise of everlasting loyalty. God bases his election of Israel to be his treasured possession not on something Israel was or had done but on his own loving initiative (Deut. 7:6–9). 'I have loved Jacob, but Esau I have hated' (Mal. 1:2–3). God's love is always prevenient: 'We love because he first loved us' (1 John 4:19).

God reveals himself to Moses as 'compassionate and gracious, slow to anger, abounding in steadfast love and faithfulness' (Exod. 34:6). This puts the lie to the common misconception that the God of the OT is wrathful whereas the God of the NT is loving. God's steadfast love (hesed) stands at the core of his covenant and is on conspicuous display throughout Israel's history, especially when the people go astray like a faithless wife (see Hos. 1–3). God initiates a new and better covenant with the whole world. God 'demonstrates his own love for us in this: while we were still sinners, Christ died for us' (Rom 5:8; cf. John 3:16). God gives himself not only in the person of his Son but also in the person of the Holy Spirit (Acts 2:38; 11:17; Rom. 5:5) who unites disciples to Christ and adopts them into God's family (Rom. 8:15–17; Eph. 1:4–5).

'God is love' (1 John 4:8): this claim summarizes the nature and character of the one who brings Israel out of Egypt and pours himself out on the cross to bring sinners out of the bondage of sin and death.

Historical and systematic theology

The *history of theology showcases the love of God in striking fashion primarily because it appears in so many doctrinal guises.

Attribute and action

Standard systematic theologies locate the love of God among the moral attributes (e.g. goodness). God's love is his unselfish interest in the well-being of others. *Thomas Aquinas defines love in terms of benevolence (bene volere = 'good willing'). Yet a generic 'willing of the good' falls short of God's special affection for and delight in his chosen people.

Karl *Barth argues from the incarnation that God is free because his existence is self-determined, and love because he determines himself to be for another. The event of Jesus Christ demonstrates that God is 'the one who loves in freedom'. Accordingly, Barth views all the divine perfections as qualifications either of God's freedom or his love.

God is also light (1 John 1:5). Love and justice are often seen to be at odds (love unites; holiness separates) but in fact converge in God's loving justice accomplished on the cross. The event of Jesus Christ reveals God's being as love: 'a still greater selflessness within a very great self-relatedness' (E. Jüngel, God as the Mystery of the World, p. 317).

Relation and union

The love of God begins in God's own immanent life: the mutual relations of Father, Son and Spirit (see *Trinity). Love in this perspective appears less an attribute of a subject than a relation between persons. Augustine, for example, focuses on the relation between the Father and Son depicted in the Fourth Gospel (John 3:35; 5:20; 14:30–31) as indicating a relation of eternal mutual love. The Spirit is the overflowing of the Father and Son's love and the love between them.

Richard of St Victor (see *Victorines) further develops this inner-trinitarian shape of divine love. Love is perfect only when shared with another. The God-world relationship is not an example of perfect love because the world is not equal to God. Perfect love requires of the divine lover a divine beloved. Love between two only, however, is selfish. Richard therefore concludes: 'the perfection of charity requires a Trinity of persons' (i.e. lover, beloved and co-lover).

Jürgen *Moltmann is representative of contemporary process, feminist, openness and pantheist theologians generally who, going further than the tradition, argue that God's love for the world means that God 'opens' up a space for the world in the trinitarian history. Love is a mutual relation of give and take between God and the world and, as the *incarnation and *cross of Jesus attest, God's love for the world involves God's suffering. Where the theistic tradition emphasizes love as action, *pantheists link love with passion (i.e. God's willingness to be affected – to suffer – by what is not God).

Communication and communion

God's love for his covenant partner involves not simply giving good gifts but the gift of *salvation, that is, the gift of triune fellowship: communion. The love of God is the Father giving the gift of himself to his adopted children through the Son in the Spirit. 'In his general goodness God bestows various gifts upon the creature; in His love He gives Himself and holds nothing back' (G. Vos, in Redemptive History, p. 440).

God's self-communication is something that God does and is. God's loving actions in history correspond to the love God is in himself. The basis of God's love ad extra is the Father's love for the Son and the Son's love for the Father to which the Spirit bears witness and in which the Spirit participates by communicating it abroad.

Is God's love a substantial attribute (e.g. benevolence) or a personal relation? The truth may lie somewhere in between if we view the love of God as God's active disposition to communicate the Father's communion with the Son to others in the Spirit.

See also: GOD; LOVE.

Bibliography

V. Brümmer, The Model of Love: A Study in Philosophical Theology (Cambridge, 1993); D. A. Carson, The Difficult Doctrine of the Love of God (Wheaton and Leicester, 2000); E. Jüngel, God as the Mystery of the World (Grand Rapids, 1983); J. McIntyre, On the Love of God (London, 1962); J. Moltmann, The Trinity and the Kingdom: The Doctrine of God (New York, 1981); J. C. Peckham, The Love of God: A Canonical Model (Downers Grove, 2015); K. J. Vanhoozer, Nothing Greater, Nothing Better: Theological Essays on the Love of God (Grand Rapids, 2001); G. Vos, 'The Scriptural Doctrine of the Love of God', in Redemptive History and Biblical Interpretation: The Shorter Writings of Geerhardus Vos (Phillipsburg, 1980).

K. J. VANHOOZER

LULL, RAYMOND (c. 1232–1316)

Lull's father participated in the armada which delivered Majorca from the Muslim Moors. The young Raymond grew up with influential contacts, allowing considerable travel and contact with Moors. A series of visions of Christ turned him from a dissolute life to an assurance of sins forgiven and a total dedication to mission among Muslims. His aim was threefold: (1) to write books on *apologetics, particularly for Muslims; (2) to inspire popes, prelates and princes to found colleges for the study of Christian sciences and Arabic; (3) to give his life as a martyr among Muslims.

Lull broke the medieval tradition by writing not only in Latin, but also in his native Catalan and in Arabic. He was prolific, producing some 290 books of which about 240 still survive. He loved religious allegories with apologetic aims. The Book of the Gentiles and the Three Wise Men and Blanquerna typify this. But he also wrote the semi-autobiographical The Book of Contemplation in seven volumes in Arabic and some more directly apologetic works – e.g. The Great Art for which he was examined at Paris University in 1287 and awarded the title Master. In The Great Art he seeks to supply incontrovertible answers to questions of theology (particularly the doctrines of the *Trinity and the *incarnation), metaphysics and natural science. Thus *Aristotelian philosophy and *scholastic theology are fused – as also in *Thomas Aquinas, Al Ghazzali (the formative Muslim theologian, 1059–1111) and the Jewish Maimonides (1135–1204).

Lull travelled widely and frequently to share his vision of training colleges with popes, prelates and princes. Frequently, however, his visits coincided with events which prevented these leaders giving attention to his aims. He persuaded King James of Majorca to establish such a college in Miramar with thirteen friars, but to Lull's grief it lasted only sixteen years. Then in 1285 Pope Honorius IV was persuaded to set up a school of Arabic and other languages in Paris. Lull himself not only spent nine years after his conversion in concentrated study of Arabic and Latin, but also then lectured in the University of Montpellier and worked in Paris, where he combated the heresies of the *Averroists. Lull's struggle with Islam-related Averroism was motivated by the hope that the heretics might then preach the pure Christian truth to Muslims. Lull's concern for pure doctrine always had a missionary purpose.

Lull engaged in three major missionary journeys to North Africa in 1291, 1307 and 1313. His pattern was to challenge leading Muslims to debate, with the pretext that he would become a Muslim if persuaded. He also did evangelistic preaching in marketplaces and streets. Like the apostle Paul, he experienced shipwreck, preaching to visitors in prison and mob violence. (Only on his third journey at the ripe age of eighty did he see people converted, both leading Moors in Tunis and simpler folk in villages.) Finally, he was stoned in the streets of Bugia and died virtually a martyr.

See also: ISLAM AND CHRISTIANITY.

Bibliography

A. Bonner, The Art and Logic of Raymond Lull: A User's Guide (Leiden, 2007); E. A. Peers, The Fool of Love: The Life of Ramon Lull (London, 1948); F. A. Yates, Lull and Bruno (London, 1982); S. M. Zwemer, Raymond Lull: First Missionary to the Moslems (New York and London, 1902).

M. F. GOLDSMITH

LUTHER, MARTIN (1483–1546)

Martin Luther was not the author, but became the accidental instigator of the *Protestant Reformation through his famous protest about the abuse of indulgences in 1517. He remains one of the Christian church's most influential theologians, who gave his name (unwillingly, it must be said) to a whole denomination and initiated a new way of Christian living, praying and believing across Europe.

Born in 1483, in Eisleben, Germany, Luther matriculated at the University of Erfurt in 1501. A dramatic experience in a thunderstorm in 1505 led to his entry into a monastery of the Augustinian Order in the same city to begin life as a friar. This event did not indicate a termination of his study, merely a refocusing around the study of theology. He was ordained priest in 1507, and transferred formally to the new university of Wittenberg in 1511 to become Professor in Biblical Studies, a post he held until he died.

During his time in Erfurt and the early years in Wittenberg, Luther began to question the theology and church practice he had been taught from his youth. The nature and timing of this is both complex and disputed. Sometime over the period between 1514 and 1520, Luther's own theological understanding, particularly of the doctrine of *salvation, was transformed. This led to a decisive break from the theology and piety of his contemporaries, and eventually from the papal church itself.

In the autumn of 1517, Luther became concerned about the abuse of indulgences, certificates issued by the church that remitted punishments imposed as part of the medieval penitential system (see *Roman Catholic theology). Indulgences had recently begun to be applied not only to the church's earthly requirements, but to punishments to be endured in *purgatory as well. They could also be applied to deceased relations who were believed to be suffering the torments of purgatory. An indulgence backed by Archbishop Albrecht of Mainz, and preached near Wittenberg by the renowned indulgence-seller Johann Tetzel drew Luther's fire. His basic complaint was that these certificates offered a form of cheap grace, and 'false assurance', encouraging people to trust in letters of indulgence rather than God's mercy. They encouraged Christians to avoid the true and painful contrition which alone rendered the sinner receptive to God's grace.

Luther's protest took the form of ninety-five theses, posted as a challenge to academic debate. These were rapidly printed and distributed, and came to be interpreted as an attack both on clear conciliar teaching and papal authority. This was clearly not Luther's intention when the controversy began. Over this period from late 1517 to 1520, in dispute with papal theologians such as Cajetan, Prierias and Eck, the implications of Luther's developing theology were slowly drawn out. The similarities between his ideas and those of the executed Bohemian heretic Jan *Hus were established, as was the clear water between his own teaching and that of recent *councils (especially the Council of Constance in 1415) and papal decretals. The result was excommunication in January 1521, followed by an appearance before Emperor Charles V at the Diet at Worms later the same year, after which Luther was placed under the imperial ban, an edict which was never fully implemented in Luther's lifetime.

For the rest of his life, Luther found himself embroiled in further disputes, this time with other reformers within the evangelical movement itself. These debates were to divide the Reformation movement profoundly. Some centred on political theology, over the tactics of the 'Peasants Revolt' of 1525, and his subsequent development of his idea of the 'two kingdoms' in response to the peasants' use of violence to achieve their aims, and the confusion between political and ecclesiastical power in the late medieval church.

A particularly significant debate focused on the theology of the *sacraments. Luther originally clashed with Andreas von *Karlstadt over the interpretation of the Mass or Lord's Supper (see *Eucharist), but later faced stronger opposition from Swiss theologians, particularly Huldrych *Zwingli from Zürich, over the same issue. While Luther had long abandoned the medieval doctrine of transubstantiation as an unnecessary piece of speculative Aristotelian theory, he consistently held to the idea of the Real Presence, the notion that 'in the Supper we eat and take to ourselves Christ's body truly and physically'. Zwingli, however, denied the real bodily presence of Christ in the elements of bread and wine, insisting that the Lord's Supper was primarily a communal meal whereby Christians pledge their allegiance both to Christ and one another. A series of lengthy treatises and counter-treatises culminated in the 'Marburg Colloquy' which brought together the main figures in the evangelical movement at the time, including Luther, his close Wittenberg colleague Philipp *Melancthon, Zwingli, *Bucer, *Oecolampadius and *Osiander. The debate was inconclusive. While agreement was acknowledged on a remarkably wide range of theological issues, over the contentious issue of sacramental presence, the parties agreed, reasonably amicably, to differ. Even so, it became clear in time that both still felt the fundamental issue had not been resolved. Luther thought Zwingli's refusal to recognize the embodied way in which God presents himself to us in sacraments was an implicit denial of the incarnation, and so jeopardized the reality of the gift of Christ to sinners. Zwingli thought Luther's insistence on the real bodily presence of Christ in the sacrament encouraged a false trust in the elements themselves rather than in Christ, and compromised God's spiritual freedom to act as he chooses, independent of physical forms.

For the remainder of his life, Luther was based in Wittenberg. He spent many hours and words working on the reformation of the church in Saxony, his home region, and in a project which was always among the closest to his own concerns, the translation of the Bible from the original languages into a colloquial and accessible German. He died in 1546.

Justification

A central feature of Luther's theology was a renewed understanding of the '*righteousness of God' (iustitia Dei). Luther referred to his discovery of this in a late recollection, the famous 'autobiographical fragment' of 1545. As he pondered the scriptural use and meaning of the phrase, particularly its occurrence in Rom. 1:17, Luther turned from a view, common within systematic works of theology at the time, of this as 'active righteousness', or God's own righteousness by which he actively condemns sinners. Instead, he began to understand it as 'passive righteousness', a righteousness which God works in sinners, and which is received by *faith. Hence God's iustitia became for Luther not demand but gift (see *Justification). Acceptance of sinners by God as truly righteous came at the start of, and as the essential precondition for, the grateful living of Christian life, rather than a goal to be achieved at the end of it. Christians were not partly righteous and partly sinful, with the Christian life as the slow process, to be completed in purgatory, whereby such sin as remained could be removed, until final acceptance by God was achieved. Instead, Christians were, in Luther's well-known phrase, 'at the same time righteous and sinful': fully righteous by virtue of the righteousness of Christ received by faith, despite and yet simultaneous with the real presence of sin.

Faith is hearing the promise of God that he justifies the ungodly (Rom. 5:6), and simply believing it. Faith therefore includes both a positive and negative aspect. Positively, it lays hold of and clings tightly to the word of promise which offers forgiveness and *grace; negatively, it refuses to try to earn any kind of personal merit before God on the basis of which a claim might be made for his favour. Faith resolves to take God at his word and therefore eschews the attempt to impress God with works: it is by definition the opposite of 'works' – passive receptiveness of grace, not active co-operation with it.

All previous versions of scholastic medieval soteriology (see *Salvation) suggested to varying degrees that the granting of salvation required the actual and gradual transformation of the penitent from within, with the help of God's grace, so that they became meritoriously righteous within themselves, and it was on the basis of this internal righteousness, once complete, that justification was bestowed. Luther, however, insisted that the righteousness which justifies a Christian is not his or her own internal righteousness, but is instead, an external or strange righteousness (iustitia externa or aliena), the 'righteousness of another, namely Christ'. The practice of good works flows from justification, but does not in any way contribute to it. Salvation did not depend on the performance of meritorious works, even those performed with the assistance of grace. Justification was granted solely on the basis of the merits of Christ, imputed to the believer through faith alone.

This view of justification led Luther to a furious falling-out with the great Dutch humanist, *Erasmus. Erasmus advocated a simple freedom for the human will to choose to turn towards God or not, and stated his belief that further precision on such questions was impossible due to the lack of clarity of Scripture on these points. For Luther, this position was untenable on two main counts. First, it re-opened the door to uncertainty in the doctrine of justification. If any part of the justification was dependent on human action or choice, it re-introduced subjectivity and hence uncertainty, which robbed the sinner of the joyful certainty of God's grace and promise.

Second, it undermined the clarity of Scripture. Only if the promise of Scripture was clear and unequivocal could it be trusted and hence bring security and peace. For Luther, Erasmus's casual assertion of Scripture's opaqueness on such questions removed the Christian's hope and freedom.

Scripture

This emphasis on *Scripture marks one of the other distinguishing points of Luther's theology. His focus on 'Scripture alone' as the final authority for Christian life and thought emerged from two distinct but related aspects of his early development. During the course of his controversy with papal theologians before his excommunication, Luther appears to have been surprised by their failure to tackle him on the grounds he wanted to argue – the teaching of the Bible. Instead, all he encountered was the repeated charge that his ideas were opposed to both papal and conciliar teaching, and therefore to be condemned. While he began the indulgence controversy with a somewhat naïve expectation that Scripture, pope, councils and canon law would be seen to be in agreement, these controversies soon drove a firm wedge between Luther's reading of Scripture and these other authorities. The failure of his opponents to answer him with Scripture compelled him towards asserting the authority of Scripture over against these other authorities, rather than complementary with them.

The other force which shaped his emerging doctrine of Scripture was experiential. Luther's experience of Christian life from early times, and subsequently in the monastery, was marked by what he later called Anfechtung, the experience of doubt and despair, especially focused on the question of whether God looked on him with favour or condemnation. His theological discoveries did not banish these experiences; they simply gave him means of dealing with them. Such experiences were particularly acute during the controversy with the papacy, and produced a consequent need for reassurance which could be trusted. In extremis, Luther found that a human word such as papal teaching, the pronouncement of a council or the word of eminent theological authorities could not give him the solid ground he needed. Only a word from God in Scripture presented itself as an unyielding foundation on which he could stand firm while the storms of conflict or conscience raged around him. As a result, his famous stand before the emperor to whom he was summoned at the Diet of Worms in 1521 took the form of an appeal to Scripture: he was '... bound by the Scriptures I have quoted and my conscience is captive to the Word of God'.

The question of the interpretation of Scripture is of course another matter. The debate with Zwingli over the Eucharist showed the inability of evangelicals who held in common the final authority of Scripture always to agree on what it meant, or the central principles by which it should be interpreted. However, this does not gainsay the vital role played by Luther in establishing the central role of Scripture within Protestant theology, and the principle of the role of theology as exegesis – that theology is essentially a response to the prior word of God revealed in Christ and in the Scriptures, a human word in response to God's word.

Christology

Luther's theology is also characterized by a focus on *Christ, as God's gift. For Luther, the Christian holds onto the gift of Christ as the eternal pledge of God's favour and grace, over against any voice of accusation or experience of abandonment that might suggest God is unmerciful. God's act in Christ of becoming human for us pledges him to us once and for all, and is the foundation of Christian faith and peace: 'If you see . . . that God is so kindly disposed towards you that he even gives his own Son for you, then your heart must grow sweet and disposed towards God.' Luther's Christology also held that Christ's divine and human natures were not separate entities co-existing within the same body, but a unified substance – a divine-human nature. This preserved for Luther the notion that Jesus' human life and nature expressed perfectly the nature and heart of God. The *incarnation, as God's gift of Christ to us, to be received by faith, is a true expression of the heart of God as turned towards humanity in love and favour. It reveals the innermost identity and will of God, not as the demanding judge, but as the generous giver. This is how we know what God is like.

In addition, this Christology profoundly affected his understanding of the way God communicates himself to humankind. Justification consists in the promise and gift of the righteousness of Christ to sinners, received only by faith. Because Luther could not conceive of any separation between Christ's divine and human nature, this gift could not be thought of as just a spiritual thing, but it had to take embodied form, just as in the incarnation. Hence, Luther thought of God's approach and availability in very physical forms. It is this Christological perspective that lies at the root of Luther's insistence on the real presence of Christ in the elements of bread and wine in the Mass. God's word of promise, which comes in the form of both preaching and sacrament, does not just refer to the gift of Christ; it actually conveys what it promises. It is no mere legal fiction, but effects a real union between the believer and Christ at the most intimate level, in which the believer's sin is exchanged with Christ's righteousness. If, as Luther insists, Christ is one human/divine nature, then it cannot be that Christ is offered to us spiritually, while his physical presence or flesh is elsewhere. Both belong together, and Christ and his benefits are offered to us bodily in the sacrament, to be received in faith.

Luther is one of the most creative and influential figures in Christian history. His writing, voluminous and seldom dull, extends over a very broad range of Christian theology and practice, and remains accessible and stimulating even 500 years later.

See also: LUTHERANISM AND LUTHERAN THEOLOGY; REFORMATION THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

M. Brecht, Martin Luther: His Road to Reformation, 1483–1521 (Philadelphia, 1985); idem, Martin Luther: Shaping and Defining the Reformation, 1521–1532 (Minneapolis, 1990); idem, Martin Luther: The Preservation of the Church, 1532–1546 (Minneapolis, 1999); G. Ebeling, Luther: An Introduction to His Thought (London, 1972); B. Lohse, Martin Luther's Theology: Its Historical and Systematic Development (Minneapolis, 1999); H. A. Oberman, Luther: Man Between God and the Devil (New Haven, 1989).

G. TOMLIN

LUTHERANISM AND LUTHERAN THEOLOGY

The Lutheran Reformation was pre-eminently a theological movement. Although it had a profound effect upon the political, social and academic life of Western Europe, it did not start out, primarily, as an effort to change political and social structures. Unlike earlier medieval reform movements in the Western church, which generally aimed at moral renewal or institutional change, Martin Luther's reform efforts in sixteenth-century Germany were rooted in a concern for doctrinal reform. Arising from his own struggle with sin and his breakthrough to a new understanding of God's *grace, Luther sought to lead others, and the church as a whole, to a fuller realization that *salvation is a divine gift received by sinners through an act of trust in the righteousness of Christ. All of Luther's significant contributions in liturgy, catechetics and hymnody, even his deep concern for social and ecclesiastical reform, came about as a result of his pursuit of this great soteriological goal.

There are three sources for an understanding of the nature and structure of traditional Lutheranism. First, the Lutheran confessions collected in the Book of Concord; second, the writings of Luther; and third, the writings of other Lutheran church leaders, most notably from the first three generations of the Lutheran movement. Since Luther was a prolific but unsystematic writer, the whole corpus of his printed works could not easily function as a concise standard for Lutheran theology. The Book of Concord, assembled some sixty years after the start of the Lutheran Reformation, served this purpose. It collected Luther's two *catechisms and joined them to several doctrinal summaries from key moments in the development of the Lutheran church. To the three ecumenical creeds shared by Eastern and Western Christians, it added the *Augsburg Confession written by Luther's close associate Philipp *Melancthon in 1530, the Smalcald Articles prepared by Luther himself in 1537 and the *Formula of Concord written in 1577 to settle doctrinal disputes that had arisen among Lutherans after Luther's death.

The Lutheran confessions do not vary on any significant point from the theology of Luther himself. However, this does not mean that all of the early Lutheran church leaders thought alike. Philipp Melancthon inspired a party of theologians known as the Philippists who clashed over several issues with another group, the Gnesio-Lutherans (so-called 'authentic' Lutherans), led by Matthias Flacius (1520–75) among others. The Formula of Concord was an effort to restore consensus to the Lutheran movement. Written principally by Martin

*Chemnitz and Jacob Andreae (1528–90), it clarified Lutheran teachings about a number of important articles of faith, such as original *sin and the bondage of the human *will, the role of good works in the Christian life, law and gospel, the nature of Christ's presence in the Lord's Supper (see *Eucharist) and *predestination. Lutheran theology in the seventeenth century, the so-called Age of Orthodoxy, was devoted to the task of defending the doctrinal heritage articulated in the Book of Concord. Chemnitz was the most important transitional figure between the late Reformation and the Age of Orthodoxy. He wrote an extensive defence of Lutheran theology in response to criticisms of it expressed in the decrees of the Council of *Trent. Theologians in this era wrote increasingly massive doctrinal textbooks using biblical exegesis and philosophical argumentation to clarify how Lutheran theology differed from the tenets of other traditions such as Roman Catholicism and Calvinism. Most notable among these university-based dogmatists was Johann Gerhard (1582–1637).

On the fundamental articles of the Trinity, the person of Christ, the centrality of Christ's saving work and the work of the Holy Spirit through word and sacrament, Lutheran theology consciously follows the great Eastern and Western creeds and Fathers of the early church. Luther and later Lutheran theologians deliberately constructed their confessions and dogmatic disquisitions according to a trinitarian scheme and pattern of thought. The distinct contribution of Lutheran theology in the history of Christian theology is in two areas: the authority of God's word in the church, and soteriology.

The theology of the word

The sacred Scriptures are the word of God brought to humanity through prophets and apostles, and as such carry with them the authority and truthfulness of God himself. Against the authority of the papacy, church councils, reason and personal experience, Lutheran theology teaches that Scripture alone (sola Scriptura) is the source of all theology and the rule and norm for judging all teachers and teachings in the church. The unity of Scripture consists in its witness to Christ, promised in the OT and made manifest in the NT (see *Scripture, doctrine of).

The books of Scripture and words proclaimed on the basis of Scripture have a soteriological purpose, and to this end are inherently powerful to raise consciousness of sin and to reveal the remedy made available by the saving work of Christ. The word of God comes in the form of *law, which judges and condemns sinners, and *gospel, which comforts the distressed and promises forgiveness. The word must be preached in both forms in order to be effective for salvation (see *Law and gospel).

The word of gospel (proclaimed through the spoken word and the 'visible word' of baptism and Eucharist) actually creates and sustains the church, which is the community of all believers everywhere. Or, more precisely, the Holy Spirit works always and only through these means of grace to call, build, comfort and save the church. The doctrine of the real presence of Christ's body and blood in the Communion bolsters this function of the sacrament as means of grace, for by his body and blood Christ procured forgiveness of sins for all. Furthermore, the gospel and all its articles, that is, the doctrine drawn from Scripture, is the Spirit's means to reform the church and to unite it against all schism. For church unity and external fellowship, unity in biblical doctrine is necessary.

The theology of the cross

Although Luther and subsequent Lutheran theologians have used various motifs to describe the saving work of Christ, the tradition has always affirmed that the Son of God has done what other humans were unable to do for themselves. As reconciler, propitiator, and victor over sin and death, Jesus Christ alone provides the way for sinners to find favour with God. In *justification (God's effective forensic act of forgiveness and acquittal for Christ's sake), God reckons to the sinner the very righteousness which Christ acquired by his perfect obedience and atoning death on the cross.

The article of justification through faith, so central in Lutheran theology, builds upon Luther's theology of the *cross. Through *faith alone (sola fide), the sinner receives and appropriates to himself all the benefits Christ has acquired for the world – Christ's righteousness, God's forgiveness, peace and *reconciliation with God and eternal life. Thus, the reality of the sinner's justification through faith offers abundant comfort and certain *assurance to troubled Christians. As the theology of the word affords the Christian certainty of his doctrine and confession, the theology of the cross affords the Christian certainty of God's grace and of his own personal salvation.

The faith through which a sinner is justified is wrought by the Holy Spirit through word and sacrament. It is not a human accomplishment. In fact, sinners contribute nothing to their salvation by acts of their own wills or by their best efforts or works. Salvation and all things pertaining to it are by God's grace alone (sola gratia). Good works are not the cause of salvation, but are manifested in the life of a Christian as fruits of faith. Emphasizing what the apostle Paul said, Lutherans see all signs of new life in the reconciled sinner as faith becoming active in love. In gratitude for what Christ has done for them, faithful believers devote themselves to the welfare of others.

From the eighteenth century onwards, there have been movements within the Lutheran churches that have sometimes shifted the language and emphasis of theology. The *Pietist reform movement increased interest in personal religious experience and added more stress on the process of regeneration or *sanctification. Rationalists during the Enlightenment elevated the role of reason and diminished the significance of some articles of faith. Influences from philosophy and historical-critical studies created various schools of thought during the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. However, the original principles of Lutheran confessional theology have been repeatedly recalled to a central place throughout the centuries. Since the middle of the twentieth century, many Lutheran theologians have been increasingly committed to ecumenical dialogue and have thereby come to a greater appreciation of commonalities shared with some other Protestant traditions and Roman Catholicism. This is even true with regard to previously divisive issues such as the doctrine of justification and the nature of the sacraments.

See also: LUTHER, MARTIN; REFORMATION THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

W. Elert, The Structure of Lutheranism (St Louis, 1962); E. Gritsch and R. Jenson, Lutheranism: The Theological Movement and Its Confessional Writings (Philadelphia, 1976); B. Hanson, Grace that Frees: The Lutheran Tradition (Maryknoll, 2004); B. Lohse, Luther's Theology: Its Historical and Systematic Development (Minneapolis, 1999); The Lutheran World Federation and the Roman Catholic Church, Joint Declaration on the Doctrine of Justification (Grand Rapids, 2000); A. McGrath, Luther's Theology of the Cross (Oxford, 1990).

E. LUND

MACARIUS (PSEUDO-)

This Greek *ascetic teacher was active in Asia Minor or Syria-Mesopotamia between c. 380 and 430. Many of his homilies and letters have been ascribed to Macarius of Egypt (c. 300–c. 390) (wrongly) or Symeon of Mesopotamia (perhaps his true name), and so he is sometimes referred to as Macarius-Symeon. The scope and significance of his corpus, clarified only in recent years, remain the subject of keen research.

Macarius had links with the Messalians, ascetic extremists who stressed prayer to the virtual exclusion of outward religion and were inclined to denigrate matter (like *Manichaeans). The movement was condemned in the Eastern church in the late fourth and early fifth centuries. But Macarius was also related to the more central tradition of ascetic and *mystical theology stimulated by *Origen and notably exemplified in *Gregory of Nyssa, one of whose works was dependent on Macarius' Great Letter on the monastic life (or perhaps vice-versa; scholars disagree). The Fifty Spiritual Homilies have been much admired in the West, not least by John *Wesley, who translated several of them. Macarius inculcated an interiorized quest for Christian perfection, freedom from all earthly passions, and mystical enlightenment.

Bibliography

Works: CPG, nos. 2410–2427; Pseudo-Macaire, oeuvres spirituelles, ed. V. Desprez, vol. 1 (SC 275–, 1980–); Fifty Spiritual Homilies, tr. A. J. Mason (London, 1921); Pseudo-Macarius: The Fifty Spiritual Homilies and the Great Letter, tr. G. A. Maloney, (New York, 1992).

Studies: W. Jaeger, Two Rediscovered Works of Ancient Christian Literature: Gregory of Nyssa and Macarius (Leiden, 1954); V. Desprez, in DSp 10, cols. 20–43.

D. F. WRIGHT

MACDONALD, GEORGE (1824–1905)

George MacDonald was born in Huntly in rural Aberdeenshire, Scotland, the son of a bleacher. He was to write nearly thirty novels, several books of sermons, a number of abiding fantasies for adults and children, short stories and poetry. His childhood is captured in his semi-autobiographical Ranald Bannerman's Boyhood (1871). Like C. S. *Lewis and J. R. R. Tolkien (1892–1973), MacDonald was a scholar as well as a story-teller. He entered Aberdeen University in 1840, and had a scientific training. Much later he was for a time professor of literature at Bedford College, London. After a short spell in the Congregational ministry, he found freer rein in the precarious life of a writer and lecturer. His broad theology allowed him to approve of both C. H. *Spurgeon and F. D. Maurice (see *Christian Socialism). It is, however, for his theology of the *imagination, and its outworkings in his writings, that he is memorable. His psychological grasp of the unconscious laws upon which the human making of meaning is based predates Freud and Jung. His sense that all imaginative meaning originates with the Christian Creator became the foundation of C. S. Lewis's thinking and imagining. Two seminal essays, 'The Imagination: Its Functions and Its Culture' (1867) and 'The Fantastic Imagination' (before 1882), remarkably foreshadow Tolkien's famous essay 'On Fairy Stories' (1947), the gist of which persuaded C. S. Lewis of the truth of Christianity on a windy night in 1931. Writes MacDonald, 'One difference between God's work and man's is, that, while God's work cannot mean more than he meant, man's must mean more than he meant.'

Bibliography

R. N. Hein, The Harmony Within: The Spiritual Vision of George MacDonald (Grand Rapids, 1982); C. S. Lewis (ed.), George MacDonald: An Anthology (London, 1946); G. MacDonald, George MacDonald and His Wife (London, 1924); K. Triggs, The Stars and the Stillness: A Portrait of George MacDonald (Cambridge, 1986); R. L. Wolff, The Golden Key: A Study of the Fiction of George MacDonald (New Haven, 1961).

C. P. DURIEZ

MACHEN, JOHN GRESHAM
(1881–1937)

John Machen was a NT scholar, apologist and popular theologian, the last major advocate of the *Princeton theology, who by training and disposition was cut out for a life of scholarship, but who as a result of a tumultuous ecclesiastical conflict became a creator of new institutions to carry on conservative Presbyterian Calvinism in America.

Machen came from a well-to-do family in Baltimore, MD, and studied at Johns Hopkins University, Princeton Seminary (under B. B. *Warfield), Princeton University and in Germany. From 1906 to 1929 he taught NT at Princeton Theological Seminary. When his appointment to a chair of theology was denied at the same time as the governing structure of the seminary was changed in favour of 'inclusive' *Presbyterianism, Machen left Princeton to found Westminster Theological Seminary in Philadelphia. Shortly thereafter, in an effort to certify the orthodoxy of missionaries, he helped establish a missions board independent of the Presbyterian General Assembly. This move led to Machen and several other conservative leaders being ousted from the large Northern Presbyterian Church. As a result, the Orthodox Presbyterian Church was formed to maintain a 'true Presbyterian' witness in the United States. Machen, who never married, was a careful scholar, a tireless organizer, and most of all a personal inspiration to many others, especially young ministers, who were troubled about the theological drift of American Presbyterianism.

Machen's best-known scholarly efforts were books defending traditional understandings of NT topics. His Origin of Paul's Religion (London, 1921) provided a careful rebuttal of the fashionable belief that Paul had propounded a gospel heavily indebted to Gk philosophy and strikingly at odds with the simple teachings of Jesus. His study The Virgin Birth (London, 1932) carefully sifted through biblical, historical and philosophical scholarship to conclude that no valid reasons existed for questioning the church's belief in the supernatural conception of Jesus (see *Virgin birth). In these and similar works Machen displayed the type of thorough orthodox scholarship that had marked Old Princeton since its founding in 1812, but which had become a rare commodity in the heated days of the *fundamentalist-*modernist controversy.

Machen's popular works presented logical and intelligent arguments for traditional Christian faith. Among these, his Christianity and Liberalism (Grand Rapids, 1923) has rightly received the most attention. Here Machen examined theological *liberalism with respect to beliefs about God and humanity, the Bible, Christ, salvation and the church. His conclusion was that 'the chief modern rival of Christianity is "liberalism."' An examination of the teachings of liberalism in comparison with those of Christianity will show that at every point the two movements are in direct opposition' (Christianity and Liberalism, p. 53). The argumentation in this volume is careful, yet compelling. The critic Walter Lippman, who was no friend to any variety of Christianity, called it a 'cool and stringent defense of orthodox Protestantism' (Preface to Morals, New York, 1929, p. 32).

With Machen's premature death on 1 January 1937, American conservative Presbyterians lost more than just an important leader. He had been at once a model of scholarship and a rallying point for consistently Reformed churchmen. Friendly critics have suggested that his thought was perhaps too closely tied to intellectual conventions of the nineteenth century and that he was overprone to independence. But critics and supporters alike have acknowledged the integrity of his work and the influence of his life.

Bibliography

D. G. Hart, Defending the Faith: J. Gresham Machen and the Crisis of Conservative Protestantism in Modern America (Grand Rapids, 1995); G. M. Marsden, 'J. Gresham Machen, History, and Truth', WTJ 42 (1979), pp. 157–175; W. S. Reid, 'J. Gresham Machen', in D. F. Wells (ed.), Reformed Theology in America (Grand Rapids, 1985); C. A. Russell, 'J. Gresham Machen: Scholarly Fundamentalist', in Voices of American Fundamentalism (Philadelphia, 1976); N. B. Stonehouse, J. Gresham Machen: A Biographical Memoir (Grand Rapids, 1954).

M. A. NOLL

MACINTYRE, ALASDAIR
CHAMBERS (b. 1929)

Alasdair MacIntyre was born on 12 January 1929, in Glasgow, Scotland. He has served on philosophy faculties at numerous universities, first in the UK, at Oxford University, and then in the United States, where he is permanent senior research fellow at Notre Dame University. MacIntyre has published numerous books and articles, starting with Marxism: An Interpretation (London, 1953). A religious interest has been evident from the very beginning, leading to the collection which he edited together with Anthony Flew, New Essays in Philosophical Theology (London, 1955). However, it was after his conversion to Catholic Christianity that he published his most influential books. It would not be an exaggeration to say that his contributions to the fields of *ethics, political philosophy and the history of philosophy have significantly altered our understanding of *rationality in general, but also theological rationality in particular.

His 1981 classic, After Virtue, was a watershed in both ethics and theology. Exhibiting a fresh philosophical methodology, which combined philosophical argument with historical narration, MacIntyre stressed the inseparability of reason and tradition. He described the contemporary moral morass as resulting from the fact that liberal reason had divorced moral concepts from the traditions and practices which are their rightful context. Moral, philosophical, theological, political arguments cannot be settled by appeal to tradition-neutral criteria, but only by setting them against the background of some tradition. He defines a living tradition as ‘an historically extended, socially embedded argument, and an argument precisely in part about the goods which constitute that tradition’ (After Virtue, p. 207). This led MacIntyre to speak about tradition-constituted and tradition-constitutive rationality.

At the time, MacIntyre was not the only philosopher emphasizing the so-called social construction of knowledge. But what distinguished MacIntyre from others, beyond his insistence that tradition is not a barrier to knowledge, was his optimism with regard to inter-traditional rationality. His Whose Justice? Which Rationality? (1988) insisted that, while reason is always embedded in traditions, both perspectivism and *relativism must be rejected. It is possible, he forcefully argued, to see transitions from one tradition to another as improvements in understanding. MacIntyre rejects *foundationalism and the correspondence theory of truth while insisting on arguments about the relative superiority of one tradition over another. His *Gifford Lectures, published as Three Rival Versions of Moral Enquiry (1990), are such a non-foundationalist and historicist argument for the superiority of the tradition of Augustinian *Thomism in ethics, as opposed to modern liberal encyclopaedia and postmodern deconstructionist genealogy.

MacIntyre has been very influential in the development of *narrative (or *postliberal) theology, as well as in the development of so-called virtue ethics.

Bibliography

Works: ‘Epistemological Crises, Dramatic Narrative, and the Philosophy of Science’, The Monist 60, 1977, pp. 453–472; After Virtue (Notre Dame, ²1984); Whose Justice? Which Rationality (Notre Dame, 1988); Three Rival Versions of Moral Enquiry (Notre Dame, 1990); The Tasks of Philosophy: Selected Essays, vol. 1 (Cambridge, 2006); Ethics and Politics: Selected Essays, vol. 2 (Cambridge, 2006).

Studies: M. Fuller, Making Sense of MacIntyre (Aldershot, 1998); C. S. Lutz, Tradition in the Ethics of Alasdair MacIntyre: Relativism, Thomism, and Philosophy (Lanham, 2004); M. C. Murphy (ed.), Alasdair MacIntyre (Cambridge, 2003).

A. VIDU

MACKAY, DONALD M. (1922–1987)

Donald MacKay was an internationally known British neuroscientist who was Granada Research Professor of Communication and Neuroscience at the University of Keele (1960–82), where he led an interdisciplinary research team on the organization of the brain. All his work, both in this area, and in his more philosophical reflections on the human person, and on science and faith, were motivated by a strong Christian faith. He was reared in the strong *Reformed faith of the Free Church of Scotland.

Theologically, MacKay’s work is important for two bold metaphysical theses which he developed with great thoroughness and tenacity. MacKay insisted that *science and religion stand in a logically complementary relationship. Science expresses the physically measurable and testable aspects of created reality. The findings of science are not exhaustive – MacKay was a fervent antireductionist – but are complemented by other levels of significant description, among which is that of the Christian religion. Thus the description of an event as 'confession of sin' is not a rival to the description of the same event in terms of physical changes in the brain, but complements it. Both science and Christian theology make claims which are objectively true or false, and the Christian faith has nothing to fear from scientific enquiry. Both science and faith progress, in different ways, in a humble, listening and enquiring attitude to the data.

The roots of MacKay's approach to science and religion lay in his view about the relation between the brain and the mind, and in his *Augustinian emphasis upon the divine timeless upholding of all things. God is not active in the 'gaps' of our present understanding, nor does he interfere with the working of otherwise immutable physical laws.

MacKay also gave prolonged and intense effort to defending the view that free choices are logically indeterminate (see *Determinism; *Will). For the chooser there is no future specification of any of his free actions which it would be correct for him now to believe, even though such specifications can, in principle, exist for another human observer, and do exist in the mind of God.

These views were expounded in numerous articles and reviews and in several books, including: Christianity in a Mechanistic Universe (London, 1965); Science, Chance and Providence (Oxford, 1978); The Clockwork Image (London, 1974); Brains, Machines, and Persons (London, 1980). His *Gifford Lectures, given in 1986, were published as Behind the Eye (Oxford, 1991).

Bibliography

J. W. Haas, Jr, 'Donald MacCrimmon MacKay (1922–1987)', Perspectives on Science and Christian Faith, 44 (1992), pp. 55–61.

P. HELM

MACKINNON, DONALD M. (1913–94)

MacKinnon held chairs in moral philosophy at Aberdeen and in philosophy of religion at Cambridge until 1978. His work represents a powerful and consistent rejection of *idealism in philosophy and theology in favour of a realism given its distinctive shape by the doctrines of the person of Christ and the *atonement. His main concerns lay in the overlapping areas of theology, metaphysics and moral philosophy. MacKinnon was especially concerned to explore the ontological and *metaphysical implications of Christian beliefs about the person and work of Christ, and it is here that his restless and interrogative analysis is at its best. His ethical work is much preoccupied with offering a realist account of the nature and significance of human action and moral freedom, especially as this determines the character of human political action. He has also written perceptively on the history of philosophy (notably on *Kant and *Butler), on *Marxist-Leninism, and on sacramental and dogmatic theology. Much of his best work is highly complex and allusive, approaching issues tangentially through particular historical incidents or texts. Partly because of this, and partly because his preferred form is the suggestive essay rather than the systematic treatise, his work has not received the attention which it deserves.

Bibliography

Works: Christian Faith and Communist Faith, ed. MacKinnon (London, 1953); A Study in Ethical Theory (London, 1957); Gifford Lectures 1965–66; Borderlands of Theology and Other Essays, eds. G. W. Roberts and D. E. Smucker (London, 1968); Making Moral Decisions, ed. MacKinnon (London, 1969); The Problem of Metaphysics (London, 1974); Explorations in Theology, vol. 5, ed. MacKinnon (London, 1979).

Studies: D. Hardy, 'Theology through Philosophically Mediated Life: Donald M. MacKinnon and Nicholas Lash', in D. Ford (ed.), The Modern Theologians (Oxford, 1997), pp. 272–278; B. Hebblethwaite and S. Sutherland (eds.), The Philosophical Frontiers of Christian Theology: Essays Presented to D. M. MacKinnon (Cambridge, 1982); P. G. Wignall, 'D. M. MacKinnon: An Introduction to His Early Theological Writings', New Studies in Theology 1, 1980, pp. 75–94.

J. B. WEBSTER

MACKINTOSH, HUGH ROSS (1870–1936)

Mackintosh was a Scottish theologian born in Paisley and educated at Edinburgh and in Germany. He ministered in Tayport and Aberdeen before appointment in 1904 to the chair of systematic theology in New College, Edinburgh, which post he held until his death. His early experience on the continent gave him a continuing interest in nineteenth-century German Protestant writers whose work he sought to publicize in Scotland, particularly by his participation in translating *Schleiermacher and *Ritschl. As with a later Scottish scholar, William *Barclay, he would accept the classification of ‘*liberal evangelical’. The two were alike in recommending their students to have a number of non-religious interests. Mackintosh rejected the view that saw propitiatory or punitive features in the *atonement. His works, which have proved more durable than those of other early twentieth-century scholars, include The Doctrine of the Person of Jesus Christ (Edinburgh, 1912), The Christian Experience of Forgiveness (London, 1927) and Types of Modern Theology (London, 1937), which latter presents developments from Schleiermacher to *Barth.

Bibliography

J. W. Leitch, A Theology of Transition: H. R. Mackintosh as an Approach to Barth (London, 1952), with bibliography; T. F. Torrance, ‘H. R. Mackintosh: Theologian of the Cross’, SBET 5:2 (1988); idem (ed.), H. R. Mackintosh: The Person of Jesus Christ (Edinburgh, 2000).

J. D. DOUGLAS

MACQUARRIE, JOHN (1919–2007)

Macquarrie taught in Glasgow, New York and latterly in Oxford. Born into a Scottish Presbyterian family, he became one of the best-known Anglican theologians of the late twentieth century, having published very widely in the areas of Christian doctrine and philosophy of religion. Much of his writing shows the influence of a variety of thinkers in the *existentialist tradition. His earlier books An Existentialist Theology (London, 1955) and The Scope of Demythologizing (London, 1960) are particularly concerned with the resources to be found in *Bultmann’s theology, though they do not counsel uncritical acceptance. His much-used textbook Principles of Christian Theology (London, 1966, 21977) draws heavily on *Tillich’s thought, among others, in its interpretations of central Christian doctrines. He is also well known for his history of Twentieth Century Religious Thought (London, 1963), and for a variety of other books on such topics as *ethics, *spirituality, theological language and Christian eschatology. Macquarrie’s later work is to be found in two large treatises on the Christian doctrines of God and man, In Search of Deity (London, 1984) and In Search of Humanity (London, 1982). Best read as essays in *natural theology, these volumes are particularly good examples of the range of theological and philosophical reference, both historical and contemporary, which his work commands.

See also: MYTH.

Bibliography

Additional works: Studies in Christian Existentialism (London, 1966); God-Talk (London, 1967); God and Secularity (London, 1968); Paths in Spirituality (London, 1972); Existentialism (Harmondsworth, 1973); Christian Hope (London, 1978).

Studies: T. Bradshaw, ‘John Macquarrie’, in A. E. McGrath (ed.), SPCK Handbook of Anglican Theologians (London, 1998); O. Cummings, John Macquarrie: A Master of Theology (New York, 2002); E. T. Long, Existence, Being, and God: An Introduction to the Philosophical Theology of John Macquarrie (St Paul, MN, 1985).

J. B. WEBSTER

MAHAN, ASA (1799–1889)

Asa Mahan was a pastor, theologian and educator, influential in many reform causes popular among English-speaking evangelical Protestants during the nineteenth century. He grew up as a *Presbyterian in the highly *revivalistic ‘burned over district’ of western New York. He graduated from Hamilton College (1824) and from Andover Theological Seminary (1827). Following seminary, he was an agent for the American Tract Society, then minister of Presbyterian churches in New York State (1829–31) and Cincinnati, Ohio (1831–5).

In 1835 Mahan became president of Oberlin College in Oberlin, Ohio. Together with Charles *Finney (the first professor of theology there) and a cohort of other ‘progressive’ New School Presbyterians and others, Mahan helped to make Oberlin a centre of ‘reformism’, and a model for many evangelical Protestant colleges of the time. Oberlin enrolled women, the poor, and African Americans. It propagated abolitionism (see *slavery), the doctrine of Christian *perfection, various health reform causes, and advocated that Christians live as simply as possible and give away all surplus to the poor. In 1850 Mahan left Oberlin for other work in Christian education. From 1859 to 1871 he was president of Adrian College, Michigan, a school founded by the abolitionist Wesleyan Methodist Church.

While at Oberlin and following, Mahan became increasingly active in the *Holiness Movement. His first major book was The Scripture Doctrine of Christian Perfection Stated and Defended (1839). A later work, The Baptism of the Holy Ghost (1870), became a standard exposition of holiness/*Higher Christian Life teaching. From 1872 until his death in 1889 Mahan lived in England, where he preached occasionally, edited several periodicals and published his autobiography (1882).

Bibliography

Works: The Scripture Doctrine of Christian Perfection; with Other Kindred Subjects, Illustrated and Confirmed in a Series of Discourses Designed to Throw Light on the Way of Holiness (Boston, 1839); The Baptism of the Holy Ghost (New York, 1870); Autobiography, Intellectual, Moral, and Spiritual (London, 1882).

Studies: E. H. Madden and J. A. Hamilton, Freedom and Grace: The Life of Asa Mahan (Metuchen, 1982).

H. E. RASER

MAN, see ANTHROPOLOGY; FEMINIST THEOLOGY

MANICHAISM

Once regarded as a Christianized form of *Zoroastrianism, Manichaeism is now generally accepted as one of the last and most complete manifestations of *Gnosticism. It was founded by the Syro-Persian Mani (216–76) who was brought up in a Jewish-Christian sect in south Babylonia and subsequently rebelled against it. The Manichaean gnōsis embodies a complex cosmic drama which centres on a primordial battle between the originating principles of Light and Darkness. An initial invasion of Light by Darkness led to a counter-attack by Light which was designed to fail, tricking the powers of Darkness into swallowing particles of Light. The universe was then created to redeem and purify this captive light and to punish and imprison the archons of Darkness. Through their concupiscence some of this defiled Light escaped from the archons' bodies and became plant life. They also brought forth humankind through a series of horrific acts involving abortion, incest and cannibalism; this resulted in the imprisonment of Light-particles, the soul, in a body which is utterly evil and corrupt. The soul could, however, be awakened by gnōsis and be made aware of its divine origins.

Jesus in Manichaeism is one of a series of Gnostic saviours, and his historical manifestation was purely *docetic. The individual details of the Manichaean cosmic drama are derived mainly from Jewish and Christian apocrypha and from the cosmogonic teaching of the Edessan philosopher Bardaisan (154–222). Mani was also heavily influenced by *Marcion, from whom he acquired a strong 'Pauline' *antinomianism and claimed the title of 'Apostle of Jesus Christ'.

The Manichaean sect was extremely hierarchical, and was divided into elect and hearers; the former were priests who had to observe sexual abstinence and strict food taboos including vegetarianism so that they could enable the liberation of the Light particles trapped in the plants. The hearers, the lay followers, had to attend to the needs of the elect, and were not bound by the same rigid rules. Easily organized into small units, the religion was able to spread swiftly and to survive persecution.

A combination of missionary zeal and persecution by Sassanian authorities resulted in the religion being diffused in the Roman Empire and the lands east of the River Oxus. It was particularly well established in Roman Africa where it passed itself off as a more perfect form of Christianity, including the young *Augustine among those who were captivated by its 'higher criticism' of the Jewish and Christian Scriptures. The *dualism of Manichaeism was later seen by church authorities in the Middle Ages as having been inherited by heretical movements such as the Paulicians, the Bogomils, the Paterenes and the Cathars (see *Albigenses). In the East, the religion gradually expanded along the Silk Road and eventually reached China where it was outlawed. After the ninth century, however, the religion became strongly established in Central Asia. Later the sect went underground in China and survived as a secret religion in the south until the sixteenth century.

The Manichaean canon consists of a corpus of seven works by Mani, none of which has survived in a complete form. Besides a large body of polemical writings on the sect by the Church Fathers, our knowledge has been greatly increased by the discovery of genuine Manichaean writings from Turfan, Dunhuang (both in China), Medinet Medi (Egypt) and Theveste (North Africa). In the 1970s and 80s a small papyrus codex from Egypt, belonging to the papyrus collection of the University of Cologne, containing a hagiographical version of the life of the founder (the Cologne Mani Codex), was successfully restored and edited. It shows beyond doubt that the sect had its origins in the fringe of Judeo-Christianity and not in Iranian religions.

Bibliography

Sources: A. Adam (ed.), Texte Zum Manichäismus (Berlin, 1969); A. Böhlig and J. P. Asmussen (eds.), Die Gnosis, vol. 3: Der Manichäismus (Zurich and Munich, 1980); R. Cameron and A. J. Dewey (eds.), The Cologne Mani Codex (Missoula, 1979).

Studies: N. J. Baker-Brian, Manichaeism: An Ancient Faith Rediscovered (London, 2011); J. K. Coyle, Manichaeism and Its Legacy (Leiden, 2009); H. J. Klimkeit, Manichaean Art and Calligraphy (Leiden, 1982); S. N. C. Lieu, Manichaeism in the Later Roman Empire and Medieval China: A Historical Survey (Tübingen, 1992); idem, Manichaeism in Mesopotamia and the Roman East (Leiden, 1994); H.-Ch. Puech, Sur le Manichéisme et autres essais (Paris, 1979).

S. N. LIEU

MARCEL, GABRIEL (1889–1973)

Gabriel Honoré Marcel was a French philosopher and playwright who played a pivotal role in the development of *existentialism. His work shows a consistent concern for the modern pressures of technology and materialism, forces that threatened to annihilate the individual. Marcel is most famous for his existential philosophy, which he preferred to call 'Philosophy of Existence' to distance his work from that of his friend Jean-Paul Sartre. Marcel also penned dozens of plays, often using the scripts to depict characters caught in the interpersonal problems that he identified in his strictly philosophical writings. Raised an atheist, Marcel converted to Catholicism in 1929 and his work is sometimes considered Christian existentialism.

In his best-known, two-volume work The Mystery of Being (1951), Marcel demonstrates his consistent commitment to concrete philosophy and ordinary language. The human world is broken, Marcel claims, because people have lost sight of their relation to *being. Without any sense of ontology, humans are oriented only by function, and defined by superficial realities instead of what is truly exigent. Unlike the problems of science, *ontology opens not toward solutions and technology, but toward mystery and the relation with the other person.

Bibliography

Works: The Mystery of Being, Volume 1: Reflection and Mystery (London, 1951); The Mystery of Being, Volume 2: Faith and Reality (London, 1951); Man Against Mass Society (Chicago, 1962).

Studies: J. G. Hernandez, Gabriel Marcel's Ethics of Hope: Evil, God and Virtue (New York, 2011); T. Michaud, 'Gabriel Marcel and the Postmodern World', Journal of French Philosophy VII, 1–2, 1995, pp. 5–29.

E. SEVERSON

MARCELLUS OF ANCYRA (d. c. 374)

Marcellus was bishop of Ancyra in Galatia. He first became prominent as a supporter of *Athanasius and the Nicene term homoousios (the Son being 'of one substance' with the Father). From this perspective he attacked the teaching of *Arius' supporters, Asterius (d. c. 341), Eusebius of Nicomedia (d. c. 342) and *Eusebius of Caesarea, but in so doing exaggerated the oneness of the Father and the Son before and after the incarnation. Eusebius of Caesarea responded with his Contra Marcellum and De Ecclesiastica Theologia, charging Marcellus with Sabellianism (see *Monarchianism). Marcellus was accordingly condemned by a synod of Constantinople (336). In exile in Rome he gained the support of Pope Julius I, and with the arrival of Athanasius (339) he was cleared of 'the falsehood of Sabellius, the malice of Paul of Samosata, and the blasphemies of Montanus' (Rome, 341; Sardica, 343). He was, however, again removed from his see by the Emperor Constantius (347) and died in exile, his teaching being repudiated by Basil and condemned by the Council of Constantinople (381).

Marcellus's ideas On the Subjection of the Son are preserved by Eusebius and in his own letter to Julius. According to Basil, he taught that only to the incarnate *Logos is the title 'Son' properly applied. By the return or contraction of the Son to the pre-incarnate state, his temporary separate existence came to an end. 'He returned again to him whence he came forth and had no existence before his coming forth, nor *hypostasis after his return' (Basil, Letter 69). It was to counter Marcellus' teaching that the phrase 'whose kingdom shall have no end' was included in the Nicene Creed.

See also: CHRISTOLOGY; CREEDS; TRINITY.

Bibliography

L. Ayres, Nicaea and Its Legacy: An Approach to Fourth-Century Trinitarian Theology (Oxford, 2004); R. P. C. Hanson, The Search for the Christian Doctrine of God (Edinburgh, 1988); J. N. D. Kelly, Early Christian Doctrines (London, 1977); J. T. Lienhard, Contra Marcellum: Marcellus of Ancyra and Fourth-Century Theology (Washington DC, 1999); A. H. B. Logan, 'Dark Star: The Rehabilitation of Marcellus of Ancyra', The Expository Times 118, 2007, p. 384; S. Parvis, Marcellus of Ancyra and the Lost Years of the Arian Controversy 325–345 (Oxford, 2006).

H. D. McDONALD

MARCION (c. 80–c. 160)

Marcion was reared in Sinope of Pontus (modern Turkey), where his father was reported to have been a bishop and himself a wealthy ship-builder. He was active as a teacher in Asia Minor, perhaps as early as the opening decades of the second century, before going to Rome. The rejection of his teaching by the leaders of the main Christian centres led him to set up a rival church which in a few years was nearly as widespread as the great church.

Marcion is best known for his work on the text and canon of the Bible (see *Scripture). He rejected the OT as a Christian book and collected the earliest known Christian canon, composed of an abbreviated version of Luke's Gospel and ten edited Pauline epistles (lacking the Pastorals). He presented his theological views in the Antitheses, in which he set out contradictions between the OT and the NT. His works do not survive, so his positions must be reconstructed from the refutations made by his opponents, the fullest of which is *Tertullian's five books Against Marcion.

Marcion was convinced that *Paul was the only true apostle and that the original twelve, by 'Judaizing', became false apostles. Galatians was placed first in his collection of Paul's letters. The opening words of the Antitheses, 'O wealth of riches! rapture, power, amazement! seeing that there can be nothing to say about it, or to imagine about it, or to compare to it!' express his wonder before the Pauline gospel of grace. From Paul, Marcion deduced an exaggerated contrast between *law and gospel. In agreement with his contemporary Aquila of Pontus, he practised a literal interpretation of Scripture, rejecting all allegory (see *Hermeneutics). Marcion went far beyond Paul in concluding that there are two Gods: the God of the OT, the Creator, who is a God of law and justice and who predicted the Jewish Messiah; and the previously unknown God of the NT, the Father of Jesus Christ, who is a God of mercy and salvation.

Jesus Christ revealed the Father in the fifteenth year of the Emperor Tiberius, for Marcion omitted the birth narratives from the gospel. Jesus' death purchased human salvation, and Jesus raised his own soul from the grave. Marcion advocated *asceticism: the avoidance of sex frustrates the Creator God. Marcion administered baptism only to the unmarried or abstinent before the end of life. Water was substituted for wine in the Lord's Supper. To the charge of antinomianism in the absence of law, he responded with 'God forbid'.

The Church Fathers objected to Marcion's separation of salvation from *creation and of the church from its OT heritage. Marcion's challenge accelerated the church's recognition of a NT canon and sharpened its emphasis on certain doctrines in the rule of faith (see *Creeds). Marcion shared in common with *Gnosticism such things as the idea of the unknown God, a negative view of the created world and a depreciation of the OT; but he differed in his lack of speculative, mythological interest, rejection of allegory, emphasis on faith rather than 'knowledge', and concern to establish a church.

Bibliography

B. Aland, 'Marcion: Versuch einer neuen Interpretation', ZTK 70, 1973, pp. 420–427; A. Amann, in DTC 9, cols. 2009–2032; D. Balás, in Texts and Testaments: Critical Essays on the Bible and Early Church Fathers, ed. W. Eugene March (San Antonio, 1980); G. Bardy, in DBS 5, cols. 862–877; E. C. Blackman, Marcion and His Influence (London, 1948); E. Evans, Tertullian: Adversus Marcionem, 2 vols. (Oxford, 1972); A. Harnack, Marcion: Das Evangelium vom fremden Gott (Leipzig, 1960 [1924]); R. J. Hoffmann, Marcion: On the Restitution of Christianity (Chico, 1984); J. Knox, Marcion and the New Testament: An Essay on the Early History of the Canon (Chicago, 1942); G. Ory, Marcion (Paris, 1980); R. S. Wilson, Marcion: A Study of a Second-Century Heretic (New York, 1980 [1933]).

E. FERGUSON

MARION, JEAN-LUC (b. 1946)

Jean-Luc Marion, Professor of Philosophy at the University of Paris and of the Philosophy of Religion and Theology at the Divinity School of the University of Chicago, is a leading phenomenologist, an authority on *Descartes and one of the most prominent figures in the 'theological turn' of recent Continental philosophy. Marion was a student of Deleuze, *Derrida, Daniélou, de Lubac and von *Balthasar. *Kierkegaard, Husserl, *Heidegger and *Levinas have deeply influenced him as well. In his most overtly theological work he has contrasted 'love' and 'being'. 'God is love' signifies that God is free in relation to 'being' and ruptures it from the outside in the gift of the incarnate Christ, a gift that cannot be comprehended. Through a liturgical, iconic witness to Christ, God's hallowing gaze disrupts intellectual fixation. The gift of God thus works a kenosis of the centred self, a metanoia that abandons idolatry.

Bibliography

Works: God Without Being (ET, Chicago, 1991); The Idol and Distance (ET, New York, 2001); Prolegomena to Charity (ET, New York, 2002); The Crossing of the Visible (ET, Stanford, 2004).

Studies: K. Hart (ed.), Counter-Experiences: Reading Jean-Luc Marion (Notre Dame, 2007);

R. Horner, Jean-Luc Marion: A Theological Introduction (Aldershot and Burlington, 2005).

C. S. KEEN

MARITAIN, JACQUES (1882–1973)

Jacques Maritain was a French philosopher and a key figure in the Roman Catholic revival of the first half of the twentieth century. He converted to Roman Catholicism in 1906. His main contribution lies in reinterpreting the insights of *Thomas Aquinas as foundations for modern metaphysics, politics and ethics. His work impacted on theology in at least five major ways. First, he restated the role of Christian philosophy as a passionate search for truth. He provided a metaphysical base, through his concept of 'intuition of being', for *existentialist theology. Of major importance are his writings on political philosophy. A friend of Popes John XXIII and Paul VI, his vision of a democratic state founded on Christian values influenced them and the conciliar church (see *Collegiality and conciliarity). He also gave a firm natural law basis for the post-war discussion on human *rights. Finally, he was a lifelong opponent of anti-Semitism, and his writings underlie, but go further than, the Second Vatican Council's Nostra Aetate. Maritain exercised an important influence on, especially, French theology in the mid-twentieth century, but also on figures such as *Lonergan or *Rahner and their transcendental *Thomism. He remains significant also for his work on the church's political role, and on *aesthetics.

Bibliography

The Collected Works of Jacques Maritain, ed. R. McNerny, vols. 1, 7, 11, 20 (Notre Dame, 1995–).

T. A. NOBLE

MARRIAGE, see SEXUALITY

MARROW CONTROVERSY, see BOSTON, THOMAS

MARTYRDOM

The word 'martyr' derives from the Greek martus, meaning 'witness', while the verb

martureo is commonly translated 'to bear witness'. Both words regularly recur in the NT, especially in John, Acts and Revelation. Stephen is described by Paul as your 'witness', whose blood was shed (Acts 22:20), while Rev. 2:13 refers to a 'witness', Antipas, who was killed for his faith. Towards the end of the second century the word 'martyr' was increasingly connected with this idea of a 'blood witness', someone who gave up their life for their faith, though it was probably not until the middle of the fourth century that the term was used exclusively in this way. The oldest surviving account of a Christian martyrdom outside the NT, the Martyrdom of Polycarp (c. 155), uses 'martyr' in this sense (see *Apostolic Fathers).

An extensive literature about martyrdom emerged from early Christian communities. First, the passiones or martyria, which describe the final days and actual death of the martyr(s) (The Passion of Perpetua and Felicitas); second, the acta or gesta, which provide accounts of the trials of the martyrs (the Acts of Justin or the Acts of Carpus); third, exhortations, which reflect upon martyrdom and are largely intended to encourage Christians facing persecution (Tertullian, To the Martyrs; Origen, Exhortation to the Martyrs; Pseudo-Cyprian, Glory of Martyrdom); fourth, eulogies or panegyrics on the anniversaries of martyrdoms, which celebrate the virtues of martyrs in order to edify their listeners (sermons by Basil, Gregory of Nyssa and John Chrysostom). Some descriptions embellish the events, transforming the martyrs into early Christian saints with supernatural powers over the beasts, the fires or their gladiatorial executioners.

'The blood of the martyrs' (cf. Tertullian, The Apology, 50) planted a seed in some imaginations. *Justin Martyr claims to have been drawn to Christianity by seeing martyrs die (Second Apology, 12). Martyrs were perceived as following in the footsteps of Christ, inspired by the Holy Spirit and assured of immediate access to heaven. Some early Christians, like Ignatius of Antioch, yearned for martyrdom, while others urged caution to those who sought it (Martyrdom of Polycarp, 4). The theological significance bestowed upon martyrdom contributed to the development of the cult of martyrs, which became widespread in the third century. Their 'remains' ('relics') were venerated, their stories retold, and their memories commemorated through liturgies, pilgrimages, books and buildings. Such practices have a long history. Stories of martyrdom were put to various uses in John Foxe's Book of Martyrs (1559) and the Martyr's Mirror (1660). Both ancient and modern stories about martyrdom are repeated, amplified, contested and elaborated upon through different media. The statues of ten twentieth-century martyrs at Westminster Abbey, London, illustrate the ongoing significance of martyrdom.

See also: SUFFERING.

Bibliography

G. W. Bowersock, Martyrdom and Rome (Cambridge, 1995); T. van Braght, Martyr's Mirror (aka The Bloody Theater, 1660); E. Castelli, Martyrdom and Memory: Early Christian Culture Making (New York, 2004); J. Foxe, Foxe's Book of Martyrs (also known as Acts and Monuments of Happening in the Church (Latin, 1554; English 1583); W. H. C. Frend, Martyrdom and Persecution in the Early Church (Oxford, 1965); L. Grig, Making Martyrs in Late Antiquity (London, 2004); J. Leemans (ed.), More than a Memory: The Discourse of Martyrdom and the Construction of Christian Identity in the History of Christianity (Leuven, 2005); P. Middleton, Radical Martyrdom and Cosmic Conflict in Early Christianity (London, 2006); H. Musurillo, The Acts of Christian Martyrs (Oxford, 1972); A. Trites, The New Testament Concept of Witness (Cambridge, 2004); B. Wicker (ed.), Witnesses to Faith? Martyrdom in Christianity and Islam (Aldershot, 2006).

J. P. MITCHELL

MARXISM AND CHRISTIANITY

Marxism refers to a socio-political project put forward in a series of treatises by Karl Marx (1818–83) and Friedrich Engels (1820–95) or to any of several systems of thought or approaches to social criticism derived from their works. The term is used narrowly to designate a cluster of socio-political structures generated by dominant Communist parties in different parts of the world in the twentieth century.

Marxism is an intellectual tradition, or a family of interrelated traditions, offering a secular 'interpretation of human existence' (A. MacIntyre, Marxism and Christianity, p. 2).

But there is more to Marxism than philosophical rationality. Marx's view that philosophers have interpreted the world but that the point is to change it, indicates the visionary and inspirational nature of Marxism while disclosing key themes of context and power in Marxist thought. Throughout the twentieth century practically all radical movements of emancipation drew upon Marxism for socio-political critique and aspiration. Marxism, as the official state-sponsored ideology of socialist regimes, evoked a kind of religious commitment. Marxist movements have an intellectual tradition, an ideology and a revolutionary vision. They intersect with Christian traditions on all three levels.

Marx did not produce a systematic exposition of his thought. The philosophical ideas of Marx and Engels evolved, and were challenged, revised, enriched and broadened by a variety of intellectuals and political activists. The philosophical aspect of Marxist discourse is often called dialectical *materialism. It is dialectical because it incorporates *Hegel's idea of inherent change, and materialistic because it follows *Feuerbach's rejection of German metaphysical *idealism and argues for economic, social and physical embodiment.

For several decades, after the Bolshevik and other revolutions, broad agreement concerning Marxist doctrine was developed and politically enforced. This resulted in 'orthodox' Marxism (or 'scientific' Marxism-Leninism). It placed heavy emphasis on historic determinism and the inevitability of the replacement of *capitalism by a socialist and eventually a communist economy. Socialism takes the equality of all individuals as its ideal. It favours control over the means of production and redirecting that for the welfare of the socialist state. The means of production can be controlled by the elite (Lenin's centralist socialism) or democratically. Marx envisioned that socialism would naturally transform itself into communism. Work for the common good becomes its own reward. This leads to the abolition of private property and brings full harmony between people's talents and needs: from each according to ability, to each according to needs. Orthodox Marxism is a totalizing and even totalitarian ideology. Western forms (humanist or critical Marxism) differ (sometimes substantially) from 'orthodox' versions, and emphasize the cultural relativity of Marx's project or the philosophical, ethical, socio-critical or aesthetic dimensions of his thought.

Marxism and Christianity

The Marxist vision has fascinating religious qualities. Its attractive power is sustained partly by an excessive confidence in the supremacy of the human reason and partly by an appeal to the goodness and equality of each individual: freedom, equality and brotherhood for all. What appears on the surface to be a logical, rational philosophy of life turns out to be based on faith-like commitments. Belief in the eventual arrival of communism requires almost as great a faith-commitment as belief in God. In many ways Marxism embodies a secularized Christian eschatology, both in form and content.

As with other foundationalist religions, 'orthodox' Marxism is founded on the uncontested truth of the narratives of the founders, such as Marx, Engels and Lenin. Others interpreted the texts and true doctrines were derived. They were systematized and enforced. Rival groups were condemned and suppressed. New party members were inducted into the privileged group through special rituals. Shrines, icons and statues of the founders of the struggle for Communist dominance were regularly visited and venerated. Psalmodes were created to praise the achievements of the Party and the glorious future. Processions of the faithful with banners of the leaders past and present (members of the Politburo) were organized annually.

The relationship of Marxism and Christianity can be viewed in terms of affinities and antagonism. Hoping for and working toward a 'bright future', with a just society that removes the problems of suffering and injustice, is appealing and evokes major Judeo-Christian concerns. Marxism owes to Judeo-Christianity the understanding of human imperfection and alienation and a search for means to overcome them, as well as a fascination with the meaning of life. Following the Hegelian lead, Marxism also takes over the understanding of a linear, progressive and teleologically determined direction in *history, a history which has meaning and purpose (union with God for Christians; eschatological justice for Communists). Marxist collectivism also draws from the way of life of radical Christian communities – shared property ownership, sacrifice for others, fellowship and mutual care.

From Marx on there is a history of interaction between Christians and Marxists. Some Christians have tried to emulate Marxist social criticism. Theologians from *Rauschenbusch (a Baptist) and the *social gossellers, through Reinhold *Niebuhr and Protestant proponents of *Christian Socialism, to Catholic *liberation theologians, have found Marxian themes of alienation, exploitation, inequality and political activism compatible with Christian social concerns. For them, as long as social divisions (elitism, wealth, class, gender, ethnicity and race) domination and asymmetric distribution of power continue, Marxism is an essential and challenging dialogue partner. Fundamentalist and conservative Christians, by contrast, have associated Marxism primarily with oppressive regimes led by Communist parties. They have regarded 'orthodox' Marxism as a satanic pseudo-religion and a threat to Christian faith. In the mid-twentieth century, anti-communism became a defining characteristic of some conservative evangelicals, particularly in the United States.

In spite of many common concerns and the qualified applicability of Marxian critical tools within Christian social thought, there is an essential narrative incompatibility of the two belief systems: that of Prometheus as the benefactor of humanity (a god against gods in early Marx) and of Immanuel, God with us, the wounded Saviour of the world, in Christianity. Marxism's explicit *atheism has a clear anthropological focus. It sets emancipated humanity at the centre and subsumes people's dignity and fate under the collective well-being. Marxist morality serves only this end. Such views are antagonistic to Christian ideas of a transcendent moral order. From a Christian perspective, Marx's accounts of the human condition and liberation are reductive and deficient. They underestimate the importance of the human spirit in relation to God and the potential of the radical politics of Jesus to transform the social order (see *Kingdom of God).

Theological implications

Currently Marxism is largely out of fashion; however, saying farewell to Marxism is premature. Marxisms share a hermeneutic of suspicion towards powerful social structures – a commitment to identifying, explaining and confronting gross inequality, social domination and abuse, particularly economic. To undermine the Marxist critique of religion, a rational apologetic defence is insufficient. The 'truth of belief in God must be proven, tested, [and] verified in practice' (H. Küng, Does God Exist? p. 260).

Christianity must not retreat into unalloyed individualism, deriding the creation, serving earthly powers or sanctioning injustice. Rather, there should be 'practical proof that Christian faith has social-ethical potential and social-critical relevance, that Christianity requires a readiness for change and active commitment, that the expectation of the kingdom of God does not exclude but includes the emancipation of the weary and heavy burdened' (Küng, p. 260).

Bibliography

J. C. Bennett, Christianity and Communism (New York, 1949); M. Hoelzl and G. Ward (eds.), Religion and Political Thought (London, 2006); A. Ignatov, Psychologie des Kommunismus (München, 1985); L. Kołakowski, Main Currents of Marxism, 3 vols. (Oxford, 1976–78); H. Küng, Does God Exist? An Answer for Today (New York, 1995); A. MacIntyre, Marxism and Christianity (London, 1995); S. Malpas and P. Wake (eds.), The Routledge Companion to Critical Theory (London, 2006); P. Scott and W. T. Cavanaugh (eds.), The Blackwell Companion to Political Theology (Oxford, 2004); D. R. Stiver, Theology after Ricoeur: New Directions in Hermeneutical Theology (Louisville, 2001).

P. R. PARUSHEV

MARY

The Roman Catholic doctrine of Mary is a classic example of the gradual *development of doctrine. From the nineteenth century the development has accelerated, stimulated by alleged appearances of Mary at Lourdes, Fatima and elsewhere. Some Catholics were hoping that the Second *Vatican Council (1962–5) would further the process by proclaiming Mary 'CoRedemptrix' (Co-Redeemer with Christ), but others felt that the greater need was to curb the excesses of popular piety. The first group wanted a separate document on Mary, but by a tiny majority the Council voted instead to devote to her a chapter of the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church. The decision to view Mary as a member of the church was itself a significant moderating step. But the document reaffirms all of the traditional Marian doctrines, albeit with certain qualifications. The aim was 'carefully and equally [to] avoid the falsity of exaggeration on the one hand, and the excess of narrow-mindedness on the other' (67). (Here and hereafter numbers in brackets refer to the sections of ch. 8 of the Constitution.)

The Eastern Orthodox view of Mary is similar, with two main qualifications. The Orthodox are hesitant about the doctrine of Mary's immaculate conception and incline towards rejecting it. They also object in principle to the Roman Catholic elevation of these beliefs and practices to the status of dogmas.

Theotokos (53, 61, 66)

In Luke 1:43 Mary is called 'the mother of my Lord'. In the early Alexandrian tradition this was made more explicit by the term theotokos ('one who gave birth to God', traditionally translated 'mother of God'). The initial concern was *Christological, not Mariological, to affirm the deity of Christ and the reality of the incarnation. At the Council of Antioch in 325 the term was used to state the deity of Christ, in opposition to *Arius. In the next century *Nestorius attacked the term (preferring Christotokos). As a consequence, theotokos was affirmed by the Council of Ephesus in 431 as a safeguard against *adoptionism. Thus far the concern was Christological, although Nestorius did, in a sermon, warn his hearers to 'beware lest you make the Virgin a goddess'. This warning was timely in that the cult of Mary burgeoned during the Middle Ages. She came to be seen as Queen of Heaven, a title that enjoys no favour in Scripture (Jer. 7:18; 44:17–19, 25). She was increasingly venerated with a worship (hyperdoulia, Gk hyperdouleia) above that offered to other saints (doulia, Gk douleia) but below that offered to God (latreia).

Mediatrix (60–62)

In the Middle Ages the practice grew of praying to *saints. Mary became especially popular. There was a tendency to see Jesus Christ as stern and unapproachable, and so the faithful were directed to Mary as a sympathetic figure who could *mediate between the believer and Christ. This view of Mary as mediatrix was forcefully stated in 1891 by Pope Leo XIII in an encyclical: 'Nothing is bestowed on us except through Mary, as God himself wills. Therefore as no one can draw near to the supreme Father except through the Son, so also one can scarcely draw near to the Son except through his mother.' The Second Vatican Council reaffirms Mary's role as mediatrix, but states that it should be so understood as 'neither [to] take away from nor [to] add anything to the dignity and efficacy of Christ the one mediator' (62; cf. 60, where 1 Tim. 2:5–6 is quoted).

Immaculate conception (59)

By the beginning of the Middle Ages it had come to be believed that Mary had lived without *sin. But when had she been delivered from sin? *Anselm held that she was born with original sin (Cur Deus Homo? 2:16). *Bernard of Clairvaux held that she was conceived with original sin but purified before birth (Ep. 174). This view was also held by *Thomas Aquinas and the *Dominican school. It was *Duns Scotus who popularized the idea that Mary was conceived without original sin. This new idea did not meet with universal acceptance, and Pope Sixtus IV in 1485 and the Council of *Trent (see *Roman Catholic theology) in 1546 both left the matter undecided. But eventually Duns Scotus' view prevailed, and in 1854 Pope Pius IX proclaimed it a dogma in his bull Ineffabilis Deus: 'We declare, pronounce and define that the most blessed Virgin Mary, at the first instant of her conception was preserved immaculate from all stain of original sin, by the singular grace and privilege of the omnipotent God, in virtue of the merits of Jesus Christ, the saviour of mankind, and that this doctrine was revealed by God and therefore must be believed firmly and constantly by all the faithful.'

This doctrine was proclaimed on the basis of the unanimity of the contemporary church. There was no scriptural basis for it. It was asserted that this doctrine had always been held in the church as a revealed doctrine. But this is not so much an appeal to tradition (which does not support the doctrine) as the triumph of dogma over tradition. The definition of the immaculate conception is rightly seen as a 'trial run' for the doctrine of papal infallibility, to be defined sixteen years later at the First Vatican Council.

Assumption (59)

In the fourth century there arose the legend that Mary had been assumed into heaven, like Enoch and Elijah in the OT. During the early Middle Ages it came to be generally believed. From the seventh century there was pressure for its definition as a dogma, and this finally took place in 1950. Pope Pius XII defined it in his apostolic constitution, Munificentissimus Deus: 'Since [Jesus Christ] was able to do [Mary] so great an honour as to keep her safe from the corruption of the tomb, we must believe that he actually did so . . . The majestic mother of God . . . finally achieved, as the supreme crown of her privileges, that she should be preserved immune from the corruption of the tomb and, like her Son before her, having conquered death should be carried up, in body and soul, to the celestial glory of heaven, there to reign as Queen at the right hand of her Son, the immortal king of the ages.'

Again, the basis for the definition is said to be its theological suitability and the consensus of the contemporary Roman Catholic Church. It should be noted that the doctrine concerns more than an (alleged) episode in Mary's personal history. It is the basis for belief in her as Queen of Heaven and as mediatrix.

Co-Redemptrix

Some had hoped that Mary would be proclaimed 'Co-Redemptrix' at the Second Vatican Council, but this did not happen. But while the term was avoided, the concept is clearly stated. Mary plays a (subsidiary) role in Christ's work of redemption. The incarnation could not occur without Mary's permission or 'fiat' (Luke 1:38). Mary 'gave life to the world' (53); 'Death through Eve, life through Mary' (56). She suffered grievously with Christ at the cross and 'lovingly consented to the immolation of this Victim which she herself had brought forth' (58). She 'was united with [Christ] in suffering as he died on the cross' and co-operated 'in the Saviour's work of restoring supernatural life to souls' (61).

Mother of the church (53f., 61f.)

At the Second Vatican Council Mary is seen both as 'a preeminent and altogether singular member of the church' and as the mother of all Christians (53). While the Constitution does not actually refer to her as 'mother of the church', Pope Paul VI used the title in promulgating the document in 1964.

Protestants as a whole reject these doctrines. While the *virgin birth is scriptural and while theotokos can be seen as an affirmation of the biblical doctrine of the incarnation, the other Marian doctrines are seen as a classic example of the bad development of doctrine, of the way in which unscriptural if not pagan devotional practices can become dogmas. They can be seen as a striking proof of the need to test all doctrine by *Scripture and of the dangers of making ecclesiastical tradition infallible.

See also: SCRIPTURE AND TRADITION.

Bibliography

D. Attwater, A Dictionary of Mary (London, New York and Toronto, 1956); H. Graef, Mary: A History of Doctrine and Devotion, 2 vols. (London and New York, 1963 and 1965); G. Miegge, The Virgin Mary (London, 1955); P. F. Palmer, Mary in the Documents of the Church (London, 1953); M. Warner, Alone of All Her Sex: The Myth and Cult of the Virgin Mary (London, 1976); D. F. Wright (ed.), Chosen by God: Mary in Evangelical Perspective (London, 1989).

A. N. S. LANE

MASCALL, ERIC, see ANGLO-CATHOLIC THEOLOGY; THOMISM AND NEO-THOMISM

MATERIALISM

Materialism is the doctrine that whatever exists is either physical matter, or depends upon physical matter. Thus stated, the doctrine is vague enough to have had numerous expressions, from the materialism of Democritus (c. 460–c. 370 BC) and Epicureanism, in which everything is reducible to the movements of atoms, to the mechanical materialism of Thomas Hobbes (1588–1679) and the physicalism both of *logical positivism and the dialectical materialism of Karl *Marx. Besides being a philosophical position with definite ontological explanations (the denial of the existence of minds or spirits), materialism may also be regarded as a research programme and research methodology with no such implications.

Materialism is opposed both by forms of mind-body *dualism (e.g. that of *Descartes) and by a more general anti-reductionism, which warns that although the universe has a materialistic aspect, it is invalid to conclude that it is 'nothing but' matter. At first glance the biblical stress on humanity as part of the creation may seem hospitable to a wholly material *creation, but the biblical doctrine of personal continuity after bodily death (2 Cor. 5:1–10) appears to rule this out (see *Immortality; *Intermediate state).

'Materialism' may also refer to an ethical outlook which regards the only worthwhile pursuit to be that of wealth and sensual gratification, but there is no logical connection between the philosophical doctrine of materialism and this ethical stance.

Bibliography

P. K. Mowser and J. D. Trout (eds.), Contemporary Materialism: A Reader (London, 1995); J. R. Smythies (ed.), Brain and Mind (London, 1965); R. C. Vitzthum, Materialism: An Affirmative History and Definition (Amherst, NY, 1995).

P. HELM

MATHER, COTTON (1663–1728)

Grandson of John Cotton and son of Increase *Mather, Cotton Mather represented two leading *Puritan families in America. Serving with his father in the ministry at Old North Church in Boston, Cotton Mather's theology and life is well represented in his writing, since he produced hundreds of books and pamphlets.

Several examples of his diverse writings are representative of the challenge of categorizing this man. In Memorable Providences Relating to Witchcraft and Possessions (1689), Mather described his pastoral work with a young woman who recovered slowly from apparent demonic possession. Later, despite some private reservations about the legal proceedings surrounding the Salem witchcraft cases, he also wrote The Wonders of the Invisible World (1692), which at times defends the judges of the trials. Mather is often viewed in an entirely negative light because of this association.

However, Mather is not easily stereotyped, as his incredible scientific abilities demonstrate (e.g. his early use and advocacy of smallpox inoculations, plant hybridization, and astronomical views). Elected into the fellowship of the Royal Society in 1713, Puritans like Mather believed their positive utilization of science was the natural outgrowth of their theology.

Mather's other works include his massive Magnalia Christi Americana (1702, which told of God's providential leading many from Europe to establish Christian New England) and the well-known Bonifacius: Essays to Do Good (1710; though mocked early on by the young Benjamin Franklin, it was later praised by him). His Manuductio ad Ministerium (1726) was an often-used text for seminarians preparing for ministry. Reading his Diary (repr., 1957) shows the warm-hearted side of a man who found the German Lutheran *Pietism of August Herman Francke appealing.

Bibliography

D. Levin, Cotton Mather: The Young Life of the Lord's Remembrancer (Cambridge, 1978); R. Lovelace, The American Pietism of Cotton Mather (Grand Rapids, 1979); R. Middlekauf, The Mathers: Three Generations of Puritan Intellectuals, 1596–1728 (New York, 1971); K. Silverman, The Life and Times of Cotton Mather (New York, 1984); B. Wendell, Cotton Mather: The Puritan Priest (repr. New York, 1963); M. P. Winship, Seers of God: Puritan Providentialism in the Restoration and Early Enlightenment (Baltimore, 1996).

K. M. KAPIC

MATHER, INCREASE (1639–1723)

Known as one of the leading American *Puritans, Increase Mather was a graduate of Harvard (1656) and completed his MA at Trinity College in Dublin (1658). Eventually he returned to Boston where he served in ministry for nearly sixty years at Old North Church (1664–1723). During this time he also functioned as president of Harvard College (1685–1701).

Publishing over 130 books and pamphlets, Mather's writings covered numerous topics, including theology, science, politics and history. As a leading churchman, he was also deeply involved in political affairs. For example, at one point he travelled to England and stayed for four years, representing concerns regarding the Massachusetts charter.

As his life progressed his rhetoric against what he saw as the spiritual decline among the people of New England grew. Although originally opposing any relaxing of the requirements for baptism, eventually he ended up defending the Half-Way Covenant (see *New England theology). Nevertheless, he always encouraged the people to look to previous generations for examples of faithfulness.

During the Salem trials of 1692 he ended up warning against the manner in which people were being found guilty. In Cases of Conscience Concerning Evil Spirits, 1693, he cautions against accepting 'spectral evidence'. Using his influence, especially among leaders like Governor Phips, he helped finally end the growing chaos and executions.

He and his wife Maria Cotton (daughter of the eminent John Cotton) had ten children; among them was their firstborn, Cotton *Mather.

Bibliography

M. Hall, Increase Mather: The Last American Puritan (Middletown, 1988); M. I. Lowance, Jr, Increase Mather (New York, 1974); C. Mather, Parentator: Memoirs of . . . Increase Mather (London, 1725); I. Mather, The Autobiography of Increase Mather, ed. M. G. Hall (repr. Worcester, 1962); R. Middlekauf, The Mathers: Three Generations of Puritan Intellectuals, 1596–1728 (New York, 1971); K. B. Murdock, Increase Mather: The Foremost American Puritan (Cambridge, 1925).

K. M. KAPIC

MAURICE, F. D., see CHRISTIAN SOCIALISM

MEDIATION

Literally, mediation is the function or condition of coming between two parties for the purpose of encounter, transaction or reconciliation. In Christian thought it pertains both (legitimately) to Christ's supreme interposition between God and man, and (illegitimately) to the active ministry of other heavenly or earthly intermediaries.

The principle of mediation is common to any of the world's religions, as various religious mediators (e.g. priests, medicinemen, rain-makers, sorcerers) interpose with supernatural or natural powers between a transcendent order (and often an offended deity) and a terrestrial realm (and offending earthly party). The OT describes a multiplicity of 'mediations' and mediators, e.g. the patriarchs, Moses, judges, prophets, kings, and Levitical priests. Fundamentally, a twofold pattern of mediation exists: the prophetic (manward), in which an appointed agent reveals, proclaims and interprets God's will to people; and the priestly (Godward), in which God is approached, reconciled and besought on man's behalf by an appointed representative. This pattern of mediation is consummated in Christ. He is both the consummation of antecedent mediation and the redefinition of mediation.

The Christian faith centres on the person and work of Christ as mediator. The NT presents Christ's unique mediatorship directly and indirectly. He is directly declared to be 'the one mediator (mesitēs) between God and men' (1 Tim. 2:5), and the mediator of a new and better covenant. He is indirectly portrayed, in his person and work, as the unique intermediary, the principle of cosmic unity, who in himself not only fulfils a prophetic ministry of revelation, proclamation and interpretation of God's will, but also a 'priestly' ministry of approach, reconciliation of sinful man to God by sacrifice, perpetual intercession and heavenly blessing. The NT portrays Christ's mediation as both an active function (as the agent of salvation) and a static condition (uniting in himself God and man, heaven and earth). Both strands have at times come to the fore in subsequent Christian reflection.

Patristic and *scholastic thought emphasized Christ's static mediation as the God-man as the basis or prerequisite of his active mediation of *salvation though his death, resurrection and exaltation, and Eastern Orthodox thought has usually followed this line, placing greater stress on the *incarnation in this connection than the West has usually done. *Thomas Aquinas, somewhat artificially, located Christ's mediation in his taking of perfect manhood, which distinguished him both from God and sinful humanity. The Protestant Reformers reaffirmed Christ's active salvific mediatory work, and *Reformed theology expounded Christ's person and work as mediator in terms of his threefold 'office' as prophet, priest and king (see *Offices of Christ). In addition, against medieval Roman Catholic sacerdotalism, the Reformers affirmed the *uniqueness, finality and permanence of Christ's mediation. Most later Protestant tradition has repudiated both an official human priestly caste, with the power to forgive sin (in absolution) and to offer *sacrifice (in the *Eucharist), and additional heavenly intermediaries (e.g. *Mary and the *saints), stressing rather the perfection of Christ's atoning sacrifice and continual intercession, and the priestly prerogative of access for all believers in Christ (see *Ministry; *Priesthood of believers). At the Second *Vatican Council, Roman Catholicism explicitly reaffirmed Christ as 'the one Mediator', although its adherence to a human derivative priesthood, co-operative with Christ, the great High Priest, an outlook largely shared by Orthodox and High Anglicans, continues to present a stumbling-block to many Protestants, especially in non-English-speaking areas.

Bibliography

L. Berkhof, Systematic Theology (London, 1969); E. Brunner, The Mediator (London, 1934); J. Calvin, Institutes II.xii-xv; A. Oepke in TDNT IV, pp. 598–624; T. F. Torrance, The Mediation of Christ (Colorado Springs, new edn, 1992).

C. D. HANCOCK

MELANCHTHON, PHILIPP (1497–1560)

Born in Bretten, Germany, a grand-nephew of the humanist Johannes Reuchlin (1455–1522), Melanchthon was a child prodigy and became a Protestant Reformer. His scholarly output started when he was only seventeen and was admired by *Erasmus as early as 1515. At this stage he was a humanist. In 1518 he came to Wittenberg to be professor of Greek. He quickly absorbed *Reformation theology, and this, together with his brilliance both as a scholar and as a teacher, ensured that he was much admired by *Luther. In 1521 he produced the first edition of his Loci Communes (Commonplaces) which developed throughout his life as a Lutheran dogmatic textbook.

Melanchthon was more a scholar than a man of action and displayed weaknesses when faced with situations of conflict. When he was confronted by the demands of *Karlstadt and the Zwickau prophets (see *Reformation, Radical) for a very radical and rapid reform of Wittenberg in 1521–22, he proved incapable of providing the strong leadership that was necessary. Despite this, supported by Luther, he exercised an important influence on the Colloquy of Marburg (1529) and drew up the *Augsburg Confession (1530) and the accompanying Apology (1531). The Augsburg documents were highly significant for the Reformation, and Melanchthon's temperament and skills were well suited to their irenic objectives. These skills were again demonstrated at the Colloquy of Regensburg (1541) when Melanchthon and *Bucer and Catholic representatives including John Eck (1486–1543) and Gasparo *Contarini reached agreement on *justification without being able to persuade their respective sides of its appropriateness. Typically, Melanchthon signed the Schmalkaldic Articles (1537) with the proviso that if the pope would allow the gospel he would concede him superiority over the bishops.

Throughout Luther's life Melanchthon declined to involve himself as fully in theology as Luther desired. He never, for example, took his doctorate in theology. He was, however, an independent thinker. On the *Eucharist he leaned towards *Calvin, on *predestination and free will more towards Erasmus and on *justification towards a more forensic view than that of Luther. When Luther died (1546), Melanchthon was his natural successor. He could not quite cope with the task. He compromised with the Catholics after the Protestant defeat in 1548 by accepting the Leipzig Interim which in effect allowed Protestant theology but required Roman Catholic ritual. This degree of compromise undermined his authority and, for the remainder of his life, he was involved in a series of conflicts within Lutheranism; with Andreas *Osiander over justification, with Nicholas von Amsdorf (1483–1565) over predestination and with a variety of Lutherans over the Lord's Supper. He died praying for deliverance from the 'fury of the theologians'. He was very widely learned and retained his humanistic interests. He was a most significant educational reformer, making an important contribution to university and school education in Germany.

Assessments of Melanchthon vary. He can be interpreted as a figure somewhat alien to the true direction of the Reformation. However, in an age which recoils, as Melanchthon did, from some of Luther's most vehement polemic, Melanchthon stands as a rational, moderate, ecumenical figure, more able than Luther to find rapprochement and to look for a middle way.

Bibliography

Works: ET of Loci Communes (1521) in W. Pauck, Melanchthon and Bucer, LCC 19 (London, 1969); Melanchthon on Christian Doctrine: Loci Communes 1555, tr. C. L. Manschreck (Oxford, 1965).

Studies: E. W. Gritsch, A History of Lutheranism (Minneapolis, 2002); N. Kurovka, Melanchthon (Tübingen, 2010); C. L. Manschreck, Melanchthon, the Quiet Reformer (New York, 1968); R. Stupperich, Melanchthon (ET, London, 1966); T. J. Wengert, Philip Melanchthon, Speaker of the Reformation: Wittenberg's Other Reformer (Farnham, 2010).

C. P. WILLIAMS

MENNONITE THEOLOGY

The roots of Mennonite theology are to be found in sixteenth-century Dutch, German and Swiss *Anabaptism. Menno Simons, Pilgram Marpeck (c. 1495–1556), Conrad Grebel (c. 1498–1526) and others provided the theological inspiration for the movement which later took the name Mennonite from its major Dutch leader, Menno Simons (1496–1561). Historically, the Mennonite tradition has assumed the substance, if not always the authority, of the early Christian *creeds. Confessionally – in statements of faith, doctrinal writings, *catechisms, sermons, hymns, devotional literature and worship – it has stressed scriptural themes often omitted in the historic creeds and *confessions, especially Christ's way of suffering love, the life of Christian discipleship and obedience (see *Christian life), and the nature of the believers' *church as separated from the world. Moreover, it has also affirmed the triune understanding of God, the substitutionary atoning death and exemplary nature of Christ's life, sin as a voluntary act of disobedience, human accountability for faithfulness in the Christian life, the return of Christ and the primacy of Scripture for all theological reflection.

The doctrine of the church is the most central theme in Mennonite theology. Its hallmarks are *regeneration, holy living, believers' baptism, the Lord's Supper, footwashing, church *discipline, nonconformity, integrity, non-resistance (see *Pacifism), religious liberty and the separation of church and *state.

In the course of its migrations, in both Europe and the Americas, the Mennonite movement came under the influence of *pietism. The effects were frequently beneficial and revitalizing, especially in regard to mission and to the personal dimensions of salvation. The experience-oriented pietism, however, also tended to erode Mennonite theological distinctives pertaining to Christian discipleship and ethics.

Mennonites sympathized with the *fundamentalist struggle against modernism, but did not formally join those ranks, even though certain sectors were strongly influenced by it. In general, Mennonite theology has been conservative and *evangelical. *Liberal theology has not had a great impact on Mennonite thought in North America and most other continents, although common *ethical interests are more evident in recent times. During the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, however, most of the Dutch and many of the North German Mennonites turned towards liberalism. Their assimilation into mainstream European culture also meant the abandonment of many traditional doctrinal positions. Some theological renewal has taken place since the Second World War. Today, Mennonite theology in northern Europe is more ecumenical in its interests.

The development of the Mennonite theological tradition can be characterized by the struggle for greater confessional unity (seventeenth and eighteenth centuries), the quest for religious and cultural stability (eighteenth to early twentieth centuries) and, more recently, a search for theological identity (twentieth century). Since the Second World War, Mennonite theology and ethics have explored their sixteenth-century roots in the *Radical Reformation. This 'recovery of the Anabaptist vision' has sought to recapture the biblical-ethical emphasis in discipleship, ecclesiology and non-resistance, the challenge of social responsibility and the nature of Mennonite theological identity as it relates to Mennonite ethnocentrism, cultural pluralism, contemporary evangelicalism and historic Anabaptism.

Representing the free-church tradition, Mennonite faith and life have contributed to an understanding of the church as a covenant community of faithful believers. Its greatest internal challenge today is the quest for theological identity and the integration of its ecclesiology with the changing relationship of the church to society.

See also: YODER, JOHN HOWARD.

Bibliography

H. S. Bender et al. (eds.), The Mennonite Encyclopedia, vols. I–IV (Scottsdale, 1955–1959); L. Driedger and D. B. Kraybill, Mennonite Peacemaking: From Quietism to Activism (Scottsdale, 1994); C. J. Dyck (ed.), An Introduction to Mennonite History (Scottsdale, 1967); H. J. Loewen, One Lord, One Faith, One Hope and One God: Mennonite Confessions of Faith in North America – An Introduction (Newton, 1985); J. D. Weaver, Keeping Salvation Ethical: Mennonite and Amish Atonement Theology in the Late Nineteenth Century (Scottsdale, 1997).

H. J. LOEWEN

MERCERSBURG THEOLOGY

A movement named after the small town in central Pennsylvania where in the nineteenth century the theological school of the German Reformed Church was located. From 1844, under the direction of John W. Nevin (1803–86), formerly an Old School Presbyterian theologian (see *Princeton theology), and Philip Schaff (1819–93), a young historian from Germany, the school attempted to provide a classical Calvinist alternative to what it perceived to be the decline of American New England and Princeton Calvinism (see *Edwards, Jonathan; *New England theology; *New Haven theology; *Reformed theology) into ‘Puritan’ revivalist subjectivism. Emphasis was placed on the ecumenical *Christological theology of the ancient church (see *Creeds), the significance of the institutional *church with its *sacraments, *ministry and catechetical method, and the organic development of that church throughout history.

Its theological thrust may be regarded as the American counterpart of English *Anglo-Catholicism and German high-church *Lutheranism in the same period, reflecting the philosophical shift from the subjectivism of *Kant and *Schleiermacher to historical and corporate expressions of reality in *Hegel and *Ritschl, which in Germany must be seen against the background of evangelical *pietism.

In much evangelical piety, the reality of personal salvation had made denominational, *confessional and particularly sacramental concerns substantially irrelevant. Heaven will be populated with representatives from all confessions, it was said. The important issue was not *baptism or church membership, but whether one had made a personal commitment to Christ. While awakenings divided denominations, their adherents regarded them as unifying true believers. Nevertheless, within the American context, the multiplicity of denominations seemed to conflict with the unity experienced in the awakenings (see *Revival).

Resolutions to this tension were varied. Princeton theologians ordinarily considered Calvinism as the most consistent expression of awakening theology. *Methodists and others expressed themselves similarly. Others thought it necessary to repudiate all existing denominations and ‘restore’ the primitive church, now possible in a time of ‘latter-day’ blessing (as in the Church of Christ, the Adventists and the Latter Day Saints; see *Sects).

Mercersburg’s response was to see the Reformed church as the embodiment of the Protestant and ecumenical church. This was seen not as sectarian, but rather as an expression of a developing church with its roots in history. This led to the repudiation of the innovative conversion experience in favour of catechetical instruction (Nevin’s Anxious Bench), and to an emphasis on the real presence of Christ in the Lord’s Supper (see *Eucharist) in the place of revivalist subjectivism. (American Calvinism’s view of the Supper had to some extent weakened into naive *Zwinglianism, and Nevin’s understanding of the Reformed sacramental heritage was more accurate than that of Charles *Hodge.) Renewed interest in Reformed liturgy and the nature of the ministerial office was also characteristic. Following the lead of German research into Calvinism, Mercersburg concluded that a *Melancthonian lack of interest in the divine decrees and rejection of reprobation (see *Predestination) was more typical of Calvinism than the New England and Princeton direction. Perhaps that was encouraged by the way it considered *Puritanism to have misused election.

While Mercersburg produced helpful insights and correctives in a confusing period in American church history, it did not provide lasting direction. Its ecumenical stance was seen to be too sympathetic towards Roman Catholicism, and it failed to give substantial leadership in the emerging arena of biblical authority (see *Fundamentalism; *Scripture). Nevertheless, questions about the value of confessions and sacraments in a pluriform American evangelical community are still present, and Mercersburg’s answers may still be studied with profit.

Bibliography

L. J. DeBie, Speculative Theology and Common-Sense Religion: Mercersburg and the Conservative Roots of American Religion (Eugene, 2008); D. G. Hart, John Williamson Nevin: High-Church Calvinist (Philadelphia, 2005); W. B. Litteljohn, The Mercersburg Theology and the Quest for Reformed Catholicity (Eugene, 2009); G. A. Mast, The Eucharistic Service of the Catholic Apostolic Church and

Its Influence on Reformed Liturgical Renewals of the Nineteenth Century (Metuchen, 1998); J. H. Nichols, Romanticism in American Theology (Chicago, 1961); idem (ed.), The Mercersburg Theology (New York, 1966).

D. C. DAVIS

MERIT

Merit is that quality of a good action which entitles the agent who performs it to a reward. In the history of Christian theology, how to conceive of human merit has led to particular controversy in connection with the questions of *justification and *salvation.

In the time of *Augustine, controversy arose with regard to the teaching of *Pelagius. Pelagius had an optimistic view of human freedom, believing that God had given the Christian the gifts of the capacity to choose freely how to act and of the guidance of the Scriptures. With these gracious gifts and without further assistance, the Christian could perform good actions and merit divine grace. For Augustine, however, this view meant that grace would no longer be grace. By contrast, Augustine believed that an individual was justified and saved not by the merit of works but by the free *grace of God.

The later, medieval view of merit is perhaps best represented by a figure such as *Thomas Aquinas. Aquinas accepted Augustine's starting point that the Christian could not merit justifying grace, and noted that any human merit before God could only exist on the presupposition that God had ordained it. Moreover, he believed that if Christians did what they ought, by the grace of God but also through their own free will, then they merited reward. He distinguished two types of merit: condign merit, which was a matter of strict justice between God and those in a state of grace, by which God was (freely) bound to reward a good work; and congruent merit, which reflected God's generous character as he rewarded the acts of those who did not satisfy the strict conditions for merit. For Aquinas, insofar as a good work proceeded from the grace of the *Holy Spirit, it would merit eternal life condignly, while insofar as a good work proceeded from an act of the free will, it would merit eternal life congruently. Meanwhile, Aquinas also believed that the saints of the church had performed meritorious good works beyond what was required of them, and that their resultant merits, together with those of Jesus Christ, were part of the property of the church and could be dispensed accordingly.

At the time of the Reformation, Martin *Luther and John *Calvin wrote vehemently against this conception of merit. The Reformers agreed that grace and salvation were made possible through the merit which Jesus Christ had graciously obtained through his obedient life and death (see *Reformation theology): that sinless life and death of Jesus Christ, as *Anselm had already observed, was so excellent and so glorious as to make not only ample but infinite satisfaction for the sins of the world. The Reformers also agreed that a Christian could not perform good works without the grace of God. However, the Reformers insisted that a Christian could not in any way merit either grace – for herself or for others – or eternal life by her works. The grace of justification came to the Christian only by faith in Jesus Christ, and the resultant righteousness was alien and extrinsic and thus not meritorious. This latter point served theologically to divide the *Roman Catholic Church – which stated its views at the Council of *Trent – from the Reformation churches on this issue. For the former, the justification of the individual involved an intrinsic change in the individual by an infusion of divine grace, such that the resultant good works were done not only through the grace of God but also through the co-operation of the free will of the agent, and thus to that agent's merit. For the latter, however, justifying grace did not effect any internal righteousness in the Christian, and thus good works brought forth by grace were to be ascribed to God alone and not to that person's merit.

The issue lay dormant for many years, but re-emerged in the late twentieth century in ecumenical discussion between Roman Catholics and *Lutherans. The discussion concluded that many antitheses might be overcome if the term 'merit' were considered in the light of its biblical meaning of 'wage' or 'reward'. However, the resultant Joint Declaration did not attempt this, nor did it resolve the issue of the meritorious value (or otherwise) of good works.

Bibliography

Anselm, 'Cur Deus Homo?' in Basic Writings (Indianapolis, 2007); Augustine, 'On the Grace of Christ and on Original Sin', in Basic Writings of Saint Augustine, vol. 1 (New York, 1948); M. Luther, Lectures on Galatians – 1535 (St Louis, 1963); J. Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion, vol. 3 (Louisville, 2001); The Canons and Decrees of the Council of Trent, Session 6 [1547] (Rockford, 1982); Lutheran World Federation and the Catholic Church, 'Joint Declaration on the Doctrine of Justification' (Grand Rapids, 2000); M. Root, 'Aquinas, Merit, and Reformation Theology after the Joint Declaration on the Doctrine of Justification', MT 20, 2004, pp. 5–22; Thomas Aquinas, Summa Theologiae, vol. 30 (Cambridge, 2006).

P. T. NIMMO

MERTON, THOMAS (1915–68)

Merton, an American Trappist-Cistercian monk, helped to shape post-Second Vatican Council Catholic, ecumenical and interfaith spirituality. His acclaimed autobiography, The Seven Storey Mountain (New York and London, 1948), recounts his early life. He was born in France to artist parents, schooled in Europe, orphaned at fifteen, landed on Long Island at eighteen to live with relatives, completed studies at Columbia University, converted to Catholicism and, in 1941, entered Gethsemani Abbey, Kentucky, taking the monastic name Louis. Poet, essayist, teacher of novices, letter-writer, literary and social critic, his life and diverse writings attest to the relevance of monasticism to a world undergoing significant turmoil and change. Rooted in the True Self (the Christ within) and the ascetical discipline of his monastic community, he branched outward to embrace increasingly diverse others, modelling contemplation as both withdrawal from and engagement with others. His move in 1965 to a hermitage on the monastery grounds increased his ability to receive leaders of the American civil rights, peace and ecumenical movements. A 1968 trip to Asia to dialogue with Buddhist monks established him as a bridge-builder among world religions. His accidental death there (Thailand) has not diminished his continuing influence as a Christian who reflected God's mercy in making room for 'the other'.

See also: ASCETICISM AND MONASTICISM.

Bibliography

Works: New Seeds of Contemplation (New York, 1961); Conjectures of a Guilty Bystander

(Garden City, 1966); N. Burton, J. Laughlin and P. Hart (eds.), The Asian Journal of Thomas Merton (New York, 1973); L. S. Cunningham (ed.), Thomas Merton: Spiritual Master: The Essential Writings (New York, 1992); P. Hart and J. Montaldo (eds.), The Intimate Merton: His Life from His Journals (New York, 1999).

Studies: J. J. Harford, Merton and Friends: A Joint Biography of Thomas Merton, Robert Lax, and Edward Rice (New York and London, 2006); G. Kilcourse, Ace of Freedoms: Thomas Merton's Christ (Notre Dame, 1993); W. H. Shannon, Thomas Merton: An Introduction (Cincinnati, 2005).

D. S. HARDY

METAPHYSICS

Metaphysics may be defined as the attempt to work out the most basic structure of reality, not by observation and experiment, as in science, but by systematic and critical thought, seeking to analyse, test and connect such concepts as 'cause', 'quality', 'matter', 'mind' and 'event'. Metaphysicians may simply try to describe the form taken by our normal thought about the world when set out systematically; or, more often, to revise and improve on this, and, it may be, to demonstrate a reality behind the appearances. In the former class might be found such thinkers as Aristotle, Locke and perhaps Thomas Aquinas, in addition to some twentieth-century thinkers such as Sir Peter Strawson (1919–2006); in the latter class, Plato, Spinoza, Leibniz, Berkeley and Hume. Most metaphysicians have of course included elements of both these approaches; and some might hold, with R. G. Collingwood (1889–1943), that as the presuppositions of our thought vary over the years, even the first kind of metaphysics needs constant revision.

Metaphysicians have at times made spectacular claims: to show, for instance, that time is an illusion; that the whole of existence forms a single unity, all else being at best only partially real; that mind and matter are both constructed out of a more basic 'neutral stuff'; or, more relevantly to the Christian, that reason can prove or disprove the existence of God or of the human soul. The frequent conflict between these claims, and the failure of metaphysicians to convince one another, have cast some suspicion on the whole enterprise. Indeed, a number of philosophers have thought that metaphysics may be in principle impossible, except perhaps in our first sense, the description rather than the revision of our normal thought. Thus *Kant argued that the ‘categories’ which made science (and experience generally) possible, such as unity, limitation, substance and cause, are not part of reality in itself, but only conditions of our experiencing of it. They cannot therefore be used to go beyond that which we experience, to argue, for example, that the world is or is not limited in extent or duration, or that it was or was not created and caused by a god. More recently, the *logical positivism of the 1920s and 1930s argued that metaphysical claims had no real meaning at all. Since they did not provide any way for us to test whether they were true or false, how could they be said to assert anything? To the Christian believer, this was a more disturbing criticism than Kant’s; for he had left it possible (and indeed himself believed) that the reality of God might be known by faith, though not proved by reason, whereas it was now argued that all metaphysical propositions, including those which Christians would wish to make, were totally meaningless and asserted nothing at all that could even be believed in faith.

Accordingly, some philosophers have seen metaphysics not as a system of factual assertions, but as a way of seeing and interpreting the world; while others have retained some metaphysical arguments as analyses of our concepts, while abandoning hope of any all-inclusive system. A number, however, remained obstinate. They could reply that as they were seeking the necessary structure of any world, it was absurd to demand that particular features of the world prove or disprove the reality of this structure; and that if it was legitimate to analyse concepts like time or cause, it was also legitimate to see whether, for instance, there were contradictions in the idea of time, or whether belief in causes should entail belief in a first cause, God.

Some metaphysical systems, such as those of *Hegel or Spinoza, were explicitly offered as substitutes for (and improvements on) traditional religious beliefs. Others, such as those of Thomas Aquinas, *Descartes or Leibniz, while avowedly Christian, claimed that human reasoning was able to prove such religious truths as the reality and goodness of God, and so seemed, to some, to depreciate *revelation (see *Natural theology). Accordingly, some theologians have wished to repudiate metaphysics altogether. And clearly there is no need for Christians to construct a metaphysical system, or accept an existing one. But many Christian concepts and beliefs involve metaphysical assertions, even when they are not argued for by metaphysical methods: the ideas of *creation, *miracle, spirit, revelation, *grace and, above all, of *God, all carry implications about the structure of reality, and may well need metaphysics, not for their discovery, but for explanation and defence. It seems a mistake therefore for the theologian to reject metaphysics completely. The truth of Christianity surely implies that some metaphysical systems (e.g. *atheist or *materialist ones) are false, and this suggests that some system – perhaps known only to God – is true; unless, indeed, with a few extreme radicals, we abandon the idea of supernatural truths and reduce Christianity to a way of life (while repudiating much of the beliefs and teaching of the Christ who founded that way). Whether in fact reason (with or without the aid of God’s revelation given to us) is adequate to work out the fundamental nature of reality can only be found out in practice.

See also: FAITH AND REASON; PHILOSOPHY OF RELIGION.

Bibliography

A. J. Ayer, The Central Questions of Philosophy (London, 1973); B. Blanshard, Reason and Analysis (London, 1962); C. D. Broad, ‘Critical and Speculative Philosophy’, in J. H. Muirhead (ed.), Contemporary British Philosophy (London, 1924); R. G. Collingwood, An Essay on Metaphysics (London, 1940); R. M. Gale, The Blackwell Guide to Metaphysics (Oxford, 2002); E. E. Harris, The Restitution of Metaphysics (New York, 2000); I. Kant, Prolegomena to any Future Metaphysics (ET, Manchester, 1957); J. Kim and E. Sosa (eds.), A Companion to Metaphysics (Malden, MA, 2000); idem (eds.), Metaphysics: An Anthology (Oxford, 1999); R. Le Poidevin et al. (eds.), The Routledge Companion to Metaphysics (New York, 2009); M. J. Loux, Metaphysics: A Contemporary Introduction, 3rd edn (London, 2006); E. J. Lowe, A Survey of Metaphysics (Oxford, 2002); J. McTaggart, ‘Introduction to the Study of Philosophy’, in his Philosophical Studies (London, 1934); D. F. Pears (ed.), The Nature of Metaphysics (London, 1957); W. H. Walsh, Metaphysics (London 1963).

R. L. STURCH

METEMPSYCHOSIS

Metempsychosis is (the belief in) the ‘transmigration of souls’, i.e. that human or animal souls pass through more than one bodily existence in this world. In some forms the reincarnation of human souls is restricted to human bodies, but in others may extend to animals (and hence its advocates are often also vegetarians). The purpose of metempsychosis is often presented as progressive purification or evolutionary development, which is not infrequently related to the view that the soul’s entry into bodily life is in some sense a punitive confinement, e.g. following a pre-existent or pre-cosmic fall.

Reincarnation is widely believed in Eastern religions such as *Buddhism and *Hinduism, and was taught by influential Gk traditions, especially Pythagoreanism, *Platonism and Neoplatonism. From such sources it was adopted by many *Gnostics (and hence by *Manichaeans and their later counterparts, the Cathari or *Albigenses). It was consequently much discussed by the early Church Fathers, normally with unqualified hostility, although they sometimes observed, for apologetic reasons, that it bore a partial similarity to the Christian belief in the resurrection of the body (cf. *Tertullian, Resurrection of the Flesh and The Soul), as too did the *Stoic doctrine of a cyclical succession of worlds.

Whether *Clement of Alexandria and *Origen espoused metempsychosis remains a matter of debate. Origen undoubtedly accepted the eternal pre-existence of souls (see *Soul, origin of), but may well have envisaged only a single bodily ‘incarnation’ (at least in this world). He certainly resisted any fatalist kind of reincarnation. If he did entertain it, he would have exploited it, like the soul’s pre-existence, apologetically, to help explain some of life’s apparent injustices and inequalities.

In later centuries, metempsychosis has found occasional advocates, e.g. among the Neoplatonists of the Italian Renaissance, in *Lessing, among spiritualists and theosophists, such as Emanuel Swedenborg (1688–1772; see *Sects) and Annie Besant (1847–1933), as well as among a few Christian thinkers of a liberal cast of mind.

The theory not only lacks biblical support but is also incompatible with central doctrines, such as the *resurrection of the body. It is also dependent on the notion, now largely abandoned by Christian theology, of the soul as a substance or essence different from the body (see *Anthropology).

Bibliography

Q. Howe, Jr, Reincarnation for the Christian (Philadelphia, 1974); G. MacGregor, Reincarnation as a Christian Hope (London, 1982).

Critique: M. Albrecht, Reincarnation: A Christian Appraisal (Downers Grove, 1982); R. A. Morey, Reincarnation and Christianity (Minneapolis, 1980).

D. F. WRIGHT

METHODISM

Methodism began as a renewal movement of religious societies within the Church of England, under the leadership of John *Wesley and his brother *Charles, during the evangelical revival of eighteenth-century Britain. Although the movement was united by a ‘catholic spirit’, early Methodism suffered various internal disputes over theology and practice; the most significant division was between followers of Wesley’s *Arminianism and the *Calvinism of George *Whitefield.

Methodism in America had its origins in Wesley’s own visit to Georgia, but grew through the ministry of early Methodist migrants and later missionaries sent by Wesley to direct the work. After the Revolutionary War, Wesley commissioned Thomas Coke and Francis *Asbury to preside over the emergence of Methodism as a separate church in America. Shortly after Wesley’s death, and against his intention, British Methodism also formally separated from the established church.

Subsequent divisions in British and American Methodism led to a variety of Methodist denominations, independent Methodist churches and other movements in the pan-Wesleyan family, such as the *Salvation Army, Free Methodists and Nazarenes. Prolific missionary activity through the nineteenth and twentieth centuries resulted in the spread of these Wesleyan traditions throughout the world. Those with roots in British Methodism are now largely independent communions, while those originating from American mission activity have retained their episcopal connection to United Methodism in America.

Wesleyan genes

The following are some Methodist family traits, having their origins in Wesley's theology and the practices of early Methodism. The founding constitutions of most Methodist denominations contain reference to Wesley's published Sermons and Notes upon the New Testament as standards of doctrine and theology.

Scriptural holiness

Wesley believed that the Methodist movement had been providentially raised up to spread 'scriptural holiness': that is, a way of discipleship summed up by love for God and neighbour, with Christian *perfection or 'perfect love' as its spiritual goal. Wesley's theological influences include patristic sources from East and West, Anglican divines, Catholic mystics and *Moravian pietists. Holiness is a way of love which encompasses heart and life, subsists in constant communion with God through the means of grace, and is founded upon the evangelical gifts of personal faith, new birth and the assurance of sins forgiven. It is both a 'relational', imputed righteousness that God has accomplished for us in Christ, bringing freedom from the guilt of sin (*justification); and a 'real', imparted righteousness that God accomplishes in us by the Spirit, bringing freedom from the power of sin (*sanctification). Methodist theology affirms the Reformation emphasis on justification by faith, but makes it the ground of sanctifying grace which denies the intractability of sin even in this life. For Wesley, sanctification is a gradual process of transformation, punctuated by the experience of perfect *love as an instantaneous gift. The doctrine of Christian perfection has invited a variety of interpretations and a good deal of controversy: including the sense in which it implies freedom from sin; whether it is a once-and-for-all state; and if it can be spoken of by those who have attained it.

Practical discipleship

Holy living is pursued by the means of *grace – both works of piety and works of mercy – by which justifying and sanctifying grace are communicated, and the responses of repentance and obedient faith are embodied. They constitute the whole of life as an arena for working out one's salvation: a life which combines personal spirituality, disciplined fellowship, evangelistic witness and loving service. Methodist theology affirms the central *Reformation commitment to salvation by 'grace alone', but strives to maintain the scriptural connections between law and gospel, faith and works. For Wesley, divine grace always works preveniently, to enable human responsibility in the way of salvation, thus avoiding the errors of both *Pelagianism and *antinomianism. (See especially John Fletcher's Checks to Antinomianism, 1771–5.)

Disciplined fellowship

Methodist theology extends the Reformation understanding of the law – as that which brings conviction of sin and drives us to the grace of Christ – to include the way Christ sends us back to the law in grace-filled obedience (see *Law and gospel). The practice of disciplined *fellowship embodies the covenant realities of divine grace and human responsibility in the activities of mutual confession, intercessory prayer and exhortation to grow in grace. 'Solitary Christianity' is denied by the doctrine of 'social holiness'. In other words, personal salvation subsists in Christian fellowship, and holy living is for the sake of witness and service in the world. The Calvinist doctrine of *perseverance is rejected, since both advancement and backsliding, even to the point of apostasy, are possible in the way of salvation.

Evangelistic mission

An 'evangelical Arminian' doctrine of *salvation has been the centre, if not the circumference, of Methodist theology, and is usefully summarized by the so-called 'Four Alls' of Methodism. First, that all must be saved affirms the doctrine of original sin, particularly against deistic accounts of natural virtue. Second, that all can be saved challenges the Calvinist doctrine of *predestination as unconditional election, by affirming that prevenient grace is free for all and in all, and that the benefits of the *atonement are universal in scope. Third, that all can know they are saved affirms the witness of the Spirit as normal Christian experience, against accusations of religious 'enthusiasm'. Fourth, that all can be saved to the uttermost challenges the intractability of sin, by affirming that holiness and perfect love can be accomplished in this life. Methodists have also stressed holiness as a 'present salvation', which cannot ultimately be separated from God's eschatological purpose to renew creation as a whole. The doctrine of God and the nature of the church are understood in terms of this evangelistic-missional priority: that God is the one who saves, and that the salvation of souls is the end of all ecclesiastical order (see *Evangelism, theology of).

Historic expressions

The history of Methodist theology and practice can be interpreted as more or less diverse expressions of this Wesleyan genome.

Christian perfection

Wesley claimed that the doctrine of Christian perfection was the 'grand depositum' of Methodism, and regular attempts have been made at restating its significance in British Methodism. From the work of William Burt Pope (1822–1903) onwards, scholars have reaffirmed Wesley's view that perfection is not absolute, but a dynamic state of spiritual maturity, utterly contingent on the grace of Christ, that can be gained and lost. R. N. Flew's The Idea of Perfection in Christian Theology (London, 1934) locates Wesley's teaching in the historical development of the doctrine, and highlights the moment-by-moment nature of perfect love in the context of human relationships. W. E. Sangster's The Path to Perfection (London, 1943) relates the doctrine to trends in psychology, while emphasizing the saintly calling of ordinary Christians. Eric Baker's The Faith of a Methodist (London, 1958) argues that the gift of Methodism to the church catholic is a theology in which the doctrine of perfection is systematically central. For the development of this doctrine in America, see John L. Peters' Christian Perfection and American Methodism (New York, 1956).

Revivalist spirituality

The early Methodist movement was born in the midst of *revival, and revivalism continued as a common feature through the nineteenth century. As a means of both renewal and conversion, revival meetings have had a place both inside and outside the church: from camp meetings to itinerant evangelism, campaigns and crusades. A renewal of Christian values in society was also expected to come through the work and witness of holy lives. In Britain, William Arthur's Tongue of Fire (London, 1856) was most influential. American Methodism has been significantly shaped by the camp meeting tradition, the Holiness Movement, and the formulation of revival meetings found in Charles *Finney's Lectures on Revival (1835).

Holiness Movement

The *Holiness Movement interpreted Christian perfection through the lens of Pentecost, anticipating a 'second blessing' in which the presence and power of sin is finally overcome by Spirit baptism (see *Baptism in the Spirit). The experience of 'entire sanctification' or 'full salvation', as an instantaneous work of grace, becomes the foundation for a divinely empowered life of witness and service. The origins of the movement in America can be traced back to Phoebe *Palmer, especially her Way of Holiness (1843), as well as the work of H. Orton Wiley (1877–1961) and Mildred Bangs Wynkoop (1905–97). Samuel Chadwick's Way to Pentecost (London, 1932) and The Call of Christian Perfection (London, 1936) made Cliff College a centre for the Holiness Movement in Britain.

Social responsibility

The pattern set by early Methodists in founding medical dispensaries, alms houses, schools, orphanages and other charities has continued through various movements of social responsibility, such as temperance, the development of Sunday schools, the abolition of *slavery, and agencies dedicated to relieving problems of poverty. At its best, the Methodist commitment to works of mercy has harnessed both social responsibility and evangelical zeal. Hugh Price Hughes (1847–1902) related Christian faith to its social context in a fusion of the Holiness Movement, radical discipleship and the 'non-conformist conscience'. John Scott Lidgett (1854–1953) continued the tradition of 'social evangelism' as a means for the 'perfecting' of society. In the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, Methodism in America was influenced by women's suffrage, notably through Frances Willard (1839–98), and the *Social Gospel movement, conferring a strong impulse to the pursuit of human *rights and social justice (see *Righteousness).

Methodist ecclesiology

Methodism has inherited the tension bequeathed by a renewal movement turned institutional church: such as, catholic spirit vs denominational distinctives; charismatic organization vs authorized structures; discipline vs inclusivity. This has been expressed in familiar debates about the conditions of membership, the nature of ministry and the administration of sacraments. In British Methodism, J. H. Rigg (1849–1902) articulated the nature of Methodist connexionalism as an ecclesiastical and spiritual principle; while the catholic spirit in R. N. Flew's Jesus and His Church (London, 1938) rooted ecclesiology in the community of disciples called and sent by Jesus, as a spiritual reality prior to any particular church order. Geoffrey Wainwright's Methodists in Dialog (Nashville, 1995) presents Methodism as a broad tradition marked by the importance of both disciple-making fellowship and ecumenical relations for the sake of unity and mission (see *Church government).

Academic scholarship

Methodist theology after Wesley was initially shaped by the biblical commentaries of Adam Clarke (1760–1832), the systematic work of Richard Watson's Theological Institutes (1823–24) and William Burt Pope's Compendium (1875–76). While remaining faithful to Wesleyan emphases, they were less concerned to use Wesley himself as a source of authority.

British Methodism, however, has consistently made its most significant contribution in the field of biblical studies, reflecting Wesley's own commitment to scriptural exposition in the service of preaching. Scholars of note include W. F. Moulton (1835–98), J. H. Moulton (1863–1917), A. S. Peake (1865–1929), Vincent Taylor (1887–1968) and more recently, James Dunn, Morna Hooker and I. Howard Marshall.

This biblical scholarship fuelled much theological reflection on the meaning of atonement. The themes of identification with Christ, the mediatorial role of his sacrifice, and moral persuasion to a cruciform life were developed in W. F. Lofthouse's Ethics and Atonement (London, 1906) and Russell Maltby's, Christ and His Cross (London, 1935). The general impulse to go beyond theories of penal *substitution, clearly seen in John Scott Lidgett's, The Spiritual Principle of the Atonement (London, 1897), was an attempt to keep the *atonement central to both evangelical conversion and the pursuit of social holiness.

In America, early Methodist theology was given direction by the systematics of Nathan Bangs (1778–1862), Thomas O. Summers (1812–82) and John Miley (1813–95). Later theological movements steered Methodism into the broad philosophical currents of *liberal Protestantism: such as Boston personalism, led by Henry Clay Sheldon (1845–1928) and Borden Parker Bowne (1847–1910); and *process theology, by John Cobb and Schubert Ogden.

Methodist theology has also been enriched by a number of scholars around the world, writing in a self-consciously Wesleyan mode. Significant voices include Theophil Sporri (Switzerland), Vilem Schneeberger (Czechoslovakia) and Manfred Marquardt (Germany); Harald Lindstrom, Thorvald Kallstad and Ole Borgen (Scandinavia); José Bonino (Argentina), Elsa Tamez (Costa Rica), Daniel T. Niles (Sri Lanka) and Emerito Nacpil (Philippines).

Contemporary variations

Since the mid-twentieth century, there has been a renewal of interest in the theology of John Wesley himself, the distinctive genes of the Wesleyan traditions and their significance for contemporary Methodism. Beginning with Harald Lindström's Wesley and Sanctification (Stockholm, 1943) and William Canon's The Theology of John Wesley (Nashville, 1946), the field of Wesley Studies has continued to emerge through contributions such as Randy Maddox's Responsible Grace (Nashville, 1994) and Kenneth Collins' The Theology of John Wesley (Nashville, 2007). The current Wesley Works project (1959–), pioneered by Frank Baker, Albert Outler and Robert Cushman, is providing essential critical editions and commentaries on primary texts for this scholarship. There is also a gathering interest in the work of Charles Wesley, and especially the theological contributions of his hymnody: for example, S. T. Kimbrough, Charles Wesley: Poet and Theologian (Nashville, 1993); and Newport and Campbell (eds.), Charles Wesley: Life, Literature and Legacy (London, 2007).

In Britain, Philip Watson, Gordon Rupp, Peter Stephens, Rupert Davies and Geoffrey Wainwright are Methodist scholars of historical and ecumenical theology who have placed an emphasis on specifically Wesleyan thinking. United Methodist theology has been deeply influenced by the '*Wesleyan Quadrilateral' of Scripture, tradition, reason and experience, though its exact formulation as a theological method, and the extent to which it is actually Wesleyan, remains a matter of scholarly debate. While promoting considerable theological diversity, it has nevertheless provided a method for sustained theological engagement with John Wesley and the Methodist tradition.

Official theological reflection in British Methodism has tended to be fixed by prevailing trends in theology and pressing social issues, rather than a prior commitment to Wesleyan doctrine as such. On this basis, what counts as Methodist theology tends to be just what the Methodist people have agreed at any given time in their history. In the missional context of 'emerging church' conversations and 'fresh expressions' of church, however, it would appear that the Wesleyan genes and their distinctive historic expressions are gaining a renewed attention.

Bibliography

K. Collins, The Theology of John Wesley: Holy Love and the Shape of Grace (Nashville, 2007); K. Cracknell and S. White, An Introduction to World Methodism (Cambridge, 2005); R. Heitzenrater, Wesley and the People Called Methodists (Nashville, 1994); S. Jones, United Methodist Doctrine (Nashville, 2002); T. Langford, Practical Divinity: Theology in the Wesleyan Traditions, vols. 1–2 (Nashville, 1999); R. Maddox, Responsible Grace: John Wesley's Practical Theology (Nashville, 1994); P. Meadows, The DNA of Wesleyan Discipleship (Cambridge, 2013); H. Rack, Reasonable Enthusiast: John Wesley and the Rise of Methodism (Peterborough, 2002); G. Rupp (ed.), A History of the Methodist Church in Great Britain, vols. 1–4 (Peterborough, 1965–88); K. Wilson, Methodist Theology (London, 2011).

P. MEADOWS

METZ, JOHANNES BAPTIST (b. 1928)

Johannes Metz is a professor at the University of Mainz, and a leading Roman Catholic representative of *political theology. A student of Karl *Rahner, some of whose earlier works he has reissued, his theology is particularly concerned with the political dimensions of Christian faith and theological reflection. Strongly opposed to any reduction of religion to a merely private option in secular society, he understands Christian faith, and its expressions in corporate life and theological activity, as a force of critical and liberating potential. In particular, he envisages theology as not simply a discipline internal to Christianity, but as a constructive critique of social reality, and in this way he sees theology as a dialogue with the world over the future shape of society. The relationship of theology to politics is not one of consequence or application; politics is intrinsic to the theological exercise. Moreover, theology has a critical role in the church, in so far as it enables the identification of ideological elements within the hierarchical forms of church life, and so contributes to the emergence of a 'post-bourgeois church'. Much of this theology rests on the basis of a powerful doctrine of *creation and on an understanding of *salvation as concerned primarily with man in his bodily, corporate and political existence.

Bibliography

Works: Theology of the World (ET, London, 1969); Faith in History and Society (ET, London, 1980); A Passion for God: The Mystical-Political Dimension of Christianity (ET, New York, 1998).

Studies: J. K. Downey (ed.), Love's Strategy: The Political Theology of Johann Baptist Metz (Harrisburg, 1999); R. D. Johns, Man in the World: The Political Theology of Johannes Baptist Metz (Chico, 1976).

J. B. WEBSTER

MEYENDORFF, JOHN (1926–92)

John Meyendorff was born in Paris, the son of Russian émigré parents. Educated in Paris, he graduated from the Institut St-Serge in 1949 and submitted his Doctorat ès lettres at the Sorbonne in 1958. In the same year he was ordained to the priesthood. In the following year, the fruits of his doctorate were published: a major work on St Gregory *Palamas, inaugurating serious study of Palamas and the *hesychast controversy, and his edition of Palamas' major work in defence of the hesychasts, the Triads. In 1959, too, Meyendorff left Europe for America, becoming Professor of Patristics at St Vladimir's Orthodox Theological Seminary, and also maintaining links with Dumbarton Oaks, the centre for Byzantine Studies in Washington DC, and with Fordham University, where he held an adjunct chair. In 1983, on the death of Alexander Schmemmann, he became Dean, resigning in 1992 and dying shortly afterwards.

As a scholar, Meyendorff was primarily a church historian with deep knowledge of both Byzantium and Russia, but he wrote widely on theological matters. Perhaps his greatest work was Byzantium and the Rise of Russia (1981), which traced the influence of hesychast monastic culture in the formation of Muscovite Russia. His work on hesychasm made Palamas accessible as never before, with the result that the Orthodox 'Neo-patristic synthesis' increasingly came to involve an endorsement of the theological terms of Palamas' defence of the hesychasts, especially the distinction drawn between God's unknowable essence and his knowable energies and an emphasis on the authenticity of a deifying experience of God attained through prayer. In the States, he became involved in both inter-Orthodox affairs (notably the establishment in 1970 of an autocephalous – self-governing – Orthodox Church of America, uniting most Orthodox of Slav descent under an American hierarchy) and in ecumenical matters. With his early death, the articulate and learned Orthodox voice America had known since *Florovsky and *Schmemmann fell temporarily silent. In his final years, glasnost and perestroika enabled him to visit his ancestral Russia, where the wisdom and insight of his words found eager listeners.

See also: EASTERN ORTHODOX THEOLOGY; RUSSIAN ORTHODOX THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

Most of Meyendorff's works in English and English translation are published by St Vladimir's Seminary Press, Crestwood. See especially: The Orthodox Church (London, 1960); Byzantine Theology: Historical Trends and Doctrinal Themes (London, 1974), both now published by SVSP.

A. LOUTH

MÍGUEZ BONINO, JOSÉ (1924–2012)

Known as the dean of Protestant theologians in the Spanish-speaking world, Bonino was also the only Latin American Protestant observer during the Second *Vatican Council. Born in Rosario, Argentina in 1924, he studied theology in Buenos Aires, and did graduate work at Emory University and Union Theological Seminary in New York. A Methodist pastor from 1947, he served in several local parishes in Argentina. From 1954 to 1985 he taught at the Higher Institute for Theological Studies (ISEDET) in Buenos Aires, of which he was also a Dean. Active in the *ecumenical movement, he became one of the presidents of the World Council of Churches and a spokesperson for ecumenical Protestantism from Latin America. He also participated with evangelicals in the Latin American Theological Fraternity. His book, Doing Theology in a Revolutionary Situation, is probably the most comprehensive introduction to *liberation theology from a sympathetic but not uncritical position. The same irenic approach is characteristic of his book Christians and Marxists: The Mutual Challenge to Revolution. His theological reflection has a Christological and ethical bent and is characterized by clarity and consistency, an acute analytical ability and familiarity with the Protestant theological traditions, especially in his later books such as Towards a Christian Political Ethics and Faces of Latin American Protestantism.

Bibliography

Works: Doing Theology in a Revolutionary Situation (Philadelphia and London, 1975); Christians and Marxists: The Mutual Challenge to Revolution (London, 1976); 'For Life and Against Death: A Theology That Takes Sides', Christian Century, 1980, pp. 1154–1158; Towards a Christian Political Ethics (Philadelphia, 1983); Faces of Latin American Protestantism (Grand Rapids, 1997).

S. ESCOBAR

MILBANK, JOHN (b. 1952)

John Milbank is an Anglican theologian and Professor of Religion, Politics and Ethics at the University of Nottingham. After studying history at Oxford and then theology at Cambridge University with Rowan *Williams, former Archbishop of Canterbury, Milbank went on to teach at the Universities of Lancaster, Cambridge and Virginia. Along with other theologians with Cambridge connections (Catherine Pickstock and Graham Ward) Milbank edited a volume of essays in 1999 called Radical Orthodoxy: A New Theology. Since that time, Milbank's scholarship has become closely associated with a 'theological sensibility' known as *Radical Orthodoxy.

Milbank's first major work to elicit widespread attention was Theology and Social Theory: Beyond Secular Reason (1990). In this work, Milbank gives a genealogy of 'secular reason', arguing that the attempt in modern social theories to have scientific ‘objectivity’ actually veils implicit anti-theological *ontologies in these theories. Wide-ranging in scope, Milbank interrogates the key thinkers in the development of modern sociology, economics and political theory to find an underlying common strand: they assume an ‘ontology of violence’, in which the necessity of conflict is a basic assumption about the way the world is. As an alternative to this, Milbank reconstructs an Augustinian ‘ontology of peace’, in which the most basic ontological status of the universe is grounded in the harmony of differences and participation in the beauty of the triune God. Theology and Social Theory seeks to liberate theology from captivity to modern norms, which claim to be based on social scientific ‘facts’. Theology itself should critique the implicit ontologies in these social theories.

Milbank’s current work focuses on the articulation of a *trinitarian ontology. In Being Reconciled (2003), Milbank begins a series of books on this ontology using the concept of ‘gift’ as ‘a kind of transcendental category in relation to all the topoi of theology, in a similar fashion to “word”’. The focus on ‘gift’ in particular reflects Milbank’s trinitarian focus upon how the work of the Spirit brings human beings into relationships of mutual interest and exchange, as opposed to a vision of love which sees the true gift as a ‘free gift’ with no return. Milbank thinks that Anders *Nygren has falsified the notion of Christian agape by excluding concerns for mutuality – and that a similar glorification of sacrifice for its own sake is also displayed in the thought of *Kant and *Derrida.

Milbank has also written monographs which fit within the Radical Orthodoxy sensibility more generally, including works on Vico (his dissertation), Thomas Aquinas, Henri de Lubac, Christology and theological *aesthetics.

Bibliography

Works: Theology and Social Theory: Beyond Secular Reason (Oxford, 1990); Being Reconciled: Ontology and Pardon (Oxford, 2003).

J. T. BILLINGS

MILLENNIUM

The term refers to the period of 1,000 years mentioned in Rev. 20:2–7 as the time of the reign of Christ and the saints over the earth.

Although the term ‘millenarianism’ has come to be used much more loosely, in this article we are concerned with millennial belief in the strict sense, referring to interpretations of the millennium of Rev. 20. Three main views of the millennium are usually distinguished (premillennialism, postmillennialism and amillennialism), but these views as they have emerged in the history of Christianity can be best understood as five traditions of interpretation:

1. Premillennialism (or chiliasm) in the early church

Many of the early Fathers, including Papias (c. 60–c. 130), Justin (c. 100–c. 165), *Irenaeus, *Tertullian, Victorinus of Pettau (d. c. 304) and Lactantius (c. 240–c. 320), were premillennialists, i.e. they expected the personal coming of Christ in glory to inaugurate a millennial reign on earth before the last *judgment (see *Eschatology). This belief was not only an interpretation of Rev. 20, but also a continuation of Jewish *apocalyptic expectation of an interim messianic kingdom. The framework of Rev. 20 was filled with content derived from Jewish apocalyptic and especially from OT prophecies, with the result that the millennium was understood primarily as a restoration of paradise. Amid the abundant fruitfulness of the renewed earth and peace between the animals, the resurrected saints would enjoy 1,000 years of paradisaical life on earth before being translated to eternal life in heaven. The 1,000 years were explained either as the originally intended span of human life on earth or as the world’s sabbath rest at the end of a 7,000-years’ ‘week’ of history. It was the materialistic nature of this millennialism which made it objectionable to others of the Fathers, including *Augustine, whose highly influential rejection of it led to the virtual disappearance of premillennialism until the seventeenth century.

2. Augustinian amillennialism

The interpretation of Rev. 20 which held the field for most of the medieval period and remained influential down to the present was pioneered by the fourth-century *Donatist Tyconius, whose ideas were taken up by Augustine. According to this view, the millennial reign of Christ is the age of the church, from the resurrection of Christ until his parousia. Augustine took the figure 1,000 itself to be symbolic, not the actual length of time. This interpretation of Rev. 20 is often called amillennialist, because it rejects belief in a future millennium. For the earthly kingdom expected by the chiliasts, it substituted a twin emphasis on the present rule of Christ and other-worldly eschatological hope.

The Protestant Reformers adopted a modified form of this view. They took the millennium to be an actual period of 1,000 years in the past (variously dated), during which the gospel flourished. Satan's release at the end of this period (Rev. 20:7) marked the rise of the medieval *papacy. For the future, the Reformers expected the imminent coming of Christ, leading at once to the last judgment and the dissolution of this world.

3. Joachimism and Protestant postmillennialism

The ideas of the twelfth-century abbot *Joachim inspired a new form of eschatological expectation which in the later Middle Ages and the sixteenth century was the major alternative to the Augustinian view. Before the end of history there would be an age of the Spirit, a period of spiritual prosperity and peace for the church on earth, which was identified with the millennium of Rev. 20, though not primarily derived from that text. This expectation can be called post-millennialist, since it held that the millennium would be inaugurated by a spiritual intervention of Christ in the power of his Spirit, not by his bodily advent, which would follow the millennium.

Joachimism appealed to some early Protestants, who saw in the success of the Reformation gospel the dawning of a new age of prosperity for the church. Joachimist influence, Protestant optimism about the trends of history, and exegesis of Revelation combined to produce Protestant postmillennialism, whose first influential exponent was Thomas Brightman (1562–1607) and which first flourished in the seventeenth century. In this view, the millennium would come about through the Spirit-empowered preaching of the gospel, resulting in the conversion of the world and the worldwide spiritual reign of Christ through the gospel.

The eighteenth century was the great age of postmillennialism, which played a key role in the development of missionary thinking. The revivals were seen as the first ripples of the movement of conversion which would engulf the world, and a view which gave human activity a significant role in God's purpose of establishing his kingdom was a major stimulus to missionary activity. But in the nineteenth century, postmillennial expectation increasingly approximated to the secular doctrine of *progress and merged into *liberal theology's identification of the *kingdom of God with moral and social improvement. The modern decline of postmillennialism coincides with the loss of Christian credibility that doctrines of progress have suffered.

4. Protestant premillennialism

Protestant premillennialism originated in the early seventeenth century, especially under the influence of Joseph Mede (1586–1638). It differs from postmillennialism in expecting the personal advent of Christ and the bodily resurrection of the saints to precede the millennium, and therefore tends to stress the discontinuity between the present and the millennial age more than postmillennialism does. It enjoyed a major revival in England in the 1820s, from which its modern forms derive. Whereas post-millennialism thrived on observing hopeful signs of the approaching millennium, premillennialism gained popularity in circles whose view of the current situation was deeply pessimistic. Not the influence of the church, but only the personal intervention of Christ could establish his kingdom on earth.

Premillennialists have taken many views on the character of the millennial reign, but nineteenth-century premillennialism tended towards a literal interpretation of prophecy, including OT prophecies applied to the millennium. This tendency reached extreme form in the *dispensationalist theology pioneered by J. N. *Darby, in which a 'secret rapture' of the church, preceding the coming of Christ, is to bring the age of the church to an end, while the millennium functions as the time of fulfilment for the OT prophecies to Israel.

5. Symbolic amillennialism

Many proponents of views 2, 3 and 4 above have taken the figure 1,000 in Rev. 20 to be a symbolic number, but have still interpreted the millennium as a period of time. A view found occasionally in the modern period takes the millennium to be a symbol, not of a period at all, but of the complete achievement of Christ's kingdom and his total victory over evil at the parousia.

The various views are, of course, based in part on the debated details of exegesis, but in a broader sense they represent differing attitudes to the relationship between the kingdom of Christ and the history of this world. In all its forms, millennial belief represents, in opposition to a completely other-worldly eschatology, the conviction that it is part of God's purpose to realize his kingdom in this world.

Bibliography

O. Blöcher, G. G. Blum, R. Konrad, R. Bauckham, 'Chiliasmus,' TRE VII, pp. 723–745; R. G. Clouse (ed.), The Meaning of the Millennium: Four Views (Downers Grove, 1977); J. Daniélou, The Theology of Jewish Christianity (London, 1964); S. Grenz, The Millennial Maze (Downers Grove, 1992); P. Toon (ed.), Puritans, the Millennium and the Future of Israel (London, 1970).

R. J. BAUCKHAM

MINISTRY

Ministry is a term that refers to the work of the *church – its service in the world, proclamation of the gospel and administration of the sacraments. It can refer to the activities of the whole people of God; or equally to individuals with specific vocations (e.g. teacher, pastor, priest, evangelist, bishop, prophet, etc.). Ministry describes both the general work and service of the church, as well as the type of vocation that is particular to an individual, which may involve ordination, licensing or some kind of recognition.

Contexts and shaping

To a large extent, the range of ministry and ministers that one can encounter across the denominational spectrum will be characteristic expressions of ecclesiological outlooks. For example, Lesslie *Newbigin contrasts associational (or congregationalist) models of the church with those that are parochial. Avery Dulles has developed five models of the church: institution, mystical communion, herald, servant and sacrament. James Hopewell suggests four models: mechanistic, organic, contextual and symbolic. Each of these models presented by the authors are suggestive of a different kind of ministry – in terms of character, style, substance, ethos and foci – that is offered by the church. Thus, a sacramental understanding of the church (Dulles) requires an emphasis on priesthood; whereas an understanding of the church as herald might lead to an emphasis on the ministry of preaching.

Ministry is never shaped in isolation from its context. Whether it is the ministry of the church or the individual minister, the environment in which a church finds itself located will have some kind of impact upon the shaping of ministerial identity. The political contexts of South and Central America play a significant part in the shaping of *liberation theology, and of the ministry offered through base communities in some of the world's poorest slums. It is less likely that a theologian in a developed country enjoying relative stability and prosperity could have generated this kind of theology and ecclesiology.

Context matters. As Richard *Niebuhr demonstrated, the social sources of denominationalism (e.g. economic, race, class, gender, caste, etc.) will have some bearing on the shape of ministry, and upon ministerial identity. Whilst theological priorities will still be more significant than other factors, here is no escaping, for example, the alignment of class identity and early Methodism in England.

In terms of contemporary contextual factors that shape ministry, current British church-going habits correlate with the two main religious economies that can be observed in Europe. The first is a market model, which assumes voluntary membership will become the norm. The second model is utility-based, where membership is ascribed rather than chosen. In the first model, individuals opt in to become members. In the second model, all in some sense are deemed to belong, unless they opt out. The two models are in partial tension, and arguably depend upon each other.

One may further characterize these differences as intensive and extensive forms of ecclesial polity. Ministries that centre on intensity tend to build strong congregational identity (cf. Newbigin's notion of 'associational' churches), which can be based on a charismatic leader, a particular programme or some kind of significant emphasis (e.g. doctrinal, worship, liturgical, pastoral, political, etc.). In contrast, extensive forms of ecclesial polity tend to be more open and accommodating, and focus on being the church for the whole community, which leads to a breadth of expression. In turn, this may compromise both definition and numerical growth, although this is not necessarily the case.

As a general rule, North American churches, irrespective of their denominational tradition, will have a primary proclivity for market and intensive models of the church, as religion is fundamentally a matter of choice. Many European countries, in contrast, are still shaped by utility-extensive expectations by virtue of the Christian faith being 'by law established' (e.g. Presbyterian in Scotland, Lutheran in Sweden, Anglican in England, etc.). But Europe, like many parts of the world, is now increasingly influenced by market-models of faith.

How, then, can one account for the particularity and praxis of ministry being so variable, even within a relatively confined area such as one suburb or small town? A fertile notion that might help explain this comes from the vocabulary of sommeliers. Terroir is a Gallic word for which there is no English equivalent. The term refers to the combination of factors that make one wine slightly different from another, even when they are geographically proximate. Sunshine and temperature; north- or south-facing, and the amount of rainfall; the height of the land (and the drainage), the type and acidity of the soil; the types and subtypes of grape, and their progeny; local know-how and human skill; the amount of time permitted for a wine to mature, and the types of barrels chosen: all combine to make wines taste different.

This accounts for why one type of Burgundy tastes quite different from another, even though they might be from the same village. And this analogy is suggestive for theology in relation to the composition of local ecclesial identity and the expression of ministry. So on one level, church is church, just as wine is wine. Yet to the refined palate, the differences are detectable and telling. The ecclesial history and ethos of one church might be composed through all manner of factors: denominational identity, buildings, local history, various forms of organization, social factors such as wealth, ethnicity and education, and more obviously ecclesial and theological accents. In an adjacent church, even of the same denominational hue, and in a similar context, the flavour of ecclesial praxis and ministry may turn out to be markedly different.

Sources

Theological rationales for ministry will have several traceable roots. These may include emphases drawn from biblical, patristic, Reformation and contemporary Christian sources. But they might also include more current cultural perspectives. Some forms of modern ministry make no apology for being enculturated expressions of faith, even to the point of becoming somewhat heterodox. (See e.g. the emergence of ministers who are exemplars of the power of positive thinking in the health, wealth and *prosperity movements.)

The scriptural sources for ministry are rooted in the person and example of *Jesus, what is known about the organization of the early church, and what the NT teaches more generally about collective discipleship, which is effectively ministerial *praxis. The ministry of Jesus is focused on teaching, proclaiming the *kingdom of God, *healing (which includes deliverance) and *prayer. Generally, the ministry of Jesus can be characterized as reaching out to the lost or marginalized. For the most part, this is a costly ministry of service and inclusiveness, where Jesus takes radical steps to either cut through or challenge the social or religious constructions of reality of his day, that in delineating are also discriminating. For example, there are over forty healing miracles recorded in the Gospels, and yet the names of the individuals healed seem to be unknown to the evangelists, suggesting that the persons receiving this ministry from Jesus had little social or religious status.

Jesus' ministry of dedicated service is of course an expression of his *incarnation. Paul's deep and profound Christological hymn (Phil. 2:6–11) talks about Jesus 'taking the form of a slave', which echoes the early established gospel tradition identifying Jesus not as one who came to be served, but to serve (Matt. 20:28; Mark 10:45; Luke 22:27; John 13:4–17). This ministry – arguably the core paradigm for all forms of Christian ministry, whether individual or collective – is ultimately expressed in the *cross. Several NT writers understand the crucifixion as priestly, sacrificial and ultimately reconciling (see Heb. 10:5–14; Rom. 5:2; Eph. 2:13–18; 1 John 2:1–2; etc.).

The ministry of the early church focused on prayer, further workings of miracles, signs and wonders amongst the poor (Acts 5:12–16) and diaconal acts of service (Acts 6:1–7). Stephen, the first Christian martyr, was one of these deacons, and the form of his commission involved him being identified for a specific ministry (i.e. selected, with the role and tasks described) and the apostles *laying their hands upon him in order to set him aside for this ministry, in the company of six others.

As the early church began to mature, and to some extent develop the initial foundations that are fundamental for organizations and institutions, the reflections on the nature of ministry and the identity of the church began to converge. Thus, Paul describes the church as ‘the body of Christ’, and in so doing offers a vivid analogy of mutuality, intra-dependence, differentiation and diversity (Rom. 12:4–8; 1 Cor. 12; Eph. 4). The analogy allows a variety of different spiritual *gifts (and their holders) to be identified, yet without individual ministries becoming competitive. Thus, some are prophets, others teachers, and still others evangelists or apostles: ‘but all are one in Jesus Christ’.

The New Testament also began to develop a sense of ‘officers’ of the church, although this is more nascent than concrete. The Twelve (following the election of Matthias, after the death of Judas) are identified as apostles. Deacons were appointed almost from the outset. Paul’s letters, on the other hand, merely refer to ‘fellow workers’ who may lead and guide the church. However, there is mention of ‘overseers’ (i.e. episkopoi) in Philippi – the forerunner of bishops. Yet the NT does not leave a clear pattern that links tasks to roles. Thus, no one office is singled out for the task associated with the presiding over and administration of the Lord’s Supper (1 Cor. 11:17–33). The book of Acts mentions the appointment of elders and presbyters (e.g. 14:23; 15:2; 20:17, 28; 21:18). Again, it is not clear what these titles indicate, and it may even be the case that the roles were rather fluid in the early church, and varied from city to city and state to state. Deacons emerge as a category within the pastoral epistles, and as with the other named offices, would have included women (e.g. Rom 16:1, 3, 6).

So whilst there is plenty of biblical warrant for patterns of ministry, and also for the identification of the roles and tasks that might pertain to ministers, the NT does not per se, offer a complete and concrete blueprint for ministry. The early church had not yet organized itself around agreed creeds, a canon of Scripture, or authorized ministers. But the early church was not disorganized either. Living between the fluid and concrete, it was, rather, unorganized. It was developing an emerging, nascent shape for its ministry, and roles and task for ministers that would soon be ordered, albeit variable (by degrees) according to the context and environment in which the new faith was expressing itself.

Development

The development of orders follows a relatively standard trajectory that is familiar to sociologists of religion. Namely, after a period of original and charismatic leadership, the phase of development that enables maintenance, development and further growth is more dependent on routinization and bureaucratization. Thus, *Methodism is the ‘system’ that develops and concretizes after the death of the *Wesley brothers.

It was no different in the early church, where the passing of the apostles, and then those that had known them first-hand, soon led to the establishment of bishops, presbyters and deacons. As the Christian faith expanded, and became increasingly diverse in its cultural expressions, it became more and more important to preserve its catholicity. Gradually, a shape for Christian ministry began to emerge that was recognizable putatively across different cultural contexts. This was driven both by numerical and geographical increase, leading to bishops being persons who presided over several eucharistic communities, whilst presbyters became more identified with single local congregations, presiding on behalf of the bishop.

In the early third century, writers such as *Tertullian and Hippolytus were beginning to describe the roles of bishops and presbyters with the use of sacerdotal terminology, thereby conflating the ministry of the priest with the priestly ministry of Christ. This trajectory continued to develop throughout the medieval period, with minor orders being added to the church, such as reader, acolyte, exorcist, pardoner, deacon and sub-deacon. The growth of monastic life also contributed to a flourishing, rich and variegated economy of recognized ministries within the church. These evolved and acquired denser identities, allowing for further delineation (e.g. celibacy for priests from the eleventh century onwards, but not for deacons; different kinds of liturgical apparel to symbolize offices and their functions; which offices are responsible for which sacraments, etc.). The maturing of ministry, in other words, cannot be separated from the development of ecclesiology.

The Reformation period witnessed a re-appraisal of ministry. Whilst the *Reformation was in fact several movements rather than just one, and a complex alloy of nationalist, theological and revisionist sentiments, all of which were supported by the emergence of mass-produced and vernacular publications, the impact of the Reformers on the shape and identity of ministry was arguably the most substantial in Christian history. In general, the Reformers rejected the idea that the identity and existence of the church was dependent upon a sacerdotal understanding of priesthood.

The consequences of this manifested themselves differently, according to the nature of the reformation and the context in which it was emerging. In many (early) Reformed churches, the distinction between clergy and laity was still perpetuated – but with the clergy now focusing their identity on a highly professional pastoral and teaching office. (Hence John Milton's dictum that the 'new Presbyter is but old priest writ large'.) In the Church of England, the office of the presbyter still had sacramental responsibility, but the pastoral and teaching foci had moved to being just as important (see *Anglicanism). This is expressed in classic writings and exemplary figures such as George Herbert, Richard *Hooker and John Donne. In more radical groups such as the *Quakers, however, the gift of *preaching was now no longer attached to an office or to ordination, and to all intents and purposes, the boundary between clergy and laity had been dissolved. Some Reformed churches emerged where ministry was simply the activity of the whole people of God, and not the particular and distinct responsibility of one person set aside for certain and unique tasks (see *Priesthood of all believers).

As the Reformation developed, differences between emerging Protestant denominations began to take place. Some of these are related to distinctive theological outlooks, whilst others arise from subtle cultural conditions. Thus, some congregations had the right to choose and dismiss their ministers, whereas in other denominations, appointment and dismissal could be done only by a bishop (or the equivalent person or body). The Church of England continued to observe a threefold distinction of ordained ministries: bishop, priest and deacon. The Anglican understanding of ministry is, therefore, still medieval in its functionality and roots, but largely stripped of its sacerdotal theology.

In the nineteenth century, however, the *Anglo-Catholic movement sought to restore pre-Reformation understandings of ministry to Anglican ministerial identity. The movement expressed itself in spirituality, hymnody, architecture and liturgical renewal. The impact of this is now widespread, albeit extremely dissipated. The underlying theology that was supposed to support this neo-gothic renaissance did not have the intensive influence that *Keble, *Newman and others had hoped. The legacy of Anglo-Catholicism today is expressed mainly in style rather than substance.

Meanwhile, and in some Reformed churches, deacons and elders are lay appointments, and the minister is a trained professional who chiefly exercises a ministry as the primary teacher and pastor. In the twentieth century, the emergence of house churches and charismatic renewal has witnessed a resurgence in new forms of recognized lay ministry, many of which depend on the authorization and validation of the local congregation, or perhaps a wider network of affiliated churches. This has led to some house church leaders being recognized (or self-designated) as *apostles, and functioning very much like primitive bishops from the early church.

More recently, church historians and sociologists now agree that the most decisive period for impacting upon ministry and ministerial identity in Britain, after the Reformation, is the Victorian era. The onset of industrialization – something begun in the eighteenth century, but which primarily came to dominate the landscape of British society in the nineteenth century – resulted in significant changes for churches. Several factors need noting.

First, the mass migration of people from rural to urban contexts led to a range of consequences. Many new churches were built in cities, although statistics tend to show that these were not necessarily well-attended. But the social upheaval created a fertile environment for *revivals. Second, training for clergy began in earnest, in order to equip ministers for the new challenges presented by an industrialized society. Theological colleges were born, which shifted the identity of clergy life from being a gentlemanly pursuit to being a profession. Third, the funding of churches began to move from being a widely held social responsibility to being that of the congregation. Fourth, clergy roles gradually became less public as the state and local government took on more responsibility. Consequently, clergy became more intensely focused on their congregations, and on the styles of theology that differentiated them. The response to gradual marginalization is invariably intensification, and some patterns of ministry now anticipated clergy becoming 'technologists of the sanctuary' – specialists in discrete areas of ritual and performance. Fifth, whilst the emerging clerical profession of the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries gave birth to better educated clergy, it was ironically for a more disconnected church. Thus, the current accent on training, formation and education in theological colleges – which includes practical work and reflective practice – is rightly regarded as an essential component in preventing clerical identity and development from becoming too rarefied.

Current developments

In more recent times, all denominations and congregations have begun to renew their understanding of ministry in the light of the problems and possibilities presented by contemporary *culture. An increased emphasis on the ministry of the laity is now common to many denominations. Yet whilst there is ample scriptural warrant for the recovery of this tradition, it also has to be acknowledged that the increased emphasis on lay ministry may also be prompted by a shortage of resources to train clergy, and, in some cases, far fewer vocations to ordained ministry. Britain and Ireland have witnessed a sharp fall in the number of priestly vocations for the Roman Catholic Church, and a steady fall in the number of nonconformist ministers.

Some commentators have observed that this correlates with a general decline in the social status of the clerical profession. However, the decline is not uniform, since the Church of England continues to ordain and licence significant numbers of men and women to a variety of ministries. And as new forms of church emerge (i.e. cell, 'fresh expressions' and other alternatives), new types of ministers are now beginning to be trained (e.g. pioneer minister). That said, no modern pattern of ministry can claim to replicate a pure and untainted version of what is presented in the NT. To claim complete scriptural warrant for a pattern of contemporary ministry is both hermeneutically doubtful and ecclesiological hazardous.

Several significant changes in ministry for churches have taken place in Western culture in the post-war era. The rise of consumerism is altering the cadence and contours of church membership. As global culture increasingly moves from one of religious assumption to consumption, in which believing and belonging are matters of conscious choice rather than a set of inherited suppositions, churches and ministers find themselves competing with other leisure activities. This is a direct consequence of concepts such as obligation and duty being eclipsed by cultures of choice.

More positively, *charismatic renewal has brought a flexibility and exuberance to ministry that has led to experimentation in patterns of organization, *worship and types of ministry. The increased presence and recognition of ordained women has also transformed the ecclesial landscape. Although this development is still confined to mainline Protestant churches (i.e. not Roman Catholics and Orthodox, but including Anglicanism), it is a development that many denominations have embraced.

Another significant development is the growing ecumenical convergence on the functions and identity of ministry. This leads denominations still to value their differences, yet also entering into formal associations that recognize the ministry practised by others. So whilst differences of organization, and the theological rationales behind them, continue to inhibit unity, there is a growing recognition that all ministries belong to Christ, who is the head of the body.

See also: CHURCH GOVERNMENT.

Bibliography

R. S. Anderson (ed.), Theological Foundations for Ministry (Edinburgh, 1979); Anglican-Roman Catholic International Commission, ARCIC: The Final Report (London, 1982); Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry, Faith and Order Paper No. 111 (Geneva, 1982); J. M. Barnett, The Diaconate: A Full and Equal Order (New York, 1981); C. K. Barrett, Church, Ministry and Sacraments in the New Testament (Exeter, 1985); A. Coxon and R. Towler, The Fate of the Anglican Clergy: A Sociological Study (London, 1979); G. Guiver (ed.), Priests in a People's Church (London, 2001); M. Harris, Organizing God's Work: Challenges for Churches and Synagogues (London, 1998); A. T. and R. P. C. Hanson, The Identity of the Church: A Guide to Recognizing the Contemporary Church (London, 1987); R. P. C. Hanson, Christian Priesthood Examined (Guildford, 1979); U. Holmes, The Future Shape of Ministry (New York, 1971); H. Küng, Why Priests? (London, 1972); P. C. Moore (ed.), Bishops – But What Kind? Reflections on Episcopacy (London, 1982); D. M. Paton and C. H. Long (eds.), The Compulsion of the Spirit: A Roland Allen Reader (Grant Rapids, 1983); M. Percy, Clergy: The Origin of Species (London, 2006); A. Russell, The Clerical Profession (London 1980); E. Schillebeeckx, The Church with a Human Face: A New and Expanded Theology of Ministry (London 1985); E. Schweizer, Church Order in the New Testament (London, 1961); M. Thurian, Priesthood and Ministry: Ecumenical Research (London, 1983).

M. PERCY

MIRACLE

The word 'miracle' (from the Latin miraculum, a wonder) is traditionally used to describe a special *supernatural intervention in the 'natural' course of events in the world. As such, it covers any supernatural activity of God, including divine *revelation and answers to *prayer, as well as healings, exorcisms, nature miracles, and the two great 'wonders' of the life of Jesus, the *incarnation and *resurrection.

In keeping with the biblical worldview and the majority culture of its day, the church in the early centuries readily accepted the reality of miracles, but initiated continuing debates on two issues: their relationship with natural events (did they contradict or complement them?), and the extent to which they should be expected to continue in the post-biblical age.

Miracles and natural events

The medieval church largely followed Augustine, who rejected any radical discontinuity between miracles and natural events, arguing that since God is *Creator both are equally his work. This view fitted well the medieval synthesis between Platonism and Christianity which viewed God as immanent and rational in all his ways. The rediscovery of *Aristotle, however, and the infiltration of his teaching into Christian thinking, especially through Thomas Aquinas, began to open up a gulf between the natural and the supernatural. This slowly widened, encouraged by the success of early Western *science, giving the natural order more and more autonomy until it became the 'clockwork machine' of the eighteenth century, a fixed order of cause and effect into which, it seemed, even God could not break. This set the stage for the great Enlightenment debate over the possibility of miracles which is still with us today.

It is important to note, however, that this debate arises from the presuppositions of the European *Enlightenment, and its significance for the concept of miracle in the rest of the world is strictly limited. When, from the eighteenth century on, missionaries took Christianity to Asia, Africa and South America, they found cultures which had no difficulty at all in accepting the biblical concept of miracle and incorporating it readily into their understanding of the natural world. Despite the universality of technology, this continues to be largely the case; even, say, in China, despite decades of indoctrination in secular materialism, Christians have no difficulty fitting the reality of miracles into their worldview, causing them to look on the continuation of the Enlightenment debate as largely irrelevant. Foisting this debate upon the rest of the world, particularly in a post-Enlightenment age, is an unfortunate example of Western intellectual and theological imperialism.

The classic Enlightenment objections to miracles were summed up by David *Hume in his Enquiry Concerning Human Understanding (1748), section 10. By defining a miracle as 'a violation of the laws of *nature' and asserting that 'firm and unalterable experience has established these laws', he was able to claim 'entire' proof against miracles. Faced with so many instances of 'natural law', he said, it will always be the case that the evidence against a miracle claim will be greater than the evidence for it. Additionally, Hume argued that those who claimed to be witnesses to miracles were frequently ill-educated or living in obscure parts of the world or prone to exaggeration. So any sensible person must necessarily always reject a reported miracle. As for the Protestant claim that miracles established the validity of the Christian revelation, Hume pointed out that different religions claim miracles, so they cannot be used to validate Christian truth claims.

None of these arguments has the cogency in our post-Enlightenment age that they had in Hume's day. No contemporary scientist holds Hume's concept of 'the laws of nature'. Radical changes in our understanding of physics and developments in the philosophy of science mean that most scientists have a much more 'open texture' understanding of the way the natural world operates than the eighteenth century 'clockwork universe' view. We have learnt to be less dismissive of the experiences of 'ignorant and barbarous nations' and are much more ready to accept counter instances to observed regularities than Hume would allow. And the debate on the relationship between the natural and the supernatural, between science and religion, has opened new ways of accommodating one to the other. In particular, a number of creative suggestions have been made by Christian thinkers to help us picture how the 'divine action' of the personal God of Christianity can be reconciled with the observed consistency of the world around us. Rather than trying to find ways in which God is enabled to break in to an autonomous natural process, we are more inclined to view the process itself as the action of *God, who incorporates the specific 'miraculous' events into the whole. At the other end of the scale, unpredictability and openness at the sub-nuclear level open up the possibility of totally unexpected events without subverting the observed principles of physics.

The continuance of miracles

Although *exorcisms, *healings and the like were accepted as part of both Christian and non-Christian cultures in the early Christian centuries, some, such as *Irenaeus, suggested that the pattern of miracles seen in the Gospels and Acts was not to be expected as the norm, and that miracles were gradually dying out. Miracles continued, however; *Augustine, for instance, gives us a list of contemporary (fifth-century) miracles for which he could personally vouch, including spectacular instantaneous healings. As the centuries went by, miracles continued to occur, but they tended to be linked with special sanctity and with martyrs and their relics, a concept which has continued to be significant in the Orthodox and Catholic traditions. But in the eyes of the Protestant Reformers this led to abuses, and, in a classic case of overreaction, much of European Protestantism developed a theology that the purpose of miracles was to confirm the validity of revelation, and so, once the Bible was complete, all miracles ceased. With delightful inconsistency, however, most Protestants (apart from Deists and some liberals) remained committed to the concept that God still acts today in the world and answers prayer, even prayer for healing.

This strange compromise was challenged by missionary contact with non-European cultures in the nineteenth century, by the rise of *Pentecostalism at the beginning of the twentieth century, and by the development during the twentieth century of a richer understanding of the purpose of miracles, particularly as an expression of the inbreaking of the kingdom of God. Pentecostals not only rejected the doctrine of the cessation of miracles as having no biblical foundation; they also produced abundant evidence that miracles were still happening, particularly, again, among those whose culture did not present a barrier to their acceptance. The influence of Pentecostalism and of the subsequent charismatic renewal has been felt by all denominations and has produced a widespread, though not yet universal, acceptance of the concept of contemporary miracles. At the same time, a recovery of a holistic concept of *salvation, in which God is seen to be concerned for the physical as well as the spiritual, has made it harder to limit the sphere of his action in the world.

Bibliography

C. Brown, Miracles and the Critical Mind (Grand Rapids and Exeter, 1984); N. L. Geisler, Miracles and the Modern Mind (Grand Rapids, 1992); R. D. Geivett and G. R. Habermas (eds.), In Defence of Miracles (Downers Grove and Leicester, 1997); K. J. Hacking, Signs and Wonders, Then and Now (Leicester, 2006); C. S. Lewis, Miracles (London, 1947); J. C. Polkinghorne, Science and Providence (London, 1989); R. Swinburne, The Concept of Miracle (London and New York, 1970).

P. A. HICKS

MISSIOLOGY

Missiology is a discipline within theology which studies the Christian faith and community as they cross frontiers in mission. Its particular interest is in the nature of their encounter with the non-Christian world. The frontier may be geographical or cultural, and includes other worldviews, ideologies, religious beliefs and practices. NT examples of these frontiers might be pagan rituals in the case of food offered to idols (1 Cor. 8), syncretistic beliefs in Colossae or the political authority of the Roman Empire (Rom. 13:1-7; 1 Pet. 2:13-17).

Missiology focuses on what happens at the border, where Christian people engage with non-Christian beliefs and practices. It surveys the activities of the church ad extra. So, missiology examines the expansion (or retraction) of the Christian faith as carried throughout the world by a self-consciously distinct community, beginning in Jerusalem around AD 30 and spreading throughout the inhabited world.

In recent years there has been a considerable debate about its relationship to theological studies. Traditionally, it has been viewed as one discipline among others in the theological curriculum. Often it has been studied as a field in practical theology only after a groundwork in biblical and systematic studies has been undertaken. Sometimes it has been offered only as an optional subject. However, as the church's calling to mission has become increasingly prominent throughout the worldwide Christian community, a growing number of people believe that missiology is an integrating factor for all the disciplines. Given the constant missionary concern of the God revealed in Jesus Christ and in the Spirit's testimony within the church, some speak of the inescapably missionary nature of all theology.

Whatever the precise way of understanding the theological task, missiology relates closely to all the classic theological subjects. Thus, biblical study investigates the basis and rationale for the expansion of the Christian community in the missio Dei, highlighted in the calling of Abraham to be a blessing for all peoples (Gen. 12:1–3), the election of Israel to be a light to the nations (Isa. 49:6), Jesus' commission to his disciples to be his witnesses to the ends of the earth and the end of time (Matt. 28:18–20; Acts 1:8), the work of the Spirit (John 15:26; 16:7–11), the universal offer of salvation (1 Tim. 2:3–4), the new community of the reign of God (Matt. 11:11) and the promise of new heavens and a new earth (2 Pet. 3:13, Rev. 21). Historical study surveys the expansion of the *church at various periods, assesses its impact on different societies and cultures and investigates what factors have encouraged or discouraged its growth (e.g. the rise of *Christendom, the coming of *Islam, the challenge of the *Enlightenment, Western colonialism). *Systematic theology studies the self-understanding of Christian faith in the context of approval, opposition, indifference or rapid change (such as the encounter with other faiths, modern *science, cultural and ethical pluralism and *globalization) and how it adjusts its message to communicate better with the changing assumptions behind a society's prevailing values. Ethical studies are incorporated into missiology to evaluate the legitimacy of ends and means in mission and orientate the church in its responsibility to declare God's will for the whole of life (see *Ethics; *Social ethics). Pastoral theology has to deal with problematic questions that occur on the frontiers of *culture, such as the practice of baptism in hostile environments, polygamy, the veneration of ancestors, the caste system and same-gender relations. It may also consider the use of cultural symbols and art-forms in the church's worship and other activities (see *Contextualization; *Cultural theory and theology).

Due to the wide scope of missiology, it has an important role to play in the integration of other areas of theology. Every aspect of theology has an inescapably missiological dimension, for, by its nature, theology exists as a critical companion of the church's mission. Missiology has a descriptive and analytical task: explaining how and why the Christian faith has expanded across frontiers. It also has a critical dimension in assessing good and bad mission practice, according to criteria which themselves have to be kept under review. Finally, it has a constructive role to play in contributing to a discussion on more adequate mission thinking and practice. In other words, it has both descriptive and normative tasks to fulfil.

In popular imagination, mission is often conceived only in terms of Christians crossing national frontiers to spread the gospel. This view reflects a past age when Christians tended to divide the world neatly into Christian and non-Christian. Today, however, 'the missionary frontier runs around the world. It is the line which separates belief from unbelief.' Mission takes place from and to all continents and within each nation. It is both global and local.

Some Christians want to restrict mission to *evangelism, understood as proclaiming the good news about Jesus Christ and inviting people to believe in him for salvation. Others, on the contrary, believe that every aspect of mission (e.g. serving the needs of the poor) is evangelism. A third group accept that mission is more than evangelism and not all mission is evangelism, yet suppose that evangelism is the primary calling of the church. However, there also exists a new impulse to discover an integral mission, which overcomes all false dichotomies.

Mission conveys the biblical idea of 'being sent', classically expressed in Jesus' saying: 'As the Father has sent me, I am sending you' (John 20:21). The parallel between God sending Jesus and Jesus sending his disciples describes both the method and the content of mission. The church is sent by Jesus, its head, in the power of the Spirit into every part of the world to be an agent and embodiment of God's new order of righteousness (see *Kingdom of God). It does not include everything the church does nor everything God does in the world. Nevertheless, 'the church is by its very nature missionary' (Ad Gentes). 'A church exists by mission as a fire exists by burning' (Emil Brunner).

There are a number of diverse, but intimately related, models or paradigms of mission. Each is vitally important. By stressing one more than the others, different groups of Christians have tended to see them as alternatives. Ideally, there is no choice. The Christian community's vocation is to ensure that each is fully implemented in its overall life.

(1) The care of the environment. This means encouraging a wise and sustainable use of the natural order created by God, by engaging in the numerous aspects of conservation and the elimination of pollution (see *Creation, *Nature, theology of). The church will point to the Creator's gift of life, which implies there are sufficient resources for all to have enough, as long as a small minority renounces the ambition of an expanding consumerist lifestyle and learns to enjoy material goods in a restrained way. Only then will future generations inherit an earth restored to health, that is able to support fully everyone's basic needs.

(2) Service among human beings without distinction and whatever their needs. This means a particular concern for vulnerable people, such as those economically excluded from society, the disabled, old people, the bereaved, children at risk and families in tension, refugees, the victims of drought and famine, bonded-labourers and those who suffer as the result of their misuse of alcohol, drugs and gambling (see *Poverty and wealth). It has a particular responsibility to work in the rehabilitation of criminals. The church will fulfil its mission by helping to set up projects that will strengthen the ability of all to decide their own future, such as development schemes, micro-industries, literacy campaigns, health care, education and housing programmes. It will provide shelter for the victims of violence and offer rehabilitation programmes for those suffering from destructive lifestyles.

(3) Witness to 'the truth as it is in Jesus' (Eph. 4:21). This includes a number of tasks, like *apologetics, personal evangelism and church planting. Bearing witness means both the verbal communication of the apostolic gospel and the visual demonstration of its power to bring new life and hope to human relationships and communities.

(4) The promotion of God's justice and healing in society (see *Righteousness; *Society, theology of). To this end, Christians will challenge the damaging effects (including modern slavery) of present global economic forces (see *Globalization), the corrosive effects of affluence (especially political corruption), the destructive fruits of poverty and any policy which serves the powerful rather than the powerless. In places of conflict and violence they are to be peace-makers (see *Pacifism/peace). In particular, the church will be active in promoting and defending the integrity of *family life against easy divorce, abortion, casual or abnormal sexual relationships, pornography, the exploitation of women and children (see *Sexuality), and experimentation on early human life. Finally, it will protest against the immoral arms trade between rich and poor nations.

(5) The practice of being a reconciled and liberated community. It is sent to demonstrate the reality of God's unmerited *grace by loving the enemy, practising forgiveness (see *Guilt and forgiveness), sharing goods and resources, eliminating prejudice and suspicion, and exercising *power as servanthood, not as domination and control.

Missiology engages in serious historical and theological reflection on all these aspects of the church's mission. In addition it has focused in recent years on a number of specific issues. Is it right for Christians to be involved in violence to overthrow non-elected, repressive regimes (see *Revolution, theology of)? What is the right approach in sharing Christ with people of other faiths – dialogue, proclamation or simply presence among them? (See *Christianity and other religions.) Is it even legitimate to evangelize them at all? Should communities of ethnically and culturally homogeneous groups be encouraged for the sake of church growth? Is there a task for mission towards the whole of a culture or subculture? What does the gospel as public truth mean (Newbigin)? What role, if any, should mission agencies, which exist independently of any church, play in evangelism, relief or development? How may human and financial resources be shared in genuine Christian partnership between different parts of the worldwide church in a way which commends the gospel? Each of these questions has many practical entailments. They are not fully resolved. They will constitute part of the missiological agenda for many years to come.

Bibliography

R. A. Ahonen, Mission in the New Millennium: Theological Grounds for World Mission (Helsinki, 2006); S. B. Bevans and R. P. Schroeder, Constants in Context: A Theology of Mission for Today (New York, 2004); D. Bosch, Transforming Mission: Paradigm Shifts in Theology of Mission (Maryknoll, 1991); S. Escobar, The New Global Mission: The Gospel from Everywhere to Everyone (Downers Grove, 2003); D. L. Guder, The Continuing Conversion of the Church (Grand Rapids, 2000); J. A. Kirk, What Is Mission? Theological Explorations (London, 1999); L. Newbigin, The Gospel in a Pluralist Society (London, 1989); H. Peskett and V. Ramachandra, The Message of Mission (Leicester, 2003); V. Ramachandra, The Recovery of Mission: Beyond the Pluralist Paradigm (Carlisle, 1996); L. Sanneh, Whose Religion Is Christianity? The Gospel beyond the West (Grand Rapids, 2003); D. Smith, Mission after Christendom (London, 2003); T. Sundermeier, The Theology of Missions (New York, 1997); N. Thomas, Classic Texts in Mission and World Christianity (Maryknoll, 1995); A. Walls, The Missionary Movement in Christian History: Studies in the Transmission of Faith (New York, 1996); T. Yates, Mission in the Twentieth Century (Cambridge, 1996).

J. A. KIRK

MOBERLY, ROBERT CAMPBELL (1845–1903)

Robert Moberly was a creative *Anglo-Catholic theologian. The son of Bishop G. H. Moberly of Salisbury, he was educated at Winchester and New College, Oxford. Moberly was successively principal of St Stephen's House, Oxford (1876), the Diocesan Theological College, Salisbury (1878), incumbent at Great Bedworth, Cheshire (1880–92), and Oxford's regius professor of pastoral theology from 1892 until his death. He was self-consciously a writer and is remembered primarily for his theological works. A *liberal Anglo-Catholic, Moberly contributed an essay 'The Incarnation as the Basis of Dogma' to the controversial Oxford publication Lux Mundi (1889). His influential Ministerial Priesthood (London, 1897) reflects a High Anglican justification of Anglican orders and centres on Christ's priesthood as determinative of the basis and nature of a 'ministerial priesthood' in the church (see *Ministry). Atonement and Personality (London, 1901) is a more significantly liberal reinterpretation of the *atonement, based on *Hegelian views of personality and the redemptive power of Christ's exemplary life and *satisfaction for sin. His other noteworthy works are Sorrow, Sin and Beauty (London, 1889), Christ Our Life (sermons, London, 1902), Udenominationalism as a Principle of Primary Education (London, 1902) and Problems and Principles (collected papers, London, 1904).

Bibliography

Appreciations by: A. Clark, DNB, Second Supplement 1901–11, vol. 2, pp. 624–626; W. H. Moberly, JTS 6 (1905), pp. 1–19; W. Sanday, JTS 4 (1903), pp. 481–499.

Studies: R. S. Franks, A History of the Doctrine of the Work of Christ, vol. 2 (London, 1918); M. Hutchison, 'Classics Revisited: Ministerial Priesthood, R. C. Moberly', Anvil 2, 1985, pp. 247–253; T. A. Langford, In Search of Foundations: English Theology 1900–1920 (Nashville and New York, 1969).

C. D. HANCOCK

MODELS

'Model' became a technical term in theology in the second half of the twentieth century, having been borrowed from the scientific world. In science a model is a kind of 'visual aid' – a set of ideas, or a natural process, or some other series of known phenomena, which can be used as a guideline for investigating relatively unknown areas. A simple example of this is the old picture of the nervous system as similar to a network of ropes, levers and pulleys. This example also serves to show that as scientific knowledge advances, certain models have to be discarded as inadequate, and replaced by others – for example, the picturing of the nervous system as a series of electrical impulses.

Theology has in fact always needed to use models, for the reality being described transcends the world from which language is taken and used to describe that transcendent reality. A classic example of a model in theology is the use of 'word' in the OT and John 1, and from the history of doctrine we could take the *Logos concept of the *apologists, *Augustine's trinitarian analogies, or the body-soul picture of the union of natures in Christ. One of the major issues in *Christology today is whether language about 'two natures' is itself a model that needs to be discarded, or at least revised. There is the danger, however, that the introduction of new models can lead, not to a greater understanding of the mystery of Christ, but to the elimination of that mystery, as Christ is reduced to the status of a mere man.

The concept of a theological 'model' has also been linked to questions about *religious language, particularly the role of metaphors. Sallie McFague proposed 'Metaphorical Theology' as a correction to abstract conceptual *systematic theology, relating theology more closely to the 'first-order' language of experience. A 'model' was an extended and relatively permanent metaphor which became definitive and was used systematically to organize thought and so draw practical and ethical implications. McFague saw the parables of Jesus as such extended metaphors, although (in line with feminist thought) she also argued that new models for God (such as mother, lover and friend) were needed to counter the patriarchal and hierarchical models in the Christian tradition which had become idolatrous. Without subscribing to the view that new models could critique biblical models, other theologians have explored the use of such definitive metaphors or models in Christian doctrine. John McIntyre and Colin *Gunton examined the use of models in the doctrine of the *atonement. Gunton particularly emphasized that although doctrine had to use models, these were not to be regarded as fictions, but were necessary ways of referring to the reality of God's saving action.

See also: ANALOGY; PARADIGM; RAMSEY, IAN THOMAS.

Bibliography

I. G. Barbour, Myths, Models and Paradigms (London, 1974); C. Gunton, The Actuality of Atonement (Edinburgh, 1998); S. McFague, Metaphorical Theology: Models for God in Religious Language (Philadelphia, 1982); idem, Models of God: Theology for an Ecological, Nuclear Age (Philadelphia, 1987); J. McIntyre, The Shape of Christology (London, 1966); idem, The Shape of Soteriology (Edinburgh, 1995); I. T. Ramsey, Models and Mystery (London, 1964).

M. DOWLING

MODERNISM (CATHOLIC)

Roman Catholic modernism is the term applied to a loose-knit movement at the end of the nineteenth and beginning of the twentieth centuries in which scholars, working in a number of different fields, tried to bridge the gap between Christianity as traditionally understood by the Roman Catholic Church and the world of modern thought and knowledge. Since the Counter-Reformation Rome had increasingly presented Christian truth as a logically watertight, *scholastic system. Against this static, unhistorical understanding, and against the authoritarianism by which it was imposed, a diverse group of scholars protested. They claimed that crucial questions about the historical origins of the Bible, the *development of doctrine, the self-understanding of the church and the relation of religion to *science were going unheard. The 'modernists', as they were called by Rome, and as some of them came to call themselves, insisted that these questions had to be faced. Pope Leo XIII (1878–1903) appeared to give some encouragement to the attempt.

Alfred Loisy (1857–1940) was a brilliant biblical scholar who dedicated himself to the application of modern, critical methods. In 1890 he became Professor of Holy Scripture at the Institut Catholique in Paris. Loisy taught, as 'permanent acquisitions of knowledge', that the Pentateuch in its present form cannot be the work of Moses, that the first chapters of Genesis do not contain an exact and reliable account of the beginnings of humankind, that the historical books of the Bible, including those of the NT, were composed 'in a looser manner than modern historical writing', and that there is a real development of doctrine within Scripture. Through the ineptitude of his rector, he lost his job in 1893 and became chaplain of a girls' school for five years. When Adolf *Harnack published his classic liberal Protestant account of Christian origins, What Is Christianity? (1900), Loisy already had to hand all the material for a comprehensive refutation, which was critical of Harnack's individualistic understanding of the gospel and his rejection of *apocalyptic, but in some respects was even more radical than Harnack on questions of gospel criticism. In L'Évangile et l'église (Paris, 1902), Loisy stressed the continuity between the ministry of Jesus and the life of the church: 'Jesus foretold the *Kingdom and it was the church that came.' The sharp distinction he made between history and faith, and the concession he allowed at the historical level, were unacceptable at Rome. Loisy made his meaning even clearer in a second book, and five of his works, including L'Évangile et l'église, were placed on the Index in 1903. Understandably, Loisy could not accept the condemnation as a comment on his historical work, but, largely because of political relations between France and Rome, he was not excommunicated until 1908.

A second important name is that of the British *Jesuit, George Tyrrell (1861–1909). He was not a scholar in the same sense as Loisy, but was the most gifted writer of the movement. In a series of brilliantly readable books and articles on devotion, ethics and apologetics, written between 1897 and 1909, he pleaded for a new synthesis between Christianity and 'science' and particularly *history. He became an ever more outspoken critic of the rationalist and authoritarian mentality of Rome. From 1900, he was in serious conflict with his Jesuit superiors. In 1906 he was dismissed from the Jesuits, and when, in 1907, he published in The Times a searing critique of the anti-modernist encyclical Pascendi, he was excommunicated. Tyrrell, like Loisy, rejected the notion that the *dogmas of the church had been revealed in propositional form. He stressed '*revelation as experience' and dogma as the human attempt to speak about that experience. The function of dogma is not primarily to inform the mind, but to promote the life of charity. The key to religious life is not theology, but prayer and love, and the test of religious truth is pragmatic, the truth of dogma being measured by its power to promote sanctity.

An important influence upon both Loisy and Tyrrell was the philosopher Maurice Blondel (1861–1949). In L'Action (Paris, 1893), he presented a *phenomenology of man as an integrated being, active in the world. It was Blondel, with Lucien Laberthonnière (1860–1932), who showed how the *supernatural could be regarded not as an alien element imposing itself from without upon the natural, but as the transcendental presupposition of all human action. The supernatural is not 'extrinsic' to the natural life of man, but discerned within the natural by 'the method of immanence'.

If there was a coherent Catholic 'modernist movement' in France, Italy and England, the common factor among the scholars involved was friendship with Baron Friedrich von *Hügel, himself a biblical scholar and critical historian of *mysticism. Von Hügel sought them out, corresponded with them, and brought them into touch with each other. Like Blondel, he eluded condemnation.

From the accession, in 1903, of Pius X, a man of simple and intolerant devotion, scholars such as these were regarded as a deadly threat to the Catholic faith. In 1907, the encyclical Pascendi warned against 'the doctrine of the modernists', and presented the picture of a composite 'modernist' who, as philosopher, founded his religious philosophy on agnosticism; as believer, rejected the notion of propositional revelation; as theologian, believed that dogmas represent divine reality only in 'symbolical' fashion; as historian, was a rationalist who excluded the miraculous; as critic, believed that Scripture is a human summary of religious experiences; and as apologist, tried to promote *religious experience, not the acceptance of religious truth. 'Modernism' (which was never a system) was branded as 'the synthesis of all heresies', and from 1910 an anti-modernist oath was imposed on Roman Catholic clergy. Not until after the Second *Vatican Council (1962–65) did Roman Catholic scholarship recover confidence in critical study of the Bible and of Christian origins.

Bibliography

A. F. Loisy, L'Évangile et l'église (Paris, 1902), ET, The Gospel and the Church (London, 1903); idem, Mémoires pour servir l'histoire religieuse de notre temps, 3 vols. (Paris, 1930–31); M. O'Connell, Critics on Trial: An Introduction to the Catholic Modernist Crisis (Washington DC, 1994); E. Poulat, Histoire, dogme et critique dans la crise moderniste (Paris, 1979); G. Tyrrell, Christianity at the Crossroads (London, 1909); A. R. Vidler, The Modernist Movement in the Roman Church (Cambridge, 1934).

N. SAGOVSKY

MODERNISM (ENGLISH)

English modernism was a school of late nineteenth- and early twentieth-century theology loosely united by the belief that the proper response to modern thought is to make radical alterations in Christian doctrine. This is an assumption on which much religious thinking has proceeded since the *Enlightenment, but in modernism the assumption became an explicit principle.

The name was first given to a school of Roman Catholic theologians, represented in France by A. F. Loisy (1857–1940) and in Britain by Baron F. von *Hügel and by G. Tyrrell (1861–1909), which was condemned by Rome in 1907. It adopted a far-reaching biblical criticism and a sceptical attitude towards Christian origins and traditional *dogma, emphasizing ethical conduct and, sometimes, *mystical devotion (see *Modernism, Catholic).

In the different context of English Protestantism, modernism displayed many of the same features. There was the same rationalistic demolition of biblical authority and traditional doctrine, the same emphasis on *ethics (the moral example and moral teaching of Jesus being particularly emphasized), and in some writers, notably Dean W. R. Inge (1860–1954), the same concern for mystical devotion. The affirmation of human goodness and of historical *progress in rational and moral thought, and the denial of any real distinction between the natural and the *supernatural or between *Christianity and other religions, were frequent themes. The divinity of Jesus was often explained as different only in degree from the divinity of every person made in the image of God.

Though theology of this kind had many representatives in the free churches, it attracted most notice in the Church of England, where its proponents were linked together by the Modern Churchmen's Union (founded 1898; now the Modern Churchpeople's Union), and where one of them, E. W. Barnes (1874–1953), became in 1924 Bishop of Birmingham. In this position he gained notoriety by his attacks on what he regarded as Anglo-Catholic superstition and especially by the publication of his sceptical book The Rise of Christianity (London, 1947), after which the archbishops of both Canterbury and York publicly called on him to resign. Modernism was by this date rapidly declining. Its ideas of human goodness and progress had been discredited by the experience of Nazism, culminating in the events of the Second World War, and its Anglican representatives had always had conscientious problems with the supernaturalism of the Book of Common Prayer and especially with the obligation to use the *creeds. The radicalism that arose in the 1960s, when the war was sufficiently far past and the Prayer Book revision had started, brought back many of the ideas of the modernists, but not their strong ethical emphasis (cf. *Robinson, John Arthur Thomas).

In many ways the most distinguished of the English modernists was Hastings Rashdall (1858–1924), teacher of philosophy at Oxford and afterwards dean of Carlisle. Apart from his standard history of the European universities, he wrote a great variety of theological works, notably The Theory of Good and Evil (Oxford, 1970), propounding a modified utilitarian ethics, Philosophy and Religion (London, 1909), defending *idealism as a basis for religious philosophy, and The Idea of Atonement in Christian Theology (London, 1919), upholding the *Abelardian or exemplarist theory of the *atonement, and rejecting the idea of *substitutionary *sacrifice as abhorrent to modern conceptions of justice. Rashdall was also strongly opposed to mysticism, thus demonstrating the variety of opinion possible among modernists.

Bibliography

P. Badham, The Contemporary Challenge of Modernist Theology (Cardiff, 1998); H. P. V. Nunn, What Is Modernism? (London, 1932); M. Rayner, 'The Theology of Hastings Rashdall' (PhD theses, University of Gloucestershire, 2005); A. M. G. Stephenson, The Rise and Decline of English Modernism (London, 1984).

R. T. BECKWITH

MODERNITY

In cultural discourse, 'modernity' refers to the culture that developed in Europe and North America, coming to full flower by the early twentieth century. The use of science to investigate nature, and the development of industrialization, coupled with democratic politics and market-based economies, have led to an astonishingly rapid rise in material wealth. It is this process of high-speed development that marks contemporary Western culture out as unique in world history.

The roots of modernity are complex and controversial. Some writers will trace it as far back as the Reformation, seeing a rejection of tradition and an invitation to individual intellectual enquiry there, which eventually leads to the *Enlightenment and modernity. Certainly the development of the method of natural science in the seventeenth century is an important ingredient in the mix, as are the new political and economic ideas of the eighteenth century, and the industrial revolution of the nineteenth century. However these relative influences are evaluated, by 1910 (say) a culture has come into being that is able to develop technologically and economically with increasing rapidity.

Modern culture borrowed a rhetoric of *rationality and progress from the Enlightenment, understanding itself in wholly positive terms, and assuming that further technological advance, and so an increase of modernity, would supply the solution to any problem still remaining in society. This mythology was already criticized in the first half of the nineteenth century, by both artists (Shelley's Frankenstein) and social activists (the Luddites). The history of the twentieth century has generated increasing disenchantment and criticism: technology has led to the most terrible wars ever seen, to the possibility of industrial genocide in the *holocaust/shoa, and to the threat of nuclear destruction. At the same time, rising understanding of the environment (see *Ecology) has led to an appreciation of the real costs of industrial growth, and post-colonial theorists have questioned the extent to which Western development was based simply on imperialism and the oppression of non-Western peoples. Further, the experience of *alienation and loss of meaning even in the midst of unparalleled wealth has led to disenchantment within modern culture. These streams of criticism have coalesced into the rise of *postmodernity, although in economic and social terms, Western culture remains resolutely modern.

Christianity has not flourished in modernity, although the rise of evangelicalism might be the one great exception. In the nineteenth century there was a general assumption that Christianity and modernity belonged together; with the critique of modernity, there has been an increasing realization that modern culture, too, needs to be challenged and transformed by the gospel. This was crystallized for many in the works of Lesslie *Newbigin.

Bibliography

L. Cahoone (ed.), From Modernism to Postmodernism: An Anthology (Oxford, 2003); C. E. Gunton, The One, the Three and the Many: God, Creation and the Culture of Modernity (Cambridge, 1993).

S. R. HOLMES

MÖHLER, JOHANN ADAM (1796–1838)

Johann Möhler was a German Catholic theologian and church historian, who taught at Tübingen and Munich. He gained an early acquaintance with the work of leading contemporary Protestant theologians, notably J. A. W. Neander (1789–1850) and *Schleiermacher, and much of his work is implicitly concerned to mediate between Catholicism and Protestantism, most especially in his Symbolik (Mainz, 1832; ET, Symbolism, or Exposition of the Doctrinal Differences . . ., 2 vols., London, 1843), where established confessional divergences are deliberately de-emphasized. His other chief works are Die Einbeit der Kirche (The Unity of the Church) (Tübingen, 1825), Athanasius der Grosse (Athanasius the Great) (Mainz, 1827) and Neue Untersuchungen (New Enquiries) (Vienna, 1834). His earlier work drew charges of unorthodoxy, notably in its assertion of the priority of spiritual church unity over institutional unity guaranteed by communion with the ecclesiastical hierarchy. Later writings shift towards a more positive evaluation of visible, institutional forms of organization, possibly under the influence of *Hegel's theory of religion. Many Catholic *modernist theologians drew inspiration from Möhler's work, which remains one of the decisive influences on post-*Enlightenment Catholic thinking.

Bibliography

J. Fitzer, Möhler and Baur in Controversy (Tallahassee, 1974); R. H. Nienaltowski, J. A. Möhler's Theory of Doctrinal Development (Washington DC, 1959).

J. B. WEBSTER

MOLTMANN, JÜRGEN (b. 1926)

Moltmann is a Protestant theologian, Professor of Systematic Theology at Tübingen (1967–94), and probably the most influential German theologian in the period since 1960.

His major works comprise two series. There is the trilogy of early works: Theology of Hope (London, 1967), The Crucified God (London, 1973) and The Church in the Power of the Spirit (London, 1977). These approach theology from three complementary perspectives: *eschatology, the *cross, and pneumatology (see *Holy Spirit) (including ecclesiology). The second series, comprising six 'contributions' to theology, make up a dogmatics: The Trinity and the Kingdom of God (London, 1981), God in Creation (London, 1985), The Way of Jesus Christ (London, 1990), The Spirit of Life (London, 1992), The Coming of God (London, 1996) and Experiences in Theology (London, 2000).

Thematically Moltmann's theology is notable, first, for rehabilitating futurist eschatology as not only credible but essential to contemporary Christian faith; secondly, for addressing the theodicy problem 'after Auschwitz' from the perspective of the *suffering of God in the cross of Christ; thirdly, for developing a thoroughly trinitarian understanding of God; fourthly, for conceiving the relationship of God and the world as reciprocal and as internal to God's own trinitarian relationships; fifthly, for breaking out of the modern paradigm of reality as human history and giving theological weight to the reciprocal relationship of humanity and the rest of nature.

In his earliest work Moltmann established his theology's Christological centre*, in the particularity of Jesus' history, and its eschatological orientation, in hope for the whole of God's creation. The two events of Jesus' cross and resurrection are understood dialectically, representing the contradiction between what reality is now, in its subjection to *sin, suffering and *death, and what God promises to make it in new creation. Because Jesus in his death was identified with the world in its godlessness, godforsakenness and transitoriness, his resurrection is God's promise for a new future for all reality. It is this all-embracing eschatological perspective that grounds Moltmann's consistently holistic view of both theology and the church's mission. Christian hope is not for the spiritual rather than the material, or for the individual rather than the social, or for the personal rather than the political, or for humans rather than the rest of creation. It is an eschatology that aims to promote involvement in the world, promoting change in anticipation of the coming kingdom and openness to the future that only God can give his creation. Moltmann's political theology stemmed originally from this eschatological approach.

On the other side of the dialectic, the cross is God's loving solidarity in love with the godless and the godforsaken. By recognizing God's presence, as the incarnate Son of God, in the abandonment of the cross, Moltmann brings the dialectic of cross and resurrection within God's own experience. God's love is such that it embraces and suffers what is most opposed to God in order to overcome the contradiction. Moreover, this suffering is internal to God's own trinitarian relationships. On the cross Jesus suffers dying in abandonment by his Father, while the Father suffers in grief the death of his Son. As such, the cross is the act of divine solidarity with the godforsaken world, in which the Son willingly surrenders himself in love for the world and the Father willingly surrenders his Son in love for the world. At the point of their most painful separation, Father and Son are united in their love for the world, and from this event of suffering love comes the power of the Spirit to overcome all that separates the world from God.

In The Crucified God Moltmann's theology became strongly *trinitarian. He developed an understanding of the trinitarian history of God with the world, in which the mutual involvement of God and the world is increasingly stressed. God experiences a history with the world in which he both affects and is affected by the world, and which is also the history of his own trinitarian relationships as a community of divine Persons who include the world within their love. This trinitarian doctrine dominates Moltmann's later work, in which the mutual relationships of the three Persons as a perichoretic, social Trinity are the context for understanding the reciprocal relationships of God and the world. The dialectic of cross and resurrection, now developed in a fully trinitarian way, becomes the decisive moment within this broader trinitarian history, which retains the eschatological direction of Theology of Hope and the crucified God's suffering solidarity with the world, but also goes further in taking the whole of *creation and *history within the divine experience. Essential to this trinitarian narrative of God and reality is the third divine Person, the Holy Spirit. As Moltmann's thought becomes increasingly pneumatological, he recognizes the Spirit as the immanent presence of God in creation and also the Spirit's equal role as one divine Subject in the reciprocal relationships of the Trinity.

With Moltmann's understanding of the Trinity as constituted in the loving and changing relationships of three divine Subjects goes a general principle of relationality and reciprocity. This governs the way Moltmann thinks about the relationship of the *church to other movements and forces in world history; about the relationship of persons in society and in the church; about the relationship of humanity and other creatures; and about the relationship between God and creation. In all these areas Moltmann thinks of relationships of mutuality rather than of dominance or even hierarchy. Whereas 'monotheism' (by which Moltmann means *unitarianism) has in his view constantly legitimated human domination, both of other humans and of nature, social trinitarianism understands God as in himself a fellowship of *love, and so finds relationships of free friendship between humans as most adequately reflecting God and constituting his 'kingdom'. In the political sphere, this principle of mutuality grounds democracy; in the ecclesiological sphere, it coheres with Moltmann's vision of the church as an open society of friends; while in the *ecological sphere, it highlights the interdependence of humanity and the rest of nature.

Moltmann also applies to such relationships the traditional trinitarian term perichoretic. It is in their perichoresis or mutual indwelling in love that the three divine Persons are both three and one. Similarly, God's relationship to his creation is one of mutual indwelling (sometimes called *panentheism). Because God is transcendent beyond the world, it dwells in him, but because, as the Spirit, he is also immanent within the world, he dwells in it. With this dominant notion of the Spirit in creation, Moltmann is able also to take the non-human creation into his general concept of the trinitarian history of God. The whole of creation from the beginning is oriented towards the future goal of its glorification through divine indwelling. The Spirit in creation co-suffers with creation in its bondage to decay, keeping it open to God and to its future with God. Humanity's eschatological goal does not lift us out of the material creation, but confirms our solidarity and relatedness with it.

Moltmann's theological project is now complete, and in Experiences in Theology he reflects on its general character. Throughout the nine major and many minor works Moltmann has combined a creative faithfulness to the central themes of biblical and historical theology with a critical and *praxis-oriented openness to the contemporary world as well as a conviction that theology's task is not only practical but also *doxological.

Bibliography

R. Bauckham, Moltmann: Messianic Theology in the Making (London, 1987); idem, The Theology of Jürgen Moltmann (Edinburgh, 1995); idem (ed.), God Will Be All in All: The Eschatology of Jürgen Moltmann (Edinburgh, 1999); G. Müller-Fahrenholz, The Kingdom and the Power: The Theology of Jürgen Moltmann (London, 2000); J. L. Wakefield, Jürgen Moltmann: A Research Bibliography (Lanham and Oxford, 2002).

R. J. BAUCKHAM

MONARCHIANISM

In the third century, under the general name 'monarchianism', the heresies of *ebionism and *docetism of the second century reappeared. Its basic doctrine that God is one, the sole principle of all existence, was itself an accepted truth of the ethical monotheism of the OT of which Christianity was heir. The term monarchia applied to God had an honourable history. It was used by Plato and Aristotle, and with a more religious connotation by *Philo. *Tertullian, who first gave the name 'monarchianism' to its specific heresy, declares, after examination of its Greek and Latin usage, that monarchia has no other meaning than 'single and individual rule' (Against Praxeas 3).

The heresies of monarchianism developed naturally as a consequence of their initial interest. Where the theological concern was the stronger, it was found necessary to stress the oneness of God against pagan polytheism. The tendency here was to exalt the unity of God at the expense of Christ's divinity. The result was the elaboration of a new form of ebionism, or as now designated 'dynamic monarchianism'. Christ is here conceived as the subject of a special influence or dynamis (Gk 'power') of the one monarchia which came to reside in the man Jesus. For introducing this 'God-denying heresy' that 'Christ was a mere (indwelt) man', Theodotus of Byzantium was expelled from the church in Rome c. 190. Its most formidable exponent was, however, Paul of *Samosata, bishop of Antioch (260–72). For him only a matter of degree marked the difference between Jesus and other men. Jesus entered progressively into such an ethical relationship with God that he became the more penetrated with the divine ousia (see *Substance) until 'out of man he became God'. Paul was condemned by a synod of Antioch in 268. He used the word homoousios to deny that the Son and the Father were distinct beings.

Modalist monarchianism, otherwise designated patripassianism and Sabellianism, started from a firm conviction of Christ's divinity free from all compromising emanationisms and subordinationisms. However, it called in question the integrity of Christ's body and thus verged towards docetism. It sought to unite the deity of the Son and the oneness of God by declaring the designations Father and Son to be modes, or expressions of manifestation, of the one divine being. The view was first elaborated by Noetus of Smyrna (c. 200–25), who 'introduced a heresy from the tenets of Heraclitus' (according to *Hippolytus), and was developed by the anti-*Montanist Praxeas, who brought in the Holy Spirit as the third mode of representation of the one God and thus 'did a twofold service to the devil at Rome: he drove away prophecy and brought in heresy; he put to flight the Paraclete, and crucified the Father' (Tertullian, Against Praxeas 1).

The name of Sabellius (in Rome c. 198–220) is now identified with modalist monarchianism. In the interest of strict monotheism, Sabellius declared that, although the names Father, Son and Holy Spirit were biblical, they were attached to the one being. Thus God as a single monad is manifest in three distinct and successive operations of self-revealing. The unity of God is thus secured at the expense of the divine tri-unity of persons within the Godhead. The Son and the Holy Spirit are but temporary modes of self-expression of the one Father of all. It was the Father who became incarnate as the Son and was crucified (patripassianism, lit. 'Father-suffering'). *Origen's strong assertion of the *Logos as at once eternal with, yet subordinate to, the Father gave the decisive blow to monarchianism.

See also: ADOPTIONISM; MONOTHEISM; TRINITY.

Bibliography

J. F. Bethune-Baker, An Introduction to the Early History of Christian Doctrine (London, 1903); J. L. Gonzalez, A History of Christian Thought, vol. 1 (Nashville, 1970); J. N. D. Kelly, Early Christian Doctrines (London, 1977); G. L. Prestige, God in Patristic Thought (London, 1956).

H. D. McDONALD

MONASTIC THEOLOGY

If theology is the contemplation of God, then monastic theology is devoted to the inner life, practices and spiritual disciplines that nurture that contemplation. Put simply, the term 'monastic theology' refers not just to the local setting of the theologians but to the approach that they adopted. They worked in an atmosphere of commitment and devotion, within the framework of a way of life that has its focus not on externals but on seeking God (from Gk monachos: alone, solitary). Their goal was not the pursuit of knowledge for its own sake, but edification and worship. Their approach was one of meditation and adoration. The theologian was not a detached academic observer studying his material from outside, but a committed, involved participant.

Monastics have been among the most productive spiritual and theological writers down the centuries, and at some periods, notably those up to the Middle Ages, the story of monastic *spirituality is almost indistinguishable from that of theology in general. In later centuries, there arose another form of theology – *scholastic theology. Theology came to be studied outside of the cloister – in the university and other 'secular' (non-monastic) settings. The goal was objective intellectual knowledge. The approach was one of questioning, logic, speculation and disputation as theology became a detached objective science. This approach did not eliminate the older monastic approach, but it was to displace it from the front line of theology. *Bernard of Clairvaux (d. 1153) is called 'the last of the Fathers', although he does not end the list of those who have continued to contribute to monastic spirituality.

The age of monastic theology

Many great names dominate the age of monastic theology: *Clement of Alexandria

(d. 199) and later *Origen (d. 253) developed the ideas on which monastic life and theology was founded. They interpreted the exodus from Egypt, the Sabbath rest and the life of John the Baptist in the desert as symbolizing the need of withdrawal from the desires of the world in order to fully seek and serve God.

In the Writings of Clement of Alexandria and especially of Origen all the essential elements of an ascetical theology may already be found. (H. Chadwick, The Early Church, p. 177)

The Life of Antony was written by *Athanasius, bishop of Alexandria, famous for the part he played in defending orthodoxy at the Council of Nicaea. The biography of Antony of Egypt defined and propagated the monastic life to both East and West, not least in precipitating the conversion of *Augustine of Hippo.

John Cassian (d. 435), a monk in Bethlehem and Egypt, produced a comprehensive monastic theology dependent largely on the teaching of Evagrius Ponticus (d. 399) and their common inspiration, Origen. Having mastered both Greek and Latin he was in a unique position to facilitate monasticism in the West, where he established monasteries in Gaul.

Cassian's writings strongly influenced Benedict of Nursia (480–547), who recommends in his 'rule' that all monks read his Institutes and Conferences (see *Benedict and the Benedictine tradition). *Gregory the Great used Cassian's teaching on compunction and prayer and built on his teaching about the active and contemplative paradox of monastic theology. Cassian is the only Latin author to be found in the 'Sayings of the Desert Fathers' (Apophthegmata) and the Greek Philokalia.

Both Cassian and Augustine remind us that the essence of monastic life lies with the aspiration and intention with which it is lived rather than in its structures or disciplines. They are nothing without a renunciation of the heart towards love. The monastic life has no meaning if it does not turn the soul towards God. The quest for purity of heart and the seeking of God alone in both the contemplative and practical aspects of life, all of which finds its fulfilment in heaven, is a theme taken up by all writers on monastic theology and popularized in the twentieth century by the Trappist monk and writer, Thomas *Merton.

Monastic theology was lived, preached and written in the monastery and was above all a theology rooted in experience. Theologians are those who can write or talk about God with the authority of their own experience of God. The writings of Augustine were prized especially for their spiritual teaching, and the *mystical teaching of Gregory and Bernard are among the greatest achievements of monastic theology.

Fundamental themes of monastic theology include the concept of spiritual warfare, which the monk is called to wage against evil spirits that threaten him on all sides (see *Devil and demons). This conflict takes place in the heart, and the struggle against evil thoughts, the need for vigilance, guarding the heart, and discernment of spirits is a daily battle. Honesty and confession to a spiritual father is useful because even when beaten the discovery of our weakness through self-knowledge helps our humility. It also strengthens our virtue and brings the reward of being able to help others similarly afflicted.

Monastic theology was based primarily on Scripture which, together with the Fathers, was read daily in the lectio divina ('divine reading'). Although Scripture was central, the aim was not a literal, scientific exegesis. Nevertheless, monastic exegesis was disciplined, with a strong emphasis on Scripture being interpreted by Scripture in handling the sacred text. Also of great importance was the allegorical interpretation of the Bible, with special emphasis on the Song of Solomon and the life of Moses, together with the Genesis account of the earlier patriarchs. This was because the monastic tradition regarded the individual soul as the bride of Christ, and interpreted OT love poetry in this sense. The patriarchal period was attractive, because of its emphasis on desert life, which corresponded to the origins of monasticism.

In summary, monastic theology is that which is characteristic of the reflections and disciplines of those leading an ascetic life either in contemplative seclusion or following a common life in a monastery.

The scholastic endeavour is to a greater degree occasioned by the need for action in the Church: controversy, pastoral administration or again the solution of new questions. Monastic thought is less affected by the concerns of the moment: rather it is governed only by the enduring necessities of the search for God. (J. Leclercq, The Love of Learning and the Desire for God, pp. 279–280)

See also: ASCETICISM AND MONASTICISM.

Bibliography

H. Chadwick, The Early Church (New York, 1968); P. King, Western Monasticism (Michigan, 1999); J. Leclercq, The Love of Learning and the Desire for God (New York and London, 2nd 1974); C. Stewart, Cassian the Monk (New York, 1998).

J. T. MILLER

MONISM

As a philosophical theory, monism is the view that all reality is ultimately one, not twofold (as in *dualism) and not many. The one, however, may be understood either quantitatively or qualitatively. In the first sense everything is numerically one, and any plurality that appears is either illusory (e.g. Parmenides and the Greek Eleatic school, sixth–fifth centuries BC) or else a transitory mode of operation of the underlying one (e.g. *Spinoza). In the second sense everything is of one kind, which may be either physical (as in naturalism and *materialism), or immaterial and spiritual (as in *idealism), or else neutral with regard to the matter-spirit distinction. Quantitative monism applied to religion erases the God-creation distinction that is basic to *theistic belief, thereby leading to forms of *pantheism or *panentheism as in Neoplatonic and *Hegelian theology. Qualitative monism applied to religion takes theism to be a kind of metaphysical idealism (e.g. *Berkeley) or else a panpsychism (e.g. *process theology).

The difficulty with monism is that when everything is treated as one, the over-generalization involved elides important distinctions, and so tends to a reductionist position. Mind or spirit is reduced to a by-product of physical processes, individuality is diminished, any ultimate distinction between good and evil is eroded, and the transcendence of God (either numerically or qualitatively) is lost. In some Eastern religions, and in F. H. Bradley (1846–1924), God is therefore one manifestation of the all-inclusive Absolute Being, rather than himself the one eternal reality.

Bibliography

J. Schaffer, 'Monism: The Priority of the Whole', Philosophical Review 119:1 (2010);

T. Sider, 'Against Monism', Analysis 67:1 (2007), pp. 1–7.

A. F. HOLMES

MONOPHYSITISM

The seeds of monophysitism, that the person of the incarnate Christ was of one nature only (monos, 'single'; physis, 'nature'), are present in *Cyril of Alexandria's polemic against *Nestorius. Cyril's That Christ Is One affirms that 'there is one nature (mia physis) of God the Word incarnate, but worshipped with his flesh as one worship'. While, according to *Harnack, Cyril's theory is pure but unintentional monophysitism, he cannot be said to state the view precisely. That was done by Eutyches, the aged anti-Nestorian monk of Constantinople (c. 378–454). Eutyches supported Cyril against Nestorius at the Synod of Ephesus, 431, but was himself accused by Eusebius of Dorylaeum in 448 of confounding the two natures and was deposed by Flavian, bishop of Constantinople (d. 449). By court support Eutyches had Flavian's decision reversed at the Latrocinium (Robber Synod) of Ephesus, 449. Both put their case to *Leo of Rome for judgment. Leo's decision went against Eutyches, and his doctrine was consequently repudiated at *Chalcedon (see *Christology) and Eutyches again deposed and exiled.

Eutyches' view was simply a reaction from Nestorianism in favour of *Apollinarianism. Faced with the question whether he confessed two natures in the incarnate Christ, Eutyches declared 'our Lord to have become out of two natures before the union. But I confess one nature after the union.' He conceived of Christ as a mingling of two natures, which constituted him a tertium quid. In the union the divine had the major share, the humanity being merged with deity as a drop of honey mingled with the ocean.

Leo's Tome in which he repudiated Eutyches' monophysitism became one of the bases of the dogma of Chalcedon. Chalcedon declared for the two natures after the union, but gave no explanation of how they unite in the one Christ. The Chalcedonian Definition was not, however, well received everywhere in the East. The Cyrilline formula, 'one nature of the Word made flesh', had popular allegiance and was sometimes defended with outbursts of violence.

After Chalcedon monophysitism diverged into two main streams. The more moderate, the Severans, following Severus the monophysite Patriarch of Antioch (c. 460–538), adhered closely to Cyril, considering the two natures to be a mere ideal abstraction. They strongly asserted the humanness of the resultant nature which they declared capable of corruption in itself like ours. Monophysites of this type were sometimes called phthartolatrai, worshippers of the corruptible, by their opponents. The other group, the Julianists, after Julian, bishop of Halicarnassus (deposed c. 518), adopted the stance of Eutyches. For them Christ's human body was so modified by union with the divine as to be rendered incorruptible. Christ suffered by an act of his own will, and not because he possessed a corruptible human nature. They were consequently referred to as the aphthartodokētai, teachers of the incorruptible, or as the phantasiastai, declarers of Christ's body as merely phantasmal.

Another group, who flourished c. 519 in Constantinople and taught that one of the Trinity suffered in the flesh, were called theopaschitai by their opponents for teaching that 'God suffered'.

The usurper Basiliscus' (d. 477) Encyclion of 476, pressing on all Eastern sees the 'one nature' doctrine, and the Emperor Zeno's Henoticon of 482, declaring the *Nicene *Creed as alone binding, served merely to intensify opposition to and support for Chalcedon. In the sixth century Leontius of Byzantium (see *Hypostasis), by interpreting Chalcedon in a Cyrilline sense, succeeded in bringing most of the East and West finally to concur in affirming the Chalcedonian dogma.

Monophysitism remains the official interpretation of Christology in the *Oriental Orthodox churches. However, recent decades have seen an increasing awareness of Christological convergence between these churches and the Chalcedonians, both (Eastern) Orthodox and Roman Catholic.

Bibliography

C. Chaillot and A. Belopopsky (eds.), Towards Unity: The Theological Dialogue Between the Orthodox Church and the Oriental Orthodox Churches (Geneva, 1998); R. C. Chesnut, Three Monophysite Christologies (Oxford, 1976); W. H. C. Frend, The Rise of the Monophysite Movement (London, 1972); A. A. Race, Monophysitism, Past and Present (London, 1920);

W. A. Wigram, The Separation of the Monophysites (London, 1923); F. Young, From Nicaea to Chalcedon (London, 1983).

H. D. McDONALD

MONOTHEISM

Monotheism is the term used to describe the concept of believing in and worshipping one God, as opposed to polytheism*, which is the belief in and worshipping of many gods, or henotheism, which presupposes the existence of several gods but accepts only one God as the supreme authority. The term is most commonly associated with the faiths of Judaism, Christianity and Islam because of what many scholars perceive as their common heritage in Abraham who is regarded as the common ancestor of all three faiths.

These world faiths describe themselves as monotheistic in different ways. Judaism, the oldest of the three, calls for a monotheism that recognizes that God is unique in relation to creation and not part of it. Judaism requires a rigorous adherence to the first commandment of the Decalogue: 'You shall have no other gods before me' (Exod. 20:3). The sole lordship of God is summarized in the central Jewish confession, the Shema: 'Hear, O Israel, the LORD our God, the LORD is one' (Deut. 6:4). Implicit in Jewish monotheism is the hope that one day all people of the world will recognize the God of Israel as the one and only God: 'The LORD will be king over the whole earth. On that day there will be one LORD, and his name the only name' (Zech. 14:9).

Christian monotheism is better described as trinitarianism. For Christians, the one and only God of Israel is decisively revealed in the self-giving love of the crucified and risen Jesus, in the love of the Father who sent him, and in the life-giving Spirit who pours God's love into the hearts of believers. The doctrine of the *Trinity thus affirms that God is one with the eternal *Logos of God incarnate in the crucified Jesus, and one with his life-giving Spirit. The one God freely *loves in God's own being in all eternity and freely shares that love with humanity, drawing humanity into communion with God and each other. The chief end of human existence is therefore to take part in the triune love of God extended to humanity by Jesus Christ in the power of the Holy Spirit (see *Love of God).

Islam, the youngest of the three monotheistic faiths, understands itself as radical and uncompromising monotheism. Allah is uniquely one. For Muslims this precludes any notion of multiple deities or of creatures sharing in the being of the one God. Islam rejects the doctrine of the Trinity. The confession of three persons in God is tantamount, from an Islamic perspective, to *tritheism. Islam also rejects the doctrine of the deity of Jesus. This follows logically from the Islamic understanding of the oneness of God. God has no partner. God is not divided and no creature is equal to God or can be associated with God. Thus Islam rejects the Christian teaching that Jesus Christ the Son of God was crucified for the salvation of the human race.

Despite obvious and deep theological differences amongst these monotheistic faiths there is growing consensus, following the terrorism most traumatically revealed in New York and Washington on 11 September 2001, for members of these faith communities to share, in principle at least, the responsibility to struggle for human justice and peace, both individually and corporately before God. There is also growing consensus for a theological commitment from each faith to achieve greater understanding of each other's tradition as well as clarification of what each faith has in common with the others and where they diverge in their understandings of God and of God's revelation to humanity. It is felt that these are responsibilities which Christians, Jews and Muslims share because of their connection to Abraham and God's promise to him.

Other philosophies and belief systems believe in one god, but cannot be regarded strictly speaking as forms of monotheism since they virtually exclude that god from the universe (*deism), or identify that god with the universe (*pantheism).

See also: GOD; ISLAM AND CHRISTIANITY; JUDAISM AND CHRISTIANITY.

Bibliography

D. F. Ford, 'An Interfaith Wisdom: Scriptural Reasoning between Jews, Christians and Muslims', Modern Theology n.s. 22.3, 2006, pp. 345–366; A. J. Heschel, 'One God', in J. Neusner (ed.), Understanding Jewish Theology: Classical Issues and Modern Perspectives (New York, 1973), p. 17; B. Klappert, 'Abraham eint und unterscheidet: Begründungen und Perspektiven eines nötigen "Trialogs" zwischen Juden, Christen und Muslimen', in Rudolf Weth (ed.), Bekennnis zu dem einen Gott? Christen und Muslime zwischen Mission und Dialog (Neukirchen-Vluyn, 2000), pp. 98–122; H. Küng, Judaism: The Religious Situation of Our Time (London, 1992); idem, Islam: Past, Present and Future (Oxford, 2007); D. Migliore, Faith Seeking Understanding: An Introduction to Christian Theology (Grand Rapids, 2004); idem, The Power of God and the Gods of Power (Louisville, 2008); J. Moltmann, 'Human Rights, the Rights of Humanity and the Rights of Nature', in H. Küng and J. Moltmann (eds.), The Ethics of World Religions and Human Rights (London and Philadelphia, 1990), pp. 120–135; M. Wyschogrod, 'Der eine Gott Abrahams und die Einheit des Gottes der jüdischen Philosophie', in C. Thoma and M. Wyschogrod (eds.), Das Reden vom einen Gott bei Juden und Christen (Bern, 1984), pp. 29–48.

G. A. CHESTNUTT

MONOTHELITISM, see CHRISTOLOGY

MONTANISM

Montanism was a prophetic movement originating c. 170 in Phrygia, where a Christian named Montanus began to utter *prophecies in a state of convulsive frenzy. He and his supporters claimed that his ecstatic condition was a sign that he was totally possessed by the Holy Spirit, who was inaugurating a new dispensation of divine *revelation. They demanded unhesitating recognition for the new prophecy.

Others demurred at this because the ecstatic mode of prophecy was contrary, they said, to recognized church tradition. Some, believing Montanus to be demon-possessed, even tried to have him *exorcized, but they were frustrated by his supporters. Several local church councils did condemn the Montanist prophecies, but were powerless to prevent the Montanist movement running its course and creating a split within the churches. The Montanists looked exclusively to Montanus and two women, Prisca and Maximilla, as their prophets, and saw to the widespread circulation of their oracles. They did not suggest that every believer should claim the prophetic gift. Indeed, when the last of these prophets, Maximilla, died c. 189, she left a prophecy that there were to be no further prophets before the end of the age. Thereafter in Phrygia the movement turned into a cult in memory of the three prophets and their writings. Elsewhere the movement gained some acceptance in a diluted form. It was taken as one piece of evidence that God had new revelation to give to his people. In this form the 'new prophecy', as it was termed, gained its most outstanding convert in the African writer, *Tertullian.

Tertullian was attracted to the movement by its strict discipline. For example, the prophecies proscribed remarriage after being widowed as unlawful, and added both to the length and frequency of those fasts which had become statutory within the church. Tertullian believed that this development was directly in line with the teaching in John 16:12–13 that the Holy Spirit had further truth to bestow. The church by Tertullian's time had reached such maturity that it could tolerate standards previously beyond its capacity. But opponents of Montanism contended that these developments were innovations contrary to Scripture.

The influence of Montanism on the church lasted about a generation. At first it provoked an inconclusive debate on the validity of ecstatic prophecy, but attention later turned to the more important issue of whether the church was to expect further revelation after the apostolic era. Montanism failed in the end to convince the church that it was a valid addition to recognized *Scripture. For one thing, the movement lost the phenomenon of prophecy in its directly inspired form, while its position on second marriage was considered contrary to Scripture. The mainstream church was left with a heightened appreciation of the apostolic teaching, and prophecy in all forms virtually disappeared from the church.

Bibliography

R. D. Butler, The New Prophecy and 'New Visions': Evidence of Montanism in the Passion of Perpetua and Felicitas (Washington DC, 2006); R. E. Heine, The Montanist Oracles and Testimonia (Macon, 1989); W. Tabbernee, Montanist Inscriptions and Testimonia: Epigraphic Sources Illustrating the History of Montanism (Macon, 1996); idem, Fake Prophecy and Polluted Sacraments: Ecclesiastical and Imperial Reactions to Montanism (Leiden, 2007); idem, Prophets and Gravestones: An Imaginative History of Montanists and

Other Early Christians (Peabody, 2009); C. Trevett, Montanism: Gender, Authority and the New Prophecy (Cambridge, 1996).

G. A. KEITH

MOONIES, see NEW RELIGIONS; SECTS

MORAL REARMAMENT

Moral Rearmament (MRA) originated through Frank Buchman (1878–1961), an American Lutheran. After an experience of conversion while at Keswick (see *Higher-life theology) for the convention in 1908, he gradually became concerned about reforming the world. He founded the Oxford Group in 1929, and this became MRA in 1938. The movement spread beyond the Christian faith, and welcomed any who sought to change society through practising the four absolutes, namely absolute purity, absolute unselfishness, absolute honesty and absolute love. Every legitimate means was used to spread the message and enrol supporters. Groups and houseparties were used from the beginning, and the general public were reached through plays and films, the Westminster Theatre in London being a centre for plays.

Buchman himself received many honours from world leaders, and after his death his place was taken by Peter Howard (1908–65), who himself wrote some of the MRA plays. At Howard's death control of the movement passed to directors in USA, but there are strong local centres at Caux in Switzerland, in Japan and other countries.

The absolutes accord with Christian ideals, but MRA members remain in their own religion, generally, but not always, Christianity. Some evangelicals who, like Buchman, already have a clear experience of salvation in Christ and his death, have held that in MRA they are united in a corporate expression of Christian standards. Others believe that there is no need for a separate organization to promote Christian values; and the promotion of values, without basic Christian doctrines, is not the NT gospel.

Bibliography

K. D. Belden, Reflections on MRA (London, 1983); G. Ekman, Experience into God (ET, London, 1972); P. Howard, The World Rebuilt (Poole, 1951); D. Johnston and C. Sampson (eds.), Religion, the Missing Dimension of Statecraft (Oxford, 1994); C. Pignet and M. Sentsis, World at the Turning (ET, London, 1982).

J. S. WRIGHT

MORAL THEOLOGY

Although theology, especially in the West, has always been concerned with questions of Christian morality, the recognition of moral theology as an independent discipline dates from the late sixteenth century. The expression theologia moralis is found a century earlier in connection with the medieval confessionals, which elaborate the purpose of the penitentials of the early Middle Ages: to give guidance to the priest on suitable *penances for various sins. With the moral theology of the Counter-Reformation (see *Reformation, Catholic Counter-) the concern is more profound and the theological roots more extensive. It aims to guide the perplexed *conscience of the individual believer confronted with complex practical deliberations. It draws on the theology of law and psychology of moral judgment developed by *Thomas Aquinas, on the *canon law, and on the common theological understanding of man's orientation to God as the summum bonum which derived from *Augustine. It attended closely to the detailed examination and analysis of moral cases – hence the modern word “*casuistry”. In the seventeenth century, as theological concern shifted from the doctrinal questions of the Reformation, English Protestantism was attracted by this orientation to deliberative questions, and major contributions to moral theology were made in English by *Puritans (e.g. William *Perkins) as well as by Laudians (e.g. Jeremy *Taylor).

The validity of the traditional moral theology was always controversial. Typical of the seventeenth century in which it flowered, it was individualist in its conception of the agent, lay-orientated in its concern for life in the world, yet looked to impose order upon subjective moral perceptions more by the authoritative guidance of the institutions than from Scripture. Modern critics (e.g. *Barth) objected to its authoritarianism, contemporaries (e.g. *Pascal) to its accommodation of lax standards. Both criticisms have some justice. So do objections to its formalist analysis of moral problems, its focus on the pathological and exceptional phenomena of the moral life, and its scholastic traditionalism. Nevertheless, it contributed considerably to an understanding of the nature of moral discernment, and so pointed towards a Christian moral thinking that was neither legalistic nor subjective. The tradition fell into disrepute in Protestant circles in the eighteenth century, while in Roman Catholicism it reached its height with the work of Alphonsus Liguori (1696–1787), and achieved new vigour in the nineteenth (Antonio Rosmini, 1797–1855), only to lose favour in the twentieth.

From the early eighteenth century, Protestant thinkers turned increasingly to philosophical sources for moral guidance, and from the late eighteenth century were under the influence of *Kant. The resulting tradition of ‘Christian *ethics’ has been marked by a persistent anxiety about how the Kantian doctrine of ethical autonomy can be at home in a theological context. Never as successful as moral theology in the detailed analysis of recurrent moral situations, it has often appeared to be at a loss in the face of new social challenges, driven back upon a pragmatic consequentialism in matters of ethical substance. By contrast, the moral-theological tradition produced strong and sometimes controversial directions on such questions as the conduct of war (see *Pacifism/peace), medical practice and the place of labour in industry.

There have been frequent calls, notable among them that of the Second Vatican Council, for a reformation of moral theology/Christian ethics (the distinction has no more than historical usefulness) into a more wide-ranging intellectual enterprise with greater responsiveness to Scripture. The following pointers serve to guide this worthy ambition:

(1) Moral theology is distinct from ‘spiritual theology’ (the study of *prayer and *worship; cf. *Liturgical theology; *Spirituality) and from ‘pastoral theology’ (the study of the tasks of Christian *ministry), being concerned with questions that are more worldly than the one and more lay-orientated than the other. Yet there will always be interaction between these three fields.

(2) The primary task of moral theology is to clarify Christian moral concepts, showing how the distinctive Christian ways of posing moral questions (in terms of the command of God [see *Law], *love for the neighbour, the *freedom of faith, the *sanctification of the believer, the forms of created orders, etc.) arise from the Scriptures, and comparing them with other ways in which moral questions may be put.

(3) Moral theology has to develop in detail certain aspects of the Christian doctrine of human nature, especially of *society and government, of *sexuality, and of life and *death. This continues the work of *systematic theology in these areas, and draws upon the relevant biblical commands and injunctions in reaching a systematic view.

(4) Moral theology must address the deliberative questions faced by individuals or societies in a way that applies what has been learned. These questions will often present themselves in three forms: (a) asking about the conduct of the individual believer who has to make a decision for himself (the agent perspective); (b) asking about how a believer or the church may advise others who have particular decisions to make (the counselling perspective); (c) asking about the form of an appropriate social rule that might govern practice (the legislative perspective). When these three forms of deliberative questioning are not kept distinct, confusion results.

(5) There is no value in the division of moral theology into 'personal' and '*social ethics' – which fosters the mistaken conception that the personal and the social constitute separate fields of moral enquiry, whereas every serious deliberative matter has both personal and social aspects to it, as outlined by the threefold distinction in (4) above.

Bibliography

R. M. Adams, Finite and Infinite Goods (New York, 2002); H. U. von Balthasar, 'Nine Theses in Christian Ethics', in Principles of Christian Morality (San Francisco, 1975); M. Banner, Christian Ethics: A Brief History (Chichester 2009); Barth, CD III.4; R. Cessario, Introduction to Moral Theology (Washington DC, 2001); G. Grisez, The Way of the Lord Jesus, 3 vols. (Chicago, 1993); J. Gustafson, Protestant and Roman Catholic Ethics (London, 1979); S. Hauerwas, The Peaceable Kingdom: A Primer in Christian Ethics (London, 1984); R. B. Hays, The Moral Vision of the New Testament (San Francisco, 1996); S. D. Long, John Wesley's Moral Theology (Nashville, 2005); B. Mitchell, Morality: Religious and Secular (Oxford, 1980); O. O'Donovan, Resurrection and Moral Order (Leicester, 1986); idem, Self, World, and Time (Grand Rapids, 2014); J. Pieper, Faith, Hope, Love (San Francisco, 1997); S. Pinckaers, The Sources of Christian Ethics (Washington DC, 1995); P. Ramsey, Deeds and Rules in Christian Ethics (New York, 1967); T. Rendtorff, Ethics, 2 vols. (Philadelphia, 1986); H. Thielicke, Theological Ethics, 3 vols. (Grand Rapids, 1966–81).

O. M. T. O'DONOVAN

MORAVIAN THEOLOGY

The worldwide Moravian Church (Unitas Fratrum), also known as the Moravian Unity, is organized and governed by the terms of Church Order of the Unitas Fratrum (Moravian Church), at the core of which is the Ground of the Unity.

The Ground of the Unity begins with an explicit Christocentric statement:

The Lord Jesus Christ calls His Church into being so that it may serve Him here on earth until He comes. The Unitas Fratrum is, therefore, aware of its being called in faith to serve humanity by proclaiming the Gospel of Jesus Christ. It recognizes this call to be the source of its being and the inspiration of its services. As is the source, so is the aim and end of its being based upon the will of its Lord. (Church Order, 2002, p. 13)

After statements on the belief of the church and personal belief, the Ground of the Unity addresses God's word and doctrine from a broad ecumenical perspective:

The Unitas Fratrum takes part in the continual search for sound doctrine. In interpreting Scripture and in the communication of doctrine in the Church, we look to two millennia of ecumenical Christian tradition in the wisdom of our Moravian forebears in the faith to guide us as we pray for fuller understanding and ever clearer proclamation of the Gospel of Jesus Christ. But just as the Holy Scripture does not contain any doctrinal system, so the Unitas Fratrum also has not developed any of its own. It knows that the mystery of Jesus Christ, which is attested to in the Bible, cannot be comprehended completely by any human mind or expressed completely in any human statement. (Church Order, p. 14)

It is therefore not possible to define or describe a Moravian theology per se. However, the Moravian Church through the centuries has recognized the importance of the great *creeds and *confessions of the Christian church in aiding the formulation of a scriptural confession, and in marking the boundaries of heresy. Furthermore, the orthodoxy and catholicity of belief in the Moravian Church can be seen in the recognition and acceptance of the Apostles', Athanasian and Nicene Creeds; and the *Protestant Reformed tradition in the list of confessions: Confession of the Unity of the Bohemian Brethren of 1535; Twenty-One Articles of the unaltered *Augsburg Confession; Shorter *Catechism of Martin Luther; Synod of Berne of 1532; *Thirty-Nine Articles of the Church of England; Theological Declaration of *Barmen of 1934; and the *Heidelberg Catechism.

Particular emphases within the broader spectrum of ecumenical theology can be seen in the concluding statements of the Ground of the Unity. There is the goal of unity itself:

We confess our shared guilt, which is manifest in the severed and divided state of Christendom. By means of such divisions we ourselves hinder the message and power of the gospel . . . Since we together with all Christendom are pilgrims on the way to meet our coming Lord, we welcome every step that brings us nearer the goal of unity in Him. (Church Order, p. 15)

There is a distinct Moravian ecclesiology (see *Church, doctrine of), which emphasizes strong sociological and missiological imperatives with regard to the church as a fellowship, emphasizing the equality of humankind regardless of ethnic origin, sex or social standing; the church as a community of service, following Christ's example of coming not to be served but to serve; serving our neighbour, recognizing the needs of and reaching out to all God's children; and serving the world, challenging humankind with the message of God's love.

Bibliography

Church Order of the Unitas Fratrum (Moravian Church) 2002 (Bethlehem, 2002). Church Order is revised and republished every seven years following the meeting of Unity Synod.

D. J. NEWMAN

MORMONS, see SECTS

MÜNTZER, THOMAS (c. 1490–1525)

Thomas Müntzer used to be regarded by Lutheran historians as a blood-stained fanatic and by Marxists as a heroic revolutionary, but he is now widely recognized as a significant radical theologian and liturgist. As a young priest he was influenced both by *humanism and by *Luther, but like *Karlstadt, German mysticism also marks his thought and language. He spent some time in Prague, and *Hussite ideas appear to have added an apocalyptic dimension to his ministry. A conscientious pastor and preacher, his translations of the Lord's Supper and other services in the little Saxon town of Allstedt proved highly popular with local artisans and peasants. His emphasis on the immediate inspiration of the Spirit led to a critique both of academic theology, whether Lutheran or Roman Catholic, and of obedience to those secular authorities he regarded as 'pagan'. Gradually coming to recognize the right to armed resistance, he wrote movingly about social justice and became a prominent leader in the Peasants' War in Thüringen. After the battle of Frankenhausen in 1525 he was arrested, tortured and executed. His hymns, liturgies and scriptural interpretations kept his name alive after his death.

See also: REFORMATION, RADICAL.

Bibliography

P. C. Matheson (ed.), The Collected Works of Thomas Müntzer (Edinburgh, 1989); T. Scott, Thomas Müntzer: Theology and Revolution in the German Reformation (Basingstoke, 1989).

P. C. MATHESON

MURRAY, ANDREW (1828–1917)

Andrew Murray was a South African religious leader, evangelist, educator, author of over 250 books and numerous articles on theology, missionary strategy, pastoral concerns and personal devotion. The son of a Scottish Dutch Reformed Church (DRC) minister, he was born in Graaf-Reinet, South Africa, and educated at Aberdeen and Utrecht. He was ordained in 1849 and returned to South Africa to become the first regular DRC minister north of the Orange River. After nine years on the frontier he returned to the Cape Colony where he engaged in a series of theological and legal disputes with liberal clergymen. In 1860 a *revival movement began in his Worcester pastorate which quickly swept through South Africa. Murray became known as a 'revivalist' preacher, and in 1879 began a series of highly successful evangelistic tours throughout South Africa, Europe and America. He is best remembered for his books on personal piety, such as With Christ in the School of Prayer (London, 1885), The New Life (London, 1891) and Absolute Surrender (London, 1895), as well as for his study of Hebrews, The Holiest of All (London, 1895).

Although not a Pentecostal in the modern sense, Murray was deeply influenced by *Methodist *holiness tradition, and through his books, The Spirit of Christ (London, 1888), The Second Blessing (Cape Town, 1891), The Full Blessing of Pentecost (London, 1907), and Divine Healing (London, 1900), he helped shape modern *Pentecostalism. Bengt Sundkler has argued, in Zulu Zion and Some Swazi Zionists (London, 1976), that Murray's teachings and emphasis on Christian experience contributed to the rise of *African independent churches. His works clearly influenced the rise of inter-denominational movements such as Inter-Varsity (Christian) Fellowship in the USA and UK, and the theology of the Chinese Christian leader Watchman Nee (1903–72). Nee's work, in turn, encouraged the growth of trans-denominational 'Bible' churches in North America which are similar in many ways to 'independent church' movements in Africa and the Majority World.

Although he preached a *pietist message, Murray was involved in South African social life and strongly opposed the growing Afrikaner nationalist movement as well as British imperialism. He was a gifted and unusual man whose influence is still felt in evangelical Christianity.

See also: DUTCH REFORMED THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

L. F. Choy, Andrew Murray: Apostle of Abiding Love (Fort Washington, 1978); W. M. Douglas, Andrew Murray and His Message (London, 1926); J. Du Plessis, The Life of Andrew Murray of South Africa (London, 1919).

I. HEXHAM

MURRAY, JOHN (1898–1975)

John Murray was born in Scotland, but studied at Princeton Theological Seminary. After fulfilling a promise to teach there for one year (1929–30), Murray joined the faculty of the newly formed Westminster Seminary, Philadelphia, which J. G. *Machen and others had founded (following the appointment to the Princeton Board of two signatories of the Auburn Affirmation, 1924, which was essentially a plea for the toleration of theological diversity within the Presbyterian Church).

An eloquent and thoughtful advocate of the classical orthodoxy of the *Westminster Standards, Murray married that theology to strong personal piety and a deep appreciation of the significance of biblical theology for *dogmatic thought (an element in his work traceable to the influence of the teaching of G. *Vos; see Collected Writings, vol. 2.). Murray's teaching and writing were consequently often marked by the close exegetical and theological argument characteristic of his Commentary on Romans (Grand Rapids, vol. 1, 1960; vol. 2, 1965).

Of special interest in his thought are: (1) his understanding of biblical *covenants as oath-bound promises, which led to his reticence to adopt the classical dual covenant thought of *Reformed theology (Covenant of Grace, London, 1954; Collected Writings, vol. 2, pp. 49–50); (2) his rooting of the Christian *ethic in the ordinances of creation (Principles of Conduct, Grand Rapids, 1957); (3) his exposition of immediate imputation (The Imputation of Adam's Sin, Grand Rapids, 1959; see *Adam; *Sin); and (4) his reworking of the doctrine of *sanctification to reflect more fully its definitive as well as progressive character (Collected Writings, vol. 2, pp. 277–317).

A deeply committed churchman, Murray served as Moderator of the General Assembly of the Orthodox Presbyterian Church, USA, in 1961.

Bibliography

Collected Writings, 4 vols. (Edinburgh, 1976–83), including I. H. Murray, The Life of John Murray, vol. 3; Bibliography, vol. 4.

S. B. FERGUSON

MUSCULUS, WOLFGANG (1497–1563)

Musculus (Müslin) was a second-generation German *Reformed theologian who joined the Reformation in 1527, leaving the Benedictine order to assist Martin *Bucer at Strasbourg. Musculus became pastor at Augsburg in 1531. While there, he participated in the Wittenberg accords (1536) and Worms discussions (1540), though he eventually left in response to the anti-Protestant Augsburg Interim (1548).

Musculus declined an invitation from the Archbishop of Canterbury to join Bucer in England after the Interim, instead heading for the Swiss territories. From 1549 he served as professor of theology at Bern, where he remained an important Reformed leader until his death. Although self-taught, Musculus was broadly learned and quite prolific. He wrote many occasional and polemical works, several biblical commentaries, and translated and edited multiple volumes of the writings of various Church Fathers.

Bibliography

Works: Common Places of Christian Religion (ET, London, 1563); P. Romane-Musculus, 'Catalogue des Oeuvres imprimées du théologien Wolfgang Musculus', Revue d'histoire et de philosophie religieuses 43.3, 1963, pp. 260–278.

Studies: R. Bodenmann, Wolfgang Musculus (1497–1563): Destin d'un autodidacte lorrain au siècle des réformes (Genève, 2000); R. Dellsperger et al. (eds.), Wolfgang Musculus, 1497–1563, und die oberdeutsche Reformation (Berlin, 1997); C. S. Farmer, The Gospel of John in the Sixteenth Century: Johannine Exegesis of Wolfgang Musculus (New York, 1997).

B. E. ELLIS

MYSTICAL THEOLOGY

Like mysticism, mystical theology has been defined in so many ways that it is necessary to distinguish its various connotations.

(1) It can mean, as it did in the Middle Ages, simply personal experience of God and reflection upon it (see *Religious experience). In this sense every medieval theologian was a mystic because he wrote about what he himself experienced. Thus Karl *Rahner can affirm that 'the devout Christian of the future will either be a "mystic", one who has "experienced" something, or he will be nothing at all' (Theological Investigations, vol. 7, London, 1971, p. 15). Theology and mysticism are equally inseparable in *Eastern Orthodox theology: 'If the mystical experience is a personal working out of the content of the common faith, theology is an expression, for the profit of all, of that which can be experienced by everyone' (V. Lossky, The Mystical Theology of the Eastern Church, London, 1957, p. 9).

Writers who understand mystical theology in this way as a loving awareness or knowledge of *God see nothing unusual in describing *Jesus and *Paul as mystics, and their teaching about *prayer, *union with God and Christ, or life in the Holy Spirit, as mysticism. They will also point out how deeply steeped in Scripture are mystics like Teresa of Avila and John of the Cross (see below).

(2) A more restricted usage of the term confines it to the higher stages of mystical prayer which, like other *gifts of the Spirit, are given as God wills to some and not to others. In this sense mystical theology is distinguished from *ascetical theology, which describes the stages of prayer from the beginnings to the prayer of 'loving attention' or 'simple regard' that goes beyond words. Many writers on prayer consider that this latter type of contemplation is open to every Christian.

(3) Protestant writers, though well aware of the relationship between theology and experience of God, have usually been reluctant to speak of mystical theology. The term 'mystical' has suggested confusion with the Greco-Roman mystery religions, identification with the Neoplatonism of the Mystical Theology of *Dionysius, and the errors of *Gnosticism and *quietism. It has also been maintained that mystical theology overlooks the prominent prophetic or ethical element in Scripture (cf. A. *Nygren, Agape and Eros, 3 vols., London, 1932–39; G. *Ebeling, Word and Faith, London, 1963). Some mystics may have laid themselves open to such charges, sometimes through their attempts to describe the indescribable, but it is impossible to categorize all mystical theology in this way. Each example must be examined in context and assessed on its own merits.

A survey of Western mystical theology down to the thirteenth century would include the Fathers from *Augustine to *Bernard of Clairvaux, *Francis of Assisi and his disciple and biographer *Bonaventura, not forgetting the mystical side of *Thomas Aquinas. Bernard's devotion to the humanity of Christ, maintained in the writings of Aelred of Rievaulx (1110–67), had lasting influence in European mysticism.

The other major influence was the *apophatic theology of Dionysius, translated from Greek into Latin by *Eriugena in the ninth century and into a modified English version in the late fourteenth century by the anonymous author of The Cloud of Unknowing. The Cloud (which also introduced English readers to the third contemporary influence in European mysticism, the school of St Victor; see *Victorines) appeared c. 1370, between the works of Richard Rolle of Hampole (c. 1295–1349) and the other flowers of English mysticism: The Scale of Perfection of Walter Hilton (d. 1396), the Showings or Revelations of Divine Love to the anchoress Julian of Norwich (c. 1342–1416) and The Book of Margery Kempe (c. 1373–1433).

Mysticism also flourished during this period in movements of spiritual renewal in Germany and Flanders inspired by Meister Eckhart (c. 1260–1327), John Tauler (c. 1300–61) and Henry Suso (c. 1295–1366). The three were involved with the Rhineland Friends of God (which produced the Theologia Germanica, an anonymous plain man's guide to mysticism which Luther later printed) and indirectly contributed to the Brethren of the Common Life in Flanders by their influence on Jan van Ruysbroeck (1293–1381). Ruysbroeck's disciple Gerard Groot (1340–84) founded the Brethren, thus promoting a spirituality which achieved lasting expression during the following century in the writings of Thomas à Kempis (1380–1471) (see *Imitation of Christ).

If some of the writings mentioned above suggest that a mystic is concerned only with the inner life of the soul, such an impression would be corrected by a study of the lives of Italian and Spanish mystics such as Catherine of Siena (1347–80), Catherine of Genoa (1447–1510), *Ignatius of Loyola, or Teresa of Avila (1515–82), the Carmelite reformer who produced, like her disciple the poet John of the Cross (1542–91), analyses of the stages of the mystical life which have never been surpassed.

More recent wrestlings with the relation between prayer and action are found in the writings of *Bonhoeffer and liberation theology. It is a substantial theme in Thomas *Merton (cf. Contemplation in a World of Action, London, 1971), whose work is also important as a pioneering contribution to the increasingly pressing question of the relationship between mystical theology and religious experience in Christianity and other religions.

Bibliography

Individual volumes in the Classics of Western Spirituality series (London and New York, 1978–); A. Bancroft, The Luminous Vision (London, 1982); L. Bouyer (ed.), A History of Christian Spirituality, 3 vols. (London, 1963–69); P. Grant, A Dazzling Darkness (London, 1985); G. Gutiérrez, We Drink from Our Own Wells (London, 1984); W. Johnston, The Wounded Stag (London, 1985); A. Louth, The Origins of the Christian Mystical Tradition (Oxford, 1981); M. A. McIntosh, Mystical Theology: The Integrity of Spirituality and Theology (Oxford, 1998); S. Tugwell, Ways of Imperfection (London, 1984); G. S. Wakefield (ed.), A Dictionary of Christian Spirituality (London, 1984); R. Williams, The Wound of Knowledge (London, 1979). Earlier literature, including the classic studies by Otto, Underhill and von Hügel, may be traced through the bibliography in R. Woods (ed.), Understanding Mysticism (London, 1981).

P. N. HILLYER

MYTH

Myth is a confusing and slippery term in theology; it is used in so many ill-defined ways by individual theologians that it would be no bad thing if its use were prohibited. In popular parlance the word is used to refer to stories that are fictional, and hence it has come to have a pejorative sense. Traditionally, it refers to invented stories about the gods in which they behave like human beings with superhuman powers. Closely associated with this sense of the word is its usage to refer specifically to the stories which may accompany and allegedly form the basis for religious rituals. Thus the Greek myth of Demeter and her daughter Persephone (who married Pluto and spent six months of each year in the underworld with her husband and six months with her mother on earth) was recited in the rites of the mystery religion celebrated at Eleusis near Athens, and was regarded as the justification for performing them. A number of modern writers would argue that such myths reflect in some ways fundamental aspects or modes of human thinking.

As the term is used technically in theological discussion it seems to have four nuances, any or all of which may be present at any one time.

(1) A myth may be a story which attempts to explain the origins of things without the use of modern historical and scientific investigation. Myth can thus be represented as pre-scientific thinking, and this may lead to a negative evaluation of it. (2) A myth may depict some aspect of human experience in the form of a story about the past. The story of an original 'social contract' which expresses the structure of society by a fictitious example of 'how it began' would be a myth of this kind. (3) A myth may be a story which is presented in terms of some symbolism and thus has a poetic or emotional appeal and is capable of reinterpretation in the light of fresh experiences. Some of the deepest feelings of people about the human predicament may find expression in mythical form. (4) The term is often used to refer to any kind of story which involves the gods or other supernatural actors.

The story of the *fall of man in Gen. 3 can be seen to function in these ways. (1) It is meant to explain how sin and disobedience came into the world. (2) It is expressive of the present fallen state of humankind, summed up in the statement: 'Each of us has become our own Adam' (2 Baruch 54:19). It describes our plight in the form of a story. (3) The language contains symbolism that is capable of further development and that may evoke fresh ideas and deeper understanding. (4) The story includes among its actors God and a serpent who miraculously speaks.

To say that this story performs the functions of a myth enables us to recognize a number of facts. First, to say that a story is a myth is not to pronounce on its historical truth or falsity; it is to say something about how it functions (just as a parable may be historical or fictional). A myth may or may not employ historical materials. For example, F. F. Bruce has commented on the way in which Exod. 1 – 15 functions as the mythos of the annual Passover ritual in Israel: 'But – and herein lies the whole differentia of Israel's faith as contrasted with the surrounding religions of Old Testament days – the mythos in this instance is . . . the recital of something that really happened in history, interpreted as the mighty, self-revealing act of Israel's God' (in C. Brown, History, Criticism and Faith, p. 80).

Second, the important question about a myth is whether it is valid, or invalid in the point that it makes: a myth which tells us that man is fallen is clearly valid, whereas a myth asserting that man is not really sinful would be invalid.

Third, myth is a well-recognized literary genre, and there is no reason in principle why the Bible should not contain mythical material. The question regarding the historical truth of a myth must be separated from the question of its validity; a myth may well be valid even though the story is fictitious, just as in the case of parables. A verdict on the literal truth or historicity of Gen. 3, for example, will depend on general considerations regarding the nature of the story and how it came to be composed, and also on how we evaluate the NT references to *Adam as a historical person.

The question of the presence of myth in the Bible raises various problems. Some of the NT writers themselves reject the use of what they call 'myths' (1 Tim. 4:7; 2 Pet. 1:16), and thereby indicate that the substance of Christian belief is not akin to pagan myths. So far as the OT is concerned, the writers on the whole did not take over pagan mythology, although, as we have seen, the use of material functioning as myth should not be excluded. One can find some parallels in pagan mythology to biblical concepts and stories in the NT, but again the influence, if any, is marginal.

Difficulties arise when material which appears to be historical is labelled as myth in the sense of being unhistorical. A powerful body of opinion extending from D. F. *Strauss to R. *Bultmann and then to the 'myth of God incarnate' school has argued in one way or another that some central affirmations of Christian faith – the *incarnation, sacrificial death (see *Atonement), *resurrection and second coming of Jesus (see *Eschatology) – are mythical in this sense. Some scholars simply reject such myths and argue that they must be dropped from Christian theology; others hold that these myths 'really' express an understanding of humanity which must be released from its mythological expression (i.e. demythologized) and then re-expressed in other terms which will be intelligible to modern men and women who cannot believe in the supernatural.

This proposal is open to basic objections. Fundamentally, it assumes that the modern scientific, materialistic frame of reference is to be the criterion by which the truth of biblical teaching is to be assessed, and it does not sufficiently recognize that such a godless understanding stands judged by biblical teaching. Further, as a result of the slipperiness of the term, it may lump together as ‘mythical’ a whole set of varied concepts and fail to differentiate between them. For example, the ‘three-decker’ view of the world held by many ancient people is not essential to the expression of biblical truth and need not be shared by modern people. But to reject this as being ‘mythical’ or ‘pre-scientific’ is quite different from rejecting the truth of the incarnation. The danger is to argue that stories involving God are ‘mythical’ like the three-decker universe, and to fail to recognize that, if myth is defined in terms of ‘stories involving God’, it is not possible to dispense with myth. To say that the myths are ‘really’ expressions about the nature and existence of humanity is to fail to recognize that the biblical writers were making the point that any expressions about the existence of humanity must inevitably also be statements about the nature and existence of God. This is not to deny that we may need to find ways of translating the biblical expressions to make them intelligible to modern people; but the whole point of translation is that it faithfully renders in our language what was originally said in another. It would be better to recognize that much of what is often called mythical language is really *analogical or *symbolical language in which we talk about the God who lies beyond the grasp of ordinary literal expressions in terms of analogy with human persons.

Bibliography

H.-W. Bartsch (ed.), Kerygma and Myth (London, 1972); C. Brown (ed.), History, Criticism and Faith (Leicester, 1976); D. Cairns, A Gospel Without Myth? (London, 1960); J. D. G. Dunn, ‘Demythologizing – the problem of Myth in the NT’, in I. H. Marshall (ed.), New Testament Interpretation (Exeter, 1977); R. Johnson, The Origins of Demythologizing (Leiden, 1974); G. Stählin in TDNT IV, pp. 762–795.

I. H. MARSHALL

NARRATIVE THEOLOGY

There are several different kinds of narrative theology. There are, for instance, ‘story theologies’, popular since the 1960s, and indebted to earlier theologies of ‘*myth’. They focus upon narrative as a means by which people evoke and express their deepest ways of seeing the world. Jesus’ parables are often presented as key exemplars of such stories (e.g. by Robert Funk): they are stories that lure their audience in by familiarity of setting and cast, but which then explode narrative bombshells, provoking moments of revelation in which the hearers’ ways of seeing the world are transformed. Parables are taken to work on their hearers at a preconceptual level, reshaping patterns of perception and thought that lie deeper than can be verbalized in clear propositions.

Then there are *postliberal theologies of ‘realistic narrative’, developed since the 1970s. Theologians like Hans *Frei focus on narrative portions of the Gospels that appear to tell the story of characters and incidents in the real, historical world. These theologies focus not on the response evoked in the reader, but on the ways in which the narratives employ literary techniques and patterns to depict a public world of character and circumstance that has a certain objectivity over against the reader. The meaning of the narrative text is not the ‘way of seeing’ that is evoked by it, but simply the story that is told.

The meaning of the Gospels is the portrayal of a character who can be identified most properly simply by telling his story. The question of historical factuality can be temporarily bracketed whilst this narrative identification is being explored and understood, but the question of the relationship between the depicted *Jesus and the Jesus of history (see *Historical Jesus, quest for) remains urgent and must be posed when it is clear where the weight of the realistic narrative identification falls (e.g. on the crucifixion–resurrection sequence). All other attempts to define the identity of Jesus, whether by reconstructing the likely facts referred to by the texts, or by amassing doctrinal statements, or by identifying the ‘mode of being in the world’ that these texts convey, are held to be thoroughly subordinate to his identification by narrative means. The significance of these narratives can be found by asking how the reader might take the world depicted to be his or her own world, or by exploring how the characters and incidents of the story can become ‘types’ of the reader’s own world.

Then there are theologies that focus on the relationship between narrative and reasoning. To ask what appropriately follows from a set of propositions differs from asking what appropriately follows from an incomplete narrative. So, for instance, in Christian ethics theologians committed to narrative reasoning can eschew sets of principles that supposedly dictate what is and is not right and instead concentrate on exploring the drama of Jesus and the church, and to asking what ways of living 'follow' this drama appropriately. Theologians like Stanley Hauerwas who value narrative reasoning tend to share with theologians of realistic narrative a focus on the history-like narratives of Jesus and the church, but also share with story theologians an interest in narrative as a pervasive human way of making sense.

Bibliography

H. W. Frei, The Eclipse of Biblical Narrative (New Haven, 1974); idem, 'On Interpreting the Christian Story', in Reading Faithfully (Eugene, 2005); R. W. Funk, Language, Hermeneutic, and Word of God (New York, 1966); S. Hauerwas, A Community of Character (Notre Dame and London, 1981); S. Hauerwas and L. G. Jones (eds.), Why Narrative? (Grand Rapids, 1989); G. W. Stroup, The Promise of Narrative Theology (Virginia and London, 1981 and 1984).

M. HIGTON

NATURAL LAW, see LAW

NATURAL THEOLOGY

Natural theology is the attempt to attain an understanding of God's existence, nature and relationship with the universe by means of rational reflection, without appealing to special revelation such as the self-revelation of God in Christ, in Scripture or in church tradition. Sometimes (as in *deism) this is thought to arise from unaided human reason (see *Rationalism), and sometimes from God's general revelation in *nature.

The early high point of popularity for natural theology was medieval *scholasticism. Anselm and Thomas Aquinas are the most important representatives of this theological approach, although their epistemologies differ significantly. *Anselm, in Proslogion, structures his argument as an a priori demonstration of the logic of God's existence. His argument (which Kant later designated the *ontological argument) begins from the definition of God as 'that than which no greater can be conceived'. Anselm claims that, in addition to attributes of perfection such as omnipresence, omnipotence, omniscience and others, we must include the characteristic of existence, because that which exists in reality surpasses that which exists only in the mind. Thus, the definition of God as 'that than which no greater can be conceived' logically entails the actual existence of God.

The intent of Anselm's argument has been hotly debated recently. On the one hand, many have noted that it is presented in the form of a prayer and is introduced under Anselm's affirmation, 'I do not seek to understand so that I may believe, but I believe so that I may understand.' This leads some commentators to argue that the ontological argument should not be taken as a philosophical proof for God's existence, but as an argument that requires prior faith. On the other hand, others have noted that Anselm seems to expect that the Fool (Anselm's conversational foil in the first part of Proslogion), who 'says in his heart, "There is no God"' (Ps. 14:1; 53:1), should be convinced of the logical necessity of God's existence apart from any pre-existing faith.

Anselm's ontological argument remained popular for many centuries among those committed to an a priori epistemology. A notable example can be found in *Descartes' modified versions of the ontological argument in his Meditations on First Philosophy. While Anselm's intent may be ambiguous, it is clear that Descartes expects the ontological argument to stand as a philosophical demonstration of God's existence. However, this argument suffered a significant blow from Kant, who argued that existence is not a predicate. Existence, properly understood, refers to the instantiation of a being that has proper predicates, such as omnipotence, and is therefore not an attribute itself. Despite Kant's criticism, the ontological argument still has proponents today.

Natural theology's other major proponent in the medieval period was *Thomas Aquinas. In contrast to Anselm's a priori *epistemology, Aquinas relied on an a posteriori approach. This method works from our experience of the world's existence and orderly operations and derives from this the conclusion that God must exist. Aquinas' arguments, commonly referred to as the 'five ways', are generally thought to be reducible to two arguments. The first four arguments (although there is some debate about the extent to which the fourth conforms to the pattern of the first three) are usually categorized as the cosmological argument. This argument, in its simplest form, says that the world and everything within it is contingent. Thus, the world is an effect that requires a cause. However, an infinite regress of causes is logically impossible. Without some first cause, which does not itself require a cause, no subsequent effects could possibly exist. Since these effects do in fact exist, an Uncaused Cause (which, Aquinas says, 'all people call God') necessarily exists as well.

The fifth of the 'five ways' is referred to as the teleological argument, or the argument from design. In sum, the teleological argument observes that order and logical structure is evident, not just in the activities of beings that possess intelligence, but also in the activities of entities that do not themselves have intellect. Aquinas' conclusion is that we can only account for orderly processes in unintelligent things by the imposition of order by an external intelligent reality. In other words, because design is a manifestation of an intelligent agent, the design evident in the universe points to a divine designer.

The emergence of *nominalist philosophy in the later medieval period diminished interest in natural theology. Unlike earlier forms of medieval scholasticism, nominalism rejected Aquinas' concept of the analogy of *being, which argues that while God's mode of existence differs from that of anything in the created order, language from our experience within the latter could be properly applied to God provided that we understood it analogically. The nominalist tradition, which tended to interpret Aquinas' analogy of being as an analogy of proportion, claimed instead that God was decisively Other than creation, and thus sharply distinguished between the realms of philosophy and theology. While the former is an adequate tool for discerning and analyzing the created order, only theology provides access to the divine. This has the effect of eliminating the entire category of general revelation, which functions as the foundation of natural theology.

The theology of the magisterial *Reformation viewed creation as deeply implicated in the fall, and was therefore more negative toward the prospects of natural theology. *Luther, educated in the nominalist tradition, rejects any possibility that philosophy can discover theological truths apart from special revelation. *Calvin's position was somewhat more nuanced. He argued that God was revealed through nature and God's providential governance of it. As a result each individual has a sense of the divine (sensus divinitatis), which is the origin of human religious sensibilities. However, the corrosive effects of *sin are so extensive that our rational capacities offer no certainty of God or God's nature. Clarity of God is available only by means of Scripture.

The English Reformation, whose break with the Roman Catholic Church was not as radical as that of the magisterial Reformation, was more optimistic about the prospects of natural theology. In combination with Lockean empiricism, the *Anglican tradition yielded two closely related but distinct approaches to natural theology that dominated the British world of the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries. The first type is most evident in works of Anglican authors such as William *Paley and Joseph *Butler. Paley, in his Natural Theology, offers what is probably the most famous restatement of Aquinas' teleological argument for God's existence – the watchmaker analogy. This analogy draws a link between the intricately interconnected and orderly structures of a watch and those found within the natural realm to argue for the existence of a divine designer. Butler's natural theology in his Analogy of Religion attempts to demonstrate God's existence through a cumulative argument, although he focuses heavily on the moral structure of the universe to make his case.

The second type of natural theology in Great Britain during this time was *deism. Deists argued that God's nature and will, to the extent that they can be known, are revealed within the structures of *creation. Typically, they asserted that the natural order reveals the existence of God, and the moral structure of our minds could detect, in its interaction with the external world, the ethical nature of this Creator. While deists quite frequently appealed to the same arguments for God's existence or to delineate our moral obligations as Anglican natural theologians, they differed in two significant ways. First, the orthodox Anglicans did not limit themselves exclusively simply to natural theology, but also accepted the validity of special revelation as a necessary supplement to what could be known by means of general revelation. In contrast, deism generally argued that what could be known about God should be limited solely to what could be gleaned from rational understanding of the natural realm. Thus, Scripture, church tradition or any other form of special revelation should be accepted only so far as it conformed to the dictates of natural reason. All else should be discarded as unwarranted superstition. Second, since God reveals himself only through the natural realm, no event that is inexplicable in terms of natural processes is possible. Thus, miracles, resurrection, theophany, and similar events that violate the general laws of nature must be dismissed as delusion or untruths.

Natural theology encountered two severe sources of criticism in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. The first was philosophical in nature, and grew primarily out of the thought of Hume and Kant. Both challenge cosmological and teleological arguments for God's existence by calling into question the concept of causality. *Hume's argument is that within a sequence of events, perception cannot distinguish between a sequence of events that we take to be causally linked and events that are merely a series. Thus, sense experience provides no foundation for claiming a causal connection between two events, no matter how frequently they might occur in sequence. He concludes that all we can say with certainty is that our mind habitually joins together certain sequences because (1) two objects in a sequence become contiguous to each other and (2) we are able to predict with accuracy, because of a resemblance to other observed sequences, what event will follow upon this contiguity. However, perception provides no means of knowing whether that which the mind draws into causal connection corresponds with any causal reality that exists beyond our mind.

*Kant comes at it somewhat differently by arguing that cause and effect simply do not apply to the divine realm. Causation is a category within the mind by which pure reason organizes the data of perception. However, since God is not an entity accessible by perception, causal arguments are not possible. Kant argues that we gain access to the metaphysical realm by means of practical reason only.

While the arguments of Hume and Kant cast significant doubt on natural theology, perhaps a more serious blow came from the natural sciences. Darwinian evolution (see *Creation and evolution) agrees that the universe manifests order, but argues that this order should not be confused with design. Cases of apparent design can be explained instead by the purely natural evolutionary processes of adaptation to a constantly shifting environment.

While natural theology was at a low ebb outside *Roman Catholic circles in the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, forms of this approach survived in the philosophical and theological systems that stressed God's immanence. *Hegel's idealism (see *German idealism) rejects the dichotomy between nature and the divine. Instead, God (Spirit) is embedded in the processes of history. As historical processes evolve toward conformity with the Absolute Spirit, our consciousness is able to discern the divine as it properly understands the nature and movement of history and its social institutions. Thus, knowledge of the natural realm is, at the same time, knowledge of God. From *idealism, it is a short jump to get to the natural theology at the foundation of *process philosophy and theology. God, in God's absolute primordial nature, lures the universe toward loving responses. However, the universe is also identical to God in God's consequent nature, and this gives a responsive impulse to all things toward love. Thus, it is possible to discern the nature and will of God to the extent that the universe responds to the divine lure.

A major impetus for contemporary discussions of natural theology has been the *Gifford Lectures. This lectureship was established by Adam Lord Gifford in 1888 to 'promote and diffuse the study of Nature Theology in the widest sense of the term – in other words, the knowledge of God'. Lecturers have included some of the most significant thinkers across a broad array of disciplines.

The most visible debate on natural theology in the twentieth century took place between Karl Barth and Emil Brunner. In this interchange, *Barth rejected all natural theology on the grounds that God reveals himself in his word. It was therefore pointless to look elsewhere for revelation. This view was questioned by *Brunner, who believed that Barth had overstated his case. Brunner pleaded for a Protestant natural theology which he wanted to base on such ideas as the image of God, general revelation, preserving grace, divine ordinances, point of contact, and the contention that grace does not abolish nature, but perfects it. Barth's later theology offers a highly qualified place for natural theology. He speaks of creation as a 'token of revelation'. By means of the incarnation, all creation, if properly seen through Christ, can be a witness to the word of God.

Presently, two currents of theological reflection have added new elements to the discussion of natural theology. First, the emergence of *postmodernism has raised new questions about the possibility of a neutral and universal rationality. Such unbiased rationality is generally thought to be the starting point for natural theology. Thus, those sceptical that we are able to conceive of reason apart from cultural and temporal conditioning will take a similarly sceptical view of natural theology's prospects. Secondly, a minor revival of interest in natural theology is evident in the work of many natural scientists and philosophers and theologians who are engaged with the sciences. While one cannot speak of developments in this area as monolithic, a sizeable number within this group argue that natural laws raise questions that can only receive satisfactory answers by appeal to a divine agent. In other words, science generates issues that science itself lacks the tools to address, and this calls for a philosophy or theology of *science that includes divine causation and guidance. While this appears to reflect Aquinas' theological approach, advocates within this movement tend to be more modest in their claims about what the natural realm reveals about God.

Bibliography

J. Barr, Biblical Faith and Natural Theology (Oxford, 1993); E. Brunner and K. Barth, Natural Theology (London, 1946); J. Cobb, A Christian Natural Theology (Philadelphia, 1965); S. Hauerwas, With the Grain of the Universe (Grand Rapids, 2001); N. Kretzmann, The Metaphysics of Creation (Oxford and New York, 2001); A. McGrath, The Science of God (Grand Rapids, 2004); J. Polkinghorne, Science and Theology (London and Minneapolis, 1998); R. Swinburne, The Coherence of Theism (Oxford and New York, 1993).

S. WILKENS

NATURE, THEOLOGY OF

The term 'nature' translates the Gk physis. If it is taken to connote undervived self-existence, it is in opposition to the biblical concept of *creation, according to which nothing comes to be of itself, but only by God's word (cf. John 1:3). Understood, however, in the sense of 'that which exists prior', i.e. prior to some supervening activity, it is used extensively in Christian theology, with two main references: that which is prior to human cultural activity, i.e. the natural world; and that which is prior to God's saving grace, i.e. human nature.

Nature prior to human culture

In some classical Gk thought physis and nomos ('law' or 'convention') are in opposition: physis in this connection refers to the human nature common to all, a given constant admitting only of simple acceptance; nomos designates the sphere of moral, social and political practice, which may differ between cultures. Another strand of Gk thought, however, intimates that of itself nature is shaped by *law. Biblical teaching resembles this latter, differing from it in ascribing the law in nature to divine promulgation. Thus Paul's dictum that 'Gentiles who have not the law (nomos) do by nature (physis) what the law requires' (Rom. 2:14, rsv) assumes an embodiment of God's law in human nature: the application of the same principle to the non-human world may be inferred from certain passages in the OT (e.g. Ps. 19).

The divine declaration that creation is 'very good' (Gen. 1:31) establishes the natural world as the proper context for human fulfilment. Humankind's *vocation is to be found in respect for nature and the *stewardship of its order, not in escape from it to a 'higher' freedom. The denial of the goodness of the material universe, contrary to the biblical view, was a feature of certain second-century *Gnostic sects and of the *Manichaeen heresy (third–fifth centuries): they typify the recurrent tendency in the West to assert a radical opposition between inert nature and imposed human ordering. In the modern period the *idealist polarization of nature and spirit and the rejection of the medieval sacralization of nature have frequently led to the denial that the natural order is either knowable or valuable. At the same time the understanding of human vocation has shifted from stewardship of a God-given order to technological manipulation of a recalcitrant environment. Similarly, values have come to be grounded in the purposes imposed on an indifferent universe by the historical creativity of the human spirit (cf. *Teilhard de Chardin's doctrine of universal 'hominization'). This relocation of the ground of morality has been rationalized in terms of the supreme value of freedom and the alleged impossibility of deriving 'values' from 'facts'. The discussion of *ecological problems and of the character of stewardship demands serious reconsideration of the biblical teaching concerning an inherent order of value in creation. The natural world bears an intrinsic dignity and ordering anterior to its usefulness for human purposes: it may not be treated simply as raw material to be exploited at the convenience of a technologically minded civilization.

The incorporation of law within nature also suggests a role for natural law within Christian *ethics, though the concept is admittedly fraught with difficulties. There are common threads within the many Christian and non-Christian conceptions of natural law: (1) moral and legal precepts are 'objective' (i.e. true independently of the will or affections of human agents); (2) they are founded on nature; and (3) they are known to all through reason (however these terms are construed). Thus human morality, despite its apparent diversity, is fundamentally homogeneous; to be human is to share in certain basic conceptions, however much they may be denied through self-interest, passion or corrupt sophistication. Natural law therefore stands against accounts that identify moral reasoning with the mere articulation or expression of preferences (subjectivism and emotivism), the prediction of consequences (utilitarianism), the unguided response to necessarily particular situations (situationism), or the reflection on untranscended communal tradition (communitarianism).

In the classic Christian exposition of natural law (that of *Thomas Aquinas, in Summa Theologica II:1:90–105), only a part of moral knowledge is derived from unassisted human reason, namely the basic principles: these comprise the law of non-contradiction and the principle that the good is to be pursued and the bad avoided; also primary precepts concerning murder, lying, stealing, duty to parents, etc. The greater part of the substance of moral teaching is provided by divine law (revealed in *Scripture) and conventional human law. But natural law also has a function here: it explains how we can recognize moral truths as necessary implications of the basic principles once we have received instruction in them from revelation or *culture. Thus the doctrine of natural law is not meant to explain how we come by all our moral insights or even (since it is admitted that culture plays a role) how we come by those that are widely accepted. Moreover, it can be given an interpretation compatible with the claim that all knowledge is ultimately dependent on grace.

Nature prior to divine action

In *Protestant theology 'nature' refers most commonly to the unfitness of humankind for God's presence prior to God's intervening act of *grace. Thus 'we were by nature children of wrath' (Eph. 2:3, RSV). In this context the term points to the fallen condition of human nature originally created good but now corrupted. Failure to set the *fall within the context of creation has sometimes left theology misleadingly polarized. Catholicism on the one hand has avoided an unacceptable severance of God the Redeemer from God the Creator through its division of human nature into a 'natural' part (which is substantially unaltered by the fall) and a 'supernatural' part (which is bestowed by grace), but has been tempted to a *Pelagian optimism about human capacity for good. Protestantism on the other hand has recognized that every part of human nature has been corrupted by *sin, but in its proper emphasis on the absolute human dependence on grace has leant towards a Manichean denial of creation.

However, the limits of human nature prior to grace, even regardless of the fall, must also be stressed. Against naturalism Christian theology teaches that human beings are not self-sufficient, but require the gracious self-disclosure of God in order to achieve the goal of their existence. Debate about revelation and the possibility of *natural theology must be set within this perspective. Through his work of salvation God gave himself to humankind in a new way, not already implicit in creaturely human existence. The knowledge of God is given as a 'mystery hidden for ages . . . but now . . . manifest' (Col. 1:26, RSV): in the person of Christ is imparted the fullness of grace and the promise of glory. Human nature is called to fulfilment in the supernatural, which transcends but does not abolish or destroy it. The same may be said about created nature as a whole: it is God's plan to 'unite all things in [Christ], things in heaven and things on earth' (Eph. 1:10, RSV).

Bibliography

K. Barth, CD, III.1–2; J. Finnis, Natural Law and Natural Rights (Oxford, 1980); C. S. Lewis, The Abolition of Man (Oxford, 1943); A. E. McGrath, A Scientific Theology: Vol. 1. Nature (Edinburgh, 2001); J. Moltmann, God in Creation (London, 1985); D. J. O'Connor, Aquinas and Natural Law (London, 1967);

O. O'Donovan, Resurrection and Moral Order (Leicester, 1986); J. Polkinghorne, The Way the World Is: The Christian Perspective of a Scientist (London, 1992); idem, One World (London, 1986); idem, Science and Creation (London, 2006); T. F. Torrance, Divine and Contingent Order (Edinburgh, 1998).

O. M. T. O'DONOVAN AND R. J. SONG

NEO-ORTHODOXY

This title is applied to a twentieth-century development in theology, which is 'orthodox' inasmuch as it emphasizes key themes of Reformed theology, but 'neo-', i.e. 'new', inasmuch as it has taken serious account of contemporary cultural and theological developments. It originated with continental theologians: *Barth, *Brunner, *Bultmann and Friedrich *Gogarten, but others have become associated with it such as *Aulén, *Nygren, *Tillich, C. H. *Dodd, *Richardson, J. *Baillie, D. M. *Baillie, Reinhold *Niebuhr and H. Richard *Niebuhr. It was in no sense an organized movement, and precise definitions or boundaries are impossible.

Neo-orthodoxy emerged in reaction against the *liberal Protestantism which had dominated the end of the nineteenth century and the beginning of the twentieth. In particular, it rejected the notion that historical investigation could provide absolute certainty as to the events recorded in *Scripture, upon which scholars had hoped to build secure theology. Further, it renounced the attempt to make man's experience of God a starting place for theology (cf. *Religious experience). The crisis in human *culture epitomized by the First World War precipitated a recognition of the bankruptcy of a theology which had been naively optimistic.

In searching for a new way to do theology, the work of *Kierkegaard, the rediscovery of *Luther, and the novels of the Russian author Fyodor *Dostoevsky became influential. Driven back to the Bible, and spurred on by the need to be able to engage with contemporary social issues, a new method of theology was developed which nevertheless could not ignore the discoveries which had been made by the application of the historical-critical method to Scripture (see *Hermeneutics).

Neo-orthodoxy affirmed the absolute transcendent 'otherness' of God whom man cannot know except God reveal himself. This he has done primarily through Jesus Christ, but also in the events of *salvation-history to which Scripture bears witness. Neo-orthodoxy accepted the results of historical inquiry showing Scripture to be a human, fallible and errant document, because its certainty was thought to lie in the fact that God has chosen to make himself known through it. It is theologically reliable as a means whereby God in Christ may be encountered.

This foundation seemed a more secure basis for theology than questionable historical events or religious experience capable of alternative secular explanations.

On the basis of an encounter with the word of God, incarnate, written and preached, the neo-orthodox theologians affirmed the sinful predicament of humanity redeemed through the *grace of God in Christ alone. Receptive *faith was the only way to enter a saving relationship with God; indeed, only those who believe can know God, or know how to please him. They thus espoused the key *Reformation principles of sola gratia and sola Scriptura.

While some common theological features characterized those dubbed neo-orthodox, sharp disagreements arose as to how to work these out in a systematic theological way. For example, Tillich and Bultmann were prepared to be influenced by contemporary philosophy more than Barth thought permissible; and Brunner's espousal of general *revelation (cf. *Natural theology) caused a sharp dispute.

Classic critiques of this position suggest: (1) Neo-orthodoxy can offer no justification for basing itself on God's revelation known only by faith (lest faith become sight), since this renders its foundation impervious to *verification or falsification. (2) The emphasis on the transcendent 'otherness' of God led to extreme scepticism about whether talk about God was possible, and indeed whether such a God any longer existed (see *Death-of-God theology). (3) *Pannenberg and others challenged its view of secular history as essentially uncertain, susceptible of differing interpretations and separable from God's activity in the world, for they regarded revelation as history. (4) Neo-orthodoxy can have no reply to those who claim to have encountered God through other religions and would therefore adopt an alternative basis to their theology.

Bibliography

G. C. Berkouwer, A Half Century of Theology (Grand Rapids, 1977); J. Livingston, Modern

Christian Thought (London, 1971); H. R. Mackintosh, Types of Modern Theology (London, 1937); W. Nicholls, Pelican Guide to Modern Theology, vol. 1: Systematic and Philosophical Theology (Harmondsworth, 1969); S. Sykes, The Identity of Christianity (London, 1984).

C. A. BAXTER

NEO-PLATONISM, see PLATONISM

NESTORIUS (fl. 428–c. 451)

Nestorius, Patriarch of Constantinople, as an extreme exponent of the *Antiochene *Christology has his name attached to the heresy of the two persons, a divine and a human, existing in juxtaposition in the incarnate Christ. A pupil probably of Theodore of Mopsuestia (c. 350–428), Nestorius was a monk and presbyter at Antioch before his elevation to the see of Constantinople by Theodosius II. His Christology, for which he was eventually condemned, was elaborated in relation to the question of the legitimacy of the term theotokos ('bearer of God', commonly translated 'mother of God') in reference to the Virgin *Mary. His chaplain at Constantinople, Anastasius, objected to its increasing usage, especially by monks. Nestorius gave him his support and himself declared the designation unscriptural and going 'best with those who deny Christ's true humanity'. Instead Nestorius preferred anthropotokos ('bearer of man') or Christotokos ('bearer of Christ'). In his structure of Christ's person, Nestorius made a clear-cut distinction between the human and the divine natures (which he seems to have equated with 'persons') in Christ, denying any real organic union between the man Jesus and the indwelling divine *Logos.

The extant fragments of his sermons and his 'Twelve Counter-Anathemas' reiterate, 'Not one nature but two are we constrained to concede to Christ' (Fragments 216). The theme is constant: Christ 'is not divided', 'the Son of God is double in his natures'. Throughout, the theotokos issue is discussed and the conclusion restated, 'The Virgin bore indeed the Son of God, but since the Son of God is twofold in his nature, she bore the manhood, which is Son because of the Son who is joined thereto' (Sermons x).

*Cyril of Alexandria's vehement opposition and his 'Twelve Anathemas against Nestorius' brought about the patriarch's condemnation by the Council of *Ephesus (431). He died in exile somewhere in the East.

Nestorius maintained his orthodoxy, declaring that the Scriptures show Christ to have been truly divine and as such not involved in human suffering and change. The same Scriptures present Christ as having lived a truly human life of growth, temptations and suffering. The only way to understand the relation of these two distinct elements, that of full Godhead and of full manhood, is to acknowledge their separate presence in a 'common prosōpon' of union. 'Christ is indivisible in that he is Christ, but he is twofold, in that he is both God and man, he is one in his Sonship, but he is twofold in that which takes and in that which is taken. In the prosōpon of the Son he is an individual, but as in the case of two eyes he is separate in the natures of manhood and Godhead' (Fragments 297).

Although Nestorius was condemned for heresy by the excessive zeal and vindictiveness of Cyril, the question of his actual unorthodoxy has persisted. The discovery of Nestorius' The Bazaar of Heracleides in a Syriac translation in 1910 reopened the issue. Opposing verdicts have been returned. J. F. Bethune-Baker declares that Nestorius was no Nestorian; while F. Nau upholds his condemnation. The Bazaar is consistent in its rejection of the designation 'Mother of God', while strongly asserting the full manhood of Christ as necessary for salvation. Cyril's objections are countered one by one and his *monophysitic statements rebutted. Nestorius denies that he admits only a moral union of the two natures, by declaring it to be 'syntactic' and 'voluntary'.

Nestorius' defence of his orthodoxy was accepted by several Eastern bishops who continued to acknowledge his primacy after the Council of Ephesus and united to form a separate Nestorian Church. The Nestorian Christians, characterized by a vigorous missionary zeal, carried the gospel to India and Arabia. In the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries their adherents suffered greatly in the Mogul invasions. Groups of 'Assyrian Christians' survive who consider themselves Nestorians and prohibit the designation 'Mother of God'.

Bibliography

G. R. Driver and L. Hodgson (tr.), Bazaar (Oxford, 1925); A. Grillmeier, Christ in Christian Tradition, vol. 1: From the Apostolic Age to Chalcedon AD 451 (London, 1975); R. V. Sellers, Two Ancient Christologies (London, 1940).

H. D. McDONALD

NEW AGE

The term 'New Age' has been used since the mid-1980s to denote the so-called 'alternative' spiritualities that came to prominence in the cultural revolution of the 1960s, and which are now so widely adopted that they may be regarded as the mainstream religious viewpoint in many places. Some identify it with the 'Age of Aquarius', thereby locating this movement within the Western mystical tradition that arose after the French Revolution and whose historical roots can be traced, through Rosicrucians, Freemasons, Cathars (see *Albigenses) and *Gnostics, back to the metaphysical traditions of ancient Babylon and Egypt. On this account, the New Age is primarily an occultic phenomenon, linked to astrological theories which understand history in terms of a series of different dispensations, each one more spiritually sophisticated than its predecessor.

To regard the New Age as exclusively – or even mainly – an occult phenomenon is, however, to miss its major significance on the spiritual landscape of contemporary *culture. It is better understood as part of what is often referred to as *postmodernity, at the heart of which is a dissatisfaction with the Western worldview inherited from the *Enlightenment, and with roots in the abstract analytical philosophy of ancient Greece. By the late twentieth century there was a growing disillusionment with the self-confidence of Western *rationality and its vision of inevitable progress that would improve the human condition. This was fuelled by a new awareness that, far from getting better, the quality of life was actually getting worse, something that was highlighted by the sheer violence and brutality of the twentieth century, exemplified by the enormous loss of life of the First World War, followed by the industrialized genocide of the Nazis (see *Holocaust), the threat of nuclear destruction, and ultimately the realization that the planet itself is under threat, with all that would imply for human safety and survival (see *Ecology). By the beginning of the twenty-first century, it was generally assumed that the vision that inspired our forebears would no longer serve to take us forward into the future, and that far from providing solutions, much of what the West regarded as 'progress' was actually part of the problem.

Faced with this reality, many people retreat into hopelessness and nihilism. Others see it as a spiritual problem, located in a *dualistic worldview that distinguished spirit from matter, body from soul, people from nature, men from women, and Westerners from the rest of the world, and therefore a more holistic outlook will be required to redress the balance. For individuals who think this way, and seek a renewed spiritual vision, the New Age is often where they turn. This is especially true of those whom social scientists call 'the creative class', who are the trendsetters of this generation, which helps to explain the widespread knowledge of these nostrums even among those who reject them.

Some of the perspectives embraced by this emerging *spirituality are indeed new, for example, the way in which 'new science' is perceived as being the antithesis of the old mechanistic – and therefore destructive – science of the past. Other strands, however, are decidedly old, if not ancient. Beginning with an awareness of the deficiencies of *modernity, those who are searching for new ways of being intuitively conclude that anything that is not traditionally Western is bound to offer insight into meaningful ways of being. Consequently, a wide variety of therapies, spiritualities, worldviews, rituals and lifestyles are embraced, with no obvious intrinsic connection apart from the fact that they are not conventional.

In this context, Christianity is often regarded as a major source of the discredited outlook that has created a dysfunctional world, with the matching assumption that it is unlikely to contribute to the creation of a new future. The history of *Christendom provides plenty of evidence to support that opinion. It is significant, however, that in searching for ways of reconnecting with the wisdom of the past, many New Age people look further back, and find the spirituality of medieval mystics or Celtic saints – not to mention the biblical prophets, and indeed Jesus – inspirational in relation to the challenges facing us today. Similar trends can be found within the church, as *missiologists reflect on the heritage of *Constantinianism and seek to reimagine the gospel for a new cultural context. A biblical text that is being adopted as a model for creative theological appreciation of the New Age is the account of St Paul's visit to Athens, a city that was arguably the ancient equivalent of today's New Age spiritual emporium (Acts 17:16–34). The underlying assumption of that story is what today would be called the missio Dei, which enabled the apostle to recognize God at work even in unlikely places, and therefore to be able to acknowledge the spirituality of the culture (in this case, the 'unknown god') while also sharing the story of Jesus.

Bibliography

J. Drane, Do Christians Know How to Be Spiritual: The Rise of New Spirituality and the Mission of the Church (London, 2005); D. Kemp, New Age: A Guide (Edinburgh, 2003); G. Lynch, New Spirituality (London, 2007); S. Sutcliffe and M. Bowman, Beyond New Age: Exploring Alternative Spirituality (Edinburgh, 2000).

J. DRANE

NEW ENGLAND THEOLOGY

This is a general name for the theological tradition which stretched from Jonathan *Edwards to Edwards Amasa Park (1808–1900). Although the New England theologians all called themselves Calvinists (see *Reformed theology), they did not share entirely similar beliefs. Rather, it was a common approach to theology combining practical morality with philosophical speculation and a common fascination for issues like the freedom of the human will which set the tradition apart.

Jonathan Edwards' efforts to describe and defend the revival in colonial America known as the Great Awakening defined the distinctive concerns of the New England theology. To an unusual degree, Edwards brought together penetrating insight into *religious experience, sophistication in the use of current philosophy, and firm commitment to Calvinistic convictions. His books such as The Freedom of the Will (1754) and Original Sin (1758) defended divine *sovereignty in *salvation over against contemporary views arguing for autonomous moral action. His works of practical divinity such as A Treatise on the Religious Affections (1746) and The Nature of True Virtue (1765) provided tests to judge the reality of spiritual experiences. The major emphases of Edwards' theology were the greatness of God, total dependence upon God for salvation, and the intrinsic value of the holy life. By promoting these concerns through careful attention to both practical Christianity and recondite philosophical argumentation, he marked out the path for his followers.

Two of Edwards' students, Joseph Bellamy (1719–90) and Samuel Hopkins (1721–1803), provided a transition to the major New England theologians of the nineteenth century. Bellamy defended at length Edwards' belief that church membership should be reserved for those who made credible profession of saving faith. Hopkins developed Edwards' *ethics into an entire system of what he called 'disinterested benevolence'. But as they adopted their teacher's ideas, they also began subtly to change them. Bellamy gave more emphasis to a governmental view of the *atonement whereby God's sense of right and wrong, rather than his wrath, was the key to understanding the work of Christ. Hopkins came to regard *sin as a quality not so much of human character as of human action.

The New Englanders who came after Bellamy and Hopkins made still further alterations in the Edwardsean legacy, but like them they shared Edwards' twin commitment to *revival and theological precision. Jonathan Edwards, Jr (1745–1801) more firmly set aside the view of God as jealous sovereign. Timothy Dwight (1752–1817), a grandson of Edwards, placed greater stress on the reasonableness of Christian faith and on the natural powers of the human will. Dwight's most influential student, Nathaniel William Taylor (1786–1858), became the most prominent exponent of New England views during the mid-nineteenth century. From his position in the chair of theology at the Yale Divinity School, Taylor reversed the elder Edwards on the will by contending for a natural power of free choice. The last major theologian of this school, E. A. Park, held forth over a long career from Andover Theological Seminary near Boston. He attempted to draw back closer to Edwards, but still held views on natural human capacity and the character of sin which were more characteristic of his century's moral optimism than of Edwards' moral realism.

All of the New England theologians were 'close' reasoners. This strength could sometimes lead to dry preaching, but it could also result in a fruitful conjunction of practical piety and learned theology. In the 1930s when theologians like Joseph Haroutunian (1904–68) and H. Richard Niebuhr rediscovered this tradition, they concentrated their attention on Edwards rather than his successors. To them, Edwards had seen more clearly the dangers to Christianity of optimistic opinions about human nature. Historians since Haroutunian and Niebuhr have not so much altered their judgments as pointed out the care and intelligence with which Edwards' successors also went about their work.

See also: NEW HAVEN THEOLOGY; WILL.

Bibliography

A. C. Cecil, The Theological Development of Edwards Amasa Park: Last of the Consistent Calvinists (Tallahassee, 1983); J. A. Conforti, Samuel Hopkins and the New Divinity Movement (Grand Rapids, 1981); F. H. Foster, A Genetic History of the New England Theology (Chicago, 1907); J. Haroutunian, Piety Versus Moralism: The Passing of the New England Theology (New York, 1932); B. Kuklick, Churchmen and Philosophers: From Jonathan Edwards to John Dewey (New Haven, 1985); H. R. Niebuhr, The Kingdom of God in America (New York, 1937); D. A. Sweeney and A. C. Guelzo (eds.), The New England Theology: From Jonathan Edwards to Edwards Amasa Park (Grand Rapids, 2006); B. B. Warfield, 'Edwards and the New England Theology', in The Works of Benjamin B. Warfield, vol. IX: Studies in Theology (New York, 1932).

M. A. NOLL

NEW HAVEN THEOLOGY

New Haven theology was the last important stage of the *New England theology which had begun with the work of Jonathan *Edwards. Its name derived from the Divinity School at Yale College in New Haven, Connecticut. The first professor of theology at that seminary, Nathaniel William Taylor (1786–1858), was also its most influential proponent.

Taylor's background included several divergent aspects of New England's theological history. He grew up in an 'Old Calvinist' community which questioned the rigorous views promoted by Jonathan Edwards. He then attended Yale College, where a grandson of Edwards, Timothy Dwight (1752–1817), was president. Dwight was not only a winsome individual and a solid theologian in his own right; he was also an ardent promoter of revival in the manner of his grandfather. In his later work, Taylor would reflect this early training. He was wary of traditional Calvinistic (or *Augustinian) solutions to problems such as the nature of sinfulness, the innate capacity of the human will, and the character of divine justice, but he was also fervently committed to *revival and societal reform.

Timothy Dwight's theological work helped prepare the way for Taylor. Dwight's concern for revival led him to emphasize the natural human ability to respond to the gospel more heavily than Edwards had. And his efforts to defend the faith reasonably gave it more of a rationalistic tone than had been the case with his famous grandfather.

Taylor, first as pastor of an influential Congregational church in New Haven and then as Yale's professor of theology, engaged in lengthy polemics against both the emerging *Unitarian party and Calvinists who were more conservative than himself. Although Taylor still regarded himself as a successor of Edwards, he went even further than Dwight in modifying Edwards' views, especially in regard to human nature. In his day Taylor was best known for his argument that people always had a 'power to the contrary' when faced with the choice for God. He also contended that human sinfulness arose from sinful acts, not from sinful nature inherited from *Adam. Everyone did sin, Taylor held, but this was not a result of God's predestinating action or the imputation of Adam's guilt.

One of the things that explains Taylor's theological convictions is the fact that he was much impressed with the Scottish philosophy of *common sense. Unlike the Presbyterian Calvinists of *Princeton Seminary in New Jersey, who used the Scottish philosophy mostly as a guide to theological method, Taylor made the Scottish conception of an internal 'moral sense' a critical feature of his *ethics. For Taylor, the intuitive deliverances of this 'moral sense' – for example, that the will had a self-determining power – constituted conclusive theological demonstration.

The New Haven theology became a powerful engine for revival and reform when it was taken up by activists such as Taylor's friend, Lyman Beecher (1775–1863). Beecher and like-minded revivalists used its principles in evangelizing the western United States and in promoting the moral reform of the country. The New Haven theology traced its origins to a colonial Calvinist, Jonathan Edwards, but it exerted its greatest influence in an America which had largely set aside the earlier Calvinistic convictions of its Puritan ancestors.

See also: REFORMED THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

O. D. Crisp and D. A. Sweeney (eds.), After Jonathan Edwards: The Courses of the New England Theology (Oxford, 2012); F. H. Foster, A Genetic History of the New England Theology (Chicago, 1907); B. Kuklick, Churchmen and Philosophers: From Jonathan Edwards to John Dewey (New Haven, 1985); S. E. Mead, Nathaniel William Taylor: A Connecticut Liberal (Chicago, 1942); D. A. Sweeney and A. C. Guelzo (eds.), The New England Theology: From Jonathan Edwards to Edwards Amasa Park (Grand Rapids, 2006); N. W. Taylor, The Moral Government of God (New York, 1859).

M. A. NOLL

NEW RELIGIONS

The history of religions is the history of new developments, reforms, revivals, novel emphases, and the passing away of older forms of *religion. Hence, new religions have always been part of the flow of religious history, just as the identification of *heresy and the persecution of perceived heretics have accompanied them. It is, of course, always worth bearing in mind that the major world religions were, at one time, ‘new’, ‘alternative’ minority religions that experienced persecution until they achieved a position of social and cultural dominance. Hence, it is important to understand that the terms used to identify minority religions tell us just as much, if not more, about those using them as they do about the groups they seek to describe. The term ‘cult’ (Lat. cultus, worship), for example, is nowadays typically used pejoratively to identify a religion as ‘other’ and, therefore, possibly dangerous or profane in some sense. That is to say, the term ‘cult’ immediately indicates how a minority religion is perceived by mainstream society.

Regarding terminology, ‘new religions’ carries essentially the same meaning as a range of other terms, including ‘new religious movements’, ‘fringe religions’, ‘alternative religions’ and ‘minority religions’. However, while terminology is often a matter of personal preference, for the reasons outlined above, most scholars interested in objective analysis avoid the popular term ‘cult’.

What religions should be considered new? This is a complex issue about which there is a lack of consensus. Generally speaking, a religion is considered new if it has emerged or has risen to prominence or has migrated to a new social context during the previous century: UFO religions are new because they emerged following the first wave of UFO sightings in America in 1947; in the West, a non-Western group, such as the Hare Krishna movement, while belonging to the ancient Hindu bhakti tradition, can be considered new in that it migrated to the West with A. C. Bhaktivedanta Prahbupada in the 1970s; organizations such as the Jehovah’s Witnesses, the Mormons and Christian Science, all of which were founded in the nineteenth century, can be considered new in that they all rose to prominence within the last hundred years. Finally, all ‘new religions’ are minority traditions, which, to some extent, stand over against mainstream religion and society. In this sense, they can be usefully distinguished from, for example, denominations.

As an area of analysis rooted in sociological methodology, scholars have been keen to construct typologies in order to provide some way of ordering and analysing the growing variety of new religions. No typology, however, is entirely satisfactory. Much early analysis built on the work of the Protestant theologian Ernst *Troeltsch and the sociologist Max *Weber, who distinguished between churches and sects. Churches enjoy social and cultural dominance and allow varying levels of commitment. Sects are smaller authoritarian groups, which typically reject the prevailing culture, challenge civil authorities, and exert significant demands on their members. Sects are also voluntarist, in that membership requires an explicit decision to accept the teachings of the organization. Later sociologists developed an understanding of ‘cult’, before it acquired its current unhelpful baggage. Rodney Stark and William Sims Bainbridge, for example, distinguished between ‘audience cults’, ‘client cults’ and ‘cult movements’, each of which offers ‘compensators’ or rewards (spiritual and/or material) for the commitment of members. Audience cults lack formal organization and disseminate their ideas through literature and other social media. There is no requirement to join as such, simply an encouragement to follow the published guidance. Client cults offer a service to people for a fee, such as astrological and tarot readings, spiritual therapies, and so on. Cult movements are minority religions which, while similar to sects, are not schismatic (i.e. have not broken away from a larger, parent tradition), but are rather novel religious developments that have emerged within particular social contexts as a result of 'mutation or migration'.

Other scholars, such as Gordon Melton and Robert Moore, have sought to distinguish new religions according to a typology of 'families', each of which represents 'a common thought world, life-style and heritage'. The Latter-Day Saint family are 'held together by a shared belief in the revelations of Joseph Smith', the founder of Mormonism. The communal family is made up of alternative religions that emphasize communal living. The metaphysical family draws on ideas developed within the nineteenth-century New Thought movement in America. Essentially, this family denies the reality of evil and emphasizes the power of the mind over matter and personal health. Individuals, it is believed, can determine their own health, wealth and happiness by positive thinking. The psychic-spiritualist family, the largest of the families, focuses on psychic phenomena, the paranormal and the occult. Drawing on spiritualism, revelations are, it is believed, communicated through mediums or channels. The ancient wisdom family consists of groups (many of which overlap somewhat with the previous family) that believe individuals to have the ability to access powerful, occult knowledge from an ancient and mythic past. Such groups will often emphasize important truths that have been passed down within secret traditions. The magical family overlaps somewhat with the previous two families, in that, again, there is an emphasis on ancient wisdom and the paranormal. However, groups within this family seek to harness natural and *supernatural forces and contact spiritual entities by means of ritual magic. Typical of this family would be the Order of the Golden Dawn, Ordo Templi Orientis, and some Satanist organizations. Melton also includes in this family pagan traditions such as Druidry and Wicca. The Eastern family draws inspiration from 'Eastern religions'. Often these groups have a single teacher or guru who will tutor them in certain techniques, disciplines and philosophies. The Middle Eastern family consists of those religions, sects and spiritualities that have their roots in faiths, such as Islam, which have their origins in the Middle East. While an approach such as this has its merits, it is problematic in that it fails to account for the enormous variety of new religions, some of which are related to a number of families and some of which cannot easily be identified with any of the families. Furthermore, it seems a little odd to allocate a separate category to the Latter-Day Saint groups.

Another popular way to classify new religions was developed by the sociologist Roy Wallis. He argued that new religions could be classified according to their relationship to society, as 'world-affirming', 'world-renouncing' or 'world-accommodating'. World-affirming new religions accept many of the values, goals and aspirations of society, but believe that they can offer a more effective route to attaining such goals and provide a better model of such values. They teach that problems can be solved by adjusting the individual's relationship with the world. The world itself is not flawed. Movements such as Transcendental Meditation and Scientology are typically world-affirming. World-renouncing new religions view the world as corrupt and detrimental to spiritual growth. As such, members are required to separate themselves from the influence of the world, including, sometimes, their non-believing families. Such groups typically require total commitment and absolute obedience. Moreover, theologically, because there is often an enormous *dualistic emphasis on the 'sinfulness' of the present age, such groups are often *millenarian, emphasizing an imminent apocalypse. In extreme cases, the renunciation of the world can lead to acts of violence, including mass suicide. This is what happened on 18 November 1978, when 918 members of Jim Jones' (1931–1978) Peoples Temple committed suicide in Jonestown, Guyana, and also on 26 March 1997 when thirty-nine members of the UFO religion Heaven's Gate evacuated their 'earthly containers' (i.e. bodies) to meet the occupants of a spacecraft trailing the Hale-Bopp comet. Finally, located between these two types of new religion are the world-accommodating movements which, while not entirely rejecting the world, do claim that humanity has, so to speak, 'backslidden'. Humans are not living as they were intended to live. Hence, there is a need to recommit oneself to the spiritual life and to increase one's devotion. However, while Wallis identifies such movements as Neo-*Pentecostalism and charismatic Christianity as being 'world-accommodating', strictly speaking, such a view applies to most major religious traditions. Hence, while helpful, this last category of Wallis's highlights a problem with the typology, namely that it is rather too broad.

Scholars have also sought to analyse the role of charismatic leadership in new religions, in that most groups are organized around an individual claiming to be 'set apart' in some sense, often as a result of certain exceptional spiritual qualities, such as supernatural gifts or unique access to new knowledge. The influence such individuals seem to have over their followers, particularly when this has led to acts of violence, has resulted in accusations of 'brainwashing'.

The largely unsubstantiated theory of brainwashing in new religions is the result of bemusement about why people would commit themselves to apparently irrational beliefs and engage in extreme behaviours in the service of eccentric leaders. Also, in the 1960s and 1970s, new religions seemed to be targeting young people and turning them against their families and the faiths in which they had been raised. Hence, encouraged by anticult activists, the families and friends of new religious adherents rejected the idea that they had freely converted and became convinced that they had been brainwashed. This was the only theory that made sense of what appeared to be their irrational behaviour. However, following significant research, little evidence has been found to support the brainwashing hypothesis and very few scholars nowadays, outside the anticult movement, would want to defend it. For example, the sociologist Eileen Barker, in her important research over a six-year period into why people joined the Unification Church ('the Moonies'), an organization subjected to numerous brainwashing allegations, found that, not only was there no evidence for it, but the organization's retention rate was extremely low.

See also: CHRISTIANITY AND OTHER RELIGIONS; NEW AGE; SPIRITUALITY.

Bibliography

E. Arweck, Researching New Religious Movements (London, 2006); G. Chryssides and B. Zeller (eds.), The Bloomsbury Companion to New Religious Movements (London, 2014); P. B. Clarke (ed.), Encyclopedia of New Religious Movements (Abingdon, 2006); L. Dawson, Comprehending Cults: The Sociology of New Religious Movements (New York, 2005); J. R. Lewis (ed.), The Oxford Handbook of New Religious Movements (New York, 2004); idem, Violence and New Religious Movements (New York, 2011); J. R. Lewis and J. A. Petersen (eds.), Controversial New Religions (New York, 2014); C. Partridge (ed.), Encyclopedia of New Religions: New Religious Movements, Sects and Alternative Spiritualities (Oxford, 2004); idem, UFO Religions (London, 2003); R. Stark and W. S. Bainbridge, 'Of Churches, Sects and Cults: Preliminary Concepts for a Theory of Religious Movements', Journal for the Scientific Study of Religion 18 (1979), pp. 117–133; R. Wallis, The Elementary Forms of the New Religious Life (London, 1984).

C. PARTRIDGE

NEWBIGIN, JAMES EDWARD LESSLIE (1909–98)

Newbigin, probably the most influential British *mission theologian of the twentieth century, was born in Newcastle-on-Tyne, the son of a ship owner. He came to Christian faith at Cambridge (where he read geography and economics) in the context of the Student Christian Movement (SCM), and after graduation became an SCM Secretary in Scotland, marrying another SCM Secretary, Helen Henderson, a missionary candidate. Convinced of his own missionary vocation, he entered Westminster College, Cambridge, following a course of private study from which he emerged, as he wrote later, 'much more of an evangelical than a liberal'. Missionary service in India under the Church of Scotland began in 1936. Formative experiences included interaction with Hindu scholars in the sacred city of Kanchipuram, sharing study of Hindu and Christian scriptures, responsibility for the Christian education of village Christians (his book Sin and Salvation was first written in Tamil) and involvement in the negotiations leading to the formation of the Church of South India. At the inauguration of that church in 1947 he became a bishop with responsibility for Madurai and Rannad. The status of the church was controversial in some Anglican circles; Newbigin's theological advocacy brought him to prominence in the International Missionary Council (IMC), and he had much responsibility for the IMC's Willingen Conference of 1947. In 1959 he was seconded by the Church of South India to be General Secretary of the IMC, with a brief to integrate it with the still young *World Council of Churches (WCC). This accomplished (he believed it would encourage mission as integral to the life of the churches), Newbigin became the first director of the WCC's Division of World Mission and Evangelism, also editing the International Review of Missions. His secondment over, he returned to India in 1965, being elected Bishop of Madras, though still active in ecumenical affairs. He retired to Britain in 1974. He had always been a prolific writer; this period (despite the demands of teaching at the Selly Oak Colleges and pastoring a run-down city congregation) produced some of his finest work, analysing the post-Christian West, developing a critique of the effect of the *Enlightenment on Western thinking, and directing a movement concerned with 'the Gospel and our *Culture'.

Newbigin, an atheist in youth and theologically liberal as a young Christian, was largely self-directed in theological formation. He read Barth seriously only late in life. His theology was developed in his own awakening to faith, and in dialogue with Hindu *monism and Western *secularism, and shaped by the life of the Indian church. He developed an essentially trinitarian three-dimensional theology of mission, proclamation based on the Father's authority, presence rooted in the Son's work and prevenience arising from the Spirit's preparatory activity. His soteriology, influenced by James *Denney, centred on the *cross as demonstrating both God's love and God's judgment, divinity 'receiving the wages of sin'. The cross also reveals the principalities and powers behind the working of the universe represented in, but not wholly identical with, political figures and institutions. The proclamation of the *gospel has thus not only individual but societal relevance: it is public truth. Newbigin's epistemology, always expressed in terms of personal relations, expanded in his last period through the influence of Michael *Polanyi, stressing that knowledge of God, like scientific knowledge, is external to the knower. The church is chosen (the election [see *Predestination] of Israel, and of the church, with corresponding privilege and responsibilities, is another recurrent Newbigin theme) to proclaim and demonstrate that reality.

Bibliography

Selected works: The Household of God: Lectures on the Nature of the Church (London, 1953); A Faith for This One World? (London, 1961); The Finality of Christ (London, 1969); Foolishness to the Greeks: The Gospel and Western Culture (London, 1986); The Gospel in a Pluralist Society (London, 1989); An Unfinished Agenda: An Updated Autobiography (Edinburgh, 2013); The Open Secret: Sketches for a Mission Theology (London, 2015). P. Weston (ed.), Lesslie Newbigin, Missionary Theologian: A Reader (London, 2006) provides a useful selection of writings.

Biography: M. T. B. Laing, From Crisis to Creation: Lesslie Newbigin and the Reinvention of Mission (Eugene, 2012); G. Wainwright, Lesslie Newbigin: A Theological Life (Oxford, 2000).

A. F. WALLS

NEWMAN, JOHN HENRY (1801–90)

Newman was an Anglican and Roman Catholic theologian and philosopher. Undergoing at fifteen a gradual intellectual conversion which he later described as an experience of falling 'under the influence of a definite creed', Newman wrestled continually with the doctrine of the *church and questions about its *authority and apostolic role as the guardian and teacher of Christian truth, finding much inspiration in the patristic studies he began in his first book, The Arians of the Fourth Century (London, 1833).

Newman's Parochial Sermons at St Mary's, Oxford, had considerable spiritual impact on hearers and readers, and his contributions to Tracts for the Times (London, 1834–41) played a significant role in the formation of the *Anglo-Catholic theology of the Oxford Movement. He supported for a while the theory that the Church of England was the true heir of the early church and a via media between the errors of Rome and Protestantism, but gradually changed his mind. Shocked by public and ecclesiastical condemnation of his attempt in Tract 90 (1841) to reconcile the *Thirty-Nine Articles with official Roman Catholic teaching, Newman retired to nearby Littlemore. Here he lived a semi-monastic life and worked on his Essay on the Development of Christian Doctrine (London, 1845), which appeared soon after Newman was received into the Catholic Church in 1845.

The high feelings aroused in both Anglicans and Catholics by Newman's conversion were cooled by the honesty of his spiritual autobiography, Apologia Pro Vita Sua (London, 1864), but his independent habits of mind found little recognition in a Catholic Church moving towards the first *Vatican Council and the definition of *papal infallibility (1870). Newman was convinced about papal supremacy and the pope's place as the divinely appointed and visible centre of unity in the church. But he did not equate authority with authoritarianism and absolutism, or confine the church's teaching office to papal pronouncements. However, Newman's suggestions 'On Consulting the Faithful in Matters of Doctrine' (1859) earned him the reputation at Rome of being the most dangerous man in England. His argument for a creative interrelationship between the church's prophetic (teaching), priestly (worshipping) and kingly (ruling) functions – which was outlined in the preface to the third (London, 1877) edition of Lectures on the Prophetic Office of the Church (London, 1837), now retitled The Via Media of the Anglican Church, vol. 1 – was almost a century too early.

Although Newman was made a cardinal in 1879 and officially cleared of *modernism in 1908 (he was beatified in 2010), his theology was generally neglected or misunderstood until Vatican II (1962–65) focused the whole Roman Catholic Church's attention on many parallel issues. It then became clear that Newman had touched on many questions of enduring importance, even if his own answers had proved to be fragmentary, illustrative rather than explanatory, inspirational rather than definitive. Newman's relevance to recent theology can be seen in two of his works in particular: the Essay on the Development of Christian Doctrine (London, 1845, ⁸1891) and An Essay in Aid of a Grammar of Assent (London, 1870).

The first of these, although primarily the intellectual cause and justification of Newman's conversion to Catholicism, had the much wider function of pioneering the idea of *development in doctrine, fifteen years before Darwin's Origin of Species popularized the concept of evolution. It also, in its final (1878) form, made a significant contribution to the question of defining the *essence of Christianity, a question now often discussed in terms of *contextualization.

The second essay, which contains Newman's analysis of the movement from implicit to explicit belief, may be criticized for assuming that faith is chiefly a matter of believing theological propositions, and for describing 'assent' in terms of an act of will towards a truth that we grasp, rather than a truth that grasps us. Elsewhere, however, in his Lectures on Justification (London, 1838), in his sermons and in hymns such as 'Lead, Kindly Light', Newman does emphasize divine grace. But the Grammar of Assent's focus on what Newman called an 'illative sense' or instinctive capacity to make sense of a mass of diverse evidence, determining 'the limit of converging probabilities, and the reasons sufficient for a proof' was an important step towards present recognition of the significance of intuition. *Lonergan has acknowledged his debt to Newman and sought to explain more fully what Newman described. *Wittgenstein's On Certainty (Oxford, 1984) and H.-G. Gadamer's Truth and Method (ET, London, ²1979) have made major contributions in this area. Many other studies on the place of *imagination in faith and the relationship between faith and *doubt have found inspiration in Newman's Grammar of Assent.

Bibliography

Works: Many editions of Apologia Pro Vita Sua, Essay on the Development of Christian Doctrine, Idea of a University (1852), and poem The Dream of Gerontius (1865); On Consulting the Faithful in Matters of Doctrine, ed. J. Coulson (London, 1961).

Studies: O. Chadwick, Newman (Oxford, 1983) and J. M. Cameron, 'John Henry Newman and the Tractarian Movement', in N. Smart et al. (eds.), Nineteenth Century Religious Thought in the West, vol. II (Cambridge, 1985), pp. 69–109; S. Gilley, Newman and His Age (London, 2002); I. Ker, John Henry Newman: A Biography (Oxford, 2009); I. Ker and T. Merrigan (eds.), The Cambridge Companion to John Henry Newman (Cambridge, 2009); N. Lash, Newman on Development: The Search for an Explanation in History (London, 1980); B. Martin, John Henry Newman (London, 2000); idem, John Henry Newman: His Life and Work (London, 2001); P. Misner, Papacy and Development (Leiden, 1976); T. J. Norris, Newman and his Theological Method (Leiden, 1977); F. M. Turner, John Henry Newman: The Challenge to Evangelical Religion (New Haven, 2002).

P. N. HILLYER

NEWTON, ISAAC (1642–1727)

Professor of mathematics at Cambridge (from 1699) and president of the Royal Society (1703–27), Newton was the most eminent physicist of his day. His most far-reaching achievement was to formulate the universal law of gravitation to explain the motion of the planets and the behaviour of everything in the solar system. The publication of his theory in Principia Mathematica (1687) heralded great advances in science. The universe was seen no longer as an irrational chaos or the place of God's constant and unpredictable intervention. It functioned according to laws that could be calculated and, in principle at least, all its secrets could be discovered by patient and logical inquiry.

Although Newton himself, a deeply religious man like many of his scientific contemporaries, believed he was discovering laws established by the Creator and that it was necessary for God to intervene from time to time to correct irregularities in the solar system that would otherwise occur due to loss of energy, this view did not prevail long. As the eighteenth century progressed, it was increasingly felt that any apparent irregularities would be accounted for in due course by refinements of scientific theory. The 'God of the gaps' would disappear, along with any concept of *miracle or *providence.

While Newton's scientific views were revolutionary, his religious beliefs were unremarkable for the period. He maintained the convention of not linking *science and religion in public debate, and kept his researches into biblical and world chronology, prophecy and alchemy to himself, along with his doubts about the doctrine of the *Trinity. Newton's private papers suggest that he did not see himself as a *Unitarian, as he criticized *Arius as well as *Athanasius for being among the many before and since who had corrupted the plain meaning of Scripture with *metaphysics. Newton does not seem to have been aware that his difficulty in taking the *incarnation seriously was entirely consistent with his understanding of space and time. For if, as Newton held, absolute space and time are attributes of God, God becomes the 'container' of the universe and his incarnation in it becomes unthinkable.

By the beginning of the nineteenth century experiments with magnetism and electricity were calling in question the universal application of Newtonian principles and paving the way for relativity theory and quantum mechanics. It has been argued that the scientific revolution associated with Albert Einstein (1879–1955) has produced a new climate of thought favourable to the Christian understanding of creation as contingent and open, 'finite and unbounded' (*Torrance).

Bibliography

S. L. Jaki, Science and Creation (Edinburgh, 1974); F. E. Manuel, A Portrait of Isaac Newton (Oxford, 1968); idem, The Religion of Isaac Newton (Oxford, 1974); J. Moltmann, God in Creation (London, 1985); T. F. Torrance, Divine and Contingent Order (Oxford, 1981); idem, Space, Time and Incarnation (London, 1969); R. S. Westfall, Science and Religion in Seventeenth-Century England (New Haven, 1958); idem, Isaac Newton (Cambridge, 2007).

P. N. HILLYER

NICAEA, COUNCIL OF

This council was a meeting of several hundred bishops (traditionally 318), convened by the Emperor *Constantine, which took place in 325. Given the number, the council is often described as the First Ecumenical Council. In fact, the bishops were mainly from the eastern provinces of the Roman Empire (a handful of Western representatives were there, including Hosius, bishop of Cordova), and the principal occasion was the teaching of the presbyter *Arius, although the Council also stated canons on points of ecclesiastical polity.

When teaching in Alexandria, Arius had adopted the idea that the Son was a second, lesser being than God and was created (as in the motto 'once the Son was not'). Arius was disciplined by Alexander, bishop of Alexandria, but fled, finding support from *Eusebius, bishop of Caesarea and Eusebius, bishop of Nicomedia. Constantine therefore had considerable political incentives to have the matter resolved.

The consensus of the council was surprisingly large, given the intense debate preceding it. There were, apparently, only two dissentients from the most important formulation of the council, a creed. This creed is designed to rebut Arianism, asserting the Son is 'begotten not made' (contradicting Arian claims that the Son was a creature), and that he is true God. It anathematizes the ideas that the Son is created or of a different substance from the Father, and asserts that the Son is 'of one/the same substance' as the Father (homoousios), possibly because of the interventions of Hosius. This term has ambiguities, conceivably meaning 'of numerically one substance' or 'of the same kind of substance'. Perhaps this contributed to the breadth of consensus, yet homoousios was not initially central to later debates over Arianism which followed the council. However, the principal defender of the Nicene settlement, *Athanasius, Alexander's successor at Alexandria, came to focus on homoousios as vital, and explained it in terms of 'of numerically one substance', a point taken up by his followers, the Cappadocian Fathers.

The Creed of Nicaea is of first importance. It was crucial in refuting Arianism, but was also the inspiration for the creed of 381 formulated at the Council of *Constantinople (our present 'Nicene' Creed), dealing with the deity of the Spirit, as well as the Christological definition of the Council of *Chalcedon 451, and remains of enormous ecumenical significance in the common trinitarian theology of Protestant, Roman Catholic and Orthodox churches.

See also: CHRISTOLOGY; COUNCILS; CREEDS; TRINITY.

Bibliography

G. Bray, Creeeds, Councils and Christ: How the Early Church Developed Doctrine (Fearn, 1997); L. D. Davis, The First Seven Ecumenical Councils (325–787): Their History and Theology (Wilmington, 1987).

M. OVEY

NICENE CREED, see CREEDS

NICHOLAS OF LYRA (c. 1265–1349)

Lyra was the most influential biblical exegete of the late Middle Ages. Born in Normandy, he entered the *Franciscan order before studying theology at the University of Paris and then teaching there. An able Hebraist, he was familiar with Jewish commentaries on the OT. He was appointed provincial of his order in France and later in Burgundy. He became involved in a controversy about the beatific *vision, in reaction against the view of Pope John XXII that the souls of those who die in grace do not enjoy this until after the last judgment. Lyra had a profound concern for the conversion of Jews, as is reflected in both his preaching and writing.

He was the author of numerous works, some of which still remain unpublished. His major achievement lay in his contribution to *hermeneutics as represented by his commentary on the whole Bible in two parts, the first (written 1322–31) expounding the literal sense and the second (1339) the mystical or moral. These Postillae established themselves as recognized text books widely cited by other biblical scholars. When published (1471–2) they had the distinction of being the first printed commentary on Scripture and soon ran through several editions. Lyra also produced a tractate comparing the Vulgate OT with the Hebrew text, and two treatises contesting Jewish interpretations of Christ.

Lyra's Postillae were so highly regarded as to be adopted as a supplement to the standard Glossa Ordinaria and indeed to be set alongside it in some editions. These two commentaries are looked upon as the crown of medieval exegesis. In the prologue to his first volume Lyra declared that the primary function of Scripture is to reveal divine truth; he described it as the sole source of theology. He conceded that Scripture may bear more than one meaning, but insisted nevertheless that the literal sense is basic and that other senses depend upon it. He therefore proposed to avoid the confusing variety of interpretations which had so hampered the *scholastic approach, and to use the historical-grammatical meaning as the overall criterion.

With this principle to guide him, Lyra realized how important it was to recover the authentic biblical text which had been obscured by the carelessness of copyists and the ineptitude of some emendations. He stressed the need to get behind the Vulgate to the Hebrew original as a corrective. Lyra's indebtedness to Rashi (Rabbi Solomon ben Isaac, 1040–1105) has been the subject of much discussion. He was not the first Christian expositor to pay attention to Rashi, but he did so more thoroughly, if cautiously, than others. Latterly his independence grew more apparent.

He displayed a similar attitude to church tradition, claiming that the opinions of the Fathers were not to be accepted as definitive in themselves, but were subject to the final jurisdiction of Scripture. In this, as in his insistence on the primacy of the literal sense, Lyra anticipated *Luther and the other Reformers. Luther, in turn, often referred to him, ranking him among the most useful commentators because his aim was to discover the exact meaning intended by the biblical writers themselves.

Bibliography

P. D. W. Krey and L. Smith (eds.), Nicholas of Lyra: The Senses of Scripture (Leiden, 2000); H. Labrosse, 'Biographie de Nicolas de Lyre', Etudes Franciscaines 17, 1907, pp. 489–505, 593–608; A. Skevington Wood, 'Nicolas of Lyra', EQ 33, 1961, pp. 196–206.

A. S. WOOD

NIEBUHR, H. RICHARD (1894–1962)

Richard Niebuhr, who taught at Yale from 1931 to his death, and was Reinhold *Niebuhr's brother, represented the left wing of American *neo-orthodoxy. He aimed at a holistic and critical Christian worldview.

Niebuhr's most important theological work was The Meaning of Revelation (1941), which advocates 'perspectival *relativism' and counsels Christians to adopt a 'confessional' stance. He maintains that any perception of truth is historically and culturally conditioned, but he repudiates *agnosticism. He holds that in revelatory experiences we truly perceive the Absolute, but our perception itself is not absolute. Thus we need not disparage other revelations and faiths in order to affirm our own. *Revelation is primarily personal, not propositional. Meaning, not information, is revealed, and different meanings have been revealed to others. The task for Christians is to view all of life according to the 'pattern' of Jesus Christ.

Niebuhr pursued this task in his famous Christ and Culture (1951). He delineates five possible models for relating the two: (1) 'Christ against Culture' rejects the world as evil. Believers must retreat to the elect community, shunning politics, art, the military, and worldly entertainments. Revelation is preferred to 'the whole Reason'. Christ has given the law of the kingdom in the Sermon on the Mount, and his disciples must live as sojourners in a foreign land. (2) 'The Christ of Culture' makes Christ the figurehead of one's *culture, embodying the culture's values yet providing a basis for culture's critique. Revelation is accommodated to reason, the line between God and world is blurred, and Christ's salvation is mere 'moral influence'. (3) 'Christ above Culture' describes a schema like *Thomas Aquinas', wherein cultural institutions are grounded in 'natural law' (see *Law), which is yet limited in scope. Christ's supernatural law is revealed to enable us to reach salvation. Nature is supplemented and fulfilled by grace, both coming from Christ. (4) 'Christ and Culture in Paradox' proposes the world as radically corrupt yet not abandoned by God, who has set up social structures to stem the tide of chaos. We live in this world of necessary evils as sinners justified by grace, resulting in a predominantly private, personal Christian morality. (5) 'Christ the Transformer of Culture' sees the world as fallen, but capable of sanctification, both socially and personally.

In his third major theological work, Radical Monotheism and Western Culture (based on lectures given in 1957), Niebuhr calls for an integrative approach to culture, politics, science, religion, etc. We ought to reject '*polytheism' (the fragmented pursuit of many distinct value centres) and 'henotheism' (partisan championing of one finite value centre, e.g. one country, sect or political party, against others) in favour of '*monotheism' (a trusting and loyal adherence to Being-itself, the source and integration point of all penultimate value centres).

Niebuhr's other works all evidence both his integrative vision and his gift for creating helpful typologies.

Bibliography

L. A. Hoedemaker, The Theology of H. Richard Niebuhr (Philadelphia, 1970); J. Irish, The Religious Thought of H. Richard Niebuhr (Atlanta, 1986); D. F. Ottali, Meaning and Method in H. Richard Niebuhr's Theology (Lanham, 1983); P. Ramsey (ed.), Faith and Ethics: The Theology of H. Richard Niebuhr (New York, 1957).

R. M. PRICE

NIEBUHR, REINHOLD (1892–1971)

The development of Christian thought in the face of the social and political challenges of the middle years of the twentieth century in Western history was dominated by Reinhold Niebuhr. Senior politicians on both sides of the Atlantic and across the political parties have spoken of their debt to his thinking.

After graduating in 1914 from Yale, Niebuhr took a pastorate in the Presbyterian Church in Detroit. His experience of ministry among Ford workers and in the face of the developing corporate power of the motor industry profoundly transformed his thinking. He abandoned the social ideas of liberal Protestantism which had been dominant in the early years of the century. Its utopianism seemed inadequate in the face of the hard realities of collective power in the contemporary world. After the publication of his first book Does Civilization Need Religion? (New York, 1927) he left Detroit to become Professor of Applied Christianity at Union Theological Seminary, New York. He remained there until his retirement. 1932 saw the publication of one of his most influential books, Moral Man and Immoral Society (New York). In it he demolished liberal Protestant responses to the social structures of the age, and set about constructing a theology of justice as the true response of biblical faith to the realities of power. In coming to terms with the structural issues of social order and political life, Niebuhr showed a sympathy for aspects of *Marxist analysis. He sometimes described himself as a Christian Marxist. However, the roots of his growing theological work could be found in the developing *neo-orthodoxy represented by *Barth and *Bonhoeffer in Europe. In many ways he stood in the tradition of *Calvin and *Augustine, demanding a full, structured statement of the transcendence and *righteousness of Christ to meet the forces of power which threatened such disastrous consequences for human experience in the middle years of the twentieth century. The Nature and Destiny of Man (1941 and 1943, 2 vols.) (his *Gifford Lectures of 1939) is the fullest theological statement he made. It was regarded as a masterpiece of contemporary exposition of fundamental Christian themes.

Niebuhr has been criticized, in his stress on the corporate manifestations of power, for being too pessimistic about human nature and for overstressing the fallenness of humanity. It was for these reasons, so the criticism runs, that he could not see a way to relate the radically Christian understanding of agapē (see *Love) directly to social issues. This is why he interposed the notion of justice as the only way Christian faith could relate to the collective issues of the time.

After the Second World War he became increasingly concerned with the effects of the Cold War. His book Children of Light and Children of Darkness (London, 1945) attempts to provide a fuller and more substantial justification of democracy than could be provided in liberal thought: 'Man's capacity for justice makes democracy possible; but man's inclination to injustice makes democracy necessary' (p. xiii). He foresaw the weakness of the optimism of liberal notions of democracy and the dangers of the optimism of Marxist ideas of social order. Throughout, he kept a vision of world community and the need, in the face of the Cold War, to find practical realistic understandings and policies to move the world towards it (see *Political theology).

Bibliography

H. Beckley, Passion for Justice: Retrieving the Legacies of Walter Rauschenbusch, John A. Ryan, and Reinhold Niebuhr (Louisville, 1992); C. C. Brown, Niebuhr and His Age: Reinhold Niebuhr's Prophetic Role in the Twentieth Century (London, 1992); K. Carnahan, Reinhold Niebuhr and Paul Ramsey: Idealist and Pragmatic Christians on Politics, Philosophy, Religion, and War (Idaho Falls, 2010); J. P. Diggins, Why Niebuhr Now? (Chicago, 2011); G. Fackre, The Promise of Reinhold Niebuhr, 3rd edn (Grand Rapids, 2011); R. Harries and S. Platten (eds.), Reinhold Niebuhr and Contemporary Politics (Oxford, 2010); D. F. Rice (ed.), Reinhold Niebuhr Revisited: Engagements with an American Original (Grand Rapids, 2009); D. F. Rice, Reinhold Niebuhr and His Circle of Influence (Cambridge, 2013); H. A. Warren, Theologians of a New World Order: Reinhold Niebuhr and the Christian Realists, 1920–1948 (Oxford, 1998).

J. W. GLADWIN

NIETZSCHE, FRIEDRICH (1844–1900)

Probably no critic of Christianity had more influence on twentieth-century thought than Friedrich Nietzsche. Born into a Lutheran parsonage, he began to move towards *atheism during his teenage years. Appointed young to a chair in Classical Philology in Basle, he was pensioned off in his mid-thirties on account of ill health, and the decade until his mental collapse in 1889 was spent in a somewhat nomadic existence in various parts of Western Europe. Nietzsche never recovered his faculties, but during the last years of his life he became a celebrity.

Nietzsche believed that reason (see *Rationalism), whether applied in biblical, philosophical or scientific investigation, had undermined Christianity. In this respect, he was the heir of eighteenth-century thought. However, he maintained that European unbelievers had not absorbed the consequences of 'the *death of God' and that the moral legacy of Christianity had to be extirpated root and branch. If God is dead, moral values have no objective grounding in a metaphysical world-order and so humans must be creators of value. This takes hardness and strength. Christianity has produced a sickly type of human being – a weak, vengeful, stupid herd-creature, submissive to a God of its own invention. It has pronounced as evil the natural instincts of human life, including self-affirming aggression. Nietzsche is unsparing: 'I call Christianity the one great curse, the one great intrinsic depravity, the one great instinct for revenge for which no expedient is sufficiently poisonous, secret, subterranean, petty – I call it the one immortal blemish of mankind' (The Antichrist).

No single writing of his conveys all Nietzsche's thought, but he regarded Thus Spoke Zarathustra as his most important work. Although it is open to various interpretations, it certainly explores the hope that a new kind of human being will emerge from post-Christian civilization, even if the vast majority of people remains contemptibly feeble. The implications of the notions surrounding this idea have been widely debated. Nietzsche has often been held responsible for Nazi ideology, but this has long been disputed. Whatever we conclude, Nietzsche certainly did not believe that the strong should be subject to moral restraint by a standard external to the egoistic impulses of their own nature.

In recent years, much attention has been given to Nietzsche's influence on *postmodernism, and his views on language, truth and perspective have undoubtedly been significant in this respect. Yet while his criticisms of Christianity are connected to these views, he concentrates his attack on the substantive content of Christian teaching on *sin and *redemption. This, above all, is what makes Christianity loathsome. In his way, Nietzsche was here echoing criticisms that went back as far as the earliest Christian centuries. It is sometimes argued that Nietzsche opposed not authentic Christianity but a distorted interpretation of it, but Karl *Barth was far nearer the mark when he said that Nietzsche 'resolutely and passionately and necessarily rejected, not a caricature of the Christian conception of humanity, but in the form of caricature the conception itself' (CD III/2, p. 231).

At present, there is no sign of abatement in the interest in Nietzsche and he has fulfilled at least elements of a prophecy which he made in Ecce Homo: 'I know my fate. One day there will be associated with my name the recollection of something frightful . . . of a decision evoked against everything that until then had been believed in, demanded, sanctified.' Opinions differ on the intellectual force of Nietzsche's work, but it is impossible to deny his influence and hard to deny the rhetorical power of much of his writing. His anti-Christianity was not just one component in Nietzsche's thought; it lay at its heart. Nietzsche arguably brings clearly and dramatically into the open the point of collision between Christianity and a central strand in European atheism, even if his beliefs about nature, morality and power are unacceptable to many who share his dislike of Christian religion. How much he is our contemporary emerges in words written in 1882: 'What decides against Christianity now is our taste, not our reasons' (The Gay Science).

Bibliography

R. J. Hollingdale, Nietzsche: The Man and His Philosophy (Cambridge, 1999); B. Magnus and K. Higgins, The Cambridge Companion to Nietzsche (Cambridge, 1996); R. Safranski, Nietzsche: A Philosophical Biography (London and New York, 2002); J. P. Stern, Nietzsche (London, 1985).

S. N. WILLIAMS

NOMINALISM

Nominalism is the view that only particular instances exist, and that our general terms or names are convenient ways of grouping these particulars, and nothing more. Our use of the language of properties is therefore a mere shorthand way of referring to groups of particulars, the groups formed as a matter of convenience. There is no property 'greenness', but only particular green things. Nominalism is contrasted with *realism, the view that properties exist independently of the mind. Realism has more than one version, however: for example, that a general property exists only if there are instances of it; or that a general property may exist even if there are no instances. If there are universals, existing independently of the mind, and of particular instances, how are they accessed? In some direct fashion, or through the familiar mental process of abstracting general features from particular instances? The view that universals exist independently of the mind is usually associated with Plato and *Platonism, the other view with Aristotle and *Aristotelianism. Conceptualism, the view that properties exist but depend on the mind for their existence, is a mid-way view.

Discussion of 'universals' had its heyday in Christian theology in the Middle Ages, controversies initiated by Roscelin (c. 1050–1125) and *Abelard. *Ockham's nominalism concerned not so much an issue in logic as in *epistemology, the nature of our knowledge of matters of empirical fact, including our knowledge of *revelation. This is important because of Ockham's commitment to the idea of divine absolute power, as well as to a theological agnosticism that seems to be implied by this view. The controversy regarding universals may seem to be arcane, but even arcane issues may signal important issues in theological *metaphysics.

So in fact (as in Ockham's case) a nominalistic attitude can be applied to particular things discernible in human experience as well. Such an attitude would claim that the division of the world into individual things grouped in kinds or classes takes place not in accordance with their essences or natures (since they may not have essences, or such things may be inaccessible), but our language about particular things is developed simply as a matter of convenience. An extreme form of nominalism is conventionalism as regards language and even as regards truth, the view that what we assert and deny is simply a matter of tacit human agreement, and assertions do not correspond (or fail to correspond) to a distinct reality.

Where nominalism is taken to be an expression of voluntarism the nominalist-realist debate engages with issues in Christian theology. Such a voluntarist-nominalist attitude may have different motivations. One sort may be epistemological, the view that reality, and especially divine reality (in whole or in part), may be undisclosed or undisclosable to us (for various reasons, such as human finitude or sin). So even divine revelation may be taken to be not a disclosure of objective or independent truth which it is possible to come to know, but the language of revelation is taken to possess a practical function, such as providing ways of coping with human need, made available by God.

So, on such a view, theological doctrines may simply be a matter of what the Christian community agrees upon as means of furthering these practical teachings found objectively disclosed in divine revelation. For the realist, by contrast, such doctrines express the natures of things, the nature of God, or of man, for example. So essentialism coheres with realism, whereas nominalism fits best with non-essentialism, though the language of essentialism may be retained in a half-way house position such as the idea of a 'nominal essence' employed by John *Locke. For expressivist, non-cognitive views of religious language, the nominalism-realism issue as regards our understanding of God is a non-issue.

Historically, nominalism and a nominalistic attitude have therefore usually been attractive to theological thinkers who are sceptical about the capacity of the human mind to receive a divine revelation, or whose view of the Christian religion is predominantly ethical and not metaphysical, and who are prepared to understand ethical ideas in non-realist terms. Christian thinking about God influenced by the theological agnosticism of Immanuel *Kant is invariably nominalistic, as is that influenced by the anti-essentialism of Ludwig *Wittgenstein. Realism at the human level may be coupled with nominalism at the divine level if human ignorance of the divine nature is stressed.

Bibliography

N. Kretzmann, A. Kenny and J. Pinborg (eds.), The Cambridge History of Later Medieval Philosophy (Cambridge, 1982).

NON-REALISM

In some ways, non-realism can be viewed as a radical version of earlier outlooks such as the *Death-of-God theology. Influential exponents of various forms of non-realism have included two English Anglican priests, Don Cupitt and Anthony Freeman, and the New Zealand Presbyterian Lloyd Geering, and it is disseminated through the *Sea of Faith network; a parallel movement of thought is Reconstructionist Judaism. Non-realism asserts the impossibility of speaking meaningfully about an objectively existing God or about any supernatural realm or dimension. 'God' is simply a construct giving expression to ultimate human values, an attempt to make sense out of profound dimensions of human experience. (Advocates may draw on *logical positivist denials of meaning to unverifiable statements, such as those about a transcendent God, or on *postmodernist assertions regarding the relationship between language and reality.) Nevertheless, spirituality and worship remain important for such 'Christian humanists' as ways of binding together a community of people and stimulating them to respond to contemporary ethical concerns.

Bibliography

C. Crowder (ed.), God and Reality: Essays on Christian Non-Realism (London, 1997); D. Cupitt, The Long-Legged Fly (London, 1987); idem, Taking Leave of God (new edn, London, 2001); A. Freeman, God in Us (London, 1993); L. Geering, Christianity Without God (Wellington, 2002); D. Hart, Faith in Doubt: Non-Realism and Christian Belief (London, 1993).

T. GRASS

NOVATIAN (fl. 249–51)

Novatian was a highly educated priest, theologian and writer, who led the Roman clergy during the vacancy between popes Fabian and Cornelius in 250–51. During this time he corresponded with *Cyprian of Carthage. After the Decian persecution when many believers lapsed from the faith, Novatian opposed any readmission of these people into the church. Because his severe denial of reconciliation was opposed to Catholic practice, Novatian was excommunicated by a Roman synod. He set up a schismatic church, which lasted to the eighth century.

According to *Jerome, Novatian wrote several works, including On the Passover, On the Sabbath, On Circumcision, On the Priesthood, On Prayer, On Standing Fast, On Jewish Foods, and many others (some of which are extant), 'especially a great volume on the Trinity'.

In his On the Trinity, Novatian's theology advances beyond *Tertullian's earlier thought in maintaining the eternal sonship of Christ (cf. *Christology). Novatian gives a clear explanation of biblical *anthropomorphisms in terms of God's *accommodation to human language. He uses the doctrine of trinitarian circumcision, and anticipates what later theology came to call the 'hypostatic union' of the two natures of Christ in one person, and the 'communication of idioms' between the natures.

Bibliography

Works: ed. G. F. Diercks (CCL 4, 1972), tr. R. J. DeSimone (FC 67, 1974); De Trinitate, ed. W. Y. Fausset (Cambridge, 1909), tr. H. Moore (London, 1919).

D. F. KELLY

NUMINOUS, see OTTO, RUDOLPH

NYGREN, ANDERS (1890–1977)

Anders Nygren served the Swedish Lutheran Church as bishop and professor of theology in Lund. Along with that of Gustav *Aulén, his work represents a Scandinavian parallel to German *dialectical theology in the 1920s and 1930s, especially in its critical attitude towards the then dominant *liberal theology. Nygren, however, was more interested than either *Barth or *Bultmann in the analysis of Christianity as a human religious system, and became one of the few significant Lutheran *philosophers of religion. His method of analysis is usually labelled 'motif-research', in that it attempts to uncover basic distinguishing motifs of Christianity by historical analysis and contrast with other religious systems. His best-known work along these lines is the now classic Agape and Eros, which presents a historical account and theological analysis of the contrast between the motif of agapē (Gk, unmotivated self-giving love) and that of erōs (Gk, love which desires to attain a higher good). The presentation of these motifs offers Nygren the opportunity to discuss basic theological issues in such areas as revelation, atonement and ethics. The book's historical analysis has been the subject of much debate, as has its sharp distinction between agapē and erōs. Critics suggest that Nygren lacks interest in *love as a human phenomenon, and that his theology shows a general deficiency in the area of the doctrine of creation. Behind the motif analysis there certainly lies a strong theology of grace as a divine accomplishment requiring no human ethical response. Such emphasis on the priority of divine action is also expressed in a brief work on the doctrine of the atonement, Essence of Christianity, and is pervasive throughout the Commentary on Romans. Nygren's philosophy of religion can be studied in more detail in his Meaning and Method.

Bibliography

Works: Agape and Eros, 2 vols. (ET, London, 1932–39); Commentary on Romans (ET, London, 1952); Essence of Christianity (ET, London, 1960); Meaning and Method (ET, London, 1972).

Studies: T. Hall, Anders Nygren (Waco, 1978); C. W. Kegley (ed.), The Philosophy and Theology of Anders Nygren (Carbondale, 1970); G. Wingren, Theology in Conflict (ET, Edinburgh, 1958).

J. B. WEBSTER

O'DONOVAN, OLIVER (b. 1945)

Oliver O'Donovan was born and schooled in London, reading classics and theology, and completing doctoral research on Augustine, at Oxford, where he was ordained into the Church of England ministry. Having taught in Toronto, in 1982 O'Donovan returned to Oxford as Regius Professor of Moral and Pastoral Theology and Canon of Christ Church Cathedral, before taking up the Chair of Christian Ethics and Practical Theology at the University of Edinburgh in 2006.

His landmark study Resurrection and Moral Order argues against a false polarity between creation and kingdom in Christian *ethics. It explores the objective reality of moral order, known in Christ and secured by his resurrection, wherein the pluriform good of creation is given back to us, as the Holy Spirit subjectively authorizes free action.

O'Donovan's work is based on sustained biblical exegesis in the light of his strong conviction of the *authority of Scripture for theology. This, in turn, directs his attention to history as *salvation-history, ordered towards the eschatological fulfilment of creation and human sociality, fuelled in particular by a recurrent engagement with the book of Revelation and his interpretation of Augustine.

From a sustained and careful reading of the tradition of Christian political thought emerges the two-part project of The Desire of the Nations and The Ways of Judgment which elaborates a contemporary Christian political conceptuality. The fullness of the Christ-event in advent, passion, restoration and exaltation, recapitulated in the life of the church, is the key to understanding God's rule, and the secular task of government as judgment in the wake of the gospel. One notable achievement of this project is the sustained emphasis on mission as the proper motor of *political theology. Moral and political theology, for O'Donovan, are apologetic disciplines for Christian public engagement.

With a strong vocational commitment to preaching, O'Donovan's churchmanship is further evidenced in contributions to Anglican, evangelical and ecumenical discussions.

Bibliography

Works: Resurrection and Moral Order (Leicester and Grand Rapids, ²1994 [1986]); The Desire of the Nations (Cambridge and New York, 1995); The Ways of Judgment (Grand Rapids and Cambridge, 2005).

A. J. DRAYCOTT

OBEDIENCE OF CHRIST

This is a biblical concept of particular importance in *Reformed theology and piety.

Filial obedience

The NT clearly depicts Jesus' whole life as one of perfect, sinless and conscious obedience to God as his Father (e.g. 1 John 2:2; 3:5; 1 Pet. 2:22), whose will for his life was learned through prayerful meditation on OT Scripture (Matt. 3:15; Luke 22:37; John 8:29, 46). Such obedience was based on trust and love of the Father, and it involved a real experience of temptation by Satan, acting both directly and through others, to try to make him doubt the Father's goodness and deviate from his plan for his life (Matt. 4:1–11; 16:22–23; 26:53–54). Such temptation was overcome by the spiritual weapons of prayer, the word of God and fasting, in a genuinely human life of faith. John emphasizes that Christ's ministry and teaching were all based on obedience to what his Father showed him and gave him to do and say. A military background enabled a Roman centurion to perceive that such submission to God was the source of Jesus' authority over evil and disease (Matt. 8:8–10; John 5:19–20; 7:16).

While Christ's obedience also included submitting himself to other God-given human authorities, even when imperfectly exercised (Mark 14:61–62; Luke 2:51; John 19:11; 1 Pet. 2:23), his obedience to God involved a resolute adherence to the Father's specific will in every situation, sometimes rejecting another morally allowable course in order to see that perfect will done in his life and death.

Representative obedience

As man and as Messiah, Jesus learned the meaning and cost of obedience in experience through what he suffered (Mark 8:31; Heb. 5:7–9), and became obedient even to death on a cross (Phil. 2:5–8). This was a conscious and voluntary act of obedience right up to the point of death itself (John 10:17–18; 19:30). Since Satan and evil had no place in his righteous life, death could not in fact hold on to him (John 14:30; 16:10–11; Acts 2:24; Rom. 1:4). Paul contrasts the obedience of Jesus with the disobedience of *Adam, seeing the two as representative figures acting on behalf of the old and the new humanity. Christ's obedience right to the cross won *justification and eternal life for the many people on whose behalf he lived and died (Rom. 5:18–19; cf. also 1 Cor. 15:20–22, 45–49).

Christ's obedience as understood by the Christian church

Jesus' obedience and sinless life have been drawn upon in at least four ways by the church down the years: (1) As the example of perfect obedience by a Son of the Father, his life gives inspiration to all God's children to live obedient lives (1 Pet. 2:18ff.); (2) The one who was tempted and did not yield can help us when we are tempted (Heb. 2:18; 4:14–16); (3) Only his righteous life could be laid down on behalf of sinners as an effective atoning sacrifice (2 Cor. 5:21; Heb. 7:26–27; 1 Pet. 3:18; 1 John 2:2);

(4) The *Holy Spirit of Christ dwells within Christians to reproduce Christ's life and image in them (Rom. 8:9–30). Calvin rightly states that we are saved by 'the whole course of his obedience' (Institutes II.xvi.5). In keeping with this, Reformed theologians have often distinguished between Christ's active obedience (his life of filial obedience to the Father) and his passive obedience (his suffering of the Father's judgment against covenant-breakers). These terms were not intended to denote that Christ was at any point inactive ('passive') in his obedience. Passive is used here in the Latinate sense (patior: suffer, submit). Nonetheless, the fullness of his obedience is now commonly clarified in terms of his preceptive and penal obedience.

Bibliography

G. C. Berkouwer, The Person of Christ (Grand Rapids, 1954); L. W. Grensted, The Person of Christ (London, 1934); D. Guthrie, New Testament Theology (Leicester, 1981); J. Murray, Collected Writings, vol. 2 (Edinburgh, 1977), pp. 151–157; B. B. Warfield, The Person and Work of Christ (Philadelphia, 1950).

J. P. BAKER

OCHINO, BERNARDINO (c. 1487–1564)

An Italian Reformer, popular evangelist and author, Ochino was born in Siena, joined the *Franciscans at the age of eighteen and studied medicine at Perugia. Transferring to the newly founded Capuchins in 1534, he was elected Vicar-General of the Order in 1538 and 1541.

His preaching was directly inspired by the Gospels and won rapturous response throughout Italy, particularly delighting Charles V at Naples in 1536. Many turned to Christ. But his 'Lutheran' doctrine began to arouse suspicion, and in July 1542 he was summoned to appear before the recently reconstituted Inquisition in Rome. Instead he quit Italy for Geneva, his flight causing a national sensation.

In 1547 Thomas *Cranmer invited him to England, and he spent six years in London; here he wrote his most ingenious work, Tragoedia (1549), which influenced Milton. He pastored exiled Italian communities in Germany and Switzerland, but his questing and questioning mind made him an uncomfortable bedfellow. No orthodoxy satisfied him, and he was suspected of anti-trinitarianism. A stream of published sermons and speculative dialogues – such as Labyrinthi (1561) – culminated in Dialogi XXX (1563), which included the scandalous Dialogus de Polygamia.

Banished from *Bullinger's Zurich, denied asylum in Nuremberg, he sought refuge in Poland, was again banished and died an outcast from Christendom in Moravia.

Bibliography

R. H. Bainton, Bernardino Ochino, esule e riformatore senese del cinque cento, 1487–1563 (Florence, 1940); C. Benrath, Bernardino Ochino of Siena (London, 1876); P. M. J. McNair (ed.), Patterns of Perfection: Seven Sermons Preached in Patria by Bernardino Ochino, 1487–1564 (Cambridge, 1999); M. Taplin, The Italian Reformers and the Zurich Church, c. 1540–1620 (Aldershot, 2003).

P. M. J. MCNAIR

ODEN, THOMAS CLARK (b. 1931)

Thomas Oden, a United Methodist minister and theologian, was born on 21 October, 1931, in Altus, Oklahoma. He retired from Drew University in 2004, where he remains as Emeritus Professor. His early theological career was characterized by liberalism, with a strong emphasis on humanistic psychology. Around 1965 Oden returned to an evangelical orthodoxy, in whose revitalizing he has been actively involved ever since. He is best known for encouraging a return to an ecumenical 'paleo-orthodoxy', by which he means an understanding of the essential nature of Christianity rooted in the teachings and exegesis of the Church Fathers from the first five centuries (see *Patristic theology). Oden argues that this corpus constitutes a consensual tradition leading to the maxim that 'in the worldwide community of believers every care should be taken to hold fast to what has been believed everywhere, always, and by all'. According to Oden, the recovery of the patristic tradition is not 'a simplistic, sentimental return to premodern methods', but 'a rigorous, painstaking rebuilding from the crash of modernity using treasures old and new for moral formation and spiritual reconstruction'. As part of this project, Oden authored numerous theological books, including a massive three-volume systematic theology. He is also the general editor of the Ancient Christian Commentary on Scripture.

Bibliography

Works: The Care of Souls in the Classic Tradition (Philadelphia, 1984); The Rebirth of Orthodoxy: Signs of Life in Christianity (New York, 2003); Systematic Theology, 3 vols. (Peabody, 2006).

Studies: A. G. Padgett, 'Methodist Theology Today: A Review Essay of Thomas C. Oden, Systematic Theology', Evangelical Quarterly 64, 1992, pp. 245–250; K. Tanner and C. A. Hall (eds.), Ancient and Postmodern Christianity: Paleo-orthodoxy in the 21st Century: Essays in Honor of Thomas C. Oden (Downers Grove, 2002); R. C. Wood, 'Rediscovering the Radical Christian Consensus: The Theology of Thomas Oden', Perspectives in Religious Studies 17, 1990, pp. 253–260.

A. VIDU

OECOLAMPADIUS, JOHN (1482–1531)

Born in Weinsberg in Württemberg, Germany, Oecolampadius attended Heidelberg University and was soon in touch with a *humanist circle which included Jacob Wimpfeling (1450–1528), Johannes Reuchlin (1455–1522), *Melancthon and *Bucer. After a period as a tutor to the children of Landgrave Philip I of the Palatinate, he became a preacher at Weinsberg (1510). Further study at Tübingen University led to a mastery of Greek, Latin and Hebrew and thence to work with *Erasmus on his NT (1515). In 1518 he was awarded his doctorate at Basel. He rapidly became a considerable patristic scholar, particularly interested in the Greek Fathers. In 1518 he was appointed penitentiary in the Münster at Basel. His studies continued and for a short time in 1521 he entered a Brigittines Monastery at Altomünster. He was, however, moving in a Reformed direction and soon left. In 1522 he returned to Basel and published the first of his translations of Chrysostom.

Already under the considerable influence of *Zwingli, he soon became the leading figure of the Reformed cause in Basel. In 1525 he was made professor of theology and, in typical Swiss fashion, furthered the Reformation cause by formal disputations. In Basel he was successful; in Catholic Baden (1526), faced by John Eck (1486–1543), much less so, but later in Berne (1528), and with the help of Bucer, Zwingli and Wolfgang Capito (1478–1541), he was part of the process which won Berne to the Reformation cause.

In the following year, under his influence, Basel committed itself to the Reformation. He made proposals for setting up a body composed of pastors, town councillors and church elders which sought to avoid the dependence for church discipline upon the council, which characterized Zurich. These were a fore-taste of later developments by Bucer and Calvin.

Oecolampadius' theology developed towards a view of Christ's spiritual presence in the Eucharist. Though he followed Zwingli at this point, he had an independent mind and cited patristic sources to support his convictions. He was involved in the Colloquy of Marburg (1529) (see Luther; Eucharist). Like Zwingli, he found himself troubled by the Anabaptists and in 1529 disputed with them. They were driven from Basel.

He died shortly after the Battle of Kappel (1531). A scholarly, retiring man, he was a significant Reformation figure in Switzerland. He had continued to work in close collaboration with Erasmus in translating Chrysostom. His role in keeping Erasmian and patristic learning within the early Reformation circle is important.

Bibliography

D. Poythress, Reformer of Basel: The Life, Thought and Influence of Johannes Oecolampadius (Grand Rapids, 2011); G. Rupp, Patterns of Reformation (London, 1969).

C. P. WILLIAMS

OFFICES OF CHRIST

Historical discussion

The Gospels record Jesus acknowledging that he was the Christ, the anointed one (Heb. messiah), long expected by Israel. The name 'Christ' became an official title for him after his resurrection. Behind this lay the anointing with oil of priests and kings in the OT, and the declaration that the Messiah was to be anointed to office (Isa. 61:1–3). While the church reflected on Christ as a royal priest from its earliest days, it was Calvin who recognized that sometimes the prophets too were anointed. In his Institutes he considers Christ as mediator between God and man in terms of his being prophet, priest, and king. This pattern became commonplace in Reformed theology, The Westminster Larger Catechism (36–45) of 1648 adopting the threefold office to unfold the work of Christ. It has been repeated in standard systematic theologies up to the present. It is not so evident in other traditions. The Catechism of the Catholic Church (pp. 1544–1545) refers only cursorily and in passing to Christ as priest. For its part, Orthodoxy is more interested in the incarnation and deification than the work of Christ, let alone Christ's offices (see R. Letham, Through Western Eyes: Eastern Orthodoxy; A Reformed Perspective, Tain, 2007, pp. 243–268).

Biblical background

The offices of Christ are based on the pattern of Israel in the OT, in line with the Jewish roots of the NT. The Christ was the anointed one, long expected as the one who would come to deliver his people. Jesus was anointed by the Holy Spirit at the Jordan at his installation in office (Matt. 3:13–17). This approach to the work of Christ follows the pattern of the three great functions or offices in Israel. Priests in Israel, who were to administer the sacrificial system and to represent the people before Yahweh, were taken from the tribe of Levi, the high priest from the sons of Aaron. Kings, after Saul, were descendants of David, from the tribe of Judah. There was a clear separation of the two – occupants of one office could not function in the other. Prophets, however, were called directly by Yahweh as his mouthpieces. The striking point about Jesus Christ is his fulfilling and occupying all three offices.

Criticisms

The idea of the threefold office has come in for much criticism. Wolfhart Pannenberg argued in Jesus – God and Man that only the prophetic office could possibly be said to characterize Jesus' earthly ministry. Indeed, there is no explicit or clear-cut evidence that Jesus claimed any of these offices for himself. He could not be a priest in Israel, since priests were taken exclusively from the tribe of Levi and Jesus belonged to Judah. Jesus himself warned against the popular demand to make him king, since his kingdom was of a different kind, not of this world (John 18:36–37). Moreover, he set himself apart from the OT prophets, for he was the Son of the living God (Matt. 16:13–16). Besides, there is an inherent difficulty in considering Christ as a prophet. Prophets spoke the word of God, whereas Jesus is identified as the Word of God (John 1:1–18). They authenticated their message with ‘thus says the Lord’. Jesus spoke on his own authority, declaring ‘I say unto you’. Therefore he is greater than a prophet.

On the other hand, it is impossible for us to understand Jesus’ identity and work outside the struggles Yahweh had with Israel down the years. Israel was heir to a long process in which God had revealed himself and his saving purposes. Torrance has argued in The Mediation of Christ that this is itself revelatory; the national structures of Israel are reflective of God’s self-revelation. Attempts to set this Jewish background aside and construct some other alternative from outside the context of Israel raise the inevitable question of anti-Semitism.

Jesus may not have claimed these offices explicitly, but the overall context points to his fulfilling everything they represented. Just as the prophets did, Jesus spoke the word of God; in his case, the biblical authors claim he was equal to, and identical with, God. His own word was the standard of authority. Behind this was the eschatological expectation of a prophet like Moses, whose word was to be heeded (Deut. 18:15–19). In Hebrews, his *death and intercession is seen in priestly terms throughout. The epistles portray the risen Christ as King over the church and the world as the Lord (Col. 1:15–20; Heb. 1:1).

The criticisms of the threefold office of Christ have largely stemmed from the twentieth century predilection for a Christology from below, in which the humanity of Christ is in the foreground. The weaknesses of this approach were exposed by Colin Gunton (in Yesterday and Today: A Study of Continuities in Christology, London, 1997); the result was a Christ who was not quite God and not quite man, who could hardly be held to have identified with us. In recent decades, growing interest in patristics, both theological and exegetical, has led to a re-appropriation of the classic *Christology of Athanasius and Cyril. In answer to the question of who Jesus Christ is, these Fathers identified him as the eternal Son who has assumed human nature into permanent union. Such a retrieval undermines the force of much of the above criticisms.

The mutual interconnection of the three offices in Christ

The work of Christ is not portioned into a series of isolated actions. His ministry, life, death, resurrection, ascension and heavenly session is one integral work ‘for us and our salvation’. His activity in all three offices is interconnected and mutually interpreting.

Prophetic office

As the supreme prophet, Jesus declares the truth of God, and reveals God, since he is one with the Father (John 14:1–11). He declares, represents and realizes the justice of God in his priestly work of atonement, while in his resurrection he makes known his kingly rule. Karl Barth focused much of his theology on Christ the living Word of *revelation.

Priestly office

As our great high priest, Christ represents his people in making *atonement, offering intercession (his presence as a man at the right hand of the Father), and in benediction (his final act in his ascension betokening his continued ministry in and to the church). This raises the question of the extent of the human race he represents and incorporates. The fate of the unevangelized has loomed large in recent discussion. Karl Rahner suggested a class of ‘anonymous Christians’, the evangelical Clark Pinnock has proposed that God’s mercy is wider than hitherto believed, while the traditional view that – apart from such instances as the case of elect infants dying in infancy – conscious faith in Christ is necessary for *salvation continues to find advocacy. Additionally, the penal *substitutionary doctrine of the atonement has come under attack at various times. Hugo *Grotius adopted what Oliver Crisp calls penal non-substitution, in his exposition of God’s upholding his moral government of the universe, while Tom Smail wishes to maintain substitution but without the penal element. That Christ underwent punishment for our sins is considered barbaric. However, its advocates maintain that it demonstrates the trinitarian love of God; the Son willingly and freely offering himself in place of his people. It is the trinitarian context, and the threefold office, that provides the context to understand the atonement.

Kingly office

At his *resurrection, Christ was exalted to the right hand of the Father, to rule all things until his enemies are all subjugated (Matt. 28:18–20; 1 Cor. 15:20–28). He reigns in effective priestly intercession and sent the Holy Spirit to reveal the truth to his apostles (John 16:12–15). However, focus on Christ's kingship has seen a range of triumphalist ideas develop. The prosperity gospel, and some in the theonomic movement, have focused on the material benefits of Christ's present reign, with suffering, poverty, human atrocities and injustice largely unaddressed (see *Poverty and wealth). It is more generally recognized that Christ's reign is inaugurated but fully consummated only eschatologically.

Bibliography

K. Barth, CD I.2, 83–87; II.1, 152ff., 397ff.; II.2, 408ff., 443ff.; III.2, 61f.; IV.1, 137ff., 275.; IV.2, 155ff., 291ff., 518f.; H. Bavinck, Reformed Dogmatics, vol. 3 (ET, Grand Rapids, 2006); J. Calvin, Institutes of the Christian Religion 2:12–17 (ET, London and Philadelphia, 1960); R. Letham, The Work of Christ (Leicester and Downers Grove, 1993); W. Pannenberg, Jesus – God and Man (ET, Philadelphia, 1968); T. F. Torrance, The Mediation of Christ (Grand Rapids, 1983).

R. W. A. LETHAM

OLDHAM, JOSEPH HOULDSWORTH (1874–1969)

Oldham was a Scottish layperson who was led to Christ by D. L. Moody at Oxford and served as secretary of the British Student Volunteer Missionary union and the Inter-Varsity Christian Union. After three years with the YMCA in India and further studies at Edinburgh he worked as Mission Study Secretary for the Free Church of Scotland. He was recruited by John R. Mott as secretary of the 1910 Edinburgh International Missionary Conference, subsequently becoming secretary of its Continuation Committee and founding editor of the International Review of Missions (1912). After the First World War Oldham designed and became secretary of the International Missionary Council and for the next twenty years was the single most influential figure on the international *ecumenical stage, his major interests including Africa, missions and education, *race relations and (in the 1930s) the growing totalitarian menace in Europe. In the 1920s he played a key role in opposing forced labour in Kenya and in establishing in British colonial policy the principle of the 'paramouncy' of the interests of Africans in East and Central Africa, and in persuading the government to devote more study and resources to African needs as a whole, especially education.

Oldham was study organizer of the Oxford Conference on Church, Community and State (1937), and the constitution of the *World Council of Churches laid down in 1938 was largely his design. At the same time he was critical of the tendency of large-scale institutions to become self-serving bureaucracies, and much of his energy from 1938 was devoted to small-scale groups bringing together 'the best minds' to work on social issues in light of Christian faith. Particularly important here were 'The Moot' (1938–47), which included figures as diverse as T. S. Eliot, Karl Mannheim and John *Baillie, and the Christian Frontier Council founded by Oldham in 1942 in order to bridge the growing gulf between the churches and secular people wrestling ethically with social issues. A prolific writer, his most substantial work was the pioneering Christianity and the Race Problem (1924). No less significantly, his little Devotional Diary (1925) enjoyed huge popularity for nearly thirty years, while his weekly bulletin The Christian News-Letter was widely influential in stimulating popular discussion of vital topics throughout the Second World War and for several years afterwards.

Bibliography

K. Clements, Faith on the Frontier: A Life of J. H. Oldham (Edinburgh and Geneva, 1999).

K. CLEMENTS

OLEVIANUS, CASPAR (1536–87)

Caspar Olevianus (Olevian) was a Reformed theologian in Heidelberg and Herborn. Raised in the Roman Church, he converted to the Reformed faith in university. After briefly practising law, he studied theology in Geneva with John *Calvin and Theodore *Beza and in Zürich with Heinrich *Bullinger. Returning to Trier, he attempted to begin a Calvinist congregation but was jailed by the archbishop. He was rescued and given a position in Heidelberg by Frederick III, the Elector Palatinate. From 1561 until 1576 he served first in the university, then as pastor of Holy Spirit Church and as a teacher in the seminary. Upon Frederick's death in 1576, he and the Reformed theologians were expelled. In Herborn he founded and led, until his death in 1587, an influential Reformed seminary.

Olevianus is best known for his collaboration with Zacharias *Ursinus in the formation of the *Heidelberg Catechism (1563), but he also wrote an important early account of Reformed federal (*covenant) theology, De substantia foederis gratuiti inter Deum et electos (1585). He wrote three popular summaries of the faith and several biblical commentaries, the most significant of which, on Romans, was published in 1579.

See also: REFORMED THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

Works: A Firm Foundation. An Aid to Interpreting the Heidelberg Catechism, tr. L. D. Bierma in R. A. Muller (ed.), Texts and Studies in Reformation and Post-Reformation Thought (Grand Rapids, 1995); Exposition of the Symbole of the Apostles, tr. J. Fielde (London, 1581); Der Gnadenbund Gottes 1590: Faksimile-Edition Mit Einem Kommentar, eds. F. Gunther, J. F. G. Goeters, W. Holtmann and K. Müller (Köln, 1994); Monatshefte für Evangelische Kirchengeschichte des Rheinlands 38–39 (1988–89).

Studies: L. D. Bierma, German Calvinism in the Confessional Age (Grand Rapids, 1997); R. S. Clark, Caspar Olevian and the Substance of the Covenant: The Double Benefit of Christ, in D. F. Wright (ed.), Rutherford Studies in Historical Theology (Edinburgh, 2005).

R. S. CLARK

OMAN, JOHN WOOD (1860–1939)

John Oman was born in Orkney and educated at Edinburgh and Heidelberg. He was Presbyterian minister at Alnwick, Northumberland, from 1889 to 1907 before becoming professor at, and principal of, Westminster College, Cambridge. Deeply concerned about the crisis for Christianity brought about by the *Enlightenment, he developed an interest in *Schleiermacher and in the inner authority of truth which verifies and helps elucidate all other experiences. But this inner illumination is not just absoluteness of value; it attaches itself to that objective reality we call the *supernatural. Oman's 'sacredly discerned' seems not unlike R. *Otto's 'idea of the holy', though Oman criticized the latter, probably unfairly. Oman believed strongly in man's progress to ultimate freedom and exalted the individual religious *conscience at the expense of all external *authority, including the *creeds and the *church. In his thinking the *kingdom of God has a similar primacy: his doctrine of the church and ministry is thus rather impoverished. In all, he wrote thirteen books, notably The Natural and the Supernatural (1931), but the Germanic cast of his thought does not make for easy reading. Oman's pupil, H. H. Farmer (1892–1981), went on to stress the personality of the supernatural, feeling that his teacher had not done justice to this aspect of deity.

Bibliography

G. Alexander and H. H. Farmer, in J. Oman, Honest Religion (Cambridge, 1941), pp. xv–xxxii (memoirs); F. G. Healey, Religion and Reality: The Theology of John Oman (Edinburgh, 1965); Y. Woodfin, John Wood Oman (1860–1939): A Critical Study of His Contribution to Theology (unpublished dissertation, New College, Edinburgh, 1962).

I. SELLERS

ONTOLOGY

Although the term ontology (literally, the study of being) was first used in scholarly writing in the early seventeenth century, ontological considerations begin in Greek thought. They underlie *Plato's (fourth century BC) description of reality in the Republic, where he differentiates the realm of appearances from the intelligible world of mathematical objects and Forms. *Aristotle (fourth century BC) in his Metaphysics and later *Thomas Aquinas in the thirteenth century systematically studied being by investigating substances in terms of their essences. In the twentieth century, Martin *Heidegger noted that 'being' must be understood through the being of the enquirer, Dasein or human beings, whose being-in-the-world he explores. In a later work, Heidegger continues to explore being by asking what he takes to be the most fundamental question, 'Why is there something rather than nothing?'

In studying what it is to exist, the general features that are characteristic of all beings, and being's most fundamental categories and the relationships that hold between them, ontology raises fundamental questions about reality: What is being? What is it to be or exist? What are the primary categories of being? What laws govern these categories? What kind of being, for example, do universals or numbers have? What gives an existent both its identity and its uniqueness? Ontology thus addresses the objective side of our experience, in contrast to but in conjunction with *epistemology, which addresses how the subject knows that reality.

Bibliography

Aristotle, Metaphysics, in R. McKeon (ed.), The Basic Works of Aristotle (New York, 2001); M. Heidegger, An Introduction to Metaphysics (Garden City, 1961); idem, Being and Time (Albany, 1996); Thomas Aquinas, On Being and Essence (Notre Dame, 1965).

B. R. REICHENBACH

OPEN THEISM/OPENNESS THEOLOGY

These terms have been given to a type of theology which has emerged in evangelical circles to question some of the fundamental assumptions of classical Christian *theism. Openness theology asserts that the traditional doctrine of *God is 'closed', mainly because of its belief that God is by nature both immutable and impassible (see *Impassibility of God). Open theists claim that these statements derive from Hellenistic philosophy and not from the Bible, which is supposed to reveal a God who is deeply affected by human activity and whose nature can change to respond to this if he wishes it to do so. They quote passages which refer to God 'repenting' of previous threats or promises because of subsequent human action, as evidence for this, often taking quite literally expressions which theologians have traditionally interpreted in a more metaphorical sense (see *Accommodation). They are particularly opposed to traditional conceptions of divine 'foreknowledge', and argument over the true meaning of this has characterized much of the recent debate in North American circles. The principal motivation of open theists is pastoral, and springs from a perceived need to preach a God who can relate to suffering human beings in a meaningful way. Open theists assume that a God who cannot change or experience suffering cannot understand the realities of human life and therefore cannot relate to us. They claim that the biblical picture of a 'suffering God', revealed most fully on the *cross of Jesus Christ, contradicts this essentially philosophical view and offers us a God who can be known and understood as one who genuinely cares about our experiences of life.

Open theism clearly owes much to the theology of Jürgen *Moltmann who has promoted the idea of a suffering God in order to account for the horrors of Auschwitz and the like. There is also some indebtedness to the *process theology of Charles Hartshorne (1897–2000), according to which God grows and develops along with his creation. At the same time, open theism is distinguished from those approaches by its typically *evangelical insistence on a high doctrine of *Scripture. Open theists contend that their view is the right interpretation of the Bible, which was obscured by a false philosophical direction taken by classical theology which the Reformers and their successors were unwilling or unable to overcome. However much of their approach may have been influenced by recent social and political trends, they insist that they are doing no more than recover what God originally revealed of himself to his people. In this sense, open theists claim to be deeply conservative and orthodox, a stance which sets them apart from men like Moltmann and Hartshorne.

Openness theology has made some impact within evangelical circles but has largely been ignored outside them, and it is unclear whether it will have much of a future. Its critics, who are almost all evangelicals, believe that 'openness' is merely a code word for 'liberalism', a term which evangelicals generally want to avoid because of its associations with a theology which ignores or compromises the supreme authority of Scripture. They argue that although open theists have a high regard for the authority of Scripture, in practice they undermine this by an inadequate hermeneutic.

The main objection to open theism is that it is superficial. Its critics do not deny that God is involved in human affairs and they insist that believers have a genuine relationship with him which is rooted and grounded in his love for us. As they see it, the problem with the open theist approach is that it fails to distinguish adequately between the persons of the Trinity on the one hand, and the nature of God on the other. In his nature, God can neither change nor suffer because he is both perfect and sovereign. For him to change would mean either that he was not perfect to begin with or else that he has now abandoned his earlier perfection, neither of which options is possible within the parameters of biblical theology. For him to suffer would mean that he is vulnerable to the power of an inferior being, which amounts to a denial of his sovereignty over all creation.

Critics of open theism insist that the love of God is not part of his nature but a quality of his persons, and it is in terms of personal relationship that human beings come to know him. In his personal aspect, God is fully capable of entering into fellowship with human beings, even to the point where one of his persons, the Son, took on a human nature in order to be able to suffer and die for us in the ultimate act of identification with our suffering and need. At the same time, the cross is not the end of the story, which continues until the final victory over sin and death is obtained through the resurrection, ascension and glorification of Christ. This can happen because in another way God remains untouched by human failure and is therefore able to save us from its consequences. In his nature, God is quite different from human beings, and it is this difference which makes it possible for him to be our Saviour. Our *salvation depends on the fact that God cannot change, because his immutability is the assurance that what he has done is guaranteed to remain the same for ever. By overemphasizing relationality at the expense of the divine nature, open theists have failed to appreciate that what they are trying to affirm has always formed an essential part of classical theology. Although much of the traditional Christian theological vocabulary may have been borrowed from ancient philosophy, its substance is more purely biblical than open theists are prepared to allow. For all these reasons, most evangelicals have rejected open theism or openness theology, which remains a minority voice even in the circles where it has attracted a certain amount of attention.

Bibliography

G. L. Bray, The Personal God: Is the Classical Understanding of God Tenable? (Carlisle, 1998); J. B. Cobb, Jr and C. H. Pinnock, Searching for an Adequate God: A Dialogue Between Process and Free Will Theists (Grand Rapids, 2000); C. H. Pinnock (ed.), The Openness of God: A Biblical Challenge to the Traditional Understanding of God (Downers Grove, 1994); J. Piper, J. Taylor and P. K. Helseth (ed.), Beyond the Bounds: Open Theism and the Undermining of Biblical Christianity (Wheaton, 2003); D. Strange, The Possibility of Salvation among the Un-evangelised: An Analysis of Inclusivism in Recent Evangelical Theology (Carlisle, 2002); B. A. Ware, God's Lesser Glory: A Critique of Open Theism (Leicester, 2001).

G. L. BRAY

ORANGE, COUNCIL OF, see SEMI-PELAGIANISM

ORDINATION, see MINISTRY

ORDO SALUTIS

Ordo salutis (Lat. 'order of salvation') is the systematic ordering of the various elements in personal *salvation. It answers the question: how are, for example, *regeneration, *faith, *repentance, *justification, *sanctification and glorification related to each other?

The term is common in *Reformed theology, but first appeared in the *Lutheran dogmatists Franz Buddeus (Institutiones Theologiae Dogmaticae, 1724) and Jakobus Karpov (Theologia Revelata Dogmatica, 1739). The concept, however, has an older pedigree, stretching back into pre-Reformation theology's attempt to relate the various experiential and sacramental steps to salvation (see *Penance). In this context Luther's personal struggle may be viewed as a search for a truly evangelical ordo salutis.

The ordo salutis seeks to establish, on the basis of Scripture, a pattern common to all believers, although experienced with different degrees of consciousness by each individual. The order involved is logical, not chronological (even if certain temporal implications seem to be implied).

Controversies over apparently isolated issues of soteriology are frequently related to contrasting expositions of the ordo salutis. This is well illustrated by the desire of some theologians (e.g. A. *Kuyper) to safeguard the justification of the ungodly by placing justification prior to regeneration in the ordo, and teaching a justification from eternity. Others, meanwhile, seek to safeguard man's responsibility by giving faith priority over regeneration, while yet others give regeneration (God's sovereign work) priority over *conversion (man's response) in order to safeguard divine *sovereignty.

Important (though often neglected) in such discussions is the recognition of the fluidity of theological language. Not all theologians have used their terminology in the same way. For example, Calvin uses 'regeneration' to denote the whole process of renewal, repentance, mortification and vivification (new life), in contrast to later evangelical theology's use of the term in an inaugural sense (new birth).

In recent years the concept has come under widespread criticism because: (1) It is heavily dependent on a passage (Rom. 8:28–30; cf. W. *Perkins' [see *Puritan theology] 'Golden Chain') which does not reflect on the order, but rather on the fullness of salvation (e.g. O. Weber, *Berkouwer).

(2) It distorts the basic NT (Pauline) emphasis on historia salutis, substituting for it a less than biblical emphasis on personal experience (H. N. Ridderbos). It transforms the NT's via salutis (Christ, John 14:6) into a 'psychologizing' (*Barth) or 'spiritualizing' (*Weber) of salvation. This subjective focus means that man's basic orientation as incurvatus in se ('turned in on himself', Luther) is unresolved.

(3) It reduces to one level (ordo) elements belonging to disparate dimensions of salvation (the divine activity and human responsibility). This 'lowest common denominator' approach minimizes the riches of God's *grace and virtually nullifies the NT emphasis on the *eschatological (already/not yet) character of Christian experience.

Some of these criticisms are salutary, but: (1) We cannot avoid thinking about salvation in a coherent (order-ly!) fashion. H. Berkhof is correct to say of Barth that 'he too needs a kind of logical order' (The Christian Faith, p. 479). (2) Following *Calvin, we should stress that the disparate elements in soteriology all have their centre in Christ. All evangelical blessings are ours only in him (Eph. 1:1–14). *Union with Christ must therefore be the dominant motif in any formulation of the application of redemption and the dominant feature of any 'order' of salvation.

Bibliography

K. Barth, CD IV.2; G. C. Berkouwer, Faith and Justification (Grand Rapids, 1954); J. Calvin, Institutes, III; R. B. Gaffin, The Centrality of the Resurrection (Grand Rapids, 1978); M. Garcia, Life in Christ: Union with Christ and Twofold Grace in Calvin's Theology (Paternoster, 2008); A. A. Hodge, 'The Ordo Salutis; or Relation in the Order of Nature of Holy Character and Divine Favor', PTR 54, 1878, pp. 305–321; J. Murray, Redemption – Accomplished and Applied (Grand Rapids, 1955); O. Weber, Foundations of Dogmatics, vol. 2 (Grand Rapids, 1983).

S. B. FERGUSON

ORIENTAL ORTHODOX THEOLOGY

The Oriental Orthodox churches are those Eastern jurisdictions which accepted the decrees of the first three *ecumenical councils but not those of the fourth, the Council of *Chalcedon (451). They comprise the Armenian Apostolic Church; the *Coptic Orthodox; the *Ethiopian Orthodox; the *Syrian or Syriac Orthodox (sometimes called Jacobite after its most important theologian, the missionary bishop Jacob Baradaeus, c. 490–578); the now-divided Syrian Orthodox of India (some of whom continue to owe allegiance to the Syrian patriarch); and (since 1994) the Eritrean Orthodox. The Nestorians or Church of the East represent a different Christological tradition, belonging to neither Eastern nor Oriental Orthodoxy, rooted in the approach of *Nestorius, a fifth-century patriarch of Constantinople.

Traditionally, the distinctive aspect of Oriental Orthodox theology, in comparison with that of (*Eastern) Orthodox churches which upheld the Chalcedonian Definition, has been their *Christology. This has been called *monophysite. However, the Oriental churches dislike this term because of its perceived pejorative connotations, and recent investigation has shown that part of the disagreement in the fifth century was (as so often during Christological debate) caused by linguistic ambiguity: the term physis, which appears in *Cyril of Alexandria's slogan 'the one physis of the incarnate Word' could be taken as meaning 'nature' or 'person'. Furthermore, it has been increasingly acknowledged that politics and resentment at perceived Greek and Roman domination of church life and thought were major factors in the fifth-century division; these churches were developing in different cultural worlds from that of the Greeks. Accordingly, dialogue assisted by the *World Council of Churches between Orthodox and Oriental Orthodox (unofficial since 1964, official since 1985) has led to agreement that both traditions are essentially orthodox in their confession of Christ, affirming both Christ's deity and his full humanity, along with the four negative adverbs used at Chalcedon affirming that the union of divinity and humanity was without confusion, change, division or separation. Indeed, it has gone so far as to describe the differences as matters of terminology rather than substance, although the two traditions continue to differ over whether the later ecumenical councils may properly be seen merely as elaborating the Nicene faith. As a result, full eucharistic communion has been restored between the two traditions in the area under the patriarchs of Antioch, although in most other areas this process is less advanced.

Testimony to the essential unity of Orthodox and Oriental Orthodox in Christology comes from the fact that both traditions venerate icons as part of worship, and do so on similar grounds. This is all the more significant since it was only at Nicaea II (787, long after attempts to heal the division had failed) that the practice received formal affirmation.

Certain other theological and ecclesiological distinctives appear in one or more Oriental Orthodox jurisdictions, but as far as the tradition as a whole is concerned, apparent differences from Eastern Orthodox theology are probably primarily cultural, the result of many centuries of separate development.

Bibliography

A. S. Atiya, A History of Eastern Christianity (London, 1968); J. Binns, An Introduction to the Christian Orthodox Churches (Cambridge, 2002); C. Chaillot, The Syrian Orthodox Church of Antioch and All the East (Geneva, 1998); C. Chaillot and A. Belopopsky (eds.), Towards Unity: The Theological Dialogue between the Orthodox Church and the Oriental Orthodox Churches (Geneva, 1998); P. Gregorios, W. H. Lazareth and N. A. Nissiotis (eds.), Does Chalcedon Divide or Unite? (Geneva, 1981); D. P. Teague (ed.), Turning Over a New Leaf: Protestant Missions and the Orthodox Churches of the Middle East (London and Lynnwood, 1992).

T. GRASS

ORIGEN (c. 185–c. 254)

As learned exegete, creative philosopher, master of the spiritual life, and active churchman, Origen was one of the great figures of the ancient church. He was born in *Alexandria of Christian parents. After the martyrdom of his father in the Severan persecution (202), Origen supported the family by teaching. When he was asked to instruct catechumens preparing for baptism, he gave up secular teaching and adopted an *ascetic life. Devoting himself to the study of Scripture, he was often called to other places to participate in theological discussions. On a trip to Palestine (c. 215) he was invited to preach by the bishops of Caesarea and Jerusalem. His bishop Demetrius, perhaps spurred by jealousy of Origen's influence, took exception to this. On a later visit to Palestine (c. 230) he was ordained a presbyter so that there would be no objection to his preaching. Demetrius was furious, and Origen chose to move his teaching activities to Caesarea. His pupil, Gregory Thaumaturgus (c. 213–c. 270), in his Panegyric on Origen, described his educational methods: he provided an encyclopedic education, encouraged the reading of all the non-atheistic philosophers, employed the Socratic method and taught more by example than by instruction. Imprisoned and tortured during the Decian persecution, Origen died not long after at Tyre.

Origen's great work of scholarship was the Hexapla, a study edition of the OT, presenting in parallel columns the Hebrew text, a Greek transliteration and the translations of Aquila, Symmachus, the Seventy (Septuagint) and Theodotion. His exegetical work found expression in scholia (brief notes) on difficult passages, numerous homilies preached regularly in Caesarea and directed to ordinary believers, and full-scale scholarly commentaries on major books (significant portions of John and Matthew survive). The climax of Christian *apologetic literature in Greek was reached in his Against Celsus; in replying to this pagan critic's True Word, Origen, in addition to the usual themes of Christian apologetics, made extensive use of the argument from the moral excellence of Jesus and the beneficent influence of Christian teaching. The treatises On Prayer and Exhortation to Martyrdom show the saintly spirituality and fervent faith of a man often remembered only as a scholar and theologian. Origen's major work of theology was On First Principles, treating in four books God and heavenly beings, the material world and human beings, free will and its consequences, and the interpretation of Scripture. Opposition to his teachings on the pre-existence of souls (see *Soul, origin of) and *universal salvation, climaxing in their condemnation at the Fifth Ecumenical Council in Constantinople (553), adversely affected the circulation of his works, many of which survive only in Latin translations of sometimes doubtful accuracy.

Origen was educated in the milieu of emerging Neoplatonism (see *Platonism), and his theological construction works with its philosophical concepts. His basic presuppositions are the unity and benevolence of God and the freedom of his creatures. Origen contributed significantly to the doctrine of the *Trinity with his teaching on the eternal generation of the Son by the Father. This assured that the Son was eternally of the same nature as the Father but derived from him. The *Holy Spirit, whose exact relation to the Father and Son is not clear, is in the third rank as the chief of spiritual beings. The universe includes a variety of functions united as in a body, so there are various ranks of angels and demons, their nature determined by their free choice. Some spiritual beings by choosing evil became demons; others whose transgression was not so serious fell into bodily existence, becoming the souls of human beings. Origen seems to make a more significant division between beings which are pure spirits (bodiless) and those having bodies, than between uncreated and created beings. Jesus Christ was a union of the *Logos, a soul that had not fallen into sin, and a human body.

In his doctrine of *redemption Origen drew on traditional Christian themes, such as the victory of Christ over the wicked spiritual powers, but at other times he described it as an educational process. The process continues in successive worlds, in which punishment is disciplinary and corrective (see *Metempsychosis). The love of God eventually triumphs in the salvation of all beings, who finally choose freely to love God. The church is important as the school of Christ. As with the human nature of Christ, the material aspect of the sacraments is not neglected, but the emphasis is on the spiritual aspect and what benefits the soul of the recipient. The true leaders of the church are concerned with the care of souls.

Origen's most enduring influence on the practice of the church was his biblical interpretation (see *Hermeneutics). Scripture is inspired by the Holy Spirit, which means that every text has a spiritual meaning whether it has a literal meaning or not. The same Spirit must be in the interpreter for him to discern this meaning, and divine power must be added to the words to make them effective. Not every part of Scripture appears to have a lofty spiritual sense, because God has accommodated it to human language and not every person is at the same stage of spiritual growth. Problems in the text are to make the reader look beyond the literal to a non-literal sense. Since the human being is body, spirit and soul (see *Anthropology), so Scripture has three senses: the actual story, the meaning for the church and Christian doctrine and the moral lesson. This is Origen's normal order, and in his homilies in church he went directly from the historical sense to the application to the souls of his hearers. The non-literal meanings were justified on the basis that since Scripture is spiritual, it must have a meaning worthy of God and be inerrant in spite of apparent difficulties. Controls on the non-literal interpretation were provided by the history of salvation and the articles of faith, but the understanding of the nature of man and God allowed philosophical ideas to influence the interpretation. The allegorical (spiritual) interpretation was elevated to prominence by Origen's followers, who thereby lost the control exercised by the moral purpose.

Bibliography

H. Crouzel, Origen (Edinburgh, 1989); J. Daniélou, Origen (London, 1955); B. Drewery, Origen and the Doctrine of Grace (London, 1960); W. Fairweather, Origen and Greek Patristic Theology (Edinburgh, 1901); R. P. C. Hanson, Allegory and Event (London, 1959); idem, Origen's Doctrine of Tradition (London, 1954); R. E. Heine, Origen: Scholarship in the Service of the Church (Oxford, 2010); J. W. Trigg, Origen: The Bible and Philosophy in the Third-Century Church (Atlanta, 1983); idem, Origen: The Early Church Fathers (London, 1998).

E. FERGUSON

ORIGINAL RIGHTEOUSNESS, see FALL

ORIGINAL SIN, see SIN

ORR, JAMES (1844–1913)

Scottish theologian, apologist and polemicist, Orr was educated for the most part at Glasgow University, where he distinguished himself in philosophy and theology. After seventeen years of pastoral ministry, he delivered a lecture series which was published as The Christian View of God and the World (1893). This work, which proved to be his magnum opus, was widely acclaimed and launched him on a prolific academic career. He was the leading United *Presbyterian theologian at the time of the United Free Church of Scotland union of 1900, and he came to exercise a significant influence in North America.

Orr's adult life corresponded to a particularly dynamic period in Protestant theology, and within this milieu he sought to defend evangelical orthodoxy in the face of various challenges. He was one of the earliest and principal British critics of Albrecht *Ritschl's thought. In The Ritschlian Theology and the Evangelical Faith (1897) and elsewhere, Orr insisted that Ritschlianism was opposed to genuine Christianity, and was intellectually untenable because of its limitation of the role of reason in Christian thought and experience. He also opposed Julius Wellhausen's documentary hypothesis on the Pentateuch. In The Problem of the Old Testament (1905), Orr argued for the 'essential Mosaicity' of the Pentateuch, and for the traditional construction of OT history. Further, Orr treated Charles Darwin's theory of man's origin as a serious threat to the Christian doctrines of man and sin. Initially he appeared comfortable with theistic evolution (see *Creation), but later, in God's Image in Man (1905), he stressed the necessity of supernatural interruptions of the evolutionary process to account for man as an embodied soul, and still later, in Sin as a Problem of Today (1910), he argued that the idea of moral evolution undermined the seriousness of sin and man's accountability for it.

There are some distinctive elements in Orr's apologetical thought. In The Progress of Dogma (1901), for example, Orr tried to counter Adolf *Harnack's negative verdict on the history of dogma by arguing that it has unfolded according to a recognizable inner logic. By regarding this logical movement as a manifestation of God's hand in history, Orr sought to vindicate the orthodox doctrines that the movement produced. With respect to *Scripture, Orr affirmed its plenary inspiration and remarkable accuracy, but regarded inerrancy as apologetically 'suicidal' (see Revelation and Inspiration, 1910). Finally, in such works as The Virgin Birth of Christ (1907), Orr defended theologically as well as biblically the *virginal conception of the Mediator.

The significance of Orr's theological contribution lies in neither its brilliance nor its originality, but in the breadth of his grasp of orthodox theology, the exhaustiveness of the reading upon which his conclusions were based and the vigour with which he defended and diffused his views. His voice seemed omnipresent in his day, and his last great work as editor of The International Standard Bible Encyclopaedia (1915) constituted a substantial and enduring means of extending conservative orthodoxy's line of defence. He was also a contributor to the twelve-volume series The Fundamentals (1910–15).

Three themes pervade Orr's work. The first is an appreciative insistence that *evangelical orthodoxy offers a unified and coherent worldview, a satisfying Weltanschauung. The second follows from the first: since Christian doctrine is an interconnected unity, no part can be negated or even altered without serious consequences for the whole. This determined Orr's apologetic agenda, and he ranged with remarkable competence across many disciplines in his efforts to buttress orthodoxy. The third decisive theme is the conviction that virtually all modern deviations from evangelical orthodoxy are prompted by anti-supernatural presuppositions.

Bibliography

J. Rogers and D. McKim, The Authority and Interpretation of the Bible (San Francisco, 1979); G. G. Scorgie, A Call for Continuity: The Theological Contribution of James Orr (Vancouver, 2004); P. Toon, The Development of Doctrine in the Church (Grand Rapids, 1979).

G. G. SCORGIE

ORTHODOXY/SCHOLASTICISM, LUTHERAN

The era of Lutheran orthodoxy refers to the century and a half of Lutheran theological development, elaboration and polemic, roughly situated between the confessional codification that took place with the Book of Concord (1580) and the various factors which contributed to an alternative paradigm for theology characterized by the concerns and approaches of the *Enlightenment, regnant in church and academy by the middle of the eighteenth century.

Lutheran orthodoxy arose in the context of the establishment within Lutheran territories of a common confessional position. Building upon the insights of the first and second generation Reformers, these later theologians sought to establish and defend such a confessional orthodoxy in church and academy. This process occurred, not only amid somewhat parallel developments within the *Reformed and *Roman Catholic confessional blocs, but also amid fundamental changes in philosophy, the sciences and biblical criticism which swept Western Christendom in the post-Reformation era.

Approach

A historiographical paradigm upheld by A. Tholuck and many others since the early nineteenth century has often evaluated Lutheran orthodoxy quite negatively, picturing it as coldly philosophical and scholastic (in a rationalistic, metaphysical sense) in contrast to the warm biblicism of their *Reformation-era forebears. This paradigm has serious shortcomings, not the least of which is the counterevidence of Lutheran orthodoxy's thoroughly exegetical approach to Scripture and the practice of theology, as well as the remarkable wealth of its devotional literature and hymnody.

Robert D. Preus began a much more sympathetic contemporary reassessment, although his historical-theological work found precedent in that of H. Schmid, and the more recent work of W. Elert, among others. Preus also appealed to the dialogue with orthodoxy among dogmatists such as F. Pieper. Preus's approach represents a notable historiographical and historical-theological advance, however, in that he sought to explore 'how these Lutherans of a former day arrived at their theological position, the basis for their assertions, the way they thought and reasoned' (Preus, Theology of Post-Reformation Lutheranism, 1.16). In doing so, Preus has shown a deep continuity in theological approach and conclusions between Luther, Melancthon and their contemporaries, and their Lutheran heirs, while not ignoring development and change in formulation, presentation and setting. Although mainly discussing Reformed orthodoxy, R. Muller has advanced and improved upon Preus's discussion in several ways, most notably regarding the nature of Protestant orthodoxy's 'scholasticism' and its role in academic theology.

Character

Preus highlighted several central characteristics of Lutheran orthodoxy: (1) a doctrinal position that grew out of and mutually informed exegesis; (2) 'catholicity and confessionalism', or commitment to the truth of Scripture as summarized in the Book of Concord, and as recognized – at least implicitly – by the universal church; (3) an abiding doctrinal unity, stemming from both confessional moorings and a strong loyalty to early Lutheran writings; and (4) a vigorous polemical stance, in line with their firm confessional position and closely reflecting the controversial tone of the day.

Periodization and representatives

Preus further suggested dividing Lutheran orthodoxy into three periods:

1. The golden age of orthodoxy, from the *Formula of Concord (1577) to the second decade of the seventeenth century; a time of exegetical and doctrinal fruitfulness in which the structure of a comprehensively 'Lutheran' systematic and polemical theology was put in place, largely on the model of *Melancthon's Loci communes. The work of L. Hutter is notable in this respect.

2. High orthodoxy, extending to mid-century; characterized by increasing awareness of issues of prolegomena, further stress on technical formulation and distinctions, and a more standardized polemical stance, together with an emphasis on the practical outflow of theology for the Christian life. J. Gerhard is considered its chief representative, who was also influential in introducing an extensive use of philosophical language and categories in the context of academic Lutheran theology.

3. The silver age of orthodoxy, reaching somewhat indefinitely into the first half of the eighteenth century; continued development took place simultaneously with various theological and philosophical movements which were increasingly undermining Lutheran orthodoxy's position in church and academy. A. Calov is often considered the pinnacle of the development of Lutheran orthodoxy in this period, although the vastness, thoroughness and clarity of J. A. Quenstedt's work arguably carried it to its furthest extent. Throughout this era, the Lutheran 'seats of orthodoxy' remained the universities at Wittenberg, Tübingen, Strasbourg, Leipzig and Jena; Rostock and Königsberg were also influential.

See also: LUTHERANISM AND LUTHERAN THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

Select Works: A. Calov, Biblia Illustrata (Frankfurt am Main, 1672–76); idem, Systema locorum theologicorum (Wittenberg, 1655–77); M. Chemnitz, Examen Concilii Tridentini (Frankfurt am Main, 1566–73); idem, Loci theologici (ET, St. Louis, 1989); J. Gerhard, Loci theologici (Jena, 1610–21); J. Hutter, Compend of Lutheran Theology (ET, Philadelphia, 1868); J. Quenstedt, Theologia didacticopolemica sive Systema Theologiae (Leipzig, 1702).

Studies: W. Elert, The Structure of Lutheranism (ET, St. Louis, 1962); R. Muller, Post-Reformation Reformed Dogmatics (Grand Rapids, 2003); F. Pieper, Christian Dogmatics (ET, St. Louis, 1951); R. D. Preus, The Theology of Post-Reformation Lutheranism (St. Louis, 1970); H. Schmid, The Doctrinal Theology of the Evangelical Lutheran Church (ET, repr. Minneapolis, 1961).

B. E. ELLIS

ORTHODOXY/SCHOLASTICISM, REFORMED

Reformed Orthodoxy was a theological movement which began in the immediate aftermath of the *Reformation and came to an end by 1800, although the Orthodox remained influential on later theologians, including *Schleiermacher and *Barth. Much was written in the twentieth century on the differences between the Reformers and the Reformed Orthodox (particularly in the 'Calvin against the Calvinists' debates), suggesting a range of changes, some material, some methodological, which made later *Reformed theology different, and inferior, from the vision of the Reformers. The theology of the Reformation thus stood out in stark contrast from medieval scholasticism preceding and Reformed scholasticism following. Some recent scholarship has instead emphasized broad theological continuity from the medieval schools through the Reformers to the Reformed Orthodox.

Following the Reformation, the new Reformed churches were faced with the need both to define their own beliefs and to defend themselves against Roman Catholic (and Lutheran) polemic. The early period of Orthodoxy (c.1560–1620) is therefore marked, on the one hand, by a preoccupation with the production, evaluation and explication of *confessional material, and on the other by a controversial interest. The natural method chosen to expound the new doctrinal systems was the scholastic method; Roman Catholic *polemics (particularly Bellarmine's influential Disputationes de controversiis christianae . . . of 1586) drew extensively on scholastic arguments and distinctions. It is no surprise, therefore, that the conscious adoption of the scholastic method was felt to be a natural development for Reformed theology.

The Synod of *Dort might be taken as a turning point: Reformed dogmatics had now achieved a degree of stability, and the churches were no longer under immediate threat. With Dort, the pressing questions became internal. Theologians began to produce works intended to offer a comprehensive summary and examination of Reformed doctrine, directed as much to the resolution of internal disputes as defence against external attacks. The polemical element thus becomes broader; indeed, in the 'elencitic' method, which shaped the whole system of Francis *Turretin, doctrine was taught and developed exclusively by considering disputed questions. Turretin is an extreme example, but Peter van *Mastricht (for example) included an 'elencitic part' under each locus, alongside the exegetical, dogmatic and practical parts.

Much of the seventeenth century, therefore, was marked by a relative stability in Reformed *dogmatics. The questions, although sharp, were defined, and the great systems advanced the arguments by assuming what had come before and proposing refinements, rather than by offering completely new constructions (the negotiations of the superlapsarian-infralapsarian debate [see *Fall] by Turretin or van Mastricht provides a pair of fine examples). The rise of federal theology (see *Covenant theology), associated with Johannes *Cocceius, was a new development within the tradition, and one which occasioned some debate and discussion, but it was not perceived as a fundamental rupture in the system. This period may be characterized as 'high orthodoxy', and offers perhaps the purest examples of the spirit and method of Reformed Orthodoxy.

This stability was most marked in those locations which had achieved a Reformed settlement: Geneva, parts of what is now Germany, the Netherlands. England produced notable contributors to Reformed Orthodoxy, notably William *Ames, William *Perkins and John *Owen, but the continued polemical context of English theology shaped the careers of these writers. Owen's work, for instance, is often polemical and occasional, and he never produced the sort of extended system of theology which a settled stability allows.

With the rise of the *Enlightenment and the beginnings of biblical criticism, old assumptions about theological method could no longer be simply assumed. More-or-less traditional theology in the Reformed Orthodox tradition continued to be produced during the eighteenth century (Endemann's Institutiones of 1777–8, and Compendium of 1782 might be taken as the last truly significant and recognizably Orthodox works), but it lacked the calm assurance, or the intellectual vigour, of the great high Orthodox systems of the previous century. Schleiermacher's Christian Faith cites the Orthodox repeatedly, but, in terms of method, Schleiermacher finds the need to reconstruct theology from the ground up, on wholly new foundations, in order to render it credible in a changed age. The period of Orthodoxy was over.

The Orthodox method was carefully logical and assumed the truth of *revelation, which was found in Scripture. Philology was interesting insofar as it served exegesis, but history, and particularly historical criticism, was largely ignored. The great Orthodox systems are masterpieces of logical acuity, built on a simple assumption that any and every text of Scripture may be assumed to be the direct self-revelation of God. This fundamentally exegetical basis should be the subject of further research; older attempts to demonstrate that the methodology of the Orthodox was, despite their own claims, in fact the logical working out of a central dogma across all other areas of theology have been shown to be false, but a careful analysis of the ways in which *Scripture was in fact used as the source of theology would be extremely valuable.

Bibliography

Primary texts available in English translation include: W. Ames, The Marrow of Theology, tr.

J. D. Eusden (Grand Rapids, 1997); F. Turretin, Institutes of Elenctic Theology, 3 vols., tr. G. M. Giger (Philipsburg, 1992–97); J. Wollebius, Compendium Theologiae Christianae, in J. W. Beardslee (ed.), Reformed Dogmatics (Oxford, 1965), pp. 26–262.

Studies: W. J. van Asselt and E. Dekker (eds.), Reformation and Scholasticism (Grand Rapids, 2000); R. A. Muller, Post-Reformation Reformed Dogmatics, 4 vols. (Grand Rapids, 2003); C. R. Trueman and R. S. Clark, Protestant Scholasticism: Essays in Reassessment (Carlisle, 1999).

S. R. HOLMES

ORTHOPRAXIS, see PRAXIS AND ORTHOPRAXIS

OSIANDER, ANDREAS (1498–1552)

Osiander was born at Guzenhausen near Nuremberg, studied Hebrew at the University of Ingolstadt and became an able Hebraist. He was ordained in 1520, joined the *Augustinians and taught Hebrew in Nuremberg. He revised the Latin Vulgate in the light of the Hebrew (1522). He attached himself to the Reformation cause and became an ardent advocate of *Lutheran doctrinal and liturgical principles in Nuremberg.

He had a difficult personality and irritated others remarkably easily. Nonetheless, his ability ensured that he was present as a Lutheran representative at the Colloquy of Marburg (1529). He was aggressive by temperament and had little sympathy with the irenic compromises of *Melanchthon at Augsburg (1530). It was not thought appropriate that he should take part in the delicate negotiations at the Colloquy of Regensburg (1541).

In 1542 he went to the Palatinate to further the Lutheran Reformation. After the Leipzig Interim (1548), with which he did not agree, he went to Königsberg (1549) and joined the theological faculty. It was from there that he became involved in a controversy with Melanchthon over *justification. He argued that Melanchthon overstated imputation. He maintained correctly that Luther spoke not only of external imputation but also of a real union with Christ. However, he exaggerated the point so that he taught that genuine *righteousness was achieved, and thus lost the Lutheran tension (simul peccator, simul justus, 'always a sinner, always justified'). His emphasis was on the indwelling of the divine Christ, at the expense of the justifying consequences of the human death of Christ. The human nature of Christ and his work consequently receded in importance.

Characteristically, Osiander conducted the controversy with much invective and won considerable opprobrium. *Calvin attacked both his view of justification and his understanding of the image of God in man. His writings 'prove him to have been perversely ingenious in futile inventions' (Institutes I. xv. 3). On the Lord's Supper (see *Eucharist) he was a strong Lutheran. He was also very interested in science and wrote the anonymous preface to Copernicus's De Revolutionibus Orbium Caelestium (Revolutions of the Celestial Spheres, 1543). It has been argued that by speaking of Copernicus's theory as a 'hypothesis', Osiander was undermining his work. He was in reality seeking to find a way round the opposition and was using a well-accepted philosophical word.

Bibliography

J. Dillenberger, Protestant Thought and Natural Science: A Historical Interpretation (London, 1961); D. C. Steinmetz, Reformers in the Wings (Philadelphia, 1971).

C. P. WILLIAMS

OTTO, RUDOLF (1869–1937)

Rudolf Otto, German Lutheran theologian, was professor of theology at Breslau (1914–17) and at Marburg (1917–29). A man of profound religious experience, he found his intellectual roots in *Luther, *Kant and *Schleiermacher.

His overriding concern was to defend the integrity of *religious experience as opposed to other types of human experience. He began by defending it from the threat posed by materialistic science, but then went on to explore its essential nature. To this end he visited India in 1911 and took up serious study of Sanskrit.

The main fruit of this inquiry was Das Heilige (1917; ET, The Idea of the Holy, Oxford, 1923), one of the classic studies of *religion in the twentieth century. The subtitle is An inquiry into the non-rational factor in the idea of the divine and its relation to the rational. Otto was concerned to reject the rationalistic emphasis of comparative religion or the history of religion, and to stress the non-rational and irreducible element in religion. For him there was at the heart of religion an experience which could not be reduced to any other category. This he described as the experience of the holy.

In Kantian terms he argued for the addition of the holy to the categories of the understanding and the categorical imperative. However, he was not perfectly at ease with the term 'holy', since it had become too identified with the moral category; so he coined the term numinous (Lat. numen; spirit, divinity) to replace it. Since, for Otto, this experience of the numinous is essentially supra-rational, all *religious language is an attempt to express the inexpressible. He also recognizes that any terms he might use to describe this experience can but point towards or evoke it. Thus his famous formula describing the numinous as mysterium tremendum et fascinans is to be taken as a series of ideograms and not a rational definition. But in attempting to evoke the numinous experience, Otto is not completely subjective. For example, he considered *Schleiermacher's definition of religion too subjective since it does not point clearly enough to the presence of the numinous object as the ground of the numinous experience. Thus the experience of the mysterium is described in terms of creature-feeling, the feeling of dependence upon that which stands over and above man as 'wholly other'. This mysterium is, on the one hand, absolutely unapproachable or awe-inspiring (i.e. tremendum), overpowering and replete with energy or life, while on the other hand, there is something in it that entrances and attracts (i.e. the aspect of fascinans), which is expressed conceptually in terms of love, mercy, pity and comfort.

While emphasizing that this numinous experience is the foundation of all religion, Otto also emphasizes the necessity of constructing a rational superstructure upon it, if it is to be of any benefit to humankind. To be a blessing, mere feeling must be transmitted into belief; and belief is only possible in rational terms. Thus the comparison of religions is possible, and Otto goes on to argue for the superiority of Christianity because of its superior conceptualization of the numinous.

Bibliography

Works: The Idea of the Holy (Oxford, 1923); The Philosophy of Religion (London, 1931); Religious Essays: A Supplement to 'The Idea of the Holy' (Oxford, 1931); Mysticism East and West (London, 1932).

Studies: P. C. Almond, Mystical Experience and Religious Doctrine (Berlin, 1982); D. A. Crosby, Interpretive Theories of Religion (Berlin, 1981); R. F. Davidson, Rudolf Otto's Interpretation of Religion (Princeton, 1947); T. A. Gooch, The Numinous and Modernity: An Interpretation of Rudolf Otto's Philosophy of Religion (Berlin and New York, 2000); R. R. Marett, The Threshold of Religion (London 1909); M. Raphael, Rudolf Otto and the Concept of Holiness (Oxford, 1997); N. Smart, Philosophers and Religious Truth (London 1964). See also 'The Piper at the Gates of Dawn', in K. Grahame, The Wind in the Willows (London, 1908).

D. A. HUGHES

OUSIA, see SUBSTANCE

OWEN, JOHN (1616–83)

Called by some 'the Calvin of England' and by others 'the greatest of the Puritan scholastics', Owen is widely considered the theological giant among the *Puritans. Born in a home of Puritan persuasion, young John was educated at Queen's College, Oxford University, receiving first a BA and then an MA. During his life Owen would minister in several churches, serve as a chaplain to Oliver Cromwell, become dean of Christ Church, Oxford, and finally receive the high honour of becoming the vice-chancellor of Oxford University (1652–57). As one committed to the 'Congregational way', Owen always valued the local church, and he spent the final decades of his life ministering primarily through his preaching and writings.

A prolific author, Owen's many books have consistently remained in print for more than 350 years. Writing significant doctrinal expositions on almost every key area of the Christian faith, Owen consistently displays both theological depth and pastoral wisdom, even though his complex sentences and detailed outlining apparatus are taxing to the reader. Owen's massive corpus (containing twenty-four volumes in the standard nineteenth-century edition) continues to stimulate readers, as his work is being rediscovered not only by historians, but also by contemporary theologians (e.g. Carl Trueman).

Several ideas in his corpus deserve mention. First, a *trinitarian sensitivity guides much of his thinking on all manner of subjects. His work Of Communion with God the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost (1657), for example, attempts to describe how saints commune with each divine person distinctly, while not compromising the reality that believers worship one God. This book displays pastoral sensitivity and theological creativity. For Owen, a biblical trinitarian theology always found its centre in Jesus Christ, who was the perfect image of God and to whom the Spirit always pointed. Two other treatises (The Person of Christ [1679] and The Glory of Christ [1684, 1691]) make this *Christological focus clear, tying together classic orthodoxy with fresh exegesis and practical application.

Owen's exploration of the person and work of the *Holy Spirit was arguably the most exhaustive treatment of the subject yet published at that point in history. Broken up into five works published from 1674 to 1693 (see vols. 3–4 of his Works), Owen's reflections follow Puritan tendencies to focus on the Spirit's application of Christ's work to the lives of believers. Here Owen holds together an unflinching commitment to the sovereignty of God while at the same time attempting not to diminish a high view of human responsibility. The Spirit is key in navigating through these difficulties. Throughout this work Owen also provides stimulating proposals for understanding the Spirit's work in the life of the incarnate Lord. Interestingly, Owen's work on the Spirit is in many ways an attempt to chart a path between what he viewed as the extreme rationalists (i.e. Socinians) on the one hand and the 'enthusiasts' (e.g. Quakers) on the other. One view seemed to deny the personal Spirit, while the other seemed to separate the Spirit from Christ.

Despite stereotypes, Owen, like many of his fellow Protestant scholastics, engaged in a great deal of exegetical work, and often he was wary of philosophical speculations. His massive multi-volume exposition of the Epistle to the Hebrews displays his knowledge of historical and linguistic backgrounds.

Owen's high view of Scripture (see *Scripture, doctrine of) is apparent throughout his work. At times his comments seem to present a flat dictation view of inspiration; while at other times he readily recognizes the biblical authors' distinctive styles, personalities, etc. What is consistent is Owen's emphasis on the work of the Spirit both in the original writings of the sacred texts and in the continuing reception of those texts by believers throughout the ages (see his Vindiciae Evangelicae [1655], Pro Sacris Scripturis Exercitationes adversus Fanaticos [1658], The Reason of Faith [1677]).

Bibliography

Works: The Works of John Owen, ed. W. H. Goold, 24 vols. (repr., London, 1965 [1850–55]); Biblical Theology (ET, Morgan, 1994).

Studies: K. M. Kopic, Communion with God: The Divine and the Human in the Theology of John Owen (Grand Rapids, 2007); S. Rehnman, Divine Discourse: The Theological Methodology of John Owen (Grand Rapids, 2002); P. Toon, God's Statesman: The Life and Work of John Owen: Pastor, Educator, Theologian (Exeter, 1971); C. Trueman, The Claims of Truth: John Owen's Trinitarian Theology (Carlisle, 1998); idem, John Owen (Aldershot, 2007).

K. M. KOPIC

OXFORD MOVEMENT, see ANGLO-CATHOLIC THEOLOGY

PACIFISM/PEACE

Christian pacifists believe that their discipleship means renouncing the use of violence. While the term 'pacifism' dates back only to 1902, the Christian rejection of violence originates in Jesus' instruction to his followers to 'turn the other cheek' when struck by their enemies (Matt. 5:39). Early Christian writings make a strong link between Christian faith and living in peace: *Justin Martyr saw Isaiah's prophecy of swords being beaten into ploughshares (Isa. 2:4) fulfilled in his time: 'we who formerly used to murder one another do not only now refrain from making war upon our enemies, but also . . . willingly die confessing Christ' (First Apology, 39); *Clement of Alexandria wrote that 'it is not in war, but in peace, that we are trained' (The Instructor, I, 12); *Tertullian asked, 'How will a Christian man war, nay, how will he serve even in peace, without a sword, which the Lord has taken away?' (On Idolatry, 19); *Origen explains that Christians 'no longer take up "sword against nation", nor do we "learn war any more", having become children of peace, for the sake of Jesus, who is our leader' (Against Celsus, V, 33); and third-century church orders stipulate excommunication for soldiers. Recent scholarship has shown, however, that this clearly stated position was not universally observed.

The position of the church changed radically following the Emperor *Constantine's Edict of Milan in 313. Church orders from 314 stipulate that Christians would be excommunicated for leaving the army. Later in the fourth century both *Ambrose of Milan and *Augustine of Hippo agreed that warfare was appropriate in certain circumstances, and by 416 Theodosius II could issue an edict specifying that only Christians could serve in the army. From the fourth century onwards, Christian renunciation of violence was restricted to monks and clerics, until a diverse range of Christian movements in the medieval and Reformation periods took it up as a return to the original witness of the church, including the Cathars (see *Albigenses), *Waldenses, Lollards, *Hussites, and later the *Mennonites, Hutterites, *Quakers and the Brethren. In the twentieth century, there was widespread protest by labour unions against war before the First World War. The mass killing of troops during that war led to disillusion about warfare as a means of resolving conflicts, and peace movements grew, inspired by the example of Mahatma Gandhi effectively resisting British Imperial rule in India with non-violent action. This belief in the effectiveness of non-violence faltered with the Second World War, though non-violent action continued afterwards, especially in opposition to nuclear weapons.

Christian pacifism is a diverse phenomenon: while rejecting the use of violence by Christians, Tertullian and Origen agree with St Paul that the political authorities rightly bear the sword (Rom. 13) and assure the Romans that the church prays for the success of Roman armies. Their pacifism is therefore communal – relevant only for the Christian community – rather than universal in application. Another difference between pacifists is whether their renunciation of violence is principled and valid in every circumstance, or strategic – chosen for its effectiveness in a particular situation (e.g. Emil *Brunner said he was pacifist because modern weaponry meant warfare could no longer achieve its purpose). Some pacifist groups have withdrawn into separatist communities and renounced responsibility for the wider world; others have been integrationist in seeing their vocation in the midst of responsibility for a diverse society. Finally, some pacifists are absolute in rejecting every use of violence (e.g. Leo *Tolstoy, who thought policing and prisons were incompatible with Christianity), whereas classical pacifists are prepared to accept the use of violence in policing contexts and peace-keeping operations.

Christians have always seen Christ as the fulfilment of Isaiah's prophecy of the coming of the Prince of Peace (Isa. 9:6), and have recognized that the Hebrew concept of shalom includes justice (see *Righteousness) as well as peace. Those who have judged war permissible have done so only on the basis that it is the only way to establish this just and peaceful order among sinful human beings. The development of the just war tradition following Ambrose and Augustine is an attempt to specify the conditions under which wars could be fought appropriately with the aim of doing justice and establishing peace. Christian pacifists and those in the just war tradition agree that violence should be avoided and what makes for the building of peace pursued; they differ in the judgment about whether violence is appropriate as a last resort when all other means of establishing justice and peace have been exhausted.

Bibliography

Clement of Alexandria, The Instructor in The Ante-Nicene Fathers: Translations of the Writings of the Fathers down to A.D. 325, vol. 2, eds. A. Cleveland Coxe et al. (Edinburgh, 1997); D. Clough and B. Stiltner, Faith and Force: A Christian Debate about War (Washington DC, 2007); J. Helgeland et al., Christians and the Military: The Early Experience (London, 1987); Justin Martyr, First Apology, in ANF, vol. 1; Origen, Against Celsus in ANF, vol. 4; R. Niebuhr, Christianity and Power Politics (Hamden, 1969); P. Ramsey, The Just War: Force and Political Responsibility (Savage, 1983); Tertullian, On Idolatry, in ANF, vol. 3; J. H. Yoder, Nevertheless: A Meditation on the Varieties and Shortcomings of Religious Pacifism (Scottsdale, 1971).

D. L. CLOUGH

PACKER, JAMES INNELL (b. 1926)

J. I. Packer (born in Gloucester, England) is an esteemed theologian in the (*Anglican) Calvinistic tradition (see *Reformed theology). He currently serves as the Board of Governors' Professor of Theology at Regent College in Vancouver, British Columbia.

The son of a clerk for the Great Western Railway, Packer won a scholarship to Oxford University where he studied at Corpus Christi College, gaining his BA in 1948, later gaining his MA (1952) and PhD (1955). In 1949 he entered Wycliffe Hall, Oxford to study for his doctoral thesis on the life and theology of the Puritan theologian, Richard *Baxter of Kidderminster. His work was published in 2003 under the title The Redemption and Restoration of Man in the Thought of Richard Baxter.

J. I. Packer was ordained as a deacon in the Church of England in 1952 and as a priest in 1953. He became an Assistant Curate of Harborne Heath in Birmingham 1952–4, lecturer at Tyndale Hall, Bristol 1955–61, librarian of Latimer House, Oxford 1961–2, and Principal 1962–9. In 1970 he became Principal of Tyndale Hall, Bristol and from 1971 until 1979 he was Associate Principal of Trinity College, Bristol, formed by the amalgamation of Tyndale Hall with Clifton College and Dalton House-St. Michael's. In 1979 Packer moved to Regent College, Vancouver as the Sangwoon Youtong Chee Professor of Theology, a position he held until his retirement.

A prolific writer and co-signer of the *Chicago Statement on Biblical Inerrancy, Packer was named as 'One of the 25 most Influential Evangelicals in America' by Time magazine (Feb. 2005). He is best known as the author of Knowing God (1973), and Fundamentalism and the Word of God (1958), the former having sold over a million copies. He has been a frequent contributor and an executive editor of Christianity Today.

Packer has devoted much of his life to Anglican and *Puritan studies, especially the latter's relevance to contemporary Christian spirituality. Controversially, Dr Packer has been an advocate of dialogue with Roman Catholics (see Evangelicals and Catholics Together: Toward a Common Mission, 1994, eds. C. Colson and R. J. Neuhaus).

Packer served as a general editor of the Bible translation English Standard Version, an evangelical revision of the Revised Standard Version.

Bibliography

Selected works: Fundamentalism and the Word of God (Eerdmans, 1958); Knowing God

(London, 1973); Concise Theology (Wheaton, 2001); The Collected Shorter Writings of J. I. Packer, 4 vols. (Carlisle, 2002).

Studies: Alister McGrath, J. I. Packer: A Biography (Grand Rapids, 1997).

D. W. H. THOMAS

PAEDOBAPTISM, see BAPTISM

PALAMAS, GREGORY (c. 1296–1359)

Gregory Palamas was born into a noble family, probably in Constantinople, in about 1296. Drawn to the monastic life from his youth, in about 1318 he went to Mount Athos, where he encountered the *hesychast tradition of solitary use of the Jesus prayer. The Turkish advance forced him to flee to Thessaloniki, where he was ordained priest in 1326. He returned to Athos in 1331. In the later 1330s, he became involved in controversy with a Calabrian monk, Barlaam. Initially the controversy concerned the doctrine of the procession of the *Holy Spirit. Attacking the Latin doctrine of the filioque clause, Barlaam invoked God's unknowability; for Palamas knowledge about God could be demonstrated, and he refuted the filioque in two 'apodeictic treatises' on the procession of the Holy Spirit. Controversy then turned to claims made by hesychast monks that in their prayer they could experience ('see') the uncreated light of the Godhead. Barlaam rejected such a claim as illusory, since God is unknowable in himself. Palamas countered by maintaining that the hesychasts indeed experienced the uncreated light of the Godhead, reconciling this with the unknowability of God by making a distinction between God's essence, which is indeed unknowable, and his activities ('energies', an over-literal translation of energeiai) through which he makes himself known; God, known in his activities, is God himself, not some created symbol. Central to the argument was the meaning of the transfiguration of the Lord, Palamas arguing that the light, radiating from Christ and perceived by the apostles, was the uncreated light of the Godhead, experienced now by the hesychast monks. The fourteenth century was a period in which *Augustine and some of the scholastic theologians, such as *Thomas Aquinas, became known in the Byzantine world, and this new factor played a not-yet-clearly understood role in the controversy. The controversy was also caught up in the divisions of Byzantine society which resulted in civil war in the 1340s. A series of synods, held on Mount Athos and in Constantinople, upheld Palamas' teaching, though Barlaam was not lacking in support. In 1347, Palamas was consecrated Archbishop of Thessaloniki, though political conditions prevented him going there until 1350. In 1354, on his way to Constantinople, he was captured by the Turks and spent a year in captivity, during which he encountered and held discussion with Muslim theologians. He died in 1359 and was declared a saint in 1368.

See also: EASTERN ORTHODOX THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

Works: Suggrammata, ed. P. Chrestou (incomplete, 5 vols., Thessaloniki, 1962–92); Triads in Defence of the Holy Hesychasts, abridged, ed. J. Meyendorff (Louvain, 1973); The Triads, Classics of Western Spirituality (Mahwah, 1983); 150 Chapters (ET, Toronto, 1988).

Studies: J. Meyendorff, A Study of Gregory Palamas (abridged, London, 1964 [1959]).

A. LOUTH

PALEY, WILLIAM (1743–1805)

Paley is chiefly remembered for his use of the analogy of the watch and the watchmaker as a defence of the existence of God. He studied at Christ's College, Cambridge, of which he eventually became a Fellow, leaving in 1775 to take up an ecclesiastical career in the diocese of Carlisle. In an age when the universities were at something of a low ebb, Paley was a gifted and conscientious teacher whose lectures were popular.

Paley's theology was in the tradition of *latitudinarianism, and he wrote a number of apologetic works against the prevailing scepticism of the eighteenth century which had its roots in *deism. He was not an original thinker, but had the great virtue of being a clear one, and his writings are more in the nature of textbooks than original treatises. His major theological works were A View of the Evidences of Christianity (1794), Natural Theology, or Evidence of the Existence and Attributes of the Deity Collected from the Appearances of Nature (1802) and Principles of Moral and Political Philosophy (1785). This last is one of the clearest statements of the utilitarian morality propounded by the latitudinarian divines of the eighteenth century, anticipating many of the arguments of Jeremy Bentham (1748–1832), though Paley appeals, as Bentham does not, to the supernatural sanction as an inducement to moral behaviour. His definition of virtue was ‘doing good to mankind, in obedience to the will of God, and for the sake of everlasting happiness’.

Despite his rejection of scepticism, however, Paley’s own theological views appear to have been tinged with *Unitarianism. Early in his career as a university lecturer he took the view that subscription to the *Thirty-Nine Articles of the Church of England could only be construed as an action of ‘peaceableness’, since they included, on his estimate, ‘some 240 distinct propositions, many of them inconsistent with each other’. On these grounds he continued to adhere nominally to the creeds, although on a conservative interpretation of them his views were at odds with the Christian understanding of the incarnation. He was, however, entirely sincere in his belief that the doctrines he did accept were logically demonstrable.

The watchmaker analogy, which appears in his Natural Theology, is a classic statement of the argument from design (the teleological argument) for the existence of God (see *Natural theology). Paley introduces it by comparing his likely reaction in crossing an empty heath to discovering, on the one hand, a stone, and, on the other, a watch. One might reasonably account for the stone in terms of its having always been there, but no-one would account for the watch in that way. Watches evidence purpose and design. In short they are mute testimonials to the existence of a watchmaker, and this is the conclusion any sensible person would infer from the discovery of one. The conclusion is not invalidated by the discoverer never having seen a watch made, nor by the watch not being accurate, nor by parts of it having an unknown function; neither could its existence be satisfactorily explained by appeals to impersonal laws or chance. What it demonstrates is the fact of design. Paley concludes, ‘Every indication of contrivance, every manifestation of design, which existed in the watch, exists in the works of nature . . .’, and the conclusion is therefore irresistible that nature too has its maker.

It is one of the ironies of history, and an example of the gap that frequently occurs between the discussions of theologians and philosophers, that twenty-three years before the publication of Paley’s Natural Theology, David *Hume had already published the classic critique of the argument from design in his Dialogues Concerning Natural Religion.

Bibliography

Works: Natural Theology, with introduction and notes by M. D. Eddy and D. M. Knight (Oxford, 2006).

Studies: M. L. Clarke, Paley: Evidence for the Man (Toronto, 1974); D. L. LeMahieu, The Mind of William Paley (Lincoln, NE, 1976).

D. D. SCEATS

PALMER, PHOEBE WORRALL (1807–74)

An American Methodist revivalist, theologian and author, Phoebe Palmer was born in New York City and grew up active in the Methodist Episcopal Church. In 1827 she married Dr Walter C. Palmer; they had six children, three of whom survived to adulthood. After a profound religious experience in 1837 she became a leader of a movement to keep John *Wesley’s doctrine of Christian *perfection at the centre of Methodist teaching and life during a time when *Methodism in the US was expanding rapidly both numerically and geographically and undergoing significant changes in leadership. In time Palmer became the principal spokesperson for this ‘*holiness movement’, which also spread beyond Methodism to influence other Protestant denominations in North America and the British Isles.

Palmer published nearly twenty books, many in multiple editions, beginning with The Way of Holiness (1843). She led a well-known weekly religious gathering, the Tuesday Meeting for the Promotion of Holiness, for over thirty years. She travelled thousands of miles, speaking and teaching in churches, camp meetings, colleges and seminaries and public auditoriums, becoming one of the most widely recognized revivalists in the world. In addition, she edited an influential journal, The Guide to Holiness, for ten years (1864–74). Palmer also supported a wide variety of compassionate and humanitarian ministries throughout her life, and was an advocate for the ministry of women in the churches.

Bibliography

Works: The Way of Holiness; with Notes by the Way (New York, 1843); The Promise of the Father; or, a Neglected Specialty of the Last Days (New York, 1859).

Studies: T. C. Oden, Phoebe Palmer: Selected Writings (New York, 1988); H. E. Raser, Phoebe Palmer, Her Life and Thought (New York, 1987); R. Wheatley, The Life and Letters of Mrs. Phoebe Palmer (New York, 1876); C. E. White, The Beauty of Holiness: Phoebe Palmer as Theologian, Revivalist, Feminist and Humanitarian (Grand Rapids, 1986).

H. E. RASER

PANENTHEISM

Panentheism is the view that the universe is God, though God is more than the universe. It should be clearly distinguished from *pantheism, in which God and the universe are strictly identical. For the panentheist God has an identity of his own, that is, he is something which the universe is not. On the other hand, the universe is part of the reality of God. It is God.

The actual term was first used by contemporary *process theology, but it could be used of several earlier theories. Plotinus (c. 205–70; see *Platonism), who influenced early medieval theology, held that the world emanates from God. It is an overflow of his creative being. God creates out of himself, not out of nothing.

Some *idealists, for example George *Berkeley, held that the world has reality only as a thought of God's mind. The very reality of the universe consists in its being the contents of God's ideas, and is, therefore, God himself. Though very different from Plotinus' view, here too God has his own reality, but the universe is real only as God.

Alfred North Whitehead and Charles Hartshorne each developed slightly differing versions of panentheism which have become the philosophical basis of process theology. For Whitehead this view is demanded by his general view of causality, coupled with the insistence that God cannot be an exception to the basic principles of reality, but must rather be their chief example. Whitehead thought of reality as composed of multiple series of events, not objects. Since only actual entities can be causes, and since each preceding event is past and not actual, events must determine themselves. And yet something must create the possibility of each event. This, Whitehead argued, must be God. Causal relations, including that of knowing, are real connections. They are events, hence God who creates and knows each event cannot be separate from them. They are just his experience, and he is just the subjectivity that feels all events.

Charles Hartshorne supplies a more detailed view of God. In his earlier writings especially, he begins by arguing for a new concept of perfection. If God is related by inclusion to all events, then he cannot be perfect in the classical sense of being unaffected by the limitations of the universe. Rather, God is perfectly relative. He is all he can be because he feels and retains all there is. And, by constantly including novel events, God is in perpetual change in new and more complex states. God grows in a creative advance as he experiences the universe he includes.

Hartshorne and his theological followers often compare God's relation to the universe to a person's relation to his body. I depend on my body as the source of my experience, but I also transcend it. Just so, while God depends on his body, the universe, he also transcends it as a mind that knows all of the possibilities for future events. In addition to the panentheism of process thought, panentheism can be seen in the theology of Teilhard de Chardin, Paul Tillich, Jürgen Moltmann and Wolfhart Pannenberg (cf. Cooper).

Bibliography

D. Brown, R. James and G. Reeves (eds.), Process Philosophy and Christian Thought (Indianapolis, 1971); J. W. Cooper, Panentheism: The Other God of the Philosophers – From Plato to the Present (Nottingham, 2007); L. Ford, The Lure of God (Philadelphia, 1978); C. Hartshorne, Omnipotence and Other Theological Mistakes (New York, 1984); A. N. Whitehead, Religion in the Making (London, 1926).

W. D. BECK

PANNENBERG, WOLFHART (1928–2014)

A German Lutheran theologian, Pannenberg studied theology under Karl *Barth in 1950–1 in Basle, leading on to doctoral work in Heidelberg where he gained a keen interest in *Hegel, and worked with a group of younger theologians in the development of a new approach to the theology of revelation, in terms of both biblical interpretation and *systematic theology. This work resulted in the seminal symposium Offenbarung als Geschichte, edited by Pannenberg (1961; ET Revelation as History, 1968). In 1961 he moved from his first teaching post at the Lutheran Seminary in Wuppertal to Mainz as Professor of Systematic Theology. Pannenberg engaged in dialogue at Chicago University 1963, and Harvard and Claremont 1966–7, notably with *process theologians. In 1968 he became professor at Munich in the Protestant Faculty of Theology, where he taught until his retirement, writing prolifically. He proved an important dialogue partner for discussions between *science and religion. He was also a significant figure in ecumenical life.

Pannenberg's essays in Revelation as History broke sharply from the predominant German-speaking theologies of *Bultmann and Barth and the 'theologies of the word', based on *revelation alone and rejecting "natural theology" as a possible source of the knowledge of God. Pannenberg argued that the approach he criticized was *dualistic, sundering faith and reason, and led theology and church into a ghetto, cut off from the questions of the secular world. Pannenberg criticized Bultmann's theology for its individualistic focus and radical disjunction between critical reason and existential faith. He criticized Barth's *epistemology as offering a form of *fideism, divorced from critical questions and the insights of reason and culture. Pannenberg did not, however, reject Barth's understanding of revelation as divine self-disclosure, but sought to widen this out and root it in historical research and interpretation. Pannenberg regards theology that does not take account of secular insights as failing to do justice to God as 'die Alles bestimmende Wirklichkeit', 'the all-determining reality' of the whole world and its truth.

This programme he presented in what may prove to be his most lasting theological legacy, his *Christology, Grundzüge der Christologie (1964; ET Jesus – God and Man, 1968). This tour de force took up his idea of 'indirect self-revelation', that is to say, divine self-disclosure through the events of *history as interpreted aright. From a formal position of openness and free enquiry into facts and meanings of events of history, Pannenberg concluded that the figure of *Jesus, his life and fate, did indeed rise from death. Pannenberg's arguments involve historical points; he is particularly impressed by the 'appearance traditions' and does not think that these are explained by psychological factors. He also makes use of what he takes to be differences in the NT texts as evidence against collusion and falsification by the authors and editors. He argues that philosophically the new and unique event is not to be ruled out on a law of naturalistic historicism, and that the resurrection is therefore a possibility. Having argued that historically the best explanation for the data about Jesus is that a resurrection did take place, he then went on to say that this event has to be interpreted in the thought context of its day, which he took to be that of apocalyptic expectation. Jewish expectation was that the end time, the time of final revelation of the meaning of all things and of God, was to be a time of resurrection of the dead (see *Eschatology). Pannenberg argued that Jesus' resurrection anticipated this expectation, and so constituted the end-time event of revelation in advance or 'proleptically'. From here he argued that this event therefore entails Jesus' 'revelational unity of essence' with God. Moreover, since in his life Jesus had shown himself totally dependent on God as his Father, this part of his identity carries forward to entail a trinitarian bond: God reveals himself indirectly, through the process of historical events and their meaning, as Father, Son and Spirit. Pannenberg stresses Jesus' humble 'self-differentiation' from God in his life, and this is taken into the divine identity of unity and differentiation.

Especially in this early Christology Pannenberg teaches that history really affects *God, and yet God sends history from the future to its present. The result has been called a 'theology of the future perfect': history is open and free, yet its final meaning always was going to have been given by Christ. The structure of this theology is one of epistemological anticipation and ontological 'retroaction': Jesus' *resurrection constitutes his identity as the Son of God, and this is read backwards into his life. Pannenberg has executed an argument for the Trinity from reason alone, but reason guided by the Spirit at work in all the historical process, and here the reader perceives the influence of Hegel, although with the distinctive future orientation given by Pannenberg's use of apocalyptic. In an important set of essays, not translated into English, Grundfragen systematischer Theologie band 2 (1980), Pannenberg made clear that his doctrine of history and God of the future were deeply *trinitarian. The Father conveys events from the freedom of the future, the Son represents the past event, and the Spirit creatively synthesizes the process as it moves forward, while originating in the open future. Jesus' filial relationship with the Father during his life is taken up into his identity at the decisive and constitutive event of the resurrection. Pannenberg's mature theology endorses a doctrine of the immanent Trinity, understood through divine eschatological self-revelation.

This pattern shapes his doctrine of humanity which is essentially open and orientated to the future. Who we really are lies in our final future or judgment: an example might be that of Mozart, who died a pauper, but whose true identity is now revealed with the verdict of the future. In the case of Jesus, the resurrection event revealed him to be the divine Son or *Logos, a concept Pannenberg has rehabilitated in his later work after rejecting it as useful for Christology earlier. Sin is the phenomenon of human refusal of the divine goal and turning in on itself. We are open to God and open to the world in our existence, and our freedom is a crucial factor in being human, a factor that no atheistic philosophy seems able to ground, notably Marxism. Pannenberg's theology is at the same time an ongoing dialogue and apologetic with other worldviews. This flows from 'revelation as history': they are two sides of one coin, theology and reason are partners in interpreting the world, and God is the best concept for making sense of the totality of reality. *Faith and reason share the same structure, as they trust in the coherence and unity of the world and our thought, a coherence needed if there is to be any thinking at all. Pannenberg produced an acclaimed book on theology in dialogue with secular learning, Wissenschaftstheorie und Theologie (1973; ET, Theology and the Philosophy of Science, 1976), and a work of massive erudition, Anthropologie in theologischer Perspektive (1983; ET 1985).

Pannenberg insists that his conclusions are 'provisional' in that he is formally open to new evidence appearing that might undermine his argument, in which case he would have to revise his position, that of being led to faith in the God of Jesus through a thoroughly rational process of argumentation. He distinguishes between logical and psychological certainty:

logically believers must formally be open to the possibility of new negative evidence against Christianity, but psychologically the believer can be certain of faith.

In his final theological work, the three-volume Systematische Theologie (1988–93; ET 1991), Pannenberg sets out his theology in its widest scope, showing that he is first and foremost a theologian, but one of great learning keen to take all criticism seriously and to harvest the fruits of secular thought, while challenging *atheism to consider the God hypothesis as the best account of truth and reality. His ideas have proved particularly interesting to those at the interface of science and faith, notably his idea of the Spirit as 'field force'. He is defended from postmodern charges of *rationalism by those who point to his stress on openness and provisionality. His theology creatively meshes Hegelian thought with biblical apocalyptic and the Christian dogmatic tradition in a genuinely new synthesis.

Bibliography

Works: The Apostles' Creed (ET, London, 1972); Basic Questions in Theology, vols. 1–3 (ET, London, 1970–73); Ethics (ET, London, 1981); Christianity in a Secularised World (ET, London, 1989); Metaphysics and the Idea of God (ET, Edinburgh, 1990).

Studies: C. E. Braaten and P. Clayton (eds.), The Theology of Wolfhart Pannenberg (Minneapolis, 1988); T. Bradshaw, 'The Trinitarian Theology of Wolfhart Pannenberg: The Divine Future Perfect', in P. Duce and D. Strange (eds.), Getting Your Bearings: Engaging with Contemporary Theologians (Leicester, 2003); A. D. Galloway, Wolfhart Pannenberg (London, 1973); S. J. Grenz, Reason for Hope: The Systematic Theology of Wolfhart Pannenberg (Oxford, 1990); C. Rausch Albright and J. Haugen (eds.), Beginning with the End: God, Science and Wolfhart Pannenberg (Chicago, 1997); F. L. Shults, The Postfoundational Task of Theology: Wolfhart Pannenberg and the New Theological Rationality (Grand Rapids, 1999); E. F. Tupper, The Theology of Wolfhart Pannenberg (London, 1974).

T. BRADSHAW

PANTHEISM

The word 'pantheism' derives from Gk pan (all) and theos (God). Literally, it means 'all is God'.

Specifically, pantheism's metaphysic, its view of reality, affirms two things: the unity of all reality and the divineness of that unity. Pantheism parallels naturalism on the first point in that both assert only one reality. But in contrast to naturalism, it calls reality divine. Pantheism is like *theism on the second point, for both recognize that the world depends on God. But unlike theism, it does not hold the world's existence to be separate from God's.

Pantheism often teaches that logical opposites coalesce in the divine being. Conceptual pairs like good/evil, personal/impersonal, and even A/non-A cannot be separated in God. These function only at the level of logical thought. At the highest levels of reality, conceptual distinctions break down because they treat as divided what is actually undivided. Since language depends on logic, pantheists usually assert *God to be ineffable or indescribable.

*Epistemologically, in their ways of knowing, pantheists fit into two general categories. Religious pantheists are often *mystical. Mysticism teaches a communion with God which bypasses discursive thought. Through *ascetic or meditative practices, mystics claim to experience God directly, intuitively and/or ineffably. Philosophical pantheists often use rationalism, the method of reason unadulterated by sense-data, for knowledge of God. Representatives of this latter group include Benedict *Spinoza and Georg W. F. *Hegel.

Religious pantheisms appear in each of the world's five major religions. Most prominently, major religions which sprang from India, *Hinduism and Mahayana ('Greater Vehicle') *Buddhism, presuppose the pantheism of the ancient Hindu scriptures, the Upanishads. Modern proponents include the Hindu Sarvepalli Radhakrishnan (1888–1975), and the Zen Buddhist D. T. Suzuki (1870–1966). But pantheists have also been found among the theistic religions, Judaism, Christianity and Islam. In Christianity, mystics like John Scotus *Eriugena, Meister Eckhart (c. 1260–1327) and Jacob *Boehme at least border on pantheism because of the influence of the Neoplatonic mystic, Plotinus (c. 205–70; see *Platonism).

Theists, however, have generally resisted pantheistic expressions. They often hold that pantheism destroys God's personality and goodness for it affirms that God is beyond such conceptual opposites as personality/impersonality and good/evil. They also criticize pantheism for implying that life in this world, including ethics, has little importance. Biblical Christianity in particular finds pantheism unacceptable, for it blurs the distinction between the *Creator and his creatures.

Philosophers who argue against pantheism raise several questions. What empirical evidence could ever count for pantheism's claim of unity? Further, what reasons could be given to call this unity divine?

Bibliography

Texts: Jacob Boehme, Works, ed. C. J. Barber (London, 1909); G. W. F. Hegel, Lectures on the Philosophy of Religion, tr. E. B. Speirs and J. B. Sanderson, 3 vols. (London, 1962); Meister Eckhart, Meister Eckhart: The Essential Sermons, Commentaries, Treatises, and Defense, tr. E. Colledge and B. McGinn (New York, 1981); S. Radhakrishnan, Indian Philosophy, 2 vols. (London, 1929); B. Spinoza, The Chief Works, tr. R. H. M. Elwes, 2 vols. (New York, 1951).

Studies: N. Geisler, Christian Apologetics (Grand Rapids, 1976); C. Hodge, Systematic Theology (1872–3, repr. Grand Rapids, 1981); H. P. Owen, Concepts of Deity (New York, 1971); C. E. Plumptre, General Sketch of the History of Pantheism (Cambridge, 2011); D. T. Suzuki, Essays in Zen Buddhism, 3 vols. (New York, 1949).

D. K. CLARK

PAPACY

In Roman Catholicism the papacy describes the office and court (or Curia) of the Bishop of Rome, who occupies a primary role among bishops and as such exercises 'full, supreme and universal power over the whole church' (Lumen Gentium, 22). Although the terms pappas and papa (Gk and Lat. 'father') were applied to various church leadership roles from the third century, more specific designations evolved in relation to the patriarch of Alexandria in the east and to the Bishop of Rome in the west. However, whereas patriarchal authority in the east developed along more plural lines, Rome's assertion of a monarchical universal primacy reflected its historic place at the centre of empire and its relatively wider territorial reach. It also rested on certain key theological claims.

Rome was associated with the martyrdom of Peter and Paul, who respectively represented the Jewish and Gentile missions of the church. On this basis *Irenaeus and *Tertullian hinted at a primary role for Rome – a primacy which Stephen (254–257), Siricius (384–398) and Innocent (401–447) institutionalized in various ways before Leo I (440–461) appropriated the pagan title pontifex maximus ('great bridge-builder'), intervened decisively in the Council of *Chalcedon (453), and declared that 'fullness of power' resided with the pontiff. Gelasius I (492–496) asserted this power further by declaring himself 'Vicar of Christ'. The title 'pope' itself had by now become largely reserved to Rome – an exclusivity which would be formalized in 1073.

As the concept of Roman primacy developed in the early medieval period, it was expounded increasingly in relation to Peter rather than Paul. Matt. 16:18–19 ('You are Peter, and on this rock I will build my church') had been cited in favour of this bias from at least the second century, but Stephen and Leo inferred from it a unique Petrine succession through a continuous lineage of popes. As it has developed, this notion has become perhaps the most contentious aspect of Roman Catholic dogma with respect to the papacy.

The general importance of Peter in the NT is clear. He was the first disciple to be called by Jesus (Matt. 4:18–19), comes first in the list of apostles (Matt. 10:2), is first to confess Jesus as Messiah (Matt. 16:16), is first among the Twelve to see the risen Christ (1 Cor. 15:5), and preaches as the church is formed on the Day of Pentecost (Acts 2:14). He is also identified as the author of two canonical epistles. However, Roman Catholic ecclesiology moves more debatably beyond these basic points to infer a strong continuity from the apostles on whom the church is founded (Eph. 2:20), to the bishops who emerged as metropolitan and regional overseers in the second and third centuries of the church's life. Within this logic, the chief apostle, Peter, is taken to be the first bishop in both a chronological and a primatial sense. Moreover, because the church is eternal, it is held that Peter must have initiated a line of successors who would embody the continuity of that church. Further support for this is claimed from Jesus' charges to Peter in Luke 22:32 ('Strengthen your brothers') and John 21:15–17 ('Feed my sheep').

This model of Petrine succession was elaborated as the papacy gained power and influence during the Middle Ages. Following the sack of Rome, Gregory I ('the Great', 590–604) restored the Western church's confidence by evangelizing the Lombards and sponsoring mission across northern Europe. However, the Lombard threat persisted and in 756 Pope Stephen II sought an alliance against them with the Frankish king Pepin III. In return for papal patronage, Pepin confirmed the Curia's right to large tracts of land in central Italy, which became known as the Papal States and which remained in the church's hands until 1870, when the pontificate's civic jurisdiction was restricted to Vatican City.

In 800 Pope Leo III anointed Pepin's successor Charlemagne as Holy Roman Emperor, yet as the papacy assimilated the trappings of imperial power, tensions mounted between lay and ecclesiastical rule. Indeed, overweening politicization was one of several charges laid against it by the Eastern Church at the Great Schism of 1054. Gregory VII (1073–85) went so far as to assert Petrine papal supremacy over secular as well as sacred rulers, and Boniface VIII (1294–1303) carried two swords to symbolize both spiritual and temporal power. Boniface's bull Unam Sanctam (1302) insisted that there was no salvation outside the church, but more specifically defined this church as the Church of Rome and justified its claim with an extensive apologetic for Petrine primacy. The *Council of Florence (1438–45) subsequently asserted the superiority of the pope over all councils. This was exploited by Leo X (1513–21), whose granting of indulgences (see *Penance) to fund the renovation of St Peter's basilica spurred the protest of Martin Luther and so helped to provoke the *Reformation.

In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries it was not only Protestants who questioned papal power. Catholic groups including the Gallicans and *Jansenists in France and the Febronians in Germany variously argued for their national churches' independence from Rome, and for the submission of pontifical to conciliar authority. In reaction, the movement which came to be known as Ultramontanism sought to centralize yet more power within the papacy, and saw many of its aims fulfilled at the First *Vatican Council of 1870 – not least in that Council's declaration of papal infallibility.

According to Vatican I, the Pontiff's Petrine lineage means that he is 'teacher of all Christians'. When he invokes this teaching authority ex cathedra to explain 'a doctrine of faith or morals to be held by the Universal Church', he 'operates with that infallibility with which the divine Redeemer wishes that His church be instructed'. Considerable debate followed on what might retrospectively be considered ex cathedra. As it was, only Pope Pius IX's pronouncement of the immaculate conception of *Mary (1854) was clearly defined as such. In the decades after Vatican I various papal challenges to theological and cultural modernism were published, but were not deemed infallible. Then, in 1950, infallibility was accorded to Pope Pius XII's affirmation of the bodily assumption of Mary.

Critiques of papal infallibility typically derive from broader biblical and historical critiques of Petrine succession. They point out that the discourse of ecclesial leadership in the NT sees pastors, teachers, deacons, presbyters and overseers deployed in various configurations (see *Church government), and that it is thus far more complex than a straight line from apostles to bishops, or from Peter to the papacy, would suggest. They underline that Peter's authority is shared with the other apostles (Matt. 18:18), and that in his own terms he is 'an apostle' rather than the chief apostle (1 Pet. 1:1). It is often added that Peter is very obviously flawed – earning Jesus' rebuke (Matt. 16:23), denying him after his arrest (Matt. 26:69–75), and reneging on support for Paul's Gentile mission (Gal. 2:11). While papal infallibility does not rest on the thoroughgoing sinlessness of Peter, it is nonetheless argued that the criteria for infallible pronouncements are unclear. It is because of this, perhaps, that infallibility has been so rarely applied, and then only to two marginal, and biblically questionable, Marian dogmas.

The Second Vatican Council of 1962–65 took place in an ecclesiastical and cultural context very different from that which marked Vatican I. The rise of the *ecumenical movement and the related interaction of Catholic, Protestant and Orthodox scholarship were influential, and while Petrine succession and papal infallibility were reaffirmed, Vatican II placed far more emphasis on the whole 'college' of bishops, in which the Bishop of Rome is 'first among equals'. While this college could not function without the Supreme Pontiff at its head, it was nonetheless seen to express 'the variety and universality of the people of God' (Lumen Gentium, 22).

Since Vatican II the Roman Catholic Church has engaged in various dialogues with other churches on supremacy. The Anglican-Roman Catholic International Commission agreed on the special place of Rome in the early church, and affirmed in principle the desirability of universal primacy. Yet it has failed to reach consensus on existing papal arrangements, and on infallibility in particular. Similar conclusions have been reached in bilateral conversations between Rome and Lutheran and Orthodox churches. Unsurprisingly, non-episcopal denominations have found it harder to identify common ground in this matter, with certain more conservative Protestants viewing the very concept of universal primacy as intrinsically antithetical to the gospel.

While theological debate about the papacy will continue, its global profile has been developed in more recent decades, not least by John Paul II (1978–2005) and Benedict XVI (2005–13), whose extensive international travelling and harnessing of modern communications have ensured that it remains one of the most significant offices held by any individual on earth.

See also: ROMAN CATHOLIC THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

C. E. Braaten and R. W. Jenson (eds.), Church Unity and the Papal Office (Grand Rapids, 2001); R. E. Brown, K. P. Donfried and J. Reumann (eds.), Peter in the New Testament (London, 1974); E. Duffy, Saints and Sinners: A History of the Popes (New Haven and London, 32006); A. Flannery (ed.), Vatican Council II: Constitutions, Decrees, Declarations (Northport, 1996); K. Schatz, Primacy from Its Origins to the Present (Collegeville, 1996); J. M. R. Tilliard, The Bishop of Rome (London, 1983).

D. H. K. HILBORN

PARADIGM

A paradigm is literally an example, especially a normative example, in the light of which the whole class is to be understood. The word may be used theologically in the following ways.

In philosophy, 'paradigm case' arguments are sometimes used against sceptical positions. So, if it is denied that free will exists, the argument would be that 'freedom' is to be understood in terms not of some abstract definition, but of paradigm cases such as lovers deciding to marry. Such cases certainly exist; so therefore does freedom. Critics reply that this would have ‘proved’ the reality of witchcraft. Moreover, concepts so defined are of limited use: is ‘freedom’ thus understood the ‘freedom’ relevant to moral responsibility?

Martin Dibelius (1883–1947) used the term for gospel passages used by early Christian preachers as examples of ‘that which Jesus was and brought into being’. Paradigms end in thoughts useful for preaching purposes, usually a saying of Jesus. Dibelius thought paradigms historically valuable, though sometimes modified by preachers or evangelists.

In recent decades theologians and ecumenists have drawn on the approach of the philosopher of science, Thomas Kuhn (1922–96). Controversially, he argues that the development of science is characterized by the alternation of periods in which ‘normal science’ solves the problems which arise in connection with the overarching framework of understanding provided by a paradigm, with periods of revolutionary changes in understanding which are precipitated when the amount of anomalies and unsolved ‘puzzles’ becomes too great for a paradigm to bear and it is replaced by a new one.

Bibliography

G. Carey, I Believe in Man (London, 1977); M. Dibelius, From Tradition to Gospel (ET, London, 1934); E. Gellner, Words and Things (London, 1959); H. King and D. Tracy (eds.), Paradigm Change in Theology (Edinburgh and New York, 1989); T. S. Kuhn, The Structure of Scientific Revolutions (Chicago and London, 2nd 1970); K. Raiser, Ecumenism in Transition (Geneva, 1991); P. Schilpp (ed.), The Philosophy of G. E. Moore (New York, 2nd 1952).

R. L. STURCH

PARADOX IN THEOLOGY

A paradox (from Gk para and doxa, ‘against opinion’) is an apparent contradiction or logical absurdity. Paradoxes may be divided into three broad categories:

(1) Rhetorical paradoxes. Here the contradiction appears only at the surface verbal level. When the statements are understood with the appropriate qualifications, they are seen to be logically consistent, but restating them in a non-paradoxical form sacrifices the rhetorical impact. Biblical examples include ‘the last will be first, and the first last’ (Matt. 20:16) and

‘when I am weak, then I am strong’ (2 Cor. 12:10).

(2) Philosophical paradoxes. Some of our commonsense intuitions about basic notions, such as being, change, truth, rationality and free choice, can be shown to entail apparent contradictions. The identification and resolution of such paradoxes has been a central theme in the history of philosophy. Famous examples include Zeno’s paradoxes (seeking to show that our assumptions about the reality of motion entail contradictions) and the Liar Paradox (‘This statement is false’ appears to be false if true, and true if false). Proposed resolutions typically require us to repudiate one of the intuitions or assumptions involved.

(3) Theological paradoxes. It has been traditionally held that theology involves propositional truth claims about *God: his attributes, his relationship to the world, his actions within the world, and so forth. Theologians occasionally make claims which seem to them (or to others) to entail contradictions, either within the claims themselves or with respect to other firmly held beliefs. The problem is acute when the claims in question are taken to be essential tenets of orthodoxy or strongly supported by inspired Scriptures.

Examples of theological paradoxes within mainstream Christianity include: the *Trinity (the three persons of the Godhead are distinct, and each is fully God, yet there is only one God); the *incarnation (the transcendent, immutable God became a man in space and time); the *hypostatic union (Christ is one person with both a divine nature and a human nature, and thus is omniscient and limited in knowledge, omnipresent and limited in location, impeccable yet susceptible to temptation, etc.); and the claim that God has infallible foreknowledge of human *free choices. Some traditions within Christianity face their own distinctive paradoxes (e.g. the Reformed teaching that God foreordains all things, yet we are morally responsible for our actions; see *Predestination).

Such paradoxes present a challenge to the rationality of Christian beliefs. Various approaches to theological paradoxes have been proposed, including: (1) The paradoxes involve real contradictions, but God is not bound by ‘human logic’. (2) The paradoxes involve real contradictions, and therefore some traditional doctrines need to be revised or (more radically) abandoned. (3) Through creative philosophical reflection the relevant doctrines can be explicated in logically consistent ways without compromising orthodoxy, thus showing that the apparent contradictions are merely apparent. (4) The paradoxes do not ultimately involve real contradictions, but they resist resolution on account of divine incomprehensibility and the limitations of the human mind. The same approach need not be followed in every case, but which approach is favoured will depend largely on one's broader theological and philosophical commitments.

Bibliography

J. N. Anderson, Paradox in Christian Theology (Eugene, 2007); R. W. Hepburn, Christianity and Paradox (London, 1958); R. M. Sainsbury, Paradoxes (Cambridge, 2009).

J. N. ANDERSON

PAROUSIA, see ESCHATOLOGY

PASCAL, BLAISE (1623–62)

Pascal, whose early genius emerged in mathematics, experimental physics and practical inventions, was converted to *Jansenism at Rouen in 1646. He participated in the social, intellectual and cultural life of Paris until his 'night of fire' (1654), an experience of intense assurance, joy and peace through Christ, leading to the total consecration of his life to God. Visiting the Jansenist community at Port-Royal, he was invited to rally public support for their leader, Antoine Arnauld, accused of heresy by the Sorbonne. In fourteen months he wrote a series of anonymous pamphlets, ten addressed to a provincial priest and eight to the Jesuits. With biting satire The Provincial Letters exposed the intellectual dishonesty of Arnauld's opponents and the moral hypocrisy of the Jesuits, who were the leading faction.

His chief legacy is an *apologia of the Christian religion, aimed at the educated unbeliever of his day. Ill health restricted it to sketches, some developed, others telegraphic, which the Jansenists published posthumously as the Pensées. Pascal eschews the traditional proofs for the existence of God, based on pure reason or deduced from the cosmos. Human reason is faulty, affected by instincts, illnesses and delusions, subject to pride, incapable of establishing first principles (contra *Descartes), let alone of bringing us to a knowledge of God and of our eternal destiny; at best it establishes only an abstract God and is powerless to move the heart (in the biblical sense, Ps. 119:36) – the highest order of human awareness, which is persuaded by grace alone. Instead, Pascal the *empiricist starts with the data, notably the inexplicable phenomenon of humankind: unquestionably corrupt, subject to inconstancy, boredom, anxiety and selfishness, doing anything in the waking hours to divert the mind from human wretchedness, yet showing the vestiges of inherent greatness in the mind's realization of this condition. Humankind is also finite, suspended between the twin infinities revealed by telescope and microscope, and aware of an inner emptiness which the finite world fails to satisfy. No philosophy makes sense of this. No moral system makes us better or happier. One hypothesis alone, creation in the divine image followed by the fall, explains our predicament and, through a redeemer and mediator with God, offers to restore our rightful state. Pascal proceeds to challenge his reader to commitment to Christ and to eternal life, particularly in his famous 'wager' passage, and then presents evidence for the truth of Christianity by showing its perpetuity from the first man until the end of time and Christ's excellence as mediator in perfectly combining human greatness with human degradation on the cross; further, the whole OT finds fulfilment in him, whose redemption relieves despair, humbles pride and empowers us to do good while not rendering us totally sinless.

The Pensées remain striking by their almost unique approach to apologetics, their deep, compassionate understanding of humankind without God and the persuasive prose of some of the developed sections. Their readership has multiplied in our affluent, anxious generation; many modern writers who reject Pascal's solution show the influence of his analysis of the human condition.

Bibliography

Works: A. Krailsheimer (ed.), Pensées (Harmondsworth, 1966); idem (ed.), The Provincial Letters (Harmondsworth, 1967).

Studies: D. Adamson, Blaise Pascal: Mathematician, Physicist, and Thinker about God (New York, 1995); J. H. Broome, Pascal (London, 1965); D. Groothuis, On Pascal (Belmont, CA, 2002); J. Jordan, Pascal's Wager: Pragmatic Arguments and Belief in God (Oxford, 2006); A. Krailsheimer, Pascal (Oxford, 1980); J. Mesnard, Pascal: His Life and Works (London, 1952).

D. G. PRESTON

PASCHAL CONTROVERSIES, see EASTER

PASCHASIUS RADBERTUS (c. 785–c. 860)

The theologian Paschasius Radbertus was the first explicit proponent of transubstantiation. Monk, and for a time abbot, of the Benedictine monastery at Corbie in modern France, he issued in 831 the first separate treatise on the doctrine of the Holy Communion, De Corpore et Sanguine Domini (On the Body and Blood of the Lord). It brought to a head the tendencies of the immediately preceding centuries, by interpreting the emphatic language of many of the Fathers about the presence of Christ in the sacrament, or in the elements, in a strictly literal sense, as meaning that the true body and blood of Christ which suffered on the cross are present, through being made out of the substance of the bread and wine – though without altering the appearance or taste of the latter (see *Eucharist). The doctrine of transubstantiation was defined by the Fourth *Lateran Council (1215), and Paschasius is a saint of the Roman calendar. He seems to have expected opposition, and the revised edition of his book (844) was given by King Charles the Bald to *Ratramnus, and perhaps to John Scotus *Eriugena, for them to answer. Paschasius wrote various other works, including a long commentary on Matthew.

Bibliography

Works: in PL 120; extracts, with translations, in C. Herbert, The Lord's Supper: Uninspired Teaching (London, 1879); discussion in N. Dimock, The Doctrine of the Lord's Supper (London, 1910).

R. T. BECKWITH

PATRISTIC THEOLOGY

The contribution of the early teachers of faith, a heterogeneous group ranging from those who wrote (or writings) ranging from the time that the NT was coming into being to seven or eight centuries after that, fall into a category traditionally called the teachings of the 'Fathers' (Lat. patres) or patristics. It has now been recognized that this understanding is too narrow and that we have to acknowledge the role and contribution of women writers and theologians of this period also. The writings range from liturgical material and directions for the ordering of worship, to apologetic and polemical writings, from teachings on the sacraments to speculations on the Trinity, from responses to questions on Christian life and practice, to analysis of 'heretical' teachings, from considerations about the link between the humanity and divinity of Christ, to questions regarding the relationship between the church and the state. These writings, which span the range of theological, ethical, poetic, linguistic, ritualistic, historical and polemical, and philosophical genres are mainly available in Latin, Greek and Syriac sources, although other local languages were also used. Some writers, because of a long tradition of transmission of manuscripts, are well-represented, and a wide range of their writings are available; others are known to us only through allusion or references in other writings, and their own contributions are lost.

Some of the writings and writers who are important in considering patristic theology are Clement of Rome, the Didache, Ignatius of Antioch, accounts of martyrdom like the description of the deaths of Perpetua and Felicitas, *Clement of Alexandria, *Tertullian, *Origen, *Cyprian of Carthage, *Athanasius, *Cyril of Alexandria, *creedal formulations like the Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed, the church historian *Eusebius, *Ambrose, *Augustine, *Basil of Caesarea, *Gregory of Nazianus, *Gregory of Nyssa, John *Chrysostom, *Jerome, Aphrahat, Ephrem and John Cassian. This is by no means a comprehensive list and there are many others who have contributed to patristic theology, a contribution that is not limited to formal writings alone, but can also be found in tombstone inscriptions, worship patterns, church architecture, laws and legal codes, and editions of the Scriptures. Some of those represented have been considered 'orthodox' in their views and teachings, and others have been derided as exhibiting 'heretical' tendencies. Some who became prominent in one region were looked upon with suspicion by those from another region, and some who were considered to be championing 'orthodoxy' at one period were held to have been schismatics or *heretics by those holding other ideological or theological positions. Debate, dialogue, confrontation, uncertainty, deliberate misunderstanding and attempts at consensus marked patristic theology through and through.

The variety and range of writers and writings exhibited by those who contributed to patristic theology are an indication that 'consensus' regarding faith and order was always elusive. Even when attempts were made through more or less representative *councils or 'synods' to arrive at consensus, not all were pleased at the outcome, and tensions because of strongly held views continued to be a mark of this period. In addition, historical vicissitudes also played a major role in the process of how doctrines, teachings and practices came into being.

In spite of these caveats, the teachings and examples of the early teachers of faith continue to be of importance in extremely significant ways to Christian theology and the life and witness of the church today. In that sense we reach back to patristic theology in order to move forward in our ecumenical quest today. Although there are ebbs and flows in how certain writers have been appropriated or ignored, nevertheless these writings offer us a rich treasure trove of material to which we can return time and again with profit, to be illumined and admonished. Even though the church is now a global phenomenon, the writings of the early teachers of faith are a repository to which those coming from various regions and locations, and also from varied traditions, can return to, even when there may not be a direct genealogical or geographical link to particular 'Fathers'.

Some of the perennial questions which continue to enliven the life of the church are questions with which patristic theology struggled. Although these struggles may not be of direct relevance to those of us in the twenty-first century, one can benefit from a study of how in another time and place and under very different situations real people struggled and dealt with similar issues and themes. In that sense the dead continue to speak to us, feeding into the living stream of tradition, which is watered from many sources. Such questions include those regarding the nature of *theology and theologizing, the attributes of *God, the meaning of the affirmation that God was in *Christ, the role and function of the *Holy Spirit, intra-*trinitarian dynamics, God-*creation-world inter-relationships, the destiny of human beings, the understanding of life, death and eternal life, hope in the second coming of Christ, the ends of God and the end of the world (see *Eschatology).

There are several other areas that would benefit from such a conversation with long-dead seekers of salvation, healing and wholeness, to say nothing of nasty church politicians, scheming bureaucrats, those condemned as heretics by one group of people and venerated as saints by another, faithful and misunderstood disciples, seekers of varied ways of responding to the living out of the Christian faith in complex intercultural situations. Some of these areas are the study of our *liturgical traditions, the attitude to women in our churches, the understanding of the *history that has shaped us, the search for new symbols and images for faith articulation, an analysis of Christology in its encounter with cultures, the methodology of biblical interpretation (see *Hermeneutics), the search for a genuine and meaningful *spirituality, the understanding of *poverty and prosperity, the changing patterns of *family life, and the quest for *ecumenical inter-relationships across doctrinal divisions.

The writings of the early teachers of faith which form patristic theology have been influential directly and indirectly in all forms of theologizing up to the present, and in this sense continue to offer us the ongoing possibility of bringing out of our treasure what is new and what is old (Matt. 13:52).

Bibliography

P. M. Blowers et al. (eds.), In Dominico Eloquio – In Lordly Eloquence: Essays on Patristic Exegesis in Honor of Robert Louis Wilken (Grand Rapids, 2002); P. Brown, The Body and Society: Men, Women, and Sexual Renunciation in Early Christianity (New York, 1988); B. E. Daley, The Hope of the Early Church: A Handbook of Patristic Eschatology (Peabody, 2003); W. H. C. Frend, The Rise of Christianity (Minneapolis, 1986); C. A. Hall, Reading Scripture with the Church Fathers (Downers Grove, 1998); idem, Learning Theology with the Church Fathers (Downers Grove, 2002); A. J. Malherbe, F. W. Norris and J. W. Thompson (eds.), The Early Church in Its Context: Essays in Honor of Everett Ferguson (Leiden, 1998); J. J. Sebastian, Enlivening the Past: An Asian Theologian's Engagement with the Early Teachers of Faith (Piscataway, 2009); C. A. Volz, Pastoral Life and Practice in the Early Church

(Minneapolis, 1990); R. L. Wilken, The Spirit of Early Christian Thought: Seeking the Face of God (New Haven, 2003).

J. J. SEBASTIAN

PELAGIANISM

Pelagianism was a current of teaching in the *ascetic movement in the West in the fifth century, of which Pelagius is commonly regarded as the fountain head. Its theological outlook was characterized by: an insistence on the adequacy of created human nature, essentially unimpaired by Adam's *fall, to fulfil the will of God; the denial of original *sin as either *guilt or corruption transmitted from *Adam to all humankind; the highest moral and spiritual expectations of the baptized Christian who must be capable of a life of perfect holiness, because God commands him thereto; and an understanding of the gifts of grace that excludes, or at best drastically minimizes, that enabling power without whose inner working we can do nothing acceptable to God.

In reality, the Pelagian movement was neither uniform nor united by Pelagius's sole inspiration. Nevertheless, the traditional terminology remains useful. The label 'Pelagian' is often loosely invoked to damn any doctrine felt to threaten the primacy of *grace, faith and spiritual regeneration over human ability, good works and moral endeavour.

Pelagius was a British layman who gained acceptance in Rome c. 400 as a teacher of Christian asceticism. He wrote letters of ascetic counsel, some treatises (including a credally orthodox Faith in the Trinity) and a commentary on the Pauline epistles. These works drew on several Christian sources, including *Origen, Ambrosiaster and *Augustine. Strongly persuaded of the goodness of the created order, he opposed whatever denigrated it, such as *Manichaeism and even *Jerome's more extravagant asceticism. One gift of grace was God's inviolable endowment of the human creature with self-determination. Although the fall set in train a habit of sinning, to the detriment of subsequent generations, the created abilities (posse) of the *will, though overlaid with invertebrate custom or obscured by forgetfulness or ignorance, remained as God made them, and needed only our act of will (velle) to make the accomplishing of God's will a reality (esse). To this end was added the grace of revelation and illumination, by both *law and *gospel. In conversion and baptism (assumed to be that of the responsible believer), the grace of the forgiveness of past sins was assured (unlike Paul, Pelagius wrote explicitly of *justification 'by faith alone'). Thereafter, however, the Christian was deemed capable of realizing the potential of his created powers. Above all, there was no room for the dismal defeatism or fatalism in the face of sin that Pelagius claimed to find in Augustine's Confessions. The church must be a community zealous for Christian perfection.

The Gothic advance on Rome in 410 dispersed Pelagius and his supporters, southwards to Sicily and Roman Africa, and eastwards to Palestine in particular. His associate Celestius was the first 'Pelagian' to incur the censure of the church, at Carthage in 411. Similar in background to Pelagius, he was nevertheless a more combative and possibly less guileful spirit. He clumsily offended received Catholic beliefs in Africa by asserting that Adam was mortal before his fall, which injured no-one but himself, and that infants were baptized not for the remission of sin (for there was no original sin), but to obtain sanctification or the kingdom of heaven. These opinions of Celestius were apparently disowned by Pelagius in Palestine in 415, when he was acquitted by two synods of Eastern bishops. Celestius had himself appealed to one Rufinus 'the Syrian' in defence of his denial of the transmission of sin. This shadowy figure (not to be confused with Rufinus of Aquileia) illustrates both the diversity of 'Pelagian' views (for, unlike Celestius, he taught that Adam would not have died had he remained sinless) and the ultimate Eastern roots, or at least affinities, of Pelagian ideas (although his role is exaggerated by the writer who depicts him as the inspirer of Pelagius himself). Rufinus rejected the traducianist theory of the origin of the *soul, which suited belief in the transmission of original sin, and was a sharp critic of Origen. The disputes about Origen's speculative doctrines, not least the pre-existence of souls, were a powerful undercurrent in the Pelagian controversy.

The condemnation of Celestius and Pelagius was spearheaded by the African episcopate instructed by Augustine. The *Council of Carthage in 418 anathematized the following teachings: the natural, rather than penal, mortality of Adam; the denial of infant baptism, and of original sin derived from Adam and requiring cleansing in baptism for the newborn; the restriction of justifying grace to the remission of past sins, excluding its help against committing future sins; the restriction of the aid that grace gives against sinning to the enlightening of the understanding, to the exclusion of the implanting of love which enables us to delight in and obey the will of God; the assertion that grace merely enables us to do more easily what we could still do without it, albeit with greater difficulty; and the denial of the plain statements of 1 John 1:8–9 and the implications of the Lord's Prayer ('forgive us our debts') in order to claim that one is in reality without sin.

African pressure was largely instrumental in eliciting a conclusive condemnation of Pelagian teachings from Pope Zosimus later in 418. Its terms are only partly recorded, but it certainly affirmed the universal transmission of sin from Adam, resulting in that captivity to sin from which all need to be set free through baptism, which has the same force for infant and adult alike. The (third ecumenical) Council of Ephesus in 431 also condemned any who shared the opinions of Celestius.

A group of Italian bishops led by Julian of Eclanum in South Italy (c. 386–c. 455) refused to subscribe to Zosimus' verdict. Julian now became the protagonist for Pelagian beliefs, conducting an increasingly bitter controversy with Augustine until the latter's death. Fragments of his works survive largely in Augustine's replies. Extant expositions of Job and of Hosea, Joel and Amos are with considerable probability ascribed to Julian.

This phase of the controversy is important more for elaborations in Augustine's thought (which in turn provoked the anti-Augustinian reaction known misleadingly as *Semi-Pelagianism) than for significant new teachings expounded by Julian. He attributed Augustine's account of humanity's bondage to sin to his incurable Manichaeism, and generally systematized Pelagian doctrines, which made him a more formidable opponent than either Pelagius or Celestius. More central to this phase of the controversy were predestination (Julian charged Augustine's God with injustice), the sinful concupiscence persisting in the Christian after baptism, and sexual intercourse between inevitably concupiscent partners as the medium for the transmission of original sin.

Pelagianism was important for provoking new or sharper clarification of Catholic beliefs on issues untouched by earlier controversies in the East, where they were inadequately understood. Modern study has rescued Pelagius and his fellows from the ranks of the moralists and humanists, recognizing their serious religious intent and their claim to be faithful to earlier tradition in areas where much was undefined. But the Pelagian assessment of the effects of Adam's fall and understanding of grace cannot be squared with Scripture, although the church, in decisively rejecting Pelagian views, did not wholly endorse Augustine's refutations.

Bibliography

T. Bohlin, Die Theologie des Pelagius und ihre Genesis (Uppsala, 1957); G. Bonner, Augustine and Modern Research on Pelagianism (Villanova, 1972); idem, 'How Pelagian Was Pelagius?', SP 9, 1966, pp. 350–358; P. Brown, Religion and Society in the Age of St Augustine (London, 1972); R. F. Evans, Pelagius: Inquiries and Reappraisals (London, 1968), and Four Letters of Pelagius (London, 1968); J. Ferguson, Pelagius: A Historical and Theological Study (Cambridge, 1956); G. de Plinval, Pélagé: Ses écrits, sa vie et sa réforme (Lausanne, 1943); B. R. Rees, Pelagius: A Reluctant Heretic (Woodbridge, 1988); D. F. Wright, 'Pelagius the Twice-Born', Churchman 86, 1972, pp. 6–15.

D. F. WRIGHT

PELIKAN, JAROSLAV (1923–2006)

An American scholar of mixed Serbian and Slovak origin, Pelikan was Professor of History at Yale University from 1962 to 1996. A Lutheran for most of his life, he converted to *Eastern Orthodoxy in 1996, regarding this more as a natural progression than as a change in religious orientation. Pelikan specialized in the history of Christian thought, to which he contributed a large number of editions and original works. His most notable achievement was his five-volume work The Christian Tradition (1971–89), a magisterial, thematic study of Christian *doctrine from its beginnings to its multiple manifestations in the modern world. He also translated a number of volumes in the American edition of Martin Luther's works and more recently he supervised a project to edit and publish the *creeds and *confessions of all the major Christian denominations. In works like Jesus through the Centuries (1985) he demonstrated how a central theme can be treated in different ways according to the social, cultural and theological predilections of a given ecclesiastical milieu. In Christianity and Classical Culture (1993) he explored the way in which the Fathers of the church developed a *natural theology in order to integrate the positive insights of ancient Greek culture into their Christian vision of the world. His approach is both conservative and ecumenical, concentrating on broad trends and overall synthesis more than on detailed analysis of particular writers and subjects. In this respect he has provided the present generation with a comprehensive and coherent vision of what the Christian cultural inheritance has achieved and still has to offer today.

Bibliography

Works: The Christian Tradition, 5 vols. (Chicago, 1971–89); J. Pelikan and V. Hotchkiss (eds.), Creeks and Confessions of Faith in the Christian Tradition (New Haven, 2003).

Studies: V. Hotchkiss and P. Henry (eds.), Orthodoxy and Western Culture: A Collection of Essays Honoring Jaroslav Pelikan on His Eightieth Birthday (Crestwood, 2005).

G. L. BRAY

PENANCE

Early in Christian theology the Greek term metanoia was translated by the Latin term poenitentia, which has broadly been understood by the concepts penitence, penance, punishment, repentance and conversion. Penance is predominantly associated with the *Roman Catholic tradition and seen as a *sacramental process that eradicates sin after baptism, what Jerome described as a second plank after baptism able to save a person after a shipwreck (Epistle 130, 9).

In the early church, penance began as a form of discipline reserved for grave offences like apostasy, murder or adultery. It usually entailed a public confession, segregation from the congregation, exclusion from the *Eucharist, and adherence to a rigid course of prayer and fasting. At this stage in church history it was only allowed once in a person's lifetime. This practice, which was intended to amend the life of a baptized sinner, became theologically buttressed by *Tertullian's work De poenitentia, which also introduced legal concepts into Western theology (e.g. *merit and *satisfaction). With this development, early in the third century, the church began seeing penance in terms of a divine contractual obligation.

In the Eastern Church penance developed differently. Here penance provided spiritual direction and was mainly a private pastoral rite. This Eastern practice influenced the sixth-century Celtic writing of elaborate penance manuals (penitentials). Now penance was seen as the private confession to a priest, absolution and completing a light formal penance. This structure gained popularity during the early Middle Ages and influenced the move toward private penance on the continent. Through the influence of Peter *Lombard's Sentences (c. 1150), penance was seen as a sacrament, and at the Fourth *Lateran Council (1215) the rite of penance became mandatory for all Christians, requiring the confession of sins once a year.

In the Late Middle Ages the doctrine became the foundation of the *nominalist view that forgiveness could be gained through a contractual agreement that God required penitents 'to do only what they are capable of' (facere quod in se). Luther's doctrines of salvation by grace alone and justification by faith were partly a reaction against this nominalist view of penance. The *Reformers unanimously rejected the contractual nature of this sacrament (esp. its related ideas of satisfaction, indulgences, merit and *purgatory). Instead of a sacrament, the Reformers interpreted penance as turning one's entire life to God (cf. Inst. 3.3.1). More recently in both Catholic and Protestant theology, and in ecumenical dialogue, penance has been viewed broadly in terms of Jesus' summons to return to God.

Bibliography

P. Anciaux, The Sacrament of Penance (London, 1962); J. Bossy, 'The Social History of Confession in the Age of the Reformation', in Transactions of the Royal Historical Society fifth series, vol. 25 (1975), pp. 21–38; H. Connolly, Irish Penitentials and Their Significance for the Sacrament of Penance (Portland, 1995); Tertullian, Treatises on Penance (ET, New York, 1959); O. Watkins, History of Penance (London, 1920).

B. LUGIOYO

PENTECOST, see BAPTISM IN THE SPIRIT; HOLY SPIRIT

PENTECOSTAL THEOLOGY

Pentecostal theology has its roots in nineteenth-century *holiness groups holding John Wesley's doctrine of entire *sanctification, sometimes called the *baptism of the Spirit, and an endowment of power; the teaching of the Keswick Conventions that the 'higher Christian life' was to be experienced after a post-conversion crisis of consecration (see *Higher-life theology); the teaching of R. A. Torrey (1856–1928) that the baptism of the Spirit was a post-conversion endowment of power for witness, not sanctification; the teaching of A. B. Simpson (1843–1919) and A. J. Gordon (1836–95) that divine healing was to be received by faith; and the *dispensational premillennialism (see *Millennium) of J. N. *Darby. These streams all contributed to the 'four-square' emphases of Pentecostal preaching: Christ the Saviour, the baptizer in the Holy Spirit, the healer and the coming King.

Origins and spread

In the late-nineteenth century supernatural manifestations, including glossolalia, were reported in the United States, and in India and Korea in the first decade of the twentieth century. However, the origin of Pentecostalism has been commonly dated to 1 January 1901, when Miss Agnes Ozman, a student at Bethel Bible College, Topeka, Kansas, spoke in tongues after the principal, Charles Fox Parham, laid hands on her and prayed for her to receive the power of the Spirit. Henceforth, for Pentecostals, the supreme sign of being baptized in the Spirit would be speaking in tongues. This is considered to be the gateway to vivid experience of God, lively worship, the gifts of the Spirit (especially divine healing) and power for Christian witness and service. The beginnings of Pentecostalism were encouraged by reports of the dramatic phenomena in the Welsh revival of 1904–5.

Powerful Pentecostal phenomena occurred at a revival (1906–9) at the Azusa Street Apostolic Faith Mission, Los Angeles, led by William J. Seymour, a former student of Parham. Within a few years Pentecostalism had spread widely in the USA, especially through the considerable influence of pastors who had witnessed the revival at Azusa Street, which was visited by Christians from around the world. At least twenty-six denominations trace their Pentecostal roots to this revival.

Pentecostal teaching was introduced to Europe by Cecil Polhill (1860–1938) and the Oslo-based Thomas Ball Barratt (1862–1940), who imparted it in 1907 to the Anglican vicar of Monkwearmouth, Alexander A. Boddy (1854–1930). Boddy organized the annual Pentecostal conferences in Sunderland (1908–14), which were attended by some of the later British Pentecostal leaders. Due to the ministry of Lewi Pethrus (1884–1974), Pentecostalism gained a strong foothold in Scandinavia. Jonathan Paul (1853–1931) established Pentecostalism in Germany, where it was accused of being demonically inspired in the notorious Berlin Declaration of 1909.

Pentecostalism gave rise to considerable controversy among evangelicals in the first half of the twentieth century, especially over the baptism in the Spirit as a second experience after conversion, and the availability of the supernatural gifts of the Spirit, particularly speaking in tongues and divine *healing. Many holiness leaders rejected Pentecostalism, although some joined the growing movement after contact with those influenced by the Azusa Street Mission. Having taught that sanctification was a 'second blessing', some described the baptism of the Spirit with glossolalia as a 'third blessing'. Most Pentecostals, however, argued that sanctification was a progressive work following conversion, and so the baptism in the Spirit was a 'second blessing'.

Over the years many Pentecostal denominations have been formed throughout the world, sometimes due to schism, but more often to the growth of indigenous churches. Considerable growth occurred after the Second World War in North and South America, Scandinavia, sub-Saharan Africa and Korea. Underground Pentecostal churches were established in the former Soviet Empire, and millions have been drawn to the illegal Pentecostal house churches in communist China, despite intermittent severe persecution. The World Pentecostal Conference first met in 1947 in Zurich and has since met triennially.

The *charismatic renewal movement (initially called 'neo-Pentecostalism') began in the United States and gained national prominence in 1960, when the Episcopalian priest Dennis J. Bennett (1917–91) announced his experience of the baptism in the Spirit to his church in Van Nuys, California. The teachings of the charismatic movement influenced many in the historic denominations, due especially to the ministry of the American Assemblies of God minister David J. du Plessis (1905–87) and other well-known speakers. Around 1960 the charismatic movement spread to the historic denominations in Britain, where it was fostered by the Fountain Trust, founded by the Anglican Michael C. Harper (1931–2010), and its magazine Renewal. Another outcome was the establishment of a number of independent networks of charismatic new churches. Similar developments occurred in other European countries. The ‘word of faith’ movement pioneered by Kenneth E. Hagin (1917–2003), which promoted the teaching that it was possible for Christians always to claim health and prosperity from God (see *Prosperity theology), also spread to many parts of the world, although many Pentecostals rejected its teaching as unscriptural.

Since 1967 the charismatic movement has extended into the Roman Catholic Church, initially influential in the USA and Ireland and later in France and Italy. But apart from a series of five extended theological dialogues at the Vatican from 1972 to 2002, there has, in general, been little attempt amongst Pentecostals to foster fellowship with Roman Catholics. Charismatic Catholic theologians have usually regarded distinctive charismatic experiences as ‘releases’ or ‘manifestations’ of the Spirit that have been imparted to the believer at her baptism and confirmation, or sometimes labelled them, along with baptism in water, as baptisms in the Spirit, although many wished to avoid this term as being elitist and divisive.

A further phase of the charismatic movement, known as the ‘third wave’, developed in the 1980s under the influence of the teaching of C. Peter Wagner (b. 1930) and the healing missions of John Wimber (1934–98), the founder of the Vineyard fellowship of churches. This third wave taught that the baptism in the Holy Spirit occurs at conversion, that multiple fillings of the Holy Spirit are to be expected, and that the gifts of the Spirit, especially healing, are to be manifest. A derivative of the third wave was the ‘Toronto experience’ that originated in the Toronto Airport Vineyard Church under the leadership of John Arnott (b. 1940) in 1994, characterized by involuntary prostrations, ecstatic spiritual experiences, spontaneous laughter and shaking.

According to the statistician David B. Barrett, by 2000 the classical Pentecostal movement had grown to 65 million adherents, denominational charismatics to 175 million and the independent, indigenous charismatic movements, mainly in the developing world, to 295 million, the total representing 27% of the Christian population worldwide.

Distinctive doctrines

Pentecostal doctrines were expounded in the United States by well-known teachers such as Peter C. Nelson (1868–1942), Ernest S. Williams (1885–1981), Ralph M. Riggs (1895–1971), Myer Pearlman (1898–1943), Stanley M. Horton (1916–2014) and William W. Menzies (1931–2011) of the American Assemblies of God, and Charles W. Conn (1920–2008) of the Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee). In Britain such teaching was promoted by key Pentecostal leaders such as Harold L. C. Horton (1880–1969), Donald Gee (1891–1966), A. Howard Carter (1891–1971) and his brother John H. Carter (1893–1981) of the Assemblies of God, and by George Jeffreys (1889–1962), William G. Hathaway (1892–1969), Percy S. Brewster (1908–80) and John Lancaster (b. 1925) of the Elim Pentecostal Church.

To support their doctrine that the baptism in the Spirit is an empowerment for mission subsequent to conversion (the ‘subsequence’ doctrine), Pentecostals hold that the anointing of Jesus with the Spirit after his baptism is a pattern to be followed by Christians, and occurred to the first disciples on the day of Pentecost, when they were baptized in the Holy Spirit and endued with power for the Great Commission. Pentecostals likewise argue that in the Acts of the Apostles the Samaritan converts of ch. 8 and the Ephesian disciples of ch. 19 were regenerate before they were baptized in the Spirit. Thus, in Luke’s terminology, ‘to receive the Spirit’ is ‘the same gift’ as the baptism by Jesus in the Holy Spirit. The Holy Spirit is described as ‘coming’ or ‘falling’ upon believers with observable results, such as speaking in tongues and prophesying.

Pentecostals distinguish between the indwelling of the Holy Spirit as the source of saving faith and the outpouring of the Spirit that empowers for Christian witness. Supernatural gifts and miracles abounded throughout the apostolic period, and this is still Christ’s will for his people. These are manifestations of Jesus’ messianic lordship and his exaltation to the Father’s right hand. The baptism in the Spirit is grounded in the *ascension of Jesus, just as forgiveness of sin and new life are grounded in the death and resurrection of Christ respectively. Speaking in tongues is the principal sign of being baptized in the Spirit, but many Pentecostals now recognize other *gifts of the Spirit as confirmatory signs of this experience.

Adult water *baptism is usually practised, immediately followed by prayer for the baptism in the Spirit. A purely symbolic (Zwinglian) view of the sacraments has usually predominated, although Pentecostals do emphasize a deep sense of fellowship with the risen Lord when partaking of Communion. Church government usually takes Congregational or Presbyterian forms, along with a stress on the *priesthood of all believers, although some Pentecostal denominations have approximated more in practice to the Episcopal form of church government. Prayer for the sick, accompanied by anointing with oil and the laying on of hands, has been a regular practice of Pentecostals in both evangelistic campaigns and weekly church services. Pentecostals have often adhered to the 'healing in the atonement' doctrine in which Christ is regarded as having borne our sicknesses as well as our sins. More recently, some have not accepted this view, holding to a less dogmatic doctrine of divine healing.

Recent debate on the baptism in the Holy Spirit

Only a brief outline can be given here of some of the significant contributions to this debate from amongst a vast literature. Detailed academic discussion of Pentecostal theology was initiated by the publication in 1970 of Baptism in the Holy Spirit by J. D. G. Dunn and A Theology of the Holy Spirit by F. D. Bruner. For Dunn the impartation of the Spirit to Jesus at his baptism confirmed his divine sonship and initiated the messianic age and the beginnings of the new covenant era. Hence, the reception of the Spirit within the 'conversion-initiation' complex of events in Acts 2, 8, 9, 10 and 19 imparted primarily regeneration to the first disciples, as well as their empowerment for their mission, and thus Luke's pneumatology of Christian initiation correlates with that of Paul. Bruner goes further in claiming that, for the apostles, justification and regeneration, identified as the baptism in the Spirit, occurred during baptism in water. Thus Bruner rejects the Pentecostal 'subsequence' doctrine and the claim that Spirit baptism is evidenced by the sign of glossolalia. For Bruner, the advocacy of conditions by Pentecostals for receiving the baptism in the Spirit undermines the sufficiency of the unconditional grace of the gospel for living the Christian life.

This teaching that opposed the Pentecostal 'subsequence' doctrine was answered by a number of defences of that position by Pentecostals such as H. Hunter in Spirit-Baptism (London, 1983) and D. Petts in The Holy Spirit (Nottingham, 1998) and by charismatic writers such as the Baptist H. M. Ervin in Conversion-Initiation and the Baptism in the Holy Spirit (Peabody, 1984) and the Presbyterian J. R. Williams in his three-volume Renewal Theology (Grand Rapids, 1988–92). In response to those who wished to press the texts in Acts on the impartation of the Spirit into a supposed Pauline mould, R. Stronstad argues that Luke's charismatic theology must be independently assessed in terms of his dependence upon OT texts describing anointing by the Spirit of God, the commonality of the motifs of the transfer of the Spirit, the parallels between Jesus and Elijah and Elisha, and the parallels between Luke 3:1 – 4:44, Acts 1:1 – 2:42 and subsequent experiences of impartation of the Spirit (The Charismatic Theology of St. Luke, Grand Rapids, 1984). Likewise, in undertaking a redactional approach to Luke-Acts, J. B. Shelton argues that Luke's distinctive pneumatology should not be forced to conform to that of Paul (Mighty in Word and Deed, Peabody, 1991). Careful exegesis of the key passages in Acts leads Stronstad and Shelton to maintain that, for Luke, the baptism in the Spirit reveals the God-given call to ministry and/or imparts empowerment for prophetic revelation, witness, miracles and service. Thus the baptism in the Spirit is commonly subsequent to regeneration and water baptism and should not be identified with either. But Stronstad and Shelton failed to explain adequately how Luke's pneumatology could be reconciled with that of the Pauline epistles, which appear to identify the impartation of the Spirit with regeneration.

In Power from on High (Sheffield, 1996) and The Holy Spirit and Spiritual Gifts (Carlisle, 1996), M. M. B. Turner argues that the intertestamental Jewish understanding was that the 'Spirit of prophecy' imparted not only charismatic revelation, guidance, prophecy, worship and miraculous powers, but also a salvific life-giving wisdom central to authentic faith and ethical renewal. He agrees with Dunn that, for Luke, the reception of the Spirit by the early disciples in Acts was a soteriological regenerating gift, as maintained by Paul, as well as an empowering for their mission. Likewise, the Pentecostal scholar Gordon Fee argues that, for Paul, the baptism in the Spirit is identical with regeneration and that the notion of the reception of the Spirit being subsequent to conversion is not a norm of the NT (God's Empowering Presence, Peabody, 1994). Fee exemplifies a departure amongst some Pentecostals from the traditional 'subsequence' doctrine.

Contrary to this, R. P. Menzies argues that the intertestamental Jewish understanding of the 'Spirit of prophecy' is commonly seen as the source of prophetic activity, but not of miracles, and only rarely as the source of life-giving wisdom (Empowered for Witness, Sheffield, 1994). Thus Luke retained this Jewish understanding of the Spirit in representing the impartation of the Spirit to Jesus at his baptism as the inauguration of prophetic empowerment for his messianic task, rather than the designation of Jesus' divine sonship or messianic calling. Likewise, the baptism in the Spirit of the first disciples at Pentecost empowered them for their prophetic mission, granting them special insight and inspired preaching, rather than mediating the new covenant or initiating their regeneration. According to Menzies, Luke limited the role of the Spirit to the impartation of prophetic powers, never attributed soteriological powers to him, and resisted the developing tendency in the apostolic church of regarding the Spirit as the source of miracle-working power. Menzies thus holds that Paul was the first to attribute soteriological functions to the Spirit so that his pneumatology contains both salvific and charismatic dimensions.

The Korean Pentecostal Y. Cho endorses these conclusions of Menzies, but goes further than him in showing that, for Paul, life in the Spirit for the Christian correlates with life in the kingdom of God as taught by Jesus to his disciples, whereas in Acts Luke limits the ministry of the Spirit to the empowerment of the disciples and the source of their inspired preaching, prophecies and miracles (Spirit and Kingdom in the Writings of Luke and Paul, Milton Keynes, 2005). Thus Menzies and Cho identify the baptism in the Spirit and such cognate phrases as 'receiving the Spirit' in Acts as a post-regeneration empowerment for the church's mission. But they do not satisfactorily say how this can be reconciled with Paul's salvific pneumatology that seems to relate such phrases to the beginnings of the Christian life.

The Finnish Pentecostal V.-M. Kärkkäinen relates Pentecostal theology to the pneumatologies of differing traditions and their theologians in his Pneumatology (Grand Rapids, 2002). Out of a desire to engage in ecumenical dialogue, the American Pentecostal A. Yong interprets the metaphor of baptism in the Spirit as referring to the dynamism of all the salvific work of the Spirit in regeneration, sanctification, empowerment for mission and spiritual gifts, as well as to the eschatological transformation of the believer in the new age. But this blurs the meaning of the term 'baptism in the Holy Spirit' (i.e. a metaphor for immersion in the dynamic presence of the Holy Spirit) that refers to the distinctive events of infillings of the Spirit in Acts. Jesus' anticipation that the disciples would be baptized in the Holy Spirit 'in a few days' (Acts 1:5) applies to the empowerment of the disciples that happened on the day of Pentecost, not to their whole experience of salvation.

K. Warrington, who has authored a comprehensive survey of recent debates on Pentecostal doctrines, also advocates a flexible understanding of the term 'baptism in the Spirit' as embracing the regenerating, liberating, sanctifying and empowering ministry of the Holy Spirit in the believer's life. Likewise, F. D. Macchia enlarges the concept of the baptism in the Spirit within a soteriological, charismatic and eschatological framework to identify it with a baptism in the love of God that sanctifies, renews and empowers us until, at the end of the age, Spirit baptism transforms all of creation into the final dwelling place of God. In other words, the risen and ascended Jesus baptizes believers in the Spirit in regeneration and sanctification (Paul) and in empowerment for mission subsequent to conversion (Luke). But these events prefigure the eschatological baptism of all creation in the Spirit at its transformation in the eschaton (cf. John the Baptist in Matt. 3:11–12).

Finally, Paul does not explain exactly what he means by Spirit baptism in his letters; perhaps because this was well known to his converts. It would seem that one either has to say that Paul's concept of Spirit baptism differs from Luke's concept of charismatic empowerment for mission in referring either to the new birth and incorporation into Christ or to the complex of events of the conversion-initiation process, or to hold that Paul's references to being baptized in the Spirit (1 Cor. 12:13), anointed with the Spirit (2 Cor. 1:21) and sealed with the Spirit (2 Cor. 1:22; Eph. 1:13) allude to a post-conversion charismatic experience as described in Acts 8 and 19.

See also: HOLY SPIRIT.

Bibliography

S. M. Burgess and E. M. van Der Maas (eds.), The New International Dictionary of Pentecostal and Charismatic Movements (Grand Rapids, 2002); G. P. Duffield and N. M. van Cleave, Foundations of Pentecostal Theology (Los Angeles, 1983); W. J. Hollenweger, Pentecostalism: Origins and Developments Worldwide (Peabody, 1997); S. M. Horton (ed.), Systematic Theology (Springfield, rev. edn, 1995); H. I. Lederle, Treasures Old and New: Interpretations of 'Spirit-Baptism' in the Charismatic Renewal Movement (Peabody, 1991); F. D. Macchia, Baptized in the Spirit: A Global Pentecostal Theology (Grand Rapids, 2006); G. B. McGee (ed.), Initial Evidence: Historical and Biblical Perspectives on the Pentecostal Doctrine of Spirit Baptism (Peabody, 1991); W. W. Menzies and R. P. Menzies, Spirit and Power: Foundations of Pentecostal Experience (Grand Rapids, 2000); V. Synan, The Century of the Holy Spirit: 100 Years of Pentecostal and Charismatic Renewal, 1901–2001 (Nashville, 2001); K. Warrington, Pentecostal Theology: A Theology of Encounter (London, 2008); idem (ed.), Pentecostal Perspectives (Carlisle, 1998); J. R. Williams, Renewal Theology: Systematic Theology from a Charismatic Perspective, 3 vols. (Grand Rapids, 1988–1992); A. Yong, The Spirit Poured Out on All Flesh: Pentecostalism and the Possibility of Global Theology (Grand Rapids, 2005).

J. W. WARD

PERFECTION, PERFECTIONISM

Perfect (teleios) and perfection (teleiōsis) are NT terms found in the sayings of Jesus (Matt. 5:48; 19:21), the teaching of Paul (Phil. 3:12–15), the epistle to the Hebrews (6:1) and the Johannine literature (1 John 4:12, 17). Throughout Christian history attempts have been made to understand what such passages imply. In some of the early apologists, such as Aristides, Athenagoras and Justin, this was interpreted as an absolute sinlessness, and some of the writings of the so-called 'Apostolic Fathers' (e.g. the Shepherd of Hermas) wrestle with the question of whether sins committed after baptism could be forgiven. Some balance appeared, however, in the teaching of *Clement of Alexandria, who stated that while Christians were in one sense 'perfect' once they were baptized into Christ (Paedagogus I, 6), and their lives evidenced a transformation, they still had to grow to a more mature level of 'perfection' (Stromateis, VII, 3 and 10). Clement wisely defined this Christian maturity positively rather than negatively, that is, not as sinlessness, but as a growing knowledge and love of God which purifies the heart.

This idea of a relative perfection, a maturity which ended the instability of the divided heart, characterized the spirituality of the Eastern Fathers. Through the example of Antony, challenged as a young man by Matt. 19:21, this inward perfection or purity of heart became the goal of the monastic movement (see *Asceticism and monasticism), pursued in different ways by Pachomius, Basil, Cassian and *Benedict. Given his strong development of the doctrine of original sin, it is not surprising that *Augustine was pessimistic about the possibility of even a relative perfection in this life (see On Man's Perfection in Righteousness). But despite his pessimism, the 'ladder of perfection', the idea of a scale of degrees of perfection, characterized the *spirituality of the medieval period. *Bernard of Clairvaux (On the Love of God) identified four degrees of love: self-love, loving God for his benefits, loving God for his own sake, and loving oneself only for God's sake. The fourth degree was possibly only in the life to come, but Bernard regarded the third degree as a level of perfection possible in this life. *Thomas Aquinas similarly defined 'perfection' in terms of *love and taught that absolute perfection was possible for God alone. Even the perfection of loving God as much as we possibly can is impossible in this life. But there is a lower level where everything contrary to the love of God (such as mortal sin) is removed. There can be no love of God without this and so it is essential to salvation. It may also move a notch higher so that everything hindering the affections toward God is removed, and this is the highest perfection possible in this life (Summa Theologica, 2a–2ae, 84, 1).

The Reformers, reacting against the hypocrisy of much sixteenth-century monasticism, generally rejected any idea of perfection as contrary to justification by grace through faith. *Calvin's exposition of Christian *sanctification, more positive than that of *Luther, still remained extremely suspicious of it. In the seventeenth century, some *Pietists developed a more positive line, but this was defined as maturity, not sinlessness. John *Wesley (see his A Plain Account of Christian Perfection) similarly developed the idea of perfection as maturity, being deeply influenced by Clement of Alexandria and by homilies thought to have been written by Macarius the Egyptian. Like Bernard and Aquinas, he defined it as 'perfect love', that is, the fulfilling of the law as summarized in the great commandments. This was not attained by discipline, but was the gift of grace received in 'entire sanctification' (cf. 1 Thess. 5:23), which was an act of God, yet never apart from the believer's self-discipline and patient seeking. He refused to define this perfection as 'sinless', and ejected extreme perfectionists from his *Methodist societies, yet he did believe that loving God with a pure heart necessarily implied a cleansing from sinful self-love. Wesley's doctrine was rejected by his Calvinist allies in the eighteenth-century Awakening.

In the nineteenth century, Wesley's teaching partly inspired the '*holiness' or 'higher-life' movement, which lacked the sophistication and balance of his thought and was strongly criticized by B. B. *Warfield of Princeton. Within American Methodism, this was propagated by a doctor's wife, Mrs Phoebe *Palmer, whose 'altar theology' and emphasis on consecration constituted what she regarded as a 'shorter way' to entire sanctification. Across the denominations, the holiness movement was also influenced by the teaching of Charles *Finney, the American revivalist, that the 'baptism of the Spirit' which the disciples received as a 'second blessing' on the day of Pentecost brought them to 'perfection'. This had a strong influence on William and Catherine Booth of the *Salvation Army and on Robert and Hannah Pearsall Smith, whose teaching led to the Keswick movement. But there the influence of Finney was barely detectable. Leading speakers at the annual Keswick Convention included Anglicans such as Bishop H. C. G. Moule, Presbyterians such as Andrew Murray and Baptists such as Graham Scroggie. In the early twentieth century, the Keswick movement came to dominate evangelical Christianity in the English-speaking world and the modern missionary movement, but it is doubtful if it is rightly described as 'perfectionist'. Unlike the patristic and medieval tradition, and unlike Wesley, its focus was not so much on the positive – perfection understood as mature, wholehearted, undivided love for God and neighbour – as on the negative aspect of victory over sin through a decisive act of faith and consecration. Finney's doctrine of the 'baptism of the Spirit' was also to lead eventually to the development of *Pentecostalism, but the idea of relative perfection as 'perfect love' was largely lost in this movement too.

Bibliography

M. de Dreuille, Seeking the Absolute Love: The Founders of Christian Monasticism (New York, 1999); R. N. Flew, The Idea of Perfection in Christian Theology (Oxford, 1934); A. H. Francke, 'On Christian Perfection', in P. C. Erb (ed.), Pietists: Selected Writings (London, 1983), pp. 114–116; C. E. Jones, Perfectionist Persuasion: The Holiness Movement in American Methodism, 1869–1936 (Metuchen, 1974); W. C. Kostlevy (ed.), Historical Dictionary of the Holiness Movement (Lanham and London, 2001); H. A. Luckman and L. Kulzer (eds.), Purity of Heart in Early Ascetic and Monastic Literature (Collegeville, 1999); B. B. Warfield, Perfectionism (Philadelphia, 1967); J. Wesley, 'A Plain Account of Christian Perfection', Works, vol. 13 (Nashville, 2013), pp. 132–191.

T. A. NOBLE

PERICHORESIS, see TRINITY

PERKINS, WILLIAM (1558–1602)

William Perkins has been regarded as the father of Puritanism and the greatest of all *Puritan theologians. In fact, he remained a committed member of the established *Church of England all his life, and condemned separatism in strong terms while also advocating tolerance of *Presbyterian polity within the national church. His theological influence in his day was remarkable: he was named alongside *Calvin and *Beza as one of the three writers most read by 'the godly' in England; his works were rapidly translated into Dutch, German, French, Welsh, Czech and Polish, and had an enduring influence in New England. His Arte of Propheying was the standard homiletic textbook of Puritan preachers for a century or more; his Golden Chaine was an enduringly popular summary of the supralapsarian Calvinist scheme (see *Predestination).

Perkins begins the Golden Chaine with the claim, 'Theology is the science of living blessedly forever.' This quotation emphasizes the practical concern of his work, which spanned an extraordinary range of subjects (ranging from biblical exposition through doctrinal theology and ecclesiastical controversy to pastoral advice, casuistry, and even a discussion of witchcraft), but was always devoted to calling the Christian to live up to his or her profession. His theology was careful, but his expression adapted to understanding, at least by the university congregations to which he spoke. Perkins's works were generally the text of lectures or sermons given in St Andrew's Church in Cambridge, where he held a lectureship from 1585 to the end of his life.

He emphasized practical *holiness as the natural life of the true Christian, and the primary evidence of our own election. (His several works on ethical dilemmas, which began and shaped the Puritan tradition of casuistry, stemmed from this emphasis.) He was capable, however, of powerful evangelistic appeal, and of pressing the mercy of Christ to those who found themselves wanting in evidence of *sanctification. His theological method was *Ramistic, and he extended this into his advice for preachers.

Although his career was relatively short, his reputation, coupled with his strategic location in a university town, ensured that he influenced many, including such eminent successors as William *Ames and Richard *Sibbes. When the Church of England became less tolerant after his death, and the self-consciously Puritan movement was born, Perkins's writings shaped much of its thought and practice.

Bibliography

Works: there is no modern critical edition; the best of the older editions remains Workes, 3 vols. (Cambridge, 1608–09).

Studies: D. K. McKim, Ramism in William Perkins' Theology (New York, 1987); P. R. Schaefer, 'Protestant "Scholasticism" at Elizabethan Cambridge: William Perkins and a Reformed Theology of the Heart', in C. R. Trueman and R. S. Clark (eds.), Protestant Scholasticism: Essays in Reassessment (Carlisle, 1999).

S. R. HOLMES

PERSEVERANCE

The doctrine of the perseverance of the *saints in *Reformed theology teaches that true believers will certainly keep their faith to the end through all tests and temptations, and will finally enter into heaven. It is argued that this salvation cannot be lost because it is grounded, not in human action but in the sovereign action of God and that it follows logically from the nature of the believer's union with Christ and from his or her *justification. A great deal of NT teaching is drawn together to support such a position, not least those passages which emphasize God's free *grace towards sinners and those passages which insist that no-one can pluck the believer from God's hand nor separate the believer from the love of God in Christ Jesus.

This doctrine of perseverance can be traced back to Augustine, but it came to full expression in the Calvinistic strand of the Protestant Reformation, being affirmed in some of the Reformed confessions and catechisms, not least in the Westminster Confession of Faith. *Luther was equivocal about perseverance because of the tension in his thought on grace and law, but *Calvin clarified and consolidated the Augustinian doctrine, tracing all the effective stages of Christian life to the 'pre-destination of glory'.

The doctrine was codified at the Synod of *Dordrecht in 1618–19, in response to the theology of Jacobus Arminius. After *Arminius died in 1609, his supporters issued a five-point 'Remonstrance' in 1610, arguing for a stronger place for the human will in Reformed theology. The Synod was called in order to respond to these 'Remonstrants' and did so by producing five points of its own (see *Dort, canons of). The first point concerns total depravity, not arguing that human beings are as bad as they could be, but that every human being is a *sinner, estranged from God, with a sinful nature. The second point affirms God's unconditional election of some sinners to *salvation. The third point is that Jesus Christ died on the *cross specifically for that 'elect' group of sinners and for no others. The fourth point concerns the means used by God to effect this salvation, namely, his irresistible grace in effectual calling. The fifth point is the perseverance of the saints, demonstrating that what God has started he will complete.

This doctrine of perseverance has not been unopposed, since there are a number of biblical passages which seem to envisage a possible falling away from salvation, especially in the letter to the Hebrews. Reformed theologians have tended to explain these in context as warnings against a superficial Christianity, or as purely hypothetical arguments ad hominem, or as urgings to seek a surer ground in holiness for Christian confidence.

Those opposed to the tenet of final perseverance, including Arminians, *Roman Catholics and the Wesleyan strand of *Methodism, often take this stance out of concern for the biblical emphasis upon the contingency of final salvation, believing that the doctrine may encourage complacency. If it has any evils, however, it has been the provoking of excessive preoccupation with assurance of final perseverance. In general, the result of the Calvinist conviction has not been lack of zeal, any more than non-Calvinists have, on the whole, lacked a strong Christian hope. The purpose of the teaching in the NT is to direct attention away from the always incomplete nature of Christian experience to the complete faithfulness and reliability of the God of all grace, and to strengthen the believer for the conflict with sin in the service of God. It emphasizes that the ultimate destiny of the Christian is achieved by God's grace through an enduring *faith.

See also: PREDESTINATION.

Bibliography

G. C. Berkouwer, Faith and Perseverance (Grand Rapids, 1958); W. Edgar, Truth in All Its Glory (Phillipsburg, 2004); R. L. Reymond, A New Systematic Theology of the Christian Faith (Nashville, 1998); Westminster Confession of Faith, ch. 17.

A. T. B. MCGOWAN

PERSONALISM

Personalism is a worldview, which posits the person as ultimate in *ontology (being) and axiology (value). Mostly personalism has been *theistic, but occasionally atheistic (e.g. J. M. E. McTaggart). Christian personalism argues that God as personal is ultimate in ontology and axiology, and that human persons, created as they are in the divine image, are penultimate in ontology and axiology.

Defining 'person' is philosophically very difficult and controversial. Minimally, one can say that a sufficient condition for personhood is the capacity to say 'I' as a self-conscious speech agent. In the canonical presentation, Father, Son and Holy Spirit are such speech agents (the Father in Matt. 3:17, the Son in John 17:1 and the Holy Spirit in Acts 13:2). Persons are 'thous', not 'its'. On this view, Christian personalism maintains that the one *God is personal in three self-consciously distinct but inseparable ways as the eternal *Trinity: one God in three Persons.

Christian personalism, when consciously informed by a trinitarian understanding of God, prizes relationships, since ultimate reality consists of Persons-in-relation: the eternal dance of love, which is Trinity. Christian personalism is not individualistic. Because of the high value placed on persons, Christian personalism ought to express itself in a concern and advocacy for the well-being of persons and their relations: a culture of life rather than a culture of death. Historically speaking, distinct forms of personalism have arisen in more than one place (e.g. Europe, Britain and the US). Personalism of whatever precise stamp resists any reductionist understanding of humankind, whether secular (e.g. humans are merely the highest kind of primate) or religious (e.g. *pantheism). Indeed, there is an argument that without the emergence of Christianity and its ideas of the triune God and Christ as the God-man, together with the shared view with Judaism of human beings as images of God, that personalism could not have arisen. The Roman Catholic tradition produced major modern personalists in John Paul II (Poland) and Emmanuel Mounier (France). In Britain, philosopher John Macmurray was an important personalist, and Borden Parker Bowne, Edgar Sheffield Brightman and Martin Luther King Jr were similarly important in the US.

Bibliography

R. Burrows, Jr, Personalism: A Critical Introduction (St Louis, 1999); J. Macmurray, The Form of the Personal, 2 vols. (London, 1995); P. A. Sayre, 'Personalism', in P. L. Quinn and C. Taliaferro (eds.), A Companion to Philosophy of Religion (Maldin and Oxford, 2000).

G. A. COLE

PHENOMENOLOGY

Philosophers have commonly distinguished between the objective world and consciousness of that objective world, and have viewed the latter, the phenomenal world, as being ontologically or epistemologically privileged. To take this view is to be an idealist. The distinction, which goes back to the Greeks, has played a central role in modern philosophy: in the work of *rationalists, such as *Descartes and in the work of empiricists, such as *Locke and *Hume. Its most celebrated exponent is Immanuel *Kant. However, although Kant's 'transcendental idealism' affirms a distinction between the 'phenomenal' and the 'noumenal' worlds, one of Kant's many famous contributions to philosophy was his 'Refutation of Idealism', his contention that knowledge claims concerning the phenomenal world necessarily presuppose knowledge of an objective world. By contrast, the twentieth-century school of thought which is called 'phenomenology' affirmed the primacy of the phenomenal world and attempted to construct a philosophy upon it.

Phenomenology is, therefore, a form of *idealism. It is a sustained attempt to describe experiences and phenomenal 'things themselves' without metaphysical speculation or commitment. In so doing, it rejects both naturalism, the attempt to study nature using the methods of the natural sciences, and psychologism, the collapsing of the normative discipline of logic into descriptive psychology, claiming to construct a distinctive science of consciousness rather than a science of material objects.

Kant's defence of a priori concepts in The Critique of Pure Reason, especially his contention that phenomenal description presupposes the integrity of a priori concepts, is as devastating when directed against phenomenology as when directed against Hume; and as recent work by Strawson and Stern demonstrate, the issue remains at the heart of contemporary *epistemology and *metaphysics.

Edmund Husserl (1859–1938) is viewed by many as the founder of the 'phenomenology' movement. Spells of his career spent at the universities of Halle, Göttingen and Freiberg marked significant milestones in his intellectual development.

When at Halle, he published his first major work on the philosophy of mathematics, On the Concept of Number (1887), which attempted to explain the synthetic unities of many-ness. These reduced to two: a physical unity, relating to the content of the mental representation; and an imposed psychical unity, based upon a unifying mental act that sets representational content into its various relationships. However, Husserl then went on to contrast with them a non-synthesized unity, the unity which is displayed by living organisms whose parts are continuous and come apart only in the process of analysis.

In Logical Investigations (1900) Husserl attacks 'psychologism' on the grounds that it treats logical relationships as being no different in kind from all other non-rational mental operations, mathematics thus collapsing into a branch of psychology. Timeless mathematical and logical principles would be transformed, in this account, into temporally instantiated and self-validating descriptions.

Husserl's third major work, Ideas 1 & 2 (1913 and 1952) sees the emergence of his transcendental phenomenology, his correlation of all forms of unity in a 'principle of principles'. The unity in question was not a unity of different elements, because, logically, prior to each kind of unity there is oneness which overrides individual subjectivity to reveal a form of trans-subjectivity which is at the heart of everything.

The intelligibility and coherence of Husserl's philosophy has been widely challenged, especially in the Anglo-American analytic tradition. To be successful, his account must show how the ego secures both the unity of the known object and the unity of the knowing subject. Even if his account of this is ultimately unsuccessful – as it shows only the possibility of the noetic project rather than its success in any particular case – it constitutes the most imaginative aspect of his later work.

Later writers in the phenomenological tradition have included Martin *Heidegger, Maurice Merleau-Ponty, Jacques *Derrida and Jean-Paul Sartre. Although sharing Husserl's general approach to philosophy, these writers developed key aspects of phenomenology in original and distinctive ways. Heidegger, for example, understood 'phenomenal reduction' *ontologically and in a way that reveals 'the Being of beings'. Since the things which are under analysis – numbers, relations, colours, people – differ greatly, their being differs also. He was led, therefore, to postulate a 'pre-ontological form of being' which is independent of our understanding of any of the specific beings under analysis. Sartre, sympathetic to central phenomenological theses, developed a distinctive account of intentionality. In particular, he rejects belief in an ego which synthesizes the experiences of a given subject. The unity of consciousness is achieved, rather, through the temporal structuring of experience.

These are only a few of the ways in which later writers, though in the phenomenological tradition, differed from Husserl over important issues.

Clearly, its practitioners believed that phenomenology has implications for all of the great branches of traditional philosophy: for metaphysics, logic, epistemology and *ethics. We should also note its interaction with the study of religion.

The phenomenology of religion seeks the meaning of *religion by focusing on experiential aspects of religion, especially the consciousness of the worshipper. Writers such as Rudolf Otto and Mircea Eliade (1907–86) have tried to study systematically the universal and transcendent aspects of sacred reality, aspects of reality which evoke dread, wonder and awe. They seek to exclude analysis or rational criticism from their accounts, and so their work might be regarded as a preliminary to *philosophy of religion rather than part of that discipline itself. This phenomenological approach to religion often provides the intellectual underpinning for writers in the traditions of *liberal theology and *postmodern Christianity.

Bibliography

M. Eliade, The Sacred and the Profane: The Nature of Religion, tr. W. Trask (London, 1959); E. Husserl, Logical Investigations, tr. J. N. Findlay (London, 1973); idem, The Essential Husserl, ed. D. Walton (Bloomington, 1999); R. Otto, The Idea of the Holy (London, 1958); B. Smith and D. W. Smith (eds.), The Cambridge Companion to Husserl (Cambridge, 1995); R. Stern, Transcendental Arguments and Scepticism (Oxford, 2000); P. F. Strawson, The Bounds of Sense (London, 1966).

H. BUNTING

PHILO (c. 20 BC – c. AD 50)

A Hellenistic Jew from Alexandria, Philo wrote through allegorical interpretation (see *Hermeneutics) of the Pentateuch and found the teachings of Plato and the Stoics already present in Moses' words. Philo's writings can be divided into what deals directly with the biblical text, and what does not. The latter include On The Contemplative Life (a treatise describing the *monastic practices of Therapeutae, who claimed they experienced the *vision of God), and Against Flaccus and The Legation to Gaius (documents dealing with anti-Jewish acts of Emperor Gaius Caligula). The writings on the biblical texts consist of major divisions entitled 'The Exposition of the Law' (considering e.g. the life of Moses, Abraham, the Decalogue and rewards and punishments), 'The Allegory of the Law' (a series of expositions from Genesis), and 'Questions and Answers' (re Genesis and Exodus).

Philo attempted to synthesize Greek philosophy with Hebrew thought. Here he is seen as a precursor of Christianity (see *Apologists; *Hellenization of Christianity; *Platonism). Yet this observation can be misleading. Philo's influence is far more important for later *Alexandrian Christianity (e.g. *Clement and *Origen) and for allegorical exegesis and theology than for the emergence of NT Christianity. Early Christianity's *Christological understanding of the OT is only superficially like Philo's exegesis; the NT's theology, for its newness, is not the amalgamation of two different worlds of ideas, Jewish and Greek, but is fully explainable within a Jewish framework alone.

Philo's goal is the practice of *religion, culminating in the *mystic vision of (and communion with) God. His eclectic appropriation of Greek philosophy attempts to communicate the truth of Judaism to his Hellenistic contemporaries. Basic to Philo's approach is the *dualism between material and non-material. The latter, the intelligible world, is ultimately all-important to Philo, who by allegorical exegesis presses consistently beyond the material, in understanding or conduct, to Plato's transcendent realm of Ideas. Philo borrows the Stoic '*Logos' concept to mediate between the transcendent God and the material world.

How Philo is related to Palestinian (rabbinic) Judaism and the NT writings is not clear. On the former, E. R. Goodenough alleged Philo's Judaism had become a Greek mystery religion; H. A. Wolfson maintained Philo held a form of Pharisaic Judaism. S. Sandmel is right: Philo is a representative of Hellenistic Judaism. Philo's possible relation to NT writings is even more complex. His influence upon the epistle of Hebrews is affirmed by some (Spicq), arguing that the author was Philo's student, although Williamson denies direct influence. With the 'Logos' prologue and frequent contrasting of material and spiritual, the Gospel of John is also described as influenced by Philo. Scholars also found parallels to Philo in Paul's epistles. Recognizing the enormous differences between Philo and the NT, however, the best conclusion is that no NT writing reflects direct dependence on Philo, and that observed similarities reflect instead the general milieu of Hellenistic ideas that pervaded the first-century Mediterranean world.

Bibliography

C. Anderson, Philo of Alexandria's Views of the Physical World (Tübingen, 2011); H. Chadwick, 'Philo and the Beginnings of Christian Thought', in CHLGEMP, pp. 137–192; idem, 'St Paul and Philo', BJRL (1965–66), pp. 286–307; E. R. Goodenough, An Introduction to Philo Judaeus (New Haven, 1940); S. Sandmel, Philo of Alexandria: An Introduction (Oxford, 1979); C. Spicq, 'Le philonisme de l'Épître aux Hébreux', RB 56 (1949), pp. 542–572; and 57 (1950), pp. 212–242; R. Williamson, Philo and the Epistle to the Hebrews (Leiden, 1970); H. A. Wolfson, Philo (Cambridge, MA, 1947).

D. A. HAGNER

PHILOSOPHICAL THEOLOGY

Philosophy is the critical examination of the meaning, *truth and grounds of ideas, and of the methods by which ideas are arrived at. *Philosophy of religion is the critical examination of religious ideas in general. By contrast, philosophical theology pursues such an examination of the ideas of a theology associated with a particular religion.

Philosophy is not a subject which has its own autonomous subject-matter, as does astronomy, biochemistry, English literature or international law. It is an ancillary discipline which examines the ideas, truth claims and methods practised in a discipline, and seeks to elucidate and evaluate their nature. Thus there is philosophy of science, behaviour (see *Ethics), art (see *Aesthetics), knowledge (see *Epistemology), *history, education, logic and religion. In each case philosophy is not a short cut to achieving the results otherwise arduously obtained in the discipline concerned. It is rather an attempt to clarify and reflect critically on what is entailed in the truth claims and methods of the discipline. Christian philosophical theology takes the Christian faith as its starting point and examines it philosophically.

Among the questions examined by philosophical theology are the following:

Grounds for belief in the existence of God. This includes discussion of the traditional arguments for the existence of God: the ontological, the cosmological, the teleological and the moral arguments (see *Natural theology). It also examines the nature and validity of appeals to experience and revelation (cf. *Religious experience; *Scripture) as well as the claim that belief in God is a necessary presupposition for making sense of the world and our experience. It takes account of arguments for *agnosticism and disbelief in God (cf. *Atheism).

The identity of God and God's relation with the world. This includes evaluation of the competing claims of *theism, *deism, *idealism, *pantheism and *panentheism.

Religious language. Discussion of the structure, meaning and use of *religious language has been a major preoccupation in philosophical theology since the advent of *logical positivism. However, the problem of using ordinary language to describe transcendent reality was a concern of the Neoplatonists (see *Platonism) and the medieval thinkers. Logical positivism claimed that religious language is meaningless, since it is not open to verification in the way that scientific claims are verifiable. This gave rise to much discussion of *verification, falsification and ways of testing meaning and truth claims. Even scientific claims are not always strictly verifiable. Words for God are not literally true, since God is not an object in time and space. Meaningful talk about God presupposes *analogy rather than direct literal correspondence. Recent investigation into religious language has drawn attention to the richness of its variety and use, and to the complexity of symbolism.

History and religion. This includes the way God may be thought of as acting in history, the question of *miracles, and the clarification of the distinction between history and *myth.

Revelation, faith and reason. This includes discussion of *revelation as a form of knowledge, the role of *faith in cognition, assent, trust and interpretation, and the role of reason in apprehending, discerning and explaining (see *Epistemology).

Evil. How can the existence of physical and moral *evil be reconciled with belief in an almighty, loving God (cf. *Theodicy)?

Freedom. In what sense may we speak of freedom and free will, in the light of theological considerations concerning the sovereignty of God and philosophical considerations concerning human beings who are products of their physical environment and whose activities are capable of explanation in terms of physical processes?

Human identity. Are human beings more than bodies? What is meant by the mind, the self and the soul? What is the relationship between the brain and the mind and between the body and the self?

Life after death. What grounds are there for belief in life after *death, and what are its possible forms (cf. *Resurrection, general)?

Prayer. What sort of an activity is *prayer? What are the logic and implications of intercessory and other forms of prayer?

The relation of Christianity to other faiths. This includes examination of the conflicting truth claims of different religions and ways of testing them.

In recent decades, there have been particular developments in thinking about the grounds for belief in the existence of God. Basil Mitchell debated the philosophical merits of theism with the atheists R. M. Hare and Antony Flew, and was succeeded as Nolloth Professor of the Christian Religion at Oxford by Richard Swinburne. Both developed the ‘cumulative case’ for the existence of God. Swinburne was interested in probability theory, and wrote a series of monographs devoted to miracles, the coherence of theism, the probability of God’s existence, the problem of evil, evolution of the soul, revelation, atonement, and the divinity of Jesus. Alvin *Plantinga and Nicholas Wolterstorff were associated with Calvin College, Michigan, where they developed a school of philosophical theology known as ‘Reformed epistemology’, building on the thought of Thomas Reid, the ‘common sense’ philosopher of the Scottish Enlightenment. Along with William Alston, they launched the journal, Faith and Philosophy. Wolterstorff developed a theory of knowledge, which examined the roles of data beliefs, data-background beliefs, and control beliefs in science and religion.

Bibliography

C. Brown, Philosophy and the Christian Faith (London, 1969); O. Crisp, A Reader in Contemporary Philosophical Theology (London, 2009); O. Crisp and M. Rea (eds.), Analytic Theology: New Essays in the Philosophy of Theology (Oxford, 2009); C. S. Evans, Philosophy of Religion (Downers Grove, 1985); A. Flew and A. MacIntyre (eds.), New Essays in Philosophical Theology (London, 1955); T. Flint and M. Rae, The Oxford Handbook of Philosophical Theology (Oxford, 2009); N. L. Geisler, Philosophy of Religion (Grand Rapids, 1974); J. Hick, Faith and Knowledge (London, 2nd 1966); idem, Philosophy of Religion (Englewood Cliffs, 3rd 1983); idem (ed.), Classical and Contemporary Readings in the Philosophy of Religion (Englewood Cliffs, 2nd 1970); B. S. Mitchell, The Justification of Religious Belief (London, 1973); idem (ed.), The Philosophy of Religion (London, 1973); A. Plantinga, God and Other Minds (Ithaca, 1967/90); idem, The Nature of Necessity (Oxford, 1974); idem, God, Freedom, and Evil (Grand Rapids, 1974); idem, Warranted Christian Belief (Oxford, 2000); M. Rea (ed.), Oxford Readings in Philosophical Theology, Vol. 1: Trinity, Incarnation and Atonement (Oxford, 2009); idem, (ed.), Oxford Readings in Philosophical Theology, Vol. 2: Providence, Scripture and Resurrection (Oxford, 2009); N. Smart, Philosophers and Religious Truth (London, 2nd 1969); R. Swinburne, The Coherence of Theism (Oxford, 1977); idem, The Existence of God (Oxford, 1979); idem, Faith and Reason (Oxford, 1981); K. Ward, God and the Philosophers (Minneapolis, 2009); N. Wolterstorff, Reason within the Bounds of Religion (Grand Rapids, 1976/84); idem, Thomas Reid and the Story of Epistemology (Cambridge, 2001); idem, Inquiring about God: Selected Essays, vol. I; Practices of Belief: Selected Essays, vol. II, ed. T. Cuneo (Cambridge, 2009); N. Wolterstorff and A. Plantinga (eds.), Faith and Rationality: Reason and Belief in God (Notre Dame, 1984); K. E. Yandell, Christianity and Philosophy (Leicester and Grand Rapids, 1984).

C. BROWN

PHILOSOPHY AND THEOLOGY

In the Christian tradition there are arguably three dominant tendencies for relating philosophy to theology: the reparative, the synthetic and the analytic. Reparative reasoning uses philosophy to interrogate *Scripture with the goal of healing the world. Synthetic reasoning brings philosophy and *theology together to illuminate each other’s concerns, in the course of faith seeking understanding. Analytic reasoning tends to separate philosophy and theology in order to discover what each can achieve independently of the other. Rarely is any one of these tendencies present to the exclusion of the others. It is a matter of which tendency is dominant.

The reparative approach is dominant in *Augustine. Augustine confronted a series of problems in the church (Pelagianism, Donatism) and used philosophy as a method for interpreting Scripture in ways that addressed those problems. Augustine makes full use of the range of philosophical tools learned from *Platonic and ancient *Stoic philosophy to develop an account of the signs of Scripture that enables him to use Scripture to solve ecclesial problems. Scripture provides the patterns of reasoning and narrative that constitute the deepest resources for human action, and philosophy provides the logical tools for learning those patterns and deploying them in new and unfamiliar situations.

The synthetic approach is also present in Augustine, who claimed, 'I believe so as to understand', but is particularly intensely displayed in the thought of *Anselm of Canterbury, who coined the term 'faith seeking understanding', and of *Thomas Aquinas. Anselm's *ontological argument for the existence of God is one of the most famous examples of the synthetic approach, where prayerful naming of God is combined with intricate logical argumentation. Aquinas' project of bringing Augustinian theology into relation with *Aristotelian metaphysics is one of the most influential intellectual syntheses in the history of Western thought. Aquinas' most famous synthetic argument is his so-called 'five ways' which answer the question 'whether God exists', bringing Aristotelian styles of reasoning to bear on Exod. 3:14: 'I AM WHO I AM'. Aquinas thought of the relation between philosophy and theology as something like Jesus' transformation of water into wine at the wedding at Cana. Philosophical water accomplishes a certain amount, and can even lead the inquiring mind to infer 'that' God exists. It is consummated by theological wine that fills the mind with grace in such a way that one can know analogically 'what' is meant when one refers to God.

The analytic approach is present in Augustine insofar as he differentiates types of credibilia, or 'things to be believed' (e.g. history, mathematics, theology), and charts different modes of reasoning that accompany them. It is also present in Aquinas insofar as he addresses the question 'whether God can be known in this life by natural reason'. It is more vigorously pursued by John *Duns Scotus and *William of Ockham. Duns Scotus investigated very thoroughly the question of what degree of 'natural' knowledge of God can be acquired by the wayfarer who does not consult Scripture, compared with the believer's 'supernatural' knowledge of God that comes from reading Scripture. Duns Scotus developed subtle arguments attempting to demonstrate that the wayfarer can know that God is infinite. Moreover, unlike Aquinas, who, developing Henry of Ghent, claimed that speech about God is analogically related to speech about creatures, Duns Scotus argued against Henry that all analogy rests on some root univocal use of concepts. These two tendencies combine to produce an approach that develops complex patterns of reasoning about God that do not require commentary on Scripture. William of Ockham strongly separated the results of philosophical reasoning from those of theology. He claimed that 'natural' reasoning could not demonstrate the existence, unity or infinity of God. These can only be known by 'supernatural' knowledge. There is a tendency in Ockham to protect the fruits of supernatural knowledge from the scrutiny of human reasoning. In this he went significantly further than either Aquinas or Duns Scotus.

The modern period, inaugurated by *Descartes and *Spinoza, saw a thoroughgoing privileging of analytic over synthetic and reparative approaches to philosophy. Descartes' method of doubt in the Meditations tends to rule out appeal to Scripture, and seeks a point of certainty independent of tradition or faith. Spinoza's principal target in the Tractatus Logico-Politicus is any reparative approach to philosophy and Scripture, and he argues strongly that Scripture teaches only obedience to God, not knowledge. Faith is distinct and separate from philosophy. Of the two figures, Spinoza is the more consistent. The names of God Descartes eventually introduces in the Meditations are largely inherited from scholastic Aristotelian theology. Spinoza's own account of 'God or nature' in the Ethics is a significantly more austere and radical rethinking of the category of substance.

The synthetic approach by no means disappears in the modern period. *Locke wrote The Reasonableness of Christianity (1695) in which he attempted to show the harmony of philosophical and scriptural reasonings. *Leibniz wrote Principles of Nature and of Grace, based on Reason (1714), in which an attempt is made to illuminate theological topics using his own refined philosophical tools of ‘necessary truths’. One can also argue that *Hegel’s late ‘eternal idea of God’ or Schelling’s late ‘potencies of God’ are likewise synthetic approaches to philosophy and theology.

It is arguably not until the twentieth century that one sees in Christian theology a significant embrace of reparative approaches that were eclipsed in the modern period. The theology of Karl *Barth is notable for its use of philosophical tools learned from *Kant and Hegel (and their heirs) to interpret Scripture in order to address serious political problems in the world (national socialism, certain forms of capitalism). Dietrich *Bonhoeffer’s unfinished Ethics likewise brings philosophical tools to bear on the book of Genesis, in a striking way, in order to repair problems relating to knowledge of the good in the context of national socialism.

The contemporary university hosts a mixture of reparative, synthetic and analytic approaches. *Systematic theology tends to combine reparative and synthetic approaches. *Philosophical theology tends to combine synthetic and analytic approaches. The *philosophy of religion tends to privilege analytic approaches, although not exclusively. The decisive factor tends to be the training of a particular thinker, and the anticipated readership’s standards of what counts as a respectable argument.

Bibliography

T. V. Morris (ed.), Philosophy and the Christian Faith (Notre Dame, 1988); Philosophy and Theology: Marquette University Journal, vol. 1 (1989) to present.

N. ADAMS

PHILOSOPHY OF RELIGION

The philosophy of religion is to be distinguished from both *philosophical theology and *apologetics. Unlike philosophical theology, which is concerned with ontological and logical reflection on the doctrine of God, the philosophy of religion is concerned with religion as a pervasive feature of human nature and *culture. And unlike the apologist, the aim of the philosopher of religion is to understand and evaluate religion from a philosophical standpoint rather than to defend belief in God, or a particular religion, by philosophical argument. Yet the three areas are sometimes intertwined, as in Aquinas’s Summa Contra Gentiles, for example.

Sometimes ‘religion’ is used in a wide sense, to include all that any person values basically or unreservedly. So Marxism and *atheistic *materialism are sometimes dubbed ‘religions’ in this sense. However, the philosopher of religion is usually not concerned with religion in this broadest of senses, but in those religions which involve belief in God or gods.

Scope

It is important to note that the ‘philosophy of religion’ simply denotes the application of the methods, problems and conclusions of the philosophical tradition going back to classical times. It is not a separate philosophy with its own doctrines and standards of argumentation, but endeavours to apply the rich tradition of Western philosophy to issues in *religion.

Religion involves sets of human subjective states, for example, acts of worship, religious belief, moral convictions, the whole range of phenomena that comprise ‘*religious experience’, from visions to convictions. These may give rise to claims about how things are. These are of interest to the philosopher of religion: how are things according to this individual or that religious tradition? And on what basis does he or she believe that things are like this? By what kind of appeal – to direct experience perhaps, or divine revelation or human reason and experience at the most general level? If they are like this – there’s the claim that there’s a God, or gods – how does this relate to other things we have reasonable beliefs or deep convictions about? How does God relate to the cosmos, or to morality, or to science?

Such enquiries involve investigations of two different kinds. There are conceptual enquiries. What does it mean to say that someone has seen a vision, or that a miracle has occurred, or that God exists and is infinitely wise? What any of these things means is partly a matter of the logical implications of claims made in particular propositions. Is saying that God exists like saying that there is a moon? Is God an object in space? If so, where is he located? If he is not in space (or time) how is his existence to be understood? Does he exist like an abstract object – goodness or beauty, say? But God acts.

Do goodness and beauty act? Is a 'miracle' the name we give to an event we cannot explain? What if there came to be a physical explanation of 'the miracle of the resurrection'? Would it cease to be a miracle?

What is religious belief? Is it like the belief that I have a left hand? Or is it more like a wager, a leap in the dark? But perhaps religious sentences are not truth-bearing, not cognitive, but emotive or expressive. 'Meaning' may be discovered in another, though related, sense, by enquiring how religion in its various elements (its symbols, utterances, practices) functions within a religion. The relation between these two senses of meaning – meaning as truth-conditions, and meaning as personal or communal significance – is itself a matter of philosophical controversy. In asking such questions, the philosopher of religion is endeavouring to understand the basic categories and commitments of religion and its associated theology.

Central to religion, and certainly to the Christian religion, are moral claims. How are these related to God? Is he subordinate to the values of a religion, simply endorsing them? Or is he superior to them? If he is superior to them, ought anything commanded by God to be obeyed? Would adultery (for example) be morally permissible if God allowed it? Could God allow it? Or is God, as an aspect of his perfection, the exemplar of moral perfection and so could not will what was at odds with that?

Besides analysing the concepts and propositions of religion in an effort to gain insight into what they mean, the philosopher of religion is also concerned about how one might reasonably be said to believe or to know that some religious claim is true or false. Here, if not before, it becomes apparent that 'the philosophy of religion' is not a distinctive kind of philosophy, but simply the main spine of philosophical interest – logic, metaphysics, epistemology, ethics – as applied to religion. Three broad answers to epistemological questions posed by religion are discernible, though these are not exclusive of each other.

Certain religious claims may be known by reason alone, by rational reflection on the concept of God (e.g. *Anselm) or by argumentation from propositions known to be true by any rational man (e.g. *Aquinas, *Locke). The main issues which arise here are over the place and legitimacy of such *natural theology, its tendency to *rationalism, and issues about the validity, soundness and strength of particular arguments.

Second, it may be claimed that God can be directly experienced, through personal encounter, vision or inspiration, or by rational reflection upon some aspect of experience. The problems concern the ambiguity or the adequacy of experience alone to provide reasonable grounds for believing that a transcendent ground of that experience exists.

A third approach is '*fideistic'. At one extreme this may be unthinking rationalism, and at the other a reliance upon the will (and not the intellect), because the issues of religion are important and yet the evidence from reason or sense experience is ambiguous, and the issues too important to be left unresolved. There may be reasons for having no reasons.

These epistemological concerns about the justification of knowledge-claims, including claims to know truths about God, have been much more dominant since the seventeenth century than they were up to the medieval period, when the reliability of reason and the senses were taken for granted, and when the authority of the church was largely unquestioned.

Such approaches have often had one common assumption, that the rationality of religious belief must be grounded in considerations which are common to all rational people. This – an assumption of the *Enlightenment – has been recently questioned by the 'Reformed' epistemologists, notably by Alvin *Plantinga. They argue that the Enlightenment requirements are not self-evidently true, and that a person is entitled (under certain conditions) to believe what is not self-evidently true to any rational person. In this connection it is interesting to note that both Anselm's ontological argument and Aquinas's 'Five Ways' were offered within the context of Christian belief, and not as providing a necessary condition of the rationality of such belief.

Immanuel *Kant initiated an important watershed in the philosophy of religion by his constructivist and anti-realist approach to metaphysical issues. Kant dismissed all natural or rational theology because in his view the very questions it raised, and the mode of argumentation, marked an illegitimate extension of human powers beyond their rational boundaries. For Kant, the existence of God could not be learned: it is a 'postulate' of the pure practical reason, not a discovery but a requirement of the rationality of morality, offering assurance that true morality will issue in true happiness. Kant's position became important and influential in post-Kantian *Protestant theology from *Ritschl to *Barth. It is also a precondition of the individualism, scepticism and communitarianism of much *postmodern philosophy.

In general, the Christian tradition has sought to occupy the middle ground between two extremes. On the one hand, in the interests of preserving the integrity of special revelation it has resisted rationalistic or a priori philosophical approaches which would reconstruct or reduce that revelation in order to conform it to some alien philosophical doctrine, and thus to eliminate the sacred mysteries of the faith. On the other hand, in the interests of being able to consider the rationality of the faith, and particularly the reasonableness of belief in God, irrationalistic attitudes have generally also been resisted. In the middle of these extremes is the broad path of 'faith seeking understanding', a programme reckoned to have been initiated by Augustine of Hippo and frequently adopted (though variously understood) since then. Anselm and Aquinas follow this tradition, as do the Magisterial Reformers, especially *Calvin, insofar as they consider the interface between theology and philosophy, and other notable thinkers such as Jonathan *Edwards.

Contemporary emphases

Much philosophy of religion in the twentieth century was dominated by the attack on *metaphysics by *logical positivists. It was alleged that theological sentences stated matters which were unverifiable or unfalsifiable empirically, and hence cognitively meaningless, which carried the consequence that religious language would not be truth-bearing. The latter decades of that century saw a rapid decline in positivism's influence, due largely to the weight of its own internal difficulties, and consequently a shift away from interest in the nature and function of *religious language. As a consequence, metaphysics has been reinstated as a legitimate philosophical enquiry, and essentialism has returned. One consequence has been the rekindling of philosophical interest in the metaphysics of theism, not only in the 'proofs' but in the entire range of theological claims of Judeo-Christianity: the nature of God, the relation between God and the creation, incarnation and the Trinity, and so forth. In fact, while the traditional stance and interests of the philosophy of religion, as mentioned above, have not gone away, they have tended to be eclipsed by a return to the 'faith seeking understanding' stance of the patristic and medieval periods.

The problem of evil

Philosophical attacks on religion have centred upon the problem of *evil. It is argued that since the existence of evil is incompatible with the existence of an essentially benevolent and all-powerful God, then such a God does not exist. Various strategies have been offered in response. For example, that there is no logical inconsistency between the existence of God and the existence of evil if men and women have libertarian freedom, since it is then up to them, and not up to God, whether there is evil, at least whether there is moral evil. (This is a 'defence' against the charge of inconsistency, rather than a full-blown *theodicy.) Others argue for a 'greater-good' defence either in terms of human 'soul-making', or in more traditionalist terms. The divine permission of a world containing moral evil is a necessary condition of the greater good of human *redemption through Christ. Such approaches are not inconsistent and so may be combined with each other to present a cumulative case. Sometimes greater-good defences are accused of adopting an ethic in which the end justifies the means.

Justification

Can the philosophy of religion be justified as a legitimate area of interest for the Christian? The Christian scholar, like it or not, must take an interest in philosophical issues because of the influence of philosophy – of Neoplatonism, or Aristotle, or Kant, to look no further – on the historical development of theology. But besides this historical enquiry, what of the activity of philosophy itself?

As noted, the current scene is marked by much less hostility to historical Christianity than a couple of generations ago. Although the philosopher's questions, 'What do you mean?' and 'How do you know?', when applied to the Christian faith, may be taken as sceptical challenges to it, they need not only be understood in this way, but rather as invitations to reflect rationally upon how the statements and other utterances of a developed religion are to be understood, and how they are to be justified. Paradoxically, it is the rich interplay between philosophy and theology throughout the Christian centuries that makes possible continued philosophical reflection on the faith. Yet the Bible, together with the main *creeds and *confessions of the church, are underdetermined both in their meaning and their truth claims when measured by current standards of philosophical rigour. The Bible is not a textbook of the natural sciences, and nor is it a textbook in metaphysics or epistemology (see *Scripture). It is best to think of the Bible as setting parameters. Within these broad but definite limits it is up to the church and the individual Christian to articulate the faith philosophically as best they can, using the resources of philosophy in an eclectic manner and not allowing the faith to be 'captured' by some prevailing philosophical fashion or unduly influenced by it.

Bibliography

B. Davies (ed.), Philosophy of Religion: A Guide and Anthology (Oxford, 2000); P. Helm, Faith and Understanding (Edinburgh, 1997); A. Plantinga, God, Freedom and Evil (London, 1974); idem, Warranted Christian Belief (New York, 2000); P. Quinn and C. Taliaferro (eds.), A Companion to the Philosophy of Religion (Oxford, 1997); R. Swinburne, The Existence of God (Oxford, 1979); C. Taliaferro, Contemporary Philosophy of Religion (Oxford, 1998).

P. HELM

PIETISM

Albrecht *Ritschl saw Pietism as a deviation from *Reformation Christianity, but it is more balanced to view it as a renewal movement within Germany and beyond, and with that, a missionary movement with room for women's initiatives. Though beginning in the late sixteenth century, it was carried on through the nineteenth and twentieth centuries by great leaders such as Mencken, *Beck and Blumhardt. Martin Brecht thinks the Bible is the indispensable connection between them by providing a 'meta-history' for the people of God which transcends historical contingencies. The canonical message is more than the mere kerygma of justification by faith, but includes guidance by the inspired reading and preaching of the Bible, allegiance to a community and dedication to a priesthood of believers. Yet most Pietists (the label attached to followers of Spener and Francke) would have distanced themselves from the so-called 'radical Pietism' of J. *Boehme and even the Holy Spirit experience of Zinzendorf's *Moravians (Herrnhuter).

One can speak of a pre-Reformation *mystical influence (e.g. Angela of Foligno, Thomas à Kempis and the Theologia Deutsch, which is thought to be written by Tauler) at work on Johann Arndt (1555–1622). He was a prophet of 'interior Protestantism' (A. Schweitzer). His most famous book was True Christianity, in which he calls the reader to follow Christ and allow his indwelling, all in a spirit of sober penitence and sanctification through prayer as conversation. Life was a process of rebirth. Faith, not learning, was the only source of all true virtues. One is to learn to know to hate the inherited abomination of original sin and his helpless misery, to ascribe all to Christ so that he may work all things by indwelling in the believer. If one cannot take up the cross with joy, one should at least take it up with humility and find interior rest as the Sabbath of God. Arndt's follower Johann Gerhard (1582–1637) believed that *spirituality and scholastic theology (see *Orthodoxy/Scholasticism, Lutheran) could be complementary. Gerhard's attempt to replace Arndt with his own textbook Schola Pietatis failed, yet his Sacred Meditations had more than 100 editions during the seventeenth century.

P. J. Spener (1635–1705) held Arndt as the one through whom the Reformation had come to fruition. Spener saw the task of dragging people out of atheism as beyond the powers of doctrine and orthodoxy, although he was indebted to English *Puritan writers and their belief in the verbal inspiration of Scripture. He encouraged believers to seek a 'new birth' with less of Arndt's sombre intensity, more on the joy of Christian life, and a call to the Christian that Christ be in us as well as for us. For Spener the Bible was certain, clear, intelligible and perfect, with an inner power, so that reading the Bible should stimulate a conversation with God, asking for guidance and receiving his answer. Central along with conversion came rediscovery of the Bible (and third, eschatological fervour, with a belief in better times for the church just ahead). He formed small (twice-weekly) meetings while remaining loyal to the Lutheran Church and encouraging regular Communion attendance and Sunday observance.

Spener had to leave Strasbourg for Frankfurt in 1665 when he came under suspicion of being a Calvinist. With him the Bible returned as the book of edification along with a new belief in the efficacy of *Scripture in the place of the Lutheran catechisms. Divine power resided in the reading of the Bible to which the medieval mystic Tauler had pointed. Bible study should not just be for learned theologians. His main work, Pia Desideria (1675), insisted on communities of Bible readers. For his close colleague J. J. Schütz (1640–1690) the reality of putting biblical commands into practice convinced him of Christianity's truth, and that conversion needed to go on within the church. By the last four years of his life, when this seemed to be failing, he and his small community, fuelled with expectation of Christ's thousand-year reign on earth (chiliasm; see *Millennium), broke off relations with the Lutheran Church.

Whereas Spener was a mystical interpreter of Luther, viewing justification as *sanctification and as practice of piety, Francke, at the Pietist centre of Halle, stressed the ethical and legalistic side of the individual's great struggle before justification, followed by a great feeling that God had done a new work, along the lines of Paul's 'change' between Rom. 7 and 8. Ministerial candidates should give testimony of their conversion. According to John 7:17, when someone does God's will, then they would know whether that teaching comes from God. The work of J. A. Bengel (1687–1752) was to produce as near as possible the NT as it left the hands of NT Christians. He disliked the text-lottery method of the Moravians. His exegesis was practical, even to the point of encouraging later south-west German Pietists to emigrate in search of the fulfilment of salvation-history of which Bengel's Bible spoke.

Around 1800 a *catechism versus Bible battle was being fought within *Lutheranism. Although one could detect Reformed influences among Swiss Pietists, the doubts about the nature of the atonement in the mid-century more reflect the internationalization of the missionary pietistic movement. This turned those who had been receivers through the Anglo-Saxon Bible societies and the Keswick *holiness movement into providers of mission. The Deutsche Christentumsgesellschaft in Basel split off from the British and Foreign Bible Society in 1824. During this period of Awakening (Erweckungsbewegung) a new accent on pastoral care appeared against the background of political unrest, industrial revolution and the state church's failure to give answers, and the need for the simple faith of the laypeople to step up to the challenge with a duty to use their gifts. The term 'evangelization' of an organized sort was advanced at the Gnadauer Conference of 1888.

On the academic side, Hermann Cremer's 1897 Beiträge zur Förderung der christlichen Theologie was an important counterweight to German *liberal theology. The significance of Adolf *Schlatter and Martin *Kähler at the beginning of the twentieth century has become increasingly appreciated. According to Martin Brecht, Kähler saw himself as one who honoured the Bible, standing in a line from *Cocceius through Menken. A split from the Pentecostal Pietists over the issue of *gifts and the possibility of *perfection was sealed as early as 1909 (Berlin Conference). For most of those 'evangelical' mission and Bible Christians who are today's descendants of Pietism, and are strong in their community churches and missions (and also with an influence on the established ones), God has come into history by the Bible in terms of its effects on the lives of believers.

Bibliography

J. Arndt, True Christianity, tr. and introd. P. Erb (Mahwah, 1979); H. Lehmann (ed.), Geschichte des Pietismus, vol. 4 (Göttingen, 2004); C. Lindberg, The Pietist Theologians (Oxford, 2005); P. J. Spener, Pia Desideria, tr. T. G. Tappert (New York, 2002).

M. W. ELLIOTT

PINNOCK, CLARK (1937–2010)

Clark Pinnock was Professor of Theology at McMaster Divinity College in Hamilton, Ontario from 1977 to 2002. His doctoral studies were in NT with F. F. Bruce at Manchester and in his early career as a Southern Baptist theologian in the US. He defended the concept of biblical inerrancy (see *Infallibility and inerrancy of the Bible), which was modified later in The Scripture Principle (1984). His later works include The Flame of Love: A Theology of the Holy Spirit (1997). Pinnock's later career is best known, however, for his reaction against his earlier Calvinism. He came to the conclusion that the 'exclusivism' which he saw in the Augustinian-Calvinist tradition militated against the mission of the church, and, going beyond the classical *Arminian position, he became the leading advocate of "open" or ‘freewill’ theism. Since he continued to believe that God’s total foreknowledge and his absolute *predestination were logically tied together, he moved to a rejection of the former in order to deny the latter. This implied a reinterpretation of God’s omniscience: just as God’s omnipotence only meant that he could do whatever was logically possible, so his omniscience meant that he knew whatever was logically possible, and that did not include complete knowledge of the future. Open theism has been supported by biblical passages where God is said to change his mind, but it has been widely rejected as authentically *evangelical theology.

Bibliography

Works: A Wideness in God’s Mercy: The Finality of Jesus Christ in a World of Religions (Grand Rapids, 1992); Most Moved Mover (Carlisle and Grand Rapids, 2001).

Studies: B. L. Callen, Clark H. Pinnock: Journey Toward Renewal, An Intellectual Biography (Nappanee, 2000); D. Strange, ‘Clark H. Pinnock: The Evolution of an Evangelical Maverick’, EQ 71, 1999, pp. 327–348.

T. A. NOBLE

PLACHER, WILLIAM (1948–2008)

William Placher was a professor of *philosophy and religion at Wabash College. He is associated with the ‘*Yale theology’ of George *Lindbeck and Hans *Frei. This theology is self-described as *postliberal theology because it attempts to move beyond the commitments of nineteenth- and twentieth-century liberal theology. It is also a form of *narrative theology because of its view that the Bible’s narrative, and not experience or reason, is the foundation of theology and the source of our knowledge of God’s identity. Part of Placher’s agenda, accordingly, was to continue Karl *Barth’s project of liberating Christian theology from any subservience to philosophy (see *Philosophy and theology). Placher, therefore, rejected theology’s apologetic task, for apologetics has usually meant using philosophy to find common ground between the beliefs and values of the church and of the larger human community. For the same reason, his post-*foundationalist approach means the rejection of any attempt to secure theology’s claims on the basis of a rational and universally acceptable basis. However, Placher’s writings show concern about some of the implications of postliberal theology, especially its tendency to locate theological authority in the church instead of in the biblical text itself. He has also written about the need to recover the idea of truth in light of the spectre of *relativism raised by post-foundationalist theology.

Bibliography

Works: Unapologetic Theology: A Christian Voice in a Pluralistic Conversation (Louisville, 1989); Narratives of a Vulnerable God: Christ, Theology, and Scripture (Louisville, 1994); The Domestication of Transcendence: How Modern Thinking about God Went Wrong (1996); The Triune God: An Essay in Postliberal Theology (Louisville, 2007).

S. M. POWELL

PLANTINGA, ALVIN (b. 1932)

Alvin Plantinga is a prominent American philosopher, apologist and founding member of the Society of Christian Philosophers. He is John A. O’Brien Professor Emeritus at the University of Notre Dame, and inaugural holder of the Jellema chair in philosophy at his alma mater, Calvin College. Plantinga’s work in epistemology, *metaphysics and the *philosophy of religion has significantly shaped contemporary philosophical discussions.

A master of the methods of analytic philosophy, and deeply engaged in its central discussions, Plantinga identifies most deeply with the tradition of *Augustine, *Calvin and Abraham *Kuyper. Like them, he believes that all human thought and action spring from broadly religious motives, and that Christian academics should act accordingly. Hence he philosophizes unabashedly as a Christian, and often directly for the Christian community. His work includes excursions into *philosophical theology (e.g. Does God Have a Nature? and Warranted Christian Belief), which integrates discussion of sin, salvation, Scripture and the work of the Holy Spirit into discussion of the knowledge of God.

Plantinga’s *epistemology is developed in his 1987–8 *Gifford Lectures, since published as Warrant: The Current Debate and Warrant and Proper Function, and followed by Warranted Christian Belief. Knowledge, he argues, is best seen as warranted true belief, where warrant derives from the operation of properly functioning cognitive equipment designed to produce true beliefs. He goes on to claim that proper function, in biology or epistemology, makes sense only in the context of theism. From this he derives an argument to the effect that evolution, if true, makes theism rather than naturalism more likely ('Naturalism defeated').

Like Augustine and Calvin, Plantinga contends that it is natural for us to respond to divine revelation by believing in God; if not for the effects of *sin, we would do so immediately and with no need for argument. But since our sense of deity is clouded by sin, we need the testimony of the Holy Spirit working through the Scriptures to bring us to the knowledge of God. Plantinga fleshes these claims out within the context of contemporary epistemology. Partly because he believes them, he is less concerned to prove God's existence, or the truth of Christianity, than to defend Christian *theism against the charge that it is irrational or false.

However, Plantinga has produced theistic and anti-atheistic proofs, arguing that (1) belief in the existence of God is epistemologically on a par with belief in other minds, so that if the one is rationally justified, so is the other (God and Other Minds); (2) the ontological argument can be given a sound formulation: in brief, if a maximally perfect being could exist (and why think otherwise?), then such a being does exist (The Nature of Necessity); (3) God's omnipotence, omniscience and goodness are logically consistent with the existence of evil (God, Freedom and Evil), nor does the existence of evil render God's existence improbable ('The Probabilistic Argument from Evil'); (4) the existence of purpose in the natural world can only be explained by divine creation (Warrant and Proper Function).

Plantinga has also argued (Warrant and Proper Function) that if naturalism and evolution are both true, it is either unlikely or not rational to believe that our cognitive faculties are generally reliable. This, plus the argument from proper function to a designer, has made him popular with the advocates of Intelligent Design in the United States. Plantinga himself sees belief in evolution and Christian faith as compatible (see *Science and theology). Most of his polemics on this subject are not aimed at evolution per se, but at the naturalistic claim that the world is here by chance, with no God involved, and that this belief somehow follows from evolutionary theory. His recent reflections on science and Christian faith are enunciated in his 2005 Gifford Lectures, Science and Religion: Conflict or Concord?

Plantinga has been a very public apologist, frequently participating in public debates in defence of the rationality of theism. His interchange with Daniel Dennett has been published as Science and Religion: Are They Compatible? (Oxford, 2011). In 2012 the University of Pittsburgh's Departments of Philosophy, History and Philosophy of Science co-awarded Plantinga the Nicholas Rescher Prize for Contributions to Systematic Philosophy.

Bibliography

Works: God and Other Minds (Ithaca, 1967); God, Freedom and Evil (Grand Rapids, 1974); The Nature of Necessity (London, 1974); Does God Have a Nature? (Milwaukee, 1980); 'How to Be an Anti-Realist', Proceedings of the American Philosophical Society 56, 1982, pp. 47–70; Warrant: The Current Debate (Oxford, 1993); Warrant and Proper Function (Oxford, 1993); The Analytic Theist: An Alvin Plantinga Reader (Grand Rapids, 1998); Warranted Christian Belief (Oxford, 2000); Science and Religion: Are They Compatible? (with Daniel Dennett) (Oxford, 2011); Where the Conflict Really Lies: Science, Religion and Naturalism (Oxford, 2012); <http://www.calvin.edu/academic/philosophy/virtual_library/articles/plantinga_alvin/>.

Studies: J. E. Tomberlin and P. van Inwagen (eds.), Alvin Plantinga (Dordrecht, 1985).

D. W. CLOWNEY

PLATONISM

Platonism, the tradition of philosophy deriving from Plato of Athens (c. 429–347 BC), one of the most significant figures in the history of human thought, has had a major influence on Christian theology, especially through its last creative development, known as Neoplatonism.

Plato's work rests on the impressive life and death of his fellow-Athenian Socrates (469–399 BC), perhaps the first Greek thinker to devote critical philosophical attention to the bases of morality (and, for his adherence to conviction even unto death, the favourite pagan hero of early Christianity). For his last forty years, Plato taught at a grove outside Athens which gave the name 'the Academy' both to his school (which lasted until Justinian's final dissolution of pagan schools in AD 529) and to the Platonic tradition in general. He produced some twenty-five works, nearly all in dialogue form, with Socrates often a leading participant. The most significant for Christian thought come from his middle and later periods, notably the Phaedo, Republic, Timaeus and Laws.

True understanding is pursued by dialectical argument. The so-called Socratic method, best observed in Meno (and known from the Gk word as ‘maieutic’ because the philosopher acts as ‘midwife’), demonstrates that we have innate knowledge (epistēmē) of basic realities, awareness of which is elicited by question and answer, not imparted by teaching. By such reasoning we may attain explicit knowledge of the forms (ideai), one of Plato’s most distinctive contributions to philosophy. He emphasizes that sense experience yields only fallible opinion (doxa), not firm knowledge, for the observed world is in perpetual flux, and easily deceives. Behind the impermanent phenomena lie the changeless archetypal ‘forms’, the originals, of which all particular things are imperfect copies. Thus there exists a ‘form’ of the human person above and apart from all individual human beings, their perfect and eternal model, by sharing in which they are what they are. The same applies to artefacts (e.g. tables and the ‘form’ of the table) and to abstract realities such as beauty and wisdom. Knowledge of the ‘forms’ is the basis of morality and practical life.

The supreme ‘form’ is that of the good, which Christian thought has easily identified with God, although Plato distinguishes them. Normally, the ‘forms’ are independent of God, but in Timaeus they appear as his thoughts. This work had a long influence on Christian thought (later in Chalcidius’ Lat. translation and commentary, c. AD 400), for it presents an outline cosmology. The world was fashioned by the Demiurge (‘craftsman’), who is apparently God, imprinting the pattern of the ‘forms’ on chaotic matter. The world is both soul and body, and so in a true sense both divine and corruptible. Laws gives the earliest version of the cosmological argument for God’s existence (see *Natural theology), based on the necessity for a ‘perfectly good soul’ as the source of all motion.

Plato believed in the *immortality of souls (Phaedo), which belong to the realm of the ‘forms’. While subject to their imprisoning bodies, they gain knowledge of the forms by recollection (anamnēsis) from their previous existence. Souls are liable to reincarnation (see *Metempsychosis) until, finally released by death, they find fulfilment after judgment in a supra-mundane heaven.

The similarity of certain Platonic ideas to Judeo-Christian beliefs was highlighted by early Christian apologists. At the same time Platonic *dualism deeply tainted Christian attitudes, with its depreciation of the body and the physical world in favour of the soul and the realm of true reality accessible to reason alone.

One element in Plato’s thought was developed by Arcesilaus and Carneades (third to second centuries BC) into philosophical scepticism. Knowledge was impossible; probability must serve as guidance for living. This position heavily influenced Cicero and evoked *Augustine’s Against the Academics.

It was the Middle Platonism of the first two centuries AD (especially Albinus, Plutarch and Numenius) that most directly influenced early Christian writers such as Justin (see *Apologists) and *Clement of Alexandria. Religious concerns predominated, and Plato was mixed with elements of *Aristotelian, *Stoic, Pythagorean and even Jewish origin. Numenius described Plato as ‘Moses speaking Attic Greek’. Middle Platonism heightened God’s transcendence, leaving him describable only negatively (cf. *apophatic theology) and active in creation only through intermediaries (e.g. *Logos, planetary powers, world-soul). Plato’s ‘forms’ are now unambiguously thoughts in the divine mind, and speculations about the cause of evil relate it in different ways to matter itself. Such tendencies fed into Gnosticism as well as orthodox Christianity. An eclectic Platonism pervasively coloured early Christian theology, most conspicuously in the Christian Platonists of *Alexandria, where *Philo the Jew had led the way.

The last phase of the tradition was Neoplatonism (third – sixth centuries), which developed out of Middle Platonism (especially Numenius) but took its shape from the creative genius of Plotinus (c. 205–270), a contemporary of *Origen at Alexandria who later taught at Rome. By c. 400 Neoplatonism had taken over the Athenian Academy itself, with Proclus (410–485), the most encyclopaedic Neoplatonic teacher, its leading light. The Syrian Iamblichus (c. 250–c. 325) accommodated Neoplatonism to *polytheism, magic and divination, while Porphyry (c. 232–303), the pupil, editor, biographer and even popularizer of Plotinus, gave it an anti-Christian twist. His Against the Christians was shrewd and weighty enough to demand responses from several major Christian writers.

In Plotinus' Platonism, dualism is subsumed within a higher *monism, and philosophy approaches religion and *mysticism. The source and goal of all existence is the One, which is beyond not only description but even being itself. It is accessible only by ascetic abstraction above the world of sense and even thought, culminating in rare moments of ecstatic vision in which the self is united with the One. From the One's creative overflow emanates a hierarchy of levels of being, tending towards multiplicity and inferiority and aspiring to return to the One. The first emanations are Mind and Soul, cosmic principles respectively of intelligence and animation. All being as such is good, even bare matter at the lower limit of the 'great chain of being' (hence Plotinus' polemic against *Gnosticism). *Evil is strictly nonbeing – a real possibility for those who turn away from the One.

Although it inspired ancient paganism's last major intellectual challenge to Christianity, Neoplatonism proved enormously attractive to Christian thinkers from Origen's successors onwards. The Cappadocian Fathers, *Ambrose, *Victorinus Afer, Augustine and *Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite were all deeply indebted to it. Through Dionysius it became perhaps the most formative factor in Christian mystical theology in both East and West (see *Eastern Orthodox theology). Through Augustine it coloured virtually the whole medieval tradition in the West. Other peaks of Christian Platonism or Neoplatonism include *Boethius, *Eriugena, the school of Chartres, Hugh of St Victor (see *Victorines) and Nicholas of Cusa (c. 1400–64).

Although the rediscovered *Aristotle became 'the philosopher' of *scholasticism, Platonic and Neoplatonic influence lived on. The Renaissance witnessed renewed interest, both in Italy (especially in Marsilio Ficino's [1433–99] Florentine Academy) and in England (e.g. John Colet, c. 1466–1519). Platonic ideas were current in some streams of the *Radical Reformation. Anglicanism has been particularly receptive, from *Hooker through the *Cambridge Platonists and the *Christian Socialists to B. F. Westcott and W. R. Inge (1860–1954; see *Modernism, English). In the twentieth century, despite widespread reactions against dualism and Greek metaphysics, the vitality of Platonism is evident in writers as diverse as A. E. Taylor (1869–1945), A. N. Whitehead (1861–1947; see *Process theology), John *Baillie, *Tillich and Iris Murdoch. *Universalism often betrays Neoplatonic influence at work.

Bibliography

A. H. Armstrong and R. A. Markus, Christian Faith and Greek Philosophy (London, 1960); CHLGEMP; E. Cassirer, The Platonic Renaissance in England (Edinburgh, 1953); J. Daniélou, Gospel Message and Hellenistic Culture (London and Philadelphia, 1973); J. Dillon, The Middle Platonists (London, 1977); W. R. Inge, The Platonic Tradition in English Religious Thought (London, 1926); J. B. Kemp, Plato (Nottingham, 1976); J. M. Rist, Plotinus (Cambridge, 1967); N. A. Robb, Neoplatonism of the Italian Renaissance (London, 1935); P. Shorey, Platonism Ancient and Modern (Berkeley, 1938); R. W. Southern, Platonism, Scholastic Method and the School of Chartres (Reading, 1980); A. E. Taylor, Plato (London, 1949); idem, Platonism and Its Influence (London, n.d.); D. P. Walker, The Ancient Theology: Studies in Christian Platonism from the Fifteenth to the Eighteenth Century (London, 1972); R. T. Wallis, Neoplatonism (London, 1972).

D. F. WRIGHT

PLATONISM, CHRISTIAN

Christian Platonism is that complex strand of theology which is influenced by the philosophy of Plato (427–347 BC) and Plato's successors. Hellenistic influence over later Jewish thought, particularly *Philo, ensured that Christianity was directly or indirectly affected by Platonic philosophy from its inception. This clear influence of Plato and *Platonism can be traced at least as far back as *Clement of Alexandria and *Origen. Alongside the Cappadocian Fathers of the East, *Augustine of Hippo is often identified as the most prominent Christian Platonist of the patristic period. His popularity amongst both Catholic and Protestant theologians during the Reformation ensured the lasting influence of Platonist thought within Christian theology. Platonism was particularly influential in the work of Christian mystics of the East (*Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite, John Climacus, c. 570–c. 649) and West (John Scotus *Eriugena, *Bernard of Clairvaux). Christian theology's encounter with pagan Neoplatonism, particularly the work of Plotinus (c. 205–270) and Proclus (410/412–85), also ensured that Plato's influence would remain strong.

Despite the introduction of the works of Aristotle in the twelfth century, the theology of the high Middle Ages is deeply influenced by various forms of Platonism. This can be seen clearly in the work of *Thomas Aquinas. Marcilio Ficino (1433–99) did much to transmit Platonic texts and ideas in the Renaissance, while the *Cambridge Platonists of the seventeenth century called for a return to what they regarded as the Platonic roots of Christian thought. Today, Christian Platonism remains highly influential, particularly amongst those who espouse an *apophatic doctrine of God which resists the influence of *nominalism in late medieval and modern philosophy and theology. Of particular note is the theological sensibility known as *Radical orthodoxy and the work of more recent Christian mystics such as Simone Weil (1909–43).

Christian Platonism is impossible to characterize in any straightforward fashion. It is often assumed to be dualistic in character, yet this is mistaken. It is precisely in Augustine's rejection of *Manichean *dualism and his view that only the good is primordial and real, with evil being the absence or privation of the good, that we see his Platonism most clearly. It is also sometimes thought that Christian Platonism regards material nature as corrupt or corrupting. Once again, this would be too crude a reading of the Platonist tradition. Christian Platonism is perhaps most clearly characterized by the development of Plato's doctrine of the Forms. Rather than existing in an independent realm in which the visible world participates, in Christian thought the Forms are understood as ideas in the mind of God (see Thomas Aquinas, Summa Theologiae 1a.15). It is by participating in the divine ideas that creatures receive being and intelligibility. The importance of the soul as the hinge between the material and the immaterial, sharing characteristics of both, is also emphasized.

Bibliography

J. Cleary (ed.), Traditions of Platonism: Essays in Honour of John Dillon (Aldershot, 1999); J. Dillon, The Middle Platonists: A Study of Platonism 80 BC to AD 200 (rev. edn, Ithaca, 1996); idem, The Great Tradition: Further Studies in the Development of Platonism and Early Christianity (Aldershot, 1997); E. J. Doering and E. O. Springsted (eds.), The Christian Platonism of Simone Weil (Notre Dame, 2004); G. O'Daly, Platonism Pagan and Christian: Studies in Plotinus and Augustine (Aldershot, 2001); J. Rist, Platonism and Its Christian Heritage (London, 1985); A. E. Taylor, Platonism and Its Influence (London, 1925).

S. A. OLIVER

PLOTINUS, see PLATONISM

PNEUMATOMACHI, see ARIANISM;
HOLY SPIRIT

POLANUS, AMANDUS, see REFORMED
THEOLOGY

POLANYI, MICHAEL (1891–1976)

Hungarian by birth, British by adoption, Polanyi came to prominence as a scientist after the First World War. Stimulated on the one hand by the new physics of Einstein, and on the other by contacts with fascism and Marxism before his move to Britain, he devoted his later years to a wide-ranging investigation of philosophical, social and cultural questions.

His major book, Personal Knowledge (London, 1958), charts a path between the epistemological extremes of subjectivism and objectivism which, although bequeathed by classical philosophy, had been especially polarized since the *Enlightenment. For Polanyi faith and knowledge are not to be set in opposition, even in the physical sciences, but are properly combined in a concept of personal knowledge. This new *epistemology is established by reference to a wide range of examples and arguments, and helps to unify a spectrum of knowledge from science to the arts. Although he did not extend his arguments substantially into the domain of theology, he recognized the validity of this enterprise, in which theologians, most notably T. F. *Torrance, have been engaged.

After Personal Knowledge, besides refining his epistemological ideas in The Tacit Dimension (London, 1967), he began to explore corresponding questions of ontology: in what ways does the actual structure of reality affect our search for an understanding of it? His last writings, summarized in Meaning (Chicago, 1975), present a stratified world which human beings, with their mental activity, indwell, personally and objectively. Polanyi's analysis of the multi-levelled structure of reality may throw interesting light upon various aspects of the relationship between divine and human activity in the world.

Bibliography

For a general introduction to Polanyi's thought, see R. Gelwick, The Way of Discovery: An Introduction to the Thought of Michael Polanyi (Oregon, 2004). For its application to theology, see T. F. Torrance (ed.), Belief in Science and in Christian Life (Edinburgh, 1980); articles by R. L. Hall et al. in Zygon 17 (1982), pp. 3–87; J. V. Apczynski, Doers of the Word: Toward a Foundational Theology Based on the Thought of Michael Polanyi (Chico, 1982); M. Mitchell, Michael Polanyi: The Art of Knowing (Wilmington, 2006); D. Scott, Everyman Revived: The Common Sense of Michael Polanyi (Grand Rapids, 1995); W. T. Scott and M. X. Moleski, Michael Polanyi: Scientist and Philosopher (Oxford, 2005).

P. R. FORSTER

POLEMICS

A sub-discipline of confessionally oriented *dogmatic theology intended to defend the doctrinal truths of specific Christian denominations or of various branches within them, over against others. Thus polemics are essentially inter- and intra-confessional. The discipline flourished in the wake of the Protestant Reformation, as each new denomination sought to define itself as precisely as possible, but the polemical approach to theology has been present throughout Christian history. Examples of significant inter- or intra-confessional theological debates include those between Catholics and Orthodox (over the filioque formula; see *Creeds), Lutherans and Reformed (over the Lord's Supper; see *Eucharist), and in the Church of England between conformists and Puritans (over *church government).

Bibliography

G. R. Elton (ed.), The New Cambridge Modern History II: The Reformation, 1520–1559 (Cambridge, ⁷1976); C. Lindberg, The European Reformations (Oxford, ⁸2002); R. A. Muller, Post-Reformation Reformed Dogmatics, vol. 1: Prolegomena to Theology (Grand Rapids, ²2003); R. E. Olson, Arminian Theology: Myths and Realities (Downers Grove, 2006); J. Pelikan, The Christian Tradition: A History of the Development of Doctrine, vol. 4: Reformation of Church and Dogma, 1300–1700 (Chicago, 1984); C. R. Trueman and R. S. Clark (eds.), Protestant Scholasticism: Essays in Reassessment (Carlisle, 1999).

C. C. SIMUȚ

POLITICAL THEOLOGY

Political theology in the broadest sense has meant from the beginning a theology which explains and justifies the political, social and economic orders. Thus, in the Roman Empire the cult of the divine emperor was something to which all loyal citizens were expected to subscribe, often alongside another permitted religion, religio licita, which did not conflict with the official cult. There was always in relation to Judaism tension between the claims of Jahweh and the formal sacrifices and so forth that were expected by the official political religion. Thus it is not without significance that Pilate insisted on putting on Jesus' cross the words 'The King of the Jews', while the Jewish leaders protested that they had no king but Caesar (Matt. 27:37; Mark 15:26; Luke 23:38; John 19:19).

Three types of political theology

In the early and patristic church three distinct types of Christian political theology emerged, each of which has its exemplars today. First of all, there was the political theology which offered a theology very much in the classical mode, suitable for the new relationship between church and empire which followed the *Constantinian settlement and the establishment of Christianity as the official faith of the Empire. Christianity took over the ancient role of civil religion, sacralizing power, legitimating the existing order of things and inculcating in the populace reverence for the authorities and obedience to orders from above. This approach, which initially had as its greatest protagonist *Eusebius, continues today in those who promote a political theology that supports an establishment of Christianity as ‘*Christendom’ and the shaping of public policy in the light of Scripture. Prominent protagonists of this position in modern times have been Abraham *Kuyper and Oliver *O’Donovan.

The second type of political theology was associated from the beginning with Tertullian and others who regarded the church as a kind of counterculture, an alternative to the Empire and the civil order. ‘Nothing,’ writes Tertullian, ‘is more foreign to us than the state.’ Christians live by their own standards, maintaining an absolutist ethic with a tendency to *pacifism. A true church should have no dealings with political power nor any involvement in the world of secular politics. Christians of this persuasion withdrew from politics in order to sustain communities of love, free from the compromises of the world of power, violence and greed. And these communities and their faith are a constant challenge to the broader society, and not only a challenge, but also the offering of an alternative to the ‘way of the world’, with its violence, greed and oppression. Communities of faith and love sustained faith, hope and love in the Dark Ages, according to Alasdair MacIntyre, and thus they ensured that civility remained a living option in an age of violence and disorder.

This type of political theology was sustained in monastic communities (see *Asceticism and monasticism) and in *Mennonite communities today, such as the Amish people in Pennsylvania. Its most potent advocates today are the disciples of the Mennonite, John Howard *Yoder, and the Methodist, Stanley *Hauerwas. And this voice is heard loudly and clearly in recent political theology.

The third type of political theology has its roots in the theology of St *Augustine. His great work, De Civitate Dei, was occasioned by the suggestion that the sack of Rome by Alaric the Goth in 410 had been caused by the abandonment of the old civil religion of Rome; the gods of Rome were angry and the virtues that had been nurtured by the traditional patriotic cult were no more in evidence. Political theologians of the school of Eusebius were incapable of responding to this onslaught, because for them the prosperity and power of Rome and the *kingdom of God had become hopelessly confused. Augustine produced not simply a tract for the times, but a theology of history and a political theology which was one of the greatest achievements of late antiquity and a classic of Christian political theology.

Augustine developed a political theology which sparked between the two poles of the earthly city and the city of God. The two cities are very different from one another, but in a real sense they are both cities of God. Augustine defines a city or a commonwealth as ‘a gathering of rational beings united in fellowship by sharing a common love of the same things’ (De Civitate Dei XIX.24). There are, of course, many loves that may bind people together in fellowship, but the highest love, which is the love of God, is the love which sustains the city of God, where alone true justice, true peace and true *fellowship are to be found. The visible church is a partial and incomplete manifestation of the city of God, and the earthly city operates in a fallen, sinful world where compromise is often the only way forward, and the task is often to provide a ‘dyke against sin’ rather than a complete manifestation of God’s love and justice.

Augustine’s political theology has been, and remains, immensely influential, but in some ways the most notable protagonists of an Augustinian approach in recent times were the American theologian, Reinhold *Niebuhr, and his many disciples such as Robin Lovin. But it was developed particularly enthusiastically by Lutherans from the Reformation period until today. This *Lutheran doctrine of the ‘Two Kingdoms’ allowed for dangerous and extreme accounts of the relation between the two kingdoms, as when Luther declared that a statesman is obliged, in seeming contradiction both to the law and the gospel, to resort on occasion to force, coercion and violence. And in such a case, Luther declared, ‘the hand that wields this sword and slays with it is . . . no more man’s hand but God’s, who hangs, tortures, beheads, slays and fights. All these are His works and His judgments’ (M. Luther, ‘Whether Soldiers, Too, Can Be Saved’, 1926, Works, vol. 46 [Philadelphia, 1967]). And far later, some German Lutheran theologians and church leaders in the 1930s refused to recognize that the rise of Nazism was a matter of theological concern because, they said, it belonged entirely in the secular realm.

Political theology in the twentieth century

The whole notion of political theology was for a long time deeply suspect among Christians because it was associated with theologies that were closely modelled on the old – and new – pagan political theologies, and performed the same function of legitimating the social order. This impression was reinforced in 1922 by the publication of a book called Politische Theologie by a German philosopher, Carl Schmitt, who taught that even in a secular age there was a necessary link between theological ideas and secular politics. Schmitt advocated a strongly nationalist form of Catholicism, and a reverence for the established order of things. Theology, he taught, is inherently conservative, and indispensable in an effective political order. Schmitt's thought had considerable influence on the emerging Nazi movement which developed as Schmitt-style political theology.

Just after the Nazi takeover in Germany, Erik Peterson published Der Monotheismus als Politisches Problem (1935), in which he argued that any form of monotheism provided support for totalitarianism, whereas a trinitarian theology was inherently associated with democracy.

The third 'father figure' of twentieth-century political theology was Ernst Bloch, an independent Marxist, who in 1959 published his monumental The Principle of Hope which suggested that a *Marxism which sustained the hope of a better future both drew heavily on the Christian tradition, and suggested that believers should strive to realize on earth a better and more just state of things. Bloch was a major influence on Jürgen *Moltmann, whose monumental Theology of Hope (1967) suggested that a Christian theology committed to serious debate with Marxism as well as the theological tradition could be challengingly relevant in the twentieth century and beyond.

Liberation theology

Meanwhile, in Latin America, a new kind of political theology emerged from the slums and the congregations of the poor which were called 'Base Communities'. Drawing heavily on Marxist insights and also on the experience of the poor, *liberation theologians emerged, led by Gustavo *Gutiérrez, Leonardo *Boff and others, who developed a theology which put at the centre the poor, taught that theology should present a 'preferential option for the poor', and should be deeply rooted in *praxis on behalf of the poor and listening intently to their voice. Most of the Latin American liberation theologians were Roman Catholic, which was only to be expected in Latin America, where the vast majority of Christians were Roman Catholic, although the rapid growth of Pentecostal Christianity was already under way. Liberation theologians found Marxist forms of social analysis helpful in their search for a radical political theology which actually helped the poor and stood with them in their trials. The early liberation theologians did not have the caution about Marxism that was common among the Europeans, who lived close to the communist dictatorships of eastern Europe, and were aware of the horrors of many of these regimes.

Two controversies deserve particular notice. *Míguez Bonino, a leading Protestant liberation theologian, challenged Moltmann to give concrete content to the 'identification with the oppressed' which he saw as the necessary implication of faith in the crucified God. There is, argued Bonino, no such thing as innocent detachment; even the most abstract theological reasoning has an ideological function. The way to avoid the reduction of the gospel to a political programme, Bonino suggests, is not to take refuge in critical detachment, but to illuminate what is going on with the help of the best economics and political science available. In a vigorous and incisive Open Letter to Miguez Bonino, Moltmann rejects the substantive charges, warns against a narrow provincialism in theology and suggests that liberation theology has problems and inadequacies of its own.

The Vatican, under a Polish pope who had experienced the tyranny of a Marxist dictatorship at first hand, and with a theologically conservative Cardinal, Josef *Ratzinger, was highly suspicious of liberation theology and issued two cautious dissuasives, in the form of Instructions, Libertatis Nuntius (1984) and Libertatis Conscientia (1986), while the pope on his visits to Latin America made clear his deep suspicion of the movement in the church that had produced liberation theology. But in some ways the two Instructions were among the most radical documents to emanate from the Vatican, embracing, for example, a preferential option for the poor. Yet in some notable cases, such as that of Leonardo Boff, individual liberation theologians were disciplined, or effectively ejected from the church. With the collapse of the European Marxist regimes in 1989, many expected liberation theology to disappear. But it survived, and in some places flourished, while the Vatican took stringent measures against some leading liberation theologians such as Jon *Sobrinho.

Varieties of political theology

A range of different political theologies continue to flourish in a variety of contexts. On the right wing, ‘conviction politicians’, such as Margaret Thatcher or the American Neocons, declared that their policies were rooted in Christian faith, while radical political theologies continue to be active, especially in Africa, Asia and Latin America, but also among evangelicals in the United States. Political theology is far from dead.

See also: SOCIETY, THEOLOGY OF; STATE.

Bibliography

A. Fierro, The Militant Gospel (London, 1977); D. B. Forrester, Theology and Politics (Oxford, 1988); G. Gutiérrez, A Theology of Liberation (London, 1974); A. Kee (ed.), Reader in Political Theology (London, 1974); J. Míguez Bonino, Revolutionary Theology Comes of Age (London, 1975); C. Rowland (ed.), The Cambridge Companion to Liberation Theology (Cambridge, 1999); P. Scott and W. T. Cavanaugh (eds.), The Blackwell Companion to Political Theology (Oxford, 2004); J. Sobrinho, The True Church and the Poor (London, 1985).

D. B. FORRESTER

POLKINGHORNE, JOHN (b. 1930)

Polkinghorne, a leading scientist in the UK, was Professor of Mathematical Physics at Cambridge University until he resigned to take up studies for ordination in the Church of England. He was ordained in 1982. Since 1984 he has published a number of important books exploring the complementary relationship between *science and Christian faith. He was elected a Fellow of the Royal Society in 1974, was awarded the Templeton Prize for Science and Religion in 2002, was founding president of the International Society for Science and Religion and the Society for Ordained Scientists, and was knighted in 1997.

Polkinghorne has been highly influential in short-circuiting the sterile antipathy between scientific *materialism and Christian revelation. He has demonstrated in particular that there is nothing at either an intellectual or scientific level that precludes faith or that makes it unlikely. On the contrary, he argues that theism makes more sense of the world and human experience than does *atheism.

He sees three areas giving rise to a presumption of *theism. The first is that our capacity for moving from an intelligence that is fit for coping practically with the everyday experiences that evolution requires of us, to one where we are able to understand the subatomic world and general relativity, takes the phenomenon of our humanity beyond the criteria required for fitness and survival. The second is the anthropic principle (in its weak and strong forms). This raises the two issues of what appears to be fine tuning of the universe to create hospitable conditions for life, and the role of the intelligent observer that the universe implicitly demands. The third is that theism makes more sense of the existence and demands of both ethics and aesthetics.

He describes his view of the world as that of critical realism. From this perspective, there is only one reality, but it is assessed, interpreted or explored from different angles by science and theology. Nature is more ‘cloud-like’ than ‘clock-like’. Dual-aspect monism implies that ‘there is only one stuff in the world’ not two; but that ‘I can occur in two contrasting states (mental and physical).’ In his *Gifford Lectures, Science and Christian Belief: The Faith of a Physicist, Polkinghorne distinguishes his position from *panentheism and from *process theology, which, while allowing God to share our suffering, do not seem to believe in the God who raised Jesus from the dead. His views on time have attracted interest. He sees the eternity of the new life containing a temporal component. It comes not ex nihilo (out of nothing) but ex vetere (out of the old).

Bibliography

Works: The Way the World Is: Christian Perspective of a Scientist (1983; London, 1992; Louisville, 2007); One World (London and Princeton, 1986); Science and Creation (London, 1989); Science and Providence (London, 1989); Reason and Reality (London, 1991); Science and Christian Belief: The Faith of a Physicist (London, 1994); Quarks, Chaos and Christianity (London, 2005).

G. ASHENDEN

POLYTHEISM

Polytheism is the belief in and worship of many gods. In the earlier part of the twentieth century it was believed to be a stage in the evolution of *religion from *animism to *monotheism. This view is now generally rejected, and polytheism is seen as the fruit of pre-scientific response to the natural world, since most of the gods are linked to some aspect of nature. Thus the sky, sun, moon, planets, earth, fire, water, animals and even plants have been considered divine, as well as identified with various characteristics of individual and social life. With the personification of natural phenomena as superhuman beings, polytheism is born. The world's mythologies are the accounts of the deeds of the gods which often sink to the level of the grossest immorality. Each god has a cult, the centre of which is the god's image. This can be a human being, an animal, a statue, a tree, a fire, a phallus, etc. Within polytheism one god or goddess is sometimes singled out by a particular group, and elevated to the position of supreme deity, though the existence of other gods is not denied. This is called henotheism or monolatry, and some have argued that OT patriarchal religion was this type of polytheism. Generally, however, the OT condemns the image-worship of polytheism as false attempts to represent God. The NT confirms this condemnation, and Paul even identifies the Corinthian gods with demons (Rom. 1:22f.; 1 Cor. 8:4–6; 10:19f.).

Bibliography

J. Assmann, 'Monotheism and Polytheism', in S. I. Johnston (ed.), Religions of the Ancient World: A Guide (Cambridge, MA, 2004); J. H. Bavinck, The Church Between the Temple and the Mosque (Grand Rapids, n.d.); A. Daniélou, Hindu Polytheism (London, 1964); M. Eliade, Patterns in Comparative Religion (London, 1958); P. Grimal (ed.), Larousse World Mythology (London, 1965); W. B. Kristensen, The Meaning of Religion (The Hague, 1960).

D. A. HUGHES

POSITIVISM

A philosophy and humanist 'religion' originating with Auguste Comte (1798–1857). Individuals, he held, and humankind in general, begin by being 'theological', ascribing events to supernatural powers; develop to a 'metaphysical' stage where they ascribe them to abstractions like 'force', which rename rather than explain; and finally reach the 'positive' stage where both these are abandoned, knowledge being recognized as of facts alone, or, in the sciences, regularities among facts. This progress is inevitable. It is matched by parallel progress in society; and Comte proposed a new science of sociology, to study humankind and enable society to be organized rationally and peacefully by a scientifically trained élite.

God as an explanatory hypothesis is unnecessary; religion should be based on worship of humanity as a whole. Comte devised a complete positivist 'church' with its saints, ceremonies, and so on, but this never became widely popular, nor did Comte's philosophy as such. However, his rejection of metaphysical and theological explanations, and his assertion that science was a matter of establishing neutral, objective 'facts' even in the realm of the social and human sciences, became widely influential in the philosophy of science and sociology. This contributed to the growth of 'scientific humanism' and the deep *secularism of European culture in the late nineteenth and throughout the twentieth century.

See also: LOGICAL POSITIVISM.

Bibliography

F. Copleston, History of Philosophy, vol. 9 (Tunbridge Wells, 1975); L. Kolakowski, Positivist Philosophy from Hume to the Vienna Circle (London, 1968).

R. L. STURCH

POSTLIBERALISM

Postliberalism is one of the most significant movements of Anglo-American theology and is chiefly inspired by the works of *Yale theologians Hans *Frei and George *Lindbeck. The term 'postliberalism' was introduced by Lindbeck, and the movement is called interchangeably 'postliberal' or 'intratextual' or the '[New] Yale school' of *narrative theology. In developing his ideas, Lindbeck made the most of the thought of the later Ludwig Wittgenstein and Clifford Geertz in order to propose an important new paradigm or 'research programme' which related religious experiences, traditions of interpretation and doctrinal conceptualizations for Christian thinking. With its holistic theory of knowledge and recognition of the diverse functions of *religious language, it is considered one of the earliest expressions of constructive *postmodern theological thought. Arising from his ecumenical engagement with different Christian traditions and in an attempt to combine the emphases of the well-established cognitive-propositional (characteristic of conservative theology) and 'experiential-expressive' symbolic (attributed to liberal theology) traditions, Lindbeck developed his 'cultural-linguistic' (Lindbeck, The Nature of Doctrine, p. 16) approach to doctrine and the function of religious language. Postliberal theologians maintain that the biblical narratives provide a categorical framework for Christian understanding of the world. According to their account, religions are communal phenomena like languages or cultures, together with their correlative forms of life. Thus, doctrines are 'regulative' (Lindbeck, The Nature of Doctrine, p. 18); they are 'best treated as second-order discourse – as [authoritative] rules to guide both [religious] practice and the use of first-order religious language (praise, preaching, exhortation, and the like)' (N. Murphy and J. W. McClendon, Jr, in Modern Theology, p. 206). The truth of theological claims is therefore 'intra-systematic' (Lindbeck, The Nature of Doctrine, p. 64).

Several theological camps have levelled criticisms against postliberalism, considering it a crypto-sectarian temptation that legitimizes a withdrawal of Christianity from pluralistic cultural discourse and disregards social responsibility (the criticism of revisionists and liberals), or accusing postliberalism of offering a cultural-relativistic view of religious belief and lacking commitment to *ontological truth claims (the criticism of conservative evangelicals). Some theologians sympathetic to the postliberal approach, while dismissing such criticisms as ill-founded, consider its account of how one justifies claims regarding the truth of religion as inadequate (Murphy, Vidu), or see Lindbeck's concept of 'intertextuality' as problematic (DeHart) or his regulative principles of Christological doctrinal formulations as lacking emphasis on discipleship (McClendon). The lasting legacy of postliberalism is in initiating an important conversation on the dialectical relationship of the practice of faith to theological reflections on the nature of *faith.

See also: LIBERALISM AND CONSERVATISM IN THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

P. J. DeHart, The Trail of Witnesses: The Rise and Decline of Postliberal Theology (Oxford, 2006); H. W. Frei, The Eclipse of Biblical Narrative: A Study in Eighteenth and Nineteenth Century Hermeneutics (New Haven, 1974); G. A. Lindbeck, The Nature of Doctrine: Religion and Theology in a Postliberal Age (Philadelphia, 1984); J. McClendon, Doctrine: Systematic Theology, vol. 2 (Nashville, 1994); N. Murphy, Theology in the Age of Scientific Reasoning (Ithaca, 1990); N. Murphy and J. W. McClendon, Jr, 'Distinguishing Modern and Postmodern Theologies,' Modern Theology 5, 1989, pp. 191–214; A. Vidu, Postliberal Theological Method: A Critical Study (Bletchley, 2005).

P. R. PARUSHEV

POSTMODERN THEOLOGY

The spirit of the postmodern age has influenced theology in two ways: as a cultural condition that intensifies capitalist consumerism ('post-modernity'), and as a philosophical rejection of the Enlightenment project of modernity ('postmodernism'). This article focuses on postmodernism: does it represent a new exodus from the bondage of modernity or a new Babylonian captivity of the church?

The postmodern Zeitgeist

'Postmodern' is a contrast term signifying what is 'subsequent to' or a 'reaction against' something (i.e. *modernity). The so-called '*Enlightenment project' of modernity was an attempt on the part of modern thinkers 'to develop objective science, universal morality and autonomous art' (M. Sarup, Identity, Culture and the Postmodern World, p. 94). In effect, it was an effort to arrive at the medieval transcendentals – truth, goodness, beauty – by pulling up our own human bootstraps (i.e. without God).

*Kant held that the enlightened person is free to use his own *reason and is not beholden to authorities and traditions. His famous 'turn to the subject' put the finishing touches on *Descartes' method of critical reasoning. The prize of such reasoning is knowledge and mastery: control of some dimension of the natural or social world. The project of modernity is a self-guided pilgrimage to the promised land of truth and liberation. Loneliness accompanies the autonomous knowing pilgrim, however, as *Voltaire well knew: ‘To be modern is to be cut off from the consolations of religion or metaphysics, to be the child – happy or wretched – of science.’

Postmodern thinkers protest the Enlightenment project and its inevitable result: modern orphans who no longer belong to nurturing traditions. Postmoderns find implausible the model of the modern knowing subject and its ambition to attain universal truth (i.e. a God’s-eye point of view). Postmodernism is the reminder that minds are not disembodied but embodied: knowing, seeing and thinking are culturally located. Human reason is never ‘pure’ but always coloured by one’s social position and historical horizon. Homo post-modernis is situated being: a being-here in a particular race-gender-class.

Is postmodernism a historical epoch, a cultural context, or a mode of thought? All of the above. It is a condition in which one lives and moves, speaks and thinks, and has one’s being; it is the shadowy ‘other’ of modernity, the ‘return of the repressed’ (Freud). To be post-modern is to have a heightened awareness of things that modernity suppressed, namely, our rootedness in a body, a culture, a tradition and a language.

Five big postmodern ideas

(1) Language. *Nietzsche’s announcement that ‘God is dead’ went hand in hand with his insistence, ‘There are no facts, only interpretations’. Postmodern thinkers radicalize the insight: language is irreducibly plural; it is impossible to believe that any one community’s language provides a better purchase on reality than another’s. Thought is language-laden; language screens us from the way things really are.

(2) Knowledge. *Foucault contests the modern ideal of absolute knowledge by claiming that all knowledge is relative to the interests and purposes of the institutions (e.g. the state, the academy, society) out of which such claims emerge. Knowledge for him is a political instrument, a means of exerting a certain kind of institutional or social power.

(3) Ethics. *Lévinas takes Foucault’s analysis one step further. If knowledge is power, then claims to know are a kind of violence insofar as they attempt to ‘master’ that of which they speak. Modern thought is the violent attempt to ‘totalize’ things by appropriating them to our conceptual schemes. Whereas epistemology is the ‘first philosophy’ of modernity, Lévinas believes that ethics – the non-violent letting-be of things – should play that role.

(4) The sublime. Lyotard generalizes the above point, and in so doing brings postmodernity into focus as an aesthetic condition. Whereas modernity suppresses the ‘other’, postmodernity is aware of the ‘sublime’ nature of experience, its inability to be mastered by language or thought, words or concepts. Postmoderns distrust grand explanatory schemes, hence the oft-cited description of postmodernism as ‘incredulity towards metanarratives’ (The Post-modern Condition, p. xxiv).

(5) Metaphysics. For Jacques *Derrida, *metaphysics – ‘the science of presence’ or being – is a ‘white mythology’: a story told by white Anglo-American intellectuals about the ability of reason and language to map the contours of ultimate reality. *Deconstruction exposes the conditions of impossibility of this metaphysical project. ‘There is nothing outside textuality’ means that reason is always/already trapped inside contingent language systems whose binary hierarchical distinctions (e.g. true/false; subject/object; faith/reason) distort thought. Deconstruction exposes the arbitrary nature of conceptual schemes. Metaphysics goes the way of all metanarratives, having been exposed as the pretender it is. The emperor philosophy has no clothes. There are no philosophical facts, only poetic interpretations.

Scripture and theology

If Scripture is the ‘soul’ of theology, then post-modern theories of textuality that trouble the distinction between legitimate and illegitimate interpretation or proclaim the death of the author and authority represent a sickness in theology’s soul. It is difficult to see how the Bible can wield significant *authority if meaning is indeterminate and if there are no universally recognized criteria for right interpretation (Vanhoozer, Is There a Meaning in This Text?). Postmodernism also questions the exclusive authority of historical criticism and has opened up space for other approaches, including the theological interpretation of *Scripture. Nevertheless, if the Bible is God’s authoritative word, we must do more than view theological interpretation of Scripture as simply one more community interest.

For simplicity’s sake, we can distinguish two broad types of postmodern theology.

'Deconstructive' theologians (e.g. D. Cupitt, C. Raschke, T. Altizer) appropriate Derrida's insights about language, textuality, knowledge, etc. and carry them through to the end, namely, a radicalized negative or 'weak' theology that limits itself to saying what God is not. The main North American representative of this postmodern type is J. Caputo, for whom the question of *atheism vs. *theism is undecidable. It is not that anything goes, but that *truth is situational, relational and pragmatic. It is ultimately a matter of doing justice to otherness rather than forcing us to conform to more-of-the-sameness.

'Reconstructive' postmodern theologies (e.g. *Radical orthodoxy; *postliberalism) accept the critiques of modern metanarratives but then go on to the more positive task of inhabiting the Christian narrative and the practices (e.g. giving and forgiving) it generates. J.-L. *Marion's work is noteworthy for its attempt to speak well of God under postmodern conditions. The 'God' of metaphysics is, for Marion, a conceptual idol. By contrast, the God who gives himself in revelation is more like an icon, a saturated phenomenon whose reality is not reduced to its appearance in consciousness. Theos gives itself to human *logos, but the logos cannot contain it. No amount of human reasoning could predict or explain God's self-giving on the cross of Jesus Christ. God is 'beyond being' because 'love does not have to be' (God without Being, p. 138). Reconstructive postmoderns thus work radicalized variations on a Kantian theme: 'I must abolish reason in order to make room for faith.'

Postmodern evangelicalism?

Evangelicals have responded to the postmodern condition in two diametrically opposed ways: critical rejection and uncritical appropriation. A number of conservative theologians and philosophers (A. McGrath; M. Erickson; D. Geivett) worry that postmodernism undermines rationality and relativizes truth, making it impossible either to commend or defend the Christian story over against competitors.

By way of contrast, postconservative, emergent and emerging theologians unapologetically embrace many characteristic postmodern themes and perspectives, including its suspicion of metanarratives, in order to contextualize the faith and 'do church' in fresh cultural ways (J. K. A. Smith). Many are content to live out the particularity of the Christian narrative without seeking to 'legitimate' it by basing it on 'foundationalist' beliefs (Grenz and Franke). They reject a strict orthodoxy that has become a tool with which to oppress others, preferring conversation to formulation of fixed truths ('always conversing') and *missional communal living to apologetic arguments. Indeed, the practices of the believing community – the form of ecclesial life – have increasingly taken the place once given to doctrinal foundations (see *Fellowship).

Conclusion

There is another, better way: critical appropriation. The church must engage postmodernity as it does every other philosophy or cultural development, with discernment, affirming 'whatever is true' (Phil. 4:8) and avoiding whatever takes us captive that is not according to Christ and his Scriptures (Col. 2:8). Postmoderns are right to protest the pride at the heart of the Enlightenment project, but the church did not need Foucault to learn about the will to power, or Marion to learn about the human tendency to manufacture *idols. Christian theology must not simply exchange philosophical masters. If modernity at its worst is guilty of pride, postmodernism at its worst succumbs to sloth: the deadly sin that cannot muster enough conviction to say, believe or do anything.

Perhaps the biggest challenge postmodernism represents to evangelical theology pertains to its Protestant heritage and future. Evangelicals are a people of the book, and biblical authority and *infallibility have long been distinguishing characteristics. The momentum in postmodernism, however, is toward according *authority to interpretive traditions (i.e. community) rather than texts (i.e. canon), thus raising the question: Will evangelicals remain on the Protestant road, defined by sola Scriptura, while driving under the postmodern influence?

See also: CONTEXTUALIZATION; CULTURE.

Bibliography

B. Benson, Graven Ideologies: Nietzsche, Derrida & Marion on Modern Idolatry (Downers Grove, 2002); J. Caputo, What Would Jesus Deconstruct?: The Good News of Postmodernism for the Church (Grand Rapids, 2007); D. Dockery (ed.), The Challenge of Postmodernism: An Evangelical Assessment (Grand Rapids, 1995); R. Greer, Mapping Postmodernism: A Survey of Christian Options

(Downers Grove, 2003); S. Grenz and J. Franke, Beyond Foundationalism: Shaping Theology in a Postmodern Context (Louisville, 2001); J.-F. Lyotard, The Postmodern Condition (Minneapolis, 1984); J.-L. Marion, God without Being (Chicago, 1991); M. Penner (ed.), Christianity and the Postmodern Turn: Six Views (Grand Rapids, 2005); M. Sarup, Identity, Culture and the Postmodern World (Edinburgh, 1996); J. K. A. Smith, Who's Afraid of Postmodernism? Taking Derrida, Lyotard, and Foucault to Church (Grand Rapids, 2006); G. Veith, Postmodern Times: A Christian Guide to Contemporary Thought and Culture (Wheaton, 1994); K. Vanhoozer, Is There a Meaning in This Text? The Bible, the Reader, and the Morality of Literary Knowledge (Grand Rapids, 1998); idem (ed.), Cambridge Companion to Postmodern Theology (Cambridge, 2003); G. Ward (ed.), The Blackwell Companion to Postmodern Theology (London, 2004).

K. J. VANHOOZER

POSTMODERNISM

Since the 1970s 'postmodernism' has featured prominently in philosophy, cultural studies, literary theory, the social sciences, fine art, architecture and theology. It is notoriously difficult to define, but the most influential attempt to do so was made by Jean-François Lyotard (1924–98), who depicted it as 'incredulity toward metanarratives'. As an ex-Marxist, Lyotard was aware of the potential of purportedly universal explanations or 'grand stories' to function in a 'totalizing' manner, and associated them particularly with the suspect ideologies of the 'modern' age. Colloquially, 'modern' might describe that which is up to date, so that the idea of anything being 'post-modern' seems nonsensical. Yet postmodernism is to be construed attitudinally rather than chronologically, as a critique of certain key metanarratives developed in the *Enlightenment period of the seventeenth, eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. For our purposes these metanarratives may be summarized as *rationalism, statism and scientism.

Rationalism exalts human reason as the primary source of knowledge and truth, most typically over against divine *revelation. Truth in rationalist understanding is presented as unitary and objective, while reason is related to universal precepts inferred from naturalistic processes. Hence René *Descartes interrogated the basis of all knowledge and experience and concluded that existence is verified by rational thought. Since thought takes place in the minds of individual humans, Descartes' work represented a 'turn to the subject' which became a hallmark of *modernity. Later, David *Hume would seek to recast both ethics and religion in rationalistic terms, while Immanuel *Kant would exalt the 'audacity to think for oneself' and rationalize religion as an essentially moral phenomenon.

One key outworking of Enlightenment rationalism was the rise of the modern secular *state. In the late 1700s revolutionaries in America and France sought to constitute government distinct from the church, on the basis of universal human rights rather than religious dogma. While contributing much to democracy, this approach was often exported to less apparently 'rational' cultures in colonialism, with decidedly mixed results. In the twentieth century it would reach its most distorted expressions in the statist tyrannies of Stalinism, Nazism and Maoism.

Modernity was also characterized by the scientific and technological advances of the industrial revolution. While delivering momentous gains in manufacturing, social mobility and medicine, at times this fostered what David Harvey calls 'the scientific domination of nature'. When wedded to the idea that scientific advance is its own justification apart from morality, such 'scientism' can be seen to have produced pollution, nuclear weaponry and gas chambers alongside the many benefits yielded by science as such.

In reaction to all this, postmodernism views reason and *truth in far more diffuse, provisional and relativistic terms. Driven by the failure of Communist 'reason', 'science' and imperialism, Lyotard's critique of metanarrative is closely bound up with a rejection of singular, uniform accounts of reality. In this sense the roots of postmodernism can be traced back to Friedrich *Nietzsche, who reinterpreted claims to truth as metaphors concealing self-interested bids for power. Also influential was Sigmund Freud (1856–1939), who expounded the 'irrational' and often self-deceptive drives of the unconscious, and as such construed an even more pessimistic epistemology than Nietzsche. Postmodern questioning of rationalism was also anticipated by Martin *Heidegger, who insisted that 'thinking subjects' are never detached from the contingencies of their environment, and that the language they use to make sense of life thus functions more as poetry than as a direct 'mirror' of the world.

In the work of later thinkers more directly associated with postmodernism, these themes are reinforced. Zygmunt Bauman (b. 1925) echoes Nietzsche when defining postmodernism as 'living with ambivalence' – an openness to plurality and difference which views unitary accounts of 'truth' as inevitably oppressive. Jacques *Derrida likewise accentuates difference, more specifically contrasting it with the 'metaphysics of presence' – that is, with the assumption that language can reconstruct pristine authorial intent or enshrine any fixed 'original' meaning. In the Derridean project of '*deconstruction', texts are read as volatile assemblages of writing itself, changing their nature as the spaces within them, and between them and other elements in the system of communication, are altered. For Michel *Foucault, truth, rationality and knowledge are similarly fluid – as demonstrated particularly in shifting social representations of insanity, criminality and sexual deviance. Truth and reason are no more stable in the American version of postmodernism propounded by Richard Rorty (1931–2007). Radicalizing earlier pragmatist philosophy, Rorty presents a thoroughly contingent understanding of reality in which 'truth' functions as little more than a set of rhetorical tropes that facilitate our 'loyalty to other human beings clinging together against the dark'.

These philosophical shifts from modernism to postmodernism have been reflected in various cultural forms. Whereas modernist architects like Le Corbusier and Mies van der Rohe designed housing along hard 'rationalist' lines devoid of ornamentation, postmodern structures are typically eclectic and ironically decorative in style. Whereas artists like Georges Braque and Wyndham Lewis made works influenced by logical sequences and mechanisms abstracted from contingent representation, postmodern artists like Andy Warhol, Jeff Koons and Tracey Emin celebrate contingency and ephemerality by referencing popular artefacts or deploying everyday objects in their work.

Christian theological responses to postmodernism might readily appreciate its emphasis on plurality and multiplicity: after all, the Trinity, the diversity of biblical canon or the numinous confluence of words, signs and actions in the Eucharist could hardly be exhausted by 'linear' rational explanations. In their later work Lyotard and Derrida in fact wrote suggestively about the interplay between God's presence and absence, his word and his silence, in biblical and devotional writings. Citing Derrida in particular, Kevin Hart suggests resonances between deconstruction and the 'negative' theology of mystics like *Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite (see Apophatic theology). Similarly, Mark C. Taylor finds in deconstructive approaches a corollary of the divine logos, which at once 'grounds' and 'disseminates' the 'divine milieu', and which is discerned in the space between the 'fullness of deity' in Christ and the *kenotic 'self-emptying' of Christ on the cross. For Jean-Luc *Marion, theological discourse which defines God as the fullest form of 'being' is actually idolatrous, in that it represents God as an extension of ourselves. Rather, Marion sees authentic theological discourse functioning 'iconically', mediating traces of divinity while pointing away to the God who is ultimately beyond language and being, and who is thus known by faith rather than reason. There are echoes here of Karl Barth's critique of philosophically based theology: indeed, Robert Jenson has argued on these grounds that *Barth is the quintessential *postmodern theologian.

More fundamentally, of course, it is hard to see how orthodox Christian theology could disavow metanarrative as such, since this would seem to require the denial of a divine 'author' or 'creator' distinct from the world – a Word who gives ultimate meaning to our words. The *gospel of salvation through Jesus Christ is in this sense surely the 'story which explains our stories' (John 4:29). Then again, it is a story which subverts the claims of other 'grand stories', because far from representing a malign 'bid for power', it has as its heart an act of radical, loving renunciation. Jesus 'deconstructs' the self-contradictions in domination-systems of his time, and as John Dominic Crossan and others have shown, the parables and sayings in which he does this have a playful quality that postmodern readings can illuminate. Yet it is precisely in the metanarrative of his atoning death (see *Atonement) that Jesus challenges the necessary postmodern identification of 'grand stories' with totalization and tyranny, for here the metanarrative turns on a divestment of *power in which the Lord of heaven and earth comes 'not to be served but to serve', and in which the bringer of abundant life sacrifices his own life as a 'ransom for many' (Mark 10:45).

Bibliography

The Blackwell Companion to Postmodern Theology (Oxford, 2005); L. Cahoone (ed.), From Modernism to Postmodernism: An Anthology (Oxford, 1996); P. Kamuf, A Derrida Reader: Between the Blinds (Hemel Hempstead, 1991); J. F. Lyotard, The Postmodern Condition: A Report on Knowledge (Manchester, 1984 [1979]); J. A. K. Smith, Who's Afraid of Postmodernism: Taking Derrida, Lyotard and Foucault to Church (Grand Rapids, 2006); A. C. Thiselton, Interpreting God and the Postmodern Self (Edinburgh, 1995); K. Vanhoozer (ed.), The Cambridge Companion to Postmodern Theology (Cambridge, 2003); G. Ward (ed.), The Postmodern God: A Theological Reader (Oxford, 1997).

D. H. K. HILBORN

POVERTY AND WEALTH

Poverty and wealth describe the situation where some people have access to and use of few of the earth's resources while others control lots of them through ownership and power. The normal forms of wealth-holding include land, raw materials, property, capital, education, technology, financial assets and direct control of workers, trade, taxes and consumption. The Bible presents a relationship between the two. Wealth, by concentrating resources into the hands of a few, undermines the access of the many. The Bible counsels against riches and for helping the poor. This principle makes sense. Even distribution of resources allows everybody to work with effect and live productive lives, while a big concentration of wealth leaves many unable to work well and encourages extravagant living among the elite. Theological responses to this issue have tended to reflect different aspects of the biblical treatment of poverty and wealth, and we therefore link each tradition to its main biblical emphasis.

The exodus shows God redeeming the children of Israel from slavery and acute poverty. They are taken into freedom and to land which God has purposed for them. In the Promised Land, territory was allotted equally among the population. The Lord commanded a revised census to be carried out (Num. 26), revealing a population of 601,730; the land was to be apportioned strictly according to the number of names (vv. 51–56). A small tribe had a small allotment of land and a large tribe a large one, so that the distribution could be equal. The radical egalitarianism of this settlement, carried out by Joshua, has been the focus of a long radical tradition since the Reformation associated with the Levellers, Diggers, Henry George, *Tolstoy and some *liberation theologians. Its emphasis is on equality in the ownership of resources and redistribution to bring it about as reflecting God's purposes.

Other decrees in the Mosaic law were designed to maintain this wide distribution of resources, preventing poverty. At a strategic level there were the Jubilee return of land and proclamation of liberty to all the inhabitants (Lev. 25). The Christian campaign in Britain with *Wesley and Wilberforce to end slavery drew from this theme, as did land distribution for migrants in the United States. Later, the rules requiring no interest and a seven-year cancellation of debt were drawn on by the Jubilee Campaign for the cancellation of debt in the Majority World, movements for forgiving personal debt and various attempts to lower interest. Credit and community banks in Europe have similarly embodied Christian attempts to centre banking on the needs of the poor rather than the revenues of the rich.

The direct provisions for the poor and needy in the Mosaic law were likewise built into the creation of what has come to be called the Welfare State in the UK. A tradition of thought and action including Shaftesbury, Chalmers, Ruskin, the early Christian Socialists, the 'Nonconformist Conscience', Lloyd George, Tawney, *Temple and others shaped a response to those in need which was a mixture of social insurance, local and national provision (see *Social ethics). This slowly moved from a patronage of the unworthy poor to a recognition that this was the right thing to do and an awareness with Lloyd George that redistributive tax was necessary. Over the last few decades this commitment has weakened with the weakening of Christianity in Britain.

Other Christians and theologians have picked up the direct commendation by Christ of the poor and poor in spirit. They have stood apart from the capitalist drive to wealth and the consumerism of the late twentieth century. In the West this has been at odds with the prevailing culture, but a mixture of people including David Sheppard, Mother Teresa, Fritz Schumacher, papal encyclicals and liberation theologians have honoured the poor, respected their mode of living and identified their needs in non-consumerist terms. *Gutiérrez and other liberation theologians identified the way in which theology has been biased towards the rich, rationalist elites of the West and ignored Christ's message of freedom for the oppressed. Now it turns out the ways of the poor are required of all of us, if we are to prevent the degradation of the planet (see *Ecology). As Christ taught, it is from the poor that we must learn blessing.

Though many theologians and thinkers have addressed aspects of Christian teaching, the evidence of the last few hundred years is that the structural, personal and economic aspects of the issue of poverty and wealth have not been held together in a coherent Christian perspective. Usually, a full Christian vision has been compromised by the secular capitalist and consumerist pressures of modern secular culture. Now we examine those trends.

Theology and economics

This biblical understanding of wealth and poverty, seeing both as a problem, has been reflected, in part, in economic and political perspectives for much of the last two millennia. Gradually, the concentration of wealth through predation, political control and economic dominance has waned. Castles, slavery, feudalism and forced labour have diminished (though they were still stronger in modern history than we usually allow). Charity, direct giving to the poor, was done and advocated by the church as a necessary immediate Christian response. Some monastic orders, especially the *Franciscans, took on vows of poverty and stood against excesses in the churches. We cannot easily estimate the impact of this long-term emphasis on European life.

The Reformation offered a deeper threat to feudal and landed control in opening up work, trade, the production of goods, investment and thrift as part of the Christian calling. Gradually, an economy not based on owned wealth and required labour emerged. At the same time this was an attack on necessary poverty. The Dutch market response of the seventeenth century was the beginning of the modern economy, and this was the time in Britain when the Levellers and Diggers attacked in Christian terms the economic control of the wealthy. Sadly, they did not win and the landed gentry re-established control, both attacking and buying off the churches. Though Protestants continued to work, improving agriculture, trade, production, science and technology, the running and understanding of the economic system moved to the kind of liberal and naturalistic view of economic life promoted by Adam Smith.

Here, especially later with Bentham, poverty was largely seen as self-imposed and was to be addressed by self-interest and tough regimes. Though the Christian influence of Shaftesbury, Chalmers and others was substantial, the dominant economic paradigm was classical. The practical reformist Christian influence produced some good results, but the intellectual opposition to classical economics came mainly from *Marx and secular socialists, though Maurice, Kingsley, Ruskin and others made important contributions. At this time, too, the self-justifications of wealth began to appear and grow. The Manchester School championed the entrepreneur and capitalist, suggesting that they were responsible for national wealth.

It was during this period that theology began to disengage from economic considerations, as though God was only interested in religion and not in the whole of life. As a result, the formation of the discipline of economics was largely without theological input, and it came to be identified as secular and supposedly value-free. Poverty and wealth were deemed outside the corpus of 'theology' for much of the twentieth century, despite the biblical content of the themes. People looked only to secular socialism to address these issues.

Some theologians moved out of this impasse, partly because of the series of papal encyclicals beginning with Leo XIII's Rerum Novarum (1891). Similarly important was Abraham *Kuyper's The Problem of Poverty (1891), which identified in Christian terms the structural links between wealth and poverty. But the theological tradition has hardly been strong.

Often the wealthy have controlled economic ideology, economic theory and business studies. Neo-liberalism lauded the value and success of the wealthy. The idea of 'wealth creation' was coined, as though the wealthy really were the engine of economic development. Though many critiques of this assertion emerged, the ideology of wealth gained weight by repetition, especially in the twenties, fifties and nineties in America. A strong Christian perspective on wealth and poverty waned.

More recently, with global warming, the problem of quasi-slave labour in poor countries (see *Slavery), the exploitations of international trade and rampant consumerism, the problems of plutocracy are glaringly obvious. Suddenly, the deep strength of the biblical perspective is newly evident. At the beginning of the twenty-first century some kind of coherent Christian response is beginning to re-emerge from aid agencies, some theologians, Christian economists and others. At every level in Christian living, policies and economic understanding, there is vast work to do, especially in the West. When all the biblical themes, personal, structural, those involving *justice, fairness (see *Righteousness), meekness and freedom from sin, and the dangers of materialist idolatry are brought together, the resources to eliminate wealth and poverty are available to us focused in the person of Christ.

See also: CAPITALISM; MATERIALISM.

Bibliography

R. G. Clouse (ed.), Wealth and Poverty: Four Christian Views of Economics (Downers Grove, 1984); B. Goudzwaard and M. Vander Vennen, Hope in Troubled Times: A New Vision for Confronting Global Crises (Grand Rapids, 2007); G. Gutiérrez, The Power of the Poor in History (New York, 1983); L. J. Hoppe, There Shall Be No Poor among You: Poverty in the Bible (Nashville, 2004); D. Hughes, God of the Poor: A Biblical Vision of God's Present Rule (Carlisle, 1998); John Paul II, Encyclical Laborem Exercens (Vatican, 1981); A. Kuyper, The Problem of Poverty (Washington and Michigan, 1991); J. Ruskin, Unto This Last (London, 1900); D. Sheppard, Bias to the Poor (London, 1983); R. H. Tawney The Acquisitive Society (London, 1948); L. Tolstoy, How Much Land Does a Man Need? (London, 1993 [1886]).

A. STORKEY

POWER

Each academic discipline analyses the concept of power according to its own objectives. Here we do so in the context of Christian theology, but not ruling out engagement with other disciplines. The thinking of two political and social systems may be identified to give meaning to the concept. First, in the Greco-Roman world in which the NT was written, the use of power was based on the patron-client social system. The Greco-Roman world was a brokered empire, hierarchical in structure, with power in the hands of a few who shaped the lives of others according to this social system. Obedience was expected of all and, despite the cultural diversity, obedience was always a measure of the structured peaceful coexistence for all. Since the tentacles of this political system stretched throughout the known civilized world, to disrupt this pax Romana was considered a criminal activity. It was a world controlled by human political power, buttressed by an efficient military system.

Secondly, at the end of the nineteenth century a new analysis of human power emerged in the writings of Friedrich *Nietzsche, who proposed that the 'will to power' re-established self-determination as the highest endeavour for human life and the proclamation of the crucified Christ was insufficient for that. Nietzsche's model had a powerful influence on Western philosophical systems.

What helps culture identify itself are systems, institutions, structures and organizations that weave patterns by which people are expected to live. This is all necessary, but some of these systems become paradigms of *evil. What this means is that political and social systems are not necessarily understood as impersonal. So to change a system is to change it from within. Systems, organizations, institutions that refuse to change eventually become 'demonic' or diseased and lose any sense of accountability or responsibility. Neither the pax Romana nor the 'will to power' encompassed the required responsible or accountable controls. Power, according to these systems, was thus open to abuse. But in Christian theology everything is accountable to God, whether persons or political and social systems.

Christian theology, based on the NT, runs in a way which is counter-cultural to political systems that became paradigms of evil even while they do not recognize their own moral and ethical failures. The apostle Paul proclaimed as of first importance the good news of Christ crucified (see *Cross). This, he acknowledged, was a stumbling block and foolishness to its cultured despisers. But Paul made clear that this message, Christ crucified, was evidence of God's power and wisdom (1 Cor. 1:23–24).

First, it should be recognized that the message of Christ crucified was not contextual in the sense of arising out of, or being limited to, one specific culture. For Paul, the good news was applicable to all cultures without being watered down or corrupted (Gal. 1:6–10). The gospel was true regardless of where it was preached, and so it is possible to affirm that Christ crucified is a theological metanarrative. But it comes from God, not through human ingenuity.

The power of God is now revealed in the crucified Christ. But the crucified Christ had lived an earthly life that revealed the new meaning of power. Such titles as Messiah and King were transformed into a new definition of power through *Jesus' life, ministry, death and resurrection. Power was evident in Jesus' healings, miracles over nature, his control over demonic forces and, in each case, the message was one of restoration, overcoming systemic oppression, establishing justice and a new form of open fellowship. In these events it became evident that God's power set humanity free (Gal. 5:1). But the controversy of Jesus' ministry was not over freedom, but the manner in which it was achieved. The divine transcendence became personally visible in the powerlessness and weakness of humanity, and this could be translated as agape *love, a self-giving love, going out of one's self for others, which was now to be understood as God's power.

Power was thus defined by God in the actions of Jesus the King. But it was Jesus' power over the evil forces and his eventual defeat of evil at the cross and in the resurrection that clearly revealed the new meaning of power. It was God's power to raise Jesus from death that set humanity free. And now such good news was proclaimed as God's power and wisdom (Rom. 1:16; 1 Cor. 1:18).

God's power revealed in Jesus' life, ministry, death and resurrection continued in the work of the Holy Spirit. Jesus' promise to the waiting disciples was the promise of power from the *Holy Spirit (Acts 1:8). Such power took on a *missional agenda, and the earliest disciples were expected to replicate Jesus' ministry in the life of the church. Of use here is the reference in Mark's Gospel to the exercise of power. While the disciples struggled for power positions with Jesus, Jesus instead taught servanthood according to the model he had set (Mark 10:35–45). This was now the power of the Holy Spirit in the life of the disciples and in the pattern of the church's ministry.

There is a 'mindfulness' that is important in Christian thought in relation to power. This is expressed by Paul: 'Your attitude should be the same as that of Christ Jesus' (Phil. 2:5). Paul then proceeds to describe Christ's humiliation, that is, his descent into human life and death, but this is followed by Christ's exaltation, his ascent to the 'highest place'. According to this new definition of power, we are to go through all the experiences of life committed to servanthood, and only so be victorious. It is this power that is given to us in the power of the Holy Spirit.

See also: POLITICAL THEOLOGY; SOCIETY, THEOLOGY OF; STATE.

Bibliography

M. Hengel, Christ and Power (ET, Philadelphia, 1977); idem, Crucifixion in the Ancient World and the Folly of the Cross (ET, London, 1977); L. Hurtado, One God, One Lord (Edinburgh, 1998); N. T. Wright, Jesus and the Victory of God (London, 1996); W. Wink, Powers That Be (London and New York, 1998).

D. L. RAINEY

PRAXIS AND ORTHOPRAXIS

'Praxis' essentially means 'action'. In theology it gained currency through *liberation theology. Theology usually emphasizes orthodoxy (i.e. right belief or conceptual reflection on truth). Like *political theology, liberation theology balances this with an emphasis on action. *Gutiérrez typically complains that 'the church has for centuries devoted her attention to formulating truth and meanwhile did almost nothing to better the world'. Knowing and doing are dialectically related, and right action becomes the criterion for truth.

An epistemology that privileges praxis can be traced back to the preference for action over contemplation characteristic of philosophy after *Hegel, *Feuerbach and *Marx. As the Croatian theologian, Miroslav Volf, pointed out, 'a new consciousness has developed: the truth opens itself up, not to beholding but to doing and to changing . . . true thinking as opposed to false consciousness is, for Marx, thinking which reveals its power to establish the truth of this world. Revolutionary practice is the criterion of truth' (Them 8, p. 13). *Míguez Bonino has observed that there is a danger that theology is reduced to ethics, the vertical dimension equated with the horizontal and the concept based on Marxism. Positively, however, it can claim biblical roots. God communicates with his world in creative activity; in John's Gospel knowing truth is contingent upon doing it (John 3:21). René Padilla accepts that liberation theology is correct in criticizing the *rationalistic tendency in theology, because, from a biblical perspective, God's Logos became a historical person. However, he offers a warning against the pitfall of pragmatism, the kind of theologizing that uses the biblical text to justify a position that has been adopted on either pragmatic or ideological grounds, because 'if there is no norm for evaluating praxis outside of praxis itself, the sheer utility will provide the only grounds for its justification – the end will justify the means. Only if faith has a cognitive content outside praxis itself can it serve as a criterion to evaluate praxis' (D. S. Schipani, Freedom and Discipleship, p. 40).

Bibliography

L. Boff, Jesus Christ Liberator (London, 1980); G. Gutiérrez, A Theology of Liberation, rev. edn (Maryknoll and London, 1988); J. Míguez Bonino, Doing Theology in a Revolutionary Situation (London and Philadelphia, 1975); C. R. Padilla, Mission Between the Times, revised and updated (Carlisle, 2010); D. S. Schipani (ed.), Freedom and Discipleship: Liberation Theology in Anabaptist Perspective (Maryknoll, 1989); M. Volf, 'Doing and Interpreting: An Examination of the Relationship Between Theory and Practice in Latin American Liberation Theology', Them 8/3 (1983).

S. ESCOBAR

PRAYER, THEOLOGY OF

Prayer is often said to include adoration, thanksgiving, confession, petition and intercession. But these last two, petition for oneself and intercession for others, present a particular problem, namely: why do we ask God for certain things if God is already *sovereign and determines what will happen? Yet the Christian faith has always rejected fatalism, and Jesus himself taught that we should ask, seek and knock (Matt. 7:7). He warns us against hypocritical prayer which is merely to display our piety, against empty vain clichés, and gives us the model prayer which begins with a prayer for the hallowing of God's name and the coming of his rule on earth. Our own requests and petitions for daily bread, for forgiveness and for deliverance from evil, follow (Matt. 6:5–13). But we pray with confidence in the *fatherly love of God (Matt. 7:9–11). His teaching surely implies that petition and intercession cannot stand alone or be extracted from prayers of adoration, thanksgiving and confession.

But a Christian theology of prayer must begin not only with the teaching of *Jesus, but with his own practice of prayer as a human being. Here he follows in the line of the great intercessors of biblical history, including Abraham (Gen. 18:22–33) and Moses (Exod. 32:31–32). But at the heart of Jesus' life of prayer lies the secret of his life and ministry, namely his unique and intimate relationship with the One he called, 'Abba' (Luke 10:21). For this man, being God incarnate, has unique access to the Father. And it is that unique access that he shares with us, his disciples. It is within the context of that relationship, his gracious gift to us, that we can bring our petitions and intercessions.

Yet as we follow him in the practice of prayer, we need to take special note of the fact that at the climax and crisis of his earthly life, the prayer he offered, 'Father, let this cup pass from me', was not to be given a positive answer (as he himself immediately acknowledged). His cry of anguish and apparent despair on the cross must also be regarded as prayer (Mark 15:34). Following Jesus in his life of prayer, therefore, we have to reject the idea that God will indulgently give a positive answer to all our requests. Even more, we have to reject the false idea that we will get what we desire if we just work up enough 'faith'. The greatest faith was exemplified by Jesus, whose prayer to be spared the cross received a negative answer and who persevered nevertheless, trusting his Father by drinking the cup which he was not spared. The greatest saints are therefore surely those who persevere despite prayers that receive negative answers. Prayer is therefore to be seen as a conversation in which we have to try to discern our Father's will rather than trying to impose our own. It is not a means of having our will done in heaven, but of having God's will done on earth.

Since Jesus taught us to pray to his Father as 'our Father' (Matt. 6:9), prayer is normally directed through the Son to the Father. We pray therefore in the name of Jesus, believing that even now the one who prayed for his disciples while on earth (John 17) is the ascended Christ who presents our prayers and requests before the Father as part of his heavenly ministry (Rom. 8:34; Heb. 7:25; 1 John 2:1). That is not to say that God does not hear the prayer of those who are not in Christ, but those who have received him are given the privileges of his children (John 1:12), sharing the intimacy of the Son with the Father. Yet we also pray to Jesus as 'Lord', as did the first martyr, Stephen (Acts 7:59). In prayer we bow the knee to him as the human being on whom the Father has bestowed the divine name of 'Lord', and we thus recognize him as the one who has always been 'in very nature God' (Phil. 2:5–11).

Such intimacy with the Father and the Son is possible for Christians because of the gift of the *Holy Spirit, and here we see that Christian prayer is fully *trinitarian. It is because the Spirit of the Son has been sent into our hearts that we too are able to cry, 'Abba! Father!' (Rom. 8:15; Gal 4:6). And the Spirit enables us to pray aright by revealing to us the mind of God (1 Cor. 2:9–13). We do not know infallibly and perfectly what God's will is in every particular circumstance, but the Spirit aids our weakness, groaning more deeply than we could ever do, so that we may join in the longings of God (Rom 8:26–27). And we do know that God's will and intention is always good, so that we pray to our Father in confidence, asking for wisdom.

Since the church rejects the idea that the Holy Spirit is a creature, and therefore confesses him also to be of one being with the Father and the Son, we can also pray to the Holy Spirit and glorify him as God. All of this we do as members of the body of Christ, participating even in our private prayer in the corporate prayer of the church. That is why the church not only glorifies the Father 'through the Son by the Holy Spirit', but in the Gloria Patri, which dates back at least to Basil of Caesarea, prayerfully sings, 'Glory be to the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit.'

Prayer is therefore an integral part of the *worship of the church. The traditional *liturgies from earliest times include the kyrie, a prayer for God's mercy (still in the original Greek), the gloria and the agnus Dei, a prayer to Christ as 'the lamb of God'. These ancient prayers remain in the Protestant liturgies of the Lutheran and Anglican traditions and were embraced by evangelicals such as Wesley and Simeon. Wesley and more recent Protestant liturgies also affirm the epiclesis, the prayer to the Holy Spirit at the consecration of the bread and wine. The Reformed tradition of the Swiss Reformation, together with the Anabaptist and Baptist traditions, generally reject forms of prayer, however, regarding genuine prayer as extemporary. But Wesley and Simeon also embraced extemporary prayer. Perhaps we should see then that both are helpful in the life of the church and in the practice of private prayer by each believer. Without the church's riches of forms of prayer, our prayers can become repetitive and the tradition threadbare and over-subjective. Without extemporary prayer, our prayers can become stilted, formal and unreal.

In all this, Christians therefore understand that petitions and intercessions are not a way of extracting from God what is according to our own pleasure. Rather, we only present our petitions and intercession to him as an integral part of a whole life of adoration, confession and thanksgiving. Prayer includes asking, but only within the context of the intimate relationship with the Father we have come to know in and through the Son by the Spirit.

See also: FELLOWSHIP.

Bibliography

D. G. Bloesch, The Struggle of Prayer (New York, 1980); E. M. Bounds, 'With Christ in the School of Prayer', in Complete Works on Prayer (Grand Rapids, 1990); J. Bunyan, Prayer (repr. London, 1965); J. Calvin, Institutes, III, xx; O. Hallesby, Prayer (London, 1961); J. Jeremias, The Prayers of Jesus (London, 1967); J. Murray, The Heavenly Priestly Activity of Christ (London, 1958); J. Owen, 'A Discourse upon the Work of the Holy Spirit in Prayer', Works, vol. 4 (London, 1967), pp. 235–350; W. R. Spear, The Theology of Prayer (Grand Rapids, 1979).

T. A. NOBLE

PREACHING, THEOLOGY OF

This is grounded in biblical conviction that *God is a speaking God who has spoken in creation (Gen. 1:3), in the incarnation of Jesus Christ (John 1:1, 14), and in the *revelation of *Scripture (2 Tim. 3:16). God has designed the universe so that words are vehicles for creative power (Isa. 55:11). Proclamation is central to the prophetic task of the OT ('this is what the Sovereign Lord says', Isa. 7:7), and to the NT where Jesus Christ is both supreme proclaimer of good news and also, by his own life, death and resurrection becomes the content (kerygma) of the early church's proclamation (see *Gospel). Preaching communicates God's revelation as his voice is heard through the preacher (1 Pet. 4:11). Subsequent theology has needed to wrestle with many issues.

Authority

Preaching became essential to subsequent church ministry and mission, assuming co-status as 'word and sacrament' in its liturgy. However, whenever a church has placed *authority on ecclesial tradition as well as on Scripture, preaching is more likely understood as 'the church speaking' than 'God speaking'. But a high view of scriptural authority as in the *Reformation's stress on sola Scriptura, re-emphasized that God himself is heard in preaching. *Calvin and *Luther both asserted that when the gospel of Jesus Christ is proclaimed, God himself is heard. This theology was vividly enshrined in the Second Helvetic Confession (1566): 'the preaching of the Word of God is the Word of God.'

Relationship between Christ, Scripture and the preacher

Karl *Barth memorably provided a formula to describe the threefold dynamic of the Word of God as: the Word revealed who is Jesus Christ; the Word written in Scripture; and the Word proclaimed in Scripture. Giving central place to Christ, Barth's theology binds all three 'words' together, each possessing a human and divine aspect, so that collectively they constitute God's own proclamation. Renewed engagement with the doctrine of the *Trinity in the latter part of the twentieth century (also influenced by Barth) has further heightened awareness of the preacher's spiritual dynamic. Emphasis on the 'social Trinity', with its perichoretic communion, has highlighted the interacting roles of Father, Son and Spirit in the theology of worship and the preaching event. *Moltmann further argues for an *eschatological dimension as preaching creates expectation of God's new future.

Interpretation

Ever since early church employment of 'four senses' (literal, allegorical, moral, prophetic), interpretation has raised urgent questions for the task of exegesis. More recently, Friedrich *Schleiermacher, the father of modern *hermeneutics, argued that understanding Scripture requires a pre-understanding about the authors' intent that a preacher awakens in the hearers' God-consciousness. This more subjective experiential process opened up the roles of both reader and text itself in subsequent hermeneutics. Fresh insights from *narrative theology also encourage moves towards narrative preaching, and recent emphasis in biblical studies on the literary and rhetorical shape of different genres has invited genre-sensitive reading and preaching.

Design

In the early church, suspicion of rhetoric's role as human persuasion was later countered by *Augustine, whose textbook adopted rules of classical rhetoric to preaching, forging a link between solid textual understanding and the need to design persuasive sermons. But tension continues, most recently surfacing between the so-called 'old homiletic' of propositional deductive 'outline' design, majoring on grammatical-historical analysis of authorial intention, and the 'new homiletic' of inductive narrative preaching, pioneered by Fred Craddock. In this contemporary ferment, 'exposition' needs defining in terms of submission to Scripture text rather than to a particular style of sermon design, so that message remains more important than method.

Culture

Current Western preaching faces other theological challenges. Shifts in *culture, from *modernity to so-called *postmodernity, also press for valid experiential responses to Scripture, in addition to traditional grammatical-historical research. The growing 'southern church' challenges the declining 'northern church' to recover spiritual authenticity and courage by powerful pneumatology. From a Latin American perspective Gustavo *Gutiérrez has argued for prophetic preaching that speaks into situations of powerlessness. The gospel and culture movement (pioneered by Lesslie *Newbigin) has critiqued Western preaching for its accommodation to culture and failure to build missional communities. Henry Mitchell's major contribution on African-American preaching as an expression of black culture with holistic theology also has much to teach the world church. These continue to be demanding days for the theology of preaching.

Bibliography

K. Barth, CD, vol. 1; F. B. Craddock, As One Without Authority (Nashville, 1971); G. Gutiérrez, A Theology of Liberation (New York, 1988); T. G. Long, The Witness of Preaching (Louisville, 2005); H. H. Mitchell, Black Preaching: The Recovery of a Powerful Art (Abingdon 1990); J. Moltmann, Theology of Hope (Minneapolis, 1967); M. J. Quicke, 360-Degree Preaching (Grand Rapids, 2003); F. Schleiermacher, The Christian Faith (Edinburgh, 1928); J. R. W. Stott, Between Two Worlds (Grand Rapids, 1982).

M. J. QUICKE

PREDESTINATION

Thomas Aquinas defined predestination as ‘The planned sending of a rational creature to the end which is eternal life’. There is inescapable witness to this idea in the NT (Rom. 8 and 9, Eph. 1:3–10 and John 6:37–45 being outstanding examples), while it is significant that the belief surfaces in passages in the NT which are not directly connected with this theme, as Acts 13:48.

After the NT period, the belief, though mentioned on occasion, tended to become latent rather than at the forefront of the church’s thinking, probably due to the arduous battle the church was engaged in against the naturalistic determinism of the *Gnostics with which they did not wish its own message to be confused. It came, however, very much to the fore again in the career of *Augustine, who as a young convert from the determinism of Manichaeism at first wished to accord to the human *will the priority in gaining salvation, but who after closer study of the Scriptures argued from 397 onwards that the final grounds in the *salvation of a person rested solely upon the will of God. This position a decade or so later was developed at length and in depth in the controversy with *Pelagius and his followers.

According to the mature Augustinian position, empirical human beings had so fallen from the intention of God that they were incapable of turning to him, unless their wills were completely reorientated by the work of God’s *grace, freely bestowed according to his determination. So the reason why some sinners are saved and others lost is to be found ultimately in God. It is according to God’s sovereign purpose, his eternal decree, that some sinners are rescued whilst others are left in their sin; so in the last resort salvation depends upon the sovereign divine decision in regard to the individual. Reprobation, the shadow-side of predestination, depends equally upon the divine will, though here it is not so much a question of the positive willing of an individual to salvation as the willed leaving of a person in his or her fallenness (see *Judgment of God). It is a clear-cut doctrine which does full justice to the biblical understanding of the sovereignty of God in salvation, and it formed the basis of the predominant understanding of the matter in the medieval Western church. Its most clear statement is to be found in the writings of *Aquinas, who dealt with predestination as an aspect of providence, giving a thoroughly Augustinian account of the doctrine. A minority among some of the later Scholastics (as *Ockham) sought to base predestination on God’s foreseeing the future presence, or not, of faith in an individual.

The doctrine of predestination in its traditional form was unsurprisingly affirmed by the three major Reformers, *Luther, *Zwingli and *Calvin. This was to be expected, as at a theological level the Reformation was really about the right interpretation of the general Augustinian position. Anglicanism too was fully compatible with this stance; among the Anabaptists a variety of views were held, but none seemed to be regarded as being of central importance. Lutheranism after Luther moved to emphasize only single predestination – that to eternal life, and to play down its negative aspect.

On the Protestant side, the doctrine played the most prominent role in the churches of the *Reformed persuasion. Interestingly enough, though Calvin, like Aquinas, almost treats the doctrine as an aspect of providence, he refrains from doing so, and instead expounds it as being primarily the foundation of the true life of faith. Believers should live by the assurance that as they are in Christ they are also elect, and that therefore their lives should be characterized by joyous, confident service of God and others. So for Calvin, predestination was a doctrine of comfort and assurance, which should liberate the Christian from morbid introspection or debilitating insecurity. Unfortunately, it was not understood thus by all adherents of the Reformed faith, who turned inward and made *assurance of election the result of a lengthy process of searching and struggle on the part of the believer.

Afterwards, within the Reformed churches there arose a disagreement about the logical order of the decrees of God – was the primary decree that of predestination and reprobation, with that of the fall subsequently following for its implementation (supralapsarianism), or that of the fall primary, and the decrees of predestination subsequent to it (infralapsarianism)? *Beza and Gomarus were associated with the former view, though the majority of Calvinists always seem to have been infralapsarian.

In the early seventeenth century, a revisionary form of the Reformed faith was put forward by the Dutch theologian Jacobus *Arminius, who tended to found predestination upon the divine foreknowledge. This was strenuously resisted by the majority of Reformed theologians, but deeply influenced many Anglicans, and through them the founders of *Methodism, where it has always been the historic stance of that church. Similar controversies were also taking place in the Roman Catholic communion during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Many theologians, including Cardinal *Contarini and the *Dominican order, upheld the general medieval position on the matter as represented by Aquinas. They were, however, opposed mainly by the up-and-coming missionary *Jesuit order, who held to a revisionary view put forward by Louis Molina (1535–1601) known as congruism. This taught that as God knew the future, he also knew all the conditions which then would be at work and thus could save individuals by offering them sufficient grace in circumstances that he had foreseen would result in their freely accepting that grace. Augustinianism, by contrast, teaches that salvation comes to the elect solely through efficient grace activating their free response. The debate between the Dominicans and the Jesuits on this issue was so fierce that eventually in 1594 Pope Clement VIII summoned the principal disputants to Rome, where in the congregation De Auxiliis they contended for eleven years until dismissed with no decision being made.

In the eighteenth century, under the influence of new revisionary modes of thought, many both within the churches and outside were contending that the final arbiter of human behaviour and belief was our inalienable free will, which even the Deity was bound to respect.

To combat this and its explicit assault on any significant doctrine of predestination, Jonathan *Edwards wrote his most powerful philosophical treatise The Freedom of the Will, which appeared in 1754. In this he argued that the everyday usage of the notion of having a free will was in no way opposed to what was affirmed by the doctrine of predestination, also pointing out how, if God was dependent upon countless finite decisions, his overall sovereignty over the universe would be destroyed.

The great Protestant theologian of the nineteenth century, *Schleiermacher, came from a Reformed church background, and though he based his interpretation of the Christian faith on the religious consciousness rather directly upon Scripture as the word of God, he nevertheless held to a doctrine of predestination. It was not, however, balanced by the doctrine of reprobation, since those who were not in the community of faith even at death were to be regarded as being as yet passed over by God. Schleiermacher seems to have believed that eventually the whole of the old humanity would be taken up into the new. So here we meet another theological possibility, that of the predestinarian *universalist.

Discussion of the doctrine of predestination has been dominated in recent years by the daring and original contribution of Karl *Barth. He was of the opinion that the role of Jesus Christ had been unduly diminished in the classic presentations of the doctrine, being largely portrayed as the agent of an anterior divine will. To counteract this he sought to develop the long-standing supralapsarian/infralapsarian argument by insisting that we must view the two primary divine decrees, creation and election, as being integral to each other, with creation being the external basis of the covenant, whilst the covenant is the internal basis of creation. Furthermore, he argued that we must regard Jesus Christ as the complete focus of the divine predestinating activity, being at the same time the elect man, and also the one who bore the reprobation of God upon the cross. Thus in him the whole process is fulfilled. A frequent criticism of this understanding is that this logically implied universalism, a charge which Barth always rejected, though he never spelled out in detail the nature of the alternative proposed.

The doctrine of predestination, unlike in previous centuries, is hardly a matter of widespread debate and concern today in the churches.

This is largely due to their being in the grip of a pragmatism which is primarily concerned about popular impact rather than becoming clear about the foundations of Christian truth. It is hard to see how one can do justice to the fundamental biblical insight of God being sovereign Creator of all that is, without having a significant doctrine of predestination, as the only alternative would be belief in some kind of finite deity. It is inevitable that any genuine revival of the faith will mean coming to terms again with what is signified by this historic doctrine. Here the test will be how far any particular presentation does justice to the various other facets of the historic faith.

Bibliography

Augustine, On the Predestination of the Saints; Augustine, On the Gift of Perseverance; K. Barth, CD II.2 c. 32–35; G. C. Berkouwer, Divine Election (ET, Grand Rapids, 1960); J. Calvin, Institutes, III c. xxi–xxiv; idem, Concerning the Eternal Predestination of God, tr. J. K. S. Reid (London, 1960); F. Schleiermacher, The Christian Faith, pt. II. 119–120; Thomas Aquinas, Summa Theologiae, 1a Q. 23.

S. RUSSELL

PRESBYTERIANISM

Presbyterianism denotes both a form of church government by elders (presbyters) and a system of scriptural doctrine whose origins date back to the sixteenth-century *Protestant Reformation and in particular John *Calvin's reforms of church and society in Geneva. It was Calvin's Institutes of the Christian Religion with its distinctive emphasis upon the biblical meaning and implication of God's sovereignty that would spread from Geneva to establish and anchor the doctrine and polity of global Presbyterianism. In what follows we will examine Presbyterianism's confessional roots, doctrine, understanding of the church and governance, as well its relation to civil society and social reform.

The Presbyterian confessions

Presbyterians share with Calvin a high view of *Scripture whose ultimate authorship and authority is attributed to God. Calvin's Institutes and extensive biblical commentaries sought to distinguish biblical doctrine and church order from medieval traditions and practices that had distorted or departed from the faith and practice of the early church. These reforms became the seedbed of the Reformed *confessions and *catechisms of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, including the Confession of Faith and catechisms of the *Westminster Assembly (1634–9) that have become the confessional and catechetical backbone of global Presbyterianism. These concise and systematic restatements of biblical doctrine were drafted to distinguish, educate and unify the growing reform movement that would establish itself as Presbyterianism. Though subordinate to Scripture, Presbyterians affirm the Apostles' and Nicene *Creeds as well as selected Reformed confessions as standards for the church that clarify biblical doctrine and guide the church in its reading, understanding and application of Scripture to its governance and ministry. This confessional tradition extends into the modern era with recognition of the *Barmen Declaration, which rejected the subordination of the church and the gospel to the state and national ideology, and the Confession of 1967, which raised concern for social justice to confessional status. Nevertheless, adoption of these two latter confessions has been controversial both within and between Presbyterian denominations.

Presbyterian doctrine

It is the majesty and praise of God that emerges from the rich doctrinal tapestry of the Reformed confessions woven from the four doctrinal distinctives of Presbyterianism: the priority of the *glory of God, the pervasiveness of human depravity, *sin and guilt, the unmerited grace of *salvation and the life of gratitude that *grace enables. The priority of God's glory can be seen in Presbyterian insistence that the purpose of creation and the goal of humankind is to glorify God. Paradoxically, the emphasis on God's glory gives rise to complementary stress upon the pervasiveness of sin and human depravity. Humankind's engrained hostility towards God leaves humankind guilty and estranged from God. Yet it is the very helplessness of the human situation which reveals that *redemption and reconciliation rest solely in the grace of God in Jesus Christ, whose perfect obedience and death on the *cross atoned for human sin by satisfying God's divine justice. Moreover, it is God who seals the gift of salvation in the sending of the Holy Spirit who unites the believer to Christ by faith. Though *faith entails human will and decision, Presbyterians hold that faith is ultimately the gift of God evidenced in the election (see *Predestination), regeneration and redemption of his chosen people. Appreciation of unmerited grace is to produce the rest and assurance that ought to exemplify the life of Presbyterians and be the catalyst of a life of service lived in gratitude to God.

Ecclesiology and polity

Reform and restoration of a biblical church order begins for Presbyterians in the recognition of Christ as the head of the church and sole mediator between God and humankind. Christ rules in his church through his word and Spirit. In turn, the church is commissioned by Christ to share in his prophetic, kingly and priestly ministry as a “*priesthood of believers”. This priesthood corporately and individually bears witness to Christ in worship, governance and through service to church and society. Moreover, Presbyterians regard children of believers as members of this *covenant communion with Christ and thus share in the church’s corporate ministry of worship, edification, witness and mission.

Two ‘marks’ identify the true church for Presbyterians: the preaching of the word and the proper administration of the *sacraments. Though all members are expected to share in the church’s ministry, elders and deacons are sanctioned by Scripture to govern and maintain that ministry. Elders are made up of ministers of word and sacrament who serve as teaching and ruling elders and lay elders who share in the oversight of the church. Deacons minister to the practical needs of the church and its members, with special attention paid to the poor and those in need.

Presbyterian unity, connection and catholicity are maintained through a system of representative assemblies (courts) at the congregational, regional and national levels of the church. Congregations are overseen by the church session (consistory) made up of the ordained ministers and elected ordained lay elders. Presbyterian congregations are not independent, but united to the wider church through their representation at the Presbytery, Synod and General Assembly levels of church governance. Presbyteries are made up of ministers and elders sent from each congregation along with theological college educators and retired ministers. Numerical balance is maintained between ordained ministers and lay elders through the appointment of additional elders. At Presbytery an equal number of ministers and lay elders are elected as representative commissioners to serve in the Synod and General Assembly. Synods assist and oversee the work of the Presbyteries, while the General Assembly is the highest governing body in Presbyterianism. In all matters ruling elders are to be guided by the conscience informed by the word and Spirit of God. Presbyterians maintain that ‘God alone is Lord of the conscience’, and thus the decisions of elders are not to be predetermined or coerced by fellow members or their congregations. Nonetheless, recognition of the freedom of conscience and the right of private judgment neither limits the right of Sessions, Presbyteries, Synods and Assemblies to establish the polity of the church nor allow elders or members to defy the church’s doctrine, rule or discipline.

Civil society and social reform

Presbyterians, like their forebears in the magisterial Reformation of Geneva and Zurich, have understood their calling to include the renewal of society through the reform of civil governance and the flowering of sciences, arts and literature. Thus, Presbyterians encourage cultivation of the life of the mind so as to better engage civil society to procure the common good. In this endeavour, historically Presbyterians have been neither naïve to the prevalence of sin in society nor cowed by its destructive force, but in wisdom have sought to reform society through reforming government institutions so as to lessen evil’s influence and bind its power to destroy both individuals and society. Accordingly, the civil magistrate is recognized by Presbyterians as ordained of God to punish vice, promote virtue and safeguard the ministry of the church. Moreover, Presbyterians are not to avoid public service, but instead to seek public office so as to better reform society and establish the common good.

See also: CHURCH; CHURCH GOVERNMENT; REFORMED THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

G. D. Henderson, Presbyterianism (Aberdeen, 1954); J. H. Leith, Introduction to the Reformed Tradition (Atlanta, 2nd 1981); idem, Creeks of the Churches: A Reader in Christian Doctrine, from the Bible to the Present (Louisville, ³1983); S. M. Lewis, On Being Presbyterian: Our Beliefs, Practices, and Stories (Philipsburg, 2006); A. E. McGrath, Reformation Thought: An Introduction (Oxford and Malden, ³1999); J. B. Torrance, Worship, Community and the Triune God of Grace (Downers Grove, 1996).

T. HARVEY

PRIESTHOOD OF ALL BELIEVERS

The doctrine of the priesthood of all believers, central to Martin Luther's teaching on the 'true' church, is a major feature of all *Protestant ecclesiologies down to the present day. It is typically derived from Peter's depiction of the *church as a 'royal priesthood', fulfilling the kingly and priestly functions of Christ insofar as the church is Christ's body. There are no texts in the NT that call leaders of any churches priests. This is significant given the existence of an all-male, hereditary priesthood in Judaism.

Priesthood of all believers in the early church

There is a wealth of historical scholarship on priesthood in general, leadership in the churches, and the doctrine of the priesthood of all believers. There was always a distinction between leaders and their flock in the early pre-Constantinian churches. Theologians disagree as to whether this was always a distinction between ordained clergy and laity, with the former having the role of administering *sacraments, or whether the distinction was merely formal. There are grounds to believe that both models existed in this period. Colin Bulley argues that *Justin Martyr and *Irenaeus were aware of the notion of the priesthood of all believers. *Tertullian develops it considerably, linking it to baptism, reception of the Holy Spirit, membership of the church as spiritual temple, and salvation. He also links believers' priesthood to prayer as believers' sacrifice. For *Clement of Alexandria, believers' priesthood is less important than his idea of the 'gnostic' Christian who is holy, knows and contemplates God and secret knowledge about him, and teaches these matters to the faithful. Later in the third century, Hippolytus, Cyprian and the Didascalia emphasize the priesthood of bishops and clergy. This influenced medieval notions of priesthood.

The Reformation and its consequences

The priesthood of all believers was a key doctrine that Martin *Luther used in anti-Catholic polemics, especially attacking the validity of the *papacy. For Luther, all Christians are born priests by virtue of baptism. There is debate as to whether ordained ministry was simply derived according to Luther from the priesthood of all believers, or whether it was directly instituted by God. Calvin (see *Reformed theology) based his doctrine of priesthood on Christ's *office as prophet, priest and king. For both, the priesthood of all believers is the basis for preaching, the sacraments of baptism and Communion, the keys of Christian discipline and forgiveness, ministerial ordination, and the spiritual sacrifices of believers as prayer, praise and thanksgiving. Some Protestant churches such as the *Quakers, the *Salvation Army and the Brethren do not have any form of ordination. Their ecclesiologies take the doctrine of the priesthood of all believers at its most literal and radical.

Why the doctrine matters today

In the twentieth century the international *ecumenical movement found discussion of the priesthood of all believers important due to wishes by some churches to reunite. In more modest vein, denominations have made progress in theological dialogue over the nature and function of priesthood and its relation to the notions of clergy and laity. Since the Second *Vatican Council, several liberal Roman Catholic theologians, following Hans *Küng, have argued that priesthood is a function of the whole church, refusing to term the leadership or presidency of ordained persons 'priesthood'.

In the modern period the priesthood of all believers has also been key in enabling space for discussing the validity of ordaining women, and in promoting this practice. Those Protestants who argue for women's ordination use the doctrine of the priesthood of all believers, arguing that there is no theological bar to any member of this priesthood being considered to have the necessary gifts for ordination and leadership. Opponents of women's ordination do not deny that women have spiritual gifts suitable for ministry, but sometimes point to Jesus' appointing of twelve males to be apostles, representing the male heads of the twelve tribes of Israel. This, however, moves the debate onto the nature of *apostles and leaders in Protestant churches. Some *charismatics and *Pentecostals make certain distinctions in this respect. These differences among Protestants have not, however, masked the fact that a very large number, in many cases a majority, of Protestant missionaries have been women. Their return from the non-Western to the Western world has been a factor in the rise in support for women's ordination among Anglican and other evangelicals in the last few decades. The concept of the ministry of all members of the church is an aspect of believers' priesthood that has surfaced in recent decades. Some of this is due to wanting to unburden ministers or priests at a time of declining ordination in Western countries. It coincides with the increased cultural and theological influence of evangelicalism, broadly understood, upon Protestants since the marginalization of churches from Western society in the 1960s.

Bibliography

C. J. Bulley, The Priesthood of Some Believers: Developments from the General to the Special Priesthood in the Christian Literature of the First Three Centuries (Carlisle, 2000); C. Eastwood, The Priesthood of All Believers: An Examination of the Doctrine from the Reformation to the Present Day (London, 1960); B. A. Gerrish, 'Priesthood and Ministry in the Theology of Luther', Church History 34(40), 1965, pp. 404–422; R. P. C. Hanson, Christian Priesthood Examined (London: 1979).

C. A. E. MOSELEY

PRINCETON THEOLOGY

Princeton theology was a major expression of conservative Calvinism (see *Reformed theology) in America during the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. It owed its force to the remarkable series of theologians who taught at the Presbyterian Seminary in Princeton, New Jersey, and to the significance of that institution within the denomination and the country at large. The three most important Princeton theologians were Archibald Alexander (1772–1851), founding professor of the school, Charles *Hodge, who taught over 3,000 students in his more than fifty years as a Princeton professor, and Benjamin Breckinridge *Warfield, who upheld Old Princeton positions during a period of fading evangelical influence. These three were joined by a host of other important figures, including Hodge's son, Archibald Alexander Hodge (1823–86), two sons of Alexander, James Waddell (1804–59) and Joseph Addison (1809–60), and the NT scholar and apologist, J. Gresham *Machen.

The Princeton theologians upheld Reformed confessionalism, defended high views of biblical inspiration and authority, organized their thinking with the aid of the Scottish philosophy of *common sense, and had a surprisingly large place for the role of the *Holy Spirit in religious experience. The theologians of Old Princeton were jealous guardians of Calvinistic views on the divine pre-eminence in salvation, the unity both of the race in Adam's guilt and of the elect in the work of Christ, and the moral inability of humans apart from God's grace. They upheld these positions against continental *romanticism and *rationalism, against domestic forms of subjectivity, against the excesses of enthusiastic revivalism, against all varieties of theological *liberalism and against evangelical *perfectionism. One of the Reformed positions which the school held most doggedly was the *infallibility of the Bible. This was a central theme in the apologetics of Alexander, it was an essential foundation for Charles Hodge's Systematic Theology and for the polemics which he carried on in the Princeton Review, and it provided Warfield with the position that he defended in countless essays toward the end of the nineteenth century. The well-known monograph on 'Inspiration' in 1881 by Warfield and A. A. Hodge summed up the Princeton position: the church's historic belief in the verbal infallibility of the Bible should be maintained both because of external proofs for Scripture's divine character and because of the Bible's own testimony concerning itself.

Principles of the Scottish philosophy of common sense provided guidelines for the Princeton theologians in their organization of scriptural material and for their approach to theology. In this they reflected the teaching of two Scottish-born presidents of Princeton College, John *Witherspoon and James McCosh (1811–94), whose work influenced all of the major Princetonians directly or indirectly.

At Princeton Seminary, the Scottish philosophy was not so much a guide for convictions about the native powers of the 'moral sense', as was the case among *New England Calvinists. It provided rather a confidence in empirical science and simple inductive procedures by which to chart a theological course. The opening pages of Charles Hodge's Systematic Theology provide the clearest illustration of these procedural commitments. But even as the Princetonians adopted the scientific standards of the Scottish philosophy, they always retained a large place for distinctly spiritual influences. The major Princeton theologians were all powerful preachers. Although they distrusted unrestrained revivalism, they worked for renewal in the church. Charles Hodge especially, in his commentaries and some of his polemics, could write as movingly about the inward effects of the Holy Spirit as any of his contemporaries.

The Princeton theologians embodied their beliefs in powerful institutions. The seminary itself trained more ministers than any comparable institution in the United States during the nineteenth century. The Princeton Review and its successor journals were mighty organs, not only among northern Presbyterians but across denominational boundaries. And the school was a force to be reckoned with in the denomination, both when its positions dominated significant segments of the church and when its views became a minority position.

Critics of the Princetonians accuse them of scholastic rationalism and a mechanical biblicism. While these claims are not without a particle of truth, the larger reality is that the theologians of Old Princeton were faithful representatives of historic Calvinism, who energetically adopted their confessional position to the needs and opportunities of the American experience.

Bibliography

H. A. Harris, Fundamentalism and Evangelicals (Oxford, 1998); C. Hodge, 'Retrospect of the History of the Princeton Review', Biblical Repertory and Princeton Review, Index Volume, no. 1, 1870, pp. 1–39; A. W. Hofferer, Piety and the Princeton Theologians: Archibald Alexander, Charles Hodge, and Benjamin Warfield (Phillipsburg, 1981); M. A. Noll (ed.), The Princeton Theology 1812–1921: Scripture, Science, and Theological Method from Archibald Alexander to Benjamin Warfield (Grand Rapids, 1983); J. C. Vander Stelt, Philosophy and Scripture: A Study in Old Princeton and Westminster Theology (Marlton, 1978); J. D. Woodbridge and R. Balmer, 'The Princetonians and Biblical Authority', in J. D. Woodbridge and D. A. Carson (eds.), Scripture and Truth (Grand Rapids, 1983); F. G. Zaspel, The Theology of B. B. Warfield (Wheaton, 2010).

M. A. NOLL

PRISCILLIANISM

Priscillianism, named after Priscillian, a Spanish nobleman, was an *ascetic movement which emerged within the churches of Spain and Aquitaine in the 370s. It emphasized virginity, voluntary poverty, and vegetarianism as sure means of attaining greater spiritual heights, particularly the gift of *prophecy. For the Priscillianists this meant the ability to discern special meaning both in the Scriptures and in various apocrypha. While Priscillian, who became Bishop of Avila, accepted the current canon of Scripture, he was convinced that divine revelation was not confined to this. He also took some interest in occult literature in the belief that a successful spiritual life involved a close knowledge of the enemy and his strategy.

Priscillianism neither challenged the church authorities directly nor fostered monastic foundations, though some informal fraternities were established. Certain bishops, however, became suspicious that the activities and doctrines of the Priscillianists smacked of *Manichaeism and sorcery. Matters came to a head when these charges were brought against Priscillian and some associates before the Emperor Maximus at Trier in 385. This led to their execution – the first and almost only occasion in antiquity when a heretic suffered this fate at the hand of a civil ruler. At the time the greatest indignation was reserved for those bishops who had pressed capital charges.

After these executions there was a temporary reaction in favour of Priscillian, who in some quarters was regarded as a *martyr. A *schism was threatened within the Spanish church, but this was avoided by vigorous action from the Council of Toledo in 400. At a popular level Priscillianism continued to exercise some influence right up to the sixth century.

Bibliography

H. Chadwick, Priscillian of Avila (Oxford, 1976).

G. A. KEITH

PROCESS THEOLOGY

Process theology is the theological system based on the philosophy of Alfred North Whitehead (1861–1947) and Charles Hartshorne (1897–2000), developed at the University of Chicago in the 1920s and 1930s. The name itself derives from the central tenet of both of these philosophers that reality is a process of becoming, not a static universe of objects or substances. In Process and Reality (1929) Whitehead set out an original *metaphysical system based on the primacy of events. The notion of events combines into one the previously separated notions of space, time and matter, as indicated by Einstein's physics and theory of relativity. These events, or 'actual occasions', are the open-textured atoms of the cosmos. Each atom is a point in the process, which takes from the past and incorporates new possibilities into a new event which, in turn, contributes to the future. The highest principle in this process is that of creativity or love. It continuously brings about novelty in a 'creative advance' that maximizes good.

Beginning with several major works in the 1940s, Hartshorne developed a complete process philosophical theology, detailing especially a full concept of *God. These views were then elaborated, especially by American theologians and philosophers such as John Cobb (b. 1925), David R. Griffin (b. 1939), Schubert Ogden (b. 1928), Daniel Day Williams (1910–73) and Lewis Ford (b. 1933), the French Jesuit *Theilhard de Chardin, and among British theologians Norman Pittenger (1905–1997) and David Pailin.

Process theology is a form of *theism with a markedly immanentist doctrine of God and redefinition of his transcendence. God gives to all events their initial aim, and so is 'primordial'. Events, and their divine giver, are inwardly interrelated and mutually participatory, and by free decision they receive, 'prehend', from all other events and so choose their own development and become 'consequences' gathering up their past into their future, actualizing their possibilities. Ultimately, God is also the recipient of these actualizations, harmonizing them in accordance with his love to further 'creative advance' in the cosmos, so that his 'primordial' pole is complemented by his 'consequent' pole, affected by all cosmic events in a real way. The *suffering of God is therefore totally real for process theology, but it claims that God cannot be degraded by suffering, or indeed temptation, because of his 'primordial pole'. Some critics have asked whether this imports a *dualism into the doctrine of God, but process theologians argue it is a distinction akin to the analogy of a person's life and body. We are inseparable from our bodies, and yet transcend our physical being, while being open to suffering and new experiences from our material side.

Process God is therefore only sovereign in that he patiently, unremittently, waits and persuades the creatively suffering God. God cannot compel change, and is open to new experiences in his 'consequent pole', but process theologians insist that God cannot fundamentally change as a result of his real and organic relation to the cosmos, and this is crucial as regards Christian basic spirituality which needs an unchangeably holy God to redeem and to be worshipped, although given the temporality of this process God, it is not immediately evident why radical change should not take hold of God. Process God works only through the freedom of the cosmos, and his judgment is a matter of a refining, sanctifying process, of luring the world towards a more loving and more joyful future, away from its self-centredness and complacency, an attitude rejected by God.

In a sense, process theology is one of continual self-incarnation of God into the material order, and Christ's *incarnation therefore exemplifies what is happening rather than proving a great disjuncture with the process. God, according to Whitehead, is not the 'exception to' the metaphysical principles undergirding reality as process, but rather the 'chief exemplification of' these principles, and Jesus discloses the heart of how things really are and should be, true openness to God. The *atonement is understood as a revelation of divine suffering and a summons to repent, along the line of the theology of *Abelard. Process Christologies, as in David Griffin, Norman Pittenger and Lewis Ford, show that Christ's life was God's in the sense that it was lived in perfect obedience to the 'lure' of God to the extent that a whole new subjectivity, a way of human living, is inaugurated, a Christology sharing much with that of *Schleiermacher. The result of the life and death of Christ is the emergence of a new kind of community, the *church. This is the meaning of *resurrection: the body of Christ is born. For Ford, this is seen as a major step in human evolution. Man is now radically different and communitarian. Add to this the view that the *Holy Spirit is to be understood as God's contribution of initial aims, and we see that process theology is unitarian, not trinitarian.

We can now see why Hartshorne rejects theism as divorcing God from the world, *pantheism as identifying God as the world, and opts for *panentheism, teaching that the cosmos is everlastingly in God, with God empathetically superintending, rather than imperiously controlling, the cosmos. The cosmos and process God were and are organically everlasting, intertwined in the temporal process, not so much 'ying and yang' as co-equal but coordinated ontologically, as mind to body. As regards the doctrine of *revelation, we can see that the cosmos, the body of God, is a continual disclosure of the divine purposes and also of evil frustrating these. Christ is the key moment of disclosure of this pattern already going on in history, as God absorbs the pain of the negative (Hegel).

*Hermeneutics is seen as an attempt to retrace the revelational process to discover God's original 'lure', in a markedly Hegelian way. Thus, it has both objective and subjective components, and is possible only in the interaction of the reader.

The general features of process philosophy imply a view of man that is very close, if not identical, to that of *Heidegger, *Bultmann and other *existentialists. Ogden has been the principal figure in developing this point. A person is a series of separate events. Each point is autonomous not only in relation to all others in the series, but also to God. It is self-determinative. Thus, it is also dependent on its own existential decision. I am what I am now deciding to be.

As a result, the redemptive activity of God consists in his willingness to accept past evil, transform it into good and continue to lure each individual toward a self-authenticating acceptance of true value. A person's salvation consists in his recognition of disloyalty to communality and his willing acceptance of God's lure to be a member of the body of Christ.

The process God's ability to preserve each event as an 'eternal object' adds an *eschatological dimension to the theological system. Not only does God's continuing knowledge preserve the reality (in a subjective sense) of each occasion, but his use of the past in presenting new possibilities to the future also gives meaning to former events. Ogden and others have used this concept in Whitehead as a way of spelling out the biblical idea of eternal life and heaven. Nothing is forgotten to the love of God; all is preserved and continues to affect the future meaningfully. It should be noted, however, that this is not conscious personal continuance, and also that it is universal in application.

Ford, Cobb and others have done much to develop a general eschatology as well. It follows from their view of the church as the emergence of a higher state of human evolution (see *Creation). This understanding permits us to look forward to a time when God's aims will finally overcome the individual evil events, and bring about a true community of love and peace. Hartshorne roots this in the biblical view of love as true union.

Process theology clearly affirms much that traditional Christianity welcomes, notably the empathy of God for the world and the desire of God to work through creaturely freedom rather than iron laws and sheer power. But the question is whether in so emphasizing such factors process theology has tipped over into a system offering a depotentiated deity who is so vulnerable to the world process as to be incapable of reaching into history to save and renew. The *history of theology has seen the equivalent of process theology in nineteenth-century theology influenced by *Hegel, in which Christ becomes a symbol of the process as God reveals himself to himself. The telling criticism offered by Karl *Barth in his dialectical theology can be directed at process theology. As with all systems tending to *monism, process theology struggles to present a sufficient doctrine of radical evil, tending to regard it as part of the process, the discord contributing to the overall harmony.

Several influential theological movements of the later twentieth century have drawn on process theology, notably *feminist theology and theologians of the *ecological movement. Feminist theology applauds the process theologians' rejection of the God who is in control, as 'male', and favour the great emphasis on nurturing and organic real relations with the cosmos, on the model of the foetus in the divine womb, united but distinct, stressing the physical and affective. Ecological thinkers have produced cosmologies suggesting a panentheism, and the Gaia theory of J. Lovelock has much in common with process views. *Evangelical theology has also been deeply affected by process thought in theologians espousing *open theism, notably Clark *Pinnock. The vulnerability of God has been emphasized by some pastoral theologians along the lines of process theology as a comfort to the suffering, since God is our co-sufferer who understands, the problem being whether God can break in to heal and to save, or merely sympathizes. Critics, on the other hand, point to the theological problems entailed with a disempowered God who cannot exercise control over a universe which could spiral into chaos and total disorder; indeed such a deity would prove to be irresponsible in creating the world and risking the horror of evil triumphing. Herbert McCabe, one such critic, therefore suggests that process theology is the result of anthropocentric sentimentalism. But it cannot be denied that process theology proves a stimulating dialogue partner for many strands of Christian theology.

Bibliography

D. Brown, R. E. James and G. Reeves (eds.), Process Philosophy and Christian Thought (Indianapolis, 1971); J. B. Cobb and D. R. Griffin, Process Theology: An Introductory Exposition (Philadelphia and Belfast, 1976 and 1977); P. S. Fiddes, The Creative Suffering of God (Oxford 1988); L. Ford, The Lure of God (Philadelphia, 1978); D. R. Griffin, A Process Christology (Philadelphia, 1973); R. Gruenler, The Inexhaustible God (Grand Rapids, 1984); C. Hartshorne, Man's Vision of God and the Logic of Theism (Chicago, 1941); H. McCabe, God Matters (London 1987); D. Pailin, God and the Processes of Reality (1989); N. Pittenger, Christology Reconsidered (1970); S. Ogden, The Reality of God and Other Essays (London, 1966); I. Trethowan, 'Process Theology and the Christian Tradition', Studies in Historical Theology 5 (Still River, 1985); A. N. Whitehead, Religion in the Making (Cambridge, 1926); idem, Process and Reality (London, 1929); D. D. Williams, The Spirit and the Forms of Love (New York, 1968).

T. BRADSHAW

PROCESSION (OF HOLY SPIRIT), see HOLY SPIRIT; TRINITY

PROGRESS, IDEA OF

The idea characterizing nineteenth-century thinking was progress. There were many reasons for this. Britain's Industrial Revolution became the pattern for rapid economic growth and social development throughout the Western world. Scientific discovery and its application in such practical developments as techniques of mass production and advances in public health helped generate an optimistic and forward-looking mentality buttressed by the spread of Western civilization by European empires and across North America. At the same time, the influence of *Hegel's dialectical *rationalism provided the seedbed in which was sown the theory of evolution (see *Creation and evolution).

Evolutionary progress as the explanatory hypothesis of reality was therefore antecedent to the development of Darwin's theory of evolution (itself not the first scientific theory of its kind). Darwinism seemed to provide a scientific basis for the philosophical ideas which were already popular, and the use of biological evolution as the key to all historical development reached its high-water mark in the extensive writings of Herbert Spencer (1820–1903). It was typical of the mindset of the mid-nineteenth century that his scientific hypothesis should be made the basis for general philosophical constructions. Scarcely any thinker avoided being influenced by the idea of evolutionary progress, in which the development of human society and the moral development of man were seen as continuous and essentially analogous with the supposed upward progress of biological evolution.

Jesuit anthropologist *Teilhard de Chardin attempted a full-blooded marriage of Darwinism and the Christian view of humanity and redemption. Spencer's later contemporary, Henry Drummond, sought in popular evangelical terms to do something similar in his Ascent of Man (1894). And many more recent forms assimilating theology and science have been offered: e.g. Wolfhart *Pannenberg's view of theology as a hard science and the future's ontological priority; the work of the John Templeton Foundation, advocating that *science may provide better insights into theology.

One immediate implication of these ways of thinking was found in the understanding of *history, where evolutionary progress was used to sketch the narrative. Since the Bible largely presents an account of history, there were dramatic repercussions for how the Scriptures were read. A classic instance is William Robertson Smith's Religion of the Semites (1889), which attempted to find revelation in a naturalistic reading of history. It was of course not new for naturalistic explanations to be given to the biblical story. Yet such was the absorption with evolutionary progress that in the mid- and later nineteenth century the church itself began to adopt such readings of its canonical Scriptures.

The Bible does not present human history as an evolutionary progress. It tells of an original perfection from which humans have fallen (see *Fall), and the following story of failed attempts to set matters right (Babel, flood, exile), with perpetual human regress. Ultimate 'progress' comes only from God. The idea of a natural evolutionary progress, with implications for morality, is therefore antithetical to the biblical picture of humanity and religion, and so the attempt to reinterpret the biblical history has to adopt the violent methods of Procrustes, and subordinate the data to the theory. This explains in part the subsequent history of OT scholarship, which despite noticeable problems with an evolutionary paradigm is still undergirded by the inversion of the order of the law and the prophets which the theory required (since prophetic religion was held to be more simple and therefore earlier).

Later social developments – from the First World War to the rise of the radical Islamic state, with global warming and economic meltdown, to epidemics and other damaging features of the Anthropocene era – essentially show that progressive views of humanity are fraught with challenges. Indeed, the myth of endless progress is seen especially in the inability of science and technological progress to account for matters of the soul and the rest of the human experience, leaving these things often ignored. Progress is still possible, but only in ways that reckon with the possibility of the (ironic) setbacks of various forms of so-called progress. And indeed, in the face of the secularization thesis that people will progress beyond religion, the majority of people today remain religious.

Human progress has been shown to be tenuous and by no means inevitable or unending, with question marks put against the claim that humanity has advanced morally since its earliest days. Redemption, far from being a product of evolution, can only be by revolution in humanity's continually regressive moral and spiritual story. The only true idea of progress is that of the progress of God in salvation history.

Bibliography

C. Dawson, Progress and Religion: An Historical Enquiry (London, 1945); C. S. Lewis, 'The Funeral of a Great Myth', in Christian Reflections (London, 1967).

N. M. DE S. CAMERON

PROOFS OF GOD'S EXISTENCE, see NATURAL THEOLOGY

PROPITIATION, see ATONEMENT; SACRIFICE; WRATH

PROSPERITY THEOLOGY

With the core of its message often referred to as the 'prosperity gospel', prosperity theology is a system of thought within the wider *Pentecostal movement, asserting that God wishes everyone to be healthy and wealthy. This theology asserts that if prosperity is not present in the lives of professing Christians, then God's blessing may not be upon them.

Developed in extravagant ways in the USA during the twentieth century with various so-called faith healers (e.g. Benny Hinn, Kenneth Copeland), teachers who became well known through television and modern media, these leaders built multi-million dollar international industries and have been widely subject to accusations of exploitation.

Additionally, there is a group of prosperity teachers deemed by many in the popular evangelical world as closer to, if not part of, *evangelicalism, including Joel Osteen, T. D. Jakes and Joyce Meyer. While committed to a kind of prosperity theology, they have become more identified with the wider evangelical movement.

Prosperity teachers are often popular particularly with those from lower socio-economic situations, often in Latino, African-American, South-East and Far-East Asian communities. One small group of prosperity preachers was profiled in a two-season US reality-television show, Preachers of L.A. (2013–14).

Bibliography

D. W. Jones and R. S. Woodbridge, Health, Wealth & Happiness: Has the Prosperity Gospel Overshadowed the Gospel of Christ? (Grand Rapids, 2010); <<http://www.oxygen.com/shows/preachers-of-la>>.

J. S. SEXTON

PROTESTANTISM

The term derives from the Diet of Speyer in 1529, when five German princes and fourteen cities made a formal protestatio against legislation to end all toleration of Lutherans in Catholic districts and demanded freedom of conscience for minorities. Protestants were marked out as stressing personal faith in Christ in Pauline fashion, and critical of Rome in so far as her practice obscured such faith. It is worth noting that groups now called Protestant existed prior to Luther and the Reformation, notably the *Waldensians, the *Hussites and Lollards. Protestantism has a longer pedigree than the *Reformation, deriving most deeply from the evangelical message of the NT, and this message has bubbled up throughout Christian history as a testimony on behalf of Christ – protestare in the most positive evangelical sense.

Core orientations of Protestantism

Grace and faith

The Pauline message of *salvation for believers in the crucified and risen Christ made present in the Spirit is central to original Protestantism, in fact the Protestant Reformation might be regarded as a recovery of the *Spirit in the church, overcoming clerical mediation. The Protestant Reformers stressed the divine gift of *grace, an emphasis found in Augustine, an authority much cited in this respect. But *Luther's emphasis found in Romans the doctrine of *justification by grace through *faith, the total acceptance by God of the repentant believer on the basis of the *sacrifice of Christ (see *Atonement, *Cross, *Redemption). Protestant theology and spirituality has since stressed this 'once for all' aspect of salvation, although it cannot be said that the challenge of *sanctification as a life process was neglected, notably in the writings of *Calvin. But salvation is the gift of God, even 'good works' are divinely given and empowered in 'the paradox of grace', the divine embracing the human, the glory going to God. The stress on grace as the direct gift of God, rooted solely in divine action at Calvary, is distinctively Protestant. Debates about the doctrine of *predestination, election (see *calling) and the status of human will take up deep strands of *Augustinian theology also found in less systematic form in biblical texts. Calvinistic and *Arminian emphases continue to be found within Protestantism, stressing divine and human agency respectively.

Protestantism harks back to *Scripture and its patterns of life in order to judge and reform current church practice now – semper reformanda. Another point worth noting is the Protestant tradition of accepting that Christians will disagree on some secondary things, adiaphora, but should all unite on the primary issues of the *gospel of salvation – indeed such shared basics are 'the catholic faith' for Protestants, rather as Irenaeus set out his 'rule of faith' as a summary of core beliefs in the early church. Scripture stands over church tradition for Protestantism, but the history of doctrinal tradition is a key resource in seeking to wrestle with problems of interpretation. Protestantism continues to be defined powerfully by its commitment to Scripture, and the principle sola Scriptura has proved a key distinguishing feature over against *Roman Catholicism. After the Enlightenment, Protestant thinkers debated the infallibility of Scripture intensively, the figure of *Schleiermacher representing a liberal view, followed by *Ritschl and *Harnack, with a conservative reply from *Pietists, *evangelicals and Tractarians (see *Anglo-Catholic theology) in England. B. B. *Warfield in America produced important scholarly defences of the inerrantist view at the end of the century (see *Infallibility and inerrancy of the Bible).

The priesthood of all believers

This emphasis on grace was gained from the NT and in effect broke the medieval synthesis of sacramental grace mediated by the priesthood, including the sacrament of *penance. The medieval hierarchical structure of salvation could not survive the radical Pauline message of Christ's reconciling grace received by personal faith. The church's ministry therefore becomes a pastoral ministry of this word, very much rooted in Scripture and lived out in practice, arguably the ministerial shape of the earliest church. Priesthood is attributed to the whole church, to all believers, as holy and set apart in Christ for the service and praise of God the Father. But the ordained ministry is very important to the church, as Calvin and many after him have taught. The minister's role has been acknowledged by most strands of Protestantism, although not by the Brethren. The ordination of women to the pastoral ministry has been accepted by many Protestant churches, but by no means all. Fierce debates about the place of homosexuals in church life may be best seen under this heading, in that salvation is by grace but Scripture seems to be clear in holding homosexual practice to be wrong, and therefore ordination of non-celibate homosexuals is not acceptable to most traditional Protestant denominations, which would seek to accept and work with homosexuals while commending abstinence for serious disciples.

While the *priesthood of all believers and a pastor-teacher ordained ministry has been the Protestant theory, history has examples of heavy-handed clericalism and even persecution, for example, the Salem witchhunts and the use of force against dissidents such as the *Anabaptists in the *Radical Reformation. Karl *Barth was scathing in his attack on the 'German Christians' who sided with Nazism in the 1930s. But the Protestant view of church history is that it is far from sinless.

The sacraments

Protestants hold to two *sacraments, taken from the NT with a strong background in the OT: *baptism and the Lord's Supper or Holy Communion (see *Eucharist). Both relate to the death of Christ as the matrix of salvation: the dying and rising with Christ in the waters of baptism; partaking of the bread and wine closely linked to Christ's Last Supper, interpreting his death to his disciples. Protestants all accept the importance of these sacraments, although they disagree about aspects of them. For example, Baptist churches do not baptize infants, and the symbolic link between the bread and wine with Christ has various interpretations, from a 'mere' sign to an 'effectual' sign conveying what it signifies. The dynamic role of the Spirit in or through the sacraments is a common Protestant emphasis, and indeed one now ecumenically agreed with Rome as seen in the Anglican Roman Catholic Agreed Statement, The Final Report.

*Church and state

As Scripture stands over tradition, Christ stands over his church, and Protestantism has a deep critique of any doctrine of the church that falls into a self-identification with Christ and then a dispenser of grace. The church stands in constant need of forgiveness for all her members; there is no specially holy caste distinct from ordinary believers. This tension between Christ and his church, in contrast to Roman Catholic identification of the two, is a fundamental difference. The Protestant Reformation received the protection of many German princes who prevented Luther being executed in the manner of Jan Hus earlier. This state protection was important historically, but theologically now seems dubious. Some Protestant denominations accepted state sponsorship – Lutherans and *Anglicans, for example – others very much rejected it, notably Calvinists. The Radical Reformation, leading to the Anabaptists and *Mennonites especially, taught a far deeper divide between church and state and developed a strongly *pacifist tradition, notable today through the work of John Howard *Yoder. The relationship between the church 'visible' and 'invisible' has been an important topic for Protestants: outer structures being adiaphora in relation to the 'inner' spiritual wholeness of Christ. This has led to charges of *dualism and other-worldliness, but Protestant history can point to an agenda of social reform and good works on a large scale. Protestantism resists sectarianism in that it recognizes fellow believers in many denominations worldwide, regarding the true church as those in communion with Christ, rather than those belonging to a particular denomination.

Many Protestant churches use the early *creeds, notably the Nicene Creed of 381, but those not favouring formal use of creeds adhere to *trinitarian doctrine upholding the deity of Christ. The English Protestant tradition includes the Anglican Church, framed by *Cranmer especially, but accused by other denominations of maintaining too many customs from Roman Catholicism and of an Erastian position of church and state. Protestantism has been associated with social action in society (see *Social ethics): nineteenth-century Britain saw Wilberforce abolish slavery and Shaftesbury introduce factory legislation; Elizabeth Fry worked in prisons; Nightingale reformed nursing; the 'Nonconformist Conscience' attacked social evils; Methodism was the tap root of the Trade Union Movement. In the twentieth century, Martin Luther King in the US famously campaigned for civil rights. One of the most significant moments in twentieth-century tensions between church and state was Karl Barth's *Barmen Declaration of 1934, summoning the German church to a total focus on Christ and against Nazi ideology. *Bonhoeffer's theology and ministry cannot be overlooked as part of this Protestant church struggle.

World Protestantism

The original Reformation was an event of immense creative power renewing faith and rediscovering Scripture. It spread through Western Europe, then to America with the *Puritans, and across the globe with missionary societies. Protestant denominations include: Lutherans, 66 million worldwide; Presbyterians, 75 million; Anglicans, 73 million; Methodists, 70 million; Baptists, 70 million; Pentecostals, 105 million. The newer expressions of faith such as *Pentecostalism are growing faster than the older 'mainline' denominations. Protestant missionary movements flourished in the nineteenth century, but now suffer criticism for failing to distinguish sufficiently between culture and Christianity. But Protestantism has found many enculturated forms globally. The phenomenon of the 'mega churches' in South Korea are interesting new developments, associated with Pentecostalism, each church consisting of tens of thousands of members in urban contexts. Such new expressions of Christianity and new structures chime in with the advent of *postmodernity, the breakdown of older forms of identity and the formation of new bondings and modes of Christian life, especially responding to urban conditions and flexibilities of lifestyle. Denominational allegiance means less and less to Protestants, who seem happy to cross structural boundaries, especially the younger generation in an era of globalization and liquid identities.

Strands and tensions in Protestantism

Christianity has always shown change and continuity, and the Protestant Reformation refocused faith in terms of personal knowledge of Christ, and the authority of Scripture as the shaping of this Christ and the doctrine of God at work in history. The history of Protestantism shows some strands stressing personal faith at the expense of the 'propositional' doctrines based in Scripture, and vice versa. *Schleiermacher reacted against what he took to be dry formalist dogmatism by stressing personally experienced faith with the Bible as a fallible source for such experiences. *Kierkegaard focused on individual faith at the expense of all else. *Kant taught that Christianity was essentially a morality, and his influence has been very deep on intellectual Protestantism ever since in the liberal Protestant school. The early twentieth century saw a deep reaction to liberalism in the rise of 'crisis' theology by Barth, stressing the radical objectivity of God, witnessed to by Scripture, and the need for the grace of Christ and his cross. His theology spoke to many in the era of the two World Wars, although his doctrine of Scripture has been held suspect by many liberals and evangelicals, for different reasons (see *Liberal theology). *Bultmann, Barth's contemporary, developed a more individualist path, seeking to equate Christian faith with *existentialist moments of encounter and to 'demythologize' Scripture as symbolic of such moments. Subsequent theologians such as *Moltmann and *Pannenberg have criticized Barth's theological dualism in favour of deepening doctrines of divine immanence in history, reflecting the influence of *Hegel, also present in the British theologian *Macquarrie. *Jüngel develops Barth critically, and his theological work has enjoyed a renaissance in the early twenty-first century, some theologians linking it with postmodern thinkers and their emphasis on the fractured nature of human culture. It is probably true to say that the modern enterprise of biblical studies and *hermeneutics has been driven and dominated by Protestant thought.

One of the greatest challenges to Protestantism is reacting to other world faiths in an era where mission and evangelism are under secular criticism (see *Christianity and other religions). A radical relativism is now one intellectual option, pioneered by *Hick, claiming that all religions lead to God and that missionary endeavour is simply disrespectful and offensive. This view suits Western secular politics as it wrestles with the problems of multicultural societies after large-scale immigration into Europe and America of peoples with Eastern faiths. Evangelical Protestantism, however, points to the 'offence of the cross' as the essence of the Christian message and refuses to allow it to be relativized into a general religiosity. The Protestant tradition has emphasized freedom of personal faith, and tolerance, but now it is faced with the problem of being labelled 'intolerant' merely for commending its own gospel of Christ to other faiths. The classical Protestant doctrines of salvation and *revelation are at stake in such controversies. The tension of love and truth in Protestant Christianity may be posed as alternatives in this problematic situation, but the deeper issue is whether it can be loving to deny the truth of Christ to any human being. Pluralism has become a feature of Protestantism itself, embracing all manner of contemporary movements of thought, notably *feminism and *Marxism through *liberation theology, raising the question as to the limits of Protestantism.

Protestantism has historically shaped the development of Europe and its institutions, and indeed of the *cultures of other continents, including Africa, where it enjoys its most rapid growth. As its old denominational identities lose their attraction, particularly in terms of 'established' churches, it is likely that looser affiliations will develop. Deep tensions exist between evangelical and liberal Protestants over questions of sexual ethics as postmodern culture loses touch with Judeo-Christian morality in favour of ever-increasing flexibility and experiential freedom. Roman Catholic critics in particular have pointed to Luther's sola fidei as a cause of modern individualism and fragmentation. *Tillich, a Lutheran theologian, has written of 'the Protestant Principle' along similar lines. At the level of theology Protestant and Roman Catholic scholars relate normally, and at denominational level the *ecumenical movement has brought together Protestant churches and Rome in active dialogue.

Protestant Christianity is pluriform, although bound to Scripture as its orientation to God and the world, and ultimately to the triune God focused in the saving act of sacrifice at Calvary. It is not a philosophy so much as a shared faith in the God who reaches out to humanity in *love. This view would be shared by all Protestants, with a wide range of opinion as to how Scripture functions to shape this faith in the world today. The category of 'Protestantism' indicates a very wide range of theologies, ecclesiologies and spiritualities. Troetsch's classification of 'church', 'sect' and 'mystical communion' remains useful as marking the range of Protestant modes of Christian practice and its diversity of approach. Protestantism adopts a stance over against very secular Western culture as an *eschatological voice offering Christlike acceptance and community to a lonely and deeply individualized society; and again it can seem to accept cultural developments uncritically. It is probably safe to say, however, that a focus on Christ and his work, present by the Spirit, portrayed through the Bible, is common to any Protestantism, albeit in sometimes strikingly different ways. The term Protestant itself may be in danger of gradually emptying on the one hand into the category 'evangelical', and on the other 'liberal', as the sharp emotional tone of the division between Protestant and Roman Catholic continues to soften.

See also: CHURCH; CHURCH GOVERNMENT.

Bibliography

K. Barth, Protestant Theology in the 19th Century (London, 1972); J. B. Cobb, Living Options in Protestant Theology (Philadelphia, 1962); J. Dillenberger and C. Welch, Protestant Christianity Interpreted Through Its Development (New York, 1954); P. Meinhold, 'Protestantism', in K. Rahner (ed.), Sacramentum Mundi, vol. 5 (London 1970); O. O'Donovan, On the Thirty-Nine Articles (Exeter, 1986); H. M. Rumscheidt, Revelation and Theology: An Analysis of the Barth-Harnack Correspondence of 1923 (Cambridge, 1972); P. Tillich, The Protestant Era (Chicago, 1948); E. Troeltsch, Protestantism and Progress (Boston, 1958); L. Vischer and H. Meyer (eds.), Growth in Agreement: Reports and Agreed Statements of Ecumenical Conversations on a World Level, Ecumenical Documents II (New Jersey, 1984); M. Weber, The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism (Harmondsworth, 2002 [1903]); J. S. Whale, The Protestant Tradition (Cambridge, 1955); J. H. Yoder, The Politics of Jesus (Grand Rapids, 1994 [1972]); H. Zahrnt, The Question of God: Protestant Theology in the Twentieth Century (London, 1969).

T. BRADSHAW

PROVIDENCE

The idea of providence arises from the notion of God as Creator. For there must be an answer to the question, how does the 'Maker of heaven and earth' relate to what he has made? Although it is possible to consider such questions from a purely philosophical or theoretical point of view, the Christian answer is derived from the teaching of Scripture. On this view *God upholds, governs and directs the order that he has created to a final end or ends.

Within the Christian church, however, the character of this providential activity of God has been variously understood. On the one hand providence is held to be 'meticulous', reaching down to every detail of the creation, including, crucially, to human free actions. On this broadly *Augustinian outlook, largely shared by the Magisterial *Reformers, even human wills fall under the providential order, and God willingly permits evil while not himself being the author of it, just as he efficaciously renews the sinful will without externally compelling it. On a broadly *Patristic, semi-*Pelagian or *Arminian view, God 'makes room' for human free *will, foreknowing but not foreordaining it. More radically still, for *Socinianism or modern '*openness' views, God, together with his creatures, faces an indeterminate future even though his resourcefulness is much greater than that of any creature. Each of these views, though not derived from philosophy, typically uses philosophical concepts, from *Aristotelianism or *Stoicism, for example, to articulate the view.

Providence is distinct from *creation. But accounts of this distinction also vary in their emphases. One approach stresses two different orders of causality, divine and human. God is the primary cause, creatures are (different kinds of) secondary cause, with which the primary cause mysteriously meshes and 'concur'. For reasons to do with the Creator-creature distinction, and also with the problem of *evil, care is taken to stress the separateness of the created order from the Creator's activity, which upholds and concurs with that of his creatures but is distinct from it. Such accounts can be found in *scholasticism and those theologies influenced by it. Another approach sees the divine activity as upholding the creation from moment to moment, and even as continuously recreating it. Here creation and providence are hard to distinguish, and occasionalism, the view that God is the only real cause, and creaturely causes and effects are simply correlations of created events, becomes an option.

Whatever their differences, this spectrum of views is united in distinguishing the Christian view of providence from several others which are held to arise from sub or non-Christian sources. *Deism is the view that God's creation unfolds in time through the original impetus imparted to it by the act of creation. For the deist, divine upholding is vestigial, and miracles are either impossible or unnecessary. Fatalism is dismissed as a pagan notion. It is impersonal, and it detaches ends from their means in a way which is at odds with the Christian view. Chance (in its ontological and not merely epistemological varieties), the idea of uncaused or purely unaccountable events (which is to be distinguished from the view that events occur with no presently assignable causes), is held to be incompatible with the view of divine *sovereignty, for it appears to place elements of the creation beyond the reach of the Creator.

Besides being of theological importance, ideas of providence have important practical consequences for those who believe them. The attitude to misfortune of those who hold that all events are in some sense willed by God is very different from those who attribute some events to the human will alone, or to chance, or to impersonal fate.

Bibliography

P. Helm, The Providence of God (Leicester, 1993); D. M. Mackay, Science, Chance and Providence (Oxford, 1978); J. Sanders, The God Who Risks (Downers Grove, 1998).

P. HELM

PSEUDO-DIONYSIUS THE AREOPAGITE

This name is given to the unknown author, probably a Syrian, of an extremely influential group of Greek theological works in the tradition of Christian Neoplatonism (see *Platonism) in the fifth or sixth century.

The writings in question comprise four treatises and ten letters addressed to persons of the apostolic age (though hints are also made in these texts about the existence of other works which, presumably, have not survived). The Divine Names explains God's attributes on the basis of the divine names supplied in the Bible. The Heavenly Hierarchy deals with *angels and their triadic hierarchical divisions and functions (i.e. seraphim-cherubim-thrones, dominions-authorities-powers, principalities-archangels-angels, and the threefold function of purification-illumination-perfection). The Ecclesiastical Hierarchy deals with the church's hierarchical structures (i.e. hierarchs-priests-liturgists and therapeutes [monks]-laity-catechumens) and their liturgical/sacramental functions. The Mystical Theology deals with the mystical union of the human soul with God achieved by means of cataphatic and *apophatic procedures.

Clearly, the addressees of the Epistles and the claims of the author point to his identity with Dionysius the Areopagite of Acts 17:34. This view prevailed by 649, when the Lateran Council, summoned in Rome against Monotheletism (see *Christology), appealed to the writings as accredited theological witnesses. This view had already been accepted by such distinguished church authors as *Gregory the Great, Leontius of Byzantium (see *Hypostasis) and *Maximus the Confessor. Once it became accepted, Dionysius' writings were rapidly disseminated, exerting a profound influence, both in the East and in the West, for centuries to come.

At the close of the Middle Ages their authenticity was questioned by Lorenzo Valla (c. 1406–57) and especially by *Erasmus, but without procuring a universal consensus, though from now on their authorship remained in dispute. This was true both at the time of the Reformation and during the nineteenth century, until in 1895 Joseph Stiglmayr and Hugo Koch, arguing independently on internal grounds and especially from their literary dependence on Proclus (411–85) and clear reference to later liturgical forms, established that the writings belong to an author who lived in late-fifth-century Syria. Since then, many attempts have been made to identify the author, but without success. The only sure point of an emerging consensus is that he must have been either a *Monophysite or a Monophysite sympathizer.

The obvious question, how an unknown writer could exert such a tremendous influence on theologians of all contexts and ages, can be adequately answered only by reference to the profound content and exceptional quality of his thought. It represents an answer to the two great challenges to early Christianity of *Gnosticism and Neoplatonism, which is based not on the development of a dialectical antipode to either of these but on a vision of catholic wholeness which includes and transcends both. Against Gnosticism it maintains that God is unknowable (anōnymos), and against Neoplatonism that he is knowable (polyōnymos, with many names, or apeirōnymos, of infinite names). In other words, God is both transcendent and immanent in relation to the world, the former relating to his being and the latter to his acts and powers. This view is defended on the basis of the Scriptures as understood by spiritual masters and of a true knowledge of the natural world, and finds its anthropological presupposition in the Christian *ascetical life.

The work of Pseudo-Dionysius is in fact a theology or a philosophy of theology (this is still much debated), which comprises three stages, the cataphatic, the symbolic and the mystical. These are respectively related to the three persons of the *Trinity (theological dimension), to the soul's ascent to the Trinity (*anthropological dimension) through purification, illumination and glorification (or *deification or union with God), and also to the threefold structure of the cosmos.

The cataphatic theology, developed in The Divine Names, refers to man's *knowledge of God in his acts (or energies or attributes). The symbolic theology, developed in The Heavenly Hierarchy, The Ecclesiastical Hierarchy and Epistle IX, refers to the threefold knowledge of the world in which God's *revelation (theophaniai) is granted (i.e. the sensible world together with the earthly world of human beings and the heavenly world of angels) and to the soul's movement from the sensible to the ecclesiastical (purification), from the ecclesiastical to the heavenly (illumination) and from the heavenly to the divine (deification). This last stage is developed in The Mystical Theology.

Though none of his works represents a comprehensive system of theology, the whole teaching of Pseudo-Dionysius presents a remarkable coherence and systematic structure. The terminology is full of neologisms and superlatives. The style leaves much to be desired. The *Christology seems to fall in line with Zeno's Henotikon (482), and it is interesting that its central notion is that of 'a new theandric energy' (Epistle IV) instead of the traditional 'one' or 'two natures'. Despite the problems surrounding Pseudo-Dionysius, the study of his teaching is indispensable for historical theology in both East and West.

Bibliography

English translations: T. L. Campbell, Dionysius the Pseudo-Areopagite: The Ecclesiastical Hierarchy (Lanham, 1981); J. D. Jones, Pseudo-Dionysius Areopagite: The Divine Names and Mystical Theology (Milwaukee, 1980).

Studies: A. Louth, The Origins of the Christian Mystical Tradition from Plato to Denis (Oxford, 1981); E. D. Perl, The Neoplatonic Philosophy of Dionysius the Areopagite (New York, 2007); R. Roques, in DSp 3, cols.

244–286; D. Rutledge, Cosmic Theology: The 'Ecclesiastical Hierarchy' of Pseudo-Denys: An Introduction (London, 1964); I. P. Sheldon-Williams, 'The Pseudo-Dionysius', in CHLGEMP, pp. 457–472.

G. D. DRAGAS

PUNISHMENT

The definition of punishment is customarily taken to have three elements: (1) the infliction of suffering upon an offender, (2) on the grounds of a particular offence, (3) administered by a legitimate authority. Punishment is therefore distinguished from any form of rehabilitation of offenders in which suffering is incidental; from other legitimate inflictions of privation or pain, such as taxation or surgery; and from personal vengeance. All punishment is retributive in the weak sense that it is visited upon an offender for an offence; but not all theories of punishment are 'retributivist' in the stronger sense that they regard the practice of retribution as self-justifying and sufficient to support the institution of punishment to which it gives rise.

It has usually been held that a theoretical account of punishment must show how retributive punishment fulfils the general requirements of justice. Optionally, it may also try to show what specific modes or applications of punishment best fulfil these requirements. Such an account is not usually expected also to show what other concerns legitimately determine the treatment of offenders (such as the wish to see them profess Christian faith, or the desire to mitigate social and psychological evils that may result from punishment): this is the concern of wider social theory. Nor is it obliged to consider whether punishment is justified in any particular case, which is a matter for ordinary judicial enquiry.

Of the three formal theories of punishment traditionally acknowledged in the West, two proceed from the assumption that retributive punishment is not self-justifying. The oldest theory attempted to justify punishment as a moral benefit to the offender. *Plato (Gorgias 476–7) argues that since a just punishment is 'a good', the person who suffers it has good done to him: he is freed from injustice of soul. The theory was influential in antiquity, and a strand of Christian thought (later regarded as heterodox) interpreted eternal fire in these terms (see *Origen, *Gregory of Nyssa). The weakness of the theory lies in its assumption that a just punishment in itself makes the sufferer just.

The second theory is associated with the rise of modern contractarian political thought in the seventeenth century. According to this view, the purpose of punishment is the security of other members of society through the restraint of the offender and deterrence of other likely offenders. Since, on the contractarian account, individuals have surrendered certain freedoms to the state in exchange for protection of their rights, the rationale of punishment lies in its claim to safeguard potential victims. The deficiency of this theory is that deterrence and restraint do not seem to afford a sufficient justification for the limited scope of retributive punishment (as indicated by points 1 and 2 above). Nor does the theory provide a convincing account of the intuition that just punishment must be proportionate to the offence.

The third theory, associated in modern times with *Kant, *Hegel and *Schleiermacher, and building on an *Aristotelian conception, treats the practice of retribution as inherently self-justifying. It is therefore often designated the 'retributivist' theory, though it might be better termed a theory of penal 'satisfaction' or 'annulment'. For its root notion is that the damage inflicted by the offence is cancelled out, or annulled, through the imposition of a comparable injury. The theory deals more effectively than the others with the question of providing a rationale for the proportionate character of just punishment. It characteristically faults other accounts for failing to affirm the dignity of the offender as the bearer of moral responsibility. However, the theory sometimes stresses the notion of equal return to such an extent as to insist on the lex talionis, or 'eye for eye' principle; moreover, its emphasis on the absolute justice of proportionate retribution allows little room for mercy and forgiveness.

The limitations of the traditional theories arise from their failure to treat punishment within a wider account of justice in society. The Scriptures have little to say about punishment as such, but a great deal about '*judgment' (the active noun is more typical than the abstract 'justice'; see *Righteousness). Judgment gives public affirmation to those values on which the common life of society depends. The retributive form which judgment takes is derived in the OT from the natural phenomenon of blood-vengeance (e.g. Gen. 4:10–11; 9:6). The role of the human judge (as appears especially in the paradigm case of the cities of refuge, Num. 35; Deut. 19; Josh. 20) is to assume communal responsibility for vindicating the victim's claim and so to transfer the rights and duties of vengeance from the private to the public sphere. By giving judgment, and thus discriminating between innocence and *guilt and rewarding the offender proportionately to his offence, the judge transforms the originally blind and impassioned act of vengeance into an occasion for public disclosure of the truth. Proportion need not entail the arbitrary lex talionis, nor need it imply a supposedly precise equilibrium of liability and penalty. Rather, the practice of retribution is moulded into a symbolic language of proportionate response which allows a high degree of flexibility about methods and degrees of punishment.

The derivation of retribution from the wrath of the injured party helps to explain the persistent ambivalence with which it is viewed. It can neither be dismissed nor absolutized, for it is a feature of human judgment which takes place under the broken social and cosmic conditions of the *fall. Scripture does, of course, use retributive concepts of the final *judgment of God also, and so admits the general conception that justice must include an appropriate penalty for offence. Yet by characterizing divine judgment also as the free *justification of sinners, it prevents the unqualified application of the norms of human retribution to the divine. To explore the interaction of these two concepts in the eschatological sphere would require a discussion of the atoning death of Christ – the ultimate punishment for sin, which is, at the same time, the decisive act of forgiveness.

Bibliography

Historical: H. Grotius, The Right of War and Peace (London and New York, 1964), book 2, chs. 20, 21; G. W. F. Hegel, The Philosophy of Right (ET, Oxford, 1967), sections 88–103; T. Hobbes, Leviathan (1651; London, 1914), ch. 28; I. Kant, The Metaphysical Elements of Justice, section 49E, Part I of The Metaphysics of Morals (ET, Indianapolis, 1965); W. Perkins, Epieikeia: or a Treatise of Christian Equitie and Moderation (London, 1604); H. Rashdall, The Theory of Good and Evil (Oxford, 1907), book 1, ch. 9; F. de Suárez, De legibus ac Deo legislatore (London, 1679), book 5, chs. 1–12; Thomas Aquinas, Summa Theologica II:1:87.

Contemporary: W. Berns, For Capital Punishment: Crime and the Morality of the Death Penalty (New York, 1981); Lord Longford, The Idea of Punishment (London, 1961); W. Moberly, Responsibility (London, 1951); O. O'Donovan, Measure for Measure: Justice in Punishment and the Sentence of Death (Nottingham, 1977); Punishment, Report of Working Party of the Church of England's Board for Social Responsibility (London, 1963); J. H. Yoder, The Christian and Capital Punishment (Newton, 1961).

O. M. T. O'DONOVAN AND R. J. SONG

PURGATORY

In the early church questions were asked about the status after death of those Christians whose lives had been less than exemplary. Two different issues were involved. First, the need for purification after *death. *Origen argued that each individual soul receives purification after death, this being related to his belief in the ultimate salvation of all. The second issue was the idea of punishment. The Fathers believed that baptism washes away all sin, but what of sin committed as a Christian? *Tertullian and *Cyprian held that post-baptismal sin dishonours God. When we repent, God forgives us, but because we have dishonoured him we need to offer some compensation or satisfaction to God – by penance, works of merit, and so on. As this was later understood, the 'eternal punishment' due to *sin is waived, but there remains a 'temporal punishment' to pay. But suppose we die without having paid off this debt? The idea emerged that those who die 'insolvent' pay off what they owe by penal and expiatory suffering in purgatory.

Various biblical texts were recruited to this cause. In 2 Maccabees 12:38–45 an expiatory sacrifice is offered for those who have died in sin. If those who blaspheme against the Spirit will not be forgiven in the age to come (Matt. 12:31–32), does that mean that some sins will be forgiven then? Paul's statement that some will be saved as through fire (1 Cor. 3:12–15) was also interpreted of purgatory. Prayer for the dead dates back to the martyr Perpetua (c. 202). *Augustine famously acceded to his mother's request to be 'remembered at the altar' after her death (Confessions 9:12:32, 9:13:36), an important precedent. The doctrine of purgatory was developed in the Middle Ages, with considerable help from Pope *Gregory I ('the Great'). The punishment still owing at death was to be paid in purgatory, where the departed suffer the same pains as the lost in hell, with the vital difference that this is only temporary. This suffering can be mitigated by offering the propitiatory sacrifice of the mass for the departed. When the idea of indulgences arose, these were also seen as effective for the dead in purgatory.

It was, of course, the practice of indulgences that provoked *Luther's protest and his Ninety-Five Theses. The Reformers all rejected the idea of retributive punishment for believers, although recognizing a disciplinary role for punishment (see *Reformation theology). The Council of *Trent reaffirmed the full medieval system.

But what of purification? C. S. *Lewis accepted the idea of a purgatorial purification after death (Letters to Malcolm: Chiefly on Prayer). Recent Roman Catholic thought plays down the idea of punishment (though without losing it completely) and instead emphasizes the idea of purification (e.g. in the Catechism of the Catholic Church §1030–32, but cf. §1471–79 on indulgences).

Bibliography

J. Le Goff, The Birth of Purgatory (London and Aldershot, 1984 and 1990); H. Schwarz, Eschatology (Grand Rapids and Cambridge, 2000); J. L. Walls, Purgatory: The Logic of Total Transformation (New York and Oxford, 2012).

A. N. S. LANE

PURITAN THEOLOGY

Theology, according to William Ames, 'is to us the ultimate and the noblest of all exact teaching arts. It is a guide and master plan for our highest end, sent in a special manner from God, treating of divine things, tending towards you, and leading man to God. There is no precept of universal truth relevant to living well in domestic economy, morality, political life, lawmaking which does not rightly pertain to theology' (Marrow of Theology, 1623).

This comprehensive vision grew out of encounter with the God who called humankind to repentance and faith in Christ through the written and preached word, and who energized them to holiness through his Spirit. Though 'Puritan' was initially a term of abuse, historians use it for those concerned for the further reform of the Elizabethan and Stuart Church of England, because of their particular *religious experience and commitment to *Reformed theology. Their faith was shaped by their struggle with popular religious culture and Roman Catholicism.

Puritans such as Thomas Cartwright (1535–1603), Dudley Fenner (c. 1558–87) and Walter Travers (c. 1548–1643) had, by the 1580s, given Reformed theology in England a strong emphasis on purity of biblical worship and polity, as part of continued reformation. A small minority saw no hope of reformation, without separation from the Church of England, into a covenanted church of saints. Robert Browne (c. 1550–1633), Henry Barrow (c. 1550–93), John Greenwood (d. 1593) and Francis Johnson (1562–1618) provided the initial theology for this movement, but their practice and conclusions were rejected not only by the authorities, but also by most of the Puritans, who were firmly committed to a national church.

Henry Smith (c. 1550–91), Richard Greenham (c. 1535–c. 1594), Richard Rogers (c. 1550–1618) and William *Perkins worked for reformation within the Church of England and developed a theology which had increasing popular appeal among a cross-section of the nation. These preacher-theologians wrote in detail about the way God's grace could be identified in human experience, penetrating behind formal religion to an inner transformation from death in sin to life in Christ, based on full faith. Puritan diaries and autobiographies reveal how intense this struggle could be, and how personalized were the great themes of Catholic and Reformed theology.

Theologians in the Puritan tradition did not neglect the work and being of Father, Son and Spirit, or the great themes of election, calling, justification, adoption, sanctification and glorification, but their emphases on religious experience and practical piety gave their writings an accent which was unusual among Reformed theologians in other parts of Europe. John *Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress (1676) is a striking example of this difference.

Though P. Helm rightly insists that differences from Calvin should not be exaggerated, shifts of emphasis in the doctrines of *predestination and *assurance reflect use of the work of *Beza and Zanchius (1516–90), as well as expansion of the use of a theology of law and *covenant. By the time the masterly

*Westminster Confession and Savoy Declaration were written, the stream of Reformed theology had cut some fresh channels, including revolutionary and apocalyptic ones. The practical emphasis of Puritan theology led to detailed attention being paid to personal and social ethics in cases of conscience, discussions of *vocation and the relationship between *family, church and commonwealth in the redeeming purpose of God.

Reform of worship and popular religious observance, hearing and obeying the word of God and sanctification of time intersected in the development of sabbatarianism, a unique function of seventeenth-century British Christianity, which was one of the most enduring legacies of applied Puritan theology. The enthusiasm with which this was taken up by many gentry and town corporations indicates how powerfully the religious seriousness of the Puritans and their theological vision of *sabbath rest integrated with more secular aspirations such as control of leisure and the discipline of the socially marginal and disorderly.

The theology of William Perkins was the first major example of a synthesis reflecting *Augustinian and *Reformed theology applied to the transformation of Elizabethan society, church and individuals. His earliest writings were on popular piety. By 1590, he expounded the Reformed tradition in Armilla Aurea (The Golden Chain) around the theme of theology as ‘the art of living well’, using the logic of P. *Ramus to order his themes in memorable visual charts. ‘Living well’ was explored in Perkins’ other prolific writings on worship, ministry, family life, vocation and conscience, as well as in published sermons, anti-Roman polemic and detailed biblical commentaries. Perkins sought to give insight into the majesty of God’s order and its social and personal implications.

As a preacher he was reported to be able to make his auditors’ hair stand up and hearts fall down. That same intensity shines through his writing, which was translated into Dutch, German, French, Czech and Hungarian, making him the first Elizabethan theologian with an international reputation. His writing on predestination inspired *Arminius to write a refutation, which in turn precipitated one of the most important theological debates of the seventeenth century, whose reverberations are still faintly heard. Perkins’ personal influence won some important disciples, who helped the further development and popularization of Puritan theology in the British Isles, New England and the Netherlands, where it helped to shape the beginnings of Reformed *pietism.

William *Ames, Perkins’ most distinguished disciple, also wrote prolifically, but his forceful criticisms of the Church of England led to his exile to the Netherlands and the banning of his books in England, until the collapse of censorship under the Long Parliament. Teaching at Franeker gave him opportunity to demonstrate his theological gifts to a wide audience. His Marrow of Theology (1623) and Cases of Conscience (1630) were his best-known works, but his writings on congregational polity and covenant were also very influential. Ames died just before his intended migration to Massachusetts, but his influence there and in the Netherlands lasted into the eighteenth century. Like Perkins, he drew deeply on the Augustinian and Reformed tradition, but also read widely in the Fathers and scholastics to refute Roman Catholic criticisms of Protestant novelty. Ames’ practical divinity gave a comprehensive perspective of how every part of life ought to be dedicated to the glory of God, for exact understanding of divine truth must be reflected in the appropriate meaning of every detail of daily life.

By the outbreak of civil war in Scotland, Ireland and England, many with Puritan sympathies had migrated to New England, for they saw little future for their theological tradition in the Church of England. The policy of Charles I and the Laudian bishops cut across Puritan convictions on worship, ministry and conscience. Arminian theology with its rationalizing and anti-Calvinist emphases appeared to threaten foundation doctrines. Nevertheless, Puritan theology still had some formidable expositors, such as Richard *Sibbes, Thomas *Goodwin and John *Owen. Their power as preachers, leaders and theologians gave Puritan theology both popular influence and scholarly depth, complementing the influence of popular devotional manuals like A Plain Man’s Pathway to Heaven (1601) by Arthur Dent (d. 1607), which set out themes of Puritan theology in very accessible form. Indeed, one of the great strengths of Puritan theology was that it was popularized without being trivialized. As a result, its reading of the Scriptures penetrated every level of British society.

Sibbes, for example, was the son of a wheelwright who studied as a sizar at St John’s College, Cambridge, before becoming a Fellow, a preacher at Gray's Inn and then Master of Catherine Hall. His preaching and life gave him wide influence in the legal profession, but his educational achievements in Cambridge were also considerable. According to Izaak Walton, 'Heaven was in him, before he was in heaven.' His telling imagery and deep spiritual insight rested on solid theological foundations. He exemplified the synthesis between biblical depth and pastoral sensitivity which characterized Puritan theology at its best. His writings are practical rather than systematic, but show clearly why Puritan emphases were so thoroughly assimilated by many laity. He underlined the authority of Scripture. 'Were not faith founded on the word of an infinite God, thoroughly appeased, the soul would sink in great temptations.' Being under Christ's government was essential to profiting from God's promises. That meant the pulling down of human achievement before the temple of God could be built. Pessimistic about the natural man, theologians like Sibbes sensitively explored the relation of grace and freedom in the redeemed. Every aspect of life had to be scrutinized by constant self-examination, so that the temptations to sin were hated as sin itself. Such strenuous and precise piety could become a caricature of evangelical freedom, sinking into joyless legalism (see *Law and gospel), but, at its best, its insights into personal and corporate holiness have been unmatched. Sibbes' writings such as A Christian's Portion and Christ's Exaltation Purchased by his Humiliation reveal deep insights into creation and incarnation, not just a sharp focus on soteriology.

Goodwin was influenced by both Sibbes and John Preston (1587–1628) and seemed assured of a distinguished ecclesiastical career when he became vicar of Holy Trinity, Cambridge in 1632. He resigned in 1634 after being persuaded by John *Cotton of the rightness of independency. He was in the Netherlands briefly after continuous harassment by the English authorities, but in 1641 his sermon A Glimpse of Syons Glory showed that he was deeply influenced by expectations of a new divine ruler, led by the Spirit. He played an important role as an advocate of independency in the Westminster Assembly and was one of the authors of An Apologetical Narration (1643), which underlined the need for reformation in polity and life. He remained an orthodox Calvinist, but rejected a national church for covenanted churches freely associated by consultation. He played a prominent part in Cromwell's regime and was president of Magdalen College, Oxford. With John Owen he counter-attacked critics of the intellectual tradition of Puritan theology, warned against the dangers of the Racovian Catechism (published in England 1652) and sought to bring unity between Independents and Presbyterians in Christ the Universal Peacemaker (1651). Goodwin's deep personal meeting with Christ permeated all his writings, and he came close to reasoning from experience rather than Scripture in some contexts. He was more interested in biblical exposition than in systematic theology, so that his many books are occasional pieces, rather than an ordered exposition of all the great themes of Puritan theology.

It was John Owen who was, with Richard *Baxter, the great systematic thinker in the Puritan theological tradition. Educated at Oxford and thoroughly grounded in the Aristotelian tradition there, he had a long spiritual struggle for assurance that ended about 1642. His formidable intellectual gifts were given to the parliamentary cause. A Display of Arminianism (1643) was a vigorous exposition of classical Calvinism. Initially of Presbyterian views, he was converted to independency by J. Cotton's Keyes of the Kingdom of Heaven (1644) and became an influential advocate of toleration for the orthodox in Of Toleration (1648). His experience as an army chaplain gave him a vivid insight into the problems of a religion of inner light, but in Christ's Kingdom and the Magistrate's Power (1652) he sought to show the differences between civil and religious authority.

His definition of biblical authority and the unity of the Scriptures can be seen in his massive commentary on Hebrews (1668–84). A firm opponent of *Quaker teaching on the Inner Light, he also rejected attempts to give a more weighty role to reason in the formulation of theology by his critique of *Socinian and *Grotian reinterpretations of the atonement and divinity of Christ in books such as The Death of Death in the Death of Christ (1647). Owen's exposition of the high-priestly office of Christ and his classic work on the Holy Spirit make his contribution to British trinitarian theology of permanent importance. To the end of his life he worked for a more comprehensive national church and reconciliation of rival dissenters.

Puritan theology remained influential among some British dissenters such as C. H. *Spurgeon until the end of the nineteenth century. Many of the major Puritan theologians were republished in more accurate editions. Likewise in New England their direct influence was still strong in the eighteenth century through scholars such as Jonathan *Edwards. In the mid-twentieth century there was a revival of interest among evangelicals such as D. M. *Lloyd-Jones and J. I. *Packer. The intellectual strength and coherence of this theological tradition is increasingly recognized by historians, despite its eclipse during the heyday of liberal theology. Its success in interpreting the seventeenth-century world has made adaptation difficult in an intellectually different era. But the faithfulness of Puritan theology to the scriptural revelation, its comprehensiveness, its integration of theology with other kinds of knowledge, its pastoral and spiritual depth, its success in creating a lasting tradition of worship, preaching and lay spirituality make it a tradition of permanent importance in English-speaking Christianity and in the wider Reformed churches, despite its distrust of the arts, its over-emphasis on individualism and its tendency to devalue the sacraments into mere symbols.

Bibliography

F. J. Bremer, The Puritan Experiment (New York, 1976); P. Christianson, Reformers and Babylon (Toronto, 1978); J. T. Cliffe, The Puritan Gentry (London, 1984); J. Coffey and P. C. H. Lim, The Cambridge Companion to Puritanism (Cambridge, 2008); P. Collinson, English Puritanism (Historical Association pamphlet, London, 1983); P. Helm, Calvin and the Calvinists (Edinburgh, 1982); E. B. Holifield, The Covenant Sealed (New Haven, 1974); P. Miller, The New England Mind (New York, 1939; Boston, 1954); E. S. Morgan, Visible Saints (Ithaca, 1975); R. S. Paul, Assembly of the Lord (Edinburgh, 1984); K. L. Sprunger, The Learned Dr William Ames (Urbana, 1972); P. Toon, God's Statesman (Edinburgh, 1971); D. D. Wallace, Puritans and Predestination (Chapel Hill, 1982); B. R. White, The English Separatist Tradition (Oxford, 1971); G. Yule, Puritans in Politics (Appleford, 1981); D. Zaret, The Heavenly Contract: Ideology and Organization in Pre-Revolutionary Puritanism (Chicago, 1985).

I. BREWARD

QUAKER THEOLOGY

The Quakers (the Religious Society of Friends) grew out of the religious controversies of the 1650s in England. There are now 20,000 Friends worldwide, but there is no central religious authority.

Early Quaker theology contained both *Puritan and *Anabaptist elements. George Fox (1624–91) taught the apostasy of the visible church from NT times (2 Tim. 3:1–5), and claimed that Christ had now come to gather the true church. Outward belief was powerless to save, for the universal Inward Light (John 1:9–18) was the only way to Christ. The Light led Christians into unity, continually revealed scriptural truth (John 16:13), and enjoined non-violence, strict equality and a disuse of all conventional forms of address. It was active savingly also in non-Christians.

Outward sacraments were rejected as survivals of the old covenant inappropriate to the pure inward worship instituted by Christ (John 4:24). Friends considered creeds to have been created by limited and defective human intellects not under the guidance of the Light, and rejected such doctrines as imputed righteousness, total depravity, and the Trinity. The true church met for worship in silence, waiting for the Holy Spirit to inspire extempore prayers, sermons or testimonies. Ministry, unpaid and unordained, was open to all, regardless of sex.

The Apology for the True Christian Divinity by Robert Barclay (1648–90) provided structure and coherence for Quaker theology. Scripture and the Fathers were used to argue the distinctive Quaker testimonies as the central truths of NT Christianity, from which all other formal doctrines derived their cogency. So convincing was this work that no serious theological development occurred among Friends until they were forced to drop their quasi-Anabaptism and come to terms with a different intellectual climate at the beginning of the nineteenth century.

Largely due to the influence of Joseph John Gurney (1788–1847), over half the world's Quakers are now evangelicals. Scriptural inerrancy and the divinity of Christ can be harmonized with traditional Quakerism, but continuing revelation, doctrinal pacifism and atonement through the Light are harder to accommodate to evangelical principles. This branch of the Quakers calls, but does not ordain, pastors. It has adopted programmed worship, while maintaining the testimony against ordinances. *Holiness movements have had some influence. The Richmond Declaration (1887) is the standard statement of evangelical Quaker belief.

The modern non-evangelical branch combines rational, mystical and liberal tendencies deriving partly from eighteenth-century *quietist Quakerism. The doctrine of the universal Light is extended, incarnational doctrine is attenuated and the basic harmony of all religions asserted. The sense of the oneness of humanity leads this branch to be as active in peace work and social concerns as the other branch is in mission.

What divides the branches is often rival interpretations of what the original message can be understood to mean in changed circumstances. Contemporary liberal and evangelical Quakers are both being challenged by a movement to be found within both groups which takes the original message of Fox, Barclay and William Penn (1644–1718) as its datum rather than more contemporary theologies.

Bibliography

M. Abbott, M. E. Chijioke, P. Dandelion and J. W. Oliver (eds.), Historical Dictionary of The Friends (Quakers) (Lanham, 2003); R. Barclay, Apology for the True Christian Divinity (Amsterdam, 1676); L. Benson, Catholic Quakerism (Philadelphia, 1966); W. A. Cooper, A Living Faith: An Historical and Comparative Study of Quaker Beliefs, 2nd edn (Richmond, IN, 2001); J. J. Gurney, Observations on the Religious Peculiarities of the Society of Friends (London 1824); W. Penn, Primitive Christianity Revived (London, 1696); W. Pollard, F. Frith and W. Turner, A Reasonable Faith (London, 1885); G. Richards, On Being Incarnate (London, 1979).

J. A. PUNSHON

QUEER THEOLOGY

Queer theology is a distinctive theological reflection, to be understood neither as a continuation of, nor as a component in, the fields of feminist or gay and lesbian theologies. *Feminist theologies have focused on the role of gender construction in Western and Majority World theologies alike, while gay and lesbian theologies have pursued a parallel analysis concerning the role of heterosexuality. Queer theology, as a product of the late twentieth century, has gone beyond *gender criticism and specifically deconstructs heterosexual ideologies and their influence in non-heterosexual identity formation. Its points of departure are: (1) the understanding of (hetero) *sexuality as the main pervasive unquestioned ideological category in theology and religious studies and (2) a conviction that sexual identities are fluid and unstable categories. In the same way that lesbian and gay theologies criticized the essentialization of male and female identities from exclusively heterosexual perspectives, queer theology criticizes the perceived homogeneity of all heterosexual and non-heterosexual identities as deceptive. It also asserts that heterosexuality needs to come ‘out of the closet’, that is, to analyse its presuppositions and ideological interests. It suggests there is also a need to realize the epistemological implications of queer theory in, for instance, systematic theology, biblical interpretation and ecclesiology.

In queer theology the term ‘queer’ (originally a term of abuse towards non-heterosexual people) has been reclaimed in a positive way. As with *liberation theology, it has stimulated hermeneutical suspicion and has become a category mediating the critical interpretation and transformation of reality. Queer theology is more than a perspective that unveils sexual ideological formations in theology. It has its own methods and has developed reflections on new areas of theological discourse as well as in traditional areas such as Christology, Mariology and the Trinity. Queer theology is based on the theories of sexuality and gender found in the works of Michel *Foucault and Judith Butler. It uses postcolonial and *postmodern theoretical resources to ‘queer’ not only the identity of the assumed Christian believer, but also the sexual underpinnings of the construction of Christian dogmatics, ethics and pastoral theology.

Queer theology presents a discourse on sexuality and sexual cultures that has not been considered before in theology. It also has its own orthopraxis, especially amongst Third World queer theologians who are bringing issues of race, class and sexuality into the debate. But it remains a highly controversial project, the orthodoxy and legitimacy of which is questioned by more conservative Christian traditions.

Bibliography

M. Althaus-Reid, The Queer God (London, 2003); R. Goss, Queering Christ: Beyond Jesus Acted Up (Cleveland, 2002); E. Stuart, Gay and Lesbian Theologies: Repetitions with Critical Difference (London, 2003); K. Stone, Queer Commentary and the Hebrew Bible (Cleveland, 2001).

M. ALTHAUS-REID

QUEST FOR HISTORICAL JESUS, see HISTORICAL JESUS, QUEST FOR

QUIETISM

The term 'quietism' derives from the belief that God is only pleased to work in the heart of a person whose whole being is passive or quiet. It may be applied generally or specifically. In a general sense it denotes an attitude, found in many religions and at all periods of the history of the church, which suggests that one should 'Let go and let God' or 'Stop thinking and empty your mind of everything' and withdraw, individually or corporately, from concern with the world.

Such tendencies or teaching may have threatened orthodox belief most seriously in the Middle Ages, when they attracted the denunciation of the Flemish mystic Ruysbroeck (1293–1381); but the term quietism is usually reserved for the seventeenth-century controversy which received papal censure. The teaching of the Spanish priest Miguel de Molinos (1628–96) was condemned by Innocent XI in 1687; and the more orthodox 'semi-quietism' of the French nun Madame de Guyon (1648–1717), which was defended by Archbishop Fénelon (1651–1715), was condemned by Innocent XII in 1699.

Molinos was condemned for holding that 'one must totally abandon one's whole self in God and thereafter remain like a lifeless body', since 'natural activity is the enemy of grace and it hinders God's action and true perfection, because God wishes to act in us without us'. This may seem a very spiritual regard for grace and a rejection of works, but in fact it is the opposite. The 'natural' activities of the believer which are discarded include petitionary prayer, self-examination, worship with fellow-believers and participation in the Lord's Supper. All ordinary means of grace are rejected in favour of an infallible short cut: if the believer makes himself passive, God must raise his soul to union with himself.

Quietism also taught that such an experience of union with God was not a momentary ecstasy, nor a temporary stage on the path of prayer, but a permanent stage of 'pure love'. Furthermore, because in this 'mystical death' God was everything and the believer nothing, the believer was not only unconcerned about his own behaviour, but – on the grounds that all his acts were God's acts – he could hold that his acts were sinless by definition, even if they caused actual harm to others. Thus quietism represents an individualistic approach to salvation and an ethic similar to that found in *pantheism.

Quietism is a distortion of orthodox *mystical theology, but official condemnation of the one produced deep suspicion about the other. In Catholicism, uncertainty lasted throughout the eighteenth century and caused a virtual suspension of serious reflection on *religious experience. The effect on Protestantism was even more extended. Quietism had some influence on *pietism's understanding of the Christian life as one of sanctification and *union with Christ. But *Ritschl's rather unsympathetic Geschichte des Pietismus (History of Pietism, 3 vols., Bonn, 1880–86) did nothing to dissuade subsequent Reformed theologians from feeling that all so-called Christian mysticism was as suspect as quietism.

Bibliography

J. Aumann, Christian Spirituality in the Catholic Tradition (London and San Francisco, 1985); M. de Molinos, The Spiritual Guide, ed. and tr. R. P. Baird (New York, 2010), see esp. B. McGinn, 'Introduction: Part Two'; E. Herman, 'Quietism', ERE 10, pp. 533–538; D. Knowles, What Is Mysticism? (London, 1967); R. A. Knox, Enthusiasm (Oxford, 1950); E. Underhill, Mysticism (London, 1911).

P. N. HILLYER

RABBINIC THEOLOGY

The most important sources are the Mishnah, the Palestinian and Babylonian Talmuds, the Midrashim and the Targums. None of these, not even the Mishnah and Talmuds with their division into tractates, attempts a systematic rabbinic theology. The unity of God and his attributes of mercy and justice (these latter associated with the divine names Yahweh and Elohim respectively) are universally affirmed; most other basic tenets are subject to a diversity of interpretations which, in the Mishnah, Talmuds and Midrashim, are often presented in an unresolved dialectic. In general, the divine attributes of omnipresence, omnipotence and omniscience are acknowledged – the first represented by the concept of šekînâ, the radiance, presence or glory of God ('There is no place without šekînâ, Midrash on Exod. 2:9), and the last two balanced by a belief in human freedom ('All is foreseen, but freedom of choice is granted', Mishnah Aboth iii.16). The extent of an individual's piety or impiety determines whether the šekînâ is experienced as near or far.

Tôrâ ('law') is the privileged possession of Israel and what sets her apart from other nations. According to one view, it is the Jews' obedience to tôrâ that will decide the precise time of the Messiah's coming; others held that the time had already been appointed by God regardless of such considerations. That the Messiah would be an essentially human figure is the predominant rabbinic view, based partly on the Hebrew Scriptures and perhaps also conceived in reaction to Christians' claims about their Messiah. The principal function of the Messiah would be to relieve Israel of foreign oppression and raise her to her true status in the world (cf. Targum Isa. 53:8).

The rabbis attributed the human proneness to sin to the 'evil inclination' which infects human nature from birth, if not before. For Jews, however, there is the countervailing 'good inclination' which becomes operative at the bar mitzvah stage, a ceremony which marks the initiation of a boy at the age of thirteen into the Jewish religious community and into observance of the precepts of the Torah. As for the expiation of sins, repentance is effective in averting, or at least delaying, punishment in all manner of circumstances (Mishnah Yoma viii.8). Study of tôrâ and regular prayer are regarded as the particularly appropriate exercises of the faithful in an age when temple and cultus are denied even to those resident in the land of Israel. Such meritorious acts could cancel out a weight of guilt and ensure divine acceptance at the last for the one who performed them. One might also derive benefit from the meritorious deeds of someone more righteous, while, on a national scale, the merits of the fathers (patriarchs) were reckoned among the causes of prevenient grace to the people of Israel. An earthly paradise was the prospect for those, principally within Israel, who merited divine favour on the day of judgment; for those who did not, Gehenna had long since been prepared, but rabbinic humaneness is well illustrated by the tendency to limit the duration of punishment therein to a finite period, twelve months being especially favoured.

See also: JUDAISM AND CHRISTIANITY.

Bibliography

I. Epstein, Judaism (London, 1959); S. Schechter, Aspects of Rabbinic Theology: Major Concepts of the Talmud (Peabody, 1998); R. A. Stewart, Rabbinic Theology (Edinburgh, 1961).

R. P. GORDON

RACE

Race is a concept used to distinguish different groups of human beings. Distinctions are made according to a number of criteria, which always include physical appearance and its underlying genetic structure, but which may also include cultural, social, political and economic factors.

This method of distinguishing people is quite alien to Scripture, where the primary assertions are (1) of the unity of the human race, both in creation (Gen. 1:28; 5:1, 2; Acts 17:26) and in the scope of salvation (Gen. 12:3; Matt. 28:19; Col. 3:11; Rev. 5:9); and (2) that the main type of subdivision of humankind is that of 'ethnicity' or 'peoplehood', where the reference is mainly cultural, though religion may be a major factor. Therefore while at times the writers of both the OT and NT refer to peoples with a darker skin colour than their own (Num. 12:7; Song 1:5; Jer. 38:7; Acts 8:27; 13:1), no further significance is seen in the fact. Likewise, most modern scientists refuse to extrapolate from genetic formation to other human characteristics. On the other hand, the existence of 'peoples' is constantly acknowledged. The beginning of Israel's special calling follows from a list of surrounding nations (Gen. 10), and a major theme of both her historians and prophets is her interplay with other peoples. Her calling to be a blessing to all peoples is seen in the NT as fulfilled in Jesus, with the gospel spreading to all peoples, whose cultures are recognized (see the numerous incidental ethnic references in Acts) and affirmed (Rev. 21:24–26), while recognizing that individuals transcend cultures (1 Cor. 9:19–23) and that ethnic identity has idolatrous potential (Phil. 3:4–9).

Biblical reflection on ‘race’ in the present world, therefore, eliminates the simply physical and genetic emphasis, and affirms, in a restrained way, its cultural aspect. There is, however, a further and major element in the meaning of ‘race’ in the modern world: namely that differences in economic well-being and political power at both the international level and within particular nations bear a definite though not absolute correlation to differences in appearance. Such injustice is sustained either by overt ideologies of racial superiority (as in apartheid), or by unacknowledged assumptions, resulting in discriminatory and oppressive behaviour. In judgment on this situation there is a mass of biblical material about God’s hatred of social and international injustice, his concern for the oppressed, and his call to establish justice in the world (cf. *Liberation theology; *Political theology).

Any attempt, therefore, to justify treating people differently on the grounds of their appearance falls foul of biblical teaching. In particular, attempts in the late twentieth century to produce a theological defence of apartheid erred in the following ways. 1) They treated ‘race’ rather than ethnicity as the main determinant (taking Israel’s relations with her neighbours as paradigmatic would logically lead to separating Afrikaans- and English-speaking, not African and European). 2) They treated racial and cultural identity as fixed, when Scripture and history show how they develop, borrow, fragment and re-form within the God-given flux of history. 3) They were blind to the ungodly brutality, oppression and economic disparity which were inseparable from the actual implementation of apartheid.

Opposition to immigration in rich Western countries can be motivated by racial prejudice, but it can also arise from genuine concerns about the social and economic effects.

See also: BLACK CONSCIOUSNESS; BLACK THEOLOGY; DUTCH REFORMED THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

J. A. Kirk, ‘Race, Class, Caste and the Bible’, Them 10:2 (1985), pp. 4–14; J. K. Carter, Race: A Theological Account (New York, 2008); ‘The Lived Theology and Race Workgroup’, <http://www.livedtheology.org/workgroup_race.html>.

J. B. ROOT

RADICAL ORTHODOXY

Radical Orthodoxy as a term arose in the mid-1990s and found its clearest expression in a 1999 book of essays called Radical Orthodoxy: A New Theology, edited by John *Milbank, Catherine Pickstock and Graham Ward. This book was quickly followed up with a dozen monographs in the Radical Orthodoxy Series, published by Routledge. Radical Orthodoxy does not claim to be a ‘school’ of thought, but a ‘theological sensibility’ with some of the following features: a distrust in an *Enlightenment notion of the autonomy of philosophy from theology; a critical engagement with French thinkers in *postmodern philosophy; and an attempt to retrieve features of patristic and high medieval thought for contemporary theology. While Radical Orthodoxy thinkers come from a variety of ecclesial standpoints, its three most prominent thinkers are *Anglo-Catholic (Milbank, Pickstock, Ward), and in many ways the Radical Orthodoxy sensibility is an Anglo-Catholic sensibility as well.

A key theme in Radical Orthodoxy theologies is that the history of theology itself can provide clues to the decline of doctrinal theology in *modernity. In general, Radical Orthodoxy thinkers emphasize the dependence of Augustine and the Cappadocian Fathers upon the broadly *Platonic philosophical tradition, in which creatures participate in the divine life. They also draw upon *Thomas Aquinas as seen in this Platonic light, and vigorously defend Aquinas’s formulation of transubstantiation. The movement away from transubstantiation is seen as part of the decline of modernity away from its properly Platonic, participatory *ontology.

In Radical Orthodoxy’s theological genealogy, the key mistake of modernity is represented by *Duns Scotus’s departure from Aquinas, postulating a ‘univocity of being’ between God and the world rather than a ‘participatory’ ontology. Duns Scotus is seen to anticipate philosophies which seek to carve out a ‘secular space’ for inquiry, since Duns Scotus is said to deny an ‘analogy of being’ between God and creation. The distinctly modern trust in the autonomy of human reason from the realm of theology is seen as grounded in Duns Scotus's denial that universals really participate in God.

While Radical Orthodoxy brings new ideas to the contemporary theological scene, its project builds upon certain streams of thought that have been developing for several decades of scholarship: renewed work on Augustine's trinitarian theology and theology of grace; a rereading of Plato in a non-dualistic mode, emphasizing the theme of participation in the One; and the theological work of Henri de Lubac and Hans Urs von Balthasar. Much of the promise of Radical Orthodoxy lies in the rereading and retrieval of these sources. Nevertheless, the most trenchant criticisms of Radical Orthodoxy come from historical theologians. In particular, Radical Orthodoxy's reading of Aquinas, Duns Scotus and 'modernity' is frequently contested by medieval and early modern specialists.

Bibliography

J. Milbank, C. Pickstock and G. Ward (eds.), Radical Orthodoxy: A New Theology (Abingdon, 1999); J. K. Smith, Introducing Radical Orthodoxy (Grand Rapids, 2004).

J. T. BILLINGS

RAHNER, KARL (1904–84)

Rahner was a Jesuit who taught theology in Germany and Austria, a prolific author, and probably the most important and influential Roman Catholic theologian of the twentieth century. Although much of his work is quite dense and thus not immediately accessible to general readers, Rahner always considered himself to be a theologian of the church. Throughout his career, his principal aim was to articulate the claims of Christianity to ordinary people of faith in an intellectually honest and practically relevant manner. He played a key role in shaping the directions and decisions of the Second Vatican Council, and his writings continue to exert significant influence on a wide range of topics in philosophy, theology and spirituality.

At the heart of Rahner's thought is a theological anthropology which he developed under the influence of the transcendental Thomism of Joseph Maréchal (1878–1944) and in dialogue with the existential philosophy of Martin Heidegger. Rahner adopts what he calls a 'transcendental and anthropological method of theology', which, prior to considering specific theological topics, inquires into the experiential conditions that make human knowledge and activity possible. In other words, Rahner grounds his theology not in dogmatic propositions, but in basic human experience.

Rahner argues that all human beings experience transcendental experience; that is, they have an original, unthematic, pre-reflective experience that renders them always and already open to the infinite mystery in and beyond the world. Such transcendental experience becomes conscious only when we reflect on the conditions for the possibility of human knowledge and agency. While this sort of reflection can take place in mundane circumstances, Rahner emphasizes that it often emerges in moments of profound hope, fear, love, longing or trust in which we recognize that there is a self-evident holy mystery which, while transcending all things absolutely, is yet constitutive of our innermost being. Religion calls this mystery 'God'. Transcendental experience thus reveals humanity's intrinsic openness to God, who is ever present to us as the eternal 'more' – the ever-receding horizon which establishes, sustains and orients our entire existence. For Rahner, God is always revealed in the dynamic, mutually conditioning relationship between unthematic, transcendental experience on the one hand, and categorical, historical reality on the other.

On this basis, Rahner aims to breathe fresh life into the traditional faith claims of the church, so that, instead of appearing as fossilized formulations in the language of neo-scholasticism, they can be seen to have existential meaning in terms of universal human experience and its specifically modern pluralistic and scientific conditioning. The message of Christianity is that the infinite mystery of God, toward which human existence is intrinsically orientated, while always remaining a mystery, is given to us eternally and absolutely in 'free and forgiving self-communication'. This grace of divine self-communication ('mediated immediacy') is present in the transcendental experience of all human beings as an offer which can be accepted or rejected, though it grounds human freedom and determines human existence even when it is rejected. Thus, for Rahner, grace is always already present in human nature and therefore the possibility of salvation is given by God in human experience as such. This means that grace can be accepted

(and salvation realized) without knowledge of the historical Christian *revelation and without explicit faith in Christ by “anonymous Christians”. These may be adherents of other religions, or may even be professed atheists who fail to thematize their transcendental relatedness as relation to God, but have not rejected it.

Rahner’s ‘transcendental *Christology’ is built upon the human experience of ‘transcendental hope’, by which each person, in the depths of his or her being, longs and searches for ultimate fulfilment and final validity in life. This means that the need for an ‘absolute bringer of salvation’ is built into human existence. Rahner emphasizes that transcendental hope always takes place in the presence of its fulfilment – the event of God’s definitive and irrevocable self-communication to humanity. Christianity claims that in the life, death and resurrection of Jesus, there has been an unambiguous fulfilment of God’s loving pledge to humanity. In Jesus, God’s offer of grace and humanity’s acceptance of that offer was fully met in history, thereby opening a way for all other men and women to fulfil their destiny in acceptance of God’s free and forgiving self-communication.

It would be challenging to find a topic in Christian theology that Karl Rahner has not influenced in some way. In *trinitarian thought, he is well known for his axiom, ‘the economic Trinity is the immanent Trinity, and the immanent Trinity is the economic Trinity’. He is also renowned for his robust eschatology, which conceives of God as ‘absolute future’. Other areas in which he has made an indelible mark include ecclesiology, the nature of *Scripture and tradition, and the relationship between Christianity and contemporary *science. He also wrote extensively on the theology of the spiritual life, where the deep roots of his own theological approach in the spiritual exercises of *Ignatius of Loyola become apparent.

Bibliography

Works: Foundations of Christian Faith: An Introduction to the Idea of Christianity (New York, 1978); Spirit in the World (New York, 1994 [1968]); Theological Investigations, 23 vols. (London, 1961–81).

Studies: K. Kilby, Karl Rahner: A Brief Introduction (Dublin, 1997; New York, 2007); D. Marmion and M. E. Hines (eds.), The Cambridge Companion to Karl Rahner (Cambridge, 2005); G. S. McCool (ed.), A

Rahner Reader: A Comprehensive Selection from Most of Karl Rahner (London, 1975); L. J. O’Donovan (ed.), A World of Grace: An Introduction to the Themes and Foundations of Karl Rahner’s Theology (New York, 1980; Washington DC, 1995); C. J. Pedley, ‘An English Bibliographical Aid to Karl Rahner’, Heythrop Journal 25, 1984, pp. 319–365; H. Vorgrimler, Understanding Karl Rahner (London, 1986); K. H. Weger, Karl Rahner: An Introduction to His Theology (London 1980).

A. HOLLINGSWORTH

RAMM, BERNARD (1916–92)

Ramm was a North American *Baptist theologian, whose primary areas of interest were *apologetics, the relation of *science to Scripture and the question of theological *authority. His early university training included study of speech and philosophy, and later, philosophy of science. From 1943 to 1992, Ramm’s teaching and writing aimed to establish a secure epistemological basis for Christian truth statements. His thought moved from evidentialist and data-focused approaches, reminiscent of mid-century fundamentalism, to increasing reliance on argument and hypothesis in which the claims of Christianity could be understood as reasonable postulates.

In reaction to *fundamentalist perceptions that science and Scripture were in inevitable conflict, he argued for a more accommodating hermeneutic seeking a valid harmony between scientific and biblical truth claims. Such ‘intelligent biblicism’ was part of a wider programme in which Ramm urged evangelicalism to engage constructively and credibly with the modern world. Critical appropriation of Barth’s view of Scripture, and adoption of a Christocentric hermeneutic embedded in a theology of Word and Spirit, shaped Ramm’s later thought. His preferred approach was a creative if critical dialogue between Christianity and its cultural context in the modern world, enabling a constructive ‘conversation with the reigning scientific paradigms of the day’.

Bibliography

Works: Protestant Biblical Interpretation (Boston, 1950); The God Who Makes a Difference (Grand Rapids, 1972); After Fundamentalism (San Francisco, 1985); ‘Helps from Karl Barth’, in D. McKim (ed.), How Karl Barth Changed My Mind (Grand Rapids, 1986), pp. 121–125; The Evangelical Heritage (Grand Rapids, 2000).

Studies: G. Dorrien, The Remaking of Evangelical Theology (Louisville, 1998); S. Grenz, ‘Ramm, Bernard’, in BDE; K. Vanhoozer, ‘The Pattern of Evangelical Theology: Hommage à Ramm’, in B. Ramm, The Evangelical Heritage (Grand Rapids, 2000), pp. ix–xxvii.

J. GORDON

RAMSEY, IAN THOMAS (1915–72)

Ordained in 1940, Ramsey became a fellow of Christ’s College, Cambridge, in 1944, professor of the philosophy of the Christian religion at Oxford in 1951, and Bishop of Durham from 1966. In his philosophy, Ramsey saw the characteristically religious situation as one combining on the one hand a discernment, in which ‘the penny drops’ and we become aware of something that includes the visible elements of the situation but goes beyond them; and on the other, a total commitment arising from that discernment. God can be the ‘objective reference’ of such a ‘disclosure’. In these cases we find that any appropriate language has logical oddities; typically, it uses *models drawn from other contexts, but qualifies them so as to differentiate them from their normal use and stress the element of transcendence. Thus God is infinitely wise, eternal Father, first cause, and so on.

Bibliography

Principal writings: (cf. Bibliography by J. H. Pye, Durham, 1979): Religious Language (London, 1957); Freedom and Immortality (London, 1960); On Being Sure in Religion (London, 1963); Models and Mystery (London, 1964); Religion and Science (London, 1964); Christian Discourse (London, 1965); Models for Divine Activity (London, 1973); Christian Empiricism [collected papers] (London, 1974).

For critical assessment see J. H. Gill, Ian Ramsey: To Speak Responsibly of God (London, 1976).

R. L. STURCH

RAMUS, PETRUS (1515–72)

Pierre de la Ramée, a French *humanist, was educated at the College of Navarre, part of the University of Paris. He was appointed regius professor in 1551. He became a Protestant c. 1561 and was murdered during the St Bartholomew’s Day massacre. He advocated comprehensive reform of the academic curriculum, which had been long dominated by universal dependence on *Aristotelian *logic. His stress was on method, on practical utility, on simplification. His method of dichotomous division, whereby any subject could be distributed into ever smaller components and then arranged in diagrams, enabled the whole topography of knowledge to be displayed for instant comprehension. This simplifying diagrammatic method was part of a major intellectual and cultural revolution marking the boundary between the medieval and modern worlds. The invention of printing was already dissociating knowledge from discourse and reconstructing it in spatial, visualist terms. The humanist development of loci (places from which knowledge in any given subject could be surveyed) had further facilitated this shift from auditive to visual categories of thought. Ramus brought this process into pedagogy.

Ramism spread rapidly, having a major impact on educational practice until c. 1650. Germany was its principal centre, 133 editions of Ramus’ Dialectic and 52 editions of his Rhetoric being published there from 1573 to 1620. Ramist method was applied to biblical exposition by Johannes Piscator (1546–1625) and to systematic theology by Amandus Polanus (1561–1610; see *Reformed theology). J. H. Alsted (1588–1638) applied it to everything. Indeed, a line can be drawn from Ramus through Alsted to Diderot and modern encyclopaedism. Ramist influence was felt in Holland and also England, where Cambridge *Puritanism had its own stress on practical utility. In seventeenth century *New England it became firmly established at Harvard and Yale.

Despite his support of *Congregationalism, which brought him into conflict with Theodore *Beza, Ramus’ influence on theology was indirect, his one theological work (Commentary on the Christian Religion, 1576) being of meagre interest. His redefinition of theology, in line with practical utility, as ‘doctrina de bene vivendo’ (the doctrine of living well) and its major consequent dichotomy of faith and observance was later developed by Puritan Ramists such as William *Ames. It represented a new foundation in man’s faith rather than in objective revelation, and so prepared the way for *pietism. Ramus’ method also became associated with the emergent *covenant theology, its rigorous dichotomizing possibly accelerating acceptance of the double covenant idea, with a pre-fall covenant of works additional to the covenant of grace. Ramist focus on the visual could be seen as diverging from the *Reformation stress on the word. Its persistent subdivision, in imposing an arbitrary structure on theology, focused on distinctions and divisions rather than internal connections and, by its rigorous simplification, tended to obscure theology's richness and multiform complexity.

Bibliography

M. Feingold, J. S. Freedman and W. Rather (eds.), The Influence of Petrus Ramus (Basle, 2001); W. S. Howell, Logic and Rhetoric in England 1500–1700 (Princeton, 1956); R. W. Letham, 'The Foedus Operum: Some Factors Accounting for Its Development', The Sixteenth Century Journal 14, 1983, pp. 457–467; J. Moltmann, 'Zur Bedeutung des P. Ramus für Philosophie und Theologie in Calvinismus', ZKG 68, 1957, pp. 295–318; W. J. Ong, Ramus, Method, and the Decay of Dialogue (Cambridge, 1958); idem, Ramus and Talon Inventory (Cambridge, 1958); K. L. Sprunger, The Learned Doctor William Ames (Urbana, 1972).

R. W. A. LETHAM

RASHDALL, HASTINGS, see MODERNISM, ENGLISH

RATIONALISM

The term 'rationalism' is used in a number of senses. It is sometimes used in contrast to *empiricism to describe a particular philosophical tradition inaugurated by *Descartes and featuring *Spinoza and *Leibniz. Where the empirical tradition argued that all our knowledge comes through the senses, without necessarily being restricted to the senses, the rationalist tradition maintained that we possess some ideas that are innate. When the term is so used, 'Rationalist' is sometimes written with the capital letter. However, the broader use of the word is also the more familiar one, where 'rationalism' is used to designate an intellectual approach which gives pride of place to the role and powers of reason. This use of the word 'rationalism' encompasses more than one position and is easier to grasp if we take into account the history of Western thought.

The Christian message has its alleged source in divine *revelation, though it is about events in human history. Contact with Greco-Roman philosophical thought in the early centuries forced it to appraise the role of reason in religious belief, but the Church Fathers held differing views on this question, viewing it in a more or less positive light (see *Patristic theology). In the Middle Ages, translation into Latin of works by Aristotle was a particularly potent factor in highlighting the issue of reason and revelation, an issue that exercised Jews and Muslims as well as Christians. In a synthesis that eventually became extremely influential on Christian thought, *Thomas Aquinas distinguished but did not divorce faith from reason. Aquinas held that some propositions can be secured by either faith or reason (e.g. that God exists) but that others are attained by faith alone (e.g. that God is triune). Reason operates by demonstration; faith believes on authority. (We deliberately simplify here.)

Currents of thought arising from Aristotle, Islam and the Church in the context of the birth of the European University contributed intellectually to the break-up of the 'Thomistic synthesis' and to the separation of *faith and reason. The religious and social conflict arising from the Protestant Reformations of the sixteenth century gradually led a number of influential thinkers to emphasize the role of reason in regulating religious assent (testing claims) and or in determining religious belief (making claims). Although the eighteenth-century *Enlightenment was not a uniform phenomenon and included thinkers who rebelled against excessive claims for reason, Enlightenment thinkers widely judged religious truth-claims by standards of reason as part of their project for regulating the whole of human and social life by what reason could know, independently of revelation. We have arrived here at 'rationalism', as it is widely understood; 'Enlightenment rationalism' is a familiar phrase. In Western thought, modern rationalism has been very largely shaped by its relationship to Christianity.

As rationalism could appeal to both proponents and opponents of Christian (or more broadly religious) belief, so it has been rejected on non-religious as well as religious grounds. *Postmodernity is widely regarded as anti-rationalist in the sense that it does not believe in universal and rational norms ideally regulating human belief and discourse across all times, spaces and cultures. In a postmodern context and perspective, rationalism can seem both mistaken and antiquated, a judgment which may, but usually does not, derive from any particular religious conviction. However, the contemporary intellectual and cultural scene in Europe and the English-speaking world is sufficiently wide and varied for rationalism to remain prominent, whether in a conscious and intellectually defended form or as a functioning practical philosophy. For this reason, quite apart from its massively important role in challenging Western Christianity, rationalism merits no less serious consideration today than it has in the past.

In assessing rationalism, we might preliminarily indicate two limitations upon reason. First, it is difficult to identify a universal, transcultural set of norms or judgments that ought to constrain the thinking of all human beings on the basis of sheer reason. On this point traditional Christianity and postmodern thinking may be in broad agreement. Secondly, even if we persist in speaking of 'reason' as though it were some identifiable transcultural entity or ideal, in practice it may not get very far. For example, John *Locke, 'the intellectual ruler of the eighteenth century' (Sir Leslie Stephen), and often regarded as a rationalist in the broad sense, allowed reason free scope in investigation, but argued that its competence to discover religious truth was very limited, although it might test the credibility of witnesses who claimed that God had revealed something. A contemporary thinker of a very different type, Blaise *Pascal could concur: 'There is nothing so consistent with reason as this denial of reason' (Pensées, no. 182).

At the same time, there are at least two features of rationalism that might compel our sympathy, if not always our agreement. First, from an historical point of view, religious obscurantism, the protection and perpetration of institutional (including ecclesiastical) power, and religious strife have all conspired to make it plausible and attractive to appeal to reason as a guide to human life and a peaceful society. The historical context in which rationalism grew and began to hold sway, in Europe in particular, should elicit a measure of sympathy when we consider the religious hostilities that sprang out of, or got mixed in with, the Reformation. Secondly, historically, the appeal to 'reason' has in the past been positively connected with the appeal to 'nature', and it is an appeal that should be taken seriously. In public life, it is impossible or difficult to adjudicate moral debate in the public square by appealing to revelation or to reason, but Christians must ponder the possibility of indicating certain 'natural' constituents of the human condition and social order – for example in relation to *sexuality and the structure of the *family – which might be susceptible to description in terms of 'reason' up to a point and in some contexts. (By 'natural' here, we mean God-given elements of our humanity.)

From a Christian point of view, God's revelation and not human reason is the source of religious truth. However, the NT not only allows, but actually invites people to scrutinize its testimony (e.g. Luke 1:1–4; 1 Cor. 15:3–6), a testimony based on the three senses of hearing, sight and touch (1 John 1:1). When Jesus commended the faith of those who believed without seeing, it was not because seeing was unimportant; it was because most contemporaries and all future generations were or would be in no position to witness for themselves the phenomena in question (John 20:29). This is not to say that seeing automatically means believing, nor that the unbelieving world should be expected to acquire a dispassionate certainty, on purely rational grounds, about the things to which the apostles testified. It is just to say that Christian belief is not detached from the evidence of the senses and that there is a possibility of appealing, within limits, to the broadly rational credibility of apostolic testimony, even if we cannot assess it with rational confidence, several centuries on. But just how much weight should be attached to this possibility is a matter of dispute, even amongst those willing to make some room for it.

The term 'rationalism' is sometimes used in another way and applied to a certain methodological use of reason within theology. Theologians firmly basing their theology on Scripture and revelation, and strongly opposed to giving reason a significant role either as source or as judge of religious truth, may nevertheless make vigorous use of it in the exposition of the faith. They set forth Christian belief in a systematically ordered, logical and conceptual form, showing that reason is vitally instrumental in understanding the content of faith. This is sometimes described as a rationalist or a rationalistic approach. Here, the word is usually being used pejoratively and the question of whether or not it should be applied to vast swathes of systematic theology over centuries in the Western tradition (at least from the Middle Ages onwards) is highly contentious. On the one hand, the attempt to explain the content of Christian belief by applying logical categories can fail to recognize the limits of our reason and confuse the reality of God and his truth with our inadequate concepts. On the other hand, reason is the instrument and logic is a necessary form of thought, so if faith requires reflection and its expression requires coherence, reason is inevitably important.

Rationalism in all its forms needs to beware of the tendency of reason to master ideas by thought; objects of reflection readily become ideas at the reflective disposal of the thinker. It is easy to forget how this appears in the light of a living God. The fear of God is the beginning of wisdom, and humility is properly the cradle of reason even for the non-religious. Only when we are rightly disposed in humility, either believing that there is a divine claim on our lives or taking seriously the fallibility, frailty and bias which marks our intellectual operations, should we deploy the resources of reason in the hope or expectation that they will yield insight.

See also: PHILOSOPHY AND THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

C. Brown, Christianity and Western Thought: From the Ancient World to the Age of Enlightenment (Leicester, 1990); K. J. Clark, Return to Reason (Grand Rapids, 1990); C. S. Evans, Faith Beyond Reason (Edinburgh, 1998); P. Helm (ed.), Faith and Reason (Oxford, 1999); M. Peterson et al., Philosophy of Religion: Selected Readings (New York and Oxford, 2001); N. Wolterstorff, Reason Within the Bounds of Religion (Grand Rapids, 1984).

S. N. WILLIAMS

RATRAMNUS (d. 868)

Ratramnus, who was known to the Reformers as 'Bertram', was an opponent of the *eucharistic teaching of *Paschasius Radbertus. Other distinguished contemporaries of Paschasius have left writings at variance with his teaching, namely John Scotus *Eriugena and Rabanus

Maurus (d. 856), but Ratramnus, monk of Corbie, devoted a formal treatise to the matter, at the request of King Charles the Bald. Like the treatise of Paschasius (who was abbot of Ratramnus' own Benedictine monastery), it is entitled De Corpore et Sanguine Domini (On the Body and Blood of the Lord). Corbie had for fifty years been a centre of *Augustinian teaching, and Ratramnus considered that he could appeal to the teaching of both *Augustine and *Ambrose against that of Paschasius. His positive teaching is not as clear as Eriugena's, though he emphasizes the role of *symbolism and faith; but, negatively, he firmly denies that the sacramental body of Christ is identical with the body born of Mary. Many passages from his treatise were borrowed by the Anglo-Saxon writer Aelfric (d. c. 1020), whose works were published at the Reformation by Archbishop Matthew Parker; but it had a strong direct influence as well, especially on Ridley (see *English Reformers) and in 1559 it was put on the Index. Various English translations have been published, from 1548 onwards. Ratramnus wrote also on *predestination (on the side of *Gottschalk) and on the controversy with the Eastern church. His treatise on the soul, rediscovered in the twentieth century, is to be found in D. C. Lambert (ed.), Analecta Mediaevalia Namurcensia 2 (1951).

Bibliography

Works in PL 121; J. N. Bakhuizen van den Brink (ed.), De Corpore (Amsterdam, 1974) (critical edition); J. Ginther, Westminster Handbook to Medieval Theology (Louisville, KY, 2009); A. J. Macdonald (ed.), The Evangelical Doctrine of Holy Communion (Cambridge, 1933).

R. T. BECKWITH

RATZINGER, JOSEPH (BENEDICT XVI) (b. 1927)

An influential theological adviser at the Second Vatican Council, and one of the leading German *Catholic theologians in the 1970s, Joseph Ratzinger became prominent and controversial after 1981 as cardinal prefect of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith. He was elected Pope Benedict XVI in 2005. Like the Catholic ressourcement movement, with which he shares an affinity, Benedict's theology is based in a reading of the Church Fathers, from where it derives its considerable spiritual power. Wide-ranging in theme, his extensive literary output over fifty years appeals to academic theologians and intelligent lay readers alike. Two motifs frequently recur throughout Benedict's writings, which underpin his understanding and critique of *modernity. Negatively, he argues that much modern thought arises out of a sub-Christian and *materialistic eschatology for which technocratic reason alone is capable of producing the 'new creation'. This was also the basis of his well-known disagreements with Catholic *liberation theology. Positively, he understands the church above all as a worshipping communio, constituted not by its own power – criticism of Benedict's 'ecclesial totalitarianism' (J. Allen, Pope Benedict XVI, p. 3) is generally misplaced – but primarily by Christ's self-gift and presence (esp. sacramental), as the given theological basis and living context of all its doctrine, belief and ethics.

Bibliography

Works: Principles of Catholic Theology: Building Stones for a Fundamental Theology (San Francisco, 1987); Jesus of Nazareth: From the Baptism in the Jordan to the Transfiguration (London, 2007); J. F. Thornton and S. B. Varenne (eds.), The Essential Pope Benedict XVI: His Central Writings and Speeches (San Francisco, 2007).

Studies: J. L. Allen, Pope Benedict XVI: A Biography of Joseph Ratzinger (London and New York, 2005); L. P. Hemming, Benedict XVI: Fellow-Worker for the Truth: An Introduction to his Life and Thought (London and New York, 2005); A. Nichols, The Theology of Benedict XVI (London and New York, 2005).

C. J. R. ASPREY

RAUSCHENBUSCH, WALTER (1861–1918)

Walter Rauschenbusch was a pastor, church historian and theologian of the *social gospel. Born in Rochester, New York, Rauschenbusch was educated in Germany and the US, and graduated from the University of Rochester (1884) and Rochester Theological Seminary (1886).

For eleven years Rauschenbusch was pastor of a German Baptist Church in New York City, near the notorious 'Hell's Kitchen' neighbourhood. There he learned first-hand about the devastating human impact of poverty, overcrowding, poor nutrition, disease and crime. He became active in social reform work and was increasingly dissatisfied with the traditional individualism he found in much American Christianity and the economic and political theory of the time.

During a leave from his church in 1891 Rauschenbusch studied in Germany and absorbed a number of important ideas from European thinkers, notably the concept that the *kingdom of God is the central theme in the gospel and should be the overarching theme for theology. He was also attracted to Christian socialism and its critique of laissez-faire *capitalism. In 1897 Rauschenbusch joined the faculty at Rochester Theological Seminary. It was here that he published the series of books for which he would be remembered, culminating with A Theology for the Social Gospel (1917). All advocated the progressive transformation of all human affairs by the thought and spirit of Jesus, which would lead ultimately to the consummation of the kingdom of God.

Bibliography

Works: Christianity and the Social Crisis (New York, 1907); Christianizing the Social Order (New York, 1912); For God and the People: Prayers for the Social Awakening (New York, 1910); A Theology for the Social Gospel (New York, 1917).

Studies: C. H. Evans, The Kingdom Is Always But Coming: A Life of Walter Rauschenbusch (Grand Rapids, 2004); P. M. Minus, Walter Rauschenbusch, American Reformer (New York, 1988).

H. E. RASER

RAVEN, C. E. (1885–1964)

One of the most distinguished Anglican scholars of the twentieth century, Raven's origins in the nineteenth are reflected in the diversity of his interests, which included theology, biological science and history. A clergyman who preached throughout his long life, Raven was a prodigious author. His achievements included a major biography of John Ray (1628–1705, 'the father of English natural history') and books on ornithology, botany, the ordination of women and pacifism (he was a supporter of both the latter causes). He occupied the Regius Chair of Divinity at Cambridge and was vice-chancellor for a period.

Raven's theology was deeply influenced by his scientific interests and in particular by his enthusiastic use of the theory of organic evolution to provide an interpretative framework for religion as well as for science. So he saw an evolutionary background even to the incarnation, and sought to understand the God-man as himself within the 'evolutionary series'. Such an extended use of evolutionary theory, common in the earlier part of the twentieth century, has fallen out of fashion more recently. It is interesting that Raven's books include a volume on *Teilhard de Chardin, for like Teilhard (though with more modest proposals) he saw himself as seeking to reinterpret orthodoxy in line with what he took to be the new science.

Bibliography

Works: Evolution and the Christian Concept of God (London, 1936); Natural Religion and Christian Theology, 2 vols. (Gifford Lectures, 1951–52; Cambridge, 1953); Science and the Christian Man (London, 1952).

Studies: F. W. Dillistone, Charles Raven: Naturalist, Historian, Theologian (London, 1975); R. F. Rizzo, Christian Vision and Pacifism: A Study of Charles Earle Raven with a Comparison to Reinhold Niebuhr (Ann Arbor, 1974).

N. M. DE S. CAMERON

REALISM

The topic of realism is one of the most hotly debated areas of contemporary philosophy, and also in theology and religious studies. There is no single theoretical position univocally termed realism, but rather various clusters of views which, broadly speaking, stress the independence of reality from the human mind. Jarrett Leplin, reflecting on the diversity of generically realist approaches, notes that 'realism is a majority position whose advocates are so seriously divided as to appear a minority' (Scientific Realism, 1984). Thus, realist approaches are present in various cultural discourses, where they have different objects: the past, other minds, artistic and literary meaning, mathematical objects, aesthetic and moral values, colours, and so on.

The typical realist thesis can be divided into two. The *ontological thesis holds that these objects have an existence which is independent of the activity of the human mind. To take a simple example, mountains and chairs would exist even if there were no human mind to know them. The *epistemological thesis is that it is possible to have accurate knowledge of these objects. Some theorists would like to add a third type of realist thesis, the semantic one, which holds that it is possible to refer successfully to an independently existing reality.

The above types of realist theses are very broad and they mask a wide variety of elaborations. They do not have to be held together. An ontological realist need not be an epistemological realist, or a semantic realist. On the other hand, an epistemological realist must be an ontological realist as well.

Historically speaking, although realism can be said to have roughly characterized both the *Platonic and the *Aristotelian schools of philosophy, it first came to prominence in the Middle Ages, in the dispute with *nominalism, a philosophical school represented by Roscelin of Compiègne (c. 1050–1125), which denied that essences, or universals, have any reality at all, except as names. Realists like William of Champeaux (1070–1121), on the other hand, held that the classes to which individuals belong have an existence outside the human mind. An intermediate position, conceptualism, made famous by Peter *Abelard, held that universals were real, but they only existed as concepts located within the human mind.

While the medieval discussion revolved around the status of universals and, later, propositions, a broad consensus seemed to hold about the status of particulars, their properties, and the relations that held between them. As we approach modernity, that agreement came under severe attack from David *Hume, who attacked *Locke's *empiricism by arguing that the connections between things are not given in experience, but are imposed by the intellect. Scottish 'common-sense' realism, through its most influential advocate, Thomas Reid (1710–96), rejected Hume's scepticism and insisted that the human mind perceives external objects and their connections directly through intuitive knowledge. This is guaranteed because our mind was constituted by God to know reality directly. Moreover, God also implanted in human beings certain *common-sense beliefs, which do not require any sort of proof. Among these are the belief in the existence of the external world and of other minds, the belief in the uniformity of nature, and the belief in the existence of God.

Scottish realism had a decisive influence on the *Princeton theology of Charles *Hodge and Archibald Alexander Hodge (1823–86) by giving it a philosophical foundation for the notion of our built-in ability to perceive facts and to know reality directly. Just as the scientist gazes openly on to the book of nature, so the Bible, as God’s revelation, constitutes the theologian’s foundation, his ‘store-house of facts’.

Another theologian standing under the influence of common-sense realism is Thomas F. *Torrance. He defended a critical realism against the background of Kant’s restriction of knowledge to appearances (phenomena). *Kant had denied that we could know things in themselves (noumena), given the active participation of the mind in the epistemic process. Torrance was also responding to the so-called ‘linguistic turn’ which stressed the constitutive part played by language in the construction of objects of knowledge. Torrance’s realism is critical in that it recognizes an interplay between what we know and how we know it. However, although we always apprehend things through a linguistic structure, this schematic framework is nevertheless derived from the inherent structure of reality and is open to constant revision in light of evidence.

Critical realism is the most common form of contemporary theological realism, both in biblical studies (N. T. *Wright and Ben F. Meyer) and in systematic theology (Alister E. McGrath, Janet M. Soskice, Donald MacKinnon, Kevin Vanhoozer). McGrath, drawing on Roy Bhaskar’s concept of the stratification of reality, insists that reality cannot be reduced to any one of its specific levels, whether physical, cultural, social, and so on. Rejecting reductionist approaches to religion, McGrath encourages a ‘connectivist’ approach to theology, by insisting on its correlation with the various strata of reality.

On American soil, under the influence of Ludwig *Wittgenstein, Clifford Geertz and Thomas Kuhn, the influential *postliberal theology of George *Lindbeck, Hans *Frei, Ronald Thiemann and Stanley *Hauerwas (to name but a few of its protagonists) accepts the social construction of knowledge while stressing the ontological priority of God. Even while Lindbeck does claim to be a realist, it is not entirely clear that his cultural linguistic model can accommodate the important realist intuition that our epistemic frameworks stand under the judgment of an objective and structured reality. Postliberals Bruce D. Marshall and Nancey Murphy draw on recent developments in analytic philosophy to suggest that the distinction between realism and *idealism is irrelevant because it rests on an implausible notion of epistemic intermediaries (representations). However, the question of whether or not realism can be abandoned rests on whether its essential intuitions (the existence of a structured reality, the subordination of knowledge before the tribunal of reality, the ability of knowledge to put us in epistemic touch with authentic features of reality) can be preserved in post-realist epistemologies.

Bibliography

W. P. Alston, A Realist Conception of Truth (Ithaca, 1996); P. Byrne, God and Realism (Aldershot, 2003); S. Haack, ‘Realism’, Synthese 73, 1987, pp. 275–99; B. D. Marshall, Trinity and Truth (Cambridge, 2000); A. E. McGrath, A Scientific Theology. Vol. 2: Reality (Edinburgh, 2002); A. Moore, Realism and Christian Faith: God, Grammar and Meaning (Cambridge, 2003); S. Patterson, Realist Christian Theology in a Postmodern Age (Cambridge, 1999); H. Putnam, Realism with a Human Face (Cambridge, 1990); J. Searle, The Construction of Social Reality (London, 1995); T. F. Torrance, Reality and Evangelical Theology: The Realism of Christian Revelation (Downers Grove, 1999).

A. VIDU

REBAPTISM

Mainstream Christian theology has generally held that *baptism is unrepeatable – or more strictly, ought not to be repeated. Although often based on a misreading of Eph. 4:5 (where ‘one baptism’ refers to the common baptism shared by all) and an unhistorical appeal to the Nicene Creed (‘one baptism for the remission of sins’, which relates to the controversy over post-baptismal sin and could not have encompassed infant baptism), this teaching has its proper grounding in the once-for-all character of Christ’s work of redemption and hence of the baptismal initiation into him.

Nevertheless, rebaptism (which is what its critics call it, although for clarity it is unavoidable) has not infrequently been practised and defended, chiefly for the following reasons:

(1) Denial of the validity of an earlier baptism. In the patristic era, *Donatists and other movements rejected Catholic baptism, which they regarded as administered by the fatally defiled clergy of an apostate church. The Donatists appealed to the earlier Catholic practice (cf. *Cyprian) which refused to recognize baptism given outside the Catholic fold and hence rebaptized, but by the Council of Arles (314) this position had been abandoned. Optatus of Milevis (fl. c. 370) and *Augustine provided the theological justification for this reversal.

Baptism has commonly been treated as null and void if any essential feature (notably, a flow of water and the trinitarian name) is lacking. In cases of uncertainty, some churches (e.g. Roman Catholic) have conditionally (re) baptized ('If you have not been baptized, I baptize you . . .').

Several churches at different periods have not recognized some other churches' baptism and have accordingly rebaptized 'converts'. Southern Presbyterians in the USA took this view of Roman Catholic baptism.

(2) Denial of infant baptism as true Christian baptism. The *Anabaptists (literally, 'rebaptizers') and other *Radical Reformers pioneered this position (with only insignificant medieval precedents), but since that sixteenth-century divide such rebaptism has been common, both in new churches holding to believers' baptism only and in individual cases.

In recent times, especially in the context of charismatic renewal, a second baptism has been sought by those unable to regard their infant baptism as meaningful – e.g. because of their parents' apparent lack of faith. Such requests raise acute pastoral problems, but also touch on basic issues of baptismal theology – e.g. the relation between baptism and faith (or experience).

Bibliography

R. S. Armour, Anabaptist Baptism (Scottsdale, 1966); A. Aubry, 'Faut-il rebaptiser?', NRT 99 (1967), pp. 183–201; C. Buchanan, One Baptism Once (Nottingham, 1978); T. H. Lyle, 'Reflections on "Second Baptism"', IJT 21 (1972), pp. 170–182; D. F. Wright, 'One Baptism or Two? Reflections on the History of Christian Baptism', Vox Evangelica 18 (1988), pp. 7–23; idem, What Has Infant Baptism Done to Baptism (Milton Keynes, 2005).

D. F. WRIGHT

RECONCILIATION, see ATONEMENT

REDEMPTION

The term 'redemption' is often used to refer to the whole scope of *salvation or *atonement. As a theological concept, however, it speaks more specifically of the aspect of Christ's work that delivers humanity from the binding power of *sin and *evil. As such, redemption is a metaphor that draws from the world of slavery and commercial transactions to explain the significance of Christ's work in the face of the tyrannical rule of sin and evil.

Redemption through the ages

The background to the Christian use of this metaphor has been extensively researched. In the Greco-Roman world, slaves could be set free by payment of a ransom price to their owners. The OT also contains numerous examples of redemption. For the early Christians, redemption was a vivid parable of the deliverance from sin and evil that they experienced through faith in Christ, and of their subsequent obligation to live as servants of God.

Throughout the writings of the early church, redemption is consistently associated with the crucifixion of *Jesus Christ (see *Cross). His suffering and death are the ransom price for us, redeeming us from the power of sin and delivering us from the 'sharpness of death' (words from the Te Deum). This association has continued in much of the theology, devotional practice and art of the Western church, both Catholic and Protestant.

Redemption has also been associated more broadly with the whole of Christ's life. In the second century Irenaeus emphasized the connection between redemption and the *incarnation. The Son of God became flesh as the Second *Adam, to restore what had been lost by sin and death from the original creation. For Eastern Christians, the redemptive work of Christ often includes his descent to the dead, the 'harrowing of hell' and the *resurrection.

While all Christians agree that redemption is accomplished by Christ, the way in which we are delivered from slavery to sin has been a matter of much theological reflection. *Origen produced an elaborate account of redemption in which Satan receives the payment of Christ's life as a ransom for those who are his prisoners. Later, *Anselm taught that it was not Satan who required a payment, but God, as restitution for the obedience and praise we owe God but are not able to give him because of our sin. In subsequent developments of this strand of thought, Western theology has tended to speak of redemption as the result of Christ's *satisfaction of divine justice. An important work by Gustaf *Aulén tries to recapture what he calls the 'classic' picture of Christ's redemptive work – that of Christus Victor, in which Christ triumphs over the powers of sin, evil and Satan.

Some systematic issues

The overwhelmingly positive point of redemption is that Christ delivers the world from bondage to sin and evil and transfers both the Christian and, in the future, the whole of creation, into the glorious freedom of the *kingdom of God. However, as with all metaphors or parables, the image of redemption includes some aspects that we must take care to avoid. In this case, we are not encouraged to work out to whom the ransom price was paid. Origen's view gives too much power to Satan by suggesting that he was the rightful master of the world to whom a ransom must be given, and some developments of Anselm's thought could diminish the freedom of God by suggesting that he is held to ransom by his own justice.

While avoiding these misconceptions, we can affirm the importance of understanding and proclaiming redemption today. Redemption describes the cosmic significance of Christ's work, and looks both backwards to the life, death and resurrection of Jesus, and forwards to the consummation of that redemptive work in the new *creation. A theology of redemption must affirm God's love and concern for the world he has made, his immense power in overcoming evil and generating new life, and his promise to complete this work through the redemption of our bodies, the resurrection of the dead (see *Resurrection, general).

Bibliography

G. Aulén, Christus Victor (London, 1970); S. T. Davis, D. Kendall and G. O'Collins (eds.), The Redemption (Oxford, 2004); G. O'Collins, Jesus Our Redeemer (Oxford, 2007).

A. J. STOBART

REFORMATION THEOLOGY

The *Protestant Reformation produced a theology that was a massive reassertion of the centrality of *God, the glory of his *sovereignty, and the primacy of his *grace in the *salvation of humanity through *Jesus Christ.

Basic principles

To Martin *Luther it was a revolutionary discovery that the *righteousness of God is 'the righteousness by which we are made righteous' (LW 25, p. 151). Medieval thinkers, he believed, had led Christendom astray by teaching that human persistence in doing good moral and ritual actions would earn *merit in the eyes of God and enable sinners to achieve salvation. But the appalling consequences of *sin had so paralysed the *will that sinners could not take the least step towards pleasing God. Close study of the teaching of Paul, however, led Luther to the conviction that through *faith in Jesus Christ – a faith which is itself God's gift – a sinner is granted free and full pardon. He is *justified by faith, not by his own achievements but because Christ bestows upon him the merits that he (Christ) has won through his victory over *sin, *death, the *law and the *devil, the 'tyrants' which have held sinful humanity in thrall. So justification is a forensic declaration of pardon which in no way depends upon human merit.

All the Magisterial Reformers followed Luther in this matter. *Calvin indeed did insist that the hidden work of the *Holy Spirit, in bringing a sinner to exercise faith, also *regenerated him into a new life, because to believe in Christ of necessity means coming into personal *union with him. The righteousness of faith thus manifests itself in the good works that spring from that union. But this so-called 'double justification' did not jeopardize the emphasis on primary justification by faith alone. Rather was it a way of understanding the connection between justification and *sanctification. The Reformers had no wish to minimize the role of morality in Christian living, but they were adamant that it was the product of justification, not its cause.

The Reformers were also agreed upon the authority of *Scripture. For Luther, Scripture is the word of God. Its human authors wrote under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, and that ensured its accuracy – not only in its general teaching, but also in its verbal details. This did not preclude a critical attitude to the transmitted text; knowledge of Hebrew and Greek was necessary in order to get as close as possible to the original autographs. The Bible is the possession of the whole people of God, and so translation into the various national languages is a necessity, for how could the public acquire a knowledge of the truth, asked William Tyndale, 'except ye scripture were playnly layd before their eyes in their mother tonge?' (Foreword to the Pentateuch).

God the Holy Spirit is the true expositor of the Bible, as *Zwingli explained in his book, The Clarity and Certainty of the Word of God (1522). The pope could claim no monopoly in expounding it. The key of interpretation, said Luther in his appeal To the Christian Nobility of the German Nation (1520), was given not to Peter and his successors at Rome, 'but to the whole community'. Calvin gathered into a more systematic form the insights of his predecessors. He emphasized the self-authenticating character of the Bible (Institutes 1.vii.2–4), as its objective witness is confirmed by the internal testimony of the Holy Spirit in the believing heart. The relation between the Holy Spirit and the Bible is therefore a very close one. To separate them from each other is to embrace either a lifeless biblicism or the vagaries of spiritual enthusiasm.

Application

The application of these two principles, sola fide and sola Scriptura, led to striking consequences. It led to a critical modification of medieval belief and practice. Church tradition could no longer be acknowledged as a standard independent of the Bible. That meant a severe curtailment of the luxurious growth of allegorical interpretation and an insistence that biblical exposition should be grounded upon the literary and historical meaning of the text. The belief in *purgatory was abandoned for lack of scriptural proof. The cults of the *saints and of the Virgin *Mary were demolished in the light of the doctrine that Christ is the sole mediator between God and man.

On the other hand, those doctrines and declarations of faith that were consonant with Scripture were retained. Thus the classical doctrines of the *Trinity and the *incarnation were retained, as well as the definitions which expressed them, such as the Apostles' Creed, the Nicene Creed and the Definition of Chalcedon. Soon the Reformers set to it to expound their own understanding of theology. Although Luther produced no systematic exposition of his theology, he made a massive contribution in a large number of publications, among which his treatises of 1520, together with his commentaries on Galatians and Romans, are crucial to an understanding of his thought. Philipp *Melancthon attempted the first systematic exposition of *Lutheran theology in his Loci Communes (1521), and the Lutheran movement produced as a definitive exposition of its faith the *Augsburg Confession (1530). Zwingli had produced the most mature expression of his theology, True and False Religion, in 1525. But pride of place must be given to Calvin's Institutes of the Christian Religion. The first edition of 1536 was expanded over the years to become the impressive masterpiece of the 1559 edition. While using the pattern of the Apostles' Creed as his framework, Calvin meant his book to be a manual for Bible readers. It is unwise therefore to seek to expound his thought in terms of one dominating doctrine, such as predestination or divine sovereignty. The work is characterized by a well-balanced treatment of complementary doctrines, each contributing towards a harmonious integration of the richness of biblical teaching.

So the Protestant Reformation released a vast amount of creative theological energy which is only partially suggested by the tags, 'faith alone', 'Scripture alone', 'Christ alone', 'grace alone' and 'to God alone be glory'.

Different emphasis

Even in those theological areas where the Reformers accepted the formulations of classical Catholic orthodoxy, there were variations of emphasis. Thus, with regard to the doctrine of God, there was a new dynamism. Luther, in his exposition of the 'theology of the *cross', introduced penetrating insights as he expounded the paradox of the glorious God who reveals himself, and yet conceals himself (see *Hidden and revealed God), in the mystery of abasement and *suffering. For Calvin, similarly, God is no remote and static divinity, but one who intervenes in a dynamic and revolutionary way in human *history. For both of them divine grace is not an impersonal quality, as it so often was in medieval theology, but a personal involvement.

In *Christology again there were differences of emphasis amongst the Reformers. Luther was always concerned to accentuate the oneness of Christ's person, while Zwingli and Calvin underlined the distinction between the two natures. In the case of Calvin, his exaltation of Christ's divinity did lay him open to the charge of minimizing his human nature. On the other hand, some *Anabaptists such as the Melchiorites rejected the teaching of the Chalcedonian Definition and maintained that Jesus' body was composed of 'celestial flesh', a unique product of the Virgin's womb, substantially different from ordinary human flesh.

Yet another area where differences of emphasis emerged was in the understanding of the relationship between *law and gospel. All the Magisterial Reformers took a sombre view of the radical effects of sin and rejected the medieval doctrine that man's natural gifts were only partially affected by the fall. On the contrary, man's will had become enslaved through sin, as Luther demonstrated in his Bondage of the Will (1525), and his mind darkened. For Luther, the chief function of the law was to convict man of his sin. It accused but could not save. Only the gospel could save. So Luther, and his colleague Melancthon, distinguished sharply between law and gospel. Calvin did not dismiss the accusatory aspect of the law in revealing the need for a saviour, but for him the chief function of the law was to inspire the justified sinner to aim at moral perfection. So gospel and law are to work hand in hand, for the *covenant of grace provides the setting for the law. It was this conviction that injected into Calvinism its moral activism both in the life of the individual and in society.

According to the Augsburg Confession, the church 'is the congregation of the saints, in which the gospel is rightly taught and the sacraments rightly administered'. And Calvin agrees with this definition (Institutes IV.i.8). Indeed, Luther and Calvin were in close agreement about the nature of the *church. The true church, known to God alone, is a company of justified sinners. But the visible church at Geneva or Wittenberg also contained hypocrites who lacked saving faith. It follows that the visible church is a mixed company, but as long as it ensures the right preaching of the gospel and the right administration of the *sacraments, it is still a true church. Calvin, unlike Luther, believed that in view of this it was necessary for the church to submit itself to constant self-examination. Its members must accept a system of pastoral *discipline to purify it, just as its ministers should be diligent to test their doctrine by the word of God. The reformation of the church is not an act but a process. The reformed church must be a reforming church, not a church which emulates Rome's boast that it is semper eadem, always the same.

The sacraments

It was by the stringent application of scriptural standards that the Reformers came to reject the sacramental system of the Church of Rome. The attack upon it had been launched by Luther in The Babylonian Captivity of the Church (1520). Christ's *sacrifice on Calvary was a complete and final oblation for the sins of the world. The doctrine that the Mass was an unbloody repetition of that sacrifice had therefore to be rejected. Nor should the offering of the Mass be considered a meritorious work. Holy Communion is Christ's gift to his people, and it is their offering to him only in the sense that it is an offering of praise and thanksgiving. Although Luther in 1520 still listed *penance as a sacrament (but only in a severely qualified sense), the Protestant consensus was that Christ had instituted only two sacraments, baptism and the Eucharist. With this radical transformation of the concept of sacrament, the Roman Church's claim to be the sole dispenser of grace was nullified, and the priesthood stripped of its quasi-magical pretensions.

Further, the Reformers sought to eradicate the Roman Catholic distinction between priest and layman. Luther put the point with characteristic vigour: 'It has been devised that the pope, bishops, priests and monks are called the spiritual estate; princes, lords, artificers and peasants are the temporal estate. This is an artful lie . . . all Christians are truly of the spiritual estate' (To the Christian Nobility, 1520). This is the principle of the '*priesthood of all believers'. All offices in the church are functions of the common ministry of the community of faith.

Despite the fact that the Reformers were of a common mind in their criticisms of the Roman Catholic doctrines of the sacraments, they were unable to agree about the precise nature of the biblical doctrines that should replace them. Luther and Calvin were agreed that *baptism involves washing in water in the name of the Trinity, that it is a sign of God's pledge to forgive sin, that it is to be closely connected with the death of Christ and his *resurrection, and that baptism is a commitment to lifelong *repentance. They were also agreed that it was appropriate to baptize infants on the grounds that the benefits of God's covenant with the parents applied to their offspring, and that Jesus had blessed infants and declared that 'of such is the kingdom of heaven'; also (in the case of Calvin) because the Holy Spirit may well act secretly even in the personality of an infant, as was the case with John the Baptist and Jesus (Institutes IV.xvi; Luther, The Holy and Blessed Sacrament of Baptism, LW 35; Zwingli, On Baptism and Exposition of the Faith).

The validity of infant baptism was challenged by the *Anabaptists. For them, baptism with water is of no avail unless it is preceded by the inner *baptism of the Spirit. Water baptism is the external sign of the commitment of faith. Since infants are incapable of exercising faith, they cannot be appropriate subjects for baptism. This was the position which drove George Blaurock and Conrad Grebel to reject infant baptism, and so to initiate the Anabaptist movement by rebaptizing those who adopted their convictions. Much was involved in their protest, because baptism on profession of faith became for them the door of entry into the church. They consequently challenged the principle, enunciated by the Magisterial Reformers, that the church was a 'mixed company'. Rather, it must be a covenanted community of sincere believers. Such a position aroused the intense opposition of the authorities; it led directly to a denial of the concept of an established church in which people, by virtue of their citizenship, were also under the pastoral jurisdiction of the church.

Similarly, there was bitter acrimony among Protestants about the Eucharist. In article 15 of the confession signed by the participants at the Colloquy of Marburg (1529) to seek a common mind on the subject, it was agreed that the Lord's Supper should be celebrated in both kinds, that the Mass was not to be deemed a good work which ensured pardon for the living and the dead, and that it is the sacrament of the very body and blood of Jesus Christ. But they failed to agree about the precise nature of Christ's presence in the sacrament. Luther held that 'in the Supper we eat and take to ourselves Christ's body truly and physically' (That These Words of Christ, 'This is my body' &c., Still Stand Firm, 1527). Zwingli, supported by *Oecolampadius, denied this physical presence 'in, with and under' the elements. They held that Christ's body is in heaven and could not be ubiquitous. His divine nature, however, is ubiquitous, and to be nourished by the sacrament is to partake of Christ's spirit through faith in the heart. So Zwingli did not deny Christ's presence in the sacrament, but he insisted that it was a real spiritual presence. Luther, however, was adamant. When Christ said, 'This is my body', he meant the word 'is' to be taken in a literal and not a figurative sense. The differences remained unresolved.

Calvin was dissatisfied with both positions. In Book IV of the Institutes he carefully expounded his own position. The sacrament has no efficacy when dissociated from the gospel. Word and sign go together. Moreover, the sacrament is made efficacious by the operations of the Holy Spirit in the heart of the participant. This is to say that in the Eucharist there is a personal, not mechanical, relationship between God and the believer. Christ is the true substance of the sacrament, and the bread and wine are signs of the invisible food which he provides, namely, his body and blood. Christ's physical body is not ubiquitous and there is no question of its being brought down from heaven to the table by the words of institution. Rather, it is true to say that, thanks to the work of the Holy Spirit, the communicants are raised to the heavenly places to share communion with their Lord. So there is a real, but spiritual and personal, presence of Christ in the Eucharist. But none of these solutions commanded general support among Protestants.

A theology of grace which emphasizes that salvation is entirely God's work is compelled to pay close attention to the biblical doctrine of divine *predestination. Salvation is entirely God's work. Faith itself is God's free gift. Is unbelief therefore also willed by God? The leading Reformers were agreed that God elected believers to eternal life and ensured their ultimate salvation on the basis of his own gracious decision, not because of any qualification in them. It was Calvin who made the most careful study of divine election. But he confessed that he could not see how it was possible to acknowledge election to life 'except as set over against reprobation' (Institutes III.xxiii.1). Yet he does not put them on an equal basis. God actively elects those whom he saves, but 'passes over' the reprobate. Even so, Calvin was convinced that even this 'passing over' was according to the divine plan, for the reprobate 'have been raised up by the just but inscrutable judgment of God to show forth his glory in their condemnation' (Institutes III.xxiv.1-4).

Those who stood on the *radical wing of the Reformation found this predestinarianism unacceptable. Thus Melchior Hofmann (c. 1495–1543) in The Ordinance of God argued that those who were in covenant with God would through *perseverance attain election. Similarly, Balthasar *Hubmaier in On Free Will developed the thesis that, despite the effects of sin, man is not entirely deprived of the capacity to choose: ‘God gives power and capacity to all men in so far as they themselves desire it.’

The theology of the Protestant Reformation is an imposing intellectual achievement; it was to have a profound influence upon modern civilization.

See also: CONFESSIONS OF FAITH; REFORMED THEOLOGY; REFORMERS, ENGLISH.

Bibliography

Works: see under individual Reformers, and Confessions. LCC vols. XV–XXVI presents writings by all the leading Reformers. The Documents of Modern History series (London, 1970–83) includes volumes on Luther, Calvin, Zwingli. Note also: H. J. Hillerbrand, The Reformation in Its Own Words (London, 1964).

Studies: see under individual Reformers, etc. Note also: D. Bagchi and D. C. Steinmetz (eds.), The Cambridge Companion to Reformation Theology (Cambridge, 2004); G. W. Bromiley, Historical Theology: An Introduction (Edinburgh, 1978); W. Cunningham, The Reformers and the Theology of the Reformation (Edinburgh, 1862); R. T. Jones, The Great Reformation (Leicester, 1986); E. Léonard, A History of Protestantism, 2 vols. (London, 1965–67); C. Lindberg (ed.), The Reformation Theologians (Oxford, 2002); J. T. McNeill, The History and Character of Calvinism (New York, 1954); W. Pauck, The Heritage of the Reformation (Glencoe, ²1961); J. Pelikan, Reformation of Church and Dogma (1300–1700), in The Christian Tradition 4 (Chicago and London, 1983); B. M. G. Reardon, Religious Thought in the Reformation (London, 1981); G. H. Williams, The Radical Reformation (London, 1962).

R. T. JONES

REFORMATION, CATHOLIC COUNTER-

The term Catholic or Counter-Reformation refers to the reform movement in the Catholic Church that began before the Protestant *Reformation and continued throughout the sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries. In past years Protestant historians have tended to label it the ‘Counter-Reformation’, suggesting that its major emphasis was to ‘counter’ the impact of Protestantism. Catholic historians preferred the label ‘Catholic Reformation’, because it emphasized the positive reforming aspects of the movement. They also argued that since Catholic reform began before the Protestant Reformation, it was not simply a reaction to it. There was a time when one could recognize the bias of the historian by the title used, but this is no longer the case. As religious bias abated, historians began to recognize that both terms have an element of truth.

Catholic reform clearly began before the Protestant Reformation. Although many of the medieval efforts at reform were thwarted by the vested interests of the church hierarchy, and the so-called Renaissance papacy was not particularly active in initiating reforms, reform movements originating from sources other than the papacy were widespread well before the beginning of the Lutheran Reformation. Cardinal Francisco Ximenes de Cisneros (1436–1517) led a major reform movement in Spain. He set about improving the calibre of the Spanish clergy and encouraged biblical study through the printing of a six-volume Complutensian Polyglot Bible. Unfortunately, intolerance and persecution of dissenters were also associated with the Spanish reform movement. In 1478 the Spanish Inquisition was set up as a special court to prosecute suspected *heretics, and for a period of time Cisneros served as its Inquisitor General. Another Spanish reformer was *Teresa of Avila who, with her co-worker John of the Cross, led a significant monastic reform movement. She also helped popularize a *mystical *spirituality that was to become one of the major characteristics of the Catholic Reformation.

In Italy groups called Oratories of Divine Love played a major role in church reform. These were small, urban religious societies that sought the inward renewal of their members through religious exercises and prayer as well as frequent Communion. They were also committed to putting their faith into practice through service to the poor. The original inspiration for establishment of the oratories came from the life and work of St Catherine of Genoa (1447–1510), whose life of selfless service in the care of the sick, and profound spirituality, inspired a wealthy layman to found an oratory in Genoa in 1497. Oratories were also established in a number of other important Italian cities, including Florence, Milan, Verona, Naples and Padua. The Genoa oratory eventually moved to Rome, where it included among its members many of the future leaders of the Catholic Reformation, including Jacopo Sadoleto (1477–1547), Gaetano Thiene (1480–1547), Reginald Pole (1500–58), Gian Pietro Carafa (1476–1559) and Gasparo *Contarini. The group met regularly for prayer, meditation, mutual encouragement, and discussions about reforming the institutional church. New monastic orders such as the Theatine Order, founded in 1524, also played leading roles in the Catholic reform movement.

Some of the most committed reformers were known in Italy as the spirituali and included members of the Roman Oratory of Divine Love, such as Gasparo Contarini, whose understanding of justification came very close to Luther's position. Pope Paul III (1534–49) made Contarini a cardinal in 1535, and he appointed him and other Catholic reformers to serve on a Papal Reform Commission that was set up to study church reform and to make recommendations. The report of the commission, issued in March 1537, was brutally honest in identifying some of the areas that needed reform. While praising Paul III for his commitment to reform, it attributed many of the evils in the church to the actions of previous *popes. It also criticized the lifestyle of the cardinals and their failure to give adequate attention to spiritual matters. In addition, the report was scathing in its commentary on the gross immorality prevalent in Rome. It was in fact so devastating in its critique of church abuses that its publication was delayed, and it was printed without authorization in 1538. Luther even published a German translation, because it so effectively detailed the abuses in the Catholic Church.

By the late 1530s the Catholic reform movement was well under way, but *Protestantism was also gaining in strength and spreading. Catholic reformers were divided on how to deal with Protestants. Contarini and other spirituali were committed to finding a way to reconcile them to Rome, while reformers such as Carafa believed that suppression was the only way to deal with heretics. In 1541 a colloquy was held in Regensburg, Germany where Protestants and Catholics, including Contarini, met in an effort to arrive at reconciliation. The most surprising achievement of the colloquy was that the participants reached an agreement on the doctrine of *justification. However, neither Luther nor hard-line Catholics like Carafa were pleased with the agreement, and the participants were unable to reconcile differences over the *Eucharist and papal authority. Although Contarini remained hopeful that conciliation might still be achieved, he died in 1542. Even before his death those who were committed to suppression rather than dialogue were beginning to introduce their methods. In July 1542 Pope Paul III bestowed on Carafa the power to establish an Inquisition in Italy. Thirteen years later Carafa was elected Pope Paul IV (1555–59). During his pontificate he not only promoted the Inquisition, but he also issued an Index of Prohibited Books that listed those books which were prohibited reading for Catholics. It initially included all vernacular translations of the Bible.

The course of the Catholic Reformation was significantly influenced by a new monastic order called the Society of Jesus that was founded by Ignatius *Loyola in 1540. Popularly known as the *Jesuits, they played a major role in the Catholic Reformation and were responsible for missionary work in the New World, Africa and the Far East. One of the most impressive Jesuit missionaries was Francis Xavier (1506–52), who, after beginning work in the Portuguese colony in India, went on to other areas of Asia, including Sri Lanka, Malaysia and Indonesia, eventually ending in Japan. He died as he was attempting to enter China. Other Jesuit missionaries, including Matteo Ricci (1552–1610), Robert de Nobilit (1577–1656) and Alexandre de Rhodes (1592–1660), continued the Jesuit missionary work in Asia, expanding their activity to China and Vietnam. The Jesuits were also responsible for establishing colleges and seminaries throughout Europe as part of their effort to confront the challenge from the Protestant Reformation, and they played a major role in the long-delayed church council which began meeting at the northern Italian city of Trent in 1545.

Although Luther and others had long sought a church *council to resolve the issues raised by the Reformation, the calling of a general council was consistently delayed by political rivalries and the reluctance of the papacy to call one. When the Council of *Trent (1545–63) was finally convened, it failed to take any positive moves towards reconciliation with Protestants. It met in three separate sessions over a period of almost twenty years, but Protestants were only represented in a limited way in the second of those sessions. Rather than reconciling differences, the Council accentuated them by issuing a series of doctrinal decrees that defined Catholic doctrine in opposition to Protestantism. The Council also enacted impressive reform legislation that held out the promise of creating a truly reformed church which would not only save Catholicism from further Protestant inroads, but could also begin the process of winning back areas that had been lost in the initial stages of the Reformation. However, for those who had hoped for reconciliation with the Protestants, the council virtually eliminated that possibility. The theological decrees condemned Protestant beliefs in such specific terms that future generations would find the canons and decrees of the Council of Trent a major stumbling block to ecumenical discussions. After Trent, it seemed the only way in which the *schism could be healed would be by Protestants surrendering their beliefs or by suppression.

A reformed papacy played a major role in the implementation of the Tridentine legislation. Pius V (1566–72) was the first of a series of popes who worked diligently to put the reforming decrees of the Council into practice. In contrast to the Renaissance papacy, Pius was noted for his austere holiness and he was careful to appoint people of similar moral commitment. He imposed such strict moral standards on Rome that he was accused of turning the city into a monastery. He completed the work of Trent by publishing a Roman catechism as well as a revised breviary and missal. Unfortunately, in his commitment to enforcing the decisions of Trent, Pius relied heavily on the Inquisition and greatly expanded its activities, at times attending its sessions in person. Equally committed reformers followed Pius V in the papal office. Gregory XIII (1572–85), although less austere and rigorous than his predecessor, worked hard to carry out the decisions of Trent and to make sure that the men appointed to the episcopacy, or who were made cardinals, were worthy of the office. He was also responsible for the revision of the calendar. Gregory proclaimed the new calendar – fittingly called the Gregorian calendar – by a papal bull in 1582. Although Catholic countries accepted it almost immediately, the divisions resulting from the Reformation were evident even in the much-needed calendar revisions. Protestant states, suspicious of a papal calendar, did not introduce it for more than a century. The popes who followed Gregory XIII, including Sixtus V (1585–90), Clement VIII (1592–1605) and Paul V (1605–21), were also committed reformers, and they took steps to implement the decisions of Trent. Thus the papacy, which had been one of the major stumbling blocks in the way of reform in the years preceding the Reformation, became its most zealous proponent. In addition, spiritual qualities and commitment to reform rather than family connections became the most important consideration in the appointment of cardinals. Thus the Catholic hierarchy was dramatically reformed. Unfortunately, the popes were equally committed to the suppression of Protestantism, and their actions are sometimes difficult to defend from a Christian perspective. For example, when Pope Gregory XIII learned of the terrible massacre of French Protestants in the St Bartholomew's Day Massacre (1572), he had thanksgiving services celebrated in Rome and issued a commemorative medallion to celebrate the massacres as a 'holy' event.

The Catholic Reformation also benefited from a significant number of reforming bishops. Charles Borromeo (1538–84), the archbishop of Milan, stands out as one of the many bishops who worked hard to reform their dioceses. He made Milan into a model archdiocese, reforming the clergy and the monastic orders, while also renovating churches and establishing schools and colleges. Nevertheless, abuses still continued in some areas of Europe. For example, in France nepotism was rampant and a significant number of bishops continued to be non-resident or pluralists. On the other hand, Ireland was blessed with conscientious and able bishops who used their powers effectively to correct abuses. However, even those bishops committed to reform did not always succeed in reforming their dioceses. One major problem was finding the resources to establish the diocesan seminaries ordered by the Tridentine decree. Although every diocese was ordered to provide a seminary where priests would receive the training necessary to carry on their ministries, only the wealthier ones could afford a seminary. Consequently, many priests still lacked an adequate education. In addition, private patrons continued to play a major role in appointing parish priests so that even reforming bishops were not always free to appoint able candidates. Nevertheless, the Catholic Reformation did succeed in improving the calibre of the parish clergy, and a new type of reformed, committed and better-educated clergy was more common throughout Europe by the middle of the seventeenth century. The Catholic Reformation also resulted in a remarkable blossoming of theology, music, spiritual literature and impressive architecture.

A central concern of the Catholic Reformation was winning back areas from Protestants, and in that sense it was also a counter-Reformation which had as one of its major objectives confronting and challenging Protestant teaching. This was achieved in a variety of ways. Whereas in the early stages of the Reformation Protestants had often defeated the poorly educated Catholic clergy in public debates, better-educated Catholic priests now challenged Protestants to public debates. Trained in the Scriptures as well as Protestant theology and methods of argumentation, the Catholic debaters were more than able to hold their own in these debates. Jesuits also used their excellent schools to attract Protestants and win them over. One of the most successful missionaries to Protestants was the Dutch Jesuit Peter Canisius (1521–97), who devoted his ministry to confronting the Protestant challenge. Travelling throughout Europe spreading the Catholic faith, he preached countless sermons and founded five Jesuit university colleges as well as a series of colleges for boys. He also prepared three catechisms for teaching the faith – a large catechism for priests and educated adults, a mid-size one for adolescents, and a small catechism for children. Canisius was one of many dedicated priests responsible for the success of the Catholic counter-Reformation in winning back areas from Protestantism through education, debate and preaching. Other successes were achieved in far less desirable ways. In the final century of the Reformation era, France, Belgium, Austria, Bavaria, Bohemia and Poland were all restored to Catholicism largely as the result of the suppression of Protestantism by persecution, political manipulation and religious war.

Although the Catholic Reformation was directed against Protestantism and many of its manifestations were anti-Protestant, it also had much in common with the Protestant Reformation. Both Reformations sought to Christianize a European population that was often Christian in only a very superficial way, and for which popular religion was more important than official Christianity. Both movements produced the kind of educated clergy that had been to a great degree absent in the medieval church. Both movements also stressed the importance of educating the laity, and both Protestants and Roman Catholics produced catechisms and homilies for this purpose. Sadly, the two movements, which had many objectives in common, found it impossible to reconcile the areas where they differed, and the result was religious war and permanent schism in the Christian church.

See also: ROMAN CATHOLIC THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

R. Bireley, The Refashioning of Catholicism 1450–1700 (Washington DC, 1999); A. G. Dickens, The Counter Reformation (New York, 1969); R. W. Heinze, 'The Catholic Reformation', in R. W. Heinze, Reform and Conflict (Grand Rapids, 2005), pp. 255–279; P. Po-chia Hsia, The World of Catholic Renewal 1540–1770 (Cambridge, 2005); M. Jones, The Counter Reformation: Religion and Society in Early Modern Europe (Cambridge, 1995); M. Mullett, The Catholic Reformation (New York, 1999); J. C. Olin, Catholic Reform from Cardinal Ximenes to the Council of Trent, 1495–1563 (New York, 1990); A. D. Wright, The Counter-Reformation: Catholic Europe and the Non-Christian World (New York, 1982).

R. W. HEINZE

REFORMATION, RADICAL

This term has been used to describe those who desired a more far-reaching Reformation than that sought by the main-line or Magisterial Reformers (*Luther, *Zwingli and *Calvin). Some historians prefer the term 'left-wing' to describe the phenomenon under study. Research in the later twentieth century pointed to a measure of continuity between the radicals and late mediaeval apocalyptic groups. Erasmus was also a particularly important source, because he took the Bible seriously and yet reached very different conclusions from those of the Magisterial Reformers.

Origins

The origins of radicalism can be traced back to the demands for an acceleration of change in Wittenberg in 1522 made by *Karlstadt and the Zwickau prophets. They wanted an abolition of Catholic liturgical practices; they preached that infant baptism was wrong, and the prophets claimed to have direct revelations from God. Thomas *Müntzer, who preached in revolutionary apocalyptic terms and was savagely critical of Luther for putting too much reliance on a learned ministry and for giving insufficient place to the Holy Spirit's leading of ordinary people, was very influential in encouraging the confident but hopeless resistance of the Peasants' Revolt. Finally, a group emerged in Zurich which was critical of Zwingli, and it became clear that its concerns were not only the question of how speedily the Reformers could achieve their objectives, but also what was the nature of those objectives. They sought both a total break with non-biblical traditions and a separation of like-minded people from those who 'compromised' the faith.

G. H. Williams in his definitive study has noted three very broad radical groupings, though within these further sub-groupings can be detected.

The Anabaptists* emphasized believers' baptism, separation from the world (including the refusal to be involved in the institutions of the state) and a very literal biblicism. They are sometimes helpfully distinguished from the Reformers as those who sought a very precise 'restoration' or 'restitution' of NT Christianity (e.g. sometimes advocating communism) as opposed to a 'reformation' according to NT principles. Somewhat unfairly, the activities of a revolutionary element among the Anabaptists – who sought to set up a rule of the godly based on a rigid and authoritarian interpretation of the OT law in Münster in 1534 – became a symbol, for most contemporaries, of the dangers of radicalism. By and large they were not a threat to the state, and the followers of Menno *Simons and Jacob Hutter (d. 1536) survived through the centuries as significant groupings (see *Mennonite theology).

The Spiritualists* put a considerable emphasis on the leading of the Spirit, sometimes at the expense of the Bible. This could lead towards a mystical understanding of the faith and a concentration on the indwelling Word. Caspar *Schwenckfeld scandalized all orthodox believers by suggesting that there should be a moratorium on the Lord's Supper as it had become so divisive.

The Evangelical Rationalists* put reason on a par with Scripture, and often stood rather loose to doctrine, favouring a *unitarian theology. *Socinianism developed from the teaching of Laelius Socinus (1525–62) and his nephew Faustus Socinus (1539–1604).

Characteristics

It is possible to identify eight characteristics of the radicals, though the movement was so diverse that exceptions abound.

1. An emphasis on *sanctification rather than justification, rooted in the late medieval Devotio Moderna stress on the Christian life as one of the *imitation of Christ. Luther, they said, put too much emphasis on the Christian's continued sinfulness (semper peccator). Some held out, by contrast, the possibility of reaching a perfect state. Many thought that Paul's description in Romans 7 ('O wretched man that I am') did not apply to Christians.

2. A reaction against an over-intellectual faith. There was a strong conviction that the Reformers had over-intellectualized the faith in the emphasis they gave to theology and to learned ministers. What was much more important was the witness of the Spirit within.

3. A conviction that it was possible to establish a holy church. All the Reformers accepted that the visible church could not be an exact replica of the true church. The radicals had a greater confidence in the possibility of creating a church of real believers and to this end put a great emphasis on excommunication ('the ban').

4. A determination to be separate from the world. In particular, they stressed that the *state was for non-Christians and their members should have as little to do with it as possible. They consequently caused great perturbation by refusing to serve as magistrates or soldiers, and thus appeared to challenge the fabric of society which was based, in both Catholic and orthodox Protestant theory, on a close relationship between church and state. Related to this was their emphasis on following the way of Christ; war was seen as contrary to his example of love (see *Pacifism/peace).

5. The importance of believers' *baptism. Most of the radicals were strongly against infant baptism, and rebaptized those baptized as infants.

6. A liability to theological heterodoxy. The restorationist emphasis meant that the great credal formulations of the church were ignored.

The result was a tendency to unorthodox theological views particularly in relation to the *Trinity and *Christology. Many, for example, believed that Christ did not take our human flesh, but brought his own divine body to earth ('the celestial flesh of Christ').

7. A passionate commitment to *evangelism. They had a strong sense of the continuing force of the great commission which the Reformers had tended to limit to the apostolic era. This, together with their lack of interest in political boundaries and their willingness to face persecution, made them very courageous evangelists.

8. A growing conviction about *toleration. Though it is undoubtedly true that the fierce reaction they aroused within both Protestantism and Catholicism had the effect of undermining any idea of toleration, the radicals did in time have an important part to play in extending the idea that religious opinion should be left to the individual to decide without any pressure from church or state.

In background, the radicals, though often led by men of education and position, were generally simple people, often peasants and craftsmen, manifestly seeking an identity and a medium of self-expression which the Reformers' doctrine of the *priesthood of all believers had promised, but had not, it was contended, delivered. They often met in simple and informal settings. They were very prone to division. Sometimes their emphasis on the leading of the Spirit produced dangerously emotional and aberrant moral behaviour.

The existence of the radicals and their particular emphases is a good example of the not infrequent tensions in the Christian church between enthusiasm and order; between Spirit and word; between *Scripture and tradition; between seeing the *church as a communion of saints or a school of sinners; and between understanding the priesthood of all believers as giving equal *ministry to all or ministries to all but with a special ministry, involving authority, to some.

Bibliography

C. P. Clasen, Anabaptism: A Social History, 1526–1618 (Ithaca and London, 1972); A. Friesen, Erasmus, the Anabaptists, and the Great Commission (Grand Rapids, 1998); H.-J. Goertz, The Anabaptists (London, 1996); C. A. Snyder, Anabaptist History and Theology: An Introduction (Kitchener, 1995); G. H.

Williams, The Radical Reformation (Kirkville, 1992); G. H. Williams and A. M. Mergal (eds.), Spiritual and Anabaptist Writers (London, 1957).

C. P. WILLIAMS

REFORMED EPISTEMOLOGY

Reformed epistemology, developed by Alvin *Plantinga, Nicholas Wolterstorff and William Alston, maintains that belief in God can be rational or justified without the support of an argument for the existence of God. This runs counter to the *Enlightenment *evidentialist view of *rationality which claims that belief in God is rational only if it can be supported by sufficient evidence.

The evidentialist view is usually rooted in a view of the structure of knowledge called 'classical foundationalism'. According to classical *foundationalism, knowledge must be built on a foundation of certitudes such as statements that are self-evident, evident to the senses, or incorrigible. Self-evident statements include truths of arithmetic and logic such as $2 + 2 = 4$ and every statement is either true or false. Statements that are evident to the senses include grass is green, honey is sweet, and I hear a mourning dove. Some epistemologists exclude statements that are evident to the senses from the foundations of knowledge because we make perceptual mistakes (we sometimes perceive gray mountains, for example, as purple or golden); they include incorrigibility as the criterion of foundational beliefs. Incorrigible propositions are first-person psychological states (seeming or appearance beliefs) about which I cannot be wrong such as grass appears green to me or honey seems to me to be sweet. Evidentialists claim that since the statement that God exists is neither self-evident, evident to the senses, nor incorrigible, belief in God is rational only if it can be adequately supported by foundational beliefs.

Reformed epistemologists contend that belief in God does not require the support of a theistic argument in order for it to be rational. They find inspiration in the work of John *Calvin, who claimed that God has provided all humans with a natural, instinctual sense of the divine. He writes: 'There is within the human mind, and indeed by natural instinct, an awareness of divinity . . . God himself has implanted in all men a certain understanding of his divine majesty . . . This conviction, namely that there is some God, is naturally inborn in all, and is fixed deep within, as it were in the very marrow.' This natural, internal sense of the divine (the sensus divinitatis) is inscribed or written on the hearts of all people, and so belief in God is not the product of an argument. Reformed epistemologists would come to learn from the philosopher Thomas Reid whose 'common-sense' philosophy affirmed in-built cognitive faculties that are involved in a wide variety of human beliefs.

Reformed epistemologists argue that evidentialist demands for evidence cannot be met in a large number of cases with the cognitive equipment that we have. There are no sound proofs for the existence of other persons, inductive beliefs (e.g. that the sun will rise in the future), or the reality of the past (perhaps, as Bertrand Russell puzzled, we were created five minutes ago with our memories intact) that satisfy classical foundationalist requirements. So, according to classical foundationalism, belief in the past and inductive beliefs about the future are irrational.

A second criticism, first offered by Plantinga, is that classical foundationalism is self-referentially inconsistent. Classical foundationalism may be formulated as follows:

CF: A proposition p is rational if and only if p is self-evident, evident to the senses or incorrigible or if p can be inferred from a set of propositions that are self-evident, evident to the senses, or incorrigible.

Consider CF itself. CF is neither self-evident, evident to the senses, nor incorrigible; therefore, it can only be rationally maintained if it can be inferred from propositions that (ultimately) are self-evident, evident to the senses or incorrigible. Is that possible? If one considers such propositions, it's easy to see that they fail to constitute adequate evidence for CF. So, CF is not self-evident, evident to the senses or incorrigible, nor can CF be inferred from a set of propositions that are self-evident, evident to the senses or incorrigible. So, belief in CF, by its own account, is irrational!

The primary reason to believe that it might be rational for a person to accept belief in God without the support of an argument is a parity argument. We are not only naturally inclined to trust the deliverances of our cognitive faculties (beliefs in the external world, other persons, that the future will be like the past, the reality of the past, and what other people tell us – to name just a few), we are also entitled to do so. For the sake of parity, we are entitled to trust the sensus divinitatis.

See also: EPISTEMOLOGY; FAITH AND REASON.

Bibliography

K. J. Clark, Return to Reason (Grand Rapids, 1990); A. Plantinga, Warranted Christian Belief (New York, 2000); A. Plantinga and N. Wolterstorff (eds.), Faith and Rationality (Notre Dame, 1983); P. Quinn, 'In Search of the Foundations of Theism', Faith and Philosophy 2, 1985, pp. 469–486; L. Zagzebski (ed.), Rational Faith (Notre Dame, 1995).

K. J. CLARK

REFORMED THEOLOGY

The classic representative statements of Reformed theology are found in the *catechisms and *confessions of the Reformed churches: e.g. the French Confession (1559), the *Scots Confession (1560), the Belgic Confession (1561), the *Heidelberg Catechism (1563), the Second Helvetic Confession (1566), the *Thirty-Nine Articles of the Church of England (1562, 1571), the Canons of the Synod of *Dort (1619), the *Westminster Confession of Faith and Catechisms (1647) and the Formula Consensus Helveticus (1675). On a secondary level are the writings of the leading representative theologians of those churches: e.g. Ulrich *Zwingli and Heinrich *Bullinger of Zurich, Martin *Bucer of Strasbourg and Cambridge, John *Calvin and Theodore *Beza of Geneva, Peter Martyr *Vermigli of Strasbourg, Oxford and Zurich, together with later great synthesizers such as Amandus Polanus (1561–1610) and Francis Turretin (1623–1687).

Historical emergence

Reformed theology developed within sixteenth-century *Protestantism in distinction from *Lutheranism. Initial disagreement between Luther and Zwingli emerged on the *Eucharist, coming to an open breach at the Colloquy of Marburg (1529). Luther's so-called consubstantiation was based on his radical, innovative view of the communicatio idiomatum ('interchange of properties' between Christ's divine and human natures; see *Christology) as it found expression in the ubiquity of Christ's humanity. Other differences existed but were more of emphasis or else less divisive, e.g. Lutheranism tended to posit more discontinuity between *law and gospel, to allow greater autonomy to the civil magistrate and to focus more narrowly on soteriology than did the Reformed. Yet agreement was immensely more extensive. Together with Rome and Constantinople, both held to the ecumenical *dogmas on the *Trinity and *Christology. On the central affirmations of the *Reformation (justification by *faith, the denial of transubstantiation, the number of *sacraments, the authority of *Scripture) both were at one. Yet all attempts to achieve theological and ecclesiastical unity failed.

Principal characteristics

The centrality of God is a theme that pervades Reformed theology, which developed under the compelling demand of God's self-revelation in Scripture, its ultimate focus being on the Trinity, with a more immediate focus on Jesus Christ as mediator. In distinction from Lutheranism, in which Luther's personal struggles for forgiveness bequeathed a concentration on soteriology narrowly focused on justification, the Reformed attempted to bring the whole of reality under the sway of the supremacy of God. This can be seen as eminently biblical, while avoiding the perils of faddish 'emphases'. The dominance of the doctrine of God comes to expression in a number of ways:

(1) Human self-knowledge is attained only in the light of the knowledge of God. For Calvin, we are able to recognize who we are only when confronted by the supreme majesty and transcendent holiness of the living God as he makes himself known to us in his word by his Spirit. Thereby we are made cognizant of our sin and wretchedness, of the depravity that pervades our entire being. This *Augustinianism represents in reality a high view of man, since we are seen as moral beings responsible to God, known only in the light of God. Our deep-rooted alienation is floodlit by the greatness of God. Our true identity is as the *image of God.

(2) Salvation in its entirety is the work of God. Because of the pervasive impact of sin we stand under the condemnation of God, unable to change our status or condition. Hence, Reformed theology has consistently testified to the sole and sovereign activity of God in *salvation. Its origin is God's eternal purpose, his sovereign election of his people in Christ before the foundation of the world (Eph. 1:4), a choice made without regard to anything intrinsic in man. Correspondingly, although divergently nuanced, sovereign reprobation was consistently recognized. Therefore, Christ's purpose in *incarnation and *atonement was to save his people from their sins. His death was not intended to atone for every human being; for then either he would have failed, or the road would lead to *universalism, uniformly rejected as unbiblical. Nor did the cross provisionally atone for all while intrinsically accomplishing nothing, leaving atonement in suspense, contingent upon believing appropriation of Christ. Rather, Christ made effective atonement for the sins of all his people (see *Atonement, extent of). Similarly, the Holy Spirit draws us invincibly to Christ. Since we were dead in sin (Eph. 2:1) and unable because unwilling to trust Christ, faith (indeed, all Christian virtue) is entirely a gift of God. The Spirit not only brings us to Christ, but keeps us there. The whole process of *sanctification and *perseverance requires our strenuous effort in faith, but that effort itself is the Spirit's gift. Thus, Reformed theology maintained with vigour at Dort that none of the elect can finally fall away from grace so as to be lost.

Frequently, the mnemonic TULIP (Total depravity, Unconditional election, Limited atonement, Irresistible grace, Perseverance) is used to summarize the Canons of Dort and Reformed theology generally. However, this can present a truncated picture, an abridgment of the panoramic grandeur of the Reformed view of church and cosmos.

(3) The whole of personal and corporate life is to be subjected to God. Reformed theology has consistently sought to order the whole of life according to the requirements of God in Scripture. From its beginnings in Zurich, Strasburg and Geneva, strong efforts were made to model civic as well as ecclesiastical life in this way. Reformed theology has been linked with the rise of both capitalism and socialism, with the spread of education, literacy and science, besides revolution in France, the Netherlands, England, Scotland and the American colonies. Correspondingly, greater stress was laid on sanctification and the ongoing role of the *law in the Christian life than in Lutheranism. Consequently, Reformed theology has always sought to do justice to the corporate dimension of the gospel and, while increasingly influenced by individualism as time passed, nevertheless maintained this more effectively than other branches of Protestantism. Covenant theology exerted a strong impact in this direction within Reformed theology, since, although the covenant of grace was related to individual soteriology, the notion of the covenant of works made by God with Adam before the fall was increasingly applied, from 1600, to the civic and political responsibilities of nations to God on the basis of a permanent and universally binding law of creation.

Christocentricity. In early Reformed theology, exemplified by Calvin, *Knox and Zanchius (1516–90), a consistent focus was evident on Christ as the ground of our knowledge of God, as the subject and object of election and, precisely because of the centrality of God, as the immediate focal centre of theology. Later, the impact of scholasticism, with its rigid logical deductivism, and covenant theology, with its preponderant use of the covenant concept (see below), led to the intrusion of other factors which then assumed a place of dominance. At times, attempts have been made to reassert a Christocentric trinitarianism, in extreme form by Karl *Barth. A merit of such proposals has been to call attention to tendencies to depart from Reformed theology's roots.

Pluriformity. Reformed theology is not, nor has been, monolithic. It has possessed creative vitality sufficient to encompass diversity within an overall consensus. For instance, before Dort, differences existed on the question of limited atonement. Calvin was somewhat ambiguous, if not contradictory, on the matter, and may have leaned towards universal atonement. His successor Beza opposed the common formula (sufficient for all, efficient for the elect) on the grounds that it weakened the biblical stress on limited, or definite, atonement. Dort, in fact, fashioned a compromise agreement between the powerful British delegation's universalizing tendency and the majority's particularizing concern.

The development of *covenant theology indicates diversity too. Begun with Zwingli, *Oecolampadius and Bullinger, developed by Zacharius *Ursinus and Kaspar *Olevianus, the movement came to maturity with Robert Rollock (1555–99) and was further elaborated by Johannes *Cocceius. While increasingly dominant in the seventeenth century, not all were covenant theologians in the sense of using the concept to structure their theology. Still more was this so before 1600. Differences existed on the nature of the covenant of grace: was it a unilateral and an unconditional imposition by God, or a bilateral pact with conditions to be fulfilled by man? Most early covenant theologians had one covenant, the covenant of grace. Later, the idea of the pre-fall covenant of works emerged. From 1648 a third, pre-temporal covenant was proposed. Each suggestion had its adherents. Additionally, diversity existed on questions of piety. *Puritanism in old and new England was oriented towards *praxis, sanctification and pastoralia, increasingly tending to anthropocentrism. Similar developments occurred in the Netherlands and Scotland. This represented a contrast with earlier Reformed theology and with the more scholastically oriented tradition. This pluriformity did not extend to *Arminianism, which was proscribed by Dort for undermining the gratuitous theocentricity of salvation.

Calvin and Calvinism

Classical Reformed theology is often called 'Calvinism' due to the towering impact of John Calvin. However, this is not an entirely satisfactory term. First, owing to the above pluriformity Calvin neither could nor did impose his views on others. The autonomy of the various Reformed centres saw to that. For instance, his theology is not shaped by the covenant concept in the manner of later Reformed theology, yet after his death covenant theology became increasingly influential. Second, it is doubtful whether Calvin's distinctive theology, rooted in biblical exegesis, was properly grasped by many who came later. A recrudescence of *Aristotelian scholasticism led to a greater reliance on reason and bred a markedly different theological climate, characterized by clarity of definition, rigorous deductivism, greater use of causal analysis and liberal employment of the syllogism. Calvin's more fluid biblicism went into eclipse. Consequently, many scholars posit a dichotomy between Calvin and the Calvinists. This can be overplayed, for, whatever the differences, the parties concerned saw themselves as colleagues not competitors. Despite his antipathy to Aristotle, Calvin did use Aristotelian causal analysis on occasion. However, the reintroduction of Aristotelian logic by Beza, Zanchius and Vermigli may well have encouraged the eventual ossification of Reformed theology by the late seventeenth century. The living biblical dynamic of earlier days, exemplified by a flood of biblical commentaries and trinitarian-grounded systematic treatises based on the Apostles' Creed (Calvin's Institutes was one), became straight-jacketed in a rigid, logical, causal system. In fact, the ground was prepared for *deism, since God became simply the First Cause behind an immanent causal chain. Despite this, there was still a major contribution to the renewal of Reformed theology in eighteenth-century North America by Jonathan *Edwards.

Later developments

A revival of classic Reformed theology occurred in the nineteenth century in America, where the *Princeton theology, spearheaded by Charles *Hodge, A. A. Hodge (1823–86) and B. B. *Warfield, followed and adapted the scholastic Calvinism of Turretin. In Holland, Abraham *Kuyper and Herman *Bavinck also made a profound impact. Kuyper took his theology into public life, founding a university, a daily newspaper and a political party, eventually becoming prime minister.

In his massive reaction to liberalism, Karl *Barth's debt to the Reformed theology of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries is obvious on almost every page of CD, seen in his welcome Christocentricity and his vigorous repudiation of anthropocentrism. However, it has been argued that he never entirely eradicated the *existentialism so evident in his Romans commentary, and represented quite a different version of Reformed theology from that of the Reformation era and subsequent centuries.

The twentieth century witnessed major application of Reformed thinking to philosophy by e.g. Herman *Dooyeweerd, and the development of a unitary theology interacting with modern physics by T. F. *Torrance. Beyond that, Reformed theology shows an ongoing capacity for self-criticism and renewal which bodes well for the future, for, as Warfield argued, the future of Christianity is inseparable from the fortunes of the Reformed faith. Its concern for consistent theocentrism, its comprehensive worldview, and its at least implicit Christocentricity all exemplify its rigorous theological exploration of the gospel, its pursuit of 'faith seeking understanding', and its movement towards the integration of creation and redemption in Christ. Indeed, whenever prayer is offered, the church is engaging in Reformed theology, acknowledging what on other occasions its theology and praxis may sometimes deny.

Bibliography

J. W. Baker, Heinrich Bullinger and the Covenant: The Other Reformed Tradition (Athens, 1980); J. W. Beardslee (ed.), Reformed Dogmatics (New York, 1965); W. R. Godfrey, Tensions within International Calvinism: The Debate on the Atonement at the Synod of Dort, 1618–1619 (PhD diss., Stanford University, 1974); B. Hall, 'Calvin against the Calvinists', in G. E. Duffield (ed.), John Calvin (Abingdon, 1966); H. Heppe (ed.), Reformed Dogmatics: Set Out and Illustrated from the Sources (London, 1950); J. T. McNeill, The History and Character of Calvinism (New York, 1954); R. A. Muller, The Unaccommodated Calvin: Studies in the Foundation of a Theological Tradition (New York), 2003); idem, Post-Reformation Reformed Dogmatics: The Rise and Development of Reformed Orthodoxy, ca. 1520 to ca. 1725, 4 vols. (Grand Rapids, 1993–2003); B. B. Warfield, 'Calvinism', in Calvin and Augustine (Philadelphia, 1974); H. E. Weber, Reformation, Orthodoxie und Rationalismus, Teil 2 (Gütersloh, 1937).

R. W. A. LETHAM

REFORMERS, ENGLISH

The success enjoyed by the Protestant Reformation in England during the sixteenth century was the result of many factors, intellectual, political, theological and social, but at its heart was the work of a group of men who were personally devoted to the Protestant doctrines and fervently advocated them even at the cost of their own lives. Most prominent among their leaders were Thomas Bilney (c. 1495–1531), Hugh Latimer (1485–1555), Cranmer, Frith, Tyndale, Ridley, Robert Barnes (1495–1540), John Rogers (c. 1500–55) and John Bradford (1510–55). All of these men were burned at the stake as *heretics between the years 1531 and 1556. During the subsequent reign of Elizabeth I (1558–1603), however, the cause of *Protestantism triumphed, and, largely through the writings of John Foxe (1516–87), the testimony of the *martyrs made a profound impression on the English Christianity of the next four centuries. The writings of Tyndale, Frith, Ridley and Cranmer are of particular theological significance, and helped to shape the Protestantism which eventually took root in England. In their turn they clearly owed a great debt to the continental *Reformation, with *Luther's early influence being moderated by the growing prestige of the *Reformed scholars of Switzerland. At the same time, the native traditions of *Wyclif and the Lollard movement had their effect as well.

The first priority for the reformation of the church was given to the accurate translation and dissemination of the Bible. William Tyndale (c. 1494–1536) devoted most of his labours to this end. His translation of the NT and parts of the OT laid the foundation for English versions to this day. In pursuing his goal so relentlessly, Tyndale exemplified the Protestant belief that the reform of the church and the salvation of men and women depended upon dispelling spiritual ignorance through a knowledge of the sure word of God. The practical consequences of their belief in the authority and sufficiency of *Scripture can be judged by the assault on those beliefs and practices they did not find in the Bible. Using the category of 'superstition', the Reformers dismissed such elements of Catholic religion as *purgatory, the use of *images in devotion, prayers for the dead, the veneration of *saints and the belief in sacred objects and contemporary *miracles. At the same time there was a deep commitment to the Christian tradition (see also *Scripture and tradition), especially in the writings of the early Church Fathers. *Councils and Fathers (see *Patristic theology) were regarded as providing a guide to the interpretation of Scripture, although they were also thought to err on occasion and their judgments could be and were dissented from.

The doctrine of *justification by faith alone was the second great concern of the Reformers. John Frith (c. 1503–33), the brilliant younger friend and associate of Tyndale, illustrated its controlling influence, for example, in his work A Disputation of Purgatory (1531). It was not only the lack of scriptural support which caused Frith to dismiss purgatory; it was its inconsistency with the *Pauline view of *grace, especially that sinners are justified by faith in the merits of Jesus Christ alone, not by works. Any other view brings discredit to the cross of Christ, for it assumes that the blood of Christ is ineffective to secure forgiveness of sin (see *Guilt and forgiveness). It also underestimates the gravity of *sin and its grip on the human personality. To trust in the message of the cross is to be truly purged. The tribulation of the Christian life is also a purgatory, but it is completed at death when all are fully purified. Frith, like the other Reformers, completed his teaching on grace by espousing a doctrine of election in which God's initiative in salvation was thoroughly secured.

The doctrines of Scripture and grace thus provided the standard by which all was to be reformed. The charge levelled by their opponents that their doctrine of grace was anti-nomian (see *Law and gospel) led to a constant emphasis by the Protestants on the need for good works as a fruit of faith. In Tyndale, for example, this found particular expression in a use of the theme of *covenant, for which he has been somewhat unjustly suspected of legalism. Thomas *Cranmer used different language but with the same purposes in his classic Homily of Salvation, where he described justification by faith alone as 'the strong rock and foundation of Christian religion', and pressed home the necessity of obedience to God as the fruit of a true faith, without which a person is not saved.

The greatest controversies of the English Reformation revolved around the doctrine of the Mass (see *Eucharist). It was at this point above all that the understanding of Scripture and faith held by Cranmer, Frith and Ridley reached its most perilous expression in their own society. Holding the views of Scripture and justification which they did, they could not but differ from *Roman Catholic theology at a point regarded by Catholics of prime significance. For this they suffered the consequences at the stake.

Nicholas Ridley (c. 1500–55) argued that the whole debate on the Mass could be reduced to one key issue: whether the matter of the sacrament was 'the natural substance of bread, or the natural substance of Christ's own body'. If this question was answered in terms of Christ's body, there would follow the idea of transubstantiation, with the devotional honour due to the sacrament, the sacrificial offering of Christ by the priest on the altar, and the reception of the flesh and blood of Christ by the unworthy. Such consequences were at odds with the Christology and soteriology of the Reformers, and they asserted that the body of Christ was and remained in heaven, the bread and the wine being the sacrament or sign of the body, and that the faithful person (and he alone) fed on Christ spiritually by faith. These were the views of the mature Cranmer, and it is they which are encapsulated liturgically in the Book of Common Prayer, especially the 1552 revision, and in the Thirty-Nine Articles of Religion*.

Another focus for debate was the doctrine of the *church. The struggle with Roman Catholicism over the role of the *papacy was increasingly understood in terms of the war between God and *Antichrist, with the pope supplying the latter role. This gave the Reformers a way of interpreting the history of the church and offering theological insights about the significance of current events. There remained, however, the difficult problem of the *state. Cranmer had to attempt to give royal authority a rightful place in the affairs of the church, without acceding to unlawful constraints. Tyndale strongly declared in his Obedience of the Christian Man the necessity of obedience to all lawful authority, but with the caveat that the Christian must obey God rather than men. At times this teaching created an alliance with the Tudors; at times its constraints proved difficult and even fatal. Ultimately, for the major Reformers, as for many others, faithfulness to Christ as the head of the church over which he rules through the Scriptures demanded an example of obedience which has resounded even to the present day.

Bibliography

R. Bauckham, Tudor Apocalypse (Appleford, 1978); A. G. Dickens, The English Reformation, 2nd edn (London, 1989); G. E. Duffield, The Work of William Tyndale (Appleford, 1964); C. Haigh, English Reformations: Religion, Politics, and Society under the Tudors (Oxford, 1993); F. Heal, Reformation in Britain and Ireland (Oxford, 2005); P. E. Hughes, Theology of the English Reformers (Grand Rapids, 2nd 1980); D. B. Knox, The Doctrine of Faith in the Reign of Henry VIII (London, 1961); M. L. Loane, Masters of the English Reformation (London, 1954); D. MacCulloch, Thomas Cranmer (London, 1996); idem, Reformation (London, 2003); J. I. Packer and G. E. Duffield, The Work of Thomas Cranmer (Appleford, 1965); T. H. L. Parker (ed.), English Reformers (LCC 26; London, 1966); A. Townsend (ed.), Writings of John Bradford, 2 vols. (1848, 1853; repr. Edinburgh, 1979); N. T. Wright, The Work of John Frith (Appleford, 1978).

P. F. JENSEN

REFORMERS, SCOTTISH

Patrick Hamilton (d. 1527) (influenced by Luther) and George Wishart (d. 1546) (more Zwinglian), the two most prominent early preachers of the Reformation in Scotland, were both martyred in St Andrews. John *Knox, a follower of Wishart and a powerful preacher, was influential in England during the reign of the Protestant Edward VI, and became pastor of the English exiles in Geneva during the reign of the Catholic Mary I. Strongly influenced by *Calvin, he wrote there the Book of Common Order and encouraged the metrical version of the Psalms. He fiercely denounced the Roman Mass as idolatry and insisted that everything in worship had to be done according to Scripture. He returned to a Scotland in crisis and civil war and, as a strong advocate of resistance to 'idolatrous' rulers, led the Reformation of the Scottish church in 1560 when parliament approved the Scots Confession* and the (First) Book of Discipline. Not only Calvin's doctrine but also his form of church structure and discipline, administered by ministers and by lay elders and deacons, were adopted in order to produce a 'Christian Commonwealth'. A fourth order of ministry, the 'doctors' in the Reformed universities, indicated an emphasis on education, also seen in the plan to have a school in every parish.

See also: PRESBYTERIANISM; REFORMED THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

W. C. Dickinson (ed.), John Knox's History of the Reformation in Scotland (Edinburgh, 1949); G. Donaldson, The Faith of the Scots (London, 1990); J. Kirk, Patterns of Reform: Continuity and Change in the Reformation Kirk (Edinburgh, 1989); H. R. Sefton, John Knox (Edinburgh, 1993); A. Ryrie, The Origin of the Scottish Reformation (Manchester, 2006).

T. A. NOBLE

REGENERATION

Regeneration is a theological term that indicates the moment of new birth into God's family, as well as describing what God does to bring that new birth about. In the first instance, regeneration is seen from the human perspective as an event that happens within us. In the second instance, regeneration is seen from the divine perspective as that which must be done to effect Christ's work of *redemption for individual believers. Regeneration thus marks both the point and the process of transition from life outside Christ to life within his kingdom. We can helpfully consider two questions:

When does regeneration occur?

There is considerable agreement among theologians that regeneration is a singular, instantaneous event in comparison to *sanctification, which is the ongoing growth in holiness that continues throughout the Christian life. Regeneration can thus be said to occur at the beginning of the Christian life. For those in the early church, regeneration was generally understood to accompany *conversion, and it was their experience that in turning to God in *repentance and *faith, they were met at that moment with God's regenerative activity, changing them from a state of spiritual death to spiritual life by means of a spiritual resurrection. The four elements of this change – repentance, faith, *baptism and receiving the *Holy Spirit – normally occurred together, or with only a small interval of time between them. For this reason, the early Church Fathers often identified baptism as the moment of regeneration. In baptism, the human marks of conversion – repentance and faith – were met with the regenerative action of God, symbolized by the baptism itself and received in the gift of the Spirit. By the time of *Justin Martyr in the second century, this understanding was well-established, and later theologians such as *Irenaeus and *Tertullian took it for granted that baptism was the moment of regeneration. In baptism, the individual died to the old life and was raised again to new life in the Spirit; this action could only be the divine grace of regeneration. *Augustine spoke of awaiting regeneration after his conversion and before his baptism at Easter, and so clearly assumes a connection between the two.

The rise of infant baptism did not sever this connection, though it did significantly alter the church's understanding of regeneration. In infant baptism, the inherited guilt of original *sin was annulled, and it was a later separate act of confirmation that bestowed the Spirit upon a believer. In this split between baptism and *confirmation, regeneration refers only backwards to the washing away of previous and original sin, and the intimate connection between regeneration and new life in the Spirit is in danger of being lost.

After the Reformation, some attempts were made to reconnect regeneration with the other elements of conversion by decoupling it from the practice of baptism. This led to the evangelical emphasis that regeneration occurs at the moment when someone repents and believes the good news of Jesus Christ (see *Gospel). This stress was prominent in the eighteenth-century Evangelical Awakening and the various church movements which arose out of it.

The conversion of individuals is, of course, a varied experience, and many conversions are not instantaneous. However, we may still affirm that regeneration is to be understood theologically as a single instantaneous event that occurs along with the other elements of conversion – specifically, repentance, faith and baptism.

How does regeneration occur?

While regeneration occurs alongside human repentance and faith, it is not to be seen as a human activity. Regeneration is solely the action of God upon the human life which transforms spiritual deadness into a living responsiveness in obedience and love towards him. This is, of course, an activity of the triune God (see *Trinity), as we are placed in relationship with the Father, through the Son and by the Spirit. However, regeneration is typically associated with the Holy Spirit, who is given to believers to effect their regeneration. Just as Jesus was raised from the dead by the power of the Spirit, so we are awakened from our spiritual sleep by the impartation of God's life-giving Spirit to us.

Different theological schemes will generally result in different descriptions of the event of regeneration. *Liberal Protestantism, for instance, tends to see the human condition as essentially devoid of true understanding; consequently, regeneration is seen as a moment of spiritual education or enlightenment. Alternatively, we may give an account of the human condition as one of spiritual *idolatry. In this case, regeneration is the turning of our hearts to God and the beginning of a life of communion with the Father, through the Son and by the Spirit.

In regeneration, the Spirit applies the redemptive work of Christ to our lives and brings about the initial change – rebirth – which is necessary for us to become the children of God (see *Sonship) and to be heirs of his *kingdom.

Bibliography

J. Baillie, Baptism and Conversion (London, 1964); K. Barth, CD IV.2, esp. §66.4; W. Pannenberg, Systematic Theology, vol. 3 (Edinburgh and Grand Rapids, 1998), esp. pp. 239–283; D. J. Pawson, The Normal Christian Birth (London, 1989).

A. J. STOBART

REINCARNATION, see METEMPSYCHOSIS

RELATIVISM

To say that truth is relative is to claim that it varies from one time, place or person to another, and that it depends on the changing conditions they bring: that there is no universal truth, valid for all peoples at all times and places. This claim has been repeated throughout history. Protagoras, the Greek sophist, asserted that each person is the measure of all things.

Relativism today is to be found in most areas of enquiry. Ethical relativists see moral standards as culturally relative; situational ethics rejects universally binding moral rules in favour of decisions dependent on their peculiar contexts. Religious relativists view different religious beliefs and practices as legitimate products of different historical and cultural settings. Relativism has even arisen in the natural sciences, with the realization that the growth of scientific knowledge is in measure a function of personal and sociological, rather than just experimental or mathematical, factors. Wherever subjective or sociological influences are admitted, as distinct from the objective and universal, there relativism is likely to make its appearance.

A number of historical developments have encouraged this trend. Twentieth-century studies in the sociology of knowledge uncovered influences on human learning which were previously overlooked. The extension of evolutionary concepts to the history of religion and of ethics popularized the notion that changing ideas are historically dependent. Yet running through these developments is the overall *secularization process, which turned Western culture from its theistic way of thinking to a naturalistic worldview lacking any transcendent point of reference. Theism had provided a transcendent locus for universally valid truth, in the wisdom of the eternal, self-revealing God. Without an adequate substitute for its divine locus, truth is dislocated and becomes relative to changing natural conditions.

Critics of relativism point out that even if beliefs are as diverse as the relativist claims, this does not mean that they ought to be so; many of our differences in fact yield to reason and evidence. But the diversity seems greatly overstated, for similarities plainly exist between different cultures; common human concerns arise from generic aspects of human nature and of the world in which we all live. The supposed dependency of human beliefs on cultural and historical conditions is likewise exaggerated, for critical and creative thought transcends in measure the ideas we inherit from others. Indeed, if all human beliefs vary and depend totally on local conditions, so too will belief in relativism. Total relativism cannot be unchangingly true: it is a self-refuting position. But if not all beliefs vary and not all are totally dependent, then at least some universal truths are valid for all times and places.

Relativism therefore boils down to *epistemological questions. Is there any objective locus for truth? Can human knowledge transcend its subjective and historical conditions sufficiently to apprehend universally valid truth? Does divine revelation give us access to universal truth?

Bibliography

M. Baghramian, Relativism (London, 2004); N. L. Gifford, When in Rome (New York, 1983); M. Krausz (ed.), Relativism: A Contemporary Anthology (New York, 2010); J. Rachels, The Elements of Moral Philosophy (New York, 1986), ch. 3; R. Trigg, Reason and Commitment (Cambridge, 1973).

See also Bibliography for *Truth.

A. F. HOLMES

RELIGION

A summary understanding of religion must take several aspects into account. This includes definitions of religion that arise from various approaches to the subject, types of religions, and the ways in which contemporary religious expression takes place in the late modern or *postmodern period.

The academic study of religion in scientific rather than theological ways in the Western world began with the study of Christianity as the dominant religious tradition (see *Religion, theology of). This gave way to include the study of other religions due to a variety of factors. This includes the Christian *mission movement of the nineteenth century that engaged other religious movements around the world and which resulted in a wealth of data for study. The *Enlightenment also contributed to a new way of study, with its emphasis on *rationality and religion related more to human than divine or supernatural activity.

As the scientific study of religion developed over time, differing approaches have been taken, and as a result 'religion' has been defined variously. One perspective of research by scholars is the cognitive approach. This method focuses on beliefs as central and explores how they lead to certain practices by religious adherents. One of the more influential practitioners of this method of studying religion was James Frazer, who studied 'primitive religion' and animism. He understood religion in an evolutionary sense of progression from the primitive to the modern, from *polytheism to *monotheism (see *Progress, idea of). For him religion was defined as 'a propitiation or conciliation of powers superior to man which are believed to direct and control the course of nature and human life' (Golden Bough, pp. 57–58).

Another academic way of studying religion is the functional approach. This dismisses the idea that beliefs are the appropriate starting point for understanding religion, and instead seeks to understand what religion does for individuals, groups and societies. One proponent of the functional approach was Emile *Durkheim, who is considered the father of modern sociology. He focused on the distinction between concepts of the sacred and profane in the practice of totemism. For Durkheim, religion 'is a unified system of beliefs and practices relative to sacred things, that is to say, things set apart and forbidden – beliefs and practices which unite into one single moral community called a Church, all those who adhere to them' (Elementary Forms of Religion, p. 44, italics original). Max *Weber was another important scholar in the functional study of religion. He was concerned with economic considerations and its relation to society and religion.

William James signals a shift from the previous scholars in that he took a psychological and individual approach to the study of religion rather than considering it in relation to larger social systems. James was concerned with *mystical *religious experiences and the resulting feelings of union with the divine or transcendent. James defined religion as 'the feelings, acts, and experiences of individual men in their solitude, so far as they apprehend themselves to stand in relation to whatever they may consider the divine' (Varieties of Religious Experience, pp. 31–32, italics original).

Mircea Eliade (1907–86) is an example of the *phenomenological study of religion. His approach involved an interest in the patterns of *symbols and the *mythical in religion as it relates to a distinction between the sacred of the extraordinary, and the profane of everyday life. Eliade's approach has also been called the '*history of religions' method.

A more recent approach to studying religion comes from anthropologist Clifford Geertz. He was not interested in methods that tried to find universal aspects running across religious traditions like those discussed above, but instead was concerned with exploring the specific elements of religions. His method involved ethnographic study called 'thick description' which explored religion as part of *culture and the shared meaning of symbols and actions they incorporate.

Yet another contemporary approach is one that explores 'lived religion'. This method moves beyond what people do in what are considered specifically religious buildings, activities and contexts to an examination of the activities of everyday life. Scholars like Gary Laderman, Meredith McGuire and Robert Orsi are examples of academics pursuing a lived religion approach.

Moving beyond various academic approaches to the study of religion and how it is defined, it is helpful to consider how scholars categorize religions by types. One major category is world religions, those religious traditions that arose during the Axial Age starting in 500 BC. As Terry Muck has noted, world religions are 'old, large, and cross-cultural' (Handbook of Religion, p. 44). They include *Hinduism, *Buddhism, *Judaism, Christianity and *Islam. Indigenous religions are another type. These are 'restricted to a single cultural group', and 'are the province of a single tribe or ethnic or cultural group' (ibid., p. 183). There are a number of indigenous religions found in various geographical areas, from North America, Meso- and South America, to Europe, the Middle East, Africa, North and South Asia, China, India and Oceania. New religious movements (often called ‘cults’ by evangelicals) are ‘new’ groups that are related to world religions or other religious traditions but which involve significantly novel expressions that differentiate them from their parent religion. Examples include The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints (Mormons) and the Watchtower Bible and Tract Society (Jehovah’s Witnesses) arising out of Christianity; the Nation of Islam arising out of Islam; Soka Gakkai arising out of Buddhism; Transcendental Meditation in connection with Hinduism; and Paganism, Gnosticism, the New Spirituality (‘New Age’), Scientology, and Satanism with connections to the Western esoteric tradition. One other religious type of note are hyper-real or fiction-based religions. There is some overlap with new religious movements, but these are defined by Adam Possamai as ‘a simulacrum of a religion, created out of, or in symbiosis with popular culture, which provides inspiration for believers/consumers’ (Handbook of Hyper-real Religions, p. 1). Matrixism, Jediism and the Otherkin are examples of this type of religion.

Finally, it should be noted that in our late modern or postmodern context, affiliation with religions and personal religious identities are fluid rather than fixed. *Sociologist of religion Zygmunt Bauman has referred to our time as one of ‘liquid modernity’, and in this context people may engage in religious switching and experimentation over a lifetime, or inhabit multiple religious identities simultaneously.

See also: NEW RELIGIONS.

Bibliography

Z. Bauman, Liquid Modernity (Malden, 2000); E. Durkheim, The Elementary Forms of Religious Life, tr. K. Fields (New York, 1995 [1912]; M. Eliade, The Sacred and the Profane: The Nature of Religion, tr. W. Trask (New York, 1959); J. Frazer, The Golden Bough: A Study in Magic and Religion (New York, 1922); C. Geertz, The Interpretation of Cultures (New York, 1973); W. James, The Varieties of Religious Experience: A Study in Human Nature (New York, 1929); C. Klassen, Religion & Popular Culture: A Cultural Studies Approach (Oxford, 2014); G. Laderman, Sacred Matters: Celebrity Worship, Sexual Ecstasies, the Living Dead, and Other Signs of Religious Life in the United States (New York, 2009); M. McGuire, Lived Religion: Faith and Practice in Everyday Life (Oxford, 2008); T. Muck, H. Netland and G. McDermott (eds.), Handbook of Religion (Grand Rapids, 2014); R. Orsi, Gods of the City: Religion and the American Urban Landscape (Bloomington, 1999); A. Possamai (ed.), Handbook of Hyper-real Religions (Leiden, 2012); M. Weber, The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism, tr. T. Parsons (Mineola, 2003 [1930]).

J. W. MOREHEAD

RELIGIONS, THEOLOGY OF

Although Christianity has always existed in a world of religious diversity, the reality of our post-*Christendom, post-colonial, post-holocaust, post 9/11, 7/7, multi-ethnic and multicultural context has meant that more than ever Christians are acutely aware of systematic, pastoral and missiological issues posed by other religions. The missiologist Gerald Anderson has stated that ‘No issue in missiology is more important, more difficult, more controversial, or more divisive for the days ahead than the theology of religions . . . This is the theological issue for mission in . . . the twenty-first century’ (‘Theology of Religions and Missiology: A Time of Testing’, in C. Van Engen, D. Gilliland and P. E. Pierson (eds.), The Good News of the Kingdom, Maryknoll, 1993, p. 201).

As a discipline, the ‘theology of religions’ has had a meteoric rise to fame and quickly become its own distinct category in theological studies. The ‘theology of religions’ must be distinguished from the allegedly ‘neutral’ discipline of academic ‘religious studies’, for although being sibling rivals striving to occupy the same space, the ‘theology of religions’ locates itself in the tradition of fides quaerens intellectum (‘faith seeking understanding’): ‘The theology of religion asks what religion is and seeks, in the light of Christian faith, to interpret the universal religious experience of humankind; it further studies the relationship between revelation and faith, faith and religion, and faith and salvation’ (J. Dupuis, Toward a Christian Theology of Religious Pluralism, Orbis, 1997, p. 7). Although the focus of the ‘theology of religions’ has often concentrated on the issue of salvation, a truly comprehensive Christian theology of religions includes not only questions pertaining to *salvation, but questions pertaining to *truth in other religions, and questions pertaining to the phenomena of human religiosity.

In 1983, Alan Race, an Anglican priest and theologian, developed a threefold typology that has largely set the terms of debate over the last twenty years within the 'theology of religions' (Christians and Religious Pluralism, London, 1983). Netland (Dissonant Voices, p. 9f.) neatly summarizes these positions:

Exclusivism maintains that the central claims of Christianity are true, and that where the claims of Christianity conflict with those of other religions the latter are to be rejected as false. Christian exclusivists also characteristically hold that Jesus Christ is the unique incarnation of God, the only Lord and Saviour. Salvation is not to be found in the structures of other religious traditions . . . Inclusivism . . . holds that [although] God has revealed himself definitively in Jesus Christ and that Jesus is somehow central to God's provision of salvation for humankind, they are willing to allow that God's salvation is available through non-Christian religions . . . Pluralism parts company with both exclusivism and inclusivism by rejecting the premise that God has revealed himself in any unique or definitive sense in Jesus Christ. On the contrary, God is said to be actively revealing himself in all religious traditions . . . Christian faith is merely one of many equally legitimate human responses to the same divine reality.

Historical context

Historically the dominant theme regarding Christian approaches to other religions has been exclusivistic. While philosophical and socio-cultural factors have played their part, the foundational authoritative basis for historical affirmations of exclusivism has been the strongly exclusivistic tenor of the Bible (both OT and NT) which Christians have understood to be a true and unified revelation of God's works and words in history. The constant theme throughout the history of Israel and in the founding of the Christian church is both the incomparability (none like him) and transcendent uniqueness (no other God) of Yahweh and Jesus Christ who is God incarnate (cf. C. J. H Wright, The Mission of God, Nottingham, 2006, p. 82). As a consequence of the nature and activity of *God comes a secondary affirmation of the incomparability and uniqueness of both Israel and the *church. There is no other covenant community like them, and there is no other community with a history like theirs, because the incomparable and unique God has covenanted with them alone and intervened salvifically on their behalf alone. However, with this theme of particularity also come complementary themes of universality, inclusion, diversity and tolerance (e.g. attitudes towards the alien and stranger; attitudes towards ethnic diversity, including the eschatological hope of Christians being drawn from all nations and languages; God's universal care and sustenance of creation; the universal scope of the gospel and the universal mandate to take the gospel to the nations, etc.). Such exclusivity should never lead to vainglory or malice, for both Israel and the church are chosen by the sheer grace of God to display his glory, and have a unique responsibility and calling to be a light for the nations in both word and deed.

Although the exclusivist mood of the biblical testimony continued into the early church, the writings of some of the early Fathers, like *Justin, *Irenaeus, *Origen and *Clement of Alexandria, indicate a willingness to speculate on the relationship between Christianity and other philosophies in matters of truth and salvation. However, it is *Cyprian in The Unity of the Catholic Church who is responsible for the slogan most often associated with exclusivism, 'extra ecclesiam nulla salus' ('outside the church there is no salvation'), remembering his focus was that of *schismatics and *heretics rather than other religions per se. With *Augustine, this axiom was strengthened. Augustine's teaching on original guilt, predestination, God's sovereignty and efficacious grace gave a far more substantial theological and philosophical basis and reinforced Christian particularity. Within *Roman Catholic teaching, exclusivistic interpretations of extra ecclesium nulla salus (albeit with some modifications) continued until the Second *Vatican Council, when many acknowledge that in terms of the threefold typology, Roman Catholic teaching shifted from the exclusivist paradigm into the inclusivist paradigm (see F. A. Sullivan, Salvation Outside the Church? Tracing the History of the Catholic Response, London, 1992).

The Protestant Reformers largely continued the exclusivist heritage, not so much under the banner of extra ecclesiam nulla salus but rather under their five ‘solas’ of the *Reformation: sola Scriptura, solus Christus, sola fide, sola gratia, soli Deo Gloria (‘Scripture alone, Christ alone, faith alone, grace alone, glory to God alone’). Calvin affirmed a universal natural revelation of God in all humanity, a sensus divinitatis or semen religionis, but claimed that because of the sinfulness of man, such knowledge was always twisted and distorted away from God (Institutes, 1.3.1–2).

For those coming under its sway, the *Enlightenment, with its own ultimate commitment to autonomous human reason, signalled a paradigm shift in the theology of religions: the death knell for exclusivism but the breeding ground for what would become inclusivism, pluralism and the scientific study of *religion (religious studies). Changes in fundamental doctrinal loci would mean changes in the Christian attitude towards the religious other. However, not all were influenced by Enlightenment presuppositions, and the early modern missionary movement continued to be propelled by an exclusivist engine fuelled on the uniqueness of Christ and the uniqueness of the Christian message. This culminated in intense debate at the first three world missionary conferences of Edinburgh (1910), Jerusalem (1928) and Tambaram (1938) where a wide range of missiological issues were discussed, underlying which was the relationship of Christianity to the world religions. One exclusivist scholar inextricably linked to and towering over these conferences, in particular Tambaram, was the Dutch missiologist Hendrik *Kraemer, whose multi-disciplinary approach combined theological, missiological, linguistic and phenomenological insights. Kraemer’s main works, The Christian Message in a Non-Christian World (1938), Religion and the Christian Faith (1956) and World Cultures and World Religions (1960), remain some of the most detailed, nuanced and sophisticated statements within the exclusivist paradigm, and have influenced (though not without criticism) subsequent generations of exclusivist missiologists from the ‘Reformed’ tradition, most importantly J. H. *Bavinck, Johannes Verkuyl and Lesslie *Newbigin.

Within the contemporary scene, different versions of exclusivism, inclusivism and pluralism can be found at both popular and academic levels, together with the emerging voices of *postliberalism (with its social and political emphasis) and comparative theology (which, in fact, argues against an all-encompassing a priori theology of religions, focusing more on a posteriori engagement between living religious traditions).

Rethinking the terms of the debate

As the ‘theology of religions’ continues to mature as a discipline, an important debate concerns the ‘terms’ on which the debate has been conducted. Increasingly, many scholars are dissatisfied with the threefold typology. First, as a classificatory system, the tradition-specific nature of all theology means that the theology of religions is a parasitic discipline dependent on other a priori theological commitments. While recognizing the pedagogical usefulness of all typologies and taxonomies, there is no real ‘generic’ exclusivism, inclusivism or pluralism, and if such generalizations are made, they must be recognized as a rather blunt analytical tool. At the very least, exclusivism, inclusivism and pluralism must be seen as points along a spectrum rather than hermetically sealed positions. For example, ‘exclusivism’ is a broad enough category to posit a number of different configurations and interpretations concerning issues pertaining to salvation and truth and human religiosity. Exclusivism certainly does not necessarily entail a parsimony regarding salvation.

Second, a number of scholars have argued that there is an inbuilt prescriptive bias in the way the threefold typology has been construed, a bias against exclusivism often portrayed in overly emotive and ‘sensationalistic’ terms, and for pluralism (and to a lesser extent inclusivism) portrayed not only as more enlightened and tolerant than the other positions, but more significantly religiously and epistemologically ‘neutral’. D’Costa has argued that ‘pluralism’ is itself a ‘myth’ and in reality a covert form of hardline exclusivism: “‘pluralism’ represents a tradition-specific approach that bears all the features of exclusivism – except that it is liberal modernity’s exclusivism’ (The Meeting of Religions and the Trinity, London, 2000, p. 22). Far from enabling tolerance and diversity, pluralism does the opposite, for it ‘privileges liberal modernity as a mastercode within which all the religions are positioned and neutered’ (Meeting of Religions, p. 91). His conclusion is that ‘pluralism’ becomes something other than Christian, a worshipping of the god of modernity rather than the triune God.

The debate within evangelicalism

Despite there being scholarly disagreement amongst evangelicals concerning a plethora of issues regarding soteriological, truth and missiological questions, *evangelicalism is still largely a confessionally exclusivistic movement, stressing the authority of the Bible, the uniqueness of Christ and the necessity of faith in Christ. Three important international symposia have articulated exclusivist themes in their official statements: the Frankfurt Declaration (1970), the *Lausanne Covenant (1974) and the Manila Manifesto (1992), and several evangelical theologians and missiologists have articulated nuanced and constructive exclusivist positions, e.g. Harold Netland, Don Carson, Chris Wright, Vinoth Ramachandra, Gerald McDermott and Terrance Tiessen. More controversially, there are also a handful of evangelical theologians like Clark *Pinnock and John Sanders who can be located more comfortably within inclusivism than exclusivism. Generally speaking, and compared to other traditions, *evangelicals have a lot more thinking to do in this area of theology.

Any evangelical ‘theology of religions’ must recognize at one and the same time both continuity and discontinuity between the quest for god in other faiths, and the fullness and finality of the knowledge of God ‘in the face of Jesus Christ’. Non-Christian religion, alike in its most debased and most elevated manifestations, always bears the dual impress of God’s gracious revelation of himself to all humankind in creation and humankind’s universal exchange of the truth of God for a lie. So long as these twin biblical perspectives are maintained, there may be scope for legitimate differences in the way Christian theology balances and correlates them in its evaluation of other religions. The two perspectives are tellingly presented in Paul’s address at Athens. Despite the universality of God’s providential care and presence (Acts 17:24–28), the Athenians’ religiosity suppressed the knowledge of the true God. Their abundant images and idols attested their ignorance of him (17:16, 22–23, 29–30), and even their awareness of that ignorance (17:23). Paul’s message came to hearers whose refusal to know the living God had left its mark upon their religion. Because *idols are distortions and perversions of truth and so ‘related’ to truth, like Kraemer one might cautiously say that Christianity is the ‘contradictive or subversive fulfilment’ of the human religious quest (‘Continuity or Discontinuity’, in W. Paton [ed.], The Authority of Faith, London, 1939, p. 5).

See also: CHRISTIANITY AND OTHER RELIGIONS; CONTEXTUALIZATION; MISSIOLOGY.

Bibliography

J. H. Bavinck, The Church Between Temple and Mosque (Grand Rapids, 1966); J. Calvin, Institutes; D. A. Carson, The Gagging of God: Christianity Confronts Pluralism (Leicester and Grand Rapids, 1996); G. D’Costa, Theology in the Public Square (Oxford, 2005); idem, Christianity and World Religions: Disputed Questions in the Theology of Religions (Oxford, 2009); G. D’Costa, P. Knitter and D. Strange, Only One Way? Three Christian Responses on the Uniqueness of Christ in a Religiously Plural World (London, 2011); V.-M. Kärkkäinen, An Introduction to the Theology of Religions: Biblical, Historical and Contemporary Perspectives (Downers Grove, 2003); H. Kraemer, The Christian Message in a Non-Christian World (New York, 1938); G. McDermott, God’s Rivals (Downers Grove, 2007); H. Netland, Dissonant Voices (Grand Rapids and Leicester, 1991); idem, Encountering World Religions: The Challenge to Christian Faith and Mission (Leicester and Grand Rapids, 2001); T. Perry, Radical Difference: A Defence of Hendrik Kraemer’s Theology of Religions (Ontario, 2001); A. Plantinga, ‘Pluralism: A Defense of Religious Exclusivism’, in T. D. Senior (ed.), The Rationality of Belief and the Plurality of Faith (London and New York, 1995); D. Strange, The Possibility of Salvation Among the Unevangelised (Carlisle, 2002); idem, ‘For Their Rock Is Not as Our Rock’: An Evangelical Theology of Religions (Nottingham, 2014); T. L. Tiessen, Who Can Be Saved? Reassessing Salvation in Christ and World Religions (Leicester and Downers Grove, 2004).

D. S. STRANGE

RELIGIOUS EXPERIENCE

The notion of ‘experience’ is famously resistant to straightforward definition. The challenges are no less formidable when attempting to define ‘religious experience’. Nevertheless, expressed in admittedly very general terms, experience can be understood as the accumulated impact of all that happens in and to a community or individual in that community or an individual's passive and active engagement with the world. In that case religious experience simply denotes what it is that happens to and in communities and individuals by virtue of their participation in the practices of particular religious traditions. It can refer, therefore, in a technically low-level way, to what happens in an individual's prayer life as much as it can to what happens when a Christian community gathers around the Communion table to celebrate the Eucharist or when that same community participates in prophetic protest against injustice. All of these contribute to the experience of being Christian.

More technical theological discussion of religious experience is oriented towards a set of issues which includes, among other things, the relationship between human and divine agency in such experience, whether there is a normative experience of *God, the nature and role of the *Holy Spirit, the respective weight to be given to individual and communal experience of God, and whether religious experience is a universal phenomenon. Despite the breadth of the topic, however, theological discussion of religious experience can be usefully divided into two broad strands. The first is deeply rooted in Christian thought and focuses on the comprehensiveness of the *Christian life. The second and more recent is methodological and is especially associated with modern theology.

Religious experience and the Christian life

Although not using the term 'religious experience', the biblical tradition insists on the fullness of the life of faith, pointing to the full personal encounter of the believer with God. This is indicated in descriptions of the believer's relationship with God in terms such as seeing (Ps. 34:8; John 12:45), eating (Rev. 3:20), tasting (Heb. 6:4) and intimate fellowship (John 17:21), etc. Such references should not, however, be understood in merely individual or narrowly spiritual terms: the fully personal is also both communal and ethical. Both OT and NT show a deep resistance to anything which disrupts the balance between the personal, communal and moral. For instance, the personal encounter with God is properly liturgical (see *Worship) and therefore communal (e.g. Pss 48; 122; 1 Cor. 11:20–26), but a communal/liturgical encounter with God separated from or at odds with the moral life is harshly criticized (e.g. Amos 5:21–24; Jas 1:26–27).

Such convictions have deeply shaped Christian discourse about religious experience. A prominent place is given to the concept of 'the heart' as that which, although unseen (e.g. 1 Sam. 16:7), encompasses the breadth of the human encounter with God (Pss 13:5; 51:10). In teaching which became seminal for Christian thought and faith, Jesus points to the state or inclination of the heart as the true index of *faith (e.g. Matt. 15:17–20; Mark 7:18–23; Luke 6:42–45). It is important to note, however, that this strand of Jesus' teaching was often specifically targeted against religious hypocrisy (e.g. Matt. 5:20–7:27; 9:13; 12:7). For Jesus, therefore, the heart is a moral category: it is the pure heart which yields righteous actions. Accordingly, appeals to the heart have often functioned as correctives to expressions of faith which involve a moral gap between what is believed and what is lived.

These issues have shaped the idea of religious experience, which Christians have often turned to as a way of challenging any merely cognitive or ritualistic expression of the faith (see *Ethics). This was evident in the various eighteenth-century movements in Britain and North America broadly designated 'The Evangelical Revival' or 'The Great Awakening', as well as later 'revivalism' including the Pentecostal movement.

Jonathan *Edwards, one of the key figures of the North American Awakening, produced one of the most theologically sophisticated accounts of the role of experience in the Christian life. In his defence of 'the doctrine of inward experience, or sensible perceiving of the immediate power and operation of the Spirit of God' (A Treatise Concerning the Religious Affections, p. 138), Edwards draws attention to the NT's references to the enlightening and revealing work of God (e.g. Eph. 1:17–18) by which believers personally encounter God. Edwards acknowledges the equal legitimacy of both the secret and the spectacular workings of the Spirit, but insists that both are subject to the Johannine injunction to test the spirits (1 John 4:1–6). The global *Pentecostal movement has similarly challenged any neglect of the personal dimension of the encounter with God and has also especially emphasized the need for serious theological attention to the Holy Spirit, the neglect of whom is often a contributing cause of the merely cognitive or ritualistic.

These two movements share one further feature: a tendency to describe religious experience in what are typically psychological categories, somewhat at the expense of its moral dimensions. On this basis, an emphasis on religious experience often becomes an emphasis on the inner over the external, the subjective over the objective, and the affective over the cognitive. This tendency is reinforced and systematized in works of modern theology.

Religious experience and modern theology

The methodological appeal to religious experience is, in fact, a major distinguishing mark of modern theology. The categories of ‘religion’ and ‘experience’ presented themselves as foundations which could resist – or elude – the challenges posed to Christian faith by both the natural sciences and the rationalism of modern philosophy. Paradigmatically, Friedrich Schleiermacher proposed the ‘feeling of absolute dependence’ as just such a foundation. He contended that this particular ‘feeling’ was a universal human experience which could not be reduced to metaphysical or ethical categories. Schleiermacher’s attempt thereby to commend the comprehensiveness of the Christian faith against its reductionist critics was laudable. In his monumental rejoinder, however, Karl Barth objected that in grounding the possibility of theology in human experience, Schleiermacher had turned theology into anthropology and, in fact, made Christianity more rather than less vulnerable to the various projection theories which emerged in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. Barth proposed that theology begins not as a reflection on some or another dimension of human experience, but as an obedient response to God’s self-revealing word spoken in Jesus and attested in Scripture.

Arguably, however, an equally telling criticism of the methodological appeal to religious experience is its twofold narrowing of the very experience to which it refers. First, through the cultural and intellectual processes of secularization, ‘religion’ had begun to function in the modern West as a description of an apolitical, privatized and circumscribed realm. Despite, therefore, attempts to appeal to experience as a non-reductive category, qualifying it as religious experience necessarily narrowed the range of what it referred to. Secondly, by treating this particular experience as self-evidently universal, it was necessary to place it outside or above the particular beliefs and language of the Christian (or any other religious) community. Consequently, religious experience was located in a narrow pre-cognitive, prelinguistic realm of life. These trends are especially evident in the following classical statement from William James: ‘The truth is that in the . . . religious sphere particular reasons are cogent for us only when our inarticulate feelings of reality have already been impressed in favour of the same conclusion. Then, indeed, our intuitions and our reason work together, and great world-ruling systems, like that of the Buddhist or of the Catholic philosophy, may grow up. Our impulsive belief is here always what sets up the original body of truth, and our articulately verbalized philosophy is but its showy translation into formulas’ (The Varieties of Religious Experience, p. 73).

Here, the key features of the distinctively modern appeal to religious experience are all in place: the designation of a specifically religious ‘sphere’; the priority of ‘inarticulate feelings’ and ‘intuition’; and the designation of language and communally held beliefs as ultimately superficial. In fact, the greater the distance placed between religious experience and specific theological claims, the more tentative and imprecise become the claims for the object of the religious experience: ‘the one who raised the Lord Jesus’ (2 Cor. 4:14), for instance, gives way to such generalizations as ‘The Sacred’, ‘The Divine’, ‘The Transcendent’, ‘The Ultimate Mystery’, ‘The Holy’, etc.

Such moves press the question of just what constitutes the Christian experience of God. Nicholas Lash suggests that ‘[i]f . . . Christianity has an experiential “root” or “core”, then it is to be found not in “fleeting” or “puzzling” transient states of private consciousness, but in the experience of Jesus in Gethsemane and on Calvary, and in the experience of his followers . . .’ (The Beginning and End of ‘Religion’, p. 110).

Christians experience God as they are incorporated by the Spirit into the eschatological drama which takes its rise from these foundational events that cannot be contained within the confines of ‘religion’. In fact, Christians do not experience ‘religion’. Instead, they experience God revealed in Jesus as he is attested in the narratives of Scripture and proclaimed in the worship, witness and service of the church. The modern notion of religious experience (even if renamed with the contemporary categories of ‘*spirituality’ or ‘identity’) is not, therefore, a foundation for theology, but is itself the object of critical theological reflection.

Bibliography

K. Barth, CD I/1, I/2; K. Berger, Identity and Experience in the New Testament (ET, Minneapolis, 2003); J. Edwards, A Treatise Concerning the Religious Affections (New Haven, 1959 [1754]); W. James, The Varieties of Religious Experience: A Study in Human Nature (New York, 1902); N. Lash, Easter in Ordinary: Reflections on Human Experience and the Knowledge of God (London, 1988); idem, The Beginning and End of ‘Religion’ (Cambridge, 1996); G. A. Lindbeck, The Nature of Doctrine: Religion and Theology in a Postliberal Age (Philadelphia, 1984); W. Proudfoot, Religious Experience (Berkeley, 1985); F. Schleiermacher, The Christian Faith (ET, Edinburgh, 1989); G. P. Schnier, ‘The Appeal to Experience’, TS 53, 1992, pp. 40–59.

G. J. THOMPSON

RELIGIOUS LANGUAGE

For a religion of the book like Christianity, the issue of language takes on great importance. This is an issue that has two sides to it. One is that the language of religion is basically the same as non-religious language. It is not a special, sacred language unto itself. The NT, for instance, is written in the common (koiné) Greek of the day. Its immense variety of confession, praise, prayer, poetry, story, depiction, argumentation, and so on is not dissimilar to language used in other contexts. Second, religious language nevertheless strains ordinary language at times to its breaking point, especially when speaking of the transcendent *God. Somehow God must be spoken of without *idolatry.

Through most of Christian history, three major options emerged. One was that language about God has basically the same literal or ‘univocal’ meaning as when used in other contexts. This assures that words have cognitive meaning when used of God, but the danger is that it limits God. For this reason, *Thomas Aquinas rejected this option in the thirteenth century. John *Duns Scotus reaffirmed it in the next generation while rejecting Aquinas’s argument for a third way, arguing that only two choices are possible: words are either univocal or equivocal. Since he accepted that cognitive revelation has occurred, then the former option is the only one possible. The view that meaning is preserved in univocal language and its corollary that symbolic or metaphorical uses of language must be translated into literal language has made bedfellows of diverse theologians in the last century such as Carl F. H. Henry, Paul *Tillich and Schubert Ogden. This view and a suspicion of figurative language have been dominant in modern philosophy, which in turn has influenced theology toward an emphasis on literal language and propositional language.

At the opposite end of the spectrum was a second option early in the church, the so-called via negativa or negative way, whereby all claims about God are denied, not for the sake of sceptical unbelief, but for the sake of the most intense *mystical awareness of God possible. *Dionysius the Areopagite (fifth or sixth century), who had an almost canonical status for a thousand years because he was mistakenly thought to be the Dionysius mentioned in Acts, propounded this view. The problem of course for a religion of *revelation is that this makes revelation non-cognitive. Language may be instrumentally effective in leading one to an encounter with God, but it cannot describe God. Some modern approaches such as those of Richard Braithwaite and Richard Hare have essentially followed this instrumentalist approach in making God-language helpful in living a moral way of life without necessarily affirming God. The problem is that this approach undercuts any meaningful sense of revelation as conveying a greater understanding of God.

Aquinas quotes Dionysius heavily and actually argues that one must begin with the via negativa. In other words, language cannot literally describe God’s transcendence of the creation. Yet in an analogical sense one can apply words to God. In one place, Aquinas suggests that this is because God is the cause of all things. In saying that God is good, for example, we are saying that God is the source of goodness but is not good in the same way that creatures are good. Moreover, Aquinas thought that those words that best analogically applied to God were words that could express God’s infinity, such as goodness, love, power, knowledge, and so on, as opposed to 'metaphorical' terms that were inherently finite, such as a fortress, a lion, a shepherd.

In the end, none of these approaches seemed satisfactory. Even Aquinas's explanations seemed to reduce *analogy to the univocal approach in seeing God as the cause of all things. If 'cause' is not thereby used univocally, then he is essentially making a circular argument, explaining analogy by an analogy. The twentieth century became, however, the century of the linguistic turn in general and has offered multiple resources for religious language. Developments in the philosophy of metaphor and symbol have pointed to what some see as Aquinas's main point, namely, that figurative language need not be 'translated' into univocal language to be used and understood. This in effect has rehabilitated his third way and also offered fertile resources for understanding the biblical language of poetry and parables. These need not, and cannot, be fully translated into literal language or propositions and stand on their own. As Tillich said at one point, one can say things in symbols that cannot be said in any other way. One can thus never leave the Bible behind once one has 'explained' its meaning, which has sometimes been a tendency in theology and preaching, but must return to *Scripture for insight over and over again in a *hermeneutical spiral.

This is not to eliminate the place of univocal explanation or propositions, but it makes them supplementary to such figurative language rather than replacing them. In fact, the work of the later Ludwig Wittgenstein emphasized that even univocal language is more flexible than previously thought. As he said, it has 'blurred edges', which allow for broader application (Philosophical Investigations, New York, 1958, p. 71). He also made the primary issue one of effective use, so a word has meaning if it has a use. The use, he additionally pointed out, is usually particular to a community, so a word might mean something literally to one group but not another. This allows for a rehabilitation of the univocal way where one might say that certain words such as holiness and love have their primary univocal meaning when applied to God. Wittgenstein's emphasis on the 'language game' or the 'form of life' (Philosophical Investigations, pp. 7, 19) as being essential to meaning led to warnings of the danger of 'Wittgensteinian *fideism', where no-one not 'playing' the particular religious language game can criticize it. This focus of Wittgenstein on the use of language, however, bore fruit in John Austin's work, How to Do Things with Words (Cambridge, 1975). Austin pointed out the descriptive fallacy, which assumes that words usually are just describing things. Rather, he indicated that people do many things with words, such as confessing, praising, praying, exhorting and commanding, which cannot be reduced to simple description. Biblical expositors such as Anthony Thiselton have shown how helpful this is for understanding multiple dimensions of biblical language. Others like Nancey Murphy, Michael Goldberg and Nicholas Wolterstorff have shown how this helps to understand the general nature of revelation.

Both of these shifts in understanding have contributed to appreciation of narrative in Scripture and fostered several forms of *narrative theology. All of these assume that narratives cannot be simply reduced to literal language, but have an integrity of their own, much like metaphor. In fact, they usually assume that literal language has its meaning only in the context of a larger socio-cultural narrative. Alasdair *MacIntyre particularly has pointed out how the modern Enlightenment emphasis on reason and univocal language is based on a narrative that did not realize it was a narrative. More recently, John *Milbank of the *Radical Orthodoxy movement has pointed out that one cannot thus out-argue one's opponents, but must in the end 'out-narrate' them (Theology and Social Theory, Cambridge, 1993, p. 330). Others, like James McClendon, have emphasized the centrality of biographies (my story, your story) for making sense of faith. The so-called *Yale school of postliberal theology is seen as a type of narrative theology that emphasizes not so much the cultural story (our story) but the biblical story (THE story), where we must allow the biblical world to absorb our world rather than vice versa. Paul *Ricœur and Kevin Vanhoozer have stressed that the Bible does not just contain one such genre to which everything else must be reduced, but has many kinds of language, such as narrative, law, wisdom, prophecy, and apocalyptic, each of which must be respected on its own terms.

These positive approaches to religious language have largely taken the place of the sceptical question of religious language that dominated the middle twentieth century. The *logical positivist's 'verification principle' meant that words have cognitive meaning insofar as they can be empirically verified. This was modified later by Antony Flew and others to a 'falsification principle' that stressed that a claim must be empirically falsifiable to have meaning. On these grounds, God-talk was seen not even to rise to the category of being false; it was nonsense. It was language that 'died the death by a thousand qualifications' (B. Mitchell [ed.], The Philosophy of Religion, p. 14). In the end, neither principle could be consistently substantiated. Some, like Ian Ramsey and Ian Crombie, however, saw that they could be valid to some extent if one allowed 'logically odd' language such as 'kingdom of God' to relate to a 'broader empiricism' or 'reference range' that could include discernment of God. Basil Mitchell pointed not to simple verification but to 'cumulative case' reasoning that involves personal and even eschatological factors (B. Mitchell, The Justification of Religious Belief, Oxford and New York, 1981, ch. 3). The poststructuralist deconstruction of Jacques Derrida also had influence toward a rejection of any kind of transcendent claim or metanarrative. More recently, some have found even in Derrida's thought room for a kind of negative theology. Along with other kinds of critique, it at least supports a 'hermeneutic of suspicion' that can clear the ground of ideology for a 'hermeneutic of testimony', as Ricœur suggests (Essays on Biblical Interpretation [Fort Worth, 1980], pp. 119–154). The effect of this wide reflection on language and specifically religious language has offered much richer and nuanced resources that are still being plumbed for understanding Scripture and theology.

Bibliography

J. D. Crossan, In Parables: The Challenge of the Historical Jesus (New York, 1973); M. Goldberg, Theology and Narrative: A Critical Introduction (Nashville, 1982); G. Lindbeck, The Nature of Doctrine: Religion and Theology in a Postliberal Age (Philadelphia, 1984); J. W. McClendon, Jr, Biography as Theology: How Life Stories Can Remake Today's Theology (Nashville, 1974); B. Mitchell (ed.), The Philosophy of Religion (Oxford and New York, 1971); P. Ricœur, Interpretation Theory: Discourse and the Surplus of Meaning (Fort Worth, 1976); D. R. Stiver, The Philosophy of Religious Language: Sign, Symbol, and Story (Cambridge, 1996); A. C. Thiselton, The Two

Horizons: New Testament Hermeneutics and Philosophical Description (Grand Rapids, 1980); K. J. Vanhoozer (ed.), The Cambridge Companion to Postmodern Theology (Cambridge, 2003); N. Wolterstorff, Divine Discourse: Philosophical Reflections on the Claim That God Speaks (Cambridge, 1995).

D. R. STIVER

RENAISSANCE, see HUMANISM
(RENAISSANCE)

REPENTANCE

Although the verb 'repent' (niham) is used in the OT generally to refer to the consideration of a change of plan on God's part, it can also refer to human repentance. It is usually translated in the NT by metanoēō, the equivalent noun being metanoia. The Heb. verb šûb, also referring to a change, 'turning around' or *conversion, is translated in the LXX as epistrephō. The two are closely connected. Repentance was the theme of the preaching of John the Baptist, and also accompanied Jesus' more positive proclamation of the coming of the *kingdom of God. After the descent of the Spirit on the apostles at Pentecost, repentance and *faith were required as a response to Peter's first preaching of the Christian *gospel of Christ crucified and risen. Whereas to be converted or to turn around (epistrephō) might seem to focus on the outward change, the word metanoia means literally 'a change of mind' and so may be thought to include also the inward revolution that lies at the heart of the outward behavioural change.

In the early centuries of the church, faith and repentance were prerequisites for Christian baptism, and rigorists taught that this repentance could occur only once. A Christian who committed one of the capital sins such as blasphemy, apostasy, adultery or murder was considered to be beyond redemption in the light of passages such as Heb. 6:1–6. Gradually this was softened until the practice of *penance developed, by which Christians could confess, repent and make "satisfaction", thus being reconciled and avoiding eternal punishment. The Celtic church introduced private penitential practices, and eventually penance was defined as one of the *sacraments of the church.

The *Reformers rejected this development, not least because of the further developments of *purgatory and indulgences out of the practice of penance. *Luther reacted particularly against a view of penance which seemed to make sufficient penitence (doing 'all that in you lies') necessary to merit forgiveness of sins. Rather, repentance came with the faith which *justifies and which was the gift of God (see *Grace). True faith, given by God, was then a mighty, active thing which brought about a change of mind and a change of life. And yet it was paradoxical: the Christian was at the same time justified and a sinner (simul iustus et peccator). Calvin distinguished between 'legal repentance' arising from fear of divine anger, and 'evangelical repentance' which is a consequence of faith in Christ. He defines it as 'a real conversion of our life to God proceeding from a sincere and serious fear of God and consisting in the mortification of our flesh and the old man, and the quickening of the Spirit' (Institutes, III.3.5).

The danger of a nominal Christian commitment and what Bonhoeffer called 'cheap grace' can only be avoided if repentance is seen to be necessary, not as a way to buy or merit grace, but as an implication of the gift of faith. While there must be a first serious step of faith and repentance, an attitude of repentance, that is to say, of confession and humility, is also regarded as necessary throughout the Christian's pilgrimage. A new appreciation today of the reality of corporate sin should also lead to practices of corporate repentance.

See also: GUILT AND FORGIVENESS.

Bibliography

J. Calvin, Institutes, III.3, 'Regeneration by Faith: Of Repentance'; S. Ferguson, The Grace of Repentance (Wheaton, 2010); Tertullian, 'On Repentance', ANF, vol. 3, pp. 657–666; R. S. Wallace, Calvin's Doctrine of the Christian Life, esp. ch. 5 (Edinburgh, 1959); J. Wesley, 'The Repentance of Believers', sermon 14, Works, vol. 1, pp. 335–352 (Nashville, 1984).

T. A. NOBLE

REPRESENTATION, see SUBSTITUTION AND REPRESENTATION

REPROBATION, see PREDESTINATION

RESURRECTION OF CHRIST

Situated between his *descent into hell and *ascent into heaven, Christ's resurrection is a trinitarian act of the Father raising the crucified *Jesus in the power of the Spirit to new, glorified human life after three days of burial.

From the beginning (1 Cor. 15:14) it has been a defining doctrine, vital for the integrity of the Christian faith. The early Fathers vigorously defended it against the heresies of *Docetism and *Gnosticism. It appeared in one of the earliest, most universal and apostolic confessional forms, the Rule of Faith, as well as in the Apostles' Creed. More significant is its enshrinement in the first ecumenical creed, the *Creed of Nicaea.

Crucial to the recognition and worship of the Christian God, belief in Christ's resurrection must be maintained despite modern pressures to abandon it in favour of a more ethically oriented and scientifically acceptable Christianity. As the early church protested against anti-materialist Docetism and Gnosticism, the church today must do likewise against contemporary philosophical and scientific *materialism.

The theological implications chiefly concern Christology, soteriology, sanctification, ecclesiology, eschatology and creation. Once the meaning for these loci has been detailed, two major attendant theological issues will be considered.

Theological implications

*Christology

As the continuation of the incarnation and his glorification, Christ's resurrection sustains and magnifies his priestly, prophetic and kingly offices. The finality of Jesus' past work should not eclipse his present ministry.

The resurrection of Christ, which dictates the mode of his ascension, confirms that the eternal Son's *incarnation was not temporary but permanent. Jesus arose from the dead not a phantom or apparition, but a genuine human being (cf. John 20:20). His bodily resurrection was quickly contested, however. Operating with Platonic anti-materialism, Docetism and Gnosticism held salvation was the immaterial soul's liberation from embodiment and thus denied any bodily component to the Saviour. This was the background for Athenagoras' On the Resurrection of the Dead, *Tertullian's

On the Resurrection of the Flesh and much of *Irenaeus' Against Heresies, writings which defended the physicality of Christ's resurrection. Later, *Thomas Aquinas stressed the continuity between Christ's dead and resurrected body to the point where every drop of blood spilled on the cross 'rose again with his body'; this led him to qualify the blood contained in relics (see Summa Theologica, III, Q. 54).

There are discontinuities, however. Aquinas also argued that Jesus' resurrected body 'differed in glory'. The Gospels portray not a resuscitated Jesus, but a resurrected Jesus whose body had been glorified, made immortal and incorruptible. As Christ's glorification, the resurrection means the Son's eternal glory pervades more fully his humanity. Just how many differences exist will be partially a function of one's view of whether the Son assumed fallen flesh. If so, then Christ's resurrection would mean glorification and sanctification. Otherwise the differences would concern only the former. The important point is to maintain both continuity – Christ rose in the same body he possessed at death – and discontinuity – that body was glorified (not merely revived) as it transitioned from death to life.

Central to the logic of Christ's mediation/priestly office is the *hypostatic union. By preserving the incarnation, Christ's resurrection preserves his *mediatorial ministry, his role as sole intercessor between God and humanity. Accordingly, it is entirely appropriate to address God 'in the name of Jesus Christ'. Christians enter the presence of the Father in worship and beseech him in their prayers only through the resurrected Mediator. As the means for humanity's intimate access to God, Christ's resurrection should energize communion with the transcendent Father.

Without his resurrection, Jesus' teaching would remain scandalized by his death, particularly Israel's judgment that he was a false prophet whose death was required by OT prescriptions. So, his resurrection divinely vindicates him and his prophetic heralding of the *kingdom of God. By raising Jesus from the dead, God declared to the world that Jesus is his Son who has faithfully testified on his behalf. In this way, Christ's emergence from the tomb is the Father's reiteration in deed of the words he spoke when Jesus arose from the baptismal waters: 'This is my Son, the Beloved; listen to him' (Mark 9:7, NRSV).

Resurrected, Christ continues to tell the world about his *Father who sent him, and does so by sending his *Spirit who declares only what he hears from Christ (John 16:13). It is on this basis that the church can, even now, hear and heed Christ in Holy Scripture. The church knows and accepts the witness of the OT prophets and NT apostles because she answers to God's perfect prophet and sent one, Jesus Christ. *Scripture is living and active because its Word lives today. Christ is the living source of the biblical message; the criteria for canonicity are therefore neither arbitrary nor subjective, but Christological.

The resurrection, along with the ascension, reveals the kingship of Jesus Christ. The Son's eternal lordship is historically manifest in Jesus' resurrection, for it is the triumph of righteousness over sin and life over death (Christus Victor).

Jesus Christ lives. In him there is human life, full and true. He is thus the Lord of eternal life and new creation, imparting it to whoever is 'in Christ'. So, he is the head of the church, the new community which has received the Spirit as guarantor of an eternal inheritance.

*Soteriology

The *righteousness established in Christ's cross results in his resurrection because life is the potency of righteousness. *Justification entails resurrection. Hence, John *Calvin interpreted Rom. 4:25 to mean the 'efficacy' of justification lies in resurrection (see his Romans commentary). In his 1 Corinthians commentary he surmised that without Christ's resurrection human sin would remain imputed (cf. his Institutes II.xvi.13).

When humanity fell from God's intention, it fell into corruption; the depth of this plunge is seen in Christ's cross and descent into hell. However, Christ's resurrection raises humanity from its depravity, freeing it from its bondages to the devil, death and decay and restoring it to wholeness. In the general *resurrection, when Christ's resurrection becomes their own, Christians will inhabit a redeemed human nature fully alive to God.

Sanctification

Christ's resurrected body is the new humanity, and is therefore the source of *sanctification. Just as the mortification of sinful flesh depends upon Christ's crucifixion (see *Cross), so too the vivification of the 'new man' requires his resurrection. Only by the power that raised Jesus from the dead will Christians be able to live a new life, a power itself accessible only through union with the resurrected Christ.

Ecclesiology

Like the early disciples who were made witnesses by the resurrected Lord's appearances, the *church is the community specially 'set apart' and 'called out' to testify to Christ's resurrection, for through word, sacrament and Christian *fellowship the resurrected Lord appears subtly but no less profoundly. As Christ's body, the church tastes the resurrection life in advance of its final consummation in the church's glorification. Christians are those who identify with the resurrected Lord through baptism; they are 'the Easter people, and Alleluia is [their] song', as Pope John Paul II exclaimed.

Eschatology

The resurrection of Christ marks the transition to the age of God's new creation and kingdom on earth. The *eschatological life has already dawned in the resurrected Jesus; wherever he is, there the future invades the present. Christ's resurrection means eschatology must have an 'already-not yet' character: the end is already 'at hand' in the reign of the resurrected Christ, but, since the resurrected Christ is the ascended Christ, it is not yet fully realized on earth. The latter is our hope and prayer: 'Your kingdom come, your will be done on earth as it is in heaven' (Matt. 6:10).

Resurrection is God's verdict upon Christ's righteousness; God's future *judgment of the world has already been handed down in him. The resurrected Lord, therefore, is the universal criterion for God's eschatological judgment; only those found in him will receive the covenant reward of eternal life.

Creation

The continuity between Christ's dead and resurrected body indicates God's commitment to his initial *creation and humanity as the imago Dei. Christianity is not anti-materialist and its soteriology is not gnostic. God pronounced creation good. In Christ's resurrection he actively repeats this declaration. Yet, as the discontinuity, the glorification implicit within resurrection, means Jesus is the 'first fruits' of a redeemed world, so God's commitment to his creation in Jesus' resurrection is an act of new creation, the creation of the new heavens and new earth which we await. Christ's resurrection, then, is cosmic in scope, a reality that redemptively redirects and reconstitutes current space and time. Christianity ought to encourage an ethic of life that propels the cultivation of, and care for, God's creation in anticipation of its future renewal (see *Ecology).

Attendant theological issues

God-world relationship

As a divine act in the world, Christ's resurrection has implications for the God-world relationship. At the very least, resurrection is a strong claim about God's activity in the *world, a claim that excludes *atheism, *deism and worldviews which see God's agency as bounded by created realities. While it occurs in history, it is not a function of previous historical sequences, nor does it arise from prior natural processes. It is a divine act, and therefore in an important sense also transcends history. Consequently, it forces Christian theology to have a concept of the miraculous, a place for super-natural/-historical causation of worldly events.

Stephen Davis has thus used Christ's resurrection as an occasion to criticize both David *Hume's scepticism of miracles and scientific naturalism as well as to defend the rationality of the supernatural on a *theistic worldview (see Risen Indeed: Making Sense of the Resurrection, London, 1993).

Wolfhart *Pannenberg offers perhaps the most radical challenge to the naturalistic worldview. He has simply scoffed at the unscientific attempts to evade the evidentiary weight of Christ's resurrection, writing: '[T]he reconstructions [of historical critics] are more fantastic than the biblical reports themselves, and one often wonders how easily critical historians, who examine their sources with a great deal of scepticism, believe their own imaginations without checking the historical plausibility of their intuitions with comparable rigor' ('Resurrection: The Ultimate Hope', in K. Tanner and C. Hall (eds.), Ancient and Postmodern Christianity, Downers Grove, 2002, p. 260). He has also accused the presupposing of naturalism in modern historiography of premature biasing, using Christ's resurrection's historicity to revise historical method. Most importantly, Pannenberg has argued that Christ's resurrection sits comfortably with contemporary science's view of the universe as less a closed system of causation and more 'elastic' and 'open'.

Since an account of the reality of Christ's resurrection rests on specifically Christian theological commitments about God and the world, Christianity's defence of it will take place primarily at the worldview level. We must be careful, then, about what sort of results we hope to harvest from historical apologetics. Perhaps it is best to keep in mind that Joseph's tomb is no more historically accessible than Mary's womb. Testimonial evidence strongly supports the conclusion that Jesus came to life in both instances. But the further claims of resurrection and incarnation ascribe a very specific notion of divine agency to these events, and that requires a worldview, if not faith itself. This does not mean that Christian faith is private, only that Christianity's public discourse will assume a more prophetic tenor: Christians will call the world to faith in the God who raised Jesus Christ from the dead, expose the weaknesses of naturalism and bemoan the inevitable meaninglessness, immorality and despair of a godless world.

The relationship between faith and history

The modern period pressed the faith-history relationship in unique ways, and Christ's resurrection became a flash-point for debate. With scientific theories challenging the supernatural, the aftermath of the Wars of Religion of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries ushering in a quest for religious tolerance which resulted in a less confessional and more ethical Christianity, and historical-criticism questioning Scripture's origin and reliability, modern theologians were forced to re-evaluate the way *faith related to *history. Do, for example, the propositions of faith stand for actual historical realities, or are they rather symbols of personal and social transformation, the claim to historicity being merely rhetorical? Two interpretations of Christ's resurrection arose: (1) psychological; and (2) historicist.

A minimalist account of the relationship between *faith and history regarding Christ's resurrection understands the historical dimension as a metaphor for faith where faith is not belief in an historical event, but the recognition of some greater truth thought to be existentially empowering. Adolf *Harnack, for example, distinguished between the 'Easter faith' and 'Easter message', deciding that the real significance of Jesus' resurrection was not the historical fact of the empty tomb, but that 'this grave was the birthplace of the indestructible belief that death is vanquished, that there is a life eternal'. Such a belief 'makes our earthly life worth living and tolerable' (What Is Christianity? New York, 1957, p. 162). Rudolf *Bultmann, believing the earliest Christians had difficulty expressing themselves, brought the *history-of-religions school's interpretation of the resurrection accounts as the disciples' translation of their appreciation for Jesus into a Hellenistic myth about a dying and rising saviour god. For Bultmann, the idea of resurrection was the way Christians conceptualized and communicated their sense for the ongoing significance of Christ's death.

For different reasons – following the trend of exchanging classic metaphysical versions of salvation for social ones – Rowan *Williams can be located within this trajectory. While personally convinced of the resurrection's historicity, he can be ambivalent toward it, focusing more on how the event constitutes a Christian identity that is received from God, not self-constructed: 'The essential point is that resurrection is the transaction in human beings that brings about the essence of a selfhood given not achieved [. . .] The resurrection of Jesus may be (as I for one believe) at least the empty tomb, but it is most importantly [. . .] judgement upon the attempt to construct a system of action and understanding so impregnable that it cannot live with prophetic criticism and judgement too upon our sentimental assumption that we can sustain newness of life beyond the regularities of "law" independently of relation to a "giving" reality' (On Christian Theology, Oxford, 2000, p. 271). Elsewhere he has given a sustained interpretation of the type of social praxis to which Christ's resurrection gives rise. For example, he suggests that by raising Christ from the dead God condemned humanity's judgment. Therefore, the church cannot be judgmental, but loving and accepting, particularly of those ostracized by society.

The historicist position sees Christ's resurrection as historical and faith in it as at least an acknowledgment of such. Reacting against what he perceived as the uncritical subjectivism of Bultmann and Karl *Barth, *Pannenberg defended the full historicity of Christ's resurrection out of a commitment to his specific configuration of the faith-history relationship, namely, 'revelation as history'. Here, biblical events have no unique character that would distinguish them from regular historical events. Faith claims must be 'rational' and therefore subject to normal historical verification.

Yet, both historicity and faith's transformative power are crucial. Faith in Christ's resurrection should not come at the expense of its historicity, and its historicity should not cost faith. Barth, who took issue with Bultmann's view but did not approach the resurrection apologetically, may represent a way forward. He agreed with Bultmann that Jesus' resurrection was comprehended by faith, not 'neutral' historical investigations. Yet Barth believed the historical resurrection was itself the determinative element for faith. Contra Bultmann, Christ's resurrection was not the product of, but the reason for, the earliest Christian kerygma (preaching). True Christian faith is communion with Christ and therefore Christ must live today. Barth thus retained the resurrection's historicity, but did not allow faith in it to be collapsed into the past. The past event was critical, not because it proves Christianity, but because of what it means for who Jesus is.

Ultimately, what is needed is an apocalyptic perspective on the resurrection's historicity in which the past event unveils both the fullness of the present as governed by Jesus' heavenly reign and the promised future his resurrection inaugurates. The historical significance of Christ's resurrection is not limited to the tomb, but includes his present activity as head of the church and the future he interjects. A truly historical resurrection is thus past, present and future. Faith, then, is not simply taking heart in the past, but submitting to Christ's present lordship and being possessed by the future of God's new creation introduced in Christ's resurrection, which may mean participating in hopeful praxis as outlined by Williams and others.

Bibliography

K. Barth, The Resurrection of the Dead (ET, Eugene, 2003); R. Jenson, Systematic Theology, vol. 1 (Oxford, 2001); W. Kunneth, The Theology of the Resurrection (St Louis, 1965); P. D. Molnar, Incarnation and Resurrection: Toward a Contemporary Understanding (Grand Rapids, 2007); G. O'Collins, Jesus Risen: An Historical, Fundamental and Systematic Examination of Christ's Resurrection (New York, 1987); O. O'Donovan, Resurrection and Moral Order: An Outline for Evangelical Ethics (Grand Rapids and Leicester, 1994); T. F. Torrance, Space, Time and Resurrection (Edinburgh, 1998); J. B. Webster, 'Resurrection and Scripture', in A. Lincoln and A. Paddison (eds.), Christology and Scripture: Interdisciplinary Perspectives (London, 2007); R. Williams, Resurrection: Interpreting the Easter Gospel (London, 1982); N. T. Wright, The Resurrection of the Son of God (Minneapolis and London, 2003).

J. R. A. MERRICK

RESURRECTION, GENERAL

The general resurrection is the decisive future action of God upon human beings by which the redemptive work of Christ will be consummated and the eternal life of God's new *creation will begin. In the present age, the church lives in the 'sure and certain hope' of this resurrection promise (words from the Christian funeral service). Along with the parousia of Christ and the final judgment, general resurrection forms the content of Christian *eschatology, the doctrine of last things.

History of general resurrection

The roots of the concept of general resurrection belong firmly in the Jewish confidence that God's covenant with faithful Israel would continue, even beyond the human limit of death. Through the intertestamental period, this understanding developed to include the expectation of a bodily resurrection of all the faithful, and perhaps of the wicked too, for judgment at the 'day of the Lord'. The *resurrection of Jesus Christ in the middle of history – one man on his own – was completely unexpected, and gave rise to the intense theological reflection of the apostles and the early church. What happened to Jesus was the 'firstfruits' of what will happen to all who belong to him. The hope of general resurrection is thus close to the centre of the NT understanding of the *gospel, and was affirmed in the major creeds of the church by the phrase 'resurrection of the dead'.

The early Church Fathers were careful to emphasize that the awaited resurrection was to be a bodily renewal, and not simply the continuation of an immaterial soul after death. This emphasis directly countered the view of the *Gnostics and others influenced by Greek dualism, who believed that the soul is the only continuing element of human life, while the body perishes along with all other created matter. In response, the Church Fathers stressed the resurrection of the flesh, affirming both the power of God to reconstitute bodies and the necessary re-embodiment of the soul in order for it to live in full fellowship with God in eternal life. The resurrection of the flesh does not mean, however, that the resurrected body will be exactly the same as when it died. Justin Martyr and Tertullian spoke of the complete healing of the resurrection body, while Origen emphasized the transformation into a spiritual body that will take place.

During the Middle Ages, this commitment to the bodily nature of the general resurrection was upheld, and the main question concerned the period of waiting between the death of a believer and the moment of resurrection – what is known as the *intermediate state. In the twelfth century, Bernard of Clairvaux explained that the soul is in a state of incompleteness until it is reunited with the body at the day of resurrection. This position reveals a belief in the continuing existence of the soul alongside the hope of bodily resurrection. The soul is in a state of sleep, or rest, until it can enjoy fellowship with God in the new creation.

The early modern period began to see a weakening of the commitment to bodily resurrection, and it was often assumed that the reconstitution of bodies after death was a scientific implausibility. This obviously affected belief in the resurrection of Jesus, with some theologians suggesting it was either a hoax or a delusion; correspondingly, the doctrine of general resurrection began to drop out of view. In popular evangelicalism, the Christian hope was often reduced to ‘going to heaven when we die’, which was perceived as a spiritual, rather than bodily, existence.

Recent theology, however, has begun to recover the doctrine of general resurrection. *Pannenberg, for instance, makes God’s promise of future bodily resurrection programmatic for his entire theological work, and this hope also informs the project of *Moltmann. N. T. Wright has worked through the biblical material to show the central significance of this doctrine for practical Christian faith.

Some systematic issues

What happens to us after *death is often seen as an individual matter by many Christians. However, general resurrection is a reminder of the corporate hope of the Christian faith. While there may be an initial intermediate state directly after death, resurrection will happen to all simultaneously as the fulfilment of God’s *redemptive work and the beginning of his new creation. General resurrection thus connects the Christian to the cosmic scope of salvation, and is a caution against a private, individualistic faith.

Ambiguity remains over whether all will be raised to face the final judgment, or only those who will inherit the *kingdom of God, for whom resurrection is their entrance into eternal life. If the risen Christ is seen as the ‘firstfruits’ of those who are raised, however, it seems more likely that the second view is the case.

The doctrine of general resurrection is a strong argument for the goodness of created matter and the essential unity of body and soul in the human life. That our future life in God’s kingdom will involve resurrected bodies should also be a motivation to use our present ones wisely. In addition, the hope of resurrection is a cause of praise and joy for the Christian, transforming even our view of death. As the promised fulfilment of Christ’s work of salvation, the general resurrection will complete the redemption of our bodies and usher us into the new creation.

See also: IMMORTALITY; JUDGMENT OF GOD.

Bibliography

K. Barth, The Resurrection of the Dead (London, 1933); J. E. McWilliam Dewart, Death and Resurrection (Wilmington, 1986); W. Pannenberg, Systematic Theology, vol. 3 (Edinburgh and Grand Rapids, 1998) esp. ch. 15; N. T. Wright, Surprised by Hope (London, 2007).

A. J. STOBART

REVELATION

As the condition of possibility for *faith, revelation is a key concept in Christian theology. In the revelation of his mystery, God does not stop being that mystery. Most theologians work with the distinction between ‘general’ and ‘special’ revelation. If general revelation is God’s everyday self-communication to the world, then special revelation takes its form in events of saving *history in Israel, culminating in the NT events, and has its impact in written

*Scripture. The 'mighty acts of God' and words spoken prophetically or apostolically are each the interpretation of the other. The tradition of interpretation of Scripture is a channel for that revelation. O. Bayer, quoting Luther, counsels believers to stay within God's word as within a cradle, the context for understanding ourselves, the text which constitutes the self, although for Luther what we find in the text is first and foremost the Son of God as Jesus of Nazareth. For A. Dulles, mystery is not 'what is left over after theology has done its best', but is the source and nourishment of theology.

Yet the form of revelation is most like an address, whose aim is to bring humans to trust *God, so as to come close to him and participate in his divine life. This takes us some distance from the 'merely propositional' view of revelation, and means that information about God gets communicated in the context of an invitation to a God-human relationship. Yet to go further and call this a 'dialogue' would be a step too far. It is communication in symbolic form from God which engages the whole human being. Scripture and the word of God of course receive interpretation in doctrinal and homiletic terms, but this is secondary to the moment of revelation which was an address to a specific group of people ('prophets and apostles'), and which has then been 'forwarded' to us. In the language of *narrative theology, that forwarding of revelation refers to that process in which the personal identities of readers are reinterpreted and transformed by means of the narratives which supply a new identity in Christ. One might speak of new room in which to live, new possibilities, adding to what is already given in creation. Yet that may still be received as a surprise since we have wilfully forgotten what was given to us. Revelation is not now new, but it might be 'new to us'. Revelation has its effect and influence 'when things click into place, when a luminous perspective emerges, which both perfects the pre-given religious framework and exceeds it'. What is revealed is not so much the essential nature of who God is, as his plan and will. Only in the Bible are created things also signifiers (Alexander of Hales, tightening Augustine).

There can be a theologically *liberal interpretation of this, that since revelation is not to be identified with Scripture or *dogmas, but as an existential guide allowing the self to transcend itself, then perhaps Christianity should see itself as something fixed but not finished – as on a path of ever new tradition and translation. But if revelation is to be a framework, then it has to be an absolute rather than something provisional. Revelation is what has been established in *Scripture and tradition, and our experience of it as it 'happens' is of something which happened once and thus for all times. Although revelation is received according to the mode of the one receiving it, the non-reception of revelation (Rom. 1:20) does not negate this 'general revelation in creation', and even less does special revelation rely on today's reception to be itself. However, the experience of *redemption is required for revelation to be fully received as such, although this should not be seen as a temporal sequence. It is not impossible that people may turn to God on the basis of general revelation without reference to Christ, but in a sense the church and Christian theology are called to communicate the special revelation as well. Revelation is a wake-up call to that sleeping world which can then become a means of bridging between *creation and what is natural on the one hand and what we are to become in our action on the other. General revelation becomes transformed through our receipt of special revelation. The latter is completed, the former, renewed by the latter, ongoing.

There has been concern that to think of revelation as external to us is to suggest that it is irrelevant, lost in history or coldly propositional. Thus John Montag: 'We have seen that Thomas [Aquinas] never had cause to reify the mediation into words or propositions through which God hands things over to be believed.' So, for *Thomas, revelation takes place in the judgment and understanding, as part of the assent of *faith. Revelation does not occur on its own, as if it were a thing apart, before becoming part of human thought and experience. That which God reveals has precisely that quality which Luther sought to recover in his translation – that is, the intimate self-manifestation, the word which pours from the heart, and which animates faith. Yet for Luther, this communication comes across a gap of knowledge: it is not really 'from the heart' even if it warms the heart. For Thomas, revelation can be seen paradigmatically in the experience of the prophet: it means the removal from the mind of a veil so that the prophet can see what was always there; it is not the face of God but natural things understood in a divine light. In symbols there is something participatory, transformative, motivational and supra-discursive (Dulles, Models).

Yet we are not prophets or apostles and Thomas is aware of that. In Thomas's treatment (STh 1a.Q 13ad 1) two things are affirmed:

1. There are two elements: images (phantasms) whether naturally or divinely formed, and a divine light. Revelation comes through the images. Revelation is not something which bypasses the mind, but nor is it something created by our minds. When believers come to receive divine light, they do it through, not as, the imagination of the prophets. Ultimately revelation remains external.
2. We do not know what he is, but know certain things about him: i.e. we can call that revealed knowledge 'propositional', since it is fragmentary and 'bitty', and needs to be weaved together in our reception of it.

Montag believes that the sixteenth-century scholastic Suárez, unlike Aquinas, saw theology as founded on philosophy, and that this was why he had a view that did not accord with St Thomas. Suárez reified revelation into words, while Thomas located it in the heart. Yet it is not the case that Thomas meant to universalize the special revelatory experience of the prophets and writers of Scripture, even if he thought that it was not discontinuous with general revelation in creation. Special revelation has a special content. Moreover, from what Thomas writes, surely the truth of the matter is that there is in Scripture, through its prophetic inspiration, not only new information about God, but knowledge of his will, his purpose, even his character, which is not just seeing the earth in a certain way. Recent work on Thomas's use of Scripture seems to confirm this. 'As a corrective theological framework, Scripture broadens our theological horizon toward a more profound understanding of the revelation of God' (Valkenberg). For Suárez, wanting to stress 'objectivity' of revelation, a proposition of faith becomes the 'sufficient object of revelation'. Since the words of Scripture alone do not bear sufficient certainty, 'the revealing God confirms his revelation (the things proposed for belief) through the infused light of faith'.

The overreaction against a 'propositional' account of revelation is also critiqued by Francesca Murphy, who wisely writes: 'the defect in Christian personalism is that it thinks of experience as something inward, rather than between. For the personalist, the key is intensive encounter, which is right, unless she sinks the extension of God's actions into herself.' In other words, the encounter has to be dramatic. It is not so much about, e.g. superimposing the Gospel accounts of Christ to get an identikit picture, but since these point beyond themselves, the audience is encouraged to look along these 'pointings' (presumably by imagination and prayerful reflection) away from oneself to where God is speaking to his people today. Tradition is called in to help us understand how this has happened in the past and how the biblical passages have been actualized. Yet it works both ways with biblical sense breaking and remaking the tradition's concepts.

So, the Bible may well be described as a 'means of *salvation', but it is not such without cognitive content. It affects people by changing their thoughts and is not just something unconscious so as to be manipulative on the part of the Holy Spirit. Those who are moved by God are, at least at points, aware of this, such that *sanctification is not simply 'automatic', that the Bible becomes perlocutionary because it is already illocutionary. So it is not wrong to point to the Bible and say: there is revelation quite apart from faith which is needed for there to be a revelation event (or better, the impact of revelation). After all, the Revelation of John speaks of no-one adding to these words. This need not mean subscribing to a verbal inspiration theory wherein each single word has value; rather, it is the combination of words that contain and form revelation. As Barth believed, Scripture was a human word commissioned by God by his providential arranging of canon and as such is open to God's providential use. There should be something arresting and surprising – following the 'prophetic' paradigm, such that for all the reception of the Bible, one cannot tame it. For this reason the insistence of evangelical theologians of recent times, from Carl Henry to Alister McGrath and Kevin Vanhoozer, that to say revelation is no less than propositional is to raise an important point. If we are going to speak of biblical revelation as 'postpropositional' (Vanhoozer, p. 276), this should mean that the 'post' in 'postpropositional' does not mean 'against' but 'beyond'. There is as much revealing as commanding going on in Christian Scripture.

Kern Trembath represents a more 'Rahnerian' view. Revelation is a relationship which allows humans to become fully human; as they come to know God as love it illuminates, even reveals what matters about being human. And when they seek the good they come into relationship with God. Thus revelation is universal, as the 'foundational groundedness' for all creatures. Revelation is about our existential concerns, not about the humans as spectators. Revelation says something about how God has made us and appears to us in the natural and the mundane. This stands against a more traditional view, as represented by A. Dulles, that the text provides us with *symbols which speak to us from beyond. Following *Rahner, we do not simply encounter things against a historically specific horizon (as for G. O'Collins), but against a universal and transcendental one.

Hans Urs von *Balthasar's helpful approach to revelation is to speak of it as a perception of the divine glory. The main thesis is a phenomenological one: that there is no deeper truth to be found by the Christian than the unique appearance of beauty. The objectively beautiful condescended to become beautiful 'to us' and this is hardly superficial. The beauty of God's revelation is one of *glory which provokes a response of awe and surprise. For Balthasar, the evidence is dazzling. God's act includes the gifting of response in the human heart as it steps into the realm of the church. 'Ecclesiology and Mariology form part of the basic structure of revelation.' The location of the biblical material on glory at the end of the Herrlichkeit series, however, is interesting: Balthasar at least seems to flirt with biblical theology as the place where the theory is worked out in all the fullness of practice. The Word is made flesh and all that he is continues to be mediated to us by words and imagery of the Gospels.

The Bible is not there to be explained or even to explain human experience, but its function is to communicate knowledge of the divine will, to transform lives and accounts of this will. In other words, as one reads the Bible giving it the benefit of the doubt concerning its authority so as to be in a freer position to make a judgment on its content. Revelation accounts for, rather than is explained by, some deep experience (such as is claimed by what Gerd Theissen calls 'the religious studies approach', as the Bible's 'implicit axioms' are internalized). The canon helps to preserve a memory of values and truths about God rather than the memory of how the text came to be as it is in its final form. That canonical approach of Brevard Childs, an attempt to read the Bible theologically, provokes responses (by e.g. John Barton) that such a canonical approach is a systematic afterthought to the work of biblical studies. But on the contrary, it is to acknowledge that there are theological roots within the Bible itself. It has been the lifework of Catholic scholars such as Lohfink and Söding to join Childs and other evangelical scholars in refusing this gulf between biblical studies and theological reading of Scripture.

*Myths have trained us with patterns to receive a content of revelation which makes sense. Reason has granted us to learn that in the world it makes sense to believe in a Creator of all. But it is the OT which has refined those myths and *natural theology so that our minds are prepared to receive the coming Christ in the right and faithful way. In this process, faith plays not just a passive but an active role and as such is able to grasp something of the life-form of the historical Jesus. Historical evidence is not the foundation of faith, but is nonetheless important, since its investigation contributes to the task of exposing the life of *Jesus as a specific divine questioning which is posed in such a way that it provokes rejection and annoyance or a resolution to gamble trustingly with this Jesus.

Bibliography

H. U. von Balthasar, Love Alone: The Way of Revelation (London, 1968); K. Barth, CD I.1; A. Dulles, Models of Revelation (Garden City, NY, 1983); idem, 'The Theology of Revelation', in Revelation and the Quest for Unity (Washington, 1968); C. F. H. Henry, God, Revelation and Authority (Waco, 1976–83); R. Latourelle, Theology of Revelation: Including a Commentary on the Constitution 'dei verbum' of Vatican II (Staten Island, 1966); B. McCormack, 'Revelation and Imagination', SJT 37 (1984), pp. 431–455; J. Montag, 'The False Legacy of Suárez', in J. Milbank, C. Pickstock and G. Ward, Radical Orthodoxy (London, 1998); F. A. Murphy, The Comedy of Revelation (Edinburgh, 2000); K. Trembath, Divine Revelation: Our Moral Relation with God (New York, 1991); W. G. B. M. Valkenberg, Words of the Living God: Place and Function of Holy Scripture in the Theology of St Thomas Aquinas (Leuven, 2000); K. Vanhoozer, The Drama of Doctrine (Louisville, 2005).

S. R. HOLMES

REVIVAL, THEOLOGY OF

For 250 years *pietistic *evangelicalism both sides of the Atlantic has conceived revival as a characteristic work of God visiting communities of his people to deepen his work of *grace in their lives and to extend his kingdom in this world. The Reformation, the Puritan era, the Evangelical Revival in Britain, the first and second Great Awakenings in America, the Welsh Revival of 1904–05, and the mid-twentieth-century East African Revival are among examples cited. The theological claim is that the revival pattern is normatively seen in the Acts narrative and in the spiritual conditions that the apostolic letters to churches reflect or seek to promote: God's holy presence, sovereignly manifested and vividly realized, brings conviction of the ugliness, guilt, pollution and destructiveness of *sin; exercises and gestures of *repentance (confession to God and others, restitution, public renouncing of vices) become vigorous and even violent; Christ and forgiveness through his *cross are joyfully celebrated; and there is an evangelistic overflow. The later, narrower, American usage ('revival' meaning a concentrated evangelistic campaign, and 'revivalist' meaning its leader) stems from the early ministry pattern of Charles *Finney, an innovative itinerant evangelist for over a decade following his conversion in 1821. His brilliant and still influential Lectures on Revivals of Religion (1835) delineated his methods and generalized from his experience.

The fountain-head theologian of revival was the latter-day Puritan Jonathan *Edwards, who after seeing revival in his own church in 1735 and in the Great Awakening of 1740 gave the world his Narrative of Surprising Conversions (1735), The Distinguishing Marks of a Work of the Spirit of God (1741), and Thoughts on the Revival of Religion in New England in 1740 (1742). In the latter work, as in his sermons of 1739, posthumously published as A History of the Work of Redemption, Edwards adumbrates a cyclical view of revival as a recurring work of sovereign mercy, like successive waves breaking on the seashore, whereby God extends his *kingdom till the largely converted world of postmillennial eschatology becomes reality. God regularly initiates revival by stirring up prayer for it (see Edward's Humble Attempt to Promote . . . Extraordinary Prayer, for the Revival of Religion, and the Advancement of Christ's Kingdom on Earth, Pursuant to Scripture Promise and Prophecies Concerning the Last Time, 1748); Satan regularly seeks to counterfeit it and corrupt it into heretical and antinomian fanaticism; the church, however, is regularly enlarged and Christ is freshly glorified through it. Interpreting Revelation in historicist terms and believing that God's plan had already reached the outpouring of the sixth vial (bowl) (Rev. 16:2), Edwards ventured the view that the work of God's Spirit in the Great Awakening was the start of an era of worldwide revival emanating from America ('Tis not unlikely . . .'). Edward's prognostication fuelled much religious and cultural optimism in America during the nineteenth century.

The Boston pastor Charles Chauncy saw the Great Awakening as unspiritual mass hysteria, expressed in manifold intellectual, emotional and behavioural excesses. Edward's apologia was that below the acrid smoke of carnal and perverted excitement the fire of God's Spirit was demonstrably burning, advancing faith, promoting holiness and exalting Christ in a way that only God could or would do. Chauncy argued that the excesses were overthrowing godliness rather than advancing it, and that the whole movement boiled down to self-deceived 'enthusiasm' (fanatical reliance on eccentric inner impressions). Revivals, as Edwards allowed, are always disfigured by this, and have drawn similar criticisms from churchmen of an intellectualist and formalist cast of mind, both Protestant and Roman Catholic.

The *Pelagian streak in Finney's anthropology led him to reconceive Edward's morphology of revival as illustrating what he took to be the universal law that honest and urgent prayer and repenting by the church guarantees an outpouring of the *Holy Spirit in revival blessing, just as under God's kindly providence the farmer's sowing and caring for his field guarantees a crop. The arguably simplistic thought that when the church is spiritually moribund Edwardsean revival is God's immediate will if only his faithful servants will pay the price in passionate prayer and penitence has been widely influential in popular evangelical piety since Finney's day, though the finding has rarely been commensurate with the seeking. Part of the difficulty has been the one-track-minded romanticizing and stereotyping of revival in Edwardsean terms, isolating it from the theological, liturgical, ethical and structural aspects of ongoing reformation and renewal in a changing world.

It has been proposed that revival, meaning transformation fellowship with personal righteousness and strong outreach, as seen in Acts, is a permanent norm for the church and will automatically be continuous where hindrances from unbelief, misbelief, apathy and sin do not intrude. The *charismatic renewal, like original *Pentecostalism, is sometimes seen as continuous revival in this sense. Edward's theocentricity and acknowledgment of God's wise yet often inscrutable *sovereignty, which may make disciplined patience the prime calling of eager but baffled petitioners, does not however find its place in these assessments, so that disillusionment following triumphalism constantly threatens.

Today's world church seeks renewal in many forms. The renewal quest among evangelical conservatives embraces doctrinal reformation in face of liberal unorthodoxy; charismatic revitalizing in worship and giftings; liturgical enrichments of various kinds; rehabilitation of expository preaching, and of pastoral mentoring and spiritual direction; establishing lay leadership of small groups and task forces within congregations, all on the principle of every-member ministry in the body of Christ according to each person's ability; restoring adult catechesis, and regaining all-round apologetic competence and interactive presentation of God's truth to the wider secular world (John XXIII's aggiornamento agenda for the Second *Vatican Council). Some seek Edwardsean revival in its classic shape, with or without the above specifics. Sought in isolation, each of these goals appears partial and incomplete in relation to the fullness of the church's present-day calling and mission. To make the profoundly spiritual Edwardsean understanding of revival the frame within which to set, and into which to integrate, all the goals mentioned would seem to be a healthful and perhaps overdue project.

See also: EVANGELISM, THEOLOGY OF.

Bibliography

J. Edwards, Works, 2 vols. (repr. London, 1974); idem, Works, 28 vols. (New Haven, 1957–); C. G. Finney, Lectures on Revivals of Religion, ed. W. G. McLaughlin (Cambridge, 1960); R. F. Lovelace, Dynamics of Spiritual Life (Downers Grove, 1979); I. H. Murray, Pentecost Today (Edinburgh, 1998); J. I. Packer, 'The Glory of God and the Reviving of Religion', in J. Piper and J. Taylor (eds.), A God-Entranced Vision of All Things (Wheaton, 2004); idem, Keep in Step with the Spirit (Grand Rapids, 2005).

J. I. PACKER

REVOLUTION, THEOLOGY OF

'Revolution' is used in the political sphere to describe the destruction of one social system and its replacement by another. It is more than the transference of power between rival political groups; it represents a new way of ordering society. By changing values and creating new political and economic structures and institutions, revolutionary groups believe that it is possible to eliminate the injustice and conflict of present societies.

Revolution is associated with the slogan, 'liberty, equality and fraternity', with Marx's view of the class struggle, Engels' withering away of the *state, Lenin's belief that capitalism was doomed to devour itself, and Trotsky's permanent vigilance against state bureaucracy (see *Marxism and Christianity). Revolution flows from the utopian dream that human beings can act as historical midwives bringing to birth a qualitatively new human society.

A theology of revolution may possess or combine any one of three different strands. It may be a systematic theological reflection on the basis, nature and implications of revolution. It may seek to draw out the revolutionary characteristics of Christian faith. And it may help direct the church's legitimate response to revolutionary movements.

Revolution in a distinctively modern sense dates from the American and French Revolutions in the eighteenth century. The former was a reassertion of principles dating back to the British Revolution of 1688, whereas the latter was the overthrowing of despotism and gave birth to more secular and utopian democratic hopes. But there had been political eruptions in previous centuries which had produced (or were sometimes caused by) theological thought: the English Peasants' Revolt of 1381, the Czech Taborites of the early fifteenth century, Münster in sixteenth-century Germany (see *Reformation, Radical), the revolution under John *Knox leading to the Scottish Reformation, the English Revolution of 1641 which eventually brought Cromwell and the *Puritan party to power and brought toleration for the even more socially radical and egalitarian Levellers and Diggers. Both *Calvinists and

*Jesuits in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries argued for the justice of rebellion in certain contexts.

The church in the nineteenth century was almost uniformly hostile to the ideas that sprang from the French Revolution. There were some exceptions: theologians such as Bruno Bauer (1809–82) and David *Strauss belonged for a time (the late 1830s) to the circle of political radicals called ‘the Young Hegelians’; F. D. Maurice, C. Kingsley and others formed the *Christian Socialists in 1850, and at the end of the century Rauschenbush in America and Ragaz in Switzerland were leaders in a movement called the *Social Gospel.

In the twentieth century, at least four major groups developed Christian thinking on revolutionary change. R. H. Tawney (1880–1962), the British economist, is representative of influential thinkers in the Western world who have challenged the *capitalist economic system from a Christian basis. The Czech theologian, Josef L. Hromadka (d. 1969), was a foremost exponent after the Second World War of those who challenged Christians to come to terms with a socialist state. Some theologians in Africa and Asia have given thought to the way in which decolonization and movements of national liberation impinge on Christian faith. Later in the century, Christian leaders in Latin America (see *Liberation theology) and South Africa (see *Black theology), speaking on behalf of peoples oppressed by neo-fascist and racist regimes, reflected theologically on social change.

Theologies of revolution have a number of characteristics in common. They are critical of the official church’s tendency to remain non-committal when challenged to endorse sweeping political changes at times of severe social dislocation. They believe that theological reflection has to begin with the real circumstances of the poor (see *Poverty and wealth). Further, they are convinced that social analysis is a necessary part of the *hermeneutical task of making Christian obedience concrete in specific situations. Finally, they hold that theological work cannot be divorced from ideological commitment, for no intellectual discipline is neutral towards social conflict.

These theologies hold the following basic themes in common. The exodus story of God’s liberation of oppressed people from Egypt is interpreted as a *paradigm of his liberating activity throughout all *history. God continues to hear the cries of those suffering from repressive government. He does not surrender to human intransigence.

Justice (see *Righteousness) is the supreme category for knowing God; it is his action on behalf of oppressed people. Only those who take ‘an option for the poor’ can know him truly. *Jesus, in his life and ministry, as he inaugurated the kingdom, incarnated God’s justice. He seals God’s intention to deliver the poor from their oppression. He died as a result of resisting the religious and political complex of power. His *resurrection displays God’s triumph over all forces of death. It is the sign of hope that the economic and military idols of our time can be destroyed and a new way of justice and peace inaugurated.

Theologies of revolution represent one type of Christian response to the innate human desire to be free of external constraints to political and economic self-determination. They express the evident antagonism of the God of the Bible to the abuse of power which grinds defenceless people into the dust. They articulate God’s saving work in social terms, believing that in the coming of Jesus a power has been unleashed which can break apparently invulnerable, closed, political and economic systems. They draw their inspiration from the hope that a better world can be realized within history. This, it is argued, will not happen because history is bound to unfold in a pre-determined direction, but because groups of people, motivated by the conviction that God’s power is greater than the forces which cause death in today’s world, struggle for change.

Two main weaknesses are apparent in this form of theological reflection. First, in the sphere of political analysis diagnosis tends to be confused with cure. A right solution to the present suffering of the poor does not spring automatically from a correct analysis of its causes. Evil is more extensively present in the world than its operation in political and economic institutions and policies.

Secondly, a new kind of society cannot emerge without people, spiritually *regenerated, walking in the new life which God offers exclusively through Jesus Christ. However, the NT emphasis on *grace, enabling people to be free of *guilt, corruption and selfishness for a life of selfless *love, is not prominent enough in theologies of revolution. Grace tends to be seen as an addition to human *power (supplementing *nature), when people are not able to eliminate power that is against change. Revolution will certainly bring change. Almost as certainly it will not bring real human transformation, unless the regenerating power of God's grace is active in human communities.

See also: POLITICAL THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

G. Gutiérrez, The Power of the Poor in History (London, 1983); A. Kirk, Theology Encounters Revolution (Leicester, 1980); J. Miguez Bonino, Revolutionary Theology Comes of Age (London, 1975); J. Moltmann, The Power of the Powerless (London, 1983); N. Wolterstorff, Until Justice and Peace Embrace (Grand Rapids, 1983).

J. A. KIRK

RICHARDSON, ALAN (1905–75)

Richardson was a leading Anglican theologian and ecumenist, and one of the chief exponents of the biblical theology movement in Britain. He was a distinguished contributor to systematic and *philosophical theology in the third quarter of the twentieth century. Much of his earlier work (such as The Miracle Stories of the Gospels, London, 1941, The Biblical Doctrine of Work, London, 1952, and commentaries on Genesis and John) focuses on recovering the distinctiveness and unity of the biblical message. His more technical Introduction to the Theology of the New Testament (London, 1958) was very widely influential, and was, along with the Theological Wordbook of the Bible (London, 1950) which he edited, an important monument of the biblical theology movement. Richardson's more strictly theological work made some important moves towards detaching theology from the *positivism and *empiricism of much of the philosophical climate of his day, starting with Christian Apologetics (London, 1947), and culminating in his major work, the Bampton Lectures on History, Sacred and Profane (London, 1964). The latter work developed the notion of *history as an *apologetic platform for explaining the biblical *kerygma, making use of historiographers such as *Dilthey and R. G. Collingwood (1889–1943) to expound the nature of revelation, resurrection and divine action in the world. Much recent work in both theology and philosophy has moved away from Richardson's concerns, and in particular recent developments in *hermeneutical theory and *epistemology have been such that his work has a decidedly dated air.

Bibliography

J. J. Navone, History and Faith in the Thought of Alan Richardson (London, 1966). Cf. R. H. Preston (ed.), Theology and Change: Essays in Memory of Alan Richardson (London, 1975).

J. B. WEBSTER

RICŒUR, PAUL (1913–2005)

Paul Ricœur was a French philosopher whose writings on *hermeneutics were amongst the most influential on thinking about biblical interpretation in the second half of the twentieth century.

The start and end point of his thinking concerns human identity and self-understanding, but this journey has an unavoidable hermeneutical element to it. Fault is a fundamental reality of human existence – both in the sense of human culpability but also in the sense that there is a fracture running through human being – and it can only be explained by *symbols. These symbols need to be treated with suspicion, but also need positive retrieval; explanation must lead to a holistic sense of understanding. Symbols, in turn, are expressed linguistically using metaphors, which are the primary way in which language creates new meaning, and form the basis for narrative, the primary textual way that humanity makes sense of its experience of itself within time.

The interpretation of texts is part of a wider project of the interpretation of the self in the world. And interpretation always involves a 'wager of faith' on what the meaning of a symbol or text actually is: 'beyond the desert of criticism, we must be called again.' Ricœur's advocacy of a self-aware and holistic hermeneutics which considers the text, the world 'behind' the text and the world 'in front of' the text makes his work uniquely important in the transition to a *postmodern world.

Bibliography

Works: The Symbolism of Evil (Boston, 1967); The Philosophy of Paul Ricœur, ed. C. E. Reagan and D. Stewart (Boston, 1978); Thinking Biblically, with A. Lacocque (Chicago, 1998).

Studies: R. Kearney, On Paul Ricœur (London, 2004); D. Stiver, Theology after Ricœur (Louisville, 2001); K. Vanhoozer, Biblical Narrative in the Philosophy of Paul Ricœur (Cambridge, 1990); M. Wallace, The Second Naiveté (Macon, 1990).

I. PAUL

RIGHTEOUSNESS

Although the righteousness of *God has often been understood in legal terms as denoting a standard of moral perfection towards which human beings must strive but which they can never fulfil, the righteousness of God revealed and exercised in *Jesus Christ places the legal conception of righteousness within the sphere of God's mercy and *grace. The righteousness of God is made known through his mercy and is thus shown to be a righteousness exercised for humanity rather than being an abstract property of God that is set over and against humanity. The realization of this central evangelical truth lay at the heart of *Augustine's discovery of the *gospel and of *Luther's discovery that *salvation depended not upon his own works but upon the unmerited grace of God.

Until the time of Luther's wrestling with Romans, he had conceived of the justice and righteousness of God as a stern righteousness that would not tolerate and would punish with eternal damnation the least hint of any human *sin that had gone unrecognized or that had not been repented of. After reading Romans, however, Luther discovered that the righteousness of God referred, not to a standard that human beings could only vainly strive for, but to God's own righteousness in justifying the sinner, and faithfully fulfilling in Christ his covenant commitment to humankind.

Without ceasing his demand upon human beings, God had revealed his own righteousness in the mercy and love that forgives sin and imparts the gift of the Spirit to enable human beings to live in fellowship with him (see *Guilt and forgiveness). For Luther, the word of the gospel was heard in all its clarity for the first time. It became true that the truth will set you free. In Luther's case he was liberated from the endless and fruitless struggle to achieve his own righteousness before God, and could simply receive the righteousness bestowed upon those who in faith give themselves into the hands of God.

To speak evangelically of the righteousness of God, therefore, we have first to speak of God's faithfulness to the *covenant established with Israel and fulfilled in Christ on behalf of all humankind. And to speak evangelically of the righteousness of humankind, we have to speak of the righteousness bestowed upon those who entrust their lives to the one who alone is righteous, who alone does what is right. In the light of this gracious bestowal of righteousness upon God's covenant people, those same people are called to a new life, the character of which is set out in the Torah and embodied in the Word made flesh.

By attending to the revelation of God as testified to in Scripture, *evangelical theology recognizes that the righteousness of God is recognized most clearly in God's pardoning of sinners, and in his *reconciling to himself a people who are not worthy. The righteousness of God is seen in God's establishment and maintenance of a covenant with those who are not God and who have no righteousness of their own. Righteousness here means 'right relationship'. It is precisely in this sense that righteousness is equated with justice. Tsedaqah in Hebrew, dikaosune in Greek and, perhaps to a lesser extent, iustitia in Latin, can all be translated as both 'justice' and 'righteousness'. Justice is done when right relationship is established. It is done, for exemplary instance, when God takes the side of the poor, the widow, the alien and the orphan, pleads their cause amongst his people, and ensures their restoration to right relationship in the community. In like manner, God takes the side of all those who have no means and no basis upon which to plead their own cause. He takes the side of sinners, puts himself in their place, and restores them to the status of his covenant partner to which they had no rightful claim. It is this act of mercy and grace that constitutes the righteousness and the justice of God. By this means God justifies the sinner and overcomes all that stands in the way of his purpose to establish right relationship with and within his creation.

It is on account of this divine drama of salvation that Christ himself may be called the righteousness of God, just as he is also the way, the truth and the life. Human beings are called to trust in Christ who is in person the righteousness of God, and who exercises on humanity's behalf the true human righteousness of faithful love that both expresses and fulfils the right relationship between Creator and creatures that is creation's goal. According to the Protestant *Reformers, this righteousness of Christ is imputed to all who place their trust in him. Luther claims that all our good lies outside us, namely, in Christ, and that we participate in him only by faith and hope. Such righteousness is sometimes described as an alien righteousness, a righteousness that is not our own. And yet, for Luther, it becomes 'our' righteousness, not by right or by achievement but solely through the grace that enables our incorporation into the righteous life of Christ. The righteousness of believers, then, consists in the fact that God has acted for them in Christ and has restored them to that loving communion with himself from which their sin had alienated them. *Faith is at once both the recognition of this intervention of God on behalf of the unrighteousness, and the appropriate response of gratitude and acceptance. The imputation of righteousness is defined as a forensic act, actus forensis, in which sinful individuals are declared to be righteous on the basis of their faith and apart from all human merit. The *Formula of Concord views the forensic declaration of righteousness as the basis of *justification. An individual is counted as righteous because she or he is in Christ, and is incorporated, thereby, into the righteousness of Christ.

Roman Catholic theologians at the Council of *Trent, and some Protestants too, notably Andreas *Osiander who disputed the point with *Calvin, objected that the notion of imputed righteousness, iustitia imputata, when taken on its own, made human beings the passive recipients of righteousness rather than active participants in right relationship with God. They thus spoke of infused righteousness, iustitia infusa, as a gift of grace by which it becomes possible through good works to maintain oneself in right-relationship with God.

The growth in righteousness expected of those who have been justified is referred to as *sanctification. The Protestant Reformers generally made a deliberate and systematic distinction between justification (the external act by which God declares the sinner to be righteous) and sanctification or *regeneration (the internal process of renewal within the individual). Although the two are treated as inseparable, they are nevertheless to be distinguished. It is this distinction that gave rise to Luther's famous phrase that the person of faith is simul iustus et peccator, at once justified, made righteous, and yet a sinner. The believer's relationship with God has been put right, but the righteous status of the believer is incompletely worked out in his or her empirical existence. Whereas justification is the process by which the sinner is declared righteous de iure, sanctification refers to the process whereby the sinner grows in righteousness de facto. Righteousness thus becomes the new life and not just the new status of those who receive in faith the righteousness of Christ. The evangelical revival of the eighteenth century in Britain placed a particular emphasis on the need for Christians to strive to live righteous and holy lives. John *Wesley, for example, stressed that while justification was the free gift of grace, attained at the point of Christian conversion, the process of sanctification was a lifelong task. Wesley contended that Christians are to strive towards perfection, by which he meant that Christians are to strive to become wholly loving persons.

The imputation of righteousness cannot be understood without also hearing the summons of God to let go of our own ideas of righteousness, conceived so often in moralistic terms, and to trust in the righteousness of God by which sinners are pardoned and those who are unworthy are made sons and daughters of God. To this extent the righteousness of God is also judgment. It lays bare the falsity of self-righteousness and requires the death of the old *Adam who trusts in a righteousness of his or her own. Faith in the righteousness of Christ, therefore, is simultaneously an acceptance of God's condemnation of our self-righteousness. It is in this sense that the disputed concept of distributive righteousness, iustitia distributiva, with its promise of reward to the obedient and punishment to the disobedient, can be maintained. All humankind, save the one who alone is righteous, falls under this condemnation, for all have sinned. The righteousness of God discloses the reality and the nature of this sinfulness and is, as such, *judgment and condemnation. But the righteousness of God is also mercy. The one who alone is righteous takes the fate of the unrighteous upon himself and receives in their stead the distribution of justice which is due to sinful human beings. Karl Barth has put the matter clearly: the divine 'No' to human sin is enclosed within God's merciful 'Yes' to the sinner. Faith's acceptance of this merciful 'Yes' is accompanied by the sorrowful admission of the justice of God's 'No' and by the penitential recognition that the 'No' has been borne by God himself. The righteousness of believers is thus expressed through faith and *repentance, gratitude and praise.

See also: ATONEMENT; CROSS.

Bibliography

K. Barth, 'The Mercy and Righteousness of God' in CD II.1 pp. 368–406; E. Jüngel, Justification: The Heart of the Christian Faith (ET, Edinburgh, 2001); A. E. McGrath, Iustitia Dei: A History of the Christian Doctrine of Justification (Cambridge, 1998); G. Yule, 'Luther's Attack on the Latin Heresy', in T. Hart and D. Thimell (eds.), Christ in Our Place: The Humanity of God in Christ for the Reconciliation of the World (Exeter and Allison Park, 1989).

M. A. RAE

RIGHTS, HUMAN

A right is an enforceable claim to a human good (hence the ancient motto, Dieu et mon droit, 'God and my right'). A 'good' in this sense is a benefit that makes for human well-being. A human right pertains to an individual or a group solely by virtue of their being human. It is not in principle to be forcibly overridden for any reason, including the supposed greater good of the community, though rights may be voluntarily foregone.

Among those human rights first affirmed were those to life, liberty and property. Whereas basic human rights, such as the right not to experience torture, may in many circumstances be non-controversial, other putative rights (e.g. a 'right' to choose abortion or euthanasia) may be contested – by Christians, amongst others – according to specific understandings of what it is to be human.

The notion of a 'right' (ius) comes from Roman law, and its development is indebted to *Stoic notions of natural law. This set limits to the positive law of the *state, which was not to infringe the acquired or the natural rights of its citizens. Similarly, the Magna Carta (1215), to which King John of England agreed, set out certain liberties (e.g. freedom from arbitrary arrest) which were not to be infringed by the monarch. *Thomas Aquinas adopts Justinian's definition of justice as 'a constant and perpetual will to render to each person their right' (ius).

The notions of 'natural law' and 'natural rights' were widely used to support a supposedly 'natural' social hierarchy in which the privileges of the few were upheld against those who had no such rights. The development of a notion of natural rights that could be deployed by the individual against the state was central to the seventeenth-century English Revolution and the later writing of John *Locke.

The American Declaration of Independence (1776) famously asserts that 'We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness.' This was followed by the French Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen (1789). During the nineteenth century the phrase 'human rights' became more widespread.

The Universal Declaration of Human Rights (1948) is one of the great aspirational documents of the twentieth century. It was born of the international consensus after the Second World War which looked back in horror at the state-organized persecution of the Jews by the Nazi regime in Germany and at the failure of other nations to provide protection to those who fled. The UDHR defines as a matter of right a minimum standard of provision to meet the needs of all human beings and the need for an international order which will sustain this provision (cf. article 28).

Member states of the UN have a duty to ensure these rights for their own citizens. To what extent they have a duty to ensure them for the citizens of other states is disputed. The UDHR has been followed by a number of other human rights instruments and declarations such as the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (1966) and the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (1966). The European Convention on Human Rights (1950) was incorporated into UK law in the Human Rights Act (1998), ensuring that all future legislation would be scrutinized for its compatibility with recognized standards in human rights.

It is sometimes argued that there are three types of human rights: first-generation civil and political rights (rights to life and to political freedoms); second-generation economic, social and cultural rights (rights to the meeting of subsistence needs); third-generation solidarity rights (rights to a sustaining social order and environment). Liberals have usually emphasized the first sort of human rights; socialists the second. The list of human rights is by no means closed: 'third-generation' rights in particular are hotly debated.

Only since the Second World War have the Christian churches unambiguously supported human rights. Before then, the Roman Catholic Church in particular saw an emphasis on human rights as a secular threat to the Christian social order. However, both liberal Protestant Christians and Roman Catholics played a key role in the drafting of the UDHR and, whilst Christians may still want to distance themselves from certain interpretations of human rights, the major churches are now committed to their support. For Roman Catholics, this was made evident in Pope John XXIII's encyclical Pacem in Terris (1963) and at the Second *Vatican Council in the Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World (Gaudium et Spes, 1965).

One major shift for Christians has been to recognize freedom of worship as a fundamental human right. Acceptance of such freedom (provided, of course, it is not harmful to others) is, however, indivisible: there cannot be a right for some religious groups which does not hold for others. The right to freedom of worship thus becomes a foundation stone for an open and plural society, in which Christians support the freedom of non-Christians to practise their faith openly. The recognition that Christianity can never be commended by violence (which may overlap with pacifism, but is not to be identified with it) may be seen as a way of placing the *cross at the centre of Christian political practice (cf. 1 Cor. 2:2–5).

The term 'human rights' does not occur in the Bible. In both OT and NT there is, however, a great concern with righteousness and with justice – two ways of translating what is one word (with its cognates) in Hebrew (šēdāqâ) and Greek (dikaiosyne). Right judgments on earth reflect the *righteousness/justice of God. Judges and kings are to judge according to right (Gen. 18:25; Deut. 16:18–20). God has done this in giving commandments to his covenanted people: a command like 'Do not steal' suggests a presumptive right to property amongst Israelites (one which even a king may not infringe; cf. 2 Sam 12:7–9; 1 Kgs 21:19). Nevertheless, there is no suggestion of a 'natural right' against which divine or human judgments are to be measured. There can be no 'right' (no claim) against the Creator – something Job has to learn (cf. Job 27:6). In accord with the concern for justice, humans are to ensure that others, especially the marginalized, receive what is right for them (cf. Deut. 24:14–22; Prov. 31:8–9). Jesus recognizes the pressing nature of human needs but does not respond to this with the promise of human rights (Matt. 6:25–33). The seed of a doctrine of natural law, from which a doctrine of rights might be induced, is, however, present in Paul (Rom. 2:14–15).

Christians have been critical of human rights approaches which do not recognize the *sovereignty of God: human beings are made in the *image of God (Gen. 1:27). The human dignity affirmed by human rights is not autonomous. It is God-given. Christians have often criticized the secularism, the individualism, and the ethnocentricity with which 'human rights' are interpreted. They have wanted to stress the solidarity of human beings by virtue of creation, human rights as a gift of God's grace for the present world order, and the correlative place of human duties, especially towards the poor.

Nevertheless, the Christian churches now recognize that the vision of human flourishing embedded in documents like the UDHR provides a secure moral basis for a plural society in which Christians are called to play their full part.

Bibliography

J. Donnelly, Universal Human Rights in Theory and Practice (Ithaca and London, 2003); J. Mahoney, The Challenge of Human Rights (Oxford, 2007); J. Nurser, For All Peoples and All Nations (Geneva, 2005); R. Ruston, Human Rights and the Image of God (London, 2004); C. Villa-Vicencio, A Theology of Reconstruction (Cambridge, 1992).

N. SAGOVSKY

RITSCHL, ALBRECHT (1822–89)

Albrecht Ritschl, a German systematic theologian, was professor at Bonn (1852–64) and Göttingen (1864–89). Through his own writings and those of his disciples, especially Herrmann and *Harnack, Ritschl was probably the most influential continental Protestant theologian between *Schleiermacher and *Barth, certainly during the period 1875–1930, the heyday of liberal Protestantism (see *Liberalism, German).

Ritschl followed *Kant in rejecting metaphysical knowledge of God and stressing the ethical elements of religion. God was to be known not in himself, but in his effects on humankind, understood in terms of Christian experience of *justification and reconciliation (see *Atonement) and progress towards the kingdom of God. In proposing this approach, most clearly expressed in vol. 3 of The Christian Doctrine of Justification and Reconciliation (1874; ET, Edinburgh, 1900), Ritschl rejected certain kinds of *religious experience. He judged Schleiermacher's sense of 'absolute dependence' too subjective, and ruled out all *mysticism and *pietism as individualistic, amoral and not distinctively Christian. God was to be known rather through the gospel witness to Jesus and his unique vocation to fulfil God's will for the world by inaugurating the kingdom, which Ritschl defined as the 'organization of humanity through action inspired by love'. Thus Jesus has the 'value' for us of God, and demonstrates that Christianity is like an ellipse, with justification and reconciliation as one focus and the *kingdom of God as the other.

Ritschl has been criticized for maintaining an ethical rather than a religious view of justification and reconciliation, reading *Luther very differently from someone like *Otto. His assertion that all religious doctrines are 'value judgments' that affirm or deny man's worth or value has seemed to many to drive an unacceptable wedge between fact and value, history and interpretation, objective and subjective salvation. Yet in insisting on the need for justification and reconciliation and locating them primarily in the church (rather than the heart of the believer), Ritschl moved some way beyond Schleiermacher's individualistic optimism. He may even have contributed, via Herrmann, to Barth's interest in Christology and decision to undertake a church dogmatics.

Barth himself, however, always stressed his differences with Ritschl and the Ritschlian school, seeing in his own theological teachers' support of Germany's declaration of war in August 1914 proof that their approach produced a dangerous confusion between the values of German civilization and the values of the kingdom of God. Yet the fact that Ritschlian theology produced an inadequate understanding of a this-worldly kingdom need not be allowed to obscure Ritschl's achievement in correctly identifying the kingdom of God as a central concern of the teaching of Jesus.

It can also be argued that Barth's well-known repudiation of Ritschl (cf. Protestant Theology in the Nineteenth Century, London, 1972) is an insufficient basis for neglecting Ritschl's influence in other areas of theology. Yet the contribution of Ritschl's concept of value judgments to *Bultmann's *existential theology has been largely overlooked, and *Pannenberg is one of the few contemporary theologians who has given Ritschl's pioneering attempt 'to build his Christology on the question about the divinity of the historical man Jesus' (Jesus – God and Man, Philadelphia, 1968, p. 37) the kind of attention, and reasoned disagreement, that Barth afforded to Schleiermacher.

Bibliography

D. Jodock (ed.), Ritschl in Retrospect: History, Community, and Science (Minneapolis, 1995); H. R. Mackintosh, Types of Modern Theology (London, 1937); D. L. Mueller, An Introduction to the Theology of Albert Ritschl (Philadelphia, 1969); B. M. G. Reardon, Liberal Protestantism (London, 1968); J. Richmond, Ritschl: A Reappraisal (London, 1978).

P. N. HILLYER

ROBINSON, JOHN ARTHUR THOMAS (1919–83)

A prolific and controversial writer, the Anglican bishop and theologian John Robinson made significant scholarly contributions in the areas of NT, *systematic theology, *apologetics, Christian *ethics, and *liturgics. He began his career as a fellow and Dean of Clare College, Cambridge (1951–59), achieved fame as the suffragan Bishop of Southwark (South London) with responsibility for Woolwich (1959–69), and ended his days as Dean of Trinity College, Cambridge (1969–83). Honest to God (London, 1963), which sold more than 1,000,000 copies, was an attempt to commend the Christian faith to the modern man who, he thought, was unable to receive the gospel when presented with it in traditional terms. The book infuriated most orthodox churchmen, and Robinson became England's best-known (if most radical) theologian.

His most substantial contributions were to NT studies, where many of his views were surprisingly conservative (by the standards of contemporary critical scholarship). In a series of studies on John's Gospel, culminating in the Bampton Lectures he was preparing at the time of his death (The Priority of John, ed. J. A. Coakley, London, 1985), he argued for both the essential historicity and early date of the book. In Redating the New Testament (London, 1976) he defended the view that all four Gospels should be dated prior to the destruction of Jerusalem (AD 70) and expressed equally conservative views on other critical issues. On the other hand, Jesus and His Coming (London, 1957) was an influential statement of the view that Jesus did not teach or expect his future second coming (see *Eschatology), and In the End, God (London, 1950) propounded *universalism. His doctrine of the church was sacramentalist (see The Body: A Study in Pauline Theology, London, 1952), his ethics opposed love to law, while his *Christology and essential theology were modernist (see The Human Face of God, London, 1973).

Bibliography

Current Biography Yearbook 1984 (New York, 1985); The Annual Obituary 1983 (Chicago and London, 1984); D. L. Edwards, The Honest to God Debate (Norwich, 1963); E. James, A Life of Bishop John A. T. Robinson: Scholar, Pastor, Prophet (Nashville, 1989); A. Kee, The Roots of Christian Freedom: The Theology of John A. T. Robinson (London, 1988); R. P. McBrien, The Church in the Thought of Bishop John Robinson (Philadelphia, 1966).

W. W. GASQUE

ROMAN CATHOLIC THEOLOGY

The term 'Roman Catholic' emerged in the sixteenth century to distinguish Christians who had remained in communion with the pope from those who had become *Protestants. The Roman church had already divided from the majority of eastern churches in the Great Schism of 1054, partly because it asserted its 'catholicity' or universality in a more monarchical way, through a 'holy father' (papa) who exercised primacy among other bishops and over the church worldwide, in succession to Peter's leadership of the apostles (see *Papacy).

These claims to supremacy and authenticity confirm Roman Catholic theology to be profoundly ecclesial, and this is underlined in the principle of papal infallibility, which holds that when the Pope speaks ex cathedra to explain 'a doctrine of faith or morals to be held by the Universal Church', he operates with an unerring trustworthiness willed by Christ. The Second *Vatican Council reaffirmed this principle, although it also saw Pope John XXIII famously redefine the role of his office with respect to *dogma when he said that 'the substance of the ancient doctrine of the deposit of the faith is one thing; the way in which it is presented is another'. To an extent this merely acknowledged that beyond Rome's assumed guardianship of the 'one faith', Roman Catholic theology in fact represents a synthesis of many different influences, from the early Greek and Latin Fathers (see *Patristic theology), through *Augustine, the medieval *scholasticism of *Thomas Aquinas and the renaissance *humanism of *Erasmus, to a wide diversity of more recent approaches, not least those stemming from global *charismatic renewal. However, Pope John's remark also more specifically echoed the significant work done on the "'development of doctrine' by the Victorian Anglican convert to Rome, John Henry *Newman, and the growing ecumenical theological interaction modelled by Yves *Congar, Hans Urs von *Balthasar and others.

Since the Middle Ages Rome's 'catholic' concern for the whole of humanity has been expressed in a general endorsement of *natural theology, which affirms the essential goodness of human beings despite the *fall, and distinct from their salvation by *grace. At a deeper level, modern Roman Catholic theologies differ on the extent to which grace and nature represent discrete or integrated means of knowing God. For example, since the Second World War scholars including Henri de Lubac (1896–1991) and Karl *Rahner have sought to develop a more holistic vision of 'graced nature' based on the *incarnation.

Closely linked to this alignment with natural theology is the recognition that reason, as a faculty common to all humans, may significantly mediate divine revelation. Although Rome is still popularly tarred with its censure of Galileo's cosmology in the seventeenth century, Roman Catholic thought in the past 100 years or so has been marked by extensive engagement with contemporary scientific and cultural thinking. Thus *Teilhard de Chardin sought rapprochement between Darwinian evolution and the doctrines of providence and redemption; Pierre Rousselot (1878–1915) and Joseph Maréchal (1878–1944) reconstrued Kant's philosophy in neo-Thomian terms;

Charles Péguy (1873–1914) pioneered a Catholic form of *Christian Socialism, John Courtney Murray (1904–67) argued for the compatibility of Christian doctrine and human rights, and in 1992 Pope John Paul II approved a report acknowledging the ‘subjective error’ of Galileo’s accusers.

Another recent example of Roman Catholic theology’s commitment to universality, *rationality and natural theology can be seen in its approach to non-Christian religions. In various works Karl Rahner presented the God revealed in Jesus Christ as the ‘destination’ of all human development – a destination which might at first be sensed implicitly rather than comprehended explicitly. From this perspective Rahner proposed those without faith in Christ who nonetheless display awareness of God may be regarded as ‘anonymous Christians’. Vatican II mirrored this approach when it defined the church as a ‘universal sacrament of salvation’ called to treat ‘whatever is of good or truth’ among non-Christians as a ‘preparation for the Gospel’. This definition in turn relates to those more specific *sacraments which encapsulate the doctrine, worship and ministry of Roman Catholicism.

In Augustine’s definition a sacrament is a ‘visible sign of invisible grace’ and denotes those sensory means by which the mysteries of Christ are communicated to humans. By 1272 the Council of Lyon had delineated seven sacraments: *baptism, *confirmation, the *Eucharist, *penance, extreme unction or anointing of the sick, orders and matrimony. These sacraments are understood to function ex opere operato – as objectively conferring grace by their very enactment, rather than according to the condition of those ministering or receiving them.

Baptism, confirmation and the Eucharist (or Mass) are all now classed in Roman Catholic doctrine as ‘sacraments of initiation’. Baptism marks incorporation into the church as well as remission from the guilt of original sin. Confirmation is associated with the distinct ‘reception of the Holy Spirit’ experienced by certain first-generation Christians (e.g. in Acts 8:14–17), but it did not develop as a separate rite in the Roman church until the early medieval period, when it was accompanied by anointing with oil and the laying on of hands by a bishop. It is in turn linked in Roman Catholic theology to participation in the Eucharist (‘First Communion’), whereas eucharistic elements are given to newly baptized infants in the Orthodox tradition.

The Eucharist itself is construed in Roman Catholic doctrine as an ‘unbloody’ *sacrifice, in which the atoning death of Christ on the cross is re-presented, and in which the consecrated elements of bread and wine become his ‘real presence’. Since the thirteenth century this process has been defined in terms of transubstantiation – an explanation strongly indebted to Aristotelian ontology whereby the ‘substance’ of the bread and wine is changed into the body and blood of Christ even though their ‘accidents’ or outward appearances remain unaltered. Transubstantiation was rejected by the Protestant Reformers, often on the grounds that it encouraged superstitious focus on the elements themselves rather than on the glorified Christ.

The administration of these and other sacraments is reserved in Roman Catholic doctrine to those who have been ordained, and the clerical orders of bishop, priest and deacon themselves constitute a threefold sacrament (see *Ministry). This link between Orders and sacraments is somewhat more complex in the case of marriage: here it is the couple who marry and minister to one another, even as the priest witnesses and blesses their union on behalf of the church.

Protestants reduced the number of sacraments to the two that they perceived to have been directly authorized by Christ – namely baptism and the Eucharist, although for both Luther and Calvin even these were in a sense depictions of the one true sacrament of the word of God. On this basis the authority that Rome accords to the church, the papacy and the sacraments is substantially refocused in Protestantism on the Bible. In response, at the Council of *Trent and since, Roman Catholic theology has tended to stress the interdependence of Scripture, sacred tradition (see *Scripture and tradition) and the teaching office of the church. Three prominent examples of this approach may be seen in the development of Mariology, reproductive ethics and social teaching.

In 1854 Pope Pius IX affirmed *Mary’s immaculate conception as a dogma to be ‘firmly and constantly believed by all the faithful’. Then, in 1950, Pius XII invoked papal infallibility to affirm her bodily assumption. Protestants have criticized these Marian dogmas as lacking scriptural warrant, yet their long development from populist devotional tenets to formal doctrines bears out the ‘Scripture-Tradition-Church’ matrix that defines the essential Roman theological method.

This method was also very much at work in the position taken by the Vatican on contraception in the late 1960s. Following the advent of the contraceptive pill, Pope Paul VI established a commission to report on the moral and theological implications of its use. The commission reached a majority view that the pill should be permitted under certain conditions. However, Paul VI asserted his primary teaching status to side with the more conservative minority, and in his encyclical Humanae Vitae (1968) rejected the pill and other forms of artificial contraception, asserting that every sexual act within marriage must have the potential for procreation.

On a broader socio-political level modern Catholic moral theology has been profoundly concerned with matters of economics, justice and *poverty. Beginning with Leo XIII’s Rerum Novarum (1861), a succession of papal encyclicals has developed contemporary ‘Catholic Social Teaching’ as a mediation between capitalist emphasis on free markets and personal responsibility, socialist insistence that the state provide for weaker members of society, and the principle of ‘subsidiarity’, in which more localized levels of governance should retain authority unless larger structures more effectively serve the common good.

While these concerns have often been reflected in the ‘centrist’ policies of various Christian Democratic parties in Europe, more radical social and political thinking influenced the ‘*liberation theology’ espoused by various Latin American Roman Catholic theologians from the late 1960s and subsequently adapted in various forms of black and feminist theologies. Gustavo *Gutiérrez, Leonardo *Boff, John *Sobrinho and others married Marxist theory to hermeneutical emphasis on the exodus and the Magnificat to propose that a ‘preferential option for the poor’ lies at the heart of the gospel. As led by Cardinal Joseph *Ratzinger, later to become Pope Benedict XVI (2005–2013), the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith affirmed the church’s obligation to the poor but disavowed liberation theology’s alignment with *Marxist concepts of class struggle and revolution. This exchange highlighted the distinction between theological work granted a nihil obstat or imprimatur by the Vatican and that published by Roman Catholic scholars but not authorized by the church. The later books of the influential Swiss theologian Hans *Küng, which include a sharp critique of papal infallibility, have also fallen into the second category.

Debate about liberation and other theologies is ongoing, but it bears out a more general challenge intrinsic to the ‘catholic’ nature of Roman Catholic theological practice: the challenge of maintaining a core of apostolic doctrine which is deemed to be unchanging, alongside a tradition of interpretation and application which has long been mutable, diverse and contested.

See also: CHURCH; CHURCH GOVERNMENT.

Bibliography

F. S. Fiorenza and J. P. Galvin, Systematic Theology: Roman Catholic Perspectives (Augsburg, 2011); A. Flannery (ed.), Vatican Council II: Constitutions, Decrees, Declarations (Northport and Dublin, 1996); N. Geisler and R. E. MacKenzie, Roman Catholics and Evangelicals: Agreements and Differences (Grand Rapids, 1995); M. Hayes and L. Gearon, Contemporary Roman Catholic Theology: A Reader (Leominster, 1998); H. Küng, The Church (London and New York, 1968); K. Rahner, Foundations of the Christian Faith (New York, 2008 [1978]); J. Ratzinger (Pope Benedict XVIII), Principles of Catholic Theology: Building Stones for a Fundamental Theology (San Francisco, 1987).

D. H. K. HILBORN

ROMANTICISM

The term ‘Romantic’ is commonly used by historians of literature to describe the period from about 1780 to about 1830, but in a broader sense it applies to the sensibility that arose among literary innovators in that epoch and subsequently spread to a much wider public. Romanticism is usually contrasted with the intellectual mood of the *Enlightenment that preceded it, but in Germany, where it put down deepest roots, there was substantial continuity between the two movements of thought. In England the preface to Lyrical Ballads (1798), a collection of poetry by William Wordsworth and S. T. Coleridge, is often seen as a Romantic manifesto against earlier neoclassical assumptions, but there was already, in such figures as William Blake and in the gothic school of literature, a flourishing movement showing many of the features of Romantic thought.

Nevertheless, Romanticism was frequently, in its early phase, a self-conscious revolt against the Enlightenment. Whereas enlightened thinkers had exalted reason, Romantics stressed the place of emotion, intuition and the will. Instead of the universal norms dictated by classical example, there was an insistence on the diversity of human experience. It was appreciated that people grow in different ways, so that the preferred metaphor for human society was no longer a machine but a tree. The Enlightenment concentration on individuals was replaced by a new emphasis on the organic solidarity of the community. Wisdom was more likely to be found among the humble poor, with their reliance on inherited custom, than within an educated 'enlightened' elite. Creativity in poetry or music would probably come from an untutored genius exercising his imagination, rather than from a slavish imitator of supposed timeless ideals. The irreligious *rationalism of the French Enlightenment was repudiated in favour of a sense of the spiritual in nature, often giving rise to a form of *pantheism.

This complex Romantic temper was associated with two other trends of thought. One was historicism, the belief that human values are moulded by historical experience. On this view there are no absolute standards to which a community should aspire, so that the notion of natural law and the idea of progress were alike rejected. Instead, each society possesses its own unique character deriving from its circumstances over time. The new appreciation of *history gave rise to the enormous popularity of the novels of Sir Walter Scott. By insisting on the distinctiveness of each land, historicism also generated the powerful current of cultural relativism that was to affect theology along with most branches of scholarship during the nineteenth century. The other trend was *idealism, a philosophical idiom that challenged the prevailing *empiricism of the Enlightenment. The central new conviction was that the mind is active in the generation of knowledge, rather than merely a passive receptor of sense experience. Immanuel *Kant taught a moderate form of idealism from the 1780s, and in the early nineteenth century G. W. F. *Hegel propounded an absolute idealism according to which the entire world is the product of mind. These two philosophers were to retain an enduring attraction for theologians touched by the Romantic spirit.

The most significant German theologian of the early Romantic era was F. D. E. *Schleiermacher, whose appeal to experience rather than dogma reflected the priorities of his age. In the English-speaking world the most influential figure among theologians was *Coleridge. Proclaiming the inadequacy of an Enlightenment 'understanding' to grasp eternal truths, he urged the merits of a Romantic 'reason' founded on intuition of the divine. Coleridge encouraged intellectual enquiry in a religious spirit, swaying many of those such as Thomas Arnold who shaped Broad Church thinking in *Anglicanism. At the same time Romantic sensibility was fundamental to the Oxford Movement that renewed High Churchmanship (see *Anglo-Catholic theology). John *Keble's collection of poetry The Christian Year (1827) exemplified the new taste in verse, and J. H. *Newman saw the fresh cultural mood as the precondition for his work at Oxford in the 1830s. The 'illative sense' that Newman, by now a Catholic, posited in his Grammar of Assent (1870) can be understood as a species of Romantic intuition. The growth within the Roman Catholic Church of Ultramontaniam, an enlarged respect for the pope joined with elaborate liturgical display, also owed a great deal to Romantic attitudes.

Evangelical Christianity was far from immune to the rising Romantic tide. Edward *Irving, a minister of the Church of Scotland in London, was a youthful friend of Thomas Carlyle, the greatest of Romantic prose writers, and profoundly influenced by Coleridge. Irving transposed evangelical doctrine into a Romantic key. Christian mission, he believed, was not to use rational business methods but to go out in radical reliance on the Almighty. Irving's readiness to expect dramatic supernatural events led him to credit the appearance of speaking in tongues in his congregation. And for the same reason he rejected postmillennial hopes of the gradual spread of the gospel over the whole earth in favour of the premillennial expectation of the imminent second coming of Jesus. J. N. *Darby, another man deeply affected by the Romantic style, also adopted premillennial teaching, propounding the distinctive version known as dispensationalism (see *Millennium; *Eschatology).

The earliest stirrings of Romantic thought in America were in *Unitarianism, the seedbed of the transcendentalism of R. W. *Emerson and his circle. The *Mercersburg theology of J. W.

Nevin and Philip Schaff transferred German Romantic themes into Reformed Christianity in America. The Congregationalist Horace *Bushnell pioneered the remoulding of evangelical teaching into Romantic phraseology, initiating the avoidance of doctrinal definition that was the hallmark of liberal theological tendencies in the English-speaking world during the later nineteenth century. The German higher critical movement associated with Julius Wellhausen was discernibly founded on Romantic premises about the growth of nations. At the same time, however, conservative trends among evangelicals such as the rise of faith missions and the Keswick holiness movement bore a Romantic impress. The many-sided phenomenon of Romanticism continued to exert a conservative as well as a liberal influence on popular theology during the twentieth century (see *History of theology).

Bibliography

M. H. Abrams, Natural Supernaturalism (New York and London, 1971); D. W. Bebbington, The Dominance of Evangelicalism (Leicester and Downers Grove, 2005); J. B. Halsted (ed.), Romanticism (New York and London 1969); T. A. Howard, Religion and the Rise of Historicism (Cambridge, 2000); R. Porter and M. Teich (eds.), Romanticism in National Context (Cambridge, 1988); S. Prickett, Romanticism and Religion (Cambridge, 1976); P. H. Reill, The German Enlightenment and the Rise of Historicism (Berkeley and London, 1975).

D. W. BEBBINGTON

ROUSSEAU, JEAN-JACQUES (1712–78)

Rousseau was born in Geneva and became one of the principal figures of the French *Enlightenment. In 1750, he became well-known for his writing after he was awarded a first prize for his Discourse on the Sciences and Arts, in which he famously argued that the progress of society was the corruptor of human morality. His new-found success set him on a trajectory that led to numerous widely read and controversial works including his political treatise The Social Contract (1762), advocating the supremacy of the general will and ‘*civil religion’ policies, as well as his autobiographical work Confessions, published posthumously.

Over the course of his life, Rousseau was engaged with issues of theology in two noteworthy situations. Disagreement arose with *Voltaire over the problem of evil, or *theodicy, in response to the Lisbon earthquake of 1755. Voltaire’s Poem on the Disaster of Lisbon and Candide rejected the explanations of Alexander Pope and Gottfried *Leibniz, which Rousseau defended. Years later, Rousseau’s book Emile (1762) received widespread condemnation for the section, ‘The Profession of Faith of the Savoyard Vicar’ and its advocacy of *natural theology and critique of church dogma and practices.

Bibliography

T. E. D. Braun (ed.), The Lisbon Earthquake of 1755: Representations and Reactions (Oxford, 2005); R. Goldberg, ‘Voltaire, Rousseau, and the Lisbon Earthquake’, Eighteenth Century Life n.s. 13.2, 1989, pp. 1–20; R. Grimsley, Rousseau and the Religious Quest (Oxford, 1968); idem, Rousseau: Religious Writings (Oxford and New York, 1970); A. F. Mettraux, ‘Rousseau et Voltaire: la guerre des philosophes’, Revue des sciences philosophiques et théologiques, n.s. 83.2, 1999, pp. 273–290; H. Rosenblatt, Rousseau and Geneva: From the First Discourse to the Social Contract, 1749–1762 (Cambridge and New York, 1997); J. S. Spink, Jean-Jacques Rousseau et Genève (Paris, 1934).

J. P. McNUTT

RULE OF FAITH, see CREEDS

RUETHER, ROSEMARY RADFORD (b. 1936)

Rosemary Ruether is an American Catholic feminist theologian. She is Carpenter Emerita Professor of Feminist Theology, Graduate Theological Union, Berkeley, California and visiting scholar in feminist theology, Claremont Graduate University and Claremont School of Theology. She taught for many years at Garrett-Evangelical Theological Seminary and was a member of the Graduate Faculty of Northwestern University in Evanston, Illinois.

Ruether’s work has been extremely influential upon the whole of *feminist theology. Her contribution to the field spans decades, and her numerous writings have helped establish the foundations of Euro-American feminist theology. Ruether's feminist *liberation theology reflects a correlationist method that places the full humanity of women in critical relationship with the practices of the historic Christian tradition. She utilizes a prophetic-liberating tradition, rooted in Scripture, which understands women as one of the oppressed whom God will liberate and vindicate, thereby making the critical principle of her feminist theology the 'promotion of the full humanity of women'. Ruether is intensely critical of what she describes as the patriarchalization of Christianity and how it has led to the exclusion of women from the shaping of theology as well as to the diminishment of their full humanity.

Therefore, it follows that Ruether grounds her theology upon sources that promote the full humanity of women. Her Christology, for instance, portrays Jesus as the messianic prophet described as the paradigm of liberated humanity. Christ's identity is that which is continued in redemptive humanity and in the life of the community. It is a 'this-worldly' approach in which our responsibility is to use our time to create a just and good community, in the present and the future. Due to the oppression that women in her own Roman Catholic tradition experienced under a patriarchal system, Ruether focused her attention on the need for women-church, a gathering of the feminist community outside established patriarchal Catholicism. Nevertheless, she is careful to maintain a link with the institutional church so as to be effective in critiquing and transforming it.

Much of Ruether's work challenges a *dualistic mindset of Western Christianity that has been distorted by androcentrism. She argues that such a view makes the male normative, and concepts like heaven, spirit, mind, good and man are polarized against earth, bodies, emotions and woman. She understands feminist theology as situated in an interconnected class, *race and *gender analysis. In addition to these, issues of *ecology are also significant. Because she understands all forms of oppression to be interlinked, Ruether seeks to construct a theology that promotes equally the embodied lives of all, as well as the well-being of the earth itself. In this way, Ruether can be considered an early North American ecofeminist who recognized the connections among ecology, feminism and religion, calling for a vision of the earth that was not defined out of domination.

Bibliography

Selected works: Sexism and God-talk: Toward a Feminist Theology (Boston, 1983); Woman-Church: Theology and Practice of Feminist Liturgical Communities (San Francisco, 1985); Christianity and the Making of the Modern Family; and Gaia and God: An Ecofeminist Theology of Earth Healing (San Francisco, 1992); Goddesses and the Divine Feminine: A Western Religious History (Berkeley, 2005); (ed.), Encyclopedia of Women and Religion in North America (Bloomington, 2006).

L. PEACORE

RUSSIAN ORTHODOX THEOLOGY

Within the *Eastern Orthodox theological tradition Russian Orthodox theology has developed specific characteristics of its own.

From the beginnings to c. 1800

The conversion of the two most populous Slavic nations, the Poles and the Russians, began with the baptism of the Polish prince Mieszko I in 966 and was followed twenty-two years later by that of Grand Prince Vladimir of Kiev (979–1015). An apparently insignificant difference in these two conversions was to influence profoundly the development of theology in the two nations. The Poles accepted their Christianity from Latin-speaking Christians of the West, and their resulting Latin orientation integrated them into Western Europe. The Russians, however, accepted the Christian faith from Constantinople, the capital of the still vigorous 'Roman' Empire (usually called, somewhat inexactly, the Byzantine Empire), where Greek was spoken. The first Greek missionaries to the Slavs, Cyril (826–69) and Methodius (c. 815–85), devised the so-called Glagolitic alphabet (the forerunner of the Cyrillic alphabet used for Russian and several other Slavic languages). Cyril's translations of biblical and liturgical texts laid the foundation for Old Church Slavonic, once widely spoken and still used in the liturgy of Slavic national churches. The use of Slavonic proved a great asset in the conversion of the Slavs, but it was later to make theology and even liturgy less accessible to the Russian masses.

For about 700 years from the conversion of Vladimir to the eighteenth century, the Russian church produced no substantial original theological literature, despite the richness of its ethical and spiritual life. A number of factors contribute to this apparent stagnation. The two most prominent are (1) the wealth of the heritage of Greek *patristic theology entering Russia in Slavonic translation, and (2) the centuries-long isolation of Russia from the outside world, particularly the West, caused by the schism of 1054 between Constantinople and Rome, the more than two centuries of Mongol rule in Russia after 1237, and the capture of Constantinople by the Muslim Turks in 1453. The flood of theological and spiritual works translated from Greek into Slavonic simply submerged the Russian church and made original work seem superfluous. The isolation of Russia kept it largely unaware of theology as a science until well into the seventeenth century.

Nevertheless, one note of continuing significance for Russian theology through the centuries was sounded early, by the first non-Greek metropolitan bishop of Kiev, Ilarion (fl. 1037–54), who produced a confession of faith as well as a classical sermon, ‘On Law and Grace’, around 1051. It is the sermon that foreshadows the future: Ilarion sets Russia in redemptive history, giving it an *eschatological role. In addition, he takes what will come to be a typically Russian stand concerning the relationship between faith and good works – a strong theoretical emphasis on the sufficiency of *faith coupled with a very practical insistence on good works, particularly on *asceticism and charity. But for centuries Ilarion stands virtually alone as an original writer.

In the West, where it was done in Latin, theology was in constant, productive ferment from the beginning of the eleventh century, producing great thinkers such as *Anselm of Canterbury, Peter *Abelard, *Thomas Aquinas and *Duns Scotus, as well as a host of lesser figures. Russian theology, done in Slavonic, oriented towards Constantinople, and, for centuries hampered by the Mongol yoke, lacked the stimulus of contact with the West. Greek theology, which it did know, was itself highly conservative and developed largely in the area of *mysticism and the ascetic life; in the East there was no counterpart to the flourishing *scholastic theology of the West.

As Russia emerged from Mongol subjugation in the reign of the Grand Prince of Moscow, Ivan III (1462–1595), Constantinople had fallen to the Turks. Russia, with Moscow as its new power centre, self-consciously assumed the mantle of empire from Constantinople. The Russian church appropriated Greek theology in large doses, but it was not to develop this theological heritage until it began to feel the shock of the Protestant *Reformation and the pressure of Catholic expansion in the Counter-*Reformation two centuries later. Ivan married the Byzantine princess Zoë Paleologus, the niece of the last Byzantine emperor, and took up the fallen imperial mantle. This continuity was given a theological interpretation by Abbot Filofei of Pskov (fl. c. 1540). Vassily III (1479–1534), Ivan’s successor, was the first Russian ruler to take the title of tsar (from the Roman and Byzantine title ‘caesar’) and to appropriate the Byzantine double eagle, the symbol of empire. Filofei likened the new tsar to Constantine the Great, the founder of New Rome (i.e. Constantinople), and wrote to him, ‘Two Romes have fallen, a third stands, and a fourth shall not be.’ This signalled the beginning of a remarkable subservience of Russian theology to tsarist ideology, partly explicable because of the fact that Russian theology derives from Constantinople rather than from Rome. Constantinople was never without a Christian emperor (apart from the brief reign of Julian the Apostate, 361–363) from its establishment to its fall in 1453. Consequently, the patriarch of Constantinople could never claim to be the head of all Christendom as the pope did, for he always stood in the shadow of the ‘sacred’ emperor and his quasi-divine office. The patriarchy of Moscow was established in 1589, bringing the number of Eastern patriarchs back to the traditional early-church number of five (Rome being no longer counted).

At this time, Rome firmly set the direction for Russian theology for two centuries by attempting to bring the Russian church under its influence, since Russia could no longer look to Turkish-ruled Constantinople. The project was facilitated by the fact that most of what is now western Russia then belonged to Poland, or, more properly, to Lithuania, in the commonwealth of Poland-Lithuania. Poland itself was just recovering from an affair with *Protestantism, in which the majority of the nobility briefly embraced the Reformation. Having brought most of the Protestants back into its fold, Catholicism turned east, where a few Polish and Lithuanian Catholics lived in the midst of an Orthodox majority. The flood of Catholic propaganda called forth an Orthodox reaction: Prince Konstantin Ostrozhsky (1526–1608) established a printing house to publish classical Byzantine theological works in translation, and in 1581 it brought out the Ostrog Bible, the first complete Bible in Slavonic.

King Zygmunt (Sigismund) III of Poland-Lithuania convened a church council at Brest in 1596. The resulting Union of Brest established the uniat Eastern Church (i.e. churches in communion with Rome but retaining their own language, liturgy, etc.) and, with mixed success, placed the Russians and Ukrainians in Zygmunt's realm under papal hegemony. Leading the opposition to this union was the Cretan Cyril Lucaris (1572–1638), later to become patriarch first of Alexandria, then of Constantinople. Lucaris spent five years in Poland-Lithuania in an attempt to prevent the submission of the Orthodox to Rome. Lucaris' role illustrates the interplay of Greek Orthodox and Protestant ideas in the development of Russian theology, which continued to be receptive rather than creative, in reaction rather than in action. During his years in Poland-Lithuania, Lucaris became acquainted with Protestant (chiefly *Reformed) theology and theologians. Consequently, he promoted Protestant ideas in Russia as well as in the Near East, initiating the Protestant connection that produced a two-centuries-long, three-way conflict in Russian theology. The struggle to preserve a distinctive Orthodox tradition was waged at times in alliance with Protestantism against Roman Catholic influence, at times against Protestantism under Roman Catholic influence, and at times against both. The period, which began in 1453 with the fall of Constantinople, may conveniently be seen to close with the accession of Tsar Alexander I in 1801, for under this charismatic ruler (1801–25), who was strongly influenced by German and Baltic Protestant *pietism and eschatological speculation, the Protestant influence appeared to predominate. Eventually, Alexander's patronage of Protestant and biblical piety would stimulate, largely as a reaction, the real flowering of Russian Orthodox theology in the nineteenth century.

To the generation following Ostrozhsky and Lucaris belongs the greatest name in Orthodox theology in the seventeenth century, that of Peter Mogila (1596–1646), who was born in Moldavia in 1597 and educated at the Latin school of L'vov in Polish Galacia. In 1640 he published his *Confession of Faith, containing Protestant emphases. This confession was translated and revised by another Cretan, Melitios Syrigos (d. c. 1667), somewhat undoing the Protestant influence of Lucaris. It was accepted in this form at the Synod of Jassy in 1643 as the confession of the Eastern churches. Mogila also published a Small Catechism in 1645, somewhat in response to Syrigos' revisions, as well as a liturgical handbook, the Euchologion, both of which again promoted Protestant tendencies. Thus the situation prevailing at the end of the seventeenth century was one in which Russian theology, without changing its officially anti-Roman and anti-Protestant stand, was permeated with Protestant influences. Patriarch Nikon (1605–81) of Moscow had revised the Orthodox liturgy in 1660, sparking the schism of the Old Believers (raskolniki, fallen-away ones) in reaction; it is significant that the major religious controversy of this period was based not on theological differences but on *liturgy. (The Old Believers soon developed pronounced ascetic, separatist and chiliastic tendencies, which are beyond the scope of our consideration here.)

Tsar Peter the Great (1682–1721) promoted the westernization of Russian religion in the context of his efforts to westernize all of Russian life. A small group of theologians in Moscow resisted Protestantizing tendencies, among them Stefan Iavorsky (1658–1722), who enjoyed Peter's favour until he produced his anti-Protestant polemic, Kamen' very (The Rock of Faith) in 1713 (banned in Russia). Peter turned to Feofan (Theophanes) Prokopovich of Kiev (by then in Russian hands) to counter Iavorsky's anti-Protestant polemics, which in Peter's eyes tied Russia to the past. Prokopovich was a typical Russian theologian of his day, in that he relied heavily on two orthodox Lutherans, J. A. Quenstedt (1617–88) and Johann E. Gerhard (1582–1637). In his Introductio ad Theologiam, Prokopovich followed the Protestants in excluding the OT apocrypha from the Bible, but in his major treatise, On the Gratuitous Justification of Sinners through Christ Jesus, he rejected the Protestant doctrine of the bondage of the will. Although we are 'saved by faith alone', faith is never 'lonely', but must be accompanied by good works, as Ilarion had taught 600 years earlier.

Opposed by the Moscow theologians around Iavorsky, at the tsar's request Prokopovich drafted the new church constitution, the Ecclesiastical Regulations of 1721. It abolished the patriarchate and created the 'Holy Synod' in its stead, a move that placed the Russian church thoroughly under imperial control. Peter was visited by the ecumenically minded German mathematician G. W. *Leibniz, who saw in Russia the predestined mediator between China and Europe. Leibniz unsuccessfully promoted the idea of an ecumenical council, to be summoned by Peter the Great as the successor to the first Christian emperor, Constantine the Great (just as Filofei of Pskov had said a century before!). Less spectacular but more pervasive was the influence of the German pietist theologian and educator August Hermann Francke (1663–1727), exercised through the intermediary of the German minority in Russia as well as through Swedish prisoners of war there; Russian diplomats regularly visited Francke in Halle en route to and from western Europe.

Later in the eighteenth century, Platon Levshin (1737–1812), rector of the Moscow Academy and later metropolitan (not patriarch!) of Moscow, perpetuated the Protestant tendencies of Prokopovich, like him relying heavily on the Lutheran theologian Quenstedt. Although Levshin followed the Orthodox tradition in denouncing 'popery, Calvinism, and Lutheranism' as 'devastating heresies', in fact he held Lutheran views on the sole authority of *Scripture as well as on the church as the company of believers rather than an institution. Nevertheless, Levshin's major work (Orthodox Teaching or a Brief Christian Theology, Moscow, 1765) marks the first attempt at a theological system in Russian (ET by R. Pinkerton, The Present State of the Greek Church in Russia . . ., Edinburgh, 1814, and G. Potessaro, The Orthodox Doctrine of the Apostolic Eastern Church, London, 1857). At this time, Russian theological education and writing were strongly coloured by Western models, Roman Catholic as well as Protestant. Such an imported theology remained a fragile transplant and could not strike deep roots in Russia. Not until the end of the period would Juvenal Medvedsky (1767–1809) compose the first truly Russian systematic theology.

As always in Russia, where theology remained more *mystical and practical than speculative, the ascetics were more influential than the Protestantizing theologians, as for example in the case of the two monks, St Tikhon of Zadonsk (1724–83) and Palsy Velichkovsky (1722–94). Tikhon relinquished an episcopate in Voronezh for the monastery of Zadonsk.

He promoted a practical love ethic based on mystical reflection on the passion of Christ. Velichkovsky gave a new impetus to the hesychast (quietist) spirituality of the Byzantine church, which had long been popular in Russia, by publishing the *hesychast spiritual and devotional handbook Philokalia (Love of the Good) in Slavonic. The Philokalia emphasizes an intense personal devotion to *Jesus based on the frequent repetition of the 'prayer of the heart' or 'Jesus prayer' – the short ejaculation, 'Lord Jesus Christ, Son of God, have mercy on me!'

Although the non-dogmatic and internationalist ideas of freemasonry enjoyed a certain vogue during the reign of Catherine the Great (1762–96), Russian spirituality soon turned back to its fascination with the Russian role in the end times. The German physician Johann Heinrich Jung-Stilling (1740–1817) contributed to the nationalistic tendencies of Russian theological speculation with his conviction that the Antichrist had been at work in the French Revolution and that all true Christians were called to gather in the East, in Russia, to withstand him. Thus a note first sounded by Metropolitan Ilarion of Kiev in 1051, namely the conviction that Russia has an important role to play in initiating the last days, continued to resound for three-quarters of a millennium: Alexander I would be seen as the 'angel flying through the midst of heaven' of Rev. 8:13. Indeed, the conviction that Russia must play a central role in the last days would continue to be heard in both tsarist and communist Russia (in secularized dress) to the present day, and to echo in an altered form in the West in the speculations of those who see the Soviet Union not as God's agent but as the opposite – the apocalyptic, anti-Christian power of the end times (see *Antichrist).

Russian Orthodox theology has been consistently a conservative force, but while it preserved major elements of patristic Gk thought, it treated them as though they were Russian. From its very beginnings it had strongly nationalistic and eschatological overtones, assigning Russia a prominent role in the conversion of the world and in the culmination of salvation history. In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, Russian theology was deeply influenced by Protestantism, first by Lutheran scholasticism, and then by pietism. Throughout the period 1453–1801, it was never original or independent, but always borrowing, first from the Greeks, then from the Germans. Nevertheless, it was consistently eager to claim a special destiny for Moscow and the Russian people, whether in terms of the 'third Rome' (Filofei of Pskov), of the conversion of Asia (Leibniz), or in the ultimate conflicts of the end times (Jung-Stilling). Not being productive of original ideas, it has also produced very little *heresy – which may help to explain the survival of the Russian church through almost seven decades of communist oppression.

Bibliography

G. P. Fedotov, The Russian Religious Mind, 2 vols. (Cambridge, MA and London, 1946, 1966); G. Florovsky, Ways of Russian Theology (Belmont, 1979); P. Kawerau, Die Christentum des Ostens (Stuttgart, 1972); G. A. Maloney, History of Orthodox Theology since 1453 (Belmont, 1976).

H. O. J. BROWN

From the nineteenth century to the present

In the nineteenth century the Russian Orthodox Church continued to be run as a department of the tsarist state. The church nevertheless continued to nurture men of great spiritual stature. One of the most beloved saints of the Russians is St Serafim of Sarov (1759–1832), an ascetic who devoted himself to the service of others. The monastery of Optina Pustyn near Tula was to become famous as a place where one could meet monks maintaining the authentic *patristic traditions of *Eastern Orthodoxy.

Tsar Alexander I (1801–25) was interested in promoting 'public enlightenment'. Archimandrite Filaret Drozdov, later Metropolitan of Moscow, reformed and extended the church's facilities for training clergy. He maintained that Russian Orthodoxy had been under too much Western influence and must return to its own roots in the apostles and the Church Fathers. He promoted the translation of the Bible into Russian. A Russian Bible Society was founded in 1812. However, the translation project fell foul of critics who suspected that Western influences were at work, and the Society was closed down in 1826.

The reformed theological schools, including the new Academies, were the cradle for the development of nineteenth-century Russian Orthodox theology within the church. Two themes were important in this theology, usually manifesting themselves as polarities: between the role of God and the role of man; and between renunciation of the world and engagement with it.

Makari Bulgakov (1816–82), a teacher of theology at St Petersburg Theological Academy and later Metropolitan of Moscow (1879–82), published five volumes of Dogmatic Theology (Bogosloviye dogmaticheskoye) (1849–53). They were systematizing rather than innovative, but for the first time theology was available in up-to-date Russian. The volumes remained central to theological teaching throughout the tsarist period.

Fedor Bukharev (1824–71) was the first Russian Orthodox theologian to call on Orthodoxy to engage with contemporary society. His book Orthodoxy and the Modern World (O pravoslavii v otnoshenii k sovremennosti, 1860) aroused considerable controversy.

Maksim Tareyev (1866–1934), a teacher of moral theology at the Moscow Academy, argued that the personal inner world of religious experience has nothing to do with the world around, which has its own laws of historical development. Meanwhile Viktor Nesmelov (1863–1920), a teacher at the Kazan Academy, made a unique effort to construct a theological system on an *anthropological basis.

Outside the church, theology, or more precisely religious philosophy, was also developing among certain sections of the intelligentsia, a stratum of individuals concerned to write and speak about the social and political situation in Russia.

Aleksei Khomyakov (1804–60) developed the theme of organic unity and community (cf. The Church Is One, Willits, 1974; see *Sobornost) as the distinctive genius of Orthodoxy. Khomyakov thus became one of the inspirers of the Slavophil movement, which focused attention on the originality and resources of Russian Orthodox religious culture, as opposed to the Westernizers, who as the name suggests looked to Western models of social and political development.

By the 1860s *positivist and *atheist ideas had established predominance among the intelligentsia. Yet some writers, including *Tolstoy and *Dostoyevsky, championed spiritual values, and the lay Orthodox philosopher Vladimir Solovyov (1853–1900) produced a comprehensive religio-philosophical system derived not simply from the 'official' Orthodoxy of the Church Fathers, but from a creative reinterpretation of the faith in the light of modern realities. His system is bound together by the concept of the 'total-unity' of all reality and the concept of 'Godmanhood'. Through the *incarnation, God sanctified all creation, including matter. The whole of creation strives for reunion with God, and human beings have a key role to play in this process.

During the 1890s, the most comprehensive and rigorously scientific positivist worldview so far adopted by the Russian intelligentsia – *Marxism – began to attract an extensive following. Solovyov's own system was of a stature to challenge Marxism, and influenced a whole new generation of the intelligentsia who were growing disillusioned with Marxism's dogmatic *materialism, including Sergei *Bulgakov, Nikolai Berdyayev (1874–1948), Semyon Frank (1877–1950) and Nikolai Lossky (1870–1965). They were part of the turn-of-the-century phenomenon known as the 'new religious consciousness' or the 'Russian religious renaissance'.

Many of these religious philosophers came together in the 1909 collection of essays called Vekhi (Landmarks), which warned in a remarkably prophetic fashion about the likely totalitarian consequences of revolution in Russia.

In 1922 over a hundred intellectuals who were unsympathetic to Marxism were banished from the Soviet Union to the West. They included a large proportion of the heirs of Solovyov. The establishment of the seminary of St Serge in Paris and later that of St Vladimir in New York provided centres where these thinkers could continue their activity and train a new generation of Russian philosophers and theologians in exile.

What followed amongst these men was an attempt at a renewal of Orthodox thought in the light of the lessons of the revolution and of post-revolutionary realities. Broadly speaking, they followed two alternative avenues: re-appraising the Russian Orthodox legacy, or reviving Patristic theology (see *Church Fathers). The main spokesman for the former path was Bulgakov; leading figures following the second path were Fr Georges Florovsky (1893–1979) and Vladimir *Lossky.

Florovsky rejected the idea that Orthodox theology needed to relate to modern philosophy. In his view it was time to revive the quest for Orthodoxy's authentic roots on which Metropolitan Filaret had embarked in the early nineteenth century. He held that Russian Orthodoxy's absorption of Western *scholasticism, *deism, *pietism and *idealism from the sixteenth century had produced a pseudo-morphosis of its real Byzantine heritage. A central theme in the work of Vladimir Lossky is a reappraisal of the concept of sobornost', in order to distinguish between its theological meaning and its socio-political use and abuse.

Bulgakov, meanwhile, was developing his understanding of the created world as a total unity, bound together by 'Sophia' – the wisdom of God – as the principle of creation. Sophia is a third being between God and the world, and from here it is a short step to positing the existence of a fourth person of the Trinity. In the 'Sophia Controversy' among Russian émigré theologians in 1935 Bulgakov was accused of *heresy by the Moscow Patriarchate.

Some have seen the controversy between the two schools as a debate between modernists and traditionalists, or between liberals and conservatives. However, the dispute was not about whether the Orthodox Church needed renewal, or about whether the church should be engaged with the world, but about the basis for such a renewal and engagement.

By the late 1940s the neo-Patristic school had prevailed over the Russian school. The latter was cut off from its roots, while the Patristics could engage with current theology and philosophy in the West on a more cosmopolitan basis. Neo-Patristics also chimed in with counter-cultural trends in Western theology at the time, such as Karl *Barth's theology, with its stress on the transcendence of God.

It was, nevertheless, one of the Russian school, Berdyayev, who became most widely known in the West. It was a happy coincidence that he should arrive in the West at a time when *existentialism was growing in popularity: mutual enrichment followed. Berdyayev distinguishes two realms of reality: spirit, which is living and free; and nature or being, which is passive, the product of the *fall. Humanity's free creative love of God is to be the source of the salvation of humankind and the world.

What, meanwhile, was happening to Orthodox philosophy and theology in the Soviet Union? The Russian Orthodox Church was severely restricted by the state, and while it possessed theological educational establishments it could engage in no study which would relate Orthodoxy to the modern world.

According to the official Marxist-Leninist ideology, religious thought was essentially reactionary and bourgeois. There were, however, one or two individuals who maintained continuity, such as Aleksei Losev (1893–1988) and Sergei Averintsev (1937–2004), who used the vehicle of lectures on such subjects as Byzantine literature and classical philosophy to introduce their students to the thought of Solovyov, Pavel Florensky (1882–1937), Bulgakov and others.

During the last twenty years of the Soviet Union, young converts to Orthodoxy were increasingly concerned to apply their faith to Soviet reality and to employ spiritual resources to tackle problems in their lives. Now in post-communist Russia continuity is being re-established both with the pre-revolutionary tradition and with the more recent work as developed in exile. The younger generation of converts who have been engaged in theological and philosophical enquiry include Yevgeni Barabanov, Mikhail Meerson, Vladimir Zelinsky, Vladimir Bibikhin and Sergei Khoruzhi.

The conditions again exist in Russia for religion to re-enter the public arena. In a context of moral uncertainty, many are seeing Orthodoxy as a potential source of guidelines for personal and social behaviour. The often heated debate about subjects such as, for example, the role of Orthodox education in state schools, is symptomatic of the revived confrontation between those who want religion to remain 'privatized', as one option in a pluralist secular state, and those who would like to see Orthodoxy assume the role of a 'civil religion'.

The Russian Orthodox Church as an institution, however, has hardly started coming to terms with the challenges of new freedoms, or with its new role in a pluralist society, or with its own recent past. In 2000 the church, it is true, produced the first ever exposition of a social doctrine by an Orthodox church: Foundations for a Social Concept for the Russian Orthodox Church (Osnovy sotsial'noi kontseptsii Russkoi Pravoslavnoi Tserkvi). The document affirms a desire to engage with the world, but this proclaimed desire is constantly questioned in the text. The document is predominantly defensive in tone. The dominant theme is that contemporary society is degraded as the result of the rise of irreligious individualism. The text does argue for the uniqueness and dignity of the individual, but this is subordinate to the main aim, which is the protection of traditional identity through resistance to *globalization, liberalization and *secularization.

In its discussion of community, the Social Doctrine refers to sobornost', but does not engage with the history and problematic usage of the term, although critical discussion of this kind is readily available in the writings of the Russian émigré theologians. The issue is still lively: in fundamentalist Orthodox circles in Russia today, for example, sobornost' tends to be used to justify collectivism, Russian national solidarity, and even the suppression of individual rights.

In the wider perspective, the Social Concept contains no discussion of the church's experience under totalitarianism, or of its longer history of adaptability to the requirements of the state.

Bibliography

- A. Blane, Georges Florovsky, Russian Intellectual and Orthodox Churchman (Crestwood, 1993); F. Copleston, Russian Religious Philosophy: Selected Aspects (Notre Dame, 1988); J. M. Edie, J. P. Scanlan, M.-B. Zeldin and G. L. Kline (eds.), Russian Philosophy, vol. 3 (Chicago, 1965); C. Evtuhov, The Cross and the Sickle: Sergei Bulgakov and the Fate of Russian Religious Philosophy (Ithaca and London, 1997); G. Florovsky, The Ways of Russian Theology, 2 vols. (vols. 5 and 6 of the Collected Works) (Belmont, 1979 and 1987); J. D. Kornblatt and R. F. Gustavson (eds.), Russian Religious Thought (Madison and London, 1996); M. Raeff, Russia Abroad: A Cultural History of the Russian Emigration, 1919–1939 (New York, 1990); E. Roberts and A. Shukman (eds.), Christianity for the Twenty-First Century: The Prophetic Writings of Alexander Men (New York, 1996); A. Schmemmann (ed.), Ultimate Questions: An Anthology of Modern Russian Religious Thought (New York, Chicago and San Francisco, 1965); N. Zernov, The Russian Religious Renaissance of the Twentieth Century (London, 1963).

P. M. WALTERS

RUTHERFORD, SAMUEL (1600–61)

Born near Jedburgh, Scotland, Rutherford graduated at Edinburgh in 1621 and was later appointed regent of humanity there. This office he demitted in 1626 after being charged with pre-nuptial fornication. Soon afterwards, he was accepted as a divinity student and inducted in 1627 to the parish of Anwoth, Galloway.

This was done 'without giving engagement to the Bishop', though episcopacy (see *Ministry) had since 1612 been the national church policy. In Rutherford's view, episcopacy brought *Arminianism. He wrote forcibly against that danger in his Exercitationes Apologetica pro Divina Gratia (Apologetical Exercitations for Divine Grace, 1636), published in Amsterdam. This led to invitations to chairs in Dutch institutions, but also to a summons from the notorious Court of High Commission which was incensed by the author's persistent nonconformity.

He was deprived of his pastoral office, forbidden to preach, and exiled to Aberdeen – 'the first in the kingdom put to utter silence', he mourned. Aberdeen to him was full of 'Papists or of men of Gallio's naughty faith'. When in 1638 most Scots rebelled and drew up the National Covenant (see *Covenanters) against Charles I's duplicity and Laud's liturgy, Rutherford hurried down from the north to subscribe his name. In 1639 he became professor of divinity at St Andrews.

His Lex Rex (1644), written in reply to the 'divine right of kings' theory, caused a furore, not least at the Westminster Assembly, to which he made influential contributions. This work asserts the supremacy of the people; that the law, and no royal tyrant, is king; and that unlimited power pertains to God only. With the Restoration the author (though not the book itself) barely escaped the hands of the public hangman. Its doctrine became the constitutional inheritance of democratic countries in modern times, but not before many Covenanters had died for the only King to whom unswerving loyalty was due.

In 1649, with the principle of religious *toleration beginning to find acceptance in England, Rutherford's Free Disputation against Pretended Liberty of Conscience argued that such toleration was against Scripture and common sense. It allowed two religions side by side, and was outrageous ecclesiastically and sinful civilly. The magistrate as God's vicegerent sent offenders to the scaffold, not with the idea of producing spiritual results, but to strengthen the foundations of the civil order.

Rutherford did not recognize the existence of religious minorities; the contempt he expressed for Independents and others in A Free Disputation provoked Milton's charge that 'New Presbyter is but Old Priest writ large'. Rutherford nonetheless came to have misgivings about the assumed infallibility of the ruling Covenanting party.

While there has been a resurgence of interest in his political views in North America, he is now chiefly remembered not for his political theory but for his Letters. Addressed to correspondents of all classes, they still offer spiritual counsel that is both biblical and insightful, thought-provoking and imaginative; and they do so with true compassion born of experience and understanding.

Cited to answer a charge of treason, the dying Rutherford sent the Privy Council notice of non-appearance, stating that he had a prior summons from 'a Superior Judge and Judicatory'.

Bibliography

A. A. Bonar (ed.), Letters of Samuel Rutherford (repr., Edinburgh, 1984); J. Coffey, Politics, Religion and the British Revolutions: The Mind of Samuel Rutherford (Cambridge, 1997); G. D. Henderson, Religious Life in Seventeenth-Century Scotland (Cambridge, 1937); A. Smellie, Men of the Covenant (repr. Edinburgh, 1975).

J. D. DOUGLAS

SABBATH

OT

Sabbath is an important, yet contested theological theme. The likely meaning of šabbāt (שַׁבָּת) is to 'desist' or to 'stop'. It is based on the idea of the divine rest at the climax of God's creative activity (Gen. 2:1–3). This event is adduced as the basis of the 'work break' in the fourth commandment (Exod. 20:8–11). The recasting of the command (Deut. 5:12–15) displays 'amazing interpretive freedom' (Brueggemann) in relocating its basis in the exodus liberation from slavery.

Between the accounts of creation and the giving of the law, there is only one reference to Sabbath (Exod. 14:23); there is no data available to indicate how or whether the day was observed during this period. After the giving of the law there are hints of a religious aspect to Sabbath observance (Lev. 23:3; Num. 28:9–10; Ps. 92).

The Sabbath is described as a perpetual defining 'sign' for Israel (Exod. 31:12–17); preserving this sign brought promised blessing; infringements, threatened judgment. This dimension of Sabbath as a badge of national distinctiveness is most fully articulated in the writings of Ezra-Nehemiah, the prophets of exile (Isa. 58), and the intertestamental period.

NT

Jesus honours the Sabbath by attending synagogue worship; yet also challenges contemporary views of the Sabbath by his words and actions. These frequent and very public challenges to Sabbath custom are difficult to read accurately; they may be attempts to put the Sabbath commandment back on track by tearing away extra-biblical additions, or may challenge the very fabric of Sabbath observance in the light of the newness of the work of Christ. The key text (Mark 2:27–28), with its reference to the relationship between humans and the Sabbath, and Jesus as ‘Lord of the Sabbath’, appears to signal aspects of continuity and discontinuity.

Historically, Christians have viewed Sunday as important. Jesus rose on the first day of the week, Pentecost occurred on that day, and there are hints that it played a significant part in the church’s calendar (Acts 20:7; 1 Cor. 16:2). The strongest reference is Rev. 1:10, where the day is designated ‘The Lord’s Day’. There is no command to ‘keep Sunday special’, or to invest it with any Sabbath-like characteristics; there are signs that the early church met on a daily basis (Acts 2:46–47). It is notable that the bridge-building advice given to Jewish and non-Jewish believers (Acts 15) does not require any form of Sabbath observance.

NT writers outside the Gospels appear to be flexible about the observance of special days (although there is doubt whether they are referring to weekly Sabbaths), seeing them as part of the shadow that has now found its substance in Christ (Rom. 14:5–6; Col 2:16–17). The most extended reflection on Sabbath locates the believer’s rest in our participation in the finished work of Christ (Heb 4:9–11).

Theological positions

The evidence has been read in different ways; conclusions tend to be shaped by wider considerations of the role of Mosaic law in the life of Christians.

Strict Sabbath observance

Sabbatarian groups such as the Seventh-Day Adventists affirm that observing a weekly seventh-day Sabbath is a mark of their identity as the people of God. During the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, a minority of English Baptists also observed the seventh day, as some Anabaptists had done.

Transference

The Sabbath is seen as a ‘creation ordinance’ (Murray), a vital gift for the well-being of humankind. This principle of rest predates the Mosaic law and has continuing force and value for human beings. Sunday or the Lord’s Day is seen as the ‘Christian Sabbath’. In its strongest form this can involve an attempt to reconstruct all of the Torah’s Sabbath regulations.

Celebration

Sunday is a valuable time to pause in gratitude and celebration of the rest offered us in Christ; it is not a day that is bound by detailed prescriptions concerning the minutiae of its use. The rest achieved through Christ’s redemptive work fulfils the law and relocates rest within a relationship with Christ (Matt. 11:28–30).

Bibliography

S. Bacchiocchi, From Sabbath to Sunday (Rome, 1977); W. Brueggemann, ‘Sabbath’, in Reverberations of Faith (Louisville and London, 2002), pp. 180–182; D. A. Carson (ed.), From Sabbath to Lord’s Day (Grand Rapids, 1982); M. J. Dawn, The Sense of Call: A Sabbath Way of Life for Those Who Serve God, the Church, and the World (Grand Rapids 2006); G. F. Hasel, ‘Sabbath’, in ABD, vol. 5, pp. 850–856; J. Murray, Collected Writings, vol. 1 (Edinburgh, 1976), pp. 205–228.

J. D. WOODS

SABELLIANSIM, see MONARCHIANISM

SACRAMENT

The term ‘sacrament’ was not used in the Bible or in the earliest church, although what we would now regard as sacramental worship was at the centre of the life and worship of the church from the beginning. The term that is closest to sacrament in the NT is mysterion, mystery. In the synoptic Gospels we read of ‘the mystery of the kingdom of God’ (Mark 4:11). For Paul the mystery is God’s plan of salvation, revealed in Jesus Christ. Mysterion was also a reality disclosing God's hidden plan (Col. 1:26). It could refer to earthly happenings related to God's great plan, and more generally to secrets that are revealed to the faithful.

The Fathers

The early Fathers of the church were cautious about referring to Christian *worship as a mystery, perhaps because they were uneasy about possible confusion with the pagan 'mystery religions' of the day. Clement of Alexandria spoke of three categories of Christian mysteries, the greater and lesser mysteries, and the supreme mystery, which is Christ himself. The Latin Fathers on the whole tended to speak of sacramentum rather than mysterion. In secular life the word sacramentum referred to the ritual for army recruits, involving an oath of unconditional loyalty. *Tertullian was the first to use sacramentum in a Christian context, specifically in reference to *baptism as the start of a new life following on a binding commitment. Cyprian understood sacramentum in a less military way than Tertullian. For him, sacramentum is a matter of symbols, figures and signs representing spiritual realities. He speaks of the *Eucharist, baptism and marriage as sacraments.

*Augustine understood a sacrament as the 'sign' of a spiritual reality, the visible form of an invisible grace. He distinguished four components, inseparable from one another: the outward and visible element; the virtue, or grace bestowed in the sacrament; the spoken formula or verbum which links the sign with its virtue; and the agent of the sacrament, that is, Christ himself.

After Augustine there was continuing controversy about the number and the nature of the sacraments. Peter *Lombard taught that there were seven sacraments (baptism, confirmation, Eucharist, marriage, ordination, penance and extreme unction), while the Reformers taught that there were only two – baptism and the Eucharist – on the grounds that a sacrament must be specifically instituted and commanded by the Lord. *Thomas Aquinas taught that the sacraments were effective ex opere operato – a way of stressing the objectivity of the sacraments, and their independence of the goodness or otherwise of the priest and the congregation. After Thomas the prevalent legal and juridical thinking resulted in the validity of the sacraments often being seen as depending on the correct performance of the rite in the prescribed form with the proper words and actions by the legally authorized minister. This legalistic understanding of the sacraments became very widespread during the later Middle Ages, sometimes almost totally obscuring a theological understanding of the rites and their significance.

The *Reformation

The Reformers' understanding of the sacraments varied widely. At one extreme were the *Zwinglians, who understood sacraments as no more than visual aids, vivid reminders of past salvific events, at the other, those who saw the sacraments as moments in which the faithful experienced the real presence of Christ with his people. In some traditions, God the Spirit was invoked in an epiclesis to come down and be with his people; in other, particularly Calvinist (see *Reformed theology), traditions the imagery was more in terms of the faithful being lifted up to share in a proleptic way the joys of heaven, and the heavenly banquet in particular. All the major Protestant traditions affirmed a necessary close linkage between word and sacrament. One could not, for instance, have a eucharistic service without the reading of Scripture and preaching. Only thus could the temptation to regard Christian worship as magical be avoided. Some Protestant sects – most notably the *Quakers – are often presented as non-sacramental or antisacramental. There is, however, a strong case that they regard the whole of life as sacramental, every meal as eucharistic, and so forth.

The Eastern churches

The *Eastern churches followed a very different path. For them the term mystery in their liturgies referred to the incarnation, the Eucharist, marriage, baptism and so forth as sacramental. The whole of life and all the events of our salvation should be regarded as sacramental. There should be no argument about whether there are two, or seven, or many sacraments

The liturgical movement

At the heart of the modern *liturgical revival is a recovery of the sense that sacraments are mysteries in which participants encounter the living triune God. Disciples of today, just as the disciples of long ago, in encountering Jesus come into touch with a mystery which they know to be the mystery of God's being and acts, the secret of the universe and the meaning of life. In the primary sense, then, we should speak of *Jesus Christ as being the sacrament. In Christ, the *incarnate Son, through his physical, historical and material humanity we encounter the mystery and the reality of God himself. In a secondary sense the *church, which is the body of Christ, should be regarded as a sacrament. It is the community in space and time, the visible *fellowship in which the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ is encountered, and as his body it represents Christ sacramentally to the world. Thus the church is to be understood as the sacrament of the unity of all humankind. It shows in sacramental form the *saving purpose of God for all humanity; it is a sign of *hope for all, the purpose of God for all humanity, a working model (to use a rather crude image) of what God wills for everyone: loving fellowship with God and with one another. And the church is a sacrament because the visible empirical reality of the fellowship points beyond itself to its Lord, to Christ.

The sacraments of the church are also sacraments, the radical Roman Catholic theologian, *Schillebeeckx argues, precisely because they are also acts of Christ himself. 'A sacrament,' he writes, 'is primarily and fundamentally a personal act of Christ himself which reaches and involves us in the form of an institutional act performed by a person in the Church who . . . is empowered to do so by Christ himself' (Christ, the Sacrament, p. 62).

The modern liturgical movement has led to a significant coming together of the major traditions of understanding of the sacraments, most clearly perhaps in documents such as the Faith and Order Commission's convergence document, Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry, agreed at Lima in 1982. But it is also fair to say that these new agreements between the major churches about the nature and celebration of the sacraments have not led to many serious moves towards unity or greater intercommunion.

Bibliography

D. M. Baillie, The Theology of the Sacraments (Edinburgh, 1957); P. F. Bradshaw (ed.), The New SCM Dictionary of Liturgy and Worship (London, 2002); D. B. Forrester, J. I. McDonald and G. Tellini, Encounter with God (London, 1996); P. T. Forsyth, The Church and the Sacraments (London, 1917); O. C. Quick, The Christian Sacraments (London, 1927); E. Schillebeeckx, Christ, the Sacrament of the Encounter with God (London, 1983);

A. Schmemmann, Introduction to Liturgical Theology (New York, 1986); idem, The Eucharist: Sacrament of the Kingdom (New York, 1988); M. Thurian, The Mystery of the Eucharist (London, 1983).

D. B. FORRESTER

SACRIFICE

Sacrifice is a central component of Christ's work of reconciling humans to God: Jesus Christ saw his death in terms of Jewish sacrifice, as the sacrificial lamb of Passover; God provided the Israelite institution of sacrifice; Israel made sacrifice to God through its priesthood. Sacrifice is used both literally and metaphorically in the OT and classical philosophers. The later prophets and some classical philosophers, particularly Neoplatonists, made ethical criticisms of blood sacrifice, arguing that it was unworthy of God. For example, Porphyry rejected animal sacrifice as killing animals was deemed immoral, and God could not demand an immoral act as worship. Jewish thinkers did not try to explain how sacrifice could be expiatory, i.e. how it could remove sin and *guilt from Israel. The early Christians felt compelled to develop explanations for the efficacy of Christ's sacrifice because it was considered to be unique, final and universal, i.e. once for all. This was in stark contrast to pre-Christian views of sacrifice.

Patristic and medieval views

*Patristic theologians understood sacrifice as aversion of divine punishment, propitiation and expiation. Several patristic authors focused on Christ's sacrifice as breaking the curse of God upon sinners through Christ himself becoming accursed in our place. *Athanasius articulated the view of sacrifice as propitiation of God as follows: 'The death of Christ was a sacrifice offered by God himself to satisfy the demands of his truthfulness and pay the debt to his integrity.' The underlying problem is that God, being holy, perfectly good and true, cannot have fellowship with sinful, imperfect humans. The actual problem, however, is not intrinsic to the nature of God, but due to the tainting of humans by original *sin. God can only be God if he always acts in accordance with all his attributes. Humans cannot make themselves holy, so if God and humans were ever to be reconciled, the initiative had to come from God.

Only God can effect expiation of sin. *Gregory of Nazianzus articulated the view of sacrifice as expiation when he stated that Christ cleansed the world of sin in his role as high priest and sacrificial victim. Medieval Western Christians emphasized Christ's role as sacrificial victim due to the stress on Christ's humanity in the early Latin Fathers. In his defence of the propitiation, *Thomas Aquinas makes a link with the theory that Christ's death was a 'satisfaction' on behalf of humans.

*Reformed theology

John *Calvin's theory of the atonement brings together the three roles of sacrifice in Christ's work. Calvin's theory is based upon consideration of the entire life of Christ on earth from his conception to his ascension. This is demonstrated by the fact that when he asks 'How has Christ abolished sin, banished the separation between us and God, and acquired righteousness to render God favourable and kindly towards us?', he replies that Christ 'has achieved this for us by the whole course of his obedience' (Institutes, II.16.5). Christ in his *obedience represents the people of God because he has taken sinful human nature upon himself. Following the authors of the NT, John Calvin states the propitiatory nature of sacrifice thus: 'Christ paid a debt to the justice of God by taking the punishment which the law of God demanded from those who breached it' (Institutes, II.16.3–5). Calvin's notion of sacrifice as penal *substitution rests on Christ's role as High Priest, one of his three offices.

Theological and ethical problems

Christ's death as a sacrifice needs to be seen in the context of the saving work of the *trinitarian God if it is not to be abused ethically. *Jesus Christ could only be the one, holy and perfect sacrifice in our place because he was fully divine and fully human. A merely human Jesus could not be a suitable sacrifice, not least because human sacrifice was not permitted in Israel, nor could he have been sinless. Thus recurring controversies in the churches over *Arianism can be understood as involving battles over the very possibility of salvation through propitiation. Propitiation has often been a subject of controversy in modern Western theology, this being due to its link to the notion of divine *wrath, which itself has come under suspicion. *Evangelical theologians have consistently argued that sacrifice has a necessary propitiatory element because God's wrath is personal and is an expression of his holiness. At the same time propitiation is precisely an expression of God's *love because he has restored the possibility of fellowship between a holy *God and sinful humans.

Since the *Enlightenment, sacrifice has fallen out of favour among some Western theologians as a metaphor for understanding Christ's *atonement. One reason for this includes horror at blood sacrifice of animals. In response, it must be said that seeing Christ as sacrificial victim made sense to converts to Catholic Christianity from sixteenth-century Aztec civilization, whose religion practised human and animal sacrifices. In such a cultural setting, the view that Christ's sacrifice is the end of all sacrifices carries a strong meaning. In contemporary African Christianity, the Israelite sacrificial system and Christ's fulfilment of it is intelligible in ways not possible for Western Christians. Blood sacrifice of animals is still made in Nigeria for example.

In post-war Germany, repugnance at Nazi rhetoric of sacrificial dying for one's country has made the concept of sacrifice a difficult one to use with integrity. Sacrifice needs to be carefully defined because the understanding of the Christian life depends theologically upon *Christology. Christ's sacrifice was accomplished with an atoning purpose. Humans are invited to present themselves as living sacrifices to God and to imitate Christ in the power of the *Spirit. *Feminist theology as well as contemporary psychology tend to be critical of sacrifice if it requires that the believer lives in such a way that he or she is destroyed and unable to live a good life. Christology therefore needs to be articulated with an awareness of its relationship to models of the *Christian life, and in turn their relationship to contemporary and historic models of the good life outside the church.

See also: LAW; SALVATION.

Bibliography

C. Baxter, 'The Cursed Beloved: A Reconsideration of Penal Substitution', in J. Goldingay (ed.), Atonement Today (London, 1995), pp. 54–72; E. Fergusson, 'Sacrifice', in E. Fergusson (ed.), Encyclopaedia of Early Christianity (New York and London, 1997), pp. 1015–1018; P. S. Fiddes, Past Event and Present Salvation: The Christian Idea of Atonement (London, 1989); J. B. Green and M. D. Baker (eds.), Recovering the Scandal of the Cross: Atonement in New Testament and Contemporary Contexts (Carlisle, 2003); C. E. Gunton, The Actuality of Atonement: A Study of Metaphor, Rationality and the Christian Tradition (Edinburgh, 1988); S. Jeffery, M. Ovey and A. Sach, Pierced for Our Transgressions (Nottingham, 2007); P. Jenkins, The New Faces of Christianity: Believing the Bible in the Global South (Oxford, 2006); J. R. W. Stott, The Cross of Christ (Leicester, 1989); T. F. Torrance, Scottish Theology: From John Knox to John McLeod Campbell (Edinburgh, 1996); F. Young, Sacrifice and the Death of Christ (London, 1975).

C. A. E. MOSELEY

SAINT

In the OT, God's people are from time to time called 'saints', 'holy ones', as being set apart to the holy God. In the NT, 'saints' (hagioi) becomes the commonest title used of Christians in general, for the more particular reason that they have been consecrated to God by the atonement of Christ and the gift of the Holy Spirit. However, it is not surprising that the expression came in time to be applied especially to people who showed conspicuous marks of their consecration to God, or of the influence of the Holy Spirit upon them, by their character or conduct.

The inclusion of saints in the liturgical calendar began in the second century. Originally these were local observances of the death-days of *martyrs. The dedication of churches to saints began in the same way, with churches built over the tombs of martyrs. As the fame of martyrs and saints spread, observance of their festivals became more widespread, and universal calendars of saints for the Western and Eastern churches eventually resulted. Biblical saints who were not already commemorated as martyrs were inserted, and in the East this included OT saints. After the *Nestorian controversy, feasts of the Blessed Virgin *Mary, as being the theotokos (bearer of God), became especially numerous and popular.

In the Church of Rome, a saint qualifies for inclusion under that title in the calendar when he or she has been canonized by the pope. The requirements for canonization are heroic virtue and miracles wrought in response to the saint's intercession. Heroic virtue contributes to the 'treasury of *merits' (see *Purgatory). Miracles are believed to occur at the saint's tomb or through his or her relics or *images, or at shrines where the saint is said to have appeared, and these miracles are attributed to the saint's intercession.

Direct requests to a saint for his or her intercession or for other benefits are what is meant by 'the invocation of saints'. The practice implies that the saints can hear such requests and know how to answer them. The practice was certainly in existence by the fourth century, and was eventually introduced into the liturgy, both Eastern and Western. It was abolished by the Reformers, as equivalent to prayer, and tending to treat the saints as gods, and hence inconsistent with the sole *mediatorship of Christ.

Because of the vast numbers of saints' days, and the legends and abuses associated with them, the Reformers were inclined to remove saints from the calendar altogether, but in England and Sweden festivals of NT saints and All Saints' Day were retained.

See also: COMMUNION OF SAINTS; SANCTIFICATION.

Bibliography

W. E. Addis and T. Arnold, A Catholic Dictionary (London, 1960); P. Brown, The Cult of the Saints (Chicago, 1981); P. D. Clarke and T. Claydon (eds.), Sainthood and Sanctity, Studies in Church History 47 (Woodbridge, 2011); K. Donovan, 'The Sanctoral', in C. P. M. Jones et al. (eds.), The Study of Liturgy (London, 1978); M. Perham, The Communion of Saints (London, 1980).

R. T. BECKWITH

SALVATION

'Salvation' is given a central place in Christian faith by the very name, 'Jesus', meaning in its Hebrew form (Yeshua) 'YHWH is salvation' (see Matt. 1:21). Soteriology (from soter, saviour, and soteria, salvation) is therefore the doctrine of salvation.

In the OT, the primary story of salvation is the exodus. It was also a '*redemption' (a setting free). But the exodus was not only Israel's salvation from slavery; it also led to the covenant at Sinai. God had acted in *grace, but that led to obligations for Israel to obey God's *law. As they were faithful, Israel experienced God's salvation in shalom (peace and prosperity), but their unfaithfulness led to exile in Babylon. Yet God was still righteous, that is, faithful to his covenant, and therefore was the 'Saviour' who brought them back to the land (Isa. 43:11; 45:21).

The Jewish people then developed an expectation of a new era of salvation, when God would intervene to establish his just rule (or 'kingdom') over the earth and re-establish the kingdom of Israel. Out of that came the Christian hope of the NT, that the rule or *kingdom of God which has already come in *Jesus has yet to come in glory. Salvation was therefore no longer a national salvation for Israel, but salvation for the world, including the hope of *resurrection from the dead and even 'the new heavens and the new earth' (Rev. 21:1; cf. Isa. 66:22). This was now a *hope for eternal salvation in 'the age to come'.

The Greek verb 'to save' (sōzō) includes the connotation of 'to heal' and is used in the Gospels for the healing miracles of Jesus. But salvation cannot be restricted to physical healing, for Jesus linked it to the forgiveness of sin (Mark 2:3–12; see *Guilt and forgiveness). Salvation is not merely the restoration of health and wealth, but at its heart has to do with our reconciliation to God. In the Pauline epistles, salvation will come in the future at the end of the age (Rom. 13:11). But it is assured now in the present to those who have faith in Jesus, confessing him to be the risen Lord (Rom. 10:9). This knowledge of present salvation is effected through the power of the *gospel (Rom. 1:16), which declares God's past completed act of salvation in the death and *resurrection of Jesus so that we can say that by grace we 'have been saved' (Eph. 2:5). The crucial moment of salvation then was when, on the *cross, Christ died for our sins (1 Cor. 15:1–5). In fundamental agreement with that, the Gospel of John also presents Jesus as 'the Saviour of the world' (4:42).

Several aspects arising from the biblical concept of salvation have been explored in Christian theology.

Salvation and atonement. First, soteriology centres on the doctrine of the *atonement, treated in the West since *Anselm as a distinct doctrine. The word 'at-one-ment', coined by Tyndale to translate katallagē (reconciliation), has since acquired the meaning of the Hebrew kpr or Greek hilaskomai, to propitiate or expiate, which provides a biblical basis for Anselm's key concept, 'satisfaction'. Christ became human to provide *satisfaction to God as our representative, for our debt of honour. But other aspects of atonement include *victory over the powers of evil (*Aulén's Christus Victor theme) and the way in which God's love is demonstrated by the cross (associated with *Abelard). Except for the particular *Calvinist tradition stemming from the Synod of *Dort (1619), all Christian traditions have held that the atonement was for all, but that that did not imply *universalism, the final salvation of all.

Salvation and justification. Secondly, soteriology acquired a new focus on *justification at the *Reformation. Luther's rediscovery of justification by faith involved wrestling with the puzzling question: how can God be just and yet justify the ungodly? As the Reformation progressed, the *Reformers generally embraced the doctrine of penal *substitution as the way to link 'subjective soteriology' (justification and *sanctification) to objective soteriology (the atonement). God in Christ not only offered satisfaction to God (as Anselm taught) by giving God the obedience we had failed to give, but he also took our place in taking the punishment we deserved. This standard Reformation doctrine has been hotly debated since the nineteenth century. But what is clear is that the moment of justification by faith has been generally considered in evangelical Protestantism to be the moment of salvation when the sinner passes from death to life.

Final salvation. With the recovery of the structure of NT (already/not yet) *eschatology in the twentieth century, there has also come a new appreciation that the expected salvation at the end of the age is to be cosmic and physical and not just spiritual. The influence of *Hellenistic thinking in the early church led to a dualism between the physical and the spiritual, so that whereas the Jewish idea of salvation was more physical, the Christian idea was 'spiritual'. It was the saving of 'souls' and to enjoy the beatific *vision of God in heaven. But while the NT certainly speaks of the dying Christian going to be 'with the Lord' (Phil. 1:23), it is clear that final salvation is to be a salvation of whole persons in the redeemed *creation. Some theologians now embrace universalism (the salvation of all), contrary to the historic doctrine of the church, or inclusivism (the salvation of some who have not believed in Christ).

Present salvation. Christian theology speaks of present salvation in the light of final (eschatological) salvation. For the individual, present salvation includes not only justification but regeneration as the beginning of *sanctification. There is not only a change in the believer's relationship to God through forgiveness, but that is necessarily accompanied by real changes in the believer's life, both in external action, and in internal motivation. Although never complete in this life, present salvation includes release from the dominance of sinful pride and self-centredness as the *saints (that is to say, all Christians, according to 1 Cor. 1:2) increase in sanctity. There is a new awareness today that such present salvation also needs to be understood more corporately within the community of the *church, the people of God.

Bibliography

Doctrine Commission of the General Synod of the Church of England, The Mystery of Salvation (London, 1995); W. Foerster and G. Fohrer, TDNT VII, pp. 965–1024; E. M. B. Green, The Meaning of Salvation (London, 1965); P. A. Rainbow, The Way of Salvation (Milton Keynes, 2005); G. Wainwright, For Our Salvation (Grand Rapids, 1997); D. F. Wells, The Search for Salvation (Leicester, 1978).

T. A. NOBLE

SALVATION ARMY

Founded in 1865 by William and Catherine Booth, the Salvation Army was formerly known as the East London Revival Society, the East London Christian Mission and the Christian Mission. In 1878, a draft copy of the organization's annual report read, 'The Christian Mission is a Volunteer Army.' By replacing the word 'volunteer' with 'salvation', Booth christened the movement, captured the spirit of an imperialistic age and encapsulated the missional activism, public engagement and commitment to the *priesthood of all believers which constitute Salvationist theology.

Called to evangelize 'the last, the lost and the least', the Army launched new congregations, innovative models of social service and imaginative methods of social activism. By 1884, the movement had more than 900 centres in Britain and Ireland and was established in thirteen countries worldwide, including America, Australia and India. 'In contemplating Victorian religion,' Owen Chadwick argues, 'we need to remember the Salvation Army as well as Oxford University.' With more than 15,000 centres in 111 countries and over one million soldiers, the Salvation Army is one of Protestantism's largest denominations and the world's largest non-governmental provider of social care.

While subject to an array of influences, William Booth's *Methodist heritage provided the Army's theological impetus. As part of the founding deeds (1878) and successive versions of the Salvation Army Act of Parliament (1931–80), the eleven Articles of Faith frame the movement's theology. Proclaiming Christ's *atonement to the whole world, the *Arminian emphasis proposes a radical view of faith whereby *salvation is offered to the 'whosoever' and is subsequently dependent 'upon continued obedient faith in Christ'.

The call to personal holiness provides the soteriological next step. 'Holiness to the Lord is to us a fundamental truth,' declared Booth, 'it stands in the front rank of our doctrines.' Influenced by North American *holiness teachers such as James Caughey, Charles *Finney and Phoebe *Palmer, William and Catherine placed women in the pulpit, pushed the chapel into the street, paired preaching with social action and pressed *Wesley's notion of 'social holiness' to the limit. By the early twentieth century, a theology of 'second blessing' had become standard Salvationist orthodoxy. Where God's saving work in conversion effects a primary blessing in the sinner's life, this secondary blessing, sometimes called the *baptism in the Spirit or the blessing of a clean heart, brings about 'sanctification', 'holiness' or 'Christian perfection'.

A Wesleyan response to the perceived dangers of *antinomianism within Reformed theology, the Arminian emphasis upon the role of free will has been said to undermine Salvationist soteriology; the danger of a lapse into salvation by works creating tension with the concurrent commitment to *justification by faith.

The movement's soteriology, combined with its inherent pragmatism, provided the foundations for subsequent missional success, doctrinal development and ecclesial organization. Prioritizing *missiology above ecclesiology, the Army considered itself part of the church, as opposed to being a church. Freed from ecclesial convention, the movement borrowed language from other institutions, most notably the armed forces. The use of military metaphors led to the adoption of distinctive uniforms, public parades, marching bands, the terms, 'soldier' and 'officer', to denote member and minister and a direct chain of command to the organization's international leader, the General. The resulting method of governance has more in common with Roman Catholicism than Protestantism or evangelicalism (see *Church government).

Coinciding with a renewed sense of *ecumenism, and addressed to the World Council of Churches, Philip Needham's Community in Mission (1987) outlined the distinctive vision and contribution of the Salvation Army within the worldwide church and proved to be a defining moment in the movement's growing ecclesiological self-awareness.

The Salvation Army is ecclesologically noted for its view of the *sacraments. Although initially observed, by 1883 conflicting theologies within the ranks, growing controversy concerning infant baptism and Booth's conviction that sacramental practice was not essential to salvation, led to Communion (see *Eucharist) and *baptism being set aside for the sake of mission. While more recent statements have sought to articulate theological justifications for the position, the stance is not prohibitive and Salvationists remain at liberty to take part in the sacraments in other contexts. More importantly, the absence of these rituals does not negate the belief in Christ's real presence within the movement. In a certain sense, the Salvation Army is highly sacramental, believing that Christ is present in every act of mission and ministry.

Discussions abound as to the future identity and direction of the movement. Growth in the Majority World, the challenge of post-Christian cultures, the growth of sizeable renewal movements and tensions arising from autocratic governance amidst an increasingly diverse and democratic membership represent just some of the challenges and opportunities facing the movement. However, through all of this the Salvation Army continues to 'preach the gospel of Jesus Christ and meet human needs in his name'.

Bibliography

W. Booth, In Darkest England and The Way Out (London, 1890); R. J. Green, The Life and Ministry of William Booth, Founder of the Salvation Army (Nashville, 2005); P. Needham, Community in Mission: A Salvationist Ecclesiology (London, 1987); R. Sandall,

A. Wiggins and F. Coutts, The History of the Salvation Army, 5 vols. (New York, 1947–73).

R. Rook

SALVATION-HISTORY

In the mid-twentieth century there were two main interpretations of the relation of the biblical message to the events of *history. For R. *Bultmann, the historical basis underlying the Christian gospel or '*kerygma' was not accessible to the historian because of what he regarded as the lack of reliable evidence; in any case, to enquire after it is illegitimate for the theologian, because that would mean that *faith would be dependent on the findings of historians. Therefore, the gospel is seen as a message which announces the bare fact of the coming of the Christ, but which is essentially a challenge to the hearer to respond to the possibility of authentic existence by making himself open to the future. This 'demythologized' version may appear to conserve the bare minimum of the gospel, namely that *justification is by faith alone in Christ who is God's word of *grace to sinful man; but the appearance is deceptive. It requires us to accept a bare word which is independent of history, and, for all Bultmann's emphasis on the fact of Christ, there is no real saving event and hence no real act of grace. Over against this view, which in effect confines revelation to the word, stands the view which sees revelation as taking place in words and events.

'Salvation history' (Ger. Heilsgeschichte) is a term which refers to the series of historical events which are interpreted by Christian faith as the specific acts of God to save his people. The terminology is particularly associated in the past with J. C. K. von Hofmann (1810–77) and Adolf *Schlatter, but in post-Second World War theology its main protagonist was Oscar Cullmann (1902–99) who deliberately presented an alternative understanding of the Bible to that of Bultmann. Cullmann insisted that the structure of biblical thinking is historical, and that *revelation takes place through a series of events in which God is active. What actually happened matters for the believer. To be sure, Cullmann insisted that the recognition of the events as salvation-history is a matter of faith and not of historical proof, but this does not affect the point that God is now seen to be active in the world in the historical incarnation, sacrificial death, resurrection and parousia of his Son. Thus the biblical story tells of a pattern of events in which God is active, stretching from creation to the consummation, with Christ's coming as the midpoint of time, the pivot of history. Although Bultmann's followers continue to deny that salvation-history is a category used by the biblical writers (or at least by the ones whom they regard as offering the kernel of biblical teaching), there can be little doubt that this is the correct framework for the interpretation of the Bible. It has been found particularly congenial by evangelical scholars, who have seen in it a viable alternative to the Bultmannian *existentialist, demythologizing approach which dissolves history away.

The most notable evangelical attempt to write a NT theology from this standpoint is that of G. E. Ladd (1911–82). Ladd insists that revelation takes place through events, but only as they are interpreted by the word. In this way justice is done to the two modes of divine revelation in deed (supremely in Jesus Christ) and in word. Since a limitation of revelation to the word would be to deny the reality of the events of the incarnation and atonement, evangelical theology cannot do other than recognize the insights of the salvation-historical approach. With the emergence of the co-called 'new quest' and 'third quest' for the '*historical Jesus' and the fading of existentialism, it may be thought that the salvation-history perspective has been vindicated. Despite continuing historical scepticism among some scholars, the challenge to the closed causal continuum which was assumed by Bultmann and others to be 'scientific' has encouraged an understanding of 'historicity' which is open to divine action. Although moving beyond the salvation-history school, scholars such as N. T. *Wright may be seen as their heirs.

Bibliography

O. Cullmann, Christ and Time (London, 1951); idem, Salvation as History (London, 1967); G. E. Ladd, A Theology of the New Testament (Grand Rapids, 1974); D. H. Wallace, 'Oscar Cullmann', in P. E. Hughes (ed.), Creative Minds in Contemporary Theology (Grand Rapids, 1966).

I. H. MARSHALL

SAMOSATA, PAUL OF (c. 260–72)

Paul of Samosata was a bishop of Antioch who was tried for heresy on more than one occasion in the years 264–8 and condemned for what is now known as *adoptionism. Paul was appointed procurator ducenarius (effectively the civil governor) of the city by Queen Zenobia of Palmyra, who seized it in 260 and held it for twelve years. He was deposed when the Emperor Aurelian restored Roman rule there in 272 and no more was heard of him. Probably much of the opposition to him was politically motivated, but theological factors certainly played a role as well. Paul apparently thought of the divine *Logos as part of the unitary being of God, not as a distinct person, which dwelt in the man Jesus of Nazareth, giving him extraordinary powers but without making him God. The baptism of Jesus seems to have been the key moment in this process, which led to a fusion of wills between God and Christ which cannot now be separated. Jesus overcame the sin of Adam by his own efforts and achieved salvation by the merits of his works, making him a model for Christians who are also adopted as children of God. It seems that Paul described this union with God in terms of consubstantiality (homoousia), a notion which was condemned by one of the councils of Antioch. At the First Council of *Nicaea in 325 this proved to be an embarrassment, because the fathers of that council wanted to use the same word to describe the relationship of the Son to the Father in the Godhead, and opponents of the doctrine cited the condemnation of Paul as an argument against this. Paul had a small following which existed for at least a generation after his death, but it never amounted to much and faded away after 325.

See also: CHRISTOLOGY.

Bibliography

J. N. D. Kelly, Early Christian Doctrines (London, 1977); U. M. Lang, 'The Christological Controversy at the Synod of Antioch in 268/9', Journal of Theological Studies 51, 2000, pp. 54–80; F. W. Norris, 'Paul of Samosata, procurator ducenarius', Journal of Theological Studies 35, 1984, pp. 50–70; R. L. Sample, 'The Christology of the Council of Antioch (268 CE) Reconsidered', Church History 48, 1979, pp. 18–26.

G. L. BRAY

SANCTIFICATION

Sanctification defines the manner or process by which objects, places and/or people are rendered holy and acceptable to God. In the history of Christian thought, therefore, the term has periodically been used in a ritualistic as well as doctrinal and theological sense.

In the primitive church, sanctification was initially associated with holiness of the heart (1 Clement 29:1). Christians are called to be *saints (1 Clement, Prologue, 59:3; Hermas, Shepherd, Visions 3:1; Didache 10:5). Because they are holy, they aim to ‘do all that belongs to sanctification’ (1 Clement 30:1; cf. Barnabas 15:7). This includes personal discipline (1 Clement 32:2) but especially good works of caring for the poor and needy (Hermas, Shepherd, Mandates 8:9f.; 2:4). Christians will be highly visible in their pagan environment – theirs is a holiness in the midst of the world (Diognetus Sf.), therefore they must witness to God and glorify him by their daily behaviour (2 Clement 13:22; Ignatius, Eph. 14:2; Polycarp, Ep. 10:2f.; Aristides, Apology 15:4f.). Throughout this initial formational stage in the early church, therefore, sanctification was both a soteriological (see *Salvation) and an ethical concept, used to define the *calling and the conduct of a Christian.

Although for a considerable period of time sanctification continues within the Greek church to be a soteriological concept linked to baptism, its moral meaning slowly fades away to be replaced by the indigenous terminology of ‘virtue’. At the same time, the ritual usage of sanctification begins to find fuller expression in the consecration of priests, liturgical vestments, the elements of the Eucharist, water, oil and buildings.

For *Clement of Alexandria the saint is still the Christian, in so far as his body and soul are the temple of the holy God and he continues to be sanctified in the school of the Saviour. His good works lie in the spiritual and material uplifting of his brethren. For that, he does not have to leave his situation; as a pilgrim, he ‘lives in the city as if it was the desert’ (Strom. VII. 7, 3). Two hundred years later, for Theodoret of Cyrillus (c. 393–c. 458) the ‘saints’ are the small band of athletes in *asceticism who, preferably living in the desert, have distinguished themselves by brilliant feats of abstinence which are recommended for imitation. Not only has the term ‘sanctification’ disappeared; its application to the Christian life in terms of being and doing have also changed out of recognition.

In the Latin church, *Tertullian restores something of the moral aspect of sanctification, but limits its application by straightforwardly identifying it with sexual abstinence, ‘either from birth or from rebirth’, and especially with the rejection of a second marriage of the widowed. *Augustine, in particular, re-emphasizes the soteriological aspect: accusing the Pelagians of the reduction of *justification to forgiveness of sins (the believer looking after his future moral life himself). Augustine claims that God’s saving grace comprises two gifts, forgiveness and the infusion of love (Rom. 5:5), which restore and equip man for his future moral life. For the Latin ear, ‘justification’ (making righteous) can never denote a merely declarative forgiveness of sins; it includes the effective transformation (sanctification) of the person. Thus, following Augustine, Catholic theologians normally include sanctification with the doctrine of justification, historically defining the latter as if it were the former (cf. Council of *Trent, Session VI), and traditionally emphasizing the reality and evidence of change in a Christian.

In the Middle Ages, both *Bernard of Clairvaux and *Thomas Aquinas recognize and support Paul’s translation of the ritual meaning of sanctification into a moral one. Like Tertullian, Bernard equates sanctification with personal discipline and self-control. Thomas, however, recovers the richer content of the term. He expounds it as threefold: purification from sin, confirmation in the good and dedication to the service of God (Summa Theologica III: 102:4; II/II: 81:8).

The ambivalence concerning sanctification arising out of the Latin concept of justification undoubtedly helped to spark the Protestant *Reformation: were human works necessary for salvation or not? To what extent was sanctification dependent solely on God’s *grace, and when did sanctification occur? *Luther re-emphasizes declarative justification as the forgiveness of sins, but he links this closely with sanctification or *regeneration which in turn leads to good works. We must be made good in order to do good, not do good in order to become good (Christian Liberty; cf. Melanchthon’s Apology). Originally, Luther insists that good works follow from faith automatically, as fruit from a tree, whereas *Melanchthon (and *Calvin) urge the continuing necessity of teaching or exhortation (the ‘third use of the law’) to prompt the believer to good works. Later in his life, Luther resolutely fought against *antinomians who failed to teach sanctification as the necessary consequence of justification. The Reformation determined civil vocation 'as the field of sanctification, good works and Christian perfection' (*Augsburg Confession, article 27) and – against popular misconceptions – postulated a progress in sanctification, although perfection would never be attained here on earth.

Calvin described the Christian life which follows justification and regeneration or *repentance in terms of mortification, meditation on the future life and the study of piety. In his Institutes (III. iii.14; III. xiv.9), he defines sanctification as the process by which we are 'more and more' being 'consecrated to the Lord in true purity of life' and 'our hearts formed to obedience to the law' by the indwelling of Christ through the *Holy Spirit.

Reformation theology in the seventeenth century continued to answer the former ambiguity of the doctrine of sanctification by attempting to integrate sanctification into an ordo salutis, or order of salvation. A series of sequential steps in the theology of grace was identified, beginning with *predestination, and proceeding via *calling, to justification, sanctification and ultimately glorification. This ordering of salvation by grace became a distinctive part of *Reformed theology and was highly influential in the development of Reformed thought, especially in England.

The section of the Edwardian Book of Homilies written by *Cranmer for the Church of England taught that justification must be completed in sanctification and holiness, something that was only possible for those regenerated by divine grace. *Hooker in his writings distinguishes between habitual and actual sanctification. The possession by the believer of the habits of faith, hope and love which are expected of the 'saints' is 'habitual sanctification', whereas the specific actions performed by the sanctified are examples of actual sanctification (N. Voak, Richard Hooker and Reformed Theology, p. 175). Hooker's view that sanctification has a qualitative effect on human behaviour, allowing them to abstain from all mortal sins, can be seen reflected in John *Wesley's initial thoughts on sanctification and what he would later term 'entire sanctification'.

Alongside *Anglican thinking, *Puritanism strongly directed Christian attention to the practice of sanctification. *Pietism reacted against the intellectualism of some Lutheran orthodoxy, fighting the 'twin pernicious errors that sanctification was neither possible nor necessary at this time' (Spener). This concern was shared by the early *Methodists as evidenced by John Fletcher of Madeley's famous 'Checks to Antinomianism' in which he insists that 'Christ is not a minister of sin but a saviour from sin.'

John Wesley's doctrine of sanctification was developed from within an *Arminian as opposed to Calvinistic framework. He stresses sanctification to the extent that 'full sanctification' is described as a 'second grace' by which believers are made perfect, not only with 'holiness begun but finished holiness' (cf. sermon 35 of his Forty-Four Sermons, and Charles Wesley's hymn 'God of All Power, and Truth, and Grace'). Wesley's doctrine of entire sanctification raised several key questions concerning the nature of grace and the participation of human endeavour in the process of salvation. Wesley taught that sanctification was possible before death, although he never claimed it for himself: he insisted that sanctification was more likely to occur, following justification, at the end of a long and disciplined quest.

This view was the received evangelical view up until the early 1830s, at which time a new teaching concerning sanctification by grace was introduced which appeared to promise a short cut to sanctification. Catherine Booth, who was persuaded of this teaching, wrote that sanctification is not a matter of waiting for 'a great and mighty work', but was instead an act of 'simple reception'. The underlying evangelical belief is that God gives the needed faith whenever it is needed; consequently, holiness is available to those of faith without having to wait for it.

From here, there is development to the *holiness (Keswick) movement of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries which stressed 'victorious living', not by human effort but by complete reliance on the strength of Christ living in the believer. The fact that in 1885 some 1,500 to 2,000 people attended the Keswick Convention, whereas by 1907 there were between 5,000 and 6,000, gives some indication of the growing strength of the movement. The unity and commitment of the holiness movement challenged many of the divisive beliefs about sanctification defended on doctrinal grounds by Calvinists and Arminians, and in so doing, managed to create a common Christian experience which later supported the development of the ecumenical movement.

In spite of its prominence in the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries through the rise of the *evangelical movement, many major twentieth-century theologians either ignored the doctrine of sanctification, or gave it only cursory consideration, arbitrarily stressing certain individual aspects, excluding others. For example, Karl *Barth sees sanctification strictly as a work of God only, denying the participation of man as well as the idea of progress; he complements his treatise, however, with a highly original paragraph on vocation to witness, in which he calls for the synergism of the believer with Christ. Emil *Brunner presents a balanced view, but, like Paul *Tillich, rejects the commandments as guiding principles for sanctification.

The one noticeable exception to this is in the field of Christian *ethics. 'Sanctification means driving out the world from the Church as well as separating the Church from the world' (D. Bonhoeffer, The Cost of Discipleship, p. 324). Theologians such as *Bonhoeffer and *Hauerwas express sanctification in terms of community rather than individual salvation. Both, however, have insisted that the language and practice of sanctification have become too 'spiritual'. Hauerwas claims that it is something that people believe that they can will or become if they just try hard enough. The use of the language of sanctification as a means of speaking of justice and equality in community and before God has led to a recovery of the eschatological dimension of the doctrine as part of its soteriological framework.

Sanctification has recently been evaluated and affirmed as a common doctrine of both the Lutheran and the Catholic Church in the Joint Declaration on the Doctrine of Justification (signed in 1999). There have similarly been cautious steps in discerning common ground concerning sanctification between Eastern and Western theologies of grace and salvation. Tentative comparisons have been drawn between the understanding of the doctrine of theosis and the doctrine of sanctification in ongoing dialogues between the Lutheran World Federation and the Orthodox community.

Sanctification as a work of God's grace remains a part of mainstream Christian doctrine, although it is often restated in manner more appropriate to this century. The search for sanctification is generally recognized as a necessary communal, ecclesial undertaking rather than a personal search for individual holiness. It is a gift of God to the people of God. As the complement of justification (forgiveness of sins), it is, in the first place, a work of God, more specifically of the Holy Spirit, both as a one-time act, valid for all time, and for all people, imputing and imparting holiness, and as an ongoing, progressive work. In the latter sense, it also becomes a human, community task. It takes place in our earthly lives, as a moral and spiritual cleansing and dedication of soul and body, harnessing and deploying all human faculties in the service of God, for the building up of communities of justice for the implementation of God's will in the world.

Holiness means to be at God's disposal; it is task-orientated and grace assisted. Sanctification may be sought through the communal means of grace that God provides, which includes worship, prayer and spiritual discipline, as well as the doing of good works that benefit people for time and eternity. It is the restoration of the *image of God in humanity, the gradual assimilation of the people of God into the body of Christ that they might think and act with 'the mind of Christ' (1 Cor. 2:16), and the 'demonstration of the Spirit's power' (1 Cor. 2:4). Directed by the double commandment of love of God and love of neighbour as the fullest description of human dedication, it works by the instruction and drive of the Holy Spirit through whom we fulfil the requirements of God's law (Rom. 8:4). Finally, sanctification, the eager pursuit of holiness in the midst of an unholy world, is the positive alternative to secularism, the attitude of a world turning away from God.

In the words of Bonhoeffer, 'Sanctification is the fulfilment of the divine purpose enunciated in the words, "Ye shall be holy: for I am holy," and again, "I the Lord who sanctify you am holy".' (Bonhoeffer, The Cost of Discipleship, p. 312).

Bibliography

K. Barth, CD, IV.2, IV.3; D. W. Bebbington, Evangelicalism in Modern Britain: A History from the 1730s to the 1980s (London, 1993); L. Berkhof, Systematic Theology (Grand Rapids, 1938); G. C. Berkouwer, Faith and Sanctification (Grand Rapids, 1952); D. G. Bloesch, Essentials of Evangelical Theology, vol. 2 (New York, 1982); D. Bonhoeffer, The Cost of Discipleship (New York, 1963); F. de L. Booth-Tucker, The Life of Catherine Booth:

The Mother of the Salvation Army, vol. 1 (London, 1924); E. Brunner, Dogmatics (London, 1949–62); S. Hauerwas, Sanctify Them in the Truth: Holiness Exemplified (Edinburgh, 1998); H. G. A. Lindstrom, Wesley and Sanctification (London, 1961); S. Neill, Christian Holiness (London, 1960); J. C. Ryle, Holiness (repr. London, 1956 [1877]); N. Voak, Richard Hooker and Reformed Theology: A Study of Reason, Will, and Grace (Oxford, 2003); D. D. Wallace, Jr, Puritans and Predestination: Grace in English Protestant Theology, 1525–1695 (Chapel Hill, 1982); O. Weber, Foundations of Dogmatics, vol. 2. (Grand Rapids, 1983).

A. SHEIR-JONES

SARTRE, JEAN-PAUL, see
EXISTENTIALISM

SATAN, see DEVIL AND DEMONS

SATISFACTION

The idea of satisfaction was introduced into theology by *Tertullian and *Cyprian. The post-apostolic church was clear that *baptism washes away all sin, but less clear about how to deal with (serious) sins committed after baptism. Tertullian and Cyprian came up with the idea that sin committed by baptized Christians dishonours God and that it is necessary for them to offer God some satisfaction or compensation for this dishonour. This can be done by fasting, almsgiving or some other meritorious activity. The penitential system took up this idea, with ‘*penances’ being set as a way of offering satisfaction.

Suppose the Christian dies without having paid off this debt of satisfaction? The idea emerged of *purgatory as a place where any remaining debt is paid off. Augustine famously acceded to his mother’s request to be ‘remembered at the altar’ after her death (Confessions 9:12:32, 9:13:36), an important precedent. In the early Middle Ages a full-blown doctrine of purgatory was developed. The idea also emerged that it is possible for the living to pay the debt for those who have died. In due course it was possible to buy ‘indulgences’, for oneself or for someone else, which offer remission for all or part of the debt that is owed. It was, of course, the practice of indulgences that provoked *Luther’s protest and his Ninety-Five Theses. The *Reformers all rejected the idea of retributive punishment for believers, although recognizing a *disciplinary role for punishment.

The NT does not refer to Christ’s death as a satisfaction, but the term was introduced into the doctrine of the work of Christ in the *patristic period, by Fathers such as Origen, Athanasius and Augustine. It was *Anselm, however, who made the idea of satisfaction the key to his teaching on the *cross. Human sin has dishonoured God and a suitable satisfaction needs to be offered to him to restore his lost honour. Christ, as the God-man, is able to provide this satisfaction by his unmerited death. In understanding Christ’s work in terms of restoring God’s honour, Anselm was simply applying to the cross the principles that underlay the penitential system. These ideas resonated with the honour-based values of feudal society.

Anselm’s idea that Christ has offered satisfaction for human sin is not the same as the idea that he has borne the punishment for *sin, in our place. *Bernard of Clairvaux, who came a generation after Anselm, also occasionally speaks of Christ’s death as a satisfaction, but not in the sense meant by Anselm. What is satisfied is not God’s honour but his *truth and justice, by the offering of a sacrifice which placates the Father. Bernard, unlike Anselm, uses the word to refer to penal *substitution. It is in this sense that the term is used in *Reformed confessions like the Belgic Confession, article XXI, and the *Thirty-Nine Articles, article XXXI. *Calvin spoke of the cross as satisfying God’s justice (e.g. Institutes, 2:12:3, 2:15:6, 2:16:5, 13, 19).

The Council of *Trent affirmed that Christ is the meritorious cause of our justification, having made satisfaction for us by his most holy passion on the cross. At the same time, Christians who sin need to offer God satisfaction by fasting, almsgiving, prayers and other pious exercises of a spiritual life. Through the sacrament of penance (or the desire for it) God remits the eternal punishment due to sin (hell, see *Judgment), but there remains a temporal punishment for which we need to offer satisfaction (Decree on Justification, chs. 7, 14). Trent also affirms that the *Mass is a sacrifice offered for the living and the dead, for their sins, penalties, satisfactions and other needs (Canon 3 on the Most Holy Sacrifice of the Mass).

A recent American dialogue between Lutherans and Roman Catholics in Dialogue focused on the theme of The Hope of Eternal Life and tackles issues such as satisfaction, purgatory, prayer for the dead, Masses for the dead and indulgences (§§1–8, 156–271).

Bibliography

L. G. Almen and R. J. Sklba, The Hope of Eternal Life: Lutherans and Catholics in Dialogue XI (Minneapolis: 2011).

A. N. S. LANE

SAUMUR, see AMYRALDISM

SCHAEFFER, FRANCIS AUGUST (1912–84)

Francis Schaeffer was born in the USA, studied under C. *Van Til and others at Westminster Theological Seminary, Philadelphia, was ordained to the ministry of the Bible Presbyterian Church and in 1948 moved to Switzerland. Eventually at Huémoz (Vaud) he and his wife Edith established the 'L'Abri' community which he led until his death. His special ministry was to all who had begun to realize the hopelessness of *humanistic ideals and also to Christians who were in danger of drifting with the tides of *existentialism into a *relativistic position. He restored to many Christians a fresh confidence in the truth of God. He spoke of 'true truth'. An orthodox Calvinist, Schaeffer placed special emphasis on the reliability and authority of the Bible. His apologetic approach has been described as "cultural apologetics". It laid more stress on common grace than did the apologetics of Van Til and the *Dooyeweerdians, and he helped the Christian to argue with the non-Christian and expose the inadequacy of his worldview, as well as affirm the objective truth of Christian doctrine and ethics. He collaborated closely with Professor Hans Rookmaaker (1922–77) in the examination of art history as a portrayal of philosophical and religious trends. His many books started to appear in 1968 and, along with his films and public seminars in the USA and Europe, gave him a worldwide influence. He did much to restore the confidence of educated evangelicals in an orthodox theology. He helped many to understand cultural trends and thereby to have both a more positive view and use of the arts and an awareness of what was seductive in humanistic culture.

Bibliography

Works: Escape from Reason (London, 1968); The God Who Is There (London, 1968); He Is There and He Is Not Silent (London, 1972); True Spirituality (London, 1972); How Should We Then Live? (London, 1980); Whatever Happened to the Human Race? with C. E. Koop (London, 1983); Complete Works, 5 vols. (Westchester, 21985); L. T. Dennis (ed.), Letters of Francis Schaeffer, vol. 1 (Eastbourne, 1986).

Studies: C. Duriez, Francis Schaeffer: An Authentic Life (Nottingham, 2008); B. Hawkins, Francis Schaeffer and the Shaping of Evangelical America (Grand Rapids, 2008); E. Schaeffer, L'Abri (London, 1969).

O. R. BARCLAY

SCHILLEBEECKX, EDWARD (1914–2009)

The progressive Roman Catholic theologian Schillebeeckx was Belgian by birth and a member of the *Dominican order. Until his retirement in 1982 he was professor of dogmatics and the history of theology in the University of Nijmegen in the Netherlands. A prolific writer in all fields of dogmatic theology, his most important work has been on the sacraments, ecclesiology, Christology and hermeneutics.

His influential early work on *sacramental theology proposed a move away from mechanical and impersonal interpretations (as in the idea of transubstantiation) towards a more *existential view of the sacraments as embodiments of the personal presence of Christ and hence a means of encounter with God in Christ.

Schillebeeckx' work is controlled by his view of the *hermeneutical task of theology. This is the task of mediating between past interpretations of the Christian experience of salvation in Christ (in the Bible and tradition) and the cultural situation in which the gospel must be reinterpreted today. The substance of the faith cannot be had in a non-historical form, but only in the fluid, historical forms which it assumes in changing cultural contexts. Thus the tradition from the past cannot be the only norm for theology, but must be creatively reinterpreted in the light of an interpretation of the modern experience of the world. Into the outworking of this hermeneutic enter two further basic principles of Schillebeeckx' approach to theology. 1) He refuses to draw a sharp distinction between *nature and *grace. There is a universal history of God's salvific presence in human experience, which the Christian history of revelation only makes explicit. 2) Especially under the influence of the *Frankfurt School, Schillebeeckx insists that a theology which is to avoid functioning as a mere ideology must be closely related to liberating Christian *praxis. These two principles also help to make the political dimension of experience an important, though not the only, sphere of soteriology and praxis.

In his great work on *Christology Schillebeeckx therefore sees the task of Christology as one of relating two sources: the early Christians' interpretations of their experience of salvation through Jesus, and the experience, both Christian and non-Christian, of living in the modern world. To this end he studies in great detail the ways in which the early church interpreted Jesus within its own cultural context, in order to distil certain principles which are constant structures of Christian experience and which must still structure our own understanding of praxis of Christian faith in the very different cultural context of today. Much of the criticism of Schillebeeckx' work on Christology has focused on the significance he gives to a speculative reconstruction of the earliest Christian interpretations of Jesus, which he thinks developed out of the original interpretation of Jesus as the eschatological prophet. This interpretation is important because it preserves the significance of the message and praxis of the historical Jesus, and Schillebeeckx therefore uses it as a critique of later Christologies which neglect these features of Jesus. While he does not consider the development of an incarnational Christology in the Johannine tradition and the Fathers to be illegitimate in itself, he judges it one-sided to the extent that it left behind Jesus the eschatological prophet, with the challenge of his message and praxis.

Bibliography

Works: Christ the Sacrament (London, 1963); The Understanding of Faith (London, 1974); Jesus: An Experiment in Christology (London, 1979); Christ: The Christian Experience in the Modern World (London, 1980); The Church with a Human Face (London, 1985). Complete bibliography at <http://schillebeeckx.nl/documenten/bibliography.pdf>.

Studies: J. Bowden, Edward Schillebeeckx (London, 1983); M. C. Hillkert and R. J. Schreiter, The Praxis of the Reign of God: An Introduction to the Theology of Edward Schillebeeckx (New York, 2002); D. P. Thompson, 'Schillebeeckx on the Development of Doctrine', Theological Studies 62:2 (June, 2001).

R. J. BAUCKHAM

SCHISM

Schism, from the Greek schisma, a division in (cf. 1 Cor. 1:10), or split from, the church. In the early centuries no clear distinction obtained between schism, an offence against unity and love, and *heresy, error in doctrine. Heretics were assumed to be, in reality or tendency, outside the church (i.e. schismatics) and vice versa. Greater clarity came in response to schismatic movements (e.g. *Novatianism and *Donatism), recognized as orthodox in faith and divided only on points of discipline or order. Whereas *Cyprian regarded separation from the institutional church as spiritual death, and sacraments given in schism as worthless, later theology – especially *Augustine grappling with Donatism – accepted the reality, if not the benefit, of schismatic sacraments. Traditional Roman theology has until recently treated bodies out of communion with the papacy (e.g. the Eastern church from 1054, and the Reformation churches, including *Anglicanism) as outside the church of Christ; but most Protestant and ecumenical theology has come to view the 'one church' of the creeds as internally in schism. Reunion thus requires not the reintegration of non-church schisms into the church, but the reconciliation of fellow churches to each other.

Bibliography

G. C. Berkouwer, The Church (Grand Rapids, 1976); S. L. Greenslade, Schism in the Early Church (London, ²1964).

D. F. WRIGHT

SCHLATTER, ADOLF (1852–1938)

Born in St Gall, Switzerland, where his father was a pharmacist and lay preacher in an independent church (though mother and children attended the state Reformed church), Adolf Schlatter studied in Basel and Tübingen (1871–75). Following brief pastoral charges in Zurich and Kasswill-Uttwill (near Lake Constance), he taught NT at Berne (1880–8), systematic theology at Griefswald (1889–93), theology in Berlin (1893–8), and NT at Tübingen (1898–1930). He was the most important figure in the faculty of theology in Tübingen during his time, and also the most influential teacher of a generation of German pastors. His biblical-historical theology and exegesis was in stark contrast to the *history-of-religions approach (see *Bultmann) and *liberal theology (see *Harnack) of others. Rooted firmly in a careful study of language and historical data, with special emphasis on the Jewish context of the NT, he sought to ground both systematic and contemporary theological concerns in the biblical text, rather than in speculative hypotheses. He resisted the call to separate faith and history, criticism and preaching, theology and life. He came to the study of the Bible quite conscious of the fact that he was a Christian theologian. Although he gave due weight to the differences between the OT and NT, he insisted on their underlying unity. Central to his work was the conviction that Jesus was ‘the Christ of God’ and the heart of the biblical revelation, and that this was the essential *hermeneutical key to the two Testaments.

Schlatter’s writings were prolific; unfortunately, few are available in English. Perhaps his greatest work is his massive study of faith in the NT (1885), in which he attempted to correct the hyper-Lutheran understanding of *justification by faith. He wrote a series of popular commentaries on the entire NT, alongside more technical and extensive volumes on Matthew (1929), John (1930), Luke (1931), James (1932), the Corinthian epistles (1934), Mark (1935), Romans (1935), Timothy and Titus (1936) and 1 Peter (1937). Those on Matthew and Romans (entitled The Righteousness of God) are the most important. He also wrote a two-volume NT theology (1909), a history of the primitive church (1926; ET, The Church in the NT Period, London, 1955), as well as major works on dogmatics (1911) and ethics (1914).

Bibliography

W. W. Gasque, ‘The Promise of Adolf Schlatter’, Crux 15, June 1979, pp. 5–9; R. Morgan (ed.), The Nature of New Testament Theology: The Contribution of William Wrede and Adolf Schlatter (London, 1973), includes ET of The Theology of the New Testament and Dogmatics; W. Neuer, Adolf Schlatter: A Biography of Germany’s Premier Biblical Theologian, tr. R. W. Yarbrough (Grand Rapids, 1995); P. Stuhlmacher, ‘Adolf Schlatter’s Interpretation of Scripture’, NTS 24 (1978), pp. 433–446.

W. W. GASQUE

SCHLEIERMACHER, FRIEDRICH DANIEL ERNST (1768–1834)

Schleiermacher was a German Protestant theologian commonly thought to be the founding father of *liberal Protestantism, though he transcends that movement and is more properly ranked with the great Reformation divines.

Born into a devout family, Schleiermacher experienced a religious conversion under Moravian influences, but whilst attending a Moravian seminary found his youthful *pietist theology intellectually inadequate. He went to study philosophy at Halle, where he immersed himself in *Kant and *Plato. During his studies there, and his early work as a tutor and pastor, he began the process of reconstructing his account of the Christian faith. His mature years were spent in Halle and later Berlin, as professor, preacher and political activist. He is chiefly known to English-language theology through the third edition of his On Religion: Speeches to Its Cultured Despisers, and the second edition of his dogmatics, The Christian Faith, a formidably difficult work which, along with *Barth’s Church Dogmatics, is the most important Protestant theological text since *Calvin’s Institutes. His other significant writings include the methodological sketch Brief Outline on the Study of Theology, the posthumous Hermeneutics and a large body of sermons, along with translations of Plato, and a Dialektik and an Ethik which, with much of the important biographical material, remain untranslated.

Schleiermacher’s theology is self-consciously church theology. He envisages theology as an intellectual exercise which has its origins in the concrete forms of the religious life. Because Christian theology is related to the corporate piety of the Christian community, it is empirical rather than speculative: the Christian faith is not primarily conceptual, and doctrines are a second-order conceptualization of its primary religious truth. In making piety central, Schleiermacher is partly seeking an alternative base for religious knowledge in response to the restrictions placed upon speculative theology by the critical philosophy of Kant and others. His account of *revelation in The Christian Faith is thus of a knowledge of God mediated through the corporate experience of redemption rather than of a body of doctrine propositionally revealed. Hence Schleiermacher's perspective on doctrines clearly distinguishes between their dogmatic form and the corporate realities of the religious life to which they give secondary expression, and thus they may be alternatively expressed.

The core of Schleiermacher's understanding of the phenomena of piety lies in his much-disputed notion of the 'feeling of absolute dependence'. He proposes that the primal structure of the religious life, Christian or otherwise, is the consciousness of self as determined by that which transcends the self. In talking of a 'feeling' of dependence, Schleiermacher does not mean 'emotion': much more is he talking of a fundamental structure of personal existence, prior to emotion, action or thought. Self-consciousness is consciousness of dependence, and thus consciousness of God as the 'whence' of the feeling. And so consciousness of the self as dependent is the primary locus of God's self-disclosure to his human creation.

In The Christian Faith, this universal understanding of piety is given a distinct *Christological shape. Whereas in the Speeches on Religion Schleiermacher sought primarily to commend religion as the implicit backcloth to science and art, and was only peripherally concerned with Christianity, his dogmatics explores how the Christian consciousness of God is determined at every point by the redemptive work of Christ. He understands *redemption as the impression made by Jesus' unclouded consciousness of God upon the Christian community, as their own impoverished God-consciousness is repaired through the God-consciousness of Jesus. The relationship of Christ as the archetype of God-consciousness to the history of Jesus is not clear in Schleiermacher, and has been the subject of much criticism since F. C. Baur (see *Tübingen School). Schleiermacher's manner of approaching Christology by a soteriological route means, moreover, that he discards much of the apparatus of classical Christology as an inadequate expression of the Christian self-consciousness.

Schleiermacher consistently refuses to move behind the analysis of the conditions of piety to discuss the objectivity of God in and for himself. Thus in his doctrine of God in The Christian Faith he passes over *trinitarian dogma, since all talk of distinctions within the Godhead is speculation divorced from piety: 'We have no formula for the being of God in itself as distinct from the being of God in the world' (172.2). Thus the doctrines of *creation and preservation are accorded prior treatment, since they relate immediately to man's consciousness of dependence, and the doctrine of the Trinity is assigned to an appendix (a move which Barth carefully reverses at the beginning of his Church Dogmatics).

The relation of dogma to piety is paralleled in Schleiermacher's *hermeneutics, a subject whose contemporary prominence owes much to Schleiermacher's work, notably the posthumously published material. While his earlier hermeneutical writings focus on the objectivity of language, he later understands the act of interpretation as psychological rather than grammatical, piercing through the text to the consciousness of the author to which it affords access.

Like his whole theology, Schleiermacher's hermeneutics have frequently attracted the charge of subjectivism. It is argued that by underlining the primacy of psychological interpretation, he gives priority to questions of meaningfulness rather than truth and locates the text's referent in subjective consciousness rather than objective states of affairs. Similarly, on a broader canvas, he is often thought so to emphasize the religious self-consciousness that he undervalues the objective ground of religious life and thought. Hence he is sometimes charged with initiating the process (completed by *Feuerbach) of reducing theology to *anthropology. This line of criticism was powerfully stated by Barth, who nevertheless had far deeper respect for and proximity to Schleiermacher than many who made Barth's earlier repudiation of his predecessor a fixed norm for Schleiermacher interpretation, in a way which Barth himself left behind. This critique is seriously undermined by the fact that Schleiermacher understood the 'feeling of absolute dependence' as intentional, i.e. referring to an external ground. The religious self-consciousness apprehends a world which transcends the self, so that through piety the 'whence' of the religious life is disclosed. This latter interpretation suggests that Schleiermacher is restating a Reformation emphasis on the coinherence of God and the life of faith, such as can be found in passages from *Luther. It remains, none the less, an open question whether Schleiermacher's theology can support any notion of God's action and presence as other than immanent. This might be borne out by his ambivalence towards *miracles and *providence. Moreover, it is debatable whether his refusal of speculative language about God's own being, in and for himself, betrays any loss of confidence in the possibility of revelation from outside the processes of human history.

After its hostile reception by many under the influence of Barth, Schleiermacher's work has attracted more positive evaluation, notably in Germany where a new critical edition has been harvesting scholarly inquiry into the development of his thought. It is certainly no longer possible to maintain the easy stereotypes by which Schleiermacher has often been dismissed. He remains the quintessential exponent of an alternative Reformation tradition from that articulated in Calvin and Barth, namely one preoccupied with human *religion as a response to God's self-disclosure. And he constitutes a type of response to *Enlightenment critiques of the possibility of theology, a response in which the reality of God is located in human historical experience.

Bibliography

Works: Kritische Gesamtausgabe (Berlin, 1980–); Brief Outline on the Study of Theology (Richmond, 1966); The Christian Faith (Edinburgh, 1928); Christmas Eve (Richmond, 1967); Hermeneutics (Missoula, 1977); On Religion: Speeches to its Cultured Despisers (London, 1894); Selected Sermons (London, 1890).

Studies: K. Barth, Protestant Theology in the Nineteenth Century (London, 1972); idem, The Theology of Schleiermacher (Edinburgh, 1982); R. B. Brandt, The Philosophy of Schleiermacher (New York, 1941); R. Crouter, Friedrich Schleiermacher: Between Enlightenment and Romanticism (Cambridge, 2008); B. A. Gerrish, A Prince of the Church: Schleiermacher and the Beginnings of Modern Theology (London, 1984); idem, in N. Smart (ed.), Nineteenth Century Religious Thought in the West (Cambridge, 1985), vol. 1, pp. 123–156; C. L. Kelsey, Thinking about Christ with Schleiermacher (Louisville, 2003); idem, Schleiermacher's Preaching, Dogmatics, and Biblical Criticism (Eugene, 2007); H. R. Mackintosh, Types of Modern Theology (London, 1937); J. Marina (ed.), The Cambridge Companion to Schleiermacher (Cambridge, 2006); R. R. Niebuhr, Schleiermacher on Christ and Religion (London, 1964); M. Redeker, Schleiermacher (Philadelphia, 1973); S. W. Sykes, Friedrich Schleiermacher (London, 1971); R. R. Williams, Schleiermacher the Theologian (Philadelphia, 1978).

J. B. WEBSTER

SCHLEITHEIM CONFESSION

Anabaptism, as a movement, is generally understood as being most visible in the decade between 1525 (when the Swiss Brethren emerge as a coherent group in Zurich) and 1535. In 1527, Michael Sattler was one of those instrumental in calling together a conference of leaders in the new movement to meet in Schleitheim, in Schaffhausen. At this time, it was becoming clear that those in power who might have looked sympathetic were resistant to the radicalness of the movement. There were also those within the movement who were influenced by *Müntzer's extremism. The conference and subsequent summary document, the Schleitheim Confession, were attempts both to defend the new movement against those who saw it as heretical and dangerous, and to set some limits against extreme teachings, especially those urging violence.

Michael Sattler is generally understood to have been the main author of the document which then became a deeply significant text for the growing radical community. While it can never be said to be or to have been definitive, it was and has remained a guiding text for those identified with *Anabaptism.

The Confession, or Brotherly Union of a Number of Children of God Concerning Seven Articles, is not, in the conventional sense, a *confession of faith, and takes the historic *creeds for granted. The Schleitheim Confession is a description of what is distinctive about Anabaptism, and therefore focuses on the life of discipleship rather than the content of belief.

The Confession consists of seven articles:

- (1) Baptism: given to believers who request it, rather than infants.
- (2) The ban: exclusion from the Lord's Supper by the congregation of those whose lives do not exemplify discipleship.
- (3) The breaking of bread: to be shared by those baptized as believers.

(4) Separation from the world: and the list of the institutions from which true believers were to separate themselves.

(5) The shepherds: reflecting the recognition that those who serve as leaders are both a necessity and likely not to survive long in the hostile environment.

(6) The sword: that true Christians will not wield the sword for war or justice.

(7) Oaths: a central aspect of sixteenth-century community cohesion which Anabaptists rejected as unscriptural.

The stated aim of the Confession is to provide unity among baptized believers, based on the unity of God in Trinity, and given as God's gift. The emphasis throughout is on separation from the sinful world, and the maintaining of the purity of the body of Christ.

See also: REFORMATION, RADICAL.

Bibliography

W. Klaassen, Anabaptism in Outline; Selected Primary Sources (Scottsdale, 1981); G. H. Williams, The Radical Reformation (London, 1962); J. H. Yoder, The Schleithem Confession (Scottsdale, 1977).

R. GOULDBOURNE

SCHMEMMANN, ALEXANDER (1921–83)

Alexander Schmemmann was born into a Russian émigré family in Reval, Estonia, in 1921. When he was seven, his family moved to Paris, where he was educated, finally graduating from the Institut St-Serge. He continued there as a lecturer, being ordained to the priesthood in 1946. In 1951, Schmemmann followed *Florovsky to America to teach at St Vladimir's Orthodox Theological Seminary. He became Dean in 1962, holding the post until his death in 1983. He came to specialize in *liturgical studies, and, in tune with contemporary developments in Roman Catholic theology, turned this subject from a drily historical discipline into a source of deeply theological reflection: 'liturgical theology'. In the 1960s, with the popularity in Protestant circles of 'secular' theology and proclamation of the 'death of God', Schmemmann found in the *sacraments, and especially the divine liturgy, resources for an understanding of God disclosed in the mystery of *worship and active in the beauty of the world; as he said, 'In the light of the Eucharist we see that Christ is indeed the life and light of all that exists, and the glory that fills heaven and earth. There is nothing else to remember, nothing else to be thankful for, because in him everything finds its being, its end.' He was instrumental in the establishment of the autocephalous (self-governing) Orthodox Church of America in 1970, which united most Orthodox of Slav descent under an American hierarchy. Despite his French education and commitment to America, he retained a deep love of Russia and Russian culture, and formed a deep friendship with the exiled Solzhenitsyn.

Bibliography

All Schmemmann's works are published by St Vladimir's Seminary Press, Crestwood NY, as is The Journals of Father Alexander Schmemmann 1973–1983 (2000). See especially, For the Life of the World (London, 1966, now published by SVSP).

A. LOUTH

SCHOLASTICISM

'Scholastic' was used first by *humanists and sixteenth-century historians of philosophy to describe the philosophers and theologians of the Middle Ages. It was a negative, derogatory term meant to indicate a tradition-bound, logic-chopping mentality, involving a slavish adherence to *Aristotle. While echoes of the old usage remain, today the term usually refers simply to the dominant form of philosophy and theology in the central and later Middle Ages. There is also a modern scholasticism, dating from about 1550 to 1830 and associated with the age of 'confessional orthodoxy', which was influential in both Protestant and Catholic universities of Western Europe (see *Orthodoxy/Scholasticism, Lutheran; *Orthodoxy/Scholasticism, Reformed). Finally, among contemporary Catholics there is a neoscholasticism which traces its roots to the Middle Ages, especially Thomas Aquinas (see *Thomism and Neo-Thomism).

When political order began to be restored in Western Europe from the ninth century onwards, education was also fostered and with it the people in the West began the task of assimilating classical culture, an intellectual tradition far richer than that of the West in that era. Consequently, much of the teaching in the *monastic and cathedral schools, and later in the universities, was built on the reading and explication of classical texts. Since the schools were founded and maintained by Christians to foster their faith, a faith rooted in the Bible as an authoritative text, a text-based method was natural to them.

The medievals were convinced that divine revelation made available to us truth that otherwise surpassed our understanding (see Faith and reason). Hence, Scripture, accepted as divinely inspired, was studied and commented on. It clarified spiritual things but also illumined the understanding of man and the world. With the rediscovery of all of the writings of Aristotle (see below), both a more sophisticated dialectical method and an alternative account of reality appeared on the scene. More than anything else, the problem of coming to terms with Aristotle dominated the debates in the medieval schools. Faith still remained prior, and the theologians accepted Anselm's view that one should not seek to understand in order to believe, but believe in order to understand.

The earliest example of the kind of rational analysis of doctrine that became characteristic of scholasticism is found in Boethius' work On the Trinity. Of much greater influence was Abelard, who sought to provide explanations of the statements of faith. In his Yes and No he advanced theological method by making the resolution of disagreements among authorities a part of the theologian's task. Peter Lombard's Sentences became the most widely used textbook in theology. It was a collection of texts from the Bible and the Fathers of the church (see Patristic theology) on the topics of God, creatures, the incarnation, redemption, the sacraments and last things (see Eschatology). Written about 1150, this work was still being used and commentaries being written on it at the time of the Reformation in the sixteenth century.

In the thirteenth century, study of the biblical text continued, but gradually the masters also began to treat difficult questions by themselves. So there developed the 'disputed question', a comprehensive examination of a single topic based on the Bible, the Fathers and the philosophic tradition. These questions treated such topics as truth, God's power, his will and free choice. The crowning achievement of scholasticism was the Summa, which was an orderly presentation of theological issues. Best known of these is Thomas Aquinas's Summa Theologica, which he wrote for beginners in theology.

In it Aquinas discusses issues in an order appropriate for beginners, treating each topic more briefly than he does in his disputed questions.

Like earlier medieval thinkers in the West, Abelard and his contemporaries in the twelfth century had access only to Aristotle's logical writings, but in the thirteenth century the remainder of Aristotle's writings became available in the West. Instead of Aristotle the dialectician, Aristotle the philosopher challenged Christian thinkers. In Aristotle's Physics, Metaphysics, Ethics, and other works the medievals found an account of reality which was far superior to anything they had known. The difficulty was that this sophisticated account was fundamentally opposed to Christian teaching on such points as the eternity of the world, the nature of the human soul, and the end of human existence. William of Auvergne (c. 1180–1249), Albertus Magnus, Bonaventura, Roger Bacon (c. 1214–92) and Thomas Aquinas are the most prominent among the many masters who sought to articulate a Christian position in the context of the new Aristotle. Each of them has his own solution. In the last century historical criticism has shown that scholasticism was not a single theology or philosophy, but rather consisted of a multiplicity of positions which attempted to deal with a common problem, the challenge of Aristotle's thought.

Around 1270 the situation at Paris was complicated by the fact that certain members of the arts faculty were promoting the interpretation of Aristotle advanced by the commentator Averroes, who held, for example, that there is only one intellectual soul for all men. Most famous of these arts masters was Siger of Brabant (c. 1235–c. 1282). He and others seem to have thought that, so far as reason goes, Aristotle had given the final word. Siger presented the thought of Aristotle without claiming that it was true but also without challenging it where it contradicts revelation. Because he did not show that Aristotle had erred, he gave the impression that natural reason inevitably contradicts revelation. This led opponents to suggest that he held a double-truth theory, the view that one thesis can be true for philosophy and its opposite true for faith. More satisfactory was the approach taken by Aquinas, who not only insisted, in principle, that all truth is one, but also criticized Aristotle and his commentators, so showing that reason does not contradict faith.

The threat of an unrestrained rationalism, as manifested in Siger and others, led to the condemnation of 1277. The bishop of Paris condemned 219 propositions. Most were those held by Averroes and his followers, but a variety of others, including some held by Aquinas, were included. More important than the content of this condemnation is the reaction which followed it. The conviction of Aquinas and others that philosophy can serve faith gave way to doubts on this score. In *Duns Scotus and *William of Ockham one sees the collaboration of faith and reason beginning to fall apart.

By 1350 scholasticism was in decline. Lectures on the Bible were no longer mandatory and study of the writings of the church fathers had also declined. Dialectical subtleties became more and more the focus. This development worsened what was already a weakness in scholasticism – its lack of historical sense. Later scholastics tended to confine themselves to extracts from the ancients and so lost the historical context and much of the meaning of the original writings. Also, there developed a tendency among these later scholastics to group themselves into schools, and then to focus on the relatively minor issues on which they differed. Ockhamists, Scotists and Thomists battled with one another, and theology became more and more remote from the life of the church. In this context it is little wonder that *Erasmus wanted to return to the simple gospel, that *Luther had no use for Aristotle, and that *Calvin repeatedly attacks the fictions of the schoolmen.

After the Reformation, nominalist, Scotist and Thomist schools continued in the Catholic universities. The most influential new thinker was Francisco de Suárez (see *Jesuit theology), whose Metaphysical Disputations influenced *Leibniz, Christian Wolff (1679–1754) and other philosophers. Among Protestants *Melancthon employed a humanist Aristotelianism in his theology, while Peter *Ramus promoted an anti-metaphysical humanism. Even so, among Protestants, too, Suárez was influential. In spite of Calvin's anti-scholasticism, Francis *Turretin and other Reformed theologians adopted the scholastic method in their theology.

Contemporary scholasticism is an extensive movement in Catholic circles which started in the early nineteenth century and flowered after Leo XIII's encyclical Aeterni Patris (1879), in which he called for the restoration of Christian philosophy, and singled out the teachings of Thomas Aquinas for special consideration. Institutes were established and journals founded in both Europe and America. Better-known members of this movement include E. *Gilson, J. *Maritain, K. *Rahner and B. *Lonergan.

A weakness of scholasticism has been noted, but it should be added that often the schoolmen have been condemned unheard. They have sometimes been ridiculed (as by Erasmus), and more often ignored, but seldom refuted. Some opponents of scholasticism are repelled by its analytical mode of thought which by its precision places a heavy demand on the reader. But precise definitions and careful arguments are as appropriate in theology as in any other area. Historically, it is the scholastics who considered most carefully the relation of faith to reason (see *Faith and reason) and of theology to the other sciences. For these reasons the scholastics remain a source of inspiration for philosophers and theologians even today.

Bibliography

E. Gilson, A History of Christian Philosophy in the Middle Ages (London, ²1980); N. Kretzmann, A. Kenny and J. Pinborg (eds.), Cambridge History of Later Medieval Philosophy (London, 1982); P. O. Kristeller, Renaissance Thought: The Classic, Scholastic, and Humanist Strains (New York, 1955); J. Marenbon, Early Medieval Philosophy (480–1150): An Introduction (London, ²1988); idem, Later Medieval Philosophy (1150–1350): An Introduction (London, rev. edn 1991); G. Van Riet, Thomistic Epistemology (St Louis, 1963).

A. Vos

SCHWEITZER, ALBERT (1875–1965)

Born in Alsace, Schweitzer was a human dynamo possessing the combined talents, energy and accomplishments of many individuals. He earned doctorates in philosophy, theology, musicology and medicine. At the age of thirty he became a missionary doctor in French Equatorial Africa in obedience to Jesus' command to 'lose his life for my sake and the gospel's'. Through many adversities, including both World Wars, he laboured among the local people, eventually building his own hospital. He periodically returned to Europe to give lectures and organ recitals, and during the whole period he continued the writing career which he had begun in student days.

In The Quest of the Historical Jesus (1906; ET 1909) Schweitzer demonstrated how all the modern 'historical' reconstructions of the life of Jesus simply attributed to Jesus the liberal theology of their authors (see *Historical Jesus, quest for). Schweitzer held that Jesus believed the *apocalyptic *kingdom of God would momentarily appear, in response to the zealous piety of himself and his disciples. Thus Jesus taught an 'interim ethic', the need for absolute *righteousness if one hoped to enter the kingdom. Jesus' values of 'higher righteousness', love and faith (described in liberal terms) called for extreme application because of the extremity of the times. One must renounce possessions, turn the other cheek and endure persecutions. In the imminent tribulation Jesus and his disciples would die and rise again, Jesus as the Son of Man.

When the end tarried, Jesus concluded that he must undergo the tribulation alone, on his followers' behalf, and thus usher in the kingdom. Later, Paul reasoned that Jesus' messianic reign had indeed begun, albeit invisibly, and so had the resurrection of his predestined elect. Paul's views of *sacraments, *ethics, the *law and *justification were all a function of his *eschatology, and not influenced by the mystery religions, as many scholars held.

In The Philosophy of Civilization (1923) Schweitzer set forth his ethical theory of 'reverence for life', which he saw as the only way to unite world-affirmation with inner moral devotion. All creatures share the 'will to live', but only humans can recognize this common bond. We must cherish the lives of all beings equally and should try not to kill even insects and plants, though of course often we cannot avoid doing so. Schweitzer regarded 'reverence for life' as the principle implicit in the ethic of Jesus. As a child he had felt protective of all animal life, and it is possible that his study of the Hindu and Jainist doctrine of ahimsa (non-harm) strengthened him in these feelings.

Bibliography

J. Brabazon, Albert Schweitzer: A Biography (New York, 1975); J. L. Ice, Schweitzer: Prophet of Radical Theology (Philadelphia, 1971); O. Kraus, Albert Schweitzer (London, 1944); G. N. Marshall, An Understanding of Albert Schweitzer (New York, 1966); A. Schweitzer and J. Brabazon, Albert Schweitzer: Essential Writings (Maryknoll, 2005).

R. M. PRICE

SCHWENCKFELD, CASPAR (1489–1561)

A lay theologian and radical Reformer from Silesia, Schwenckfeld became a Lutheran in 1518 and from 1522 to 1529 was the chief adviser of Duke Frederick II in the promotion of the *Reformation. By 1524 he had embraced eucharistic views that were unacceptable to *Luther, and he went into voluntary exile. His theology as it developed put him in the ranks of the Spiritualists among the Radicals (see *Reformation, Radical).

The *Eucharist played a formative role in his thinking. The true Eucharist, he held, is not outward participation in the rite, but an inward, spiritual feeding on the heavenly bread which is the celestial flesh of Christ. Such inward feeding ensured that the communicant was transformed by full participation in the divine nature. As a result, the will, previously paralysed by sin, is liberated to exercise the love to God and man commanded by Christ. This spiritual absorption of the celestial flesh of Christ is made possible by justifying faith which incorporates the believer in the second Adam. Even those, such as Abraham, who lived before the incarnation, were equally partakers of the spiritual Christ if they exercised faith, and are to be deemed Christians. Schwenckfeld rejected Luther's forensic understanding of justifying faith, by linking faith closely with a continuous feeding upon Christ. In this way *justification is closely tied to progressive *deification. It harmonized with his sombre view of sin and his yearning to see the Reformation producing an improvement in morality.

His *Christology matches his eucharistic teaching. He held that the human nature of Christ, although received from Mary, was 'begotten, not made'. He conceived of man's human nature, like his divine nature, progressing from a state of humiliation in the earthly ministry to a glorification which is virtually deification. He insisted that Christ suffered on the cross in his divine, as well as in his human, nature. In this way, Christ's celestial flesh became available for believers by means of the Eucharist. It is difficult to discern the difference between the two natures in the state of glorification, and that is why Schwenckfeld was accused by Luther of Eutychianism (see *Monophysitism).

The contrast between 'outer' and 'inner' runs throughout Schwenckfeld's theology. The 'outer' word of God in Scripture is contrasted with the 'inner' or spiritual word in the heart. The true church is not the outward institution, but the company of people who feed spiritually upon Christ. 'Outer' baptism with water is nothing apart from the 'inner' *baptism of the Holy Spirit. Because of his conviction that the *Holy Spirit cannot be fettered by institutions and ceremonies, Schwenckfeld withdrew from communion with other churches, but without yielding his irenic belief that God's true spiritual church had members in all communions. It followed that he was a protagonist of *toleration. He argued for the separation of church and *state and yet believed that the Christian had a creative role to play in civil government.

Although he rejected infant baptism, he is not to be confused with the *Anabaptists. The differences between him and them were sharply defined in his long controversy with Pilgram Marpeck (c. 1495–1556).

Bibliography

Works: Commentary on the Augsburg Confession, tr. R. A. Grater (Pennsburg, 1982); Corpus Schwenckfeldianorum, 19 vols. (Leipzig, 1922 onwards).

Studies: P. C. Erb (ed.), Schwenckfeld and Early Schwenckfeldianism (Pennsburg, 1986); R. Gouldbourne, The Flesh and the Feminine: Gender and Theology in the Writings of Caspar Schwenckfeld (Bletchley, 2006); R. E. McLaughlin, Caspar Schwenckfeld, Reluctant Radical: His Life to 1540 (New Haven and London, 1986); S. G. Shultz, Caspar Schwenckfeld von Ossig (1489–1561): Spiritual Interpreter of Christianity, Apostle of the Middle Way (Norristown, 1977); G. H. Williams, The Radical Reformation (Kirkville, 1992).

R. T. JONES

SCIENCE AND THEOLOGY

In this article 'science' is taken to mean the systematic study of the natural world, an activity at once intellectual, practical and social. It is thus to be distinguished from the vast corpus of empirical 'facts' accumulated by that activity and often called 'science' by the layman. The precise character of the scientific enterprise and its methodology have varied with time. 'Modern science' may be said to have originated in Western Europe at about the time of the Renaissance and Reformation. Since then its relationship with theology has been conceived in a variety of ways.

Models of the relationship between science and theology

Some have imagined a model of total independence, thus eliminating any of the possibilities (and problems) discussed below. Such a zero-interaction model is irreconcilable with historical evidence, which points to a continuous series of strong interactions over many centuries.

Secondly, there is a conflict model which was assiduously developed after Darwin by those who wished science to snatch cultural supremacy from the church in late-Victorian Britain. On the basis of undeniable episodes in which scientific evidence did undermine received traditions that were apparently based on the Bible (e.g. Galileo and Darwin), a generalized, triumphalist image for science was cultivated, owing much to the *positivist philosophy that only scientific knowledge was ultimately meaningful. Despite much evidence for the gross historical distortions introduced by such a pre-emptive generalization, its survival in popular literature even today testifies to its hold on the public mind.

A third model is that of complementarity which (though not by that name) may be dated back to Francis Bacon (1561–1626) in the seventeenth century. He spoke of 'two books', the book of nature and the book of Scripture, each of which had to be read and understood. Because both came from the same author they could not be in conflict. But because each had a different purpose it was idle to mix 'philosophy' (science) and divinity, and to seek scientific data in the pages of Scripture. Problems arose, however, where biblical and scientific evidence appeared to clash, and in those circumstances it was necessary to recognize the complementarity of their modes of explanation. *Calvin, drawing on the *Augustinian concept of '*accommodation', assumed that the Holy Spirit accommodated his language to that of common speech in order to teach spiritual principles. Hence biblical accounts of the days of *creation, of the structure of the cosmos, of the sun (as opposed to the earth) standing still and of a literally universal flood would be susceptible to a non-literal interpretation. In other words, the biblical and scientific accounts of natural phenomena have purposes that are complementary rather than contradictory, the Bible's concerns being spiritual and eternal. This approach has continued to our own day and may be fruitfully applied to later problems, not least the creation debate.

For all its merits the 'complementarity' model by itself fails in a number of respects, particularly by ignoring the considerable network of relationships between science and theology disclosed by recent historical scholarship. A fourth model which takes these into account may be termed symbiosis. This recognizes that historically, scientific and theological thinking have owed much to one another and that their growth has been mutually promoted. It conforms with a widespread acknowledgment that much human knowledge is culture-dependent, but it does not prejudice the independence of data either in the Bible or in the natural world. It merely recognizes that in the interpretation of such data, theological and scientific ideas are often intermingled in one brain, as they are indeed in one society. Hence one might expect some degree of mutual influence, and such turns out to be the case.

Influence of science on theology

The responses of theology to science have been legion. One of the earliest was *natural theology. From Robert Boyle (1627–91) to *Paley, English literature is replete with attempts to make discoveries of science the basis of a Christian apologetic; it has been argued, somewhat doubtfully, that underlying such efforts lay a quest for social stability which might be bolstered by a strong Anglican church. Its unchanging formularies were to be confirmed by the unchanging laws of science. Be that as it may, the 'argument from design' survived, albeit in a weakened form, even the onslaughts of Darwinism. With today's greater knowledge of the intricacies of the natural world, attempts have been made to revive it, though not with conspicuous success.

It was in fact the awesome regularity of the mechanical universe as emphasized by Isaac *Newton that raised urgent questions of divine intervention. Did God intervene in the running of the machine he had created, or did he not? The dilemma was crystallized in the (probably apocryphal) remark by Laplace (1749–1827) that he had 'no need of that hypothesis (God)' in his cosmology. Thus arose a powerful stimulus to the growth of *deism and its derivatives such as *unitarianism. A recognition that all natural events (not merely those explicable by known scientific laws) must be seen as God's activity was not absent in the late eighteenth century. But a God-in-the-gaps theology proved surprisingly resilient and represents another popular misunderstanding of the science/religion relationship.

A third response of theology to science has come in the area of biblical interpretation. It goes at least as far back as Galileo's famous quip of 1615 that, in Scripture, 'the intention of the Holy Ghost is to teach us how one goes to heaven, not how heaven goes' – a response engendered at least in part by his own telescopic discoveries in vindication of Copernicus. Since that time the discoveries and theories of science have not infrequently led to a revision of traditional interpretations of Scriptures. These include ancient views on the age of the earth, the structure of the universe, the extent of Noah's flood and the origins of biological species (including human beings). Few commentators disagree when this happens over cosmology, but application of an identical methodology to questions of human origins is still controversial.

It is important not to imply a unique role for science in the reinterpretation of Scripture, but it cannot be neglected. Where a theological response to science has been claimed with much less justification is in the 'demythologization' (see *Myth) programme prescribed by *Bultmann and others. The assertion that '*miracle' is incredible in a scientific age is as unphilosophical as it is unhistorical. It ignores the fact that science is, by definition, concerned only with regularities and can therefore make no pronouncement on their breach; and it neglects to note that, at the very time when demythologization came into vogue, old-fashioned, positivistic scientific dogmatism was in decline. For this a variety of causes may be cited, notably the demise of the *deterministic world of Newtonian mechanics in the face of successive challenges by thermodynamics, relativity and quantum theory.

Finally, it may be briefly noted that the *process theology of Whitehead, Hartshorne and others sprang, at least ostensibly, from a concern to understand God's relationship to the world of nature as studied by science.

Influence of theology on science

The origins and growth of science may be fruitfully considered in terms of a response to biblical insights liberated at, and since, the Reformation (Hooykaas, Russell). This response may be seen in the writings of many men of science and in the morphological similarity between scientific and religious theories. Five such insights may be identified:

(1) The elimination of myth from nature: an animate, even 'divine', nature is not susceptible to scientific enquiry, nor compatible with biblical injunctions to treat nature instead as a dependent creation of God (Pss 29, 89, 104, 137, etc.) who alone is to be worshipped (Deut. 26:11; Isa. 44:24; Jer. 7:18, etc.). The replacement of an organismic by a mechanistic universe (nature's own 'demythologization') coincided with a renewed awareness of such teaching.

(2) The laws of nature: the emergence of 'laws of nature' in the seventeenth century has been shown by Zilsel (Physical Review 51, 1942, pp. 245–279) as a derivative of biblical doctrines, citing inter alia Job 28:26 and Prov. 8:29. Later writers (Whitehead, Oakley, etc.) have strengthened this thesis.

(3) The experimental method: both in English *Puritanism and continental Calvinism (see *Reformed theology) the questioning manipulation of nature was strongly encouraged as an alternative to the abstract reasoning of ancient pagan cultures. It was seen as fully compatible with biblical injunctions to 'test' all things (1 Thess. 5:21; Rom. 12:2; Ps. 34:8, etc.).

(4) Controlling the earth: Bacon and his followers saw in Scripture (Gen. 1:26; Ps. 8:6–8, etc.) a clear mandate for altering the natural world for human benefit.

(5) To the glory of God: that scientific research could add lustre to the divine name was believed even by patristic writers, but it most strongly emerged in the seventeenth century. Thus John Kepler (1571–1630), in studying those heavens which declared the glory of God (Pss 8, 19, 50), exclaimed he was 'thinking God's thoughts after him'. This of itself was a powerful motive for the scientific exploration of nature.

If science may, without exaggeration, be seen as historically dependent for its emergence on Christian theology, then, in an age when this has been largely forgotten, biblical theology has an even more important contribution to make.

This is in the area of ethical direction. Crucial to such an impact is a renewal of the biblical concept of *stewardship, which may be seen as the only key to current dilemmas over areas of concern ranging from the pollution of the biosphere and climate change to a possible nuclear holocaust. All of these arise from technologies now made possible by science. Moreover, many aspects of modern science have been seen as eroding human dignity and worth, whether in the extrapolations of biological science to the so-called 'sociobiology', or in the naive reductionism that, in the manner of the Greek atomists, sees all phenomena in purely material terms. To an allegedly 'scientific' worldview so devoid of comfort and hope theology surely has much to say.

See also: MACKAY, DONALD M.; ECOLOGY; NATURE, THEOLOGY OF; POLANYI, MICHAEL; TORRANCE, THOMAS F.

Bibliography

I. G. Barbour, Issues in Science and Religion (London, 1966); R. Bube, The Human Quest (Waco, 1971); J. Dillenberger, Protestant Thought and Natural Science (London, 1961); R. Hooykaas, Christian Faith and the Freedom of Science (London, 1957); idem, Religion and the Rise of Modern Science (Edinburgh, 1973); S. J. Jaki, The Savior of Science (Washington, 1988); M. A. Jeeves (ed.), The Scientific Enterprise and Christian Faith (London, 1969); D. M. MacKay, The Clockwork Image: A Christian Perspective on Science (London, 1974); idem, Human Science and Human Dignity (London, 1979); A. McGrath, Science and Religion: An Introduction (Oxford, 1999); H. Montefiore (ed.), Man and Nature (London, 1975); A. Padgett, Science and the Study of God: A Mutuality Model for Theology and Science (Grand Rapids, 2003); A. R. Peacocke, Creation and the World of Science (Oxford, 1979); J. Polkinghorne, Science and Theology: An Introduction (London, 1998); idem, Theology in the Context of Science (London, 2008); A. Richardson, The Bible in the Age of Science (London, 1964); C. A. Russell, Crosscurrents: Interactions between Science and Faith (Leicester, 1985); T. F. Torrance, Christian Theology and Scientific Culture (Belfast, 1980); idem, Theological Science (Oxford, 1996).

C. A. RUSSELL

SCIENTOLOGY, see SECTS

SCOTS CONFESSION

The Scots Confession was one of a number of confessions and catechisms which were produced during and after the Protestant Reformation of the sixteenth century. The purpose of these confessions was to state in summary form the content of the Christian faith as understood by Protestant theologians, particularly as distinguished from medieval Catholicism. Each strand of the Reformation produced its own distinctive theology. The Scots Confession is one of the representative documents of the Calvinistic strand of the Reformation, as opposed to the Lutheran or Anabaptist strands.

It was written in 1560, the year of the Scottish Reformation, at the request of the Scottish Parliament. It was drawn up in four days by John Knox, John Winram, John Spottiswoode, John Willock, John Douglas and John Row (the six Johns). It was revised and then approved by Parliament. The majority of scholars agree that it was primarily the work of John *Knox and indeed it is sometimes referred to as 'Knox's Confession', although some would argue that the work was done more equally by the six. It consists of twenty-five short chapters, beginning (unlike later Reformed Confessions) with the doctrine of God. It remained the official confession of the Church of Scotland (see *Presbyterianism) until 1647, when it was replaced with the *Westminster Confession of Faith.

See also: CONFESSIONS OF FAITH; REFORMERS, SCOTTISH; REFORMED THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

J. H. S. Burleigh, A Church History of Scotland (Oxford, 1960); G. D. Henderson, The Scots Confession of 1560 (Edinburgh, 1960); J. Knox, The History of the Reformation of Religion in Scotland (London, 1905); T. McCrie, The Story of the Scottish Church (Glasgow, 1988); J. Rogers, Presbyterian Creeds: A Guide to the Book of Confessions (Louisville, 1985).

A. T. B. MCGOWAN

SCRIPTURE

Scripture (Lat. Scriptura, rendering Gk graphē, which means a writing and is used some fifty times in NT for some or all of OT) is the Judeo-Christian label for the literature that the church has historically received as God's own written witness to himself in the form of human witness to his work, will, ways and proper worship. Graphē bears essentially the same sense in both singular and plural: the Scriptures are all the items that make up the Bible, each viewed as part of the divine whole, and 'Scripture' means the same material viewed as one organic unit of divine instruction. 'Holy' is regularly prefixed to 'Scripture', pointing to God as both its source and its subject matter.

Beginning as a sect within Judaism, Christianity was from the start a book-religion, invoking the Hebrew Scriptures (and, since it used Greek, sometimes the Septuagint translation as well) to establish its identity, legitimacy, authority, continuity with Israel, and much of its teaching. As *Jesus had implicitly indicated that all his ministry was fulfilling all the hopes, dreams and ideals set forth in the Scriptures, so now the apostles trumpeted this claim, and it was natural that the church should soon bracket apostolic writings with the Jewish Scriptures as declaring their fulfilment of the latter by their witness to the being and doing, the character, purpose and work of the triune Creator-Saviour. (This, be it said, was from the outset the implicit, instinctive Christian conception of God, though words in which to express it were entirely lacking in the apostolic era.) Peter classed Paul's letters as Scripture, and Paul quoted the words of Jesus in Luke's Gospel as Scripture, as early as the sixties of the first century (2 Pet. 3:16; 1 Tim. 5:18).

By the end of the first century, most of our NT was collected and in use throughout the churches: the four Gospels and Acts matching the OT historical books, the apostles' pastoral letters matching the hortatory sermons of the prophets and wisdom writers, and the book of Revelation, with its symbolic anticipation of things to come, matching the visionary foreshadowings found in Daniel and some other prophets. The two collections have been regularly called the 'Old' and 'New' Testaments since the fourth century; earlier, the OT had been 'the Scriptures' and the NT 'the gospel and the apostles'.

Mainstream Christianity knows itself as a doxological response to a loving triune Creator who is now Redeemer of our race through, first, the ongoing mediation of the second divine person, the Son, who became man, died for sins, and now reigns cosmically as Jesus the Lord, and through, second, the ongoing ministry of the third divine person, the Holy Spirit, who evokes response to the Father and to Jesus, and who changes believers progressively into the moral and spiritual likeness of the incarnate Son. God the holy Three is known, and communed with, as a team, the Father as planner, promiser and provider overall, the Son and the Spirit as Saviour and Sanctifier respectively. Communion with this God calls for knowledge of his active tripersonhood, without which he is misconceived (see *Trinity); and this knowledge has been given by self-revealing communication from him, now committed to writing for permanent availability to all in an uncorrupt form. God, who equipped humankind with language for purposes of communication, now uses language to tell us the truth about himself. The end-product of *God's self-disclosure in history, and the means of its continuance in personal experience, is precisely Holy Scripture, the written word of God.

In literary terms, Scripture is a mix of prose and poetry, history and homily, letters, visions, memoirs, philosophy, love-lyrics directed both Godward and manward, law-codes, liturgical rubrics, genealogies, statistics, and more. In functional terms, it is a guide to godliness for sinful human beings, starting from wherever each person is and operating through illumination from the Holy Spirit, who helps in interpreting the biblical writings that he himself generated. In Scripture the outworking, past, present and future, of the Father's loving, Christ-centred plan of *redemption for both individuals and the cosmos is displayed; the required response (faith, repentance, hope, love, worship, service, thanksgiving, faithfulness) is analysed, verbalized, and illustrated by narratives; and Christians and churches are in effect told to live under this written word of God, where the truth of the apostolic gospel and the claims of the triune Lord are brought home. Theological discussion of Scripture should always be so oriented as to ensure that the ministry of the written word is not blocked but enhanced.

Scripture and canon

Before asking which books belong to the canon, we should ask what being canonical actually signifies. Kanōn (Gk) means a rule, measure or standard. Scripture is called canonical because it is God's rule for belief and behaviour. The uses of canon for a list of books that are canonical in this sense are secondary and derivative. The church has always known, more or less clearly, that it did not create a canon by discretionary fiat, but received the canon that God created for it. The OT canon (i.e. the thirty-nine books read and stored in first-century Palestinian synagogues, Jesus' Bible) came to the church from the hands, as it were, of Christ and his apostles, for whom Christianity's credentials presupposed the divine authority of Jewish Scripture, which Christian fact fulfilled. The NT canon comes in effect from the same source, for it was the *Holy Spirit whom Christ sent who enabled the apostles to speak and write the truth about Jesus, and who all along has brought about recognition of apostolic documents as canonical. The basis of that recognition was, and is, (1) apostolic authorship for authentication, (2) Christ-honouring doctrinal content, in line with the known teaching of other apostles, and (3) continuous acknowledgment and spiritually fruitful use of the books within the church from the apostolic age on – a consideration that becomes weightier and more compelling with every passing year.

The historic *Protestant claim, that the Holy Spirit authenticates the canonical books by causing them to impose themselves upon believers as a divine rule for faith and life, should be understood in corporate terms – namely, as meaning that at no time has the great body of the church rejected any book now rated canonical, and that divine authority is constantly experienced by the faithful when canonical Scripture is read and preached in the congregation.

On the extent of the canon there has not been perfect unanimity. Protestants hold to the sixty-six-book list found in Athanasius' Festal Letter of 367, in Jerome, and in the canons of the provincial council that met at Carthage in 397; the Council of Trent defined twelve apocryphal books into the Roman canon in 1546; the Synod of Jerusalem defined four of these (Judith, Tobit, Wisdom and Ecclesiasticus) into the Eastern Orthodox canon in 1672; Luther rejected James; and so on. But these are relatively small matters: Luther's trouble was that he misunderstood James, supposing him to contradict Paul; and the Apocrypha is not important for doctrine. More important is the fact that the principles of canonicity to which, however unconvincingly, appeal was made each time, remained constant throughout. Thus, (2) above was Luther's warrant for rejecting James, and (3) was the Roman Catholic and Orthodox warrant for canonizing apocryphal books that were no part of Christ's Bible.

Scripture and revelation

The historic Christian view, which goes back to Christ, that Scripture is verbal *revelation in writing, is unfashionable today; most contemporary theologians classify Scripture as a human record, exposition and celebration of God in history which God uses for self-revealing encounters with us in the present. This formula, though true so far (unless 'human' is taken to imply inadequacy, incoherence or incorrectness), is theologically incomplete. That Scripture is intrinsically revelation must also be affirmed (see next section). But when this affirmation is not properly related to God's saving work in history, it too becomes incomplete. Scripture depicts revelation as a complex work of *grace whereby God brings sinners into *saving knowledge of himself, and the nature of Scripture as revelation must be understood within this functional frame.

In revelation, according to the Bible, God acts at three linked levels. Level one is revelation *on the public stage of history, in a series of redemptive events of which God's verbal predictions and explanations at each stage formed part. This series reached a penultimate climax in the incarnation, atonement, resurrection and enthroning of the Son of God and the Pentecostal outpouring of the Spirit. Awaited now is the final climax of Christ's return for judgment and cosmic renewal, which will end history as we know it (see *Eschatology).

Within this sequence emerged level two, revelation in the public records of Scripture. As redemptive revelation unfolded, God caused narrational, explanatory and anticipatory writing to be done that would preserve and spread true knowledge of his ongoing work of grace.

Level three is revelation in the personal consciousness of individuals: that is, the gift to sin-blinded humans of a responsive understanding of the God of history and Holy Scripture. This gift is given through the enlightening ministry of the Holy Spirit, who interprets to us the contents of Scripture, in whatever form these are met. The *Reformers insisted that as only Scripture, unaugmented from philosophical or religious sources, can bring us to know God, so it is only as the Spirit opens Scripture to us and writes its teachings on our hearts that this knowledge becomes reality for us.

Undergirding Scripture's instrumental function at level three is the total trustworthiness that its divine origin guarantees. Were the 'public records' incoherent and misleading, the knowledge of God based on them would be a dangerous half-ignorance. The many who nowadays imply this to be the case by their critiquing of the historic faith call in question not only the veracity of God as Scripture's primary author, but also his wisdom and competence in communication. If documents designed to make God known to all generations are untrustworthy and so inadequate for their purpose, God has indeed failed badly. But only the various forms of *liberal theology would ever require such a conclusion.

Scripture and inspiration

The historic description of Scripture as inspired means, not that it is inspiring (although it is), but that it is 'God-breathed' (theopneustos, 2 Tim. 3:16), a product of the Creator-Spirit's work, always to be viewed as the preaching and teaching of God himself in and through the words of the human witnesses who were divinely moved to write it. Both Testaments cite the words of Scripture as God's own words. Paul's quoting of God's promise to Abraham and threat to Pharaoh as the utterance of Scripture to both (Gal. 3:8; Rom. 9:17) shows how completely he equated statements of Scripture with words of God. And by teaching and commanding in Christ's name, claiming Christ's authority because he was Christ's apostle, and insisting that both his matter and his wording were Spirit-given, Paul showed that apostolic utterances were to be treated as truth and wisdom from God in just the same way that OT declarations were to be (see 2 Thess. 3:6; 1 Cor. 14:37; 2:9-13).

Since the God who created Scripture by sanctifying his servants' authorial efforts is true and no deceiver, biblical *infallibility and inerrancy become articles of faith. Jesus, though human, did not go astray in conduct or teaching, and there is no a priori reason why the Bible, though human, should go wrong either. Those who confess a sinless Christ cannot consistently dismiss the analogous belief in an inerrant Bible. To treat the unequivocal witness of Christ and the apostles to the nature of Scripture as not settling the matter, and to go against them, is illogical, irreverent and indefensible. The phenomena of Scripture should be dealt with on the assumption that, being God-given, it is faithful to physical, moral and spiritual reality. This has been taken for granted for most of Christian history, and is taken for granted by most of the world church still.

Scripture and interpretation

As the Reformers discerned, word and Spirit go together, and it is through Spirit-led interpretation that God's communication is received. Interpreting Scripture is, however, a demanding activity. Assuming God's changelessness, Scripture's trustworthiness and the doxological goal of encounters with deity, the interpreter's task is to draw from Scripture and apply to thought and life today all those truths about God, humanity and their mutual relations that the texts yield. Since the biblical books are occasional writings addressed to people and situations of long ago, interpretive method involves unshelling those truths from the particular applications in which we find them embedded and reapplying them to ourselves. We must move from what the text meant historically to what it means as a word from God for us today. And this can be tricky (see *Hermeneutics).

To grasp what the text meant requires grammatical-historical exegesis that takes account of the text's linguistic idiom, literary genre, cultural and geographical milieu, and the life-situation of both writer and first readers, so far as this can be known. So one must ask where, when, by whom, for what reason, to what end and with what resources each book, and the part of it now being studied, was written.

Then, discerning what the text means in application today requires two things. The truths excavated by exegesis must be checked to ensure that they square with the covenantal, Christocentric, redemptive, holiness-oriented framework of canonical revelation as a whole, for only if they do so dare one believe they have been perceived aright. After that, they should be set to interrogate us for 'rebuking, correcting and training in righteousness' (2 Tim. 3:16) as they confront our inadequacies, clarify to us our calling and our hope, and animate us to the activities of obedience. Spirit-given sensitivity to our own situation must be sought from God at this stage; we cannot succeed in obeying God without it, for then we shall still be unaware of all that needs to be done.

Scripture and authority

*Authority is the basic theological issue into which discussions of biblical revelation, inspiration and interpretation finally run. At issue is the nature and extent of the motivating control that canonical Scripture should exercise over the doctrine, discipline and devotion of the church and its members. That Scripture mediates the authority of the God who gave it and the Christ to whom it testifies, that it does this by presenting the presence of this God and the realities of salvation-history in their universal significance, and that it cannot have authority further than it is true (for falsehood has no right to rule) are points of widespread contemporary agreement. That the church has no right to read into Scripture, or graft on to it, traditional ideas that cannot be read out of it, and that no individual Christian is ever entitled to back his or her judgment against it, are principles that should command full agreement, though sometimes they do not. It cannot be said too often or too strongly that submission to Scripture is one aspect of submission to Christ.

The Reformers formulated and vindicated biblical authority against ecclesiastical waywardness by three corrective assertions, covered together in the tag-phrase sola Scriptura (by Scripture alone):

- The necessity of Scripture. Only biblically taught notions of God will be true and can be trusted. Speculations lead astray.
- The sufficiency of Scripture. All that needs to be known for godliness and salvation is on display in the Bible. Additions lead astray.
- The clarity of Scripture. The canonical books exhibit their unity and build up their message from within. In that sense, Scripture interprets Scripture. Imposed interpretations lead astray.

Post-Reformation theology recognizes that the role of Scripture is to critique as well as instruct.

Scripture in the church

The Bible has always been studied, taught and preached primarily as meat and drink for feeding and forming the faithful, those already grounded in orthodox belief (the rule of faith, the *creeds, the *confessions and doctrinal bases), and who need and desire application of God's truth to their own lives. From *Justin Martyr through *Thomas Aquinas to the Reformation and since, it has been acknowledged that doctrine can only be established from the 'literal' sense of the text (that is, the sense that the human writer directly expressed). But from *Irenaeus and *Origen through the Middle Ages devotional allegorizing, moral and mystical in thrust, was additionally practised within the bounds of orthodoxy in order to edify, and some preachers, especially outside the West, still do this, as do some Christians in their private meditations.

See also: SCRIPTURE, DOCTRINE OF; SCRIPTURE AND TRADITION.

Bibliography

J. Barr, The Bible in the Modern World (London, 1973); K. Barth, CD, I.1–2; G. C. Berkouwer, Holy Scripture (Grand Rapids, 1975); D. G. Bloesch, Holy Scripture (Downers Grove, 1994); S. Fowl (ed.), The Theological Interpretation of Scripture (Oxford, 1997); N. Geisler (ed.), Inerrancy (Grand Rapids, 1979); P. Helm and Carl R. Trueman (eds.), The Trustworthiness of God (Grand Rapids, 2002); C. F. H. Henry, God, Revelation, and Authority, vols. I–IV (Waco, 1976–9); A. Kuyper, Principles of Sacred Theology (Grand Rapids, 1954); B. M. Metzger, The Canon of the New Testament (Oxford, 1987); J. I. Packer, God Has Spoken (London, 2005); C. Pinnoch, Biblical Revelation (Chicago, 1971); idem, The Scripture Principle (San Francisco, 1984); E. Rademacher and R. Preus (eds.), Hermeneutics, Inerrancy, and the Bible (Grand Rapids, 1984); A. C. Thiselton, The Two Horizons (Exeter, 1980); idem, New Horizons in Hermeneutics (London and Grand Rapids, 1992); K. J. Vanhoozer, Is There a Meaning in This Text? (Grand Rapids, 1998); idem, First Theology (Downers Grove, 2002); B. Vawter, Biblical Inspiration (London, 1972); B. B. Warfield, The Inspiration and Authority of the Bible (Philadelphia, 1948); N. Wolterstorff, Divine Discourse (Cambridge, 1995).

J. I. PACKER

SCRIPTURE AND TRADITION

The relationship between Scripture and tradition cannot be studied in isolation. They interact with one another only through a third party: the contemporary *church. It might help to define the two terms. 'Scripture' refers to the canonical writings of both Testaments. The early Christians inherited the Jewish (OT) Scriptures, but did not immediately acquire a parallel body of Christian Scriptures. Early moves toward it (e.g. 2 Pet. 3:14–16) came to fruition by the time of Irenaeus, by when there was a clear concept of an NT alongside the OT. The acceptance of Christian Scriptures posed the question of the relation between these writings and the Christian tradition, which included the teaching of the *apostles handed down in other ways in the church.

'Tradition' is sometimes understood narrowly to refer solely to extra-scriptural or even unscriptural traditions. Such clearly exist, but our present concern is with tradition in the broader sense of the Christian faith as it is handed down to us from the past. Such a broad definition could logically include Scripture (as in Orthodox thought, in which Scripture is often seen as part of the tradition which is the expression of the work of the *Holy Spirit in the church), but since our concern is with the relation between Scripture and tradition, we shall follow normal Western usage and exclude Scripture from the definition. Every Christian group has to grapple with the relationship between these two. There is no Christian group, however informal, that has no tradition. Similarly, every Christian group, however informal, has some authority structure, some standards of what is and is not 'Christian'. It is this element, the contemporary teaching authority of the church, which must not be forgotten in considering the relation between Scripture and tradition.

The relationship between Scripture, tradition and church has been seen differently over the ages. The earliest view may be called the coincidence view; the church teaches what the apostles taught, which it receives from the apostolic Scriptures and from the apostolic tradition. Scripture, tradition and church are assumed to teach the same one apostolic message. There is no conflict between them, and the whole Christian message is found in each. It is this approach that was adopted by *Irenaeus and *Tertullian against *Gnosticism. The Gnostics appealed to their own scriptures and to their own secret traditions. Irenaeus responded with the claim that the apostles' teaching, found in their genuine writings, was handed down in an open public tradition of teaching in those churches which they had founded, where it was still taught. This threefold cord provided the most effective answer to the Gnostic claims.

In time, the coincidence view came to be overshadowed by the supplementary view: tradition is needed to supplement Scripture, to provide teaching not found in Scripture. The belief that apostolic tradition supplements Scripture as a guide to practice is found early, but it was some time before theologians came to defend beliefs which they acknowledged not to be in Scripture. An important step in this direction was taken by *Basil of Caesarea in his defence of the deity of the Holy Spirit, where he states that some Christian beliefs are not found in Scripture. This approach became more common in the Middle Ages, with the emergence of doctrines concerning *Mary which lacked explicit scriptural grounding. But the coincidence view was never lost sight of.

The supplementary view could be invoked to justify beliefs with no scriptural basis. But what of beliefs actually contrary to Scripture? As the Middle Ages drew to a close, various groups began to raise this charge against some *Roman Catholic doctrines. These charges came to a head in the Reformation. The most fundamental issue in the *Reformation was not *justification by faith, not the role of tradition, but the relationship between Scripture and the church. The Magisterial Reformers rejected the teachings of the Roman Church in the name of the scriptural gospel. In turn, they faced the charge of heresy for rejecting church doctrine. The issue was simple: Does the gospel define the church, or vice versa? The Reformers branded the Roman Catholic Church a false church for suppressing the gospel. Rome called the Reformers heretics for rejecting the teaching of holy mother church. The Reformers did not believe in 'private judgment', with every man his own theologian. But they did believe that all church teaching needs to be tested by Scripture. They had a deep respect for tradition, especially the teaching of the early Fathers. But tradition must not add to Scripture and must be tested by Scripture. The *Radical Reformers generally adopted a more negative view of tradition, although with time many developed their own traditions and some gave expression to them in authoritative *confessions of faith.

The Council of *Trent responded to the Reformers in its Decree on Scripture and Tradition (1546). It stated that 'the truth and discipline [of the gospel] are contained in the written books and in unwritten traditions – those unwritten traditions, that is, which were either received by the apostles from the mouth of Christ himself or were received from the apostles themselves (having been dictated by the Holy Spirit) and have come down even to us, having been transmitted as it were hand by hand'. Furthermore, Scripture and tradition are to be venerated 'with equal affection of piety and reverence'. It used to be believed that this committed Rome to the supplementary view, but more recently J. R. Geisemann (1890–1970) and others have challenged this assumption. It is now widely accepted that Trent does not foreclose the question of the material sufficiency or otherwise of Scripture. In other words, Trent allows the view that all Catholic doctrine is found in Scripture. What is quite clear in the teaching of Trent is the role of the church, guided by the Holy Spirit. No-one shall 'presume to interpret [the Scriptures] contrary to that sense which holy mother Church, to whom it belongs to judge of their true sense and interpretation, has held and holds, or even contrary to the unanimous teaching of the Fathers'.

Many changes have taken place since the sixteenth century. Historical criticism has affected the church's approach to the Bible and has also shown how doctrine has changed over the years. Today the fact of the *development of doctrine is widely accepted by both Roman Catholic and Protestant theologians. But despite these changes, the fundamental issue, the relationship between Scripture and the church, remains much the same. At the Second *Vatican Council (1962–5), the dogmatic constitution on Divine Revelation expounded, in the second chapter, the relationship between Scripture, tradition and church. Due to the efforts of Geisemann and others the question of the material (in)sufficiency of Scripture was left open. The apostolic teaching of the gospel is transmitted to us through both Scripture and tradition, which 'are to be accepted and venerated with the same sense of devotion and reverence'. Development of doctrine is acknowledged: 'there is a growth in the understanding of the realities and the words which have been handed down.' (The Council was indebted to the work of J. H. *Newman, who argued that it is the teaching of the contemporary church, guided by the Spirit, which is authoritative, and that the teaching of earlier generations should be interpreted in the light of this.) But the final authority is neither Scripture nor tradition, but the teaching office of the church: 'The task of authentically interpreting the word of God, whether written or handed on, has been entrusted exclusively to the living teaching office of the church, whose authority is exercised in the name of Jesus Christ.' Among Protestants today there is a greater willingness than before to acknowledge the importance of tradition and to ascribe to it a high role. This is seen very clearly in the report Scripture, Tradition and Traditions of the Fourth World Conference on Faith and Order of the WCC, which met at Montreal in 1963. But there are no signs that Protestants are willing to submit their interpretation of Scripture to 'the living teaching office of the church'.

Tradition cannot be escaped. A sermon in church, a book read at home, sharing one's faith with a friend – all of these are tradition in action. Tradition is inevitable – and also desirable. The adage that 'those who are ignorant of history are condemned to repeat it' holds true in the history of theology. Those who have arrogantly despised tradition have often ended by relearning some of the most basic lessons that the past can teach us. Karl Barth aptly stated that the correct attitude to tradition is summarized in the fifth commandment: honour your father and mother. We must honour our theological forebears and listen with respect to the voice of the past, but we are not bound by it. With tradition, as with parents, there are times when we should say 'we must obey God rather than men'. Tradition is worthy of respect, but is subject to the word of God in the Scriptures. If a tradition represents a manifestation of the Spirit's teaching work, it will not contradict Scripture.

The Reformers coined the slogan sola Scriptura: Scripture alone. What does this mean? It does not mean that we should use nothing but the Bible – that there is no place for dictionaries of theology and the like. It does not mean that we should learn Christian doctrine only directly from the Bible, which would make sermons and other books redundant. It does not even mean that we should recognize no other authority than the Bible in our Christianity. Tradition and the church inevitably and properly function as authorities in some sense. But the Bible remains the decisive and final authority, the norm by which all the teaching of tradition and the church is to be tested.

Bibliography

F. F. Bruce and E. G. Rupp (eds.), Holy Book and Holy Tradition (Manchester, 1968); Y. M. J. Congar, Tradition and Traditions (London, 1966); P. C. Rodger and L. Vischer (eds.), 'Scripture, Tradition and Traditions', in The Fourth World Conference on Faith and Order (London, 1964); G. H. Tavard, Holy Writ or Holy Church: The Crisis of the Protestant Reformation (London, 1959); WCC, A Treasure in Earthen Vessels (Geneva, 1998).

A. N. S. LANE

SCRIPTURE, DOCTRINE OF

The task of a doctrine of Scripture is rightly to handle the distinction and the relation of the human words in the Bible to the word of God. Jesus' oft-cited formula 'It is written' (e.g. Mark 14:27; Luke 4:8) ascribes supreme authority for life and thought to just these writings (Gk graphē ['writing'] is rendered in Latin by scriptura). Applied to the Bible, then, 'faith seeking understanding' involves, among other things, articulating its clarity, unity and sufficiency.

The doctrine of Scripture sets forth the reasons why the Bible is the supreme norm for Christian theology, as well as its relation to other doctrines. This dual purpose is seen in the prominent location of the article on Scripture at or near the beginning of many Protestant confessional statements. The Scots Confession, for example, states Scripture's authority 'to be from God', not from the church; the Westminster Confession of Faith declares Scripture 'the Word of God written'.

Nature: revelation and inspiration

The rise of modern historical understanding and concomitant loss of a supernaturalistic worldview led many to view the Bible as the record of human experience and, at best, an expression of human religious faith. Yet to call the Bible 'Scripture' is to regard it in some way as authoritative and part and parcel of what it means to be a Christian. However, it is one thing to assign supreme authority to Scripture, and quite another to appeal to it as an authority for theology and ethics.

Historic orthodoxy acknowledges Scripture to be 'holy' (set apart for a divine purpose) as the divinely appointed medium of God's self-communication. Where theologians differ, however, is over how God in his self-revelation relates to the biblical texts.

B. B. *Warfield responded to critical views of the Bible by reasserting its divine origin. The Bible presents itself as theopneustos (2 Tim. 3:16), literally ‘God-breathed’ or ‘expired’, not merely inspired in the sense of spiritually uplifting. Because the human authors are borne along by God’s Spirit (2 Pet. 1:21), what they say in Scripture is ultimately what God says.

Contra this ‘propositional’ emphasis, K. *Barth refused simply to equate the word of God with Scripture for fear of negating God’s freedom and confusing God’s self-revelation (‘personal’ in Jesus Christ) with information susceptible to human mastery. According to Barth, the Bible becomes the word of God only when God freely and actively communicates himself to human recipients by graciously commandeering the human words so that they effectively witness to their subject matter, Jesus Christ.

More recently, a number of proposals have sought to get beyond the propositionalist-impasse by viewing Scripture in terms of divine speech acts or discourse. Saying is a form of doing, and the concept of illocution refers to what one does in speaking. To equate the Bible with God’s word, then, is to recognize that God does more with human words than reveal information, or even himself: God also commands, warns, promises, consoles, rebukes, etc. Scripture is more than a textbook about God; it is a creaturely medium in which God personally relates to his people through a variety of communicative acts. Through literary forms such as poetry, song, parable and apocalyptic, Scripture appeals to the imagination as well as to the mind in order both to form and inform the people of God.

Authority: word and Spirit

To confess the Bible as the word of God is to locate Scripture in the broader triune economy of *revelation and *redemption. Scripture derives its *authority from its role in the mission of the divine communicative action – the movements of Word and Spirit – into the world. The ultimate authority in theology is the triune God speaking in and through the Scriptures.

B. Ramm identifies the *Protestant or ‘Scripture’ principle, and hence the principle of supreme authority, with the *Holy Spirit speaking in the Scriptures. To say that the words of the biblical text alone are authoritative gives rise, by contrast, to an abbreviated Protestant principle, a view that undermines the structure of theological authority by omitting the internal testimony of the Spirit that shaped both individuals and the church’s catholic tradition. ‘The temptation of biblicism is that it can speak of the inspiration of the Scriptures apart from the Lord they enshrine’ (Special Revelation and the Word of God, p. 117).

The doctrine of Scripture should not be isolated from other affirmations about God’s communicative presence and activity. Inspiration is related to *sanctification: the Spirit sets aside and shapes just these texts, their subject matter and verbal form, to serve the publication of the knowledge of God. Scripture is a creaturely means by which the triune God presents Christ, administers the covenant, and renews the world through the ministry of the word in the power of the Spirit. As such, it governs all that the church says, thinks and does by calling God’s people to respond, and correspond, to what God has done as Creator and Redeemer.

Interpretation: script and performance

Scripture is not simply a source of information about God’s work of creation and redemption, but an authoritative script that calls for God’s people to participate in its content: what God is doing in Christ through the Spirit to renew all things. The church, living in the first scene of the last act of the drama of redemption, is to be a theatre of the gospel precisely as the community that reads, understands, and then demonstrates its understanding of God’s word.

See also: INFALLIBILITY AND INERRANCY OF THE BIBLE; SCRIPTURE.

Bibliography

J. Barr, The Bible in the Modern World (London, 1973); J. Holcomb (ed.), Christian Theologies of Scripture (New York and London, 2006); D. Kelsey, Proving Doctrine: The Uses of Scripture in Modern Theology (Harrisburg, 1999); B. Ramm, Special Revelation and the Word of God (Grand Rapids, 1961); P. Satterthwaite and D. F. Wright (eds.), A Pathway into the Holy Scripture (Grand Rapids, 1994); K. Vanhoozer, The Drama of Doctrine: A Canonical-Linguistic Approach to Christian Theology (Louisville, 2005); T. Ward, Word and Supplement: Speech Acts, Biblical Texts, and the Sufficiency of Scripture (Oxford, 2002); B. B. Warfield, The Inspiration and Authority of the Bible (Philadelphia, 1948); J. Webster, Holy Scripture: A Dogmatic Sketch (Cambridge, 2003); N. Wolterstorff, Divine Discourse: Philosophical Reflections on the Claim That God Speaks (Cambridge, 1995); N. T. Wright, Scripture and the Authority of God (London, 2005).

K. J. VANHOZER

SEA OF FAITH MOVEMENT

Sea of Faith (SoF) is a loosely organized movement dedicated to exploring and promoting an understanding of religious faith as a human creation. With national networks in Great Britain, Australia and New Zealand, it claims approximately 2,000 members worldwide.

The movement traces its origins to a controversial book and television series of the same name. Written and presented by Don Cupitt, an Anglican priest and philosopher of religion at Cambridge University, The Sea of Faith (the title is taken from Matthew Arnold's poem 'Dover Beach') traced the decline of religious certainties in the modern world and urged a reevaluation of the meaning of traditional theological language. Religiously serious talk of 'God', for example, no longer is to be understood as referring to an independently existing divine being. Rather, it serves to give public voice to the spiritual and moral values that guide human life.

Cupitt's radical Christian humanism and the theological *non-realism it entailed are not universally shared within the movement he inspired. SoF has no official statement of belief; its members are united only by a common commitment to continuing exploration of the religious dimensions of human life and a deep aversion to all forms of religious authoritarianism.

Bibliography

D. Boulton, A Reasonable Faith: Introducing the Sea of Faith Network (Manchester, 1996); C. Crowder (ed.), God and Reality: Essays on Christian Non-Realism (London, 1997); D. Cupitt, The Sea of Faith (London, 1994); A. Freeman, God in Us: A Case for Christian Humanism (London, 1993); A. Moore, Realism and Christian Faith (Cambridge, 2003).

D. P. WOOD

SECTS

The contemporary study of sectarianism has its roots in the work of the Protestant theologian Ernst *Troeltsch and the sociologist Max *Weber, who made an important distinction between *church and sect. For Weber, traditionally, the church is not a voluntary organization, but rather a community into which one is born. Sects, on the other hand, are voluntarist and do not seek to regulate the lives of those who do not explicitly wish to become its members. Those who do wish to become members, however, must satisfy certain membership criteria in order to demonstrate their commitment to the sect. Hence, for Weber, the church-sect distinction focuses on membership – the church being inclusive, the sect exclusive.

This, however, is not a static relationship, in that successful sects tend to evolve into churches. On the one hand, the size of a sect has an impact on the internal dynamics of the movement, in that the more people that are involved, the more likely it is to progress towards a church-type institution. On the other hand, and more importantly, Weber observes the 'routinization of charisma'. A sect's charisma is usually located in a founder, an individual religious hero, the recipient of personal revelation. As the sect continues, particularly after the death of the founder, the charisma may be relocated to 'an office', such as the office of priest or the office of bishop. Successors, as they are inducted into these ministerial offices within a religious organization, inherit the charisma of the founder in much the same way as it is believed that the charisma of Jesus Christ was communicated through Peter to the *papal office and to the office of the priest (see *Ministry). Hence, churches and sects can be distinguished, not simply by the principle of membership, but also by the nature of charisma. Whereas in a sect charisma is original, attached to a leader, in a church it is routinized, attached to an office.

In The Social Teachings of the Christian Churches, Troeltsch employs Weber's church-sect distinction as a key tool of interpretation. In dialogue with Albrecht *Ritschl's thought, he examines the teaching of Jesus and the formation of the early church, after which he provides a detailed sociological analysis of medieval Christianity. Although much is taken from Weber, Troeltsch differed from him in several respects, the two principle differences being that he identified particular attitudes to 'the world' as a key distinguishing feature. His types can be summarized as follows: The church type is open to the world and, to some degree, will accept the secular order: 'The fully developed Church utilizes the *State and the ruling classes, and weaves these elements into her own life; she then becomes an integral part of the existing social order; from this standpoint, then, the Church both stabilizes and determines the social order; in so doing, however, she becomes dependent upon the upper classes, and upon their development.' The church type is most obviously represented by medieval *Catholicism, although it can also be seen in the later development of mainstream Protestant Christianity. The sect type of Christianity is found in relatively small voluntary groups that tend to separate themselves from church-type institutions. Moreover, sects tend to be 'connected with the lower classes, or at least with those elements in society which are opposed to the state and to society; they work upwards from below, and not downwards from above'.

While the work of Weber and Troeltsch has not gone unchallenged, the central theses have been developed in recent sociological studies of sectarianism. In particular, scholars have distinguished 'sects' from 'cults' or '*new religions'. While the latter are typically doctrinally distinct, novel developments within a particular social context, sects are schismatic movements, which, having broken away from their parent religion, are critical of its beliefs and practices, just as they are critical of the prevailing culture and civil authorities. Indeed, sects, such as the Jehovah's Witnesses, typically claim to be the defenders of true faith over against a church or a religion that has become 'lukewarm' and barely distinguishable from the surrounding society and culture. Hence, sects tend to be revivalist, enthusiastic and authoritarian organizations, which exert significant demands on their members.

Not all sects are the same. They do not, for example, all demand the same levels of commitment from their members, or the same degrees of separation from the wider society. For example, reflecting Troeltsch's analysis of sectarian attitudes to 'the world', the sociologist Bryan Wilson (1926–2004) distinguished four sub-types of Christian sect: (1) *conversionist, (2) Adventist/revolutionist, (3) introversionist/*pictist, and (4) *Gnostic.

Conversionist sects seek to alter people, and thereby to alter the world; the response is free-will optimism. The Adventist sects predict drastic alteration of the world, and seek to prepare for the new dispensation – a pessimistic determinism. The Introversionists reject the world's values and replace them with higher inner values, for the realization of which inner resources are cultivated. The Gnostic sects accept in large measure the world's goals but seek a new and esoteric means to achieve these ends – a wishful mysticism.

While this, of course, is not the only typology available, it has been influential and does help us to grasp the complexity and breadth of sectarian religion.

Bibliography

G. Chrystides and B. Zeller (eds.), The Bloomsbury Companion to New Religious Movements (London, 2014); C. Partridge (ed.), Encyclopedia of New Religions: New Religious Movements, Sects and Alternative Spiritualities (Oxford, 2004); E. Troeltsch, The Social Teaching of the Christian Churches, tr. O. Wyon, 2 vols. (New York, 1931); M. Weber, 'The Protestant Sects and the Spirit of Capitalism', in H. H. Gerth and C. W. Mills (eds.), From Max Weber: Essays in Sociology (London, 1948), pp. 302–322; B. R. Wilson, Sects and Society: A Sociological Study of Three Religious Groups in Britain (London, 1961); idem, The Social Dimensions of Sectarianism: Sects and New Religious Movements in Contemporary Society (Oxford, 1990); idem (ed.), Patterns of Sectarianism (London, 1967).

C. PARTRIDGE

SECULAR CHRISTIANITY

*Secularization is that process in European history marking the transition from the religious worldview to the secular worldview, approximately from 1570 to 1970. At the beginning of the period religion was the fabric of society, within which everything cohered, individuals and institutions. By the end of the period meaning and value emerged from within the saeculum, the here and now.

The irreligious interpreted this process as the death of (God) religion. The religious agreed. Battle was joined with secularism, a militant *atheistic worldview also linked conveniently to the Cold War. There was a third possible position: secular Christianity. Rejecting secularism as an irreligious and dehumanizing ideology, some Christians welcomed secularization, a process which had enabled very positive advances in the natural, medical and social sciences, together with the spread of egalitarian values of democracy and inclusivity in society. They held that Christians should critically engage with the secular and not seek to return to the medieval world with its corruption, cruelty and injustice.

Bibliography

J. Casanova, Public Religions in the Modern World (Chicago, 1994); A. Kee, The Way of Transcendence (London, 1971); D. Martin, A General Theory of Secularization (Oxford, 1978); R. G. Smith, Secular Christianity (London, 1966).

A. KEE

SECULARIZATION

From its inception in the nineteenth century, sociology has predicted the decline of *religion in modern societies. Nowadays, while few would doubt that some form of religious diminution or 'secularization' is taking place, there has been much debate as to its nature. Indeed, there has been an increased focus on 'de-secularization', 'sacralization', 're-enchantment', and, more recently, the 'post-secular', all of which, in various ways, identify the growth of the significance of religious discourses personally, socially and culturally in post-industrial societies.

The term 'secularization' had its origin in the Peace of Westphalia (1648) designating the transfer of ecclesiastical property into princely hands. Hence, secularization came to refer to the transfer of material goods from the religious sphere to the non-religious (secular) sphere. Likewise, in sociology, secularization refers to the historical transition from a religious social context to a less or non-religious social context. As Bryan Wilson put it, secularization is 'the process whereby religious thinking, practice and institutions lose their social significance'. In other words, secularization is a complex, multi-dimensional process. Not only does it describe the decline of religious institutions, but also the decline of the importance of religion for both society and for individuals. Hence, as Karel Dobbelaere has argued, secularization needs to be analysed across three levels: the macro-level (society), the meso-level (organizations) and the micro-level (individuals).

Classic theories of secularization, which seek to explain, rather than simply to describe the process, typically argue that 'modernization' leads to the erosion of religion and 'the disenchantment of the world' (Max Weber). Central to modernization is the progress of capitalism and what Weber referred to as 'rationalization', by which he meant the focus on reason, the scientific method, and the growth of a goal-oriented culture for which efficiency is central (see *Enlightenment; *Modernity). In the modern period, traditional values and beliefs quickly succumbed to the most efficient methods of production in order to increase profit. Gradually, this had implications for religion. For example, praying for a good harvest and observing the Sabbath is less effective than spraying with fertilizers and pesticides and working seven days a week. As such, religion began to lose its place at the centre of modern social and cultural life. It was increasingly privatized, in that, while it was considered to be acceptable for those who found it personally comforting, it seemed to make little sense for progressive modern economies and societies.

Likewise, modernity encouraged the growth of individualism and the 'turn to the self'. This has contributed to secularization, in that, again, it corrodes the social bonds so central to the communities on which traditional organized religion depends. The authority of the community, the church, the clergy, the Bible and even God, are all called into question by the modern tendency to elevate the authority of individual reason and experience.

Again, modernity has witnessed the rise of the secular nation *state. That is to say, modern states have formally separated themselves from the church and taken control of large areas of social and political life. Consequently, key social functions once performed by religious organizations have been transferred to the modern state and secular agencies.

The overall effect of such developments has been a significant decline in the numbers of those who actively participate in religious communities. Many simply do not see the point of religion, and those who do, tend to pursue self-oriented, non-institutional, private forms of 'spirituality'.

While there is a general consensus regarding secularization, there are competing theories as to the details of the process itself. Four main varieties of secularization theory can be usefully distinguished: the disappearance thesis; the differentiation thesis; the de-intensification thesis; and the co-existence thesis. The disappearance thesis, which reflects the nineteenth-century theories of Émile *Durkheim and Max *Weber, claims that religion will effectively disappear in modern societies. Similarly, Karl *Marx predicted the displacement of religion by a new 'communist society'. The differentiation thesis is more cautious, in that it argues that, while religion will retain some significance in private life, it is becoming increasingly insignificant in social life. The de-intensification thesis claims that religion will continue to have a nominal presence in society, but only in a de-intensified, weak and insubstantial form, such as a way of investing births, marriages and deaths with some form of social significance. The coexistence thesis is more positive. It argues that, while secularization takes place in particular social contexts, in other contexts religions retain their vitality, and even grow. As we will see below, some have observed that in other areas of the world, modernization has not led to secularization.

Secularization theories can also be categorized according to the particular processes of modernization identified as its principal causes. First, differentiation theories argue that the roots of secularization are to be located in the processes of 'functional' differentiation. The various functions of modern society (health, education, social services, and so on) become increasingly disengaged from religion. Secondly, theories which focus on 'rationalization' argue that secularization can be understood by attending to the processes by which a modern society becomes rationalized, bureaucratized and science-oriented in its modes of operation. Gradually, science, technology and bureaucracy dominate our understanding of the world, thereby making magic and the supernatural redundant. Thirdly, there are theories which focus on pluralization. These observe that the awareness that others hold different beliefs tends to erode an exclusive commitment to one's own beliefs and thus promotes secularization of the mind (micro-level secularization). How do I know that my own beliefs are true and not culturally relative? Perhaps all religious beliefs are culturally relative? Fourthly, theories which focus on individualization argue that the process by which authority is internalized is damaging to religion, since religious institutions seek to have authority over people, rather than allowing individuals to make their own choices and follow their own paths. In other words, in modern societies when the authority of the self is challenged by traditional religion, it tends to be traditional religion that suffers. Finally, following Durkheim, theories which maintain that religion flourishes at the level of the local community argue that, because the modern period has witnessed the progress of urbanization and a decline in local communities, secularization is inevitable.

So far the focus has been on religion in Western societies. However, some sociologists have argued that, just because modernization in Europe has led to secularization, does not mean that this will always and everywhere be the case. Modernization may be hostile to religion, but religions can adapt and survive depending on a number of contextual variables. For example, Peter Berger, one of the principal architects of 'the disappearance thesis', changed his mind in later life and encouraged us to consider the 'desecularization of the world'. We should not assume that the Western relationship between modernization and religion is the only one, for it is clear that modernization in other parts of the world has not led to the erosion of religion. In fact, religion beyond the West seems to be thriving. Indeed, there are now several versions of modernity and modernization gaining ground, including the notion of multiple modernities, not all of which entail secularization to the same degree.

Even in the West, strong theories of secularization that predict the disappearance of religion are being challenged by those who encourage us to look beyond traditional institutional religion. For example, while the 'turn to the self' in modern societies has contributed to the decline of traditional mainstream religion, it has also contributed to the rise of new self-oriented beliefs. In other words, what we are witnessing in the West may be less a case of the decline of religion and more a case of the relocation of religion. Some scholars have framed this in terms of a shift from 'religion' to '*spirituality'. While religious behaviours like church attendance have declined, belief in the supernatural, the paranormal, and the spiritual significance of the self remains high. Hence, the evidence suggests that, while theistic notions of a transcendent deity have suffered, there is a turn to more immanent and ‘holistic’ forms of spirituality. Sometimes termed ‘self religion’, this process has more to do with the cultivation of a unique subjective life than with conforming to divinely revealed norms. Rather than turning to traditional authorities, Western modernity has encouraged individuals to create and re-create themselves, carving out their own paths and constructing their own identities. It is not surprising, therefore, that ‘religion’ is giving way to new forms of ‘spirituality’ that offer the enhancement and cultivation of unique subjective lives. Personal growth becomes identified with spiritual growth (see *New religions).

While modern societies are typically characterized by a distrust of religion, and often hostility to it, nevertheless its presence is increasingly felt and its discourses used in ‘the public sphere’. Hence, many now make use of the term ‘post-secular’ to describe the ways in which non-secular belief persists in secular contexts. However we understand the post-secular (and there are a variety of interpretations), it seems clear that there is a tension between the processes of secularization/disenchantment and sacralization/re-enchantment. The secular is challenged, not only by the ubiquitous presence of non-secular discourses in, for example, popular culture (typically involving paranormal phenomena), but also by the migration of communities from parts of the world where religion is still important and by the presence of religion in the media. All of this makes adherence to strong theories of secularization increasingly difficult to maintain.

In the final analysis, secularization is a powerful theory largely because it appears to make sense of what most people observe to be obviously the case, namely that societies are becoming progressively less religious. However, significant evidence of spiritual growth in Western societies has led to softer versions of secularization and, in some cases, to substantial revisions. Moreover, many now argue that, while secularization is taking place in some contexts, in other contexts we are witnessing some form of ‘re-enchantment’.

Bibliography

J. Beckford, ‘Public Religions and the Post-secular: Critical Reflections’, Journal for the Scientific Study of Religion 51 (2012), pp. 1–19; P. Berger (ed.), The Desecularization of the World (Grand Rapids, 2000); S. Bruce, Secularization: In Defence of an Unfashionable Theory (Oxford, 2011); K. Dobbelaere, Secularization: An Analysis at Three Levels (Frankfurt, 2002); P. Heelas and L. Woodhead, The Spiritual Revolution (Oxford, 2005); C. Partridge, The Re-Enchantment of the West, 2 vols. (London, 2004, 2006); K. Wiegandt and H. Joas (eds.), Secularization and the World Religions (Liverpool, 2009); B. Wilson, Religion in Secular Society (London, 1966); L. Woodhead and P. Heelas, Religion in Modern Times (Oxford, 2000).

C. PARTRIDGE

SEMI-PELAGIANISM

Semi-Pelagianism was a largely monastic movement of reaction against *Augustine’s developed anti-*Pelagian teachings (and hence more fittingly called Semi-Augustinianism; ‘Semi-Pelagian’ is found no earlier than the sixteenth century). This ‘revolt of the monasteries’ began in Roman Africa in 427, evoking from Augustine Grace and Free Will and Correction and Grace in response to critics of his Letter 194. When he heard of monastic disaffection in South Gaul, where John Cassian’s teaching breathed an *Origenist optimism (cf. P. Munz in JEH 11, 1960, pp. 1–22), Augustine wrote The Predestination of the Saints and The Gift of Perseverance. Controversy continued after his death (430), with his weightiest critic, Vincent of Lérins (see *Catholicity), whose famous Commonitory implicitly faults his ‘non-catholic’ doctrine, and Prosper of Aquitaine (c. 390–c. 463) his tireless champion. Later, Faustus of Riez (c. 408–c. 490) and Fulgentius of Ruspe (468–533) represented the two positions.

Eventually, Bishop Caesarius of Arles (c. 470–542) convened the Second Council of Orange in 529, which condemned Semi-Pelagian (and Pelagian) doctrines and endorsed a qualified Augustinian theology. Its decrees, compiled by Caesarius partly from Prosper’s digest of Augustine, rejected *predestination to evil, affirmed that with God’s *grace we can fulfil his will, and were silent on such issues as irresistible grace, the fate of unbaptized infants and the manner of transmission of original sin.

The initial point of difference concerned ‘the beginning of *faith’. Augustine’s critics insisted that this was an act of unaided human freedom, although grace instantly strengthened incipient faith. Augustine held that ‘the will is prepared by God’ by prevenient grace alone. The assault soon extended to the ‘fixed quota’ who were alone predestined to salvation and granted such grace, the abandonment of the rest of the ‘mass of perdition’ to just condemnation, the irresistibility of grace in the elect and their infallible *perseverance to the end. Objection was also taken to Augustine’s denial that God ‘willed all people to be saved’, which even Prosper eventually abandoned.

This anti-Augustinianism arose in part out of a monastic spirituality anxious lest fatalism should encourage lethargy (monastic accidie) and make rebuke and exhortation, not to say prayer and evangelism, pointless. Although Augustine feared a recrudescence of Pelagianism proper, these ‘semi-Augustinians’ affirmed original sin and the necessity of grace for salvation, but sought a balanced antimony between grace and freedom, disliked the resort to God’s hidden counsels in election and doubted whether a just predestination could avoid being based on foreknowledge.

The doctrinal issues opened up in these decades have reappeared regularly, especially in the sixteenth to eighteenth centuries (see *Jesuit theology) and in the ceaseless ‘Calvinist (see *Reformed theology) vs. *Arminian’ debate in modern evangelicalism.

Bibliography

Prosper’s Works, tr. P. De Letter, ACW 14 (1952) and 32 (1963); E. Amann in DTC 14 (1941), cols. 1796–1850; P. Brown, Augustine of Hippo (London, 1967); N. K. Chadwick, Poetry and Letters in Early Christian Gaul (London, 1955); O. Chadwick, John Cassian (Cambridge, 1968); G. Fritz in DTC 11 (1931), cols. 1087–1103; J. Pelikan, The Christian Tradition, 1: The Emergence of the Catholic Tradition (100–600) (Chicago, 1971); G. Weigel, Faustus of Riez (Philadelphia, 1938); F. H. Woods, The Canons of the Second Council of Orange (Oxford, 1882).

D. F. WRIGHT

SESSION OF CHRIST, see ASCENSION

SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTISM

In the late 1820s William Miller (1782–1849), a New England farmer and later Baptist preacher, became convinced by his study of the Bible that the Second Coming (Advent, see *Eschatology) would take place within the next few years. He began to proclaim this publicly, and a significant number of his hearers joined his ‘Adventist’ movement. Miller’s expectation that the Advent would take place between spring 1843 and spring 1844 proved unfounded, but one of his followers proposed 22 October 1844 as the day of the parousia, and Miller eventually and reluctantly endorsed this. After the ‘Great Disappointment’ of that date, many of the faithful (including Miller) returned to their original church allegiance, but some formed new Adventist churches. The most prominent of these is the Seventh-day Adventist (SDA) Church, which came together in 1863 as an amalgamation of three continuing ‘Millerite’ groups: (1) a group led by Joseph Bates (1792–1872), a retired sea captain who had become convinced by his study of the Bible and by contact with Seventh-Day Baptists that Saturday (the seventh day) should be observed as the Christian *Sabbath; (2) a group led by Hiram Edson (1806–82), whose insight was that biblical prophecy did indeed point to 22 October 1844, but that Miller’s understanding of its significance had been in error, and that that date marked the heavenly beginning of the last *judgment which would be executed on earth at the second coming (date unspecified); (3) a group formed around the prophetic ministry of Ellen Gould Harmon, later White, (1827–1915), whose visions served to comfort the disappointed, and later to endorse the teachings of the other two groups. These in turn accepted Ellen White’s prophetic gift.

Despite its North American origins and administrative centre, the church has been missionary from a very early stage (its first official missionary, J. N. Andrews [1829–83], began work in Switzerland in 1874), and today of a world membership of more than 17 million (as of June 2011) fewer than one in ten lives in North America and the church can be found in 209 of the 232 countries and areas recognized by the UN.

Although the church in principle rejects any official creed, believing with many evangelicals that creedal statements leave the believer unable to accept any ‘new light’ which God may choose to reveal, in practice its faith is enshrined in the ‘Fundamental Beliefs’, which have varied in number over time, but currently stand at twenty-eight. (They were last revised in 2005.) These affirm many articles of faith to which most *evangelical Christians would also assent. For example, the first Belief affirms that the Bible is the inspired word of God in which he ‘has committed to man the knowledge necessary for salvation’. Other central evangelical doctrines affirmed in the Fundamental Beliefs include the *Trinity (Nos. 2–5), the *fall (No. 7), the deity of *Christ, his *incarnation and his substitutionary *atonement in death and resurrection (Nos. 4 and 9). Some other of the Fundamental Beliefs, though less mainstream, are nonetheless held in common with some in the evangelical world: ‘soul sleep’, for example (No. 26), and the requirement that members refrain from tobacco and alcohol, though the addition here of ‘the foods regarded as unclean in the Scriptures’ is less usual (No. 22). However, the distinctively SDA doctrines which, as mentioned above, lie at the foundation of the church itself – the prophetic witness of Ellen White (No. 18); the perpetual nature of the seventh-day Sabbath (No. 20); and the eschatological significance of the 1844 message, with the corollary that the second coming will soon take place (No. 24) – take SDAs away from mainstream evangelical thought. These teachings lead to a self-identification of the SDA Church as God’s remnant church for the last days (affirmed in No. 13), which has often led the church to take a triumphalist and isolationist stand, making co-operation with more mainstream Christian groups difficult and, as far as many on the SDA side are concerned, both undesirable and unnecessary.

One of the earliest significant critics of the SDA faith was D. M. Canright (1840–1919), originally a protégé of Ellen White and her husband James, and an SDA minister for almost twenty years. In his books, published after he left the SDA Church, he charged the SDAs with teaching works-centred salvation (the Sabbath doctrine), and Ellen White with plagiarism and false prophecy. Though the SDA Church has often attempted to refute them, these charges continue to underpin the fundamental unease felt by many evangelicals confronted by its teaching.

Bibliography and resources

Resources: The official SDA website is www.adventist.org. The official Ellen G. White website (www.whiteestate.org) includes historical and apologetic resources and links to online texts of works by and about her, including the official biography in six volumes by her grandson, Arthur L. White. Canright’s works (Seventh-day Adventism Renounced; The Lord’s Day from Neither Catholics Nor Pagans; and The Life of Mrs Ellen G. White) can be found at various anti SDA websites (e.g. www.truthorfables.com). (All online resources accessed February 2013.)

Bibliography: M. Bull and K. Lockhart, Seeking a Sanctuary (Bloomington, 2006); General Conference of Seventh-Day Advent, Seventh-Day Adventists Believe (Nampa, 2005); R. Numbers, Prophetess of Health (Grand Rapids, 2008).

I. GRAHAM

SEXUALITY

The subject of sexuality is undoubtedly an important one in contemporary Christian theology. Disagreements over it threaten unity among Christians, and the church’s traditional teaching is also increasingly a challenge to Western society and thus significant in the church’s *mission. It is important to recognize the breadth covered by the concept and acknowledge that the term is often not sharply defined. This article introduces five main areas of theological importance.

Male and female

Central to a Christian understanding of human sexuality is the Creator’s differentiation of human beings, as creatures made in God’s *image into male and female (Gen. 1:27; 2:18–25). This is reaffirmed by Jesus in the Gospels (Mark 10:6–9) and also shapes apostolic teaching on sexuality (1 Cor. 7; Eph. 5:21–33), although being male and female is now to be understood in the light of our unity in Christ (1 Cor. 11:8–12; Gal. 3:28).

The significance of this sexual differentiation received little detailed attention from early patristic theologians. They held various views ranging from the irrelevance of sexual difference to our humanity (Tatian), through to emphasizing the dangers and temptations sexual differentiation brings (Tertullian), limiting its significance to procreation (Clement) or even apparently seeing it as part of God’s response to the fall (Gregory of Nyssa). As in many areas relating to sexuality, *Augustine’s thought has proved particularly influential on later Christian tradition. He establishes the goodness of sexual difference and traces its importance through the drama of creation, God's *redemption of our fallen state and the eschatological consummation. This view became the largely unexamined Christian consensus through the medieval period and the Reformation. In recent theology a number of both Protestant (Karl *Barth) and Roman Catholic (Hans Urs von *Balthasar, Pope John Paul II) theologians have developed more systematic accounts of what it means to be male and female within their theological anthropologies. In their different ways they all highlight the importance of sexual differentiation for human *fellowship and relationship.

The issue is of contemporary significance in four main areas. First, there are ongoing debates, especially among evangelical Christians, about whether the fundamental equality of men and women is compatible with a belief in male headship and whether Scripture teaches such a hierarchical view of the relationship between the sexes (see *Ministry). Second, the extent to which, beyond biology, any differences claimed between men and women are essential and part of God's created purpose or simply social constructions of *gender identity. Third, the importance of *feminist theology. Fourth, in ethics, a theology of sexual differentiation is vital for the development of a Christian response to homosexuality and transsexuality.

Sexual desire

Scripture speaks positively of sexual desire between men and women (Gen. 2:23; Song; 1 Cor. 7:3), but also warns against lust and disordered and excessive sexual desire (2 Sam 11; Rom. 1:24), often described in terms of concupiscence within the Christian tradition. From early in church history, the latter negative emphasis has often predominated in Christian attitudes to sex. At times this has viewed all sexual pleasure in a negative light and effectively denied the goodness of being created as sexual and bodily creatures through an exaggerated *asceticism or a *dualistic understanding of humanity which has emphasized the spirit over the body and even denigrated the body and sexuality. In recent decades, the pendulum has swung back the other way with a rediscovery of a positive Christian understanding of sexual desire (e.g. Pope John Paul II's Theology of the Body). In some writers (e.g. James Nelson's 'body theology' and Carter Heyward's 'erotic theology') this has led to an exaltation of eros that departs from biblical and traditional sexual norms. In wider society, the understanding of human sexuality in terms of sexual desire is increasingly being replaced by the language of sexual orientation. This conceptualization of human sexuality in terms of a fixed, settled sexual attraction to someone of the opposite (heterosexual) or same (homosexual) sex or people of both sexes (bisexual) is only beginning to be subjected to theological analysis and critique.

Sexual identity

An important recent cultural development is the phenomenon of relating sexuality to personal identity. This has arisen as a result of a number of factors, including greater openness about sexual matters, the concept of sexual orientation and the social organization and political mobilization of groups whose sexuality has in the past led to their marginalization or persecution. Originally focused on homosexuality, the number of possible sexual identities has continued to expand and diversify further, especially among young people. These sexual identities are also now beginning to find their own distinctive theological voice in the development of gay and lesbian theologies (discussed in Elizabeth Stuart's Gay and Lesbian Theologies, Oxford, 2003) and *queer theology (the best guide now being Gerard Loughlin [ed.], Queer Theology: Rethinking the Western Body, Oxford, 2007). These new approaches increasingly extend beyond discussion of sexuality into wider, more traditional, theological subjects. It remains to be seen whether these will become as theologically influential as other contextual theologies such as *liberation theology and *black theology, but this is unlikely for at least two reasons. First, they generally work from presuppositions opposed to traditional Christian teaching on sexuality. Secondly, many Christians believe the creation of identities based on sexuality is false, even idolatrous, and a denial that our identity is given us by God in creation and in Christ: 'At the deepest ontological level, therefore, there is no such thing as "a" homosexual or "a" heterosexual; there are human beings, male and female, called to redeemed humanity in Christ, endowed with a complex variety of emotional potentialities and threatened by a complex variety of forms of alienation' (St Andrew's Day Statement, 1995).

Sexual behaviour

Scripture includes both general warnings against sexual immorality (porneia, e.g. Matt. 15:19; Acts 15:20; 1 Cor. 6:18) and a significant number of prohibitions relating to specific sexual behaviour. These have then been expanded within later Christian tradition. In evaluating sexual behaviour, Christian *moral theology has emphasized the procreational (Gen. 1:28) and relational (Gen. 2:18–24) goods of sexual intercourse and the divine gift of marriage between a man and a woman as the proper context for sexual union (Gen. 2:24; Exod. 20:14; Heb. 13:4). The emphasis on procreation led to the condemnation of various practices not explicitly addressed in Scripture, including masturbation, various forms of non-procreative sexual behaviour (e.g. oral and anal sex) and the use of contraception. The latter is still rejected by the official teaching of the Roman Catholic Church, but accepted by most Protestant Christians. In much contemporary Christian sexual ethics the focus of moral evaluation has shifted to the relational good of sexual behaviour and the existence of a loving relationship. Thus traditional teaching against adultery, promiscuity, paedophilia and prostitution continues to be upheld, but other non-marital sexual behaviour is more acceptable to some Christians (e.g. Adrian Thatcher, Liberating Sex, London, 1993).

A particular area of contention concerns homosexual behaviour. This is consistently condemned in both the OT (Lev. 18:22; 20:13) and NT (Rom. 1: 24–27; 1 Cor. 6:9–10; 1 Tim 1:9–10) and is also seen by most of the Christian tradition as unnatural sexual behaviour. A number of scholars have, however, challenged this negative stance. They have argued for a more positive response to homosexual behaviour in loving relationships. This is either because they believe the biblical prohibitions are more narrow (e.g. restricted to cultic, abusive or pederastic sexual conduct) or because of alleged new understanding of homosexuality unavailable to the biblical writers. However, the majority of biblical scholarship and almost all Christian churches are not persuaded by these claims.

The Christian church has also strongly insisted, in contrast to much contemporary popular thinking, that sexual behaviour is not essential to human flourishing. In fact, the church honours those who, like Christ himself, commit themselves to sexual abstinence, and the early and medieval church particularly exalted virginity and celibacy.

Sexual relationships

Christian moral theology has traditionally commended marriage – a lifelong, exclusive, monogamous relationship – between a man and a woman as the only holy form of sexual relationship. Augustine defended marriage (On the Good of Marriage) in the face of some negative Christian evaluation and excessive exaltation of celibacy. His account of the three goods of marriage (offspring, faithfulness and sacrament) shaped the Christian tradition and is still central to much contemporary sexual ethics. Marriage is significant in Christian theology both as a created institution (Gen. 2) and as a symbol of God's covenant love for his people (Hos., Eph. 5) (see *Family).

Current debates about marriage focus on its beginning and ending. The rapid rise in cohabitation has led some to question traditional teaching against all premarital sex. A strong case can, however, still be made that the meaning, significance, symbolism and consequences of sexual union all point to it being fitting only within a marital relationship. Christians have for centuries disagreed over what circumstances, other than death, can bring an end to a marriage in such a way as to make a further marriage legitimate. Those with a strong view of indissolubility reject all remarriage after divorce, some believe Scripture allows remarriage after adultery (the Matthean exception, Matt. 19:1–12) or desertion by an unbelieving spouse (the Pauline privilege, 1 Cor. 7), while others allow remarriage in other circumstances. There are also debates as to whether same-sex relationships can be treated as marriage or as equivalent to marriage.

Bibliography

C. Ash, Marriage: Sex in the Service of God (IVP, 2003); T. Bradshaw (ed.), The Way Forward? Christian Voices on Homosexuality and the Church (Hodder & Stoughton, 1997); P. E. Engle and M. L. Strauss (eds.), Remarriage after Divorce in Today's Church: 3 Views (Zondervan, 2006); R. Gagnon, The Bible & Homosexual Practice (Abingdon Press, 2001); S. Grenz, Sexual Ethics: An Evangelical Perspective (Westminster John Knox Press, 1999); R. B. Hays, The Moral Vision of the New Testament (New York, 1996), pp. 379–406;

O. O'Donovan, A Conversation Waiting to Begin: The Churches and the Gay Controversy (London, 2009), published in USA as Church in Crisis: The Gay Controversy and the Anglican Communion (Eugene, 2008); D. Peterson, Holiness and Sexuality: Homosexuality in a Biblical Context (Milton Keynes, 2004); P. Ramsey, One Flesh: A Christian View of Sex Within, Outside and Before Marriage (Grove Books, 1977); D. W. Torrance (ed.), God, Family and Sexuality (Edinburgh, 1997).

A. GODDARD

SHINTOISM AND CHRISTIANITY

Shintoism is a naturalistic cosmic religion, an *animistic *polytheism. It represents the original worldview and way of life of the Japanese. Its central concept is kami. (The Chinese character pronounced kami on its own is pronounced shin in combination.) Kami is usually translated as 'god' or 'gods', but also means 'above', 'superior' or 'divine'. Kami means anything sacred and/or extraordinary which arouses man's fear or respect (see R. *Otto). Shintoism claims that there exist 800 million kami, being manifested in the beneficent beauties of nature – mountains, trees, beasts and birds. Shinto shrines are dotted around the countryside. Humankind is also a part of this world, and can never be separated from it. Every being is part of the community of the entire universe and all share kami nature. When a person is purified (harai), he recovers his kami nature and restores his true self. In Shintoism, the heavenly and earthly realms are not sharply separated, nor the realms of life in this world and life after death. In many homes dead relatives are worshipped as kami, through *syncretism with ancestor worship.

The Shinto myths trace the origin of heaven and earth to the marriage of a male deity (Izanagi, he who invites) and a female deity (Izami, she who is invited). This resulted in the birth of the sun goddess Amaterasu Oomino-kami. Her children came down to the human domain, and their descendant, Jimmu, is said to have been the first tenno (heavenly emperor) of Japan.

In the early history of Japan (fifth century AD), several clans fought to establish themselves as the political centre. Each clan possessed its clan kami, to whom the whole clan turned in the time of need. The leader of the clan acted as both chief priest and military commander. The tenno clan (whose leader has been tenno up to the present day) eventually united the whole country. This meant that the goddess of tenno was invincible. As a result, Shintoism came to play the central role in Japanese history as a patriotic imperial cult.

In the fifth and sixth centuries, Shintoism was influenced by *Confucianism and *Buddhism, which supplied respectively the ethics and the philosophy which Shintoism lacked. Shinto's simple naturalistic faith and practice became more theoretical and ritualistic. In the ninth century, a Buddhist interpreted the Shinto kami as local manifestations of the universal Buddha. This provided the philosophical explanation for the co-existence of these two religions (known as Ryobu Shinto), which lasted until the nineteenth century. Buddhist concepts of repeated rebirths (see *Metempsychosis) and of success and failure as the result of sins in earlier lives were syncretized with underlying Shinto beliefs.

Christianity came to Japan on three occasions in history as the religious element of foreign aggression. It was first introduced to Japan by the pioneer Jesuit Francis Xavier (1502–52) in 1549. At that time, Japan was nominally ruled by tenno, but was actually divided among feudal lords. In such a situation, Christianity spread rather rapidly and claimed several Christian feudal lords. After the Tokugawa Shogunate consolidated its political power (1603), it severely persecuted Christians because they pledged allegiance to God rather than to Shogun. It also isolated the country to prevent Christian influence.

As soon as Japan reopened after 250 years of seclusion (1854), Protestant Christian missionaries arrived and were initially successful. In 1868, the Tokugawa Shogunate was overthrown and the Meiji imperial government was established. This government introduced several Western social, educational, political and military structures, including monarchy. The leaders of the government argued that Christianity was too individualistic for the Japanese Empire and Buddhism too weak to solidify the country. They chose Shintoism to play the role which Christianity had played in European monarchies. This was the origin of state Shintoism in Japan. A rescript read daily in schools between 1889 and 1945 declared that Japan was 'the nation of the kami'. When nationalists and militarists thus utilized state Shintoism to enhance Japanese nationalism, Christians were again faced with the choice between worshipping God or the emperor, as were the Christians in the early Roman Empire. The defeat of the Japanese Empire in 1945 was seen as the failure of the kamikaze ('divine wind') to protect the country. This caused a serious loss of face for the kami, and weakened Shinto for a time.

The twentieth-century interdenominational mission also began with some success, but today Japanese Christians see attempts to reinstate Shinto as the state religion as threatening. They feel that any check on Japan's economic empire might mean a return to militarism sanctioned by Shinto as a nationalist patriotic movement.

Most Christian services in Japan begin with reference to seasons or weather, which may be either desirable *contextualization in recognition of the true Creator or syncretism with Shinto! The Christian concepts of sin and cleansing are difficult to understand if one holds Buddhist preconceptions, but the Shinto ideas of defilement and ritual cleansing (perhaps explaining why the Japanese bathe far more frequently than other humans) provide a helpful way of illustrating how the Bible thinks of sin and cleansing. Outward cleansing of the body is meant to be accompanied by a cleansing of the heart.

Little theological cross-fertilization has taken place between Christianity and Shinto. The anti-Buddhist Shinto restorationist, Hirata Atsutane (1776–1843), was partly influenced by a Christian understanding of God, and some Christian elements have been incorporated into sect Shinto. An extreme 'Japanese Christianity' has only rarely been advocated. K. Kitamori's (1916–98) Theology of the Pain of God (1946; ET, Richmond, 1965) is a deliberate theological attempt to speak to Japanese culture.

Another writer whose theology has sought to be explicitly sensitive to Japanese tradition and experience, particularly after the atomic bombing of Hiroshima, is Kosuke Koyama, notably in Mount Fuji and Mount Sinai: A Pilgrimage in Theology (London, 1984).

Bibliography

Agency for Cultural Affairs, Japanese Religion (Tokyo and Palo Alto, 1972); H. B. Earhart, Religion in the Japanese Experience (Encino and Belmont, 1974); R. Hammer, Japan's Religious Ferment: Christian Presence amid Faiths Old and New (London, 1961); J. M. Kitagawa, Religion in Japanese History (New York and London, 1966); C. Michalson, Japanese Contributions to Christian Theology (Richmond, 1965); S. D. B. Picken, Shinto: Japan's Spiritual Roots (Tokyo and New York, 1980); F. Rambelli and M. Teeuwen, Buddhas and Kami in Japan: Honji Suijaku as a Combinatory Paradigm (London, 2002).

S. P. KANEMOTO AND M. C. GRIFFITHS

SIBBES, RICHARD (c. 1577–1635)

Richard Sibbes [also Sibbs, Sibs] of Tostock, Suffolk, matriculated at St John's College, Cambridge in 1595, where he earned a full slate of theological degrees including a DD. Sibbes was a noted speaker, elected St John's college preacher, Sunday lecturer at Holy Trinity Church, Cambridge, and concurrently, preacher at Gray's Inn, London. He was also elected Master of St Catherine's College, Cambridge.

Sibbes combined irenic personal qualities with a certain theological boldness. In ministry he was a moderate, submitting to the ecclesial requirements of his day, yet he twice drew formal rebukes from William Laud. In his mature theology he was widely respected by virtually all English Reformed ministers despite his rejection of the newly imported and increasingly popular federal theology (see *Covenant) from Heidelberg. Sibbes dismissed the bilateral covenant of federalists and instead preached God's unilateral triune *love as a 'spreading goodness' that woos, converts and transforms souls. The Father, Sibbes held, embraces the church in love just as he does Christ. This presumed a real – not merely juridical – union of Christ and the church under the rubric of mystical marital, a position he held in alignment with *Bernard of Clairvaux, *Luther and *Calvin. Such a relational understanding of *grace dismissed the federal return to a Thomistic model of grace – as a newly created and morally enabling habitus – that held faith to be a human act of will offered as a human quid pro quo to God's infused grace that then gains salvation. Sibbes, against this, held faith to be a simple response of a formerly disaffected heart to God's disclosures of love.

In Lutheran fashion, Sibbes held that the new covenant of the gospel replaces the old covenant and called for an affective *spirituality that relies on the Spirit's immediate presence and work of illuminating the Scriptures as a guide for daily life. Thus a love for God is the central feature of spirituality, an affection engendered in the converted soul by the Spirit's immediate witness to God's prior love. Sibbes also dismissed speculative or rationalistic theologies – citing John Calvin's similar resistance – and showed no interest in composing a systematic theology.

Bibliography

Works: Works of Richard Sibbes, ed. A. Grosart, 7 vols. (Edinburgh, 1862–4).

Studies: M. E. Dever, Richard Sibbes: Puritanism and Calvinism in Late Elizabethan and Early Stuart England (Macon, 2000); R. N. Frost, '“The Bruised Reed” by Richard Sibbes', in K. Kapic and R. Gleason (eds.), The Devoted Life: An Invitation to the Puritan Classics (Downers Grove, 2004).

R. N. FROST

SICKNESS, see HEALING

SIMONS, MENNO (1496–1561)

Menno Simons, a Dutch Catholic priest, demurred from eucharistic sacramentalism and infant baptism, leading him eventually into the *Anabaptist movement, which he served as pastor and theologian. Gathering together scattered and demoralized Anabaptists after the disastrous and atypical attempt to seize control of Münster, he resisted spiritualizing and apocalyptic tendencies and established peaceful and disciplined congregations from which the worldwide *Mennonite Church eventually developed.

Menno's theology was evangelical with one exception: though insisting Christ was fully human and fully divine, he taught that Jesus did not take flesh 'from' Mary but 'in' Mary. This doctrine of the 'celestial flesh', which he defended increasingly reluctantly, he had inherited from the Spiritualists via Melchior Hoffman, who founded Dutch Anabaptism.

Menno regarded *Christendom as more deeply flawed than the Magisterial Reformers acknowledged and urged a more *radical reformation. He also distrusted scholarly biblical interpretation, which he perceived as often evading the challenge of simply obeying Scripture. He sought a pure church, free from state control, comprised of true disciples, who were baptized as believers, were morally distinctive and exercised mutual admonition. He regarded as essential for church membership new birth and readiness to take up the cross.

Menno adopted a Christocentric hermeneutic (quoting 1 Cor. 3:11 in all his writings) and insisted Jesus' teaching and example were ethically normative, superseding OT practices. Consequently, Christians must not wield the sword or swear oaths, but speak the truth always and be prepared to suffer rather than fight. Menno shared the widespread – and socially disturbing – Anabaptist commitment to economic radicalism, including simple living and open-handed generosity.

Bibliography

W. E. Keeney, Dutch Anabaptist Thought and Practice 1539–1564 (Nieuwkoop, 1968); C. A. Snyder, Anabaptist History and Theology (Kitchener, 1995); J. C. Wenger (ed.), The Complete Writings of Menno Simons c. 1496–1561 (Scottsdale, 1984).

S. W. MURRAY WILLIAMS

SIMPLICITY, DIVINE

'Divine simplicity' is the doctrine that *God is not composite. To be composite is in some sense to be imperfect, or less than ultimate (every composite being necessarily has a prior cause that caused its parts to cohere). Thus if God is perfect and Creator of all, God must be simple.

Divine simplicity implies that God could not be in any way other than he is without ceasing to be himself ('God's essence is his existence'). From this, it follows that God is identical with his perfections (his love, power, wisdom, etc.). Modern discussions of simplicity derive from this the claim that God's perfections are identical with each other: God's love is identical to his power, and so on. This move was resisted by many in the medieval tradition: *Thomas Aquinas insisted that there was real distinction between God's attributes, which did not amount to division (Comm. Sent. Lib.1); Maimonides accepted the argument, but circumvented the conclusion by denying that God has any properties to be identical with each other (Guide for the Perplexed). Classical accounts of divine simplicity were in fact more interested in the identity of God's being with his activity than in any account of the unity of properties.

The idea of divine simplicity was generally accepted until the Enlightenment, but is now disputed. Some deny that the idea itself is logically coherent: if God is identical to his properties, then God would appear to be merely a property, and this seems a difficult or nonsensical position. A second line of criticism accepts that God could be simple, but argues that this is incompatible with other aspects of traditional religious concepts of deity: a simple God cannot, it might be argued, be personal, or active within history, or triune, or able to become incarnate. Some have responded to this by downplaying the significance of divine simplicity, claiming it is merely an apophatic guide to certain things that must not be claimed about God. More robust defences typically turn on a suggestion that at one point or another an illegitimate assumption has been made, one that holds true for human beings but need not hold true for God.

Bibliography

C. Hughes, On a Complex Theory of a Simple God: An Investigation into Aquinas' Philosophical Theology (London, 1989); B. Miller, A Most Unlikely God: A Philosophical Enquiry into the Nature of God (London, 1996); S. R. Holmes, 'Something Much Too Plain to Say: Towards a Defence of the Doctrine of Divine Simplicity', NZSTh 43, 2001, pp. 137–154.

S. R. HOLMES

SIN

According to one influential Protestant catechism, sin is 'any want of conformity unto, or transgression of, the law of God' (Westminster Shorter Catechism, Q. 14). If this is how it is defined, then sin has a particular relation to the moral law, but there have been those in the Western theological tradition who have conceived of it as principally privative in nature (e.g. Augustine). There are differences between the way in which Eastern and Western Christians have thought about sin. In this article, the Western tradition is the primary focus of attention.

Unlike the Chalcedonian doctrine of Christ's two natures of 451, there is no single account of sin that the whole catholic church has approved. That said, there are accounts of sin that ecumenical councils of the church have deemed unorthodox. One such is the Pelagian theory of sin. This states that the significantly free moral choices of human agents are uncaused by anything other than the agent themselves, and even then, not caused by previous choices made by the human agent. In addition, Pelagians teach that humans are without original sin and that all human sin is a result of imitation, not transmission from Adam to his progeny. So my sin is learnt from my elders and my peers. I do not inherit, or have imputed to me, some vitiated moral nature which predisposes me to sin. This theory of sin, which denies original sin, was the object of Augustine of Hippo's ire, and was eventually anathematized at the Council of Carthage in 418.

But other theories have been put forward since then, and they are often different in important points of detail. Some such theories are properly designated 'concepts of original sin', whereas others are less specific than that, attempting merely to account for the prevalence of sin in human society. One example of the latter sort of theory is that of Immanuel Kant, but that is a philosophical rather than a theological approach.

There are several distinct problems to be tackled in any full-orbed theological account of original sin. The first has to do with the nature of sin: what is original sin? The second concerns the transmission of sin from Adam to his progeny, particularly how it is just for God to transmit or impute to me the sinful condition and guilt of Adam's primal sin. The latter issue has to do with the penal consequences of sin, and how Christ atones for sin. In addition to these issues, there is the problem of the authorship of sin, but that is related more to questions of theodicy.

Concerning the nature of sin, the Augustinian tradition took the view that, in sinning, Adam and Eve lost original righteousness, that state of moral uprightness with which they were created (see Fall). Additionally, many post-Reformation theologians took the view that Adam and Eve incurred a macula, or deformity of soul as a result of sin, which disordered their moral natures. (Some Protestants, like Huldrych Zwingli, preferred to speak of sin as a Präst or disease, rather like some medieval theologians. But this has not found favour with many Protestant theologians.) This deformity of soul is often thought to be itself heinous in the sight of God independent of any actual sin a given human agent performs. If so, then even if – per impossibile – someone were never to commit an actual sin, but had the property of original sin, such an individual would be barred from entering heaven on account of the heinousness of their moral state in the eyes of God. Infants who die prematurely, and perhaps the insane and severely mentally handicapped, may fall into such a category. But many theologians have thought that such individuals are not moral agents and therefore not capable of being damnable or salvable, or perhaps are salvable as a class, rather than individually. Some in the Calvinist tradition (see *Reformed theology) have taught that such individuals are treated by God in just the same way as the rest of humanity, and are either elect or reprobate depending on the divine will. Still others, notably (until recently) Roman Catholics, taught that many such agents were confined to a region on the outskirts of hell called the limbus infantum, where they remain in something like a state of everlasting suspended animation.

In addition to the deformity of soul, which leaves all of Adam's progeny with a fallen human nature, there is original *guilt. This is often thought to comprise the reatus poenae (liability to punishment – on account of possessing original sin), and the reatus culpa (liability to guilt). The sinner, so the story goes, is guilty for Adam's sin and therefore punishable for Adam's sin, just as Adam himself was, because he acts as our representative, or because we are somehow united with Adam. Christ's atonement may deal with the penal consequences of sin, the reatus poenae, so that the sinner herself need not suffer in hell the *punishment due for her sin. But she remains the one guilty of possessing original sin – the reatus culpa. And, of course, she is also guilty of any actual sin she commits in addition to the deposit of original sin she has inherited, or had imputed to her, by God. For this reason, some theologians, like Jonathan *Edwards, speak of a double guilt: for original sin, and for one's actual sin. Christ's work may deal with the penal consequences of both, according to such Protestant thinkers.

There are real problems for a full-orbed doctrine of original sin. One problem has to do with the biblical parallel between the first Adam and the second (e.g. Rom. 5: 2–19). If Christ deals with the sin brought about by the first Adam, how are we to square this theological commitment with the findings of modern evolutionary biology? Was there a first human pair, and if so, did they 'fall' from some higher moral state to a lower one – and if they did, what could this mean? This cluster of problems has been almost universally ignored in modern theology. But this simply will not do, given the important relation between sin and *salvation.

Another issue has to do with the justice of imputing the sin of one guilty person to another. This has two aspects. First, how can God justly impute Adam's sin to me? Why am I punished for the sin of someone who lived many years before me? This seems monumentally unjust. The second aspect to this issue concerns how the penal consequences of my sin can be transferred to Christ, who is sinless and guiltless. Surely it is unjust for an innocent *substitute to be punished in my place. Yet Christ does just this (on certain views of the *atonement). There are theological responses to these problems. One of these, popular in the Reformed tradition, is to suppose God treats me 'as if' I were guilty of Adam's sin, where Adam is the representative of the whole race, rather like one might have a representative in a senate who makes decisions on behalf of the populace of a republic. The same sort of reasoning could be applied to my relation to Christ, although the relation here is a spiritual, rather than a natural, one. God treats Christ 'as if' he was the guilty party and punishes him in my stead. Again, there are precedents for this: the payment of a fine need not be demanded of the guilty party if a substitute is willing to step in. But these solutions rely on a sort of forensic, or pecuniary, 'fiction' whereby God acts as if I am guilty of Adam's sin, or Christ is guilty of my sin. And some theologians have found this profoundly unconvincing.

There is an alternative view. This stems from St Augustine, and is called Augustinian realism. It says that Adam and his progeny are somehow one metaphysical entity such that God may 'pass on' Adam's sin to me because he and I are parts of one greater whole, in a way analogous to my arm and my foot being parts of a larger organic whole, namely, my body. But even if sense can be made of this, how can it apply to my relation to Christ? The Saviour and the sinner are surely not parts of one metaphysical whole. At least, almost all Augustinian realists writing about the imputation of Adam's sin have balked at applying similar reasoning to the union of the *regenerate sinner with Christ. There is a minority report in the Reformed tradition that has taken this view (the Puritan Tobias Crisp nods in this direction, as did some advocates of the *Mercersburg theology in the United States). This is difficult theological territory. But perhaps it is no more difficult than well-known contemporary philosophical problems with the composition of objects. Tibbles the cat has parts that are not ginger, like his claws. Still, he is a ginger cat. Christ and the regenerate may be parts of one whole object in the mind of God, call it 'redeemed humanity'. The fact that Christ atones for the sin of other 'parts' of this object does not necessarily mean Christ is a sinner. Analogously, Tibbles's claws being part of a ginger cat does not mean his claws are ginger. Yet they are claws of a whole object that is a ginger cat. Perhaps Christ is part of a whole object including all regenerate sinners, who are somehow mystically united together through the agency of the Holy Spirit, without confusing the different parts of this metaphysical object. This hardly constitutes a complete solution to this particular issue, but it may provide the beginnings of an interesting answer to an ancient theological conundrum.

See also: ESCHATOLOGY; JUDGMENT OF GOD.

Bibliography

Anselm of Canterbury, On The Virgin Conception and Original Sin in Anselm of Canterbury, The Major Works, eds. B. Davies and G. Evans (Oxford, 1997); Augustine, Enchiridion, tr. E. Evans (London, 1953); H. Blocher, Original Sin: Illuminating the Riddle (Leicester, 1997); J. Edwards, Original Sin: The Works of Jonathan Edwards, vol. 3, ed. C. A. Holbrook (New Haven, 1980); J. Murray, The Imputation of Adam's Sin (Grand Rapids, 1959); P. L. Quinn, 'Original Sin, Radical Evil, and Moral Identity', Faith and Philosophy 1, 1984, pp. 188–202; R. Swinburne, Responsibility and Atonement (Oxford, 1989); Thomas Aquinas, On Evil [De Malo], tr. J. A. Oesterle and J. T. Oesterle (Notre Dame, 1995); T. Wiley, Original Sin: Origins, Developments, Contemporary Meanings (New York, 2002); N. P. Williams, The Ideas of the Fall and of Original Sin (London, 1927).

O. D. CRISP AND M. JENSON

SINLESSNESS OF CHRIST

The belief in the sinlessness of *Jesus in the history of the church grew out of reflection on a variety of biblical texts (e.g. Isa. 53:9; John 8:46; 2 Cor. 5:21; 1 Pet. 2:22; 3:18; Heb. 4:15; 7:26; 9:14; 1 John 3:5). Often its theological significance has been viewed primarily in soteriological terms (see *Salvation), in which the redemption of sinful humanity is linked with the purity of a holy and sinless Messiah. Such thinking is exemplified by the medieval theologian *Anselm, who argued that Jesus' sinlessness meant he never dishonoured God and thus he was free from the need to die. Therefore Jesus, by his voluntary death as the perfect God-man, was enabled to serve as an *atonement for others (see his Cur Deus Homo).

In modern theology the idea of the sinlessness of Christ has taken a number of interesting turns. Classic liberal theology, while denying that Jesus was incapable of sinning, still often placed a tremendous emphasis on the fact that Christ did not sin. *Schleiermacher, for example, declared Jesus' sinlessness as his 'absolute perfection' which distinguished him from the rest of humanity. In the followers of A. *Ritschl, a reconceived view of the sinlessness of Jesus becomes a kind of proof of his divine status.

One of the debates surrounding the sinlessness of Jesus in the past two centuries is based on the question of whether the Son of God assumed a 'fallen' (cf. 'sinful flesh') or 'unfallen' human nature. While it is sometimes debated, the evidence seems to be that the early Fathers generally affirmed that he assumed a human nature free from sin (cf. *Adam before the fall). Such an understanding appears to be the dominant position throughout the history of the church (see *Christology), but some clarification was needed.

Edward *Irving notably argued that the Son of God assumed a 'fallen' human nature, arguing that an 'unfallen' nature is unintelligible in a postlapsarian world. The concern of Irving, and those who would embrace a similar view (e.g. Barth, Torrance, etc.), grows out of a real fear of creeping *docetism in the church. The worry is clear: if the Son did not assume a 'fallen' human nature, then he must have assumed a generic nature which was not like those he came to redeem, and thus he becomes unable to act as their Saviour.

Others have responded by arguing that the Son did assume an 'unfallen' human nature, that from birth he was free from guilt and sin, and that only on the cross did he voluntarily become (i.e. assume) the sins of humanity. His temptations were real, but they did not arise from ‘internal’ corruption. The concern here is also clear: to say the Son assumed a ‘fallen’ human nature sounds to many as if Jesus was tainted with personal guilt and sin, compromising his holiness.

Sadly, often this disagreement comes more from misunderstanding than substance, since neither side appears eager to say that Jesus was either personally guilty of sin, nor was he anything less than fully human and genuinely tempted. The debate centres around what is implied by the idea of ‘fallen’. Substantively, some questions require further debate, such as Jesus’ relationship to original sin, how the Spirit empowers and keeps Jesus holy, how to maintain the integrity of the two natures without compromising the truth that Jesus is truly God and truly man.

Part of the confusion surrounding the sinlessness of Jesus grows out of historical developments which, although intending to heighten the doctrine, may have merely muddied the waters. Primarily through *Augustine, the discussion shifted from the extraordinary faithfulness of Jesus in resisting temptation (stressed in the temptation narratives and Hebrews), to the metaphysical conditions for Christ to be sinless from birth. Thus, the *virgin birth was given in Augustine (and many of the creeds) the significance of breaking the bond of sexually transmitted original sin. This line of reasoning is one contributing factor to understanding historic discussions about the status of Jesus’ mother and the development of the doctrine of her immaculate conception (see *Mary).

More recently, discussions about the sinlessness of Jesus have focused on the Spirit’s work not merely at conception, but throughout the life, death, resurrection and ascension of Jesus.

See also: FALL; SIN.

Bibliography

D. Bathrellos, ‘The Sinlessness of Jesus: A Theological Exploration in the Light of Trinitarian Theology’, in P. L. Metzger (ed.), Trinitarian Soundings in Systematic Theology (New York, 2005); O. Crisp, ‘Did Christ Have a Fallen Human Nature?’ International Journal of Systematic Theology 6, 2004, pp. 270–288; K. M. Kopic, ‘The Son’s Assumption of a Human Nature: A Call for Clarity’, International Journal of Systematic Theology 3, 2001, pp. 154–166; D. Macleod, The Person of Christ (Downers Grove, 1998); G. W. P. McFarlane, Christ and the Spirit: The Doctrine of the Incarnation According to Edward Irving (Carlisle, 1996); T. F. Torrance, ‘The Mind of Christ in Worship: The Problem of Apollinarianism in the Liturgy’, in T. F. Torrance, Theology in Reconciliation (London, 1975); C. Ullmann, The Sinlessness of Jesus (Edinburgh, 1870); T. Weinandy, In the Likeness of Sinful Flesh: An Essay on the Humanity of Christ (Edinburgh, 1993).

K. M. KAPIC

SLAVERY

Slavery is a social institution justifying the involuntary servitude of individuals who are treated as property. Slave owners often held the power of life and death over their slaves. Historically, slavery has existed throughout the world in most periods of history. It was divided into two forms: commercial and household slavery. Commercial, or productive, slavery involved the largest number of slaves, in mines, industrial production and farming, where they were often literally worked to death.

The most surprising fact about slavery is how very little attention it has received from scholars apart from extensive discussions of the transatlantic slave trade (TST), which was actually only a small part of the overall picture. For example, almost all ancient civilizations, including Assyria, Babylon, Egypt, Greece, Rome, Persian and Sumner, were based on slavery, yet historians, particularly art historians, either overlook slavery altogether or simply mention it in passing. Even when slavery is discussed, it is usually in terms of the relatively well-treated domestic slaves, while those who were brutally treated in manufacturing are ignored.

Similarly, the role of slaves as the basis of economic production in China, India, other parts of Asia, the Middle East and most traditional societies is usually overlooked by anthropologists and historians. As Rodney Stark points out, it was not until 1990 that the Smithsonian Institute in Washington fully recognized the role of slavery among Northwest Coast native societies. Yet up to one third of Northwest Coast natives were enslaved by other native peoples to form the productive base of their economies.

The ancient Hebrews accepted and traded in slaves (Gen. 14:14; 17:23; 24:35; 26:14; Job 1:3). In theory at least, Hebrew slavery was comparatively humane, lacking the harshness found in many other cultures, to the extent that slaves were accorded some protection under the law (Exod. 12:44; 21:20–21, 26–27). To what extent these laws were enforced in actual cases is hard to determine. In the Hebrew Bible the idea of slavery was used to illustrate the relationship between God and his people Israel. The Israelites were pictured as being redeemed from Egyptian slavery by the historic deeds of Yahweh (Exod. 20:2; Deut. 5:6). As a result, the Hebrews believed that they had become the slaves of God and were dependent on him. For this reason they could neither live for themselves alone nor worship other gods (Lev. 25:42, 55; Exod. 20:2–6). A similar use of the imagery of slavery is to be found in the NT, where Christians are described as slaves of God (Rom. 1:1; 1 Pet. 2:16).

Although early Christians owned slaves and the institution is not condemned in the NT (Matt. 18:23; 1 Cor. 7:21; Phlm.), early Christian writings display a significantly changed attitude towards slaves which reveals an awareness that they are people made in the image of God (cf. Eph. 6:5–8; Col. 3:22 – 4:1; Titus 2:9–10; Hermas; Shepherd). Slowly a new realization that slavery was sin grew up in Christian lands, with people like St Bathilde (d. 680), the wife of Clovis II (d. 656), working to free slaves and abolish slavery; St Ansgar (801–65), who evangelized Scandinavia, also worked hard for the abolition of slavery.

In the Byzantine Empire the monasteries and many clergy worked against slavery, with the result that laws were passed limiting the number of slaves a monastery could accept as free men. The Byzantines also enacted legislation to allow former owners to regain their slaves from monastic institutions under specific conditions. Nevertheless, by the eleventh century Byzantine slavery was in decline, although it continued to flourish in Byzantine-influenced areas like Kiev and later Russia, where it only began to decline in the seventeenth century.

All the great medieval monastic orders of Western Europe accepted slaves as free men and refused to own slaves. The Holy Roman Emperor, Conrad II (990–1039), supported by the pope, forbade traffic in slaves, thus taking a stand that is unique among world religions. During the eleventh century, St Wulfstan (1008–95), the only English bishop allowed to retain his post after the Norman Conquest, worked ceaselessly to end the slave trade centred on Bristol. Together with Anselm he urged William the Conqueror (1027–87) to support abolition, practically bringing an end to slavery in Britain. Consequently, by the twelfth or thirteenth century slavery had virtually disappeared in north-western Europe, with the result that *Thomas Aquinas, who taught that slavery was a sin, regarded it as something practised by Muslims and people living on the edge of civilization. Various popes threw their weight behind Aquinas's teachings, leading to a series of official papal pronouncements against slavery of which those of Pope Paul III (1468–1549) are a good example.

Until recently the role of papal decrees in mitigating the evils of slavery has been dismissed by most scholars as insignificant, while statements like that of Pope Paul III, who confirmed the right of clergy to own slaves as late as 1548, have been highlighted. This dismissal of Roman Catholic criticisms of slavery has been challenged by Rodney Stark on the basis of statistical evidence showing that following the Reformation slaves were far better off in Catholic than Protestant lands because papal teachings had a significant beneficial influence on the way slaves were treated while promoting the freeing of slaves on a large scale.

Aquinas's judgment that slavery flourished in border areas and the Islamic world may seem harsh today, given the claim of contemporary Muslim apologists that the Qur'an regulates slavery in Sura IV. However, this overlooks the fact that regulation is not abolition. Further, the claim that Mohammed freed some of his slaves also overlooks the fact that he kept many more. Thus both the Qur'an and Mohammed's example actually justify slavery, as all the major traditions of Islamic law readily affirm. Similarly, both Buddhist and Hindu scriptures accept slavery as part of the established order, while temple slaves were common in both religious traditions.

The neglect of slavery in most history books, be they textbooks or academic monographs, has created the perception that the issue of slavery centres on the TST, which many people interpret to mean plantation slavery in what is today the United States of America. This distorted view overlooks the fact that the TST centred on the Caribbean rather than mainland America. In fact the number of slaves imported to what became the US was relatively small. They numbered around half a million between the first shipments of slaves to Manhattan Island by the Dutch in 1626 to the banning of slave imports by the American government in 1808. By contrast, over a million slaves were imported into Barbados and Jamaica. It is equally important to recognize that during the same period French, Portuguese and Spanish ships imported large numbers of African slaves to the Americas.

Despite the grim conditions on slave ships and the enormous suffering caused by this vile trade, the impact of the TST dims in comparison to slavery as a global institution. The TST ravaged Africa between 1579 and 1807, causing between 5 and 12 million Africans to be enslaved. However, this number is small compared to estimates of the number of Africans enslaved by Muslim slavers from the eighth century to the present, which range from 10 to 200 million.

Apart from distorting the extent to which slavery existed in the past, concentration on the TST has also caused slavery to be viewed in racial terms, creating the impression that most slaves were black. Actually, throughout history the majority were enslaved regardless of race. For example, after the Battle of Lepanto (1571) over 15,000 European slaves were freed. Since most of the galleys in the Muslim fleet were sunk, the total of European slaves, who were chained to their posts, was probably ten times that number. Similarly, at least one million Europeans were enslaved in North Africa at the beginning of the nineteenth century.

During the eighteenth century various Protestant Christian writers sought to develop a theological defence of slavery. Probably the first of such works to be written in America was John Saffin's A True and Particular Narrative . . . and A Brief and Candid Answer . . . Both were tracts published in Boston in 1701 which sought to justify slavery as a perpetual institution created by God and ordained in Scripture. Saffin also attempted to refute the anti-slavery arguments of Judge Samuel Sewall, who attacked the institution of slavery in his The Selling of Joseph . . . (Boston, 1700).

Throughout the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries many other theological defences of slavery appeared. In 1772 Thomas Thompson produced The Trade in Negro Slaves on the African Coast in Accordance with Humane Principles and with the Laws of Revealed Religions. Later, in the 1850s Samuel A. Cartwright argued that it was impossible to 'civilize' or 'Christianize' Africans who were not slaves. In defending slavery, numerous arguments were developed, such as those linking black Africans with the curse of Ham (Gen. 9:22–27) and the notation that slaves were receiving a 'just' punishment for their corrupt natures. Josiah Priest's Bible Defence of Slavery (Glasgow, 1852) even argued that Lev. 18:8 indicated that Ham's sexual perversions led to slavery. Later nineteenth-century theologians in the American South, such as Robert Lewis Dabney (1820–98), did immense harm by building the defence of slavery into their theology. In these works the Confederate States were romanticized in what was essentially a pro-slavery civil religion. All these arguments eventually gave way before the force of the reasonable criticisms of slavery and the zeal of evangelical reformers.

The writings of Jean-Jacques Rousseau (1712–78) and Thomas Paine (1737–1809) led the early modern attack on slavery. Unfortunately, with the notable exception of Paine, Rousseau and other Enlightenment thinkers, such as David Hume, also promoted vicious racial stereotypes of Africans while denouncing slavery.

It was devout Christians who pursued the cause of abolition in Britain with the utmost vigour by arguing that African slaves were equal in all respects to other people. In 1772, Grandville Sharp (1735–1813) began a campaign for the suppression of slavery. John Wesley and the Methodists took up the challenge, as did William Wilberforce (1759–1833) and the Anglican Clapham Sect in England. Quakers, Presbyterians and Baptists all campaigned against the slave trade. Supported by these Christian abolitionists, talks and writing by freed slaves, such as Olaudah Equiano (c. 1745–97), whose autobiography The Interesting Narrative of the Life of Olaudah Equiano or Gustavus Vassa, the African (1789) is a classic anti-slavery tract, made a great impact on the public mind.

Eventually the slave trade was outlawed in Britain in 1807, and in 1808 the foreign slave trade was prohibited in the United States. In 1833 slavery was abolished in the British Empire and the Royal Navy engaged in a vigorous campaign to suppress it at sea. On land David Livingstone (1813–73) exposed the realities of the internal African slave trade and fought for its abolition. During much of the nineteenth century, missionary endeavour in Africa, such as the founding of Blantyre in Malawi, was part of the strategy of ‘Christianity, commerce and civilization’, which was intended to build up self-sufficient African communities large and powerful enough to resist raids by well-armed slave traders.

In America Christians of all persuasions, including Unitarians centred around Boston and men like the journalist William Lloyd Garrison (1805–79), joined the attack on slavery. The biggest impact, however, was made by the Congregationalist Harriet Elizabeth Beecher Stowe (1811–96), whose best-selling novel Uncle Tom’s Cabin (1851) made an enormous impact on public thinking. Slavery was finally abolished after the Civil War in 1865.

Today traditional forms of slavery still exist in many societies, although they receive little attention and are generally considered a dead issue. Perhaps even more extensive is the growth of sex-based slavery that exploits women from former communist countries in places as far apart as Britain and Korea. Consequently, a renewed awareness of the continuation of slavery has led to the rebirth or reinvigoration of anti-slavery societies on both sides of the Atlantic, which is a sad comment on our times.

Bibliography

B. Lewis, Race and Slavery in the Middle East (New York, 1990); P. E. Lovejoy, ‘Volume of the Atlantic Slave Trade’, Journal of African History 23, 1982, pp. 473–501; J. J. Miller, ‘The Unknown Slavery: In the Muslim World, That Is – and It’s Not Over’, The National Review, 54, 2002, pp. 41–43; G. Milton, White Gold: The Extraordinary Story of Thomas Pellow and Islam’s One Million White Slaves (New York, 2005); A. Porter, ‘“Christianity and Commerce”: The Rise and Fall of a Nineteenth-Century Missionary Slogan’, The Historical Journal, 28, 1985, pp. 597–621; R. Stark, For the Glory of God (Princeton, 2003).

Websites: Anti-Slavery International, <<http://www.antislavery.org>>; Anti-Slavery Society, <<http://www.anti-slaverysociety.addr.com/society.htm>>; American Anti-Slavery Society, <<http://www.anti-slaverysociety.addr.com/amass1.htm>>.

I. HEXHAM

SOBORNOST

In Russian sobor means both ‘church’ and ‘synod’ or ‘council’. No single English word can do justice to sobornost. Its use to characterize Orthodoxy’s distinctive vision of the *church dates from the Russian Orthodox lay theologian Alexis S. Khomyakov (1804–60). In his view the genius of Orthodoxy lay in avoiding the polar weaknesses of Romanism (unity imposed externally from above) and of Protestantism (individualistic liberty), in a unique synthesis of freedom and unanimity, diversity and unity. This sobornost, or communal unity by free association in Christ, finds significant expression in the church *council, where harmony is attained by free consultation. Khomyakov also made much of the ‘reception’ of conciliar decisions by the church as a whole. The sobornost of the church is a kind of organic spiritual catholicity and conciliarity. In ecumenical discussion sobornost has become almost a shorthand description of Orthodoxy’s distinctive approach to ecclesiology. Somewhat comparable concepts in Anglican and Roman usage are koinonia* and (in more limited contexts) *conciliarity and collegiality.

See also: RUSSIAN ORTHODOX THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

S. Bulgakov, The Orthodox Church (London, 1935); A. S. Khomyakov, ‘The Church Is One’, in W. J. Birkbeck (ed.), Russia and the English Church During the Last Fifty Years, vol. 1 (London, 1969 [1895]); N. Zernov, Three Russian Prophets (London, 1944).

D. F. WRIGHT

SOBRINO, JON (b. 1938)

Jon Sobrino was born into a Roman Catholic family in the Basque country of Spain in 1938. At eighteen he entered the *Jesuit order and at twenty was sent to El Salvador. He attained an MA in mechanical engineering at St Louis (1965) and his doctorate in theology at Frankfurt (1975). Returning to El Salvador he became involved in *liberation theology. In 1989, when right-wing militia invaded the university and murdered six Jesuit professors, a housekeeper, and her daughter, Sobrino was in Thailand lecturing. Despite the violence, Sobrinho remained an outspoken advocate of peace and reconciliation.

Although Sobrinho has published on diverse subjects such as peace, ethics, spirituality (particularly *Ignatian spirituality), ecclesiology and community, and biographies of martyred victims of the violence in Central America, his three controversial *Christological studies brought an investigation from the Vatican's Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith. In 2007 a Notification was issued declaring that there were areas of Sobrinho's Christological thought that were, 'erroneous or dangerous and may cause harm to the faithful'. Technically, this was not a form of censorship, but an indication of theological dissatisfaction by the Vatican.

Part of the controversy was about his methodology. He insisted that the 'Church of the poor' set the agenda for Christological investigation. The Vatican responded by stating that the foundation for theology is 'in the apostolic faith transmitted through the Church for all generations'. Yet early in Jesus the Liberator, Sobrinho had written, 'Latin American Christology – and specifically as Christology – identifies its setting, in the sense of a real situation, as the poor of this world, and this situation is what must be present in and permeate any particular setting in which Christology is done' (p. 28). The Vatican was not against developing a theology for the poor (see *Poverty and wealth), but it rejected this type of *contextual theology as foundational.

Although Sobrinho has never rejected the Nicene Creed (381) or the Chalcedonian Symbol (451), the Vatican also expressed reservations that in his writings the humanity of Christ tended to overwhelm his divinity. The Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith never accused Sobrinho of heresy, but insisted that Sobrinho provide greater clarity about Christ's divine nature. At this time Jon Sobrinho has not expressed any particular concern to alter any of his controversial statements on Christology.

Bibliography

Works: Christology at the Crossroads (ET, London, 1978); Jesus the Liberator: A Historical-Theological Reading of Jesus of Nazareth (ET, Tunbridge Wells, 1993); Christ the Liberator: A View from the Victims (ET, London, 2001).

Studies: L. Boff and C. Boff, Introducing Liberation Theology (ET, Tunbridge Wells, 1987).

D. L. RAINEY

SOCIAL ETHICS

From the days of Plato and Aristotle ethical thought has sought to contribute to human life in society. *Ethics seeks to clarify the underlying values which inform our understanding of our shared life in society and of its political practice. From the earliest days of Christian experience the church has sought to make principled sense of the social world in which it was set. Human beings are social animals. As persons called to know and love God our Creator and Redeemer, we are called to articulate what discipleship means for our place in the wider human community (see *Christian life).

Across the centuries of Christian social thinking Christian thought has produced a rich variety of traditions in this field. In the Catholic tradition (see *Roman Catholic theology), for example, with its debt to *Thomist theology, there is a strong commitment to the theme of natural law (see *Natural theology). From this tradition the church has sought to bring to the surface the inbuilt values and themes that make for healthy social living. The contemporary Catholic emphasis on 'The Common Good', which has attracted ecumenical support, is rooted in this tradition that there are given values built into the ways things are that we need to hold on to – justice, fairness, charity, to name a few.

Protestant thinking has developed parallel themes. The great social theologian of the middle of the twentieth century, Reinhold *Niebuhr, on the basis of his experience of ministry in the corporate industrial world of Detroit in the 1930s, believed that the Christian theme of agape love needed mediating through the principle of justice if it was to challenge the corporate realities of power. He went on, with great effect, to develop this theme in relation to the corrupt world of unaccountable political power facing the challenge first of Fascism and then of *Marxism.

British social ethical thinking, building on the foundations laid by Archbishop William *Temple, R. H. Tawney, J. H. *Oldham and others in the heart of the twentieth century, sought to develop the idea of 'middle axioms' as a way of mediating conversation between the Christian traditions and secular thought. R. H. Preston and latterly John Atherton have contributed to this tradition of Christian social ethical work.

Much of this came under challenge at the end of the twentieth century and into the twenty-first through the work of John *Milbank. His seminal work, Theology and Social Theory, sought to challenge the assumption of scientific objectivity in secular sociological thought and to recover a full Christian foundation for engagement with this field. This has led to a ‘*Radical Orthodoxy’ as a Christian tradition holding to orthodox creedal faith and to a radical political and social agenda. This way of thinking can be seen to owe much to the *Barthian tradition of theological reasoning.

Others who believe that it is possible to move directly from biblical faith to social and political life include Alan Storkey whose A Christian Social Perspective remains a classic example of a tradition that is rooted partly in *Calvinist theology and in Anabaptist traditions.

On the edge of *Anabaptist life are the Mennonites and Amish communities, some of whom place strict limits on the way Christians should relate to the wider world. Distinctive in their thinking and practice are the *Quaker people who, with a strong radical understanding, engage with society believing that the light of God’s Spirit is to be found across the human community. The debate will, without doubt, continue and be influenced by the way Christians sense their place in the society in which they are set and the opportunities and threats to Christian experience that they experience.

Bibliography

J. Atherton, Christianity and the New Social Order (London, 2011); G. Durham, The Spirit of the Quakers (Yale, 2010); R. J. Elford and S. Markham, The Middle Way: Theology, Politics and Economics in the Later Thought of R. H. Preston, Grove Booklets on Ethics (Cambridge, 2010); S. Hauerwas and C. Pinches, Christians among the Virtues (Chicago, 1997); C. Mathewes, A Theology of Public Life (Cambridge, 2007); J. Milbank, Theology and Social Theory (Oxford, UK and Cambridge, USA, 1990); R. Niebuhr, Moral Man and Immoral Society (New York, 1934); A. Storkey, A Christian Social Perspective (Leicester, 1979);

W. Temple, Christianity and Social Order (London, 1942).

J. GLADWIN

SOCIAL GOSPEL

The Social Gospel was a loosely organized movement in North America from roughly 1880 to the start of the Great Depression (1929) which attempted to formulate a Christian response to the rapid social changes of the period. Its origins were both domestic and foreign. The strong link in the American revival tradition between personal holiness and social reform contributed to the movement; as did also the newer concern for scientific study of social problems that accompanied the rise of modern America after the Civil War. In addition, the example of Britons, like Thomas *Chalmers in Scotland or the *Christian Socialism of F. D. Maurice (1805–72), who attempted innovative Christian responses to the problems of industrial society, also influenced Americans desiring a Christian social reform.

Early expressions of the Social Gospel included the work of Washington Gladden (1836–1918), a Congregationalist minister in Springfield, Massachusetts, and Columbus, Ohio. While still in Massachusetts he had published Working People and Their Employers (1876), an appeal for fairness to workers. In his Ohio congregation were mine owners whose labourers struck twice in the mid-1880s for better wages and working conditions. Gladden’s belief in the justice of their demands led to a more insistent appeal for the rights of labour and the application of the ‘Golden Rule’ to industrial organization. A different expression of the Social Gospel appeared in the work of Charles Sheldon (1857–1946), a clergyman from Topeka, Kansas, whose best-selling novel In His Steps (1897) presented a picture of what could happen in a community torn by social dissension if Christians would only ask themselves in every decision, ‘What would Jesus do?’

The most important exponent of the Social Gospel was Walter *Rauschenbusch (1861–1918), a German-American Baptist who ministered for ten years in New York City’s ‘Hell’s Kitchen’ before becoming a professor of church history at Rochester Seminary in the state of New York. Rauschenbusch’s first-hand experience of industrial exploitation and governmental indifference to workers made him a convinced critic of the established order. His fruitful relationships with New York City socialists like Henry George (1839–97) offered alternative models for social organization. But Rauschenbusch's main concern was to search the Scriptures for a message to the troubled circumstances of industrial society. The results of this search were published in 1907 as Christianity and the Social Crisis, a work that recalled the prophetic denunciations of OT prophets against social callousness as well as NT injunctions about the dangers of mammon. Rauschenbusch followed this work with other influential volumes, including Prayers of the Social Awakening (1910), Christianizing the Social Order (1912) and A Theology for the Social Gospel (1917). In these works Rauschenbusch combined a prophetic ideal of justice (see *Righteousness) with a commitment to building the *kingdom of God through the power of Christ.

The Social Gospel is often identified with theological *liberalism, and with some justice. Gladden, for example, was a popularizer of biblical higher criticism, and Rauschenbusch, though much more realistic about the intractably *fallen character of human nature, yet reinterpreted some traditionally supernatural elements of Christian doctrine. At the same time, however, themes of social service associated with the Social Gospel were also prominent among evangelical bodies such as the *Salvation Army or in individual evangelical leaders like A. J. Gordon (1836–1895) in Boston. Since the 1930s the Social Gospel has disappeared as a movement in its own right, but its influence remains, both in the more liberal, mainline denominations and in the renewed social concern displayed by American evangelicals since the 1960s.

See also: SOCIAL ETHICS; SOCIETY, THEOLOGY OF.

Bibliography

P. A. Carter, Decline and Revival of the Social Gospel . . . 1920–1940 (New York, 1956); D. G. Gorell, The Age of Social Responsibility: The Social Gospel in the Progressive Era, 1900–1920 (Marcon, 1988); R. T. Handy (ed.), The Social Gospel in America, 1870–1920 (New York, 1966); C. H. Hopkins, The Rise of the Social Gospel in American Protestantism 1865–1915 (New Haven, 1940); W. S. Hudson (ed.), Walter Rauschenbusch: Selected Writings (New York, 1984); P. T. Phillips, A Kingdom on Earth: Anglo-American Social Christianity 1880–1940 (University Park, 1996); R. C. White, Jr, and C. H. Hopkins (eds.), The Social Gospel: Religion and Reform in Changing America (Philadelphia, 1976).

M. A. NOLL

SOCIETY, THEOLOGY OF

Early Christian understandings of society usually reflected the centrality of God to human relationships and institutions. They had some sense of the unity of the two great commandments: to love God and love neighbour as self. Relationships were God-given and formed; human beings indwelt them with norms of conduct and rightness given in the Scriptures. Paul, following Jesus, articulated these relationships and showed norms brought back into relationship with God.

This understanding was brought to the dominant cultures of the day. *Augustine showed that the city of God, the society of God, shown by God's revelation, transformed ordinary sinful relationships and institutions. Following the *Constantinian settlement Christianity partly settled down to dwell with Roman imperial rule. Sometimes this involved a sacred-secular dualism in which the domain of the church was set over and alongside the political and military power. Often the rule of Christ was acknowledged, but only partially and with a weak awareness of the principles of God's rule over all human society. This pattern continued through the Holy Roman Empire to medieval feudalism.

The medieval church tended to accept a hierarchical view of society in which imperial power or monarchy was sanctified before God and descending orders were seen as located in a traditional society. *Monastic orders sat outside such a view, and understandings of the mutuality of relationships, care of the poor and the equality of people before God were also part of the picture in medieval Catholicism.

The *Reformation developed a theme seen among some earlier groups, especially among *Anabaptist groups. They emphasized God's kingdom rule in the Christian community bringing interdependence, peace, reconciliation and the absence of hierarchy and human-based authority. This view looked more directly to NT relationships than had often occurred before, with an awareness of the transforming power of God through faith, love, peace and reconciliation. The long-term impact of the Reformation was to open up areas of society God-ward in a new way. *Work and industry became a calling before God. Marriage and *family life were seen in terms of covenantal love. The ruler was redefined as the servant of the people, and democratic participation based on citizenship rather than wealth or power was mooted by the Levellers and other groups. Common wealth was emphasized rather than accumulated wealth. Education opened up, both as being versed in the Scriptures and as the study of God's creation, heralding the great scientific revolution of the seventeenth century. The underlying effect was of society seen as open before God and plural in its institutions, though this effect was slower in Lutheran, Calvinist and Anglican theologies. Even great theologians like Calvin were partly locked into church and *state as their main institutional framework, following Catholic thinkers, so that they did not break out into a wider biblical theology of society, except in terms of practical precepts. *Baxter, in his Directory, and others teetered on the edge of a broader vision.

The *Counter-Reformation partly retreated into the institutional church as the overarching structure for a Christian society, increasingly compromised by a secular state, and in the *Enlightenment a similar *secularization of society emerged in the worldview, where natural processes, rather than God, were seen as governing state, the economy, and social forms. When sociology emerged, society was largely defined in self-referencing terms by Comte, Marx, Spencer and others. However, two developments took place which limited this secularizing dominance. The Catholic Church, after Rerum Novarum, began to think about society more fully, and the Reformational Movement associated with Abraham *Kuyper picked up on the underlying themes of Reformation theology and articulated them in terms of society. Kuyper identified the fact that the sovereign God has created human society and given it a plural institutional structure: of state, family, church, work, education and so on. This gave 'institutions' their original meaning, as instituted by God, and he also considered the different given purposes of these institutions as spheres of society, involving limits. He thus had a critique of totalitarianism in secular society, as it arrived. He also recognized that the *kingdom of God extended to all institutional areas of life and not just to institutional church life. The Christian response was therefore society-wide and not just narrowly churchy.

These were at odds with the secular statist and totalitarian philosophies developing in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, often formed within historicist and social Darwinist perspectives. These sought to erode the integrity of church, family, education and other institutions, usually in the name of Fascist or Communist totalitarianism; apart from the Kuyperian tradition, there was no deep and strong enough theology to resist this trend. *Barth mounted a spirited theological opposition to the Nazis, though not with a full theology of society (see *Barmen Declaration). Theology had largely retreated from the arena. There was some Christian socialist thought addressing economic *poverty and exploitation, though partly in statist terms. *Temple, Tawney and the Christendom Trust opened up these themes in the 1920s to 50s. Other conservative theologies reacted to trends in *modernism in culture, family life and secularization, but few theologians were able to come to grips with the dominance of sociology in social and societal thought.

Yet, what did emerge was a slowly growing Christian theological and sociological alternative to secularism. Seminal was Jacques *Ellul. The Shaftesbury Project, the Ilkley Group and responses to the *Lausanne Covenant led to new bodies of work and new relationships between theologians and sociologists. Theologians of church, state, family, marriage, work and other areas began to identify the purposes and norms of these institutions in biblical and wider theology. These studies would examine problems in these areas and identify a Christian salvific response. Sin, expressed in culture, behaviour and the structure of relationships was identified as distorting the human relationship, not just with God, but also with one another. These studies were matched by biblical studies showing, in OT and NT, the place of relationships, institutions and whole societies in God's revelation. The prophetic concern for the state of societies and cultures before God was re-discovered as a consistent biblical emphasis by liberation theologians worldwide. John *Milbank and others opened up a theological critique of modernity in relation to social theory.

Overall, there is hope that a Christian theology of society will emerge from these studies, one that recognizes the centrality of God in all human relationships and the created structure of human life. It should also engage with the issues of relationship, *culture, change and testing that occur in these relationships, identifying the social forms of sin with which we struggle. Most of all, it should find Jesus the locus of saving persons and relationships, and in the gentle kingdom of God healing and shalom for much of what humankind suffers. There is hope that this will emerge, as secular sociology falters, but it is work in progress.

See also: SECULAR CHRISTIANITY.

Bibliography

R. Baxter, The Christian Directory (1673); J. Ellul, The Technological Society (London, 1965); A. Kuyper, The Stone Lectures (Edinburgh, 1899); Pope Leo XIII, Rerum Novarum (Rome, 1891); J. Milbank, Theology and Social Theory: Beyond Secular Reason (Oxford, 2006); A. Storkey, A Christian Social Perspective (Leicester, 1979); R. H. Tawney, The Acquisitive Society (London, 1921); E. Troeltsch, The Social Teaching of the Christian Churches (London, 1931).

A. STORKEY

SOCINUS AND SOCINIANISM

Two lay theologians of this name (Italian, Sozini, or Sozzini), Lelio (1525–62) and his nephew Faustus (1539–1604), had wide influence because of their persuasive reconstruction of early Christianity. The elder was one of many gifted Italian Protestant exiles. He travelled widely and discussed theology with *Calvin, *Melancthon and *Bullinger. His learning, social status and attractive personality gave him many friends, though Calvin warned him about the spiritual dangers of his penchant for asking questions. His Confession of Faith (1555) used orthodox terms, but in an open-ended and enquiring manner which made some Protestants uneasy.

Faustus, largely self-educated, was a prolific writer of anonymous manuscripts. Though he did not attract the attention of the Holy Office while at the court of Isabella de Medici (1565–75), his early works show he had moved far from orthodoxy. As early as 1562 his Explicatio raised questions about the divinity of Christ, and in 1563 he rejected the natural *immortality of the soul. He defended the authority of the Scriptures on rational and historical grounds, rather than on the testimony of the Holy Spirit. In Basel, his De Jesu Christo Servatore (unpublished until 1594) dramatically reinterpreted the person and work of Christ, underlining their exemplary character.

He arrived in Poland in 1579, finding a congenial environment in the ‘Minor Church’. Their simple biblical piety and quest for holiness had led to deep divisions. Socinus gave unifying leadership, which profoundly influenced younger ministers. He appears not to have been a church member since he refused believers’ *baptism, but by his death he was the church’s most authoritative spokesman. Those sharing his views began to be called Socinians. He was able to moderate their otherworldliness and rejection of the state, but repudiated any political resistance. Though he agreed with their anti-trinitarian theology, he guided them into a more coherent and reasoned theological position, which is well expressed in the Racovian Catechism (1605). Drawn up by Socinus’ colleagues, it was very influential among Socinian churches and beyond. Emphasis on correct knowledge as the key to salvation was basic to its content. At many points, it differed from mainstream *Protestantism. Jesus did not die for *satisfaction of sin. His role was to inspire disciples to follow his example, for only those who persevered in obedience were raised from the dead.

As a system of belief and life, Socinianism appealed not only in Poland and Hungary, but to many distressed by bitter theological warfare, who sought a simpler biblical and more tolerant Christianity. The publication of Socinus’ works gave his ideas wide currency. The move from a substitutionary understanding of *atonement, apologetic emphasis on Jesus’ miracles and greater emphasis on the non-dogmatic interpretation of the Scriptures aroused bitter hostility. Nevertheless, the leavening influence of Socinianism continued to grow in the eighteenth century, especially with the rise of a more historical and critical approach to the Scriptures and the search for a rational rather than a revealed Christianity. By the end of the nineteenth century, Socinianism was no longer seen as one of the major threats to orthodoxy.

Bibliography

M. Martini, Fausto Socino et la pensée socinienne (Paris, 1967); H. J. McLachlan, Socinianism in Seventeenth Century England (Oxford, 1951); S. Mortimer, Reason and Religion in the English Revolution (Cambridge, 2010); E. M. Wilbur, History of Unitarianism, 2 vols. (Cambridge, 1945–52); G. H. Williams, The Polish Brethren, 2 vols. (Chico, 1980).

I. BREWARD

SOCIOLOGY OF RELIGION

The founding fathers of sociology, Claude Saint-Simon (1760–1825) and Auguste Comte (1798–1857) were hostile to religion, believing it to belong to a past, less mature age. Yet each of the great classical sociologists who laid the foundations of modern sociology recognized the fundamental importance of *religion in shaping society. Emile Durkheim's (1858–1917) perspective was essentially collective. In The Elementary Forms of Religious Life (1912; ET, London, 1976) he divided the world into the sacred and the profane (the ordinary). Religious belief and ritual focused on the sacred and were collective representations of society itself. They had the function of producing social solidarity and regenerating ailing commitments.

Max *Weber, the greatest sociologist, had a more dynamic view of religion and a place for the individual social actor. He was fascinated by the theme of the increasing rationalization of his world and in The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism (1904–5; ET, London, 1965) explored the contribution Protestant, especially Puritan, religion made to rational capitalist behaviour. While shunning simplistic ideas, such as that Protestantism had caused *capitalism, he nonetheless believed that 'the Puritan stood at the cradle of modern economic man'. His investigations into other great world religions equally explained why such rational behaviour was prevented from developing among them. Weber's view may well have been formed in reaction to Karl *Marx. Marx argued that society advanced not because of ideas but on the basis of material interests. He viewed religion as an enemy of progress that by positing a false world, kept people dependent on a God or gods that did not exist. His views on religion were complex. He saw it as both a useful tool in the hands of the powerful to keep the oppressed enslaved, but also, in his famous 'opium of the people' comment, saw that religion was a way of dulling the pain of the oppressed. Only by doing away with religion would people overcome their alienation.

A further early contribution to a sociological understanding of religion was made by Ernst *Troeltsch, who in The Social Teaching of the Christian Churches (1912; ET, London, 1931), proposed a distinction between '*church' (an inclusive, hierarchical body which is established in a nation) and a '*sect' (a small-scale, exclusive and voluntary religious community). Subsequent discussion in relation to immigrant religions in the USA by H. Richard *Niebuhr, and the British experience by David Martin, led to the development of the concept of 'denomination'. This framework has proved extremely fertile in understanding religious organizations and especially the growth of modern sectarian religion. The concept of the sect was greatly advanced by Bryan Wilson (1926–2004) and his numerous research students. More recently, given the *postmodern context, Troeltsch's third category of *mysticism has resurfaced in the concept of the 'cult', which, as opposed to popular press definitions, in sociological terms speaks of an undogmatic and unorganized group that an individual can brush with to satisfy their religious quest at their convenience.

None of the classical sociologists was optimistic about the future of religion and this scepticism nurtured what became the reigning paradigm of the sociology of religion in the mid to late twentieth century, namely the theory of *secularization. Briefly stated, the *modern world was considered to be inhospitable to religion. A combination of factors, including the advance of science and technology, urbanization, pluralism and rationalization, were thought to undermine a religious worldview. The decline of religious practice and the marginalization of religion in society were produced as evidence. Key advocates of the theory included Bryan Wilson, Peter Berger (b. 1929) and, most recently, Steve Bruce (b. 1954). The evidence of religious vitality in the USA was always something of an embarrassment to the theory, as were the varying definitions of secularization employed by its proponents. Increasingly, the crude theory has been refined and much more attention paid to the variety of cultural histories that contribute to a nation's religious practice as well as a recognition of there being multiple modernities and trajectories that developed nations might follow. Rather than seeing the decline of religion in Europe as the typical pattern that others will follow, it is now more frequently seen as the exception that needs explaining in a world of global religious vitality.

Stephen Warner has pointed out that a new paradigm began to emerge in the late twentieth century that called into question some of the previous certainties of the discipline. Rational choice theorists used the perspective of economics to argue that religion was not irrational and that people made religious choices by calculating the cost-benefit involved as with any other purchase they made. They argued that the demand for religion was roughly constant and that variations of religious expression could not therefore be explained by a decline in demand but rather by variations of supply. Monopoly religious positions led to little participation because there was little 'marketing' of the faith, whereas the USA enjoyed a healthy religious economy because of the lack of an established religion and energetic religious competition. The theory has many deficiencies and is vigorously opposed by Bruce. But Berger has revised his earlier view and now sees pluralism not as undermining religious certainty but as contributing to its vitality.

A difference may be detected between those sociologists who write in a nuanced way with some sympathy for religion and those who write from a more detached position, leading to the question of the proper relationship between sociology and faith. In part this mirrors the long-standing debate as to whether sociology is an art or a science. The predominant stream, influenced by Weber, was to see it as an objective science which excluded any personal commitments, except in the choice of research topic. Berger was key in advocating that sociologists should 'bracket out' any personal religious commitments, lay aside questions of validity and approach religion as 'methodological atheists'. In practice such neutrality proves much harder to produce than in theory, as the writings of its advocates demonstrate. It also makes religion a phenomenon that is purely dependent on social factors, as in Berger's concept of 'plausibility structures' where he posits that the choice and maintenance of belief is heavily influenced by having a supportive group around the believer. Other sociological fields have long recognized the value of the personal commitment of its researchers, and the faith or lack of faith of sociologists of religion is now much more transparently acknowledged than previously.

With religion playing a significant role on the global political map, the discipline of sociology of religion is undergoing a creative and diverse phase. While many are looking at themes like fundamentalism or religious minorities, others are working at the impact of religion on everyday life, the role of women, and studying local congregations. While not providing the total explanation of religion, sociological insights can prove invaluable in a world and communities where religion remains a powerful and socially conditioned aspect of human experience.

Bibliography

P. Berger, The Sacred Canopy: Elements of a Sociological Theory of Religion (New York, 1967); idem (ed.), The Desecularization of the West: Resurgent Religion and World Politics (Grand Rapids, 1999); S. Bruce, God Is Dead: Secularization in the West (Oxford, 2002); G. Davie, The Sociology of Religion (Los Angeles and London, 2007); S. Warner, 'Work in Progress towards a New Paradigm for the Sociological Study of Religion in the United States', American Journal of Sociology, 98, 1993, pp. 1044–1093; B. Wilson, Religion in Sociological Perspective (Oxford, 1982); L. Young (ed.), Rational Choice Theory and Religion: Summary and Assessment (London, 1997).

D. J. TIDBALL

SOELLE, DOROTHEE (1929–2003)

Soelle was a radical German theologian, who was visiting professor at Union Theological Seminary in New York from 1975 to 1987. The major characteristics of her theology are her rejection of traditional *theism and her political hermeneutic. Her deep concern with the issues raised by Auschwitz (see *Holocaust) both led her to Christian faith and made the idea of God as omnipotent ruler of the world inconceivable. She shared the *Marxist criticism of traditional theism as putting people in a position of alienated dependence and encouraging the acceptance of suffering, instead of protest and political activity to abolish suffering. For Soelle, God is loving solidarity, not omnipotent superiority. She pursued this reconception of God to the extent that, in her work, God often seems to be only a symbol for human love, liberation and hope. In this she continued *Bultmann's programme of demythologizing (see *Myth), but she rejected Bultmann's *existential privatization of Christianity in favour of a political hermeneutic of the gospel. Existential concerns cannot be separated from the need for concrete application of the gospel to the oppressive realities of international politics. Soelle's passionate advocacy of a radical political theology was matched by personal involvement, especially in base communities and the peace movement of the 1980s.

Bibliography

Works: Christ the Representative (London, 1967); Political Theology (Philadelphia, 1974); Suffering (London, 1975); The Inward Road and the Way Back (London, 1979); Thinking about God: An Introduction to Theology (London, 1990); Theology for Skeptics: Reflections on God (Minneapolis, 1995); Against the Wind: Memoir of a Radical Christian (Minneapolis, 1999); Dorothee Soelle: Essential Writings, ed. D. L. Oliver (Maryknoll, 2006).

Studies: S. K. Pinnock (ed.), The Theology of Dorothee Soelle (Harrisburg, 2005).

R. J. BAUCKHAM

SONSHIP

The sonship of Jesus Christ

The portrait of *Jesus that emerges from Scripture quite clearly shows him to be the Son of God. Although the language of divine sonship is used sparingly in the OT (e.g. Exod. 4:22–23), it features prominently in the NT. It is frequently used of Jesus in the Synoptics, it is pervasive in the fourth Gospel, and it is common in Paul's writings and the rest of the NT. The sonship of Jesus was widely recognized by the early Christians, and it was just as widely understood to be central to his identity. But questions also abounded in the early Christian communities: does the fact that Jesus is a son also mean that he is a creature? Does sonship entail inferiority or subordination? Is Jesus the Son of God only in the *incarnation? Or does the sonship of Jesus reveal something about the nature of God?

Pre-*Nicene theology offered no consensus, and subsequent discussions served to heighten awareness of the importance of such questions. By the early fourth century, however, the Arian controversy brought these matters to the forefront of theological consciousness. The theology of *Arius and the early 'Arians' (not all of whom were members of a sharply distinguished Arian 'party') can be summarized as containing the following propositions. First, God was not always *Father; there was a time when he was simply God and not Father. Second, the Son is a creature, one who is created by God out of nothing. The third point is that there are several powers of God (subsequent to the creation of the Son), while the fourth point is that the Son is variable by nature and remains stable only by the grace of God (e.g. R. P. C. Hanson, The Search for the Christian Doctrine of God, pp. 20–23). Central to Arian teaching is the insistence that the Son is alien from the divine being and distinct from God – even though he can be called 'divine', he is not true God. The Son has been created for the purpose of mediation with the rest of creation, and, as a creature, his knowledge of God is imperfect. The Son is thus a created deity, a lower-order or secondary God.

Arius was happy to affirm that Jesus Christ is the Son of God; he was perfectly willing to affirm that the Son is 'begotten of the Father'. For the Arians, begetting and creating were synonymous, and to be begotten or created is to be dependant, subordinate and inferior. There is no common divine nature or substance; the Father and Son are of different essences. To be the 'Son' just is to be created, and of course all created beings are inferior to the One who is uncreated. The insistence of the 'Neo-Arians' of the mid-fourth century (e.g. Eunomius and Aetius) is even more pronounced: because names reveal the essence of things, and because ingenerateness is the exhaustive definition of God, then the Son who is generated must be heteroousios rather than homoousios.

To these challenges the pro-Nicenes responded with a variety of arguments. They produced exegetical arguments (from the divine works performed by the Son, from the names and titles of Christ, and from the witness to his pre-existence) to the conclusion that the Son is fully divine. They also argued that since only God is rightly worshipped, and since the worship of Jesus is universal among Christian believers and grounded in the Scriptures, then Jesus Christ must be fully and completely divine. Similarly, they argued that Jesus Christ must be fully divine because, while only God can truly be said to save us, all Christians believe that Jesus Christ is the Saviour of the world.

Thus they endorsed the statement that the Son is homoousios with the Father, and they concluded that the Son is equal to the Father in all things.

The importance of the homoousion for a proper understanding of the sonship of Christ was not lost upon *Athanasius and the other pro-Nicenes (perhaps most notably the Cappadocians, *Gregory of Nyssa, *Gregory of Nazianzus and *Basil of Ceasarea). They insisted that the Son is pre-existent and indeed eternal; there was no time when the Son did not exist. Furthermore, the Son is fully and truly divine, for his is not a diminished divinity. He is not subordinate to the Father in any way (other than his 'functional' or 'economic' subordination as incarnate). The Son is all that the Father is except Father, and the Son has all of the essential attributes of divinity. The Father and Son are equal in authority and power; neither the Father nor the Son have special abilities or powers not possessed by the other. Indeed, for much classical Christian theology any of the divine persons could have become incarnate. Moreover, the fact that the Son is fully divine has vast implications for our understanding of the nature of God: because God is Father and Son (and *Holy Spirit) the relations are inherent to the very being of God and are even essential. As the Father is Father only in relation to his Son, and as the Son is Son only in relation to his Father, so also the being of God is constituted in the loving relations of the intra-divine life.

Sons and daughters of God

The pro-Nicene theologians also understood the sonship of Jesus Christ to have implications for human identity and destiny. The only-begotten Son of God became incarnate in order that human persons could become by grace what he is by nature. Drawing from the NT language of *regeneration and adoption, these theologians insisted that salvation is entrance into God's own life of light and love. While our understanding of *salvation is to be informed by and consistent with the legal imagery of the NT, it cannot be limited to the categories of pardon and justification. Though not less than that, it is certainly more than that. While our status as creatures is never altered, we can experience spiritual adoption and regeneration. Because the Son of God became the Son of Man, we are enabled by his grace to 'receive the full rights' of children (Gal. 4:5), to cry 'Abba, Father' (Gal. 4:6; Rom. 8:15), and indeed to 'participate in the divine nature' (2 Pet. 1:4).

See also: CHRISTOLOGY; GOD; TRINITY.

Bibliography

L. Ayres, Nicaea and its Legacy: An Approach to Fourth-Century Trinitarianism (Oxford, 2004); R. Cross, The Metaphysics of the Incarnation (Oxford, 2002); D. Fairbairn, Grace and Christology in the Early Church (Oxford, 2003); S. Gathercole, The Pre-existent Son: Recovering the Christologies of Matthew, Mark, and Luke (Grand Rapids, 2006); R. Hanson, The Search for the Christian Doctrine of God: The Arian Controversy, 318–381 AD (Edinburgh, 1988); T. Torrance, The Trinitarian Faith: The Evangelical Theology of the Ancient Catholic Church (Edinburgh, 1988); P. Widdicombe, The Fatherhood of God from Origen to Athanasius (Oxford, 1994).

T. MCCALL

SOUL, see ANTHROPOLOGY; SOUL, ORIGIN OF

SOUL, ORIGIN OF

The way that one understands the origin of the soul depends on prior metaphysical presuppositions about what a soul is. As such, we shall consider first theories of soul origination that assume substance *dualism before briefly noting the different approach taken by a physicalist understanding of the soul.

How the soul comes to be

Pre-existentism. As it merely makes the claim that the soul pre-existed the body, pre-existentism is not itself a theory of the soul's origin. However, it has often been associated with an emanationist theory in which the soul emerges from God (as in some forms of *Gnosticism). The pre-existence of the soul was taught by Plato and was introduced to Christian theology by *Origen. In light of its speculative, unbiblical nature and its tendency toward a Gnostic devaluation of the body, pre-existentism has remained a minor eccentricity in theological history.

Traducianism. Taking his cue from *Stoic thought, *Tertullian proposed that the soul is naturally propagated by human beings. This position was adopted by a number of Latin theologians and was later embraced by Martin Luther and most subsequent Lutherans as well as a few Reformed theologians (e.g. William Shedd and Augustus Strong). Traducians argue that Adam's creation is unique (Gen. 2:7), such that human beings, like other creatures, were designed to create progeny naturally after their kind. Traducians have disagreed over how the soul is propagated, but most have argued that the process includes some form of seminal presence, a notion that they claim has biblical warrant (e.g. Heb. 7:10) and grounds a realist theory of Adam's headship.

Creationism. The predominant theory in Eastern Christianity, and more recently in both the Catholic and Reformed traditions, the creationist position affirms that God directly creates the soul. Creationists appeal to a number of texts (e.g. Zech. 12:1), but such passages are indeterminate at best and do not clearly exclude God's creation through mediate causes. Creationists also believe their theory provides a means to ensure Christ's incarnation without fallenness, though critics charge that the theory makes God complicit in evil since he either directly creates a depraved soul, or creates a pure soul that is joined to a depraved body.

When the soul comes to be

While there has been no settled opinion on when souls come to exist, Aristotle's views (especially as mediated by Thomas Aquinas) have been very influential. He argued that the soul proceeds through three developmental phases (vegetative, sensate and rational) with the last, constituting ensoulment proper, beginning at forty days gestation for males and eighty days for females. More recently, many theologians have identified conception as the initial point of ensoulment. The question of the soul's origin has important bioethical implications for a range of issues, including the moral licitness of abortion, abortifacient contraceptives, artificial reproductive technologies (e.g. in-vitro fertilization) and stem cell research (see Ethics).

Rethinking the soul's origin

Many today consider the traditional substance dualist framework to have been rendered obsolete by advances in science and philosophy. Creationism in particular fits poorly with advances in evolutionary biology, neuroscience, cognitive science and psychology. For one thing, its appeal to divine action to explain conscious life looks like the widely repudiated God-of-the-gaps approach to divine action. What is more, the creationist account does not comport with the intimate relationship between genetics and the brain and personal characteristics. Still, it is not clear that traducianism fares much better, as it posits a wholly mysterious account of spiritual origination with relatively sparse explanatory payoff. If one adopts a physicalist view of the self, then the soul might be understood simply as the living being (nephesh), in which case the soul comes to exist when the living being comes to exist (perhaps at conception). Conversely, one might view the soul as the set of mental properties and/or events (that is, the mind) that arises out of the functioning of the brain, in which case the soul comes to exist when the brain is sufficiently developed to produce mental properties and/or events.

Bibliography

G. C. Berkouwer, Man: The Image of God, tr. D. W. Jellema (Grand Rapids, 1972); W. S. Brown, N. Murphy and H. N. Malony (eds.), Whatever Happened to the Soul? Scientific and Theological Portraits of Human Nature (Minneapolis, 1998); J. P. Moreland and S. Rae, Body and Soul: Human Nature and the Crisis in Ethics (Downers Grove, 2000).

R. RAUSER

SOUTHERN BAPTIST THEOLOGY

The Southern Baptist Convention (founded 1845) has distinguished itself more for practical Christian activity than profound theological writing. Nevertheless, its missionary activity has not proceeded within a theological vacuum. John L. Dagg (1794–1884), the Convention's first writing theologian, contributed theological, ecclesiological, ethical and apologetic works giving identity and direction to Southern Baptists. His Manual of Theology (1858) is a devotional, yet theologically cogent, exposition of evangelical Calvinism founded upon the fundamental principle of every man's duty to love God. J. P. Boyce (1827–88), founder of the first Southern Baptist theological seminary, wrote Abstract of Systematic Theology as a textbook. Reflecting Boyce's Princeton education, it gives voice to the consistent Calvinism of his Southern Baptist contemporaries (see *Reformed theology). B. H. Carroll (1843–1914), though not a systematic theologian, had great conserving effect on Southern Baptist theology through pulpit, print, classroom, personal relations (G. W. Truett, 1867–1944, and L. R. Scarborough, 1870–1945), and the founding of Southwestern Baptist Seminary (1908). E. Y. Mullins (1860–1928) retained Calvinistic views of election, the precedence of new birth to faith, justification by faith, and perseverance, but his book, The Christian Religion in Its Doctrinal Expression, made universal Christian experience one of the major sources of theological method, thus introducing pragmatism into twentieth-century Southern Baptist theology. W. T. Conner (1877–1952) taught systematic theology at Southwestern Seminary for thirty-nine years. His Revelation and God and The Gospel of Redemption show a clear indebtedness to Mullins and A. H. Strong. Dale Moody's (1915–92) The Word of Truth shows a highly eclectic relationship with modern trends in theology, a cordial receptivity to biblical criticism, and a general rejection of historic Baptist Calvinism.

Theological controversy within Southern Baptist life has focused on two issues – ecclesiology (see *Church) and *Scripture. The Landmark movement, led by J. R. Graves (1820–93), so defined Baptist origins and ecclesiology that members of non-Baptist fellowships were not embraced as Christian brethren, nor their ministers as Christian ministers. Mainstream Southern Baptists rejected the most radical features of Landmarkism.

Controversy over Scripture arose from the gradual introduction of biblical criticism into the seminaries, countered by a growing awareness of its destructive implications for the doctrines of *revelation and inspiration. The C. H. Toy controversy at Southern Seminary (1879), the evolution controversy (1923–27), the controversy over Ralph Elliott's book The Message of Genesis (1961–63), and the Broadman Commentary controversy (1970ff.) were actually individual eruptions produced by the tension of this one conflict. The 1980s and 1990s witnessed a vigorous debate on the issue that established a clear commitment to biblical inerrancy on the part of all the agencies and the six theological seminaries (see *Infallibility and inerrancy of the Bible). Though it involved significant personnel change, all these organizations came to affirm not only the inerrancy of Scripture but to require a conscientious subscription to the doctrinal statement of the Southern Baptist Convention, The Baptist Faith and Message, newly revised in 2000. The task assumed by each of these Convention entities also took a more decidedly evangelical form. This renewed affirmation of doctrinal fidelity has fuelled an energetic discussion on the Calvinistic heritage of Southern Baptists vis-à-vis the reticence of many in the denomination to embrace that earlier confessional heritage.

See also: BAPTIST THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

L. R. Bush and T. J. Nettles, Baptists and the Bible (Nashville, 1999); J. L. Garrett, Baptist Theology: A Four-Century Study (Macon, 2009); T. J. Nettles, The Baptists, 3 vols. (Fearn, 2005–07).

T. J. NETTLES

SOVEREIGNTY OF GOD

The assertion of God's sovereignty is essential to Christian belief. It is an amplification of the assertion that God is Ruler, King and Lord of all, what is otherwise depicted by the trisagion of Isa. 6 with its vision of God sitting upon a throne. It is expressed in the affirmation of the Nicene Creed, 'I believe in God, the Father almighty . . .' and is confessed by all Christian traditions. It is particularly emphasized in the *Reformed tradition stemming from John Calvin, and specifically interpreted in conservative branches of that tradition as implying God's foreordination, particularly in the doctrine of double predestination of the elect and the reprobate. Those in other traditions, and many in the Reformed tradition today, affirm God's sovereignty but reject that interpretation.

God's sovereignty in *creation is illustrated by an insistence that he creates ex nihilo, out of nothing. The will, the design and the execution are entirely his. It is the basis of creation's coherence and rationality, as well as of the possibility of *science. God creates not out of any metaphysical necessity or determinism but from a free act.

Traditional Christian *theism has held that God is defined as omnipotent, omniscient and omnipresent, each a variant of divine sovereignty. His power ensures that his goals are met, his designs fulfilled and, traditionally, that his *providence is essentially 'risk-free'. His power is not absolute in the sense that God can do anything (potestas absoluta), although that idea is present in medieval thought as well as in *Luther, *Calvin and *Zwingli. Creedal expressions of sovereignty, however, are careful to maintain that omnipotence does not mean that God can do anything, but rather that he can do all that is logically possible (e.g. he cannot deny himself). *Anselm of Canterbury (in his Proslogion) and *Thomas Aquinas (in his Summa Theologica) suggested that it is because God is omnipotent that he cannot sin. Nineteenth-century *kenoticism argued that God engaged in self-limitation or self-emptying in the *incarnation, setting aside metaphysical attributes (omnipotence, omniscience, omnipresence) in Christ while retaining the moral attributes (love, righteousness, holiness). Dietrich *Bonhoeffer spoke of Christ's incarnation as an expression of 'God's *powerlessness'. Traditional Christian theism regarding sovereignty is also recast by *process theologians who speak of God's 'dipolarity' (e.g. A. N. Whitehead, C. Hartshorne) whereby the constant unchanging polarity of God is continually adapting itself to the cosmic evolutionary process.

As to God's omnipresence, traditional theism has insisted that God is not bound by the limitations of space (or time), but that he is always present everywhere at all times, though invisibly and imperceptibly.

The belief in God's omniscience has been challenged of late by evangelical and post-evangelical *open theism (or free-will theism), in an attempt to defend a notion of human freedom. Thus, John E. Sanders can write:

That God changes in some respects implies that God is temporal, working with us in time. God, at least since Creation, experiences duration. God is everlasting through time rather than timelessly eternal . . . We believe that God could have known every event of the future had God decided to create a fully determined universe. However, in our view, God decided to create beings with indeterministic freedom which implies that God chose to create a universe in which the future is not entirely knowable, even for God. For many open theists, the 'future' is not a present reality – it does not exist – and God knows reality as it is (<<http://www.opentheism.info/>>).

Another challenge to the traditional attributes of God related to his sovereignty has been to the notion of *impassibility: that no-one can inflict suffering, pain or any sort of distress on God. In the traditional view, God may and does enter into the creature's suffering by choice and empathy, but not as a victim. Traditional orthodoxy, despite frequent claims to the contrary, has not suggested that God is a stranger to joy or does not experience emotion. But impassibility has often been equated with Aristotle's idea of the metaphysical and ethical perfection of God, apatheia, meaning imperturbability and dispassionateness (the Unmoved Mover).

The traditional Calvinist view of the sovereignty of God in election and preterition (in Calvinistic theology, God's sovereign decision to pass over some people in election, who are finally condemned on account of their sin: cf. e.g. Berkhof, pp. 116–117; see *Perseverance, *Predestination) has occasioned heated disagreements in the doctrine of God itself as well as soteriology. In both, the accomplishment of *redemption as well as its application in the lives of individuals, Calvinism has seen the sovereignty of God in the concept of election itself (those chosen to eternal life), insisting, in the words of W. G. T. Shedd, that the exercise of mercy is optional with God. Calvinistic theology argues that God's purposes in redemption are always achieved: the cross accomplishes and guarantees the *salvation of men and women rather than simply making salvation possible. The ordo salutis, it is argued, necessitates that a line be drawn from foreordination to glorification, else the notion of election is in question.

But in the *evangelical tradition from the Reformation to the present many (*Melancthon, Arminius, Richard *Baxter, John *Wesley) have disagreed with this in some way. Many evangelicals hold that God's sovereign prevenient grace in Christ extends to all, but does not compel any, and many contemporary Western theologians take a similar line. *Barth reinterpreted election to argue that God in his sovereignty elects all in Christ, but that some may reject their salvation. Similarly, *Eastern Orthodoxy generally opposes the idea that the sovereignty of God implies the Calvinist doctrine of predestination, comparing it with Islamic fatalism.

Those issues involving the relationship of sovereignty and human responsibility become acute in several ways. First, views differ in relation to choice or 'free will', the belief that the human *will has an inherent power to choose between alternatives. In opposition to *determinism, the will is said to be free from necessary causation (libertarianism), or the will coexists with all events being determined by previous states of affairs (compatibilism). Calvinists agree that free agency is necessary to human nature, but insist that moral choices can only take place according to the condition of human nature as fallen and not in some neutral state. Human depravity necessitates moral inability. They deny absolute autonomy, insisting on prevenient grace to enable the will to respond. Classical *Arminians agree, but insist that prevenient grace is not coercive. Some later theologians (misleadingly classified as 'Arminians') disagreed with Arminius by defending a doctrine of natural free will.

Second, in relation to *evangelism, if the sovereignty of God implies his preordaining some to eternal life and others to eternal damnation (see *Judgment of God), this appears not only to deter but ultimately to cripple initiative and encourage passivity and inertia. Defenders have countered by arguing a compatibilist position: evangelism is commanded by Christ and the apostles and should be done on this ground alone, but adding that God saves through, and not apart from, means. Yet most theologians find the notion that God has eternally elected some to damnation blunts the appeal of the gospel and makes the sovereignty of God incompatible with his love.

Third, in relation to *ethics, responsibility in behaviour and culpability in transgression are once again viewed as compatible with overall sovereignty, nowhere seen more starkly than in Phil. 2:12: 'Work out your salvation with fear and trembling, for it is God who works in you to will and to act according to his good pleasure.'

Fourth, in relation to civic power and authority, God is sovereign in the determination of rule and government (Rom. 13:1–7).

Fifth, in relation to *evil, both in respect to its origin and continued existence, the sovereignty of God meets its most acute problem (see *Theodicy). That God does not prevent evil from existing calls into question his omnipotence or benevolence. Seeming solutions are that evil is imaginary (Christian Science), illusion (Hinduism), privation of the Good suggesting something without ontology (Augustine and medieval thought). Reformed thought in the conservative Calvinist tradition is summarized by the Westminster Confession: 'God, from all eternity, did, by the most wise and holy counsel of His own will, freely, and unchangeably ordain whatsoever comes to pass: yet so, as thereby neither is God the author of sin, nor is violence offered to the will of the creatures; nor is the liberty or contingency of second causes taken away, but rather established' (3:1). God is the 'first cause' of all things, but evil is a product of 'second causes'. In the words of John Calvin, 'First, it must be observed that the will of God is the cause of all things that happen in the world: and yet God is not the author of evil', adding, 'for the proximate cause is one thing, and the remote cause another' (J. Calvin, Concerning the Eternal Predestination of God, pp. 169, 181).

See also: GOD; TRINITY.

Bibliography

J. Arminius, 'Declaration of Sentiments', Works, vol. 3 (London, 1825), pp. 516–668; H. Bavinck, Reformed Dogmatics, vol. 2: God and Creation, 4 vols., ed. John Bolt (Grand Rapids, 2004); G. Bray, The Doctrine of God (Leicester, 1993); J. Calvin, Concerning the Eternal Predestination of God (London, 1982 [1552]); J. Frame, The Doctrine of God: A Theology of Lordship (Phillipsburg, 2002); M. Luther, The Bondage of the Will, tr. J. I. Packer and O. R. Johnson (London, 1973); A. McGrath, Christian Theology: An Introduction (Oxford, 1994); R. K. McGregor, No Place for Sovereignty: What's Wrong with Freewill Theism? (Downers Grove, 1996); T. C. Oden, The Living God (New York, 1992); R. E. Olson, Arminian Theology: Myths and Realities (Downers Grove, 2006); C. H. Pinnock, Most Moved Mover: A Theology of God's Openness (Carlisle, 2001); John Wesley, 'On Predestination', Works, vol. II (Nashville, 1985), pp. 413–421; idem, 'Free Grace', Works, vol. III (Nashville, 1986), pp. 542–563.

D. W. H. THOMAS

SPINOZA, BENEDICT (BARUCH) DE (1632–77)

A complex, original, Dutch thinker, prominent in public affairs, Spinoza was of Jewish origin, but was expelled from his synagogue (1656) for his unorthodox views, which were *pantheistic. There is only one reality or 'substance', which can be called equally 'God' or 'Nature'; all other things are modifications of this (similarly, mind and body are aspects of a single human unity). Since God/Nature exists necessarily, all else follows necessarily; human freedom is simply acting rationally rather than as a slave of the passions. Our greatest good is to know and love God; but God, being perfect in himself, neither loves nor hates, save in us. The common idea of *immortality is a mistake; yet in necessary knowledge we are aware of an eternal, timeless aspect of the mind.

According to Spinoza, religions such as Judaism and Christianity do not express philosophical truth; they are primarily ways of conveying moral truths to those incapable of seeing them by reason. Any religion which helps in this way should therefore be tolerated. In seeking to study the Bible dispassionately (and dating many OT books later than tradition), Spinoza has also been seen as a forerunner of biblical criticism.

Bibliography

Ethics and De Intellectus Emendatione (ET, London, 1910); S. Hampshire, Spinoza (Harmondsworth, 1951); G. Lloyd, Spinoza and Ethics (London, 1996); S. Nadler, A Book Forged in Hell: Spinoza's Scandalous Treatise and the Birth of the Secular Age (Princeton, 2011); R. Scruton, Spinoza: A Very Short Introduction (Oxford, 2002).

R. L. STURCH

SPIRITUALISM, see SECTS

SPIRITUALITY

Varied understandings of spirituality are offered by those writing on the subject. Some are broad enough to include most human experience, not simply what is Christian. Within the specifically Christian context, the contemporary understanding of spirituality increasingly emphasizes the holistic involvement of the person who is responding to God's revelation of himself, recognizes and affirms the community context of spirituality in worship and fellowship, and stresses that authentic spirituality is embodied in social transformation. These perspectives mean that spirituality is not taken to refer exclusively to the life of prayer or the inner spiritual exercises. Using a framework proposed by Philip Sheldrake, spirituality can be seen as concerned with the conjunction of theology, experiential communion with God and practical Christianity. Seen in this way, spirituality is increasingly a subject for study. A more academic approach to spirituality involves critical historical analysis of a broad range of 'lived experience'.

A traditional distinction has been made between *apophatic spirituality, in which any idea of using an image of God – even a mental image – is rejected, and cataphatic spirituality, which draws attention to the association between God and his creation and which is therefore open to the use of symbols and icons. Both these tendencies can co-exist within the same Christian tradition. Thus the Eastern Church has been known both for its great mystics and also for its theology and use of icons. Another distinction that has been made is between 'apostolic' or missionary approaches to spirituality on the one hand, and the more *monastic attitude on the other, which seeks to find spiritual resources in withdrawal. A more complex categorization has been proposed by Geoffrey Wainwright, who has suggested that Richard *Niebuhr's well-rehearsed typology of the relationship between Christ and culture (Christ against culture, the Christ of culture, Christ above culture, Christ and culture in paradox, and Christ the transformer of culture) could be applied to streams of spirituality.

Historically, there have been some significant differences between the approaches of the Eastern and the Western Church. However, in the patristic period and beyond, both East and West saw spirituality and theology as one, rather than as separated. The Fathers of the church emphasized and sought to integrate *prayer, study and service (see *Patristic theology). In the medieval period influential figures in the story of spirituality included *Hildegard of Bingen, *Francis of Assisi, Meister Eckhart and *Julian of Norwich, whose Revelations of Divine Love give her a place as the first English 'woman of letters'. The trend was towards the exaltation of the *mystical, although Francis was also an active evangelist. The sixteenth century produced those who contributed to outstanding and very different ways to an understanding of spirituality – for example, Martin *Luther, *Ignatius of Loyola, *Teresa of Avila and her assistant, John of the Cross – but from the Protestant *Reformation onwards there was a tendency in the West, on the part of both Roman Catholic and Protestant leaders, to give precedence to the theological task and to see spirituality as subsidiary, having to do only with the practice of devotion. There were notable exceptions: many of the seventeenth-century English *Puritans sought to integrate a robust doctrinal approach with a deep commitment to godly living. In the *Eastern Orthodox tradition, spirituality – particularly its corporate expression in the worship of the church – remained central.

Within Protestantism the eighteenth century saw the rise of renewal movements across Europe. In 1675 Philipp Spener, a Lutheran, wrote on the subject of ‘pious desires’, and the movement that took shape was nicknamed *Pietism. By contrast with the rather lifeless state of much German Protestantism at the time, Pietism soon came to be seen as embodying an important rallying call to a more vital Protestant spirituality. It reaffirmed the centrality of the Christian experience of the new birth and also wanted to renew the theology of the *priesthood of all believers, with its outworking in the recovery of lay ecclesial participation. In order to improve the level of spiritual instruction in church life, class meetings were held, in which believers would meet to teach each other, engage in singing and share Christian testimonies. Pietism was to some extent refashioned by Nicholas von Zinzendorf, a young German count who had been educated in a Pietist environment at Halle and who opened his estate in south-east Saxony in the 1720s to a group of Protestant refugees from Bohemia and Moravia. The community that was established, called Herrnhut (‘under the Lord’s Protection’), became the locus of a profound spiritual renewal which produced a missional spirituality and issued in remarkable ventures in world mission (see *Moravian theology).

The same period saw the emergence within Roman Catholicism of ‘spiritual theology’. This was viewed as a subset of theology and was linked with the practice of spiritual direction. The Society of Jesus in particular sought to bring together ‘ascetical theology’, which had to do with the active seeking of perfection, and ‘mystical theology’, which had contemplation as its focus. Some manuals of spiritual theology were produced, although among *Jesuits the primary resource was the thinking of their founder, Ignatius of Loyola, and especially his Spiritual Exercises. In the development of Ignatian spirituality there has been a stress on practical Christianity lived out in daily life through entry into the gospel story, self-examination (the examen), the idea of the retreat as a place of guidance, an invitation to decision or ‘election’ – as the Holy Spirit guides the person – in the context of surrender to God, and mission in the style of the early disciples. These ideas, or variations of them, have been taken up widely in different sections of the Christian church, especially in the later twentieth century.

John *Wesley, who shaped much early evangelical thinking in the English-speaking world, recorded in his diary for 24 May 1738 the following words, which were to become among the most famous in the story of Protestant Christian experience:

In the evening I went very unwillingly to a society in Aldersgate Street [in the city of London], where one was reading Luther’s Preface to the Epistle to the Romans. About a quarter before nine, while he was describing the change which God works in the heart through faith in Christ, I felt my heart strangely warmed. I felt I did trust in Christ, Christ alone, for salvation; and an assurance was given me that He had taken away my sins, even mine, and saved me from the law of sin and death . . . I then testified openly to all there what I now first felt in my heart.

This account, describing as it does how John Wesley came to a point of personal reliance on God’s grace and Christ’s work on the cross for salvation, later came to be seen as a description of a typical experience of *evangelical *conversion, although perhaps it should rather be seen as an expression of *assurance of salvation. Among the prior spiritual influences on John Wesley and on his brother *Charles, who was also an Anglican clergyman, were the seventeenth-century English Puritan movement and Catholic and Anglican High Church devotion. John Wesley was affected by his reading of the Imitation of Christ, by Thomas à Kempis, and the writings of the Anglican High Churchman, William Law, On Christian Perfection (1726) and A Serious Call to a Devout and Holy Life (1728). There was also the (somewhat ambiguous) influence on Wesley of the more mystical streams of spirituality, notably that expressed by German mystics such as Meister Eckhardt and Jakob Böhme, or in books like

The Life of God in the Soul of Man, by Henry Scougal of Aberdeen, a Scottish episcopalian. All these different influences contributed in some way to the shaping of John Wesley's evangelical spirituality.

In eighteenth-century North America, Jonathan *Edwards, America's greatest theologian, was a primary shaper of evangelical spirituality. In his own phrase, in one of his great works, The Religious Affections, 'holy affections' constituted a great part of true religion. 'The Holy Scriptures,' he asserted, 'do everywhere place religion very much in the affections; such as fear, hope, love, hatred, desire, joy, sorrow, gratitude, compassion, zeal.' Yet for Edwards, evangelical spirituality was not to be defined as fine feelings. He insisted that 'there must be light in the understanding, as well as an affected fervent heart . . . on the other hand, where there is a kind of light without heat, a head stored with notions and speculations, with a cold and unaffected heart, there can be nothing divine in that light, that knowledge is no true spiritual knowledge of divine things.' In the Religious Affections, it becomes clear that meditation on the *cross is central to 'spiritual knowledge'. 'Where,' enquired Edwards, as he spoke with heartfelt expression of Christ's sufferings on the cross, 'are the exercises of our affections proper, if not here?'

Within the English-speaking world, a number of key figures who followed on from the founding figures such as Wesley and Edwards helped to shape evangelical thinking about spirituality. In Britain these included Anglicans such as John Newton, the hymn-writer William Cowper (hymns have been crucial expressions of evangelical spirituality) and Charles *Simeon, as well as Presbyterians such as Robert Murray McCheyne and Baptists like Charles Haddon *Spurgeon. In America, Charles *Finney was among those whose influence on thinking about holiness and evangelism was profound. There has also been a significant reshaping of aspects of evangelical experience in the period since the early twentieth century, due to the massive influence on evangelical life worldwide of the *Pentecostal and *charismatic movements, with their emphasis on the power of the Holy Spirit and also the gifts of the Spirit, such as prophecy, speaking in tongues and healing. The international Pentecostal/charismatic community, to a large extent a subset of evangelicalism although also embracing Catholic charismatics, has seen phenomenal numerical growth since its beginnings about 100 years ago, and its approach to experience has presented fresh challenges.

From the 1970s and 1980s the term 'spirituality' largely replaced 'spiritual theology', and an increasing number of seminaries, including those in the evangelical tradition, began to offer courses in spirituality. It is sometimes thought that the main ingredients of evangelical spirituality have always been rather restricted – early rising, prayer and Bible study – and that little of this could be studied. However, Derek Tidball, in Who Are the Evangelicals? (1994), rightly questioned the close association of evangelical spirituality with the 'quiet time', as it is sometimes called, and in examining evangelical spirituality he dealt with such broader themes as grace, holiness and involvement in *society. The major topics explored by David Gillett in his study of evangelical spirituality, Trust and Obey (1993), are a 'twice-born' spirituality, assurance of salvation, the cross of Christ, the pursuit of holiness, the God who speaks and the God who acts. Gillett suggested that there is within evangelicalism a new openness and a welcoming of opportunities to examine varieties of Christian spirituality. Evangelicals have become more interested in areas such as contemplative prayer, lectio divina, spiritual direction, the place of the sacraments, an appreciation of creation, and spirituality in relation to social action – drawing, for example, from the insights of *liberation theology.

As well as the phenomenon of evangelicals exploring other Christian traditions of spirituality, they have been engaged since the 1980s in a fresh examination of their own spiritual tradition, with its varied sub-strands such as Wesleyan *holiness, *Reformed, Keswick and Pentecostal spiritualities. Most (though not all) recent studies of evangelicalism have aligned themselves with the argument advanced by Bebbington that evangelicalism is a movement comprising all those who stress conversion, the Bible, the cross and activism. All of these features can be found in other Christian traditions, but in evangelicalism they are combined in a particular way. Evangelicalism is not so much defined by its doctrines, but may be seen, rather, as a distinctive stream of Christian spirituality, since these four features are not doctrinal formulations, but have to do with 'lived experience'. At the heart of evangelical spirituality is a personal relationship with Christ.

In the current revival of interest in spirituality in the wider Christian world, a number of twentieth-century writers have been of particular significance. One has been Thomas *Merton, an American Trappist monk, who published his best-selling autobiography, The Seven Storey Mountain, in 1947. Another significant Catholic writer has been Henri Nouwen, a Dutch priest, who has given attention to the nature of authentic spirituality in books such as The Return of the Prodigal. Kallistos Ware has been one of a number of writers introducing the wider Christian community in the West to Orthodox spirituality. Perhaps the evangelical writer who has done most to highlight the richness of the varied streams of spirituality has been Richard Foster, most notably in his book Streams of Living Water (1999). Fresh commitment to the renewal of spirituality is currently to be found in all Christian traditions.

Bibliography

L. Bouyer (ed.), A History of Christian Spirituality, 3 vols. (London, 1968); K. J. Collins, Exploring Christian Spirituality (Grand Rapids, 2000); R. Foster, Streams of Living Water (London, 1999); D. Gillett, Trust and Obey (London, 1993); C. Jones, G. Wainwright and E. Yarnold (eds.), The Study of Spirituality (Oxford, 1986); G. Mursell (ed.), The Story of Christian Spirituality (Oxford, 2001); I. M. Randall, What a Friend We Have in Jesus (London, 2005); P. Sheldrake, Spirituality and Theology (London, 1998); idem (ed.), The New SCM Dictionary of Christian Spirituality (London, 1983).

I. M. RANDALL

SPURGEON, CHARLES HADDON (1834–92)

Born into an Essex Congregational home, Spurgeon experienced a dramatic conversion in his early teens and sought baptism as a believer. After a successful short ministry in rural Cambridgeshire he became Baptist minister at New Park Street Chapel, London, which later moved to the Metropolitan Tabernacle to accommodate the vast congregations which came to hear him preach. His popularity was greatly enhanced by the weekly publication (from 1855 onwards) of his sermons, the sale of which in England and the USA helped to finance the theological college he had established in 1856. The sermons give rich expression both to his firmly held Calvinistic (see *Reformed theology) convictions and evangelistic concern. In 1864 his sermon on ‘*Baptismal Regeneration’ brought him into theological conflict with paedobaptists, including some evangelicals. Later, when *liberal theological ideas were gaining ground, he affirmed his unqualified allegiance to biblical doctrine. During his own denomination’s ‘Downgrade’ controversy (1887–9) he expressed alarm concerning unorthodox views, and in 1887, ‘with the utmost regret’, withdrew from the Baptist Union. His voluminous writings (135 books), which frequently reflect his indebtedness to seventeenth-century *Puritanism, continue to be published, maintaining his immense spiritual influence throughout the evangelical world.

See also: BAPTIST THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

J. C. Carlile, C. H. Spurgeon: An Interpretative Biography (London, 1933); H. F. Colquitt, The Soteriology of Charles Haddon Spurgeon . . . (unpublished dissertation, New College, Edinburgh, 1951); I. H. Murray, The Forgotten Spurgeon (London, 1966); G. H. Pike, The Life and Work of Charles Haddon Spurgeon, 6 vols. (London, 1892–3); H. Thielicke (ed.), Encounter with Spurgeon (London, 1964).

R. BROWN

STANILOAE, DUMITRU (1903–93)

Dumitru Staniloae was one of the most influential and prolific Romanian Orthodox theologians. As Professor of Dogmatic Theology at the Faculty of Orthodox Theology in Sibiu and Bucharest, he wrote and translated thousands of academic books and articles, mainly from the area of patristics and dogmatic theology.

His theological career started in 1922, focusing mainly on church history, particularly the hesychast movement. In 1928 he completed his doctoral thesis on The Life and Work of Patriarch Dositheos of Jerusalem and His Relations with the Romanian Lands. Immediately after that, Staniloae travelled to Munich, Berlin and Paris, where he studied in the area of dialectical philosophy and theology and Byzantine mystical theology. After 1929, he taught theology at the Theological Academy in Sibiu and at the Faculty of Orthodox Theology in Bucharest till 1973. Staniloae was imprisoned for five years (1958–64), apparently because of his part in the revival of Romanian Orthodox spirituality.

Staniloae's contribution to Romanian Orthodoxy is seen in the two major directions of his academic studies. The first direction was the recovery of patristic spirituality. For instance, in 1938 he published The Life and Teaching of St. Gregory Palamas, reviving the interest on *mystical theology and practice of *hesychasm. In the same period, he started to publish a compilation of spiritual patristic texts under the title Philokalia. The second direction was a dialogue with Western theology and *spirituality. In one of his major works, Jesus Christ, or the Restoration of Man (1943), the influence of dialectical and personalist philosophy can be clearly distinguished in emphasizing the ontological dimension of Christian salvation. Staniloae's magnum opus is his three-volume Orthodox Dogmatic Theology (1978), followed by Orthodox Spirituality (1981), Spirituality and Communion in the Orthodox Liturgy (1986) and Studies in Orthodox Dogmatic Theology (1991) – all published under the Communist regime.

Staniloae was a faithful apologist of Orthodoxy, a historian, *dogmatician and philosopher. His theology is considered original, creative, mystical and *personalist. There is an immense erudition packed into his texts. A single work cannot reveal the compactness of his knowledge of patristic and modern theology. Behind his theological system there is an important organizing structure. What is specific to Staniloae's Orthodox theology is: (1) the balanced approach to the apophatic-cataphatic issue, disclosing the insufficiency of cataphaticism in Western theology and the radical way of *apophaticism in Eastern theology; (2) the rationality of creation as the revelation of the *Logos; (3) the Trinity as the structure of supreme love; (4) the emphasis on the *hypostatic equilibrium between the economy of the Son and of the Spirit; (5) the unification of incarnation and deification; (6) the church as the icon of the Trinity and communion of persons; (7) the synergetic equilibrium between the free will of man and the power of uncreated energies mediated by the Spirit as sacramental power; and (8) the vision of a transfigured cosmos. The heart of this theology is found in the theology of person and communion. Staniloae's view on *deification (theosis) as the goal of human existence is very much informed by his communitary personalism, a motif into which the other themes are usually subsumed.

See also: EASTERN ORTHODOX THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

Selected Works: Orthodox Dogmatic Theology, 3 vols. (Brookline, 2005, 2011).

Studies: E. Bartos, Deification in Eastern Orthodox Theology: An Evaluation and Critique of the Theology of Dumitru Staniloae (Carlisle, 1999); L. Turcescu (ed.), Dumitru Staniloae: Tradition and Modernity in Theology (Iasi, 2002).

E. BARTOS

STATE

Strictly the term 'state' refers to civil government and magistrature, including the executive and legislature, together with judicial, diplomatic, military and law enforcement functions – in other words, the administration of public justice. Contemporary secular political thought often tends to conceive it in broad terms, nearer to the idea of 'nation'.

The term 'state church' usually denotes a specific constitutional and legal establishment of a church in relation to the state which gives it certain privileges, e.g. political, legal, financial, religious and may also impose certain state controls upon its own inner life and government.

The contemporary state is, with relatively rare exceptions, a secular entity. Even where, as in England or Scotland, the Christian church is in some sense 'established', the state remains secular and pluralistic. Historically, until comparatively recently, a secular state was unthinkable. Every state was religious, supporting and supported by the particular religious tradition or traditions which expressed its ideals and objectives. This was particularly true for the Jews, from among whom the first disciples came, but also for every community in the ancient world.

The question of how Christians were to understand and relate to temporal power confronted the church from earliest times. It was the political demands of Rome that set Jesus' birth in Bethlehem; it was against the background of political unrest and national aspiration characteristic of an occupied territory that his ministry unfolded; and it was on the orders of the temporal power that he was executed.

The church's theological response to persecution broadly followed two lines, each drawn from the NT. Those who, like Paul, affirmed the powers of the state, sought to present the case for the toleration of Christianity without the condition of participation in the Roman cults. They argued, in effect, that Christians must always be exemplary citizens because of their perception of the divine origin of temporal power: obedience to God ensures commitment to the commonwealth. Those, on the other hand, who looked to the traditions of Jewish apocalyptic, including the book of Revelation, for their inspiration, developed a theology in which the Roman Empire was strongly rejected as the embodiment of evil and idolatry. The objective for the Christian was not rapprochement with the world, but *martyrdom – the victory by which the believer prepared the way for the ultimate overthrow of earthly states by the kingdom of Christ. The ambivalence of the NT seen in the tension between Romans 13 and Revelation 13 highlights both the positive and negative possibilities of the powers. The same tension has been evident in more recent political challenges faced by the church. The Swiss theologian Karl *Barth saw it as central to the crisis that confronted Christianity in Germany during Hitler's rise to power in the 1930s. As a member of the dissident '*Confessing Church' and a drafter of the anti-Nazi *Barmen Declaration of 1934, Barth argued that Romans 13 enjoined subordinate service rather than unqualified subjection, and that where the state has become tyrannical, it would be most faithfully served by opposition and prophetic critique. Similarly, a group of South African evangelicals set against apartheid in the 1980s declared that 'Romans 13 does not call for blind obedience to all evil systems . . .' (Concerned Evangelicals, Evangelical Witness in South Africa: A Critique of Evangelical Theology and Practice by South African Evangelicals Themselves, London, 1986). The contemporary abstract concept of the 'state' is unknown in the OT. There, political power is embodied in identifiable rulers who may be favourable or hostile, but who are always seen as subject to the sovereign rule of God. Thus Jeremiah's advice to the exiles in Babylon to seek the 'welfare of the city' (Jer. 29:7) has particular resonance. Israel gains strength in the midst of oppression from knowing that it has been called to live as God's chosen covenant community. Similarly, Christians in the NT gain strength from knowing that Jesus' kingdom is 'not of this world' (John 18:36). The eschatological promise enshrined in this statement makes it possible to submit to the governing authorities now (Rom. 13:1–7). However, there is a very real sense in which everything is God's, so that even Caesar's power is limited (John 19:11). It is also clear that where gospel ministry is curtailed by civic authorities, they may be defied (Acts 5:29). The tension between these respectively quietist and activist first-century texts is becoming increasingly poignant in twenty-first-century Britain, as Christians face growing legislative threats to historic rights and freedoms.

The religious character of states in the ancient world helps explain the eventual outcome of the conflict between Rome and the church. Once a Roman emperor became an adherent of Christianity it was inevitable, in the absence of any concept of the secular, that Christianity must become the official cultic expression of his faith to his subjects. The eventual result of the conversion of *Constantine in AD 312 was that the church changed places with the official pagan cult of Rome. In effect, the *Christendom of the Middle Ages was inaugurated. In many ways, this marked the triumph of the moderate, world-affirming theology over the martyr tradition. This 'Christendom' model pertained for the next 1,500 years.

One of Constantine's historic decisions was to build Byzantium (Constantinople) in 330, a new capital for the Eastern Empire. After the collapse of the Western Empire in 410, the Eastern Empire was known as the Byzantine Empire. From the outset Constantinople was intended as a Christian city and with state and religion in the ancient world always coterminous, its government looked to Christian principles, in contrast to pagan Rome. Constantine therefore naturally considered himself a guardian of the Christian church and accordingly intervened as a Christian emperor to settle controversies in the early church. Constantine's close friend, *Eusebius of Caesarea, developed a complete apologia for the notion of empire and church together reflecting the kingdom of heaven where the empire reflected divine universal rule in the form of strong central government which prevented political and social chaos. It was a short step for the emperor to be acting head of the church as well as head of state, responsible for the appointment and dismissal of bishops and seeking to influence the church's theology and worship. Orthodox historians object to the term 'Caesaropapism' – control of the church by secular political interests – considering the church never to have been subordinated to the state. Rather, they believe the two worked in harmony with neither exercising absolute control over the other.

The plight of Eastern Christianity following the early Islamic conquests of the Eastern and Southern parts of the Mediterranean world was far-reaching and came mainly at the expense of Christian lands. Arab armies rapidly expanded out of Arabia following the death of Muhammad, conquering Syria, Mesopotamia, Egypt, North Africa and Spain, as well as Persia, Central Asia and India. When *Islam encountered conquered peoples they were generally required to convert to Islam in exchange for peace. However, Jews and Christians were allowed to retain their own faiths as long as they surrendered and paid a tax. They were regarded as 'dhimmis' or 'protected ones', though the political reality of 'dhimmitude' reduced them to a religious minority status. When Islamic juridical power was rolled out, it instituted a collection of laws which gradually eroded any remaining rights of the dhimmis. Prior to the rise of Islam, the Orthodox Church had persecuted non-Chalcedonian churches using the arm of the Byzantine Empire to suppress heresy. Unsurprisingly, many of these communities initially welcomed the Arab invaders, ignorant of the implications of Islamic servitude. Christian minorities generally fared better during the ascendancy of the Arabs within the Muslim empire than later on when power shifted to the Ottoman Turks, who in the early sixteenth century conquered the Middle East. As the plight of minorities deteriorated, Christians suffered regular persecutions and were reduced to small groups of illiterate peoples and their churches weakened.

As either ideal or reality, the identification of church and state was to be the most pervasive feature of European society. Rome reasserted itself as the true 'spiritual heart' of empire, and amplified its claim to the 'primacy' of its own bishop as 'pontifex maximus', or 'pope'. However, this claim was severely tested when the city was captured by the Goths in AD 410. In the wake of that disaster, *Augustine of Hippo wrote his masterpiece, The City of God.

Although Augustine made a clear distinction between the City of Man as temporal and transitory and the City of God as spiritual and eternal, he equated the reign of Christ not simply with a perfect future kingdom, but with the ongoing life and witness of the church on earth, thus effectively justifying the Christendom compact. For all its eloquence, Augustine's apologetic could not prevent the capitulation of Rome to the Barbarians in AD 476. While this further shifted power to the East, the Roman church still asserted its superiority. In many ways the medieval church was the state: it had a coherent structure, a single head, an effective administration and a body of law; it had its own courts and it controlled all learning and most communications, so that even such civil power as was able to survive depended upon it. Medieval Europe was, in effect, a church-state, and relations between church and state were largely a matter of manoeuvres between laymen and ecclesiastics to exercise effective power within it.

The Protestant *Reformation brought about immense shifts in the practices and beliefs of the Western church. It marked the point at which pre-Reformation concerns with that church's corruption threatened decisively to rupture Christendom. The religious commitments of the Reformers cannot be isolated from the growing contemporary aspirations towards greater freedom and national autonomy, and for which the pertinent theological debates became something of a vehicle. In such a climate the mainstream Reformers were unable to accomplish their work without alliances with the ruling powers in their own areas. For this reason the mainstream strand of the Reformation is sometimes called 'magisterial', in recognition of its reliance upon the magistracy. For theological and pragmatic reasons, therefore, the Magisterial Reformers maintained in principle, though in modified form, the alliance of church and ruler which had characterized medieval Christendom. The mainline Protestant Reformers diverged somewhat from one another on their theology of church and state. Martin *Luther (1483–1546) developed a doctrine of 'Two Kingdoms', in which the defining concern of the church was identified as the word of God, with temporal power devolved to magistrates charged with the maintenance of the social order, and more specifically, with the protection of the church's distinct calling and mission. Within this paradigm, it did not behave the clergy to interfere in matters of government any more than it did the rulers to intervene in theological affairs. Yet *Lutheranism has frequently been charged with too compliant an attitude to social injustice because of a failure to integrate the ‘two kingdoms’ more coherently. John *Calvin (1509–1564) followed Luther in developing a clear distinction between the spiritual sphere in which the church operated and the civil sphere in which rulers and magistrates fulfilled their responsibilities. As with Luther, he was persuaded that the state was divinely sanctioned and that its ministers were ordained by God. One significant difference between Luther and Calvin, however, lies in the social contexts in which they worked. Luther’s was a semi-feudal society in which the princes exercised personal rule over their localities and subjects. Calvin’s was the city-state of Geneva, in which the emergence of an early democracy can be discerned. Church and state in this context were mutually influential, the state having the responsibility to establish true religion, and the church influencing and shaping the nature of the civil order and its practice. In the Calvinist tradition the concept of ‘*covenant’ – the agreement between citizens and their rulers incorporating the beginnings of ideas of social contract – was to prove influential. Calvin could therefore even envisage in extremis the just removal of tyrants from their positions. In general, the Calvinist tradition has consistently demonstrated a high level of commitment to shaping the civil order.

Roman Catholicism has struggled to adapt to modern secular and democratic polities and the place of religion in public affairs. Some leading theologians and philosophers have turned to Thomas Aquinas for defence of orthodox Catholic teaching and as a sound means of confronting what they regard as contemporary errors and problems, especially concerning the social order. Aquinas, following Aristotle, emphasized the natural, social and political dimensions of human beings who depend on the companionship of fellow humans for human flourishing, which in turn requires wise political rule. So the purpose of government is to promote the common good, and just or unjust political governance can be measured by this standard. Jacques *Maritain in particular has been at the forefront of attempts to apply *Thomist wisdom to moral and socio-political philosophy, developing the idea of a Christian social philosophy that imagines a new kind of Christendom or social and political order. This is based on a social democratic and liberal view of the state, but focused on a theocentric form of humanism involving recognition of the sovereignty of God, natural law, the common good, human dignity, liberty, and human rights and responsibilities. Maritain saw church and state as cooperative institutions, with the state concentrating on temporal matters as well as the holistic human person, whilst the church focused on spiritual matters. Fruits of Maritain’s thought have been seen in the UN Declaration on Human Rights as well as other national human rights declarations. The Aristotelian-Thomist concept that political society is necessary to human welfare is notable in the affirmation of society and community as the natural and beneficial location for the human person in the 1965 expression of Catholic social theology Gaudium et Spes – the pastoral constitution of the Second *Vatican Council. This is reinforced by emphasis on the notion of the common good. For the promotion of the common good, divinely sanctioned political authority is required supported by wide participation in the democratic processes. This approach also stresses the benefit of the church to society. All the church seeks is space and freedom – in return much will be rendered to the state in terms of moral influence.

Following the Second World War the role of the church under communism, notably in eastern Europe and China, became a focus for demands for free space within ruling systems that allowed no legal political opposition and offered few opportunities for open debate. Religion was suppressed because it competed with the Party for control of the popular mind and prevented a developed sense of collective solidarity. Believers were persecuted and religious institutions either shut down or controlled by the state. The result was to drive religion underground, and when free religious expression became once again legitimate, it became apparent that the Christian faith had not died as predicted by *Marx. At a time when traditional religion was in decline, the church attracted wider and burgeoning support from those who considered it best represented their political interests and provided a political and/or social and community alternative to the state, often facilitating discussion and awareness of social concerns such as *peace, environment, human *rights – and even providing a base from which to initiate protest movements against the state. However, some churches were accused of being too conservative or accommodating to the state, or even being vehicles of state control. The response of the state was to dismiss the church as a mere apolitical religious community on the one hand, whilst policing and if necessary suppressing any emergent radical impulses on the other. The church was often discredited by the state as fronts for Western sabotage and espionage, and church leaders were arrested and church properties monitored, whilst the general population were pressured to withdraw from the church. When it became clear that the church was not disappearing as predicted, church-state relations gradually began to improve, with concessions being won as a result of increasing dialogue. However, strict separation of church and state was maintained whilst the church was to a greater extent permitted to define its own range of religious activities, whilst always remaining vulnerable to state pressure, propaganda and veto.

Such divergences became reflected in the different models of church-state and church-nation relationships which developed. On the radical wing of the Reformation, *Anabaptists like Balthassar *Hubmaier and Menno *Simons challenged the consensus by commending an independent, 'gathered church' ecclesiology and an explicit refusal to swear oaths or serve as magistrates. We are still living with its consequences, and its legacy is now intensely debated. As Christendom has faded, such Anabaptist and dissident or nonconformist emphases are becoming more popular among evangelicals. Separation of church and state is in fact required by the American Constitution, and increasingly the norm around the world. But the legacy of Christendom is still much debated, with some commending the opportunities afforded by state support for mission, whilst others repudiate the church's collusion with power.

Bibliography

P. Avis, Church, State and Establishment (London, 2001); D. Fergusson, Church, State and Civil Society (Cambridge, 2004); O. O'Donovan, The Desire of the Nations (Cambridge, 1996); S. Perks, A Defence of the Christian State (Taunton, 1998); W. Pilgrim, Uneasy Neighbours: Church and State in the New Testament (Minneapolis, 1999).

D. G. HORROCKS

STAUPITZ, JOHN, see AUGUSTINIANISM

STEWARDSHIP

The principle of stewardship is closely linked to the concept of *grace: everything comes from God as a gift and is to be administered faithfully on his behalf. There is thus both stewardship of the earth and stewardship of the gospel; stewardship of personal resources of time, money and talents, and stewardship of the resources of church and society. Along with questions of mission strategy and support there are issues of personal and corporate lifestyle, just wages and fair prices, *poverty and wealth, all related to explicit or implicit theologies of the *kingdom of God, *work and *nature.

The theme of stewardship as a recognition of the unity of *creation and the consequent need to care for the whole earth can be traced in Eastern Orthodoxy and in Western theology down to Calvin. Nevertheless, it can be argued that in practice a more prevalent understanding of 'dominion' (Gen. 1:28) as domination rather than stewardship has been a justification, if not a cause, of much exploitation. However, international consciousness of the relationship between *ecological and political exploitation and the need to seek a just and sustainable society has grown steadily since the pioneering Brandt Commission report North-South: A Programme for Survival (London, 1980). In the 1980s the pressing problems were the arms race and nuclear disarmament, and the social consequences of unemployment and technological change in industry. They remain unresolved, and are arguably more widespread than then. But, increasingly, attention inside and outside the churches has focused on the effects of climate change; on progress towards ratification of the 1997 UN Kyoto Protocol which came into force in 2005; and on the arguments put forward by those countries unwilling to participate.

Bibliography

R. J. Berry (ed.), Environmental Stewardship (London and New York, 2006); Church of England General Synod, Sharing God's Planet (London, 2005); M. Northcott, Environment and Christian Ethics (Cambridge, 1996); C. Sugden, Radical Discipleship (London, 1981); idem (ed.), The Church in Response to Human Need (Exeter, 1987); World Council of Churches, Solidarity with Victims of Climate Change (Geneva, 2002).

P. N. HILLYER

STODDARD, SOLOMON (1643–1729)

Solomon Stoddard was born in Boston, Massachusetts to Anthony Stoddard, a prominent merchant, and Mary Downing, a niece of Governor John Winthrop. After graduating from Harvard in 1662, he was appointed tutor (1666) and librarian (1667) at the college before serving two years as a chaplain in Barbados. In 1669 Stoddard was called to the *Congregational Church in Northampton, Massachusetts, where he served as pastor for the next sixty years until his death in 1729. Troubled over declining membership resulting from the Half-Way Covenant (1662), he instituted open communion to all who would partake and granted full church membership based upon ‘a serious profession of the true religion’ even though some lacked a definite experience of saving grace. Increase *Mather’s ten-year debate with Stoddard over his new innovations did little to prevent their adoption by most of the clergy in the Connecticut River valley. Also his strong evangelistic preaching and methods resulted in five distinct awakenings or ‘harvests’ uncommon elsewhere in New England prior to the Great Awakening (see *Revival, theology of). His remarkable success as an evangelist added to the popularity of his treatises on conversion, especially his Guide to Christ (1729), which was widely read by young ministers, including his grandson, Jonathan *Edwards, who succeeded him at Northampton. Though Edwards later came to reject his grandfather’s views on open communion, he followed many of Stoddard’s methods through the pivotal years of the Great Awakening, citing him frequently in his classic On Religious Affections (1746).

Bibliography

K. J. Hardman, Seasons of Refreshing: Evangelism and Revivals in America (Baker, 1994); D. Laurence, ‘Jonathan Edwards, Solomon Stoddard, and the Preparationist Model of Conversion’, Harvard Theological Review 72, 1979, pp. 267–283; P. Miller, ‘Solomon Stoddard, 1643–1729’, Harvard Theological Review 34, 1941, pp. 277–320; T. A. Schafer, ‘Solomon Stoddard and the Theology of the Revival’, in S. C. Henry (ed.), A Miscellany of American Christianity: Essays in Honor of H. Shelton Smith (Cambridge, 1963); J. P. Walsh, ‘Solomon Stoddard’s Open Communion: A Reexamination’, The New England Quarterly 43, 1970, pp. 97–114.

R. GLEASON

STOICISM

Stoicism was founded by Zeno (335–263 BC), who taught in Athens in a stoa (porch), from which his school derived its name. He was succeeded by Cleanthes (331–232 BC), who breathed a more personal spirit into the Stoic conception of deity, as in his ‘Hymn to Zeus’. Chrysippus (c. 280–207 BC) gave Stoicism its completed form and logical defence.

The Stoic worldview may be characterized as *materialistic *pantheism. Matter, however, comes in two kinds: a grosser kind, corresponding to the ordinary conception of matter, and a more refined kind, described as breath or spirit and diffused throughout reality. The latter is the ruling power and guiding force of reality and corresponds to deity, for it exercises providence, making this the ‘best of all possible worlds’. The human being too is composed of these same two kinds of material reality, as is the cosmos. The present world derived from fire and will return to fire (the world conflagration), after which the same world will re-emerge to repeat the cycle (the regeneration, palingenesis). The ruling spirit is rational, and the Stoics contributed to logic by their efforts to represent reality rationally and to defend their system. The Stoics developed the allegorical method of interpretation as a way of attaching their physical theories to classical mythology. Their philosophy provided a defence of the traditional religion, including divination and astrology, on the basis of the interconnectedness of the universe.

The lasting influence of Stoicism came not from its pantheism and rationalism, but its moral teaching and attitude toward life. The goal of life is virtue, and virtue is to live in accord with the rational nature of reality. The emotional life was disparaged as irrational and unnatural. The only important thing in life is virtue: therefore, one is to remain unmoved by external affairs, anything that is not within one’s own power, and concentrate on the attitudes and character that are within one’s control. Since according to the Stoic view of providence and the cyclical nature of reality, everything is determined, a person should accept things as they are. One cannot control circumstances, but people can control the way they look at them. Everything outside of virtue is indifferent, but in the development of later Stoic ethics more and more attention was paid to what was preferred and not preferred among indifferent things.

This change in ethical concern came with the Middle Stoa of Panaetius (c. 185–109 BC), who adapted Stoicism for the Romans by giving more attention to political theory and allowing a greater place to emotional and aesthetic concerns. Posidonius (c. 135–50 BC) further broadened Stoicism to include scientific experiment, and through the theory of sympathetic relationship between all parts of the world contributed to the understanding of kinds of unity. He likened the universe to the unity of a living body. The later Stoics allowed a greater independence to the life of the soul and so weakened the earlier monism.

Roman Stoicism represented almost exclusively ethical concerns. Seneca (c. AD 1–65) laid bare the wickedness in human nature, and in his moral exhortations he more nearly approximated to Christian teaching than any other classical philosopher. Musonius Rufus (30–101) and Epictetus (55–c. 135) use language comparable to that in the NT. Stoicism ascended the imperial throne with Marcus Aurelius (131–180), an introspective and melancholy yet noble man. Thereafter we do not hear about Stoicism as a school, but it was not extinct, for its significant moral insights had become common property, one of the permanent legacies of the ancient world to Western civilization.

Many points of contact between Stoicism and the NT have been noted. For instance, Paul in Acts 17:28 quotes a Stoic commonplace from the Phaenomena of Aratus (c. 315–240 BC), a pupil of Zeno. Many terms in the NT were at home in Stoicism: spirit, *conscience, *logos, virtue, self-sufficiency, reasonable service. Even the substantive similarities, however, are set in different worldviews. Stoicism did not have a fully personal god, a creator, personal immortality, or a saviour. In ethics, where the similarities were the closest, there were fundamental differences. Stoicism told one to have the attitude to self that one has towards others; Christianity reversed the outlook. The motivation was different: in Stoicism, living in accord with the higher self; in Christianity, response to the love of God in Christ.

The pervasive influence of Stoicism in the ethical thought of the early Empire, including that of the first-century Jewish philosopher, *Philo, meant that early Christian ethical writings showed contact with Stoicism. This is evident, for example, in *Clement of Alexandria's Instructor (Paedagogus). *Ambrose's treatise On the Duties of the Clergy is a Christian adaptation of Cicero's On Duties, itself influenced by Panaetius. The Stoic view of *anthropology influenced Tatian (second century) and *Tertullian's On the Soul, which gives a more 'material' view of the soul than *Platonism did.

As assimilated into Christian thought, aspects of Stoicism became a part of the Christian heritage. Independent revivals of elements in Stoicism occurred in the Renaissance and early modern period. The Stoic attitude that inner character is superior to and indifferent to external affairs has continued to have appeal. Where morality has been sought apart from religion, the Stoic view that virtue is sufficient for happiness has given encouragement. The Stoic stimulation of the idea of a natural religion and its humanitarianism and cosmopolitan universalism have been absorbed into Christian thought.

Bibliography

L. Edelstein, The Meaning of Stoicism (Cambridge, 1966); B. Inwood, The Cambridge Companion to the Stoics (Cambridge, 2003); R. MacMullen, Enemies of the Roman Order (Cambridge, 1966); M. Pohlenz, Die Stoa, 2 vols. (Göttingen, 1955–59); J. M. Rist, Stoic Philosophy (Cambridge, 1969); F. H. Sandbach, The Stoics (London, 2nd 1994); J. N. Sevenster, Paul and Seneca (Leiden, 1962); R. W. Sharples, Stoics, Epicureans and Sceptics (London, 1996); M. Spanneut, Le Stoïcisme des pères de l'Église de Clément de Rome à Clément d'Alexandrie (Paris, 1957); R. M. Wenley, Stoicism and Its Influence (New York, 1963); E. Zeller, Stoics, Epicureans, and Sceptics (London, 1880).

E. FERGUSON

STRAUSS, DAVID FRIEDRICH (1808–74)

David Friedrich Strauss was born at Ludwigsburg in Württemberg, south Germany, and studied at Tübingen under Ferdinand Christian Baur (see *Tübingen School). After further study in Berlin, he was appointed tutor in the theological seminary at Tübingen, where he wrote his most famous work, The Life of Jesus. From its appearance in 1835 we may date the open emergence of the historical-critical investigation of the Bible.

The key to understanding this work is not merely Strauss's *Hegelian ideas, but rather his underlying non-miraculous and non-supernatural presuppositions. Strauss to the end of his days explicitly denied the existence of a God who was both transcendent and personal. It followed logically from this that there could be no divine miracles, and that every miraculous story in the NT must be ipso facto unauthentic. Thus the Gospels were regarded by him as fictitious accounts, elaborated solely to prove that Jesus was the Messiah. If it was prophesied that the Messiah would heal the blind and raise the dead, then such miracles had to be claimed for Jesus by the evangelists in order to show that he had fulfilled these prophecies. If Enoch and Elijah were taken up to heaven, then Jesus also had to have an ascension. The Gospel stories reflected the *myth-making power of his followers' piety which was steeped in OT expectations. This mythical approach had been suggested by some of Strauss's predecessors, but Strauss was the first to apply it consistently to every part of the NT. It is quite independent of the Hegelian philosophy, and only in his concluding attempt at a positive reconstruction of Christianity was the Hegelian philosophy employed. Jesus demonstrates the realization of the Absolute in the human race.

As a consequence of his attack on historic Christianity, Strauss was dismissed from his position at the seminary. Nomination to a professorship of theology at Zurich in 1839 came to nothing, and Strauss spent the remainder of his life writing historical biographies with renewed forays into the theological field. In 1864 he produced his revised Life of Jesus for the German People, and in 1872 came his last work, The Old Faith and the New, in which he accepted a scientific materialism, rejected life after death, and espoused Darwinian evolution, the first theologian to do so.

Strauss was undoubtedly one of the most significant theological figures of the nineteenth century. His Life of Jesus set in motion the whole 'Quest' for the historical Jesus, and precipitated the continuing critical examination of the NT sources. Throughout the theological and ecclesiastical world, not only in Germany but also abroad, he was widely regarded as the leader of the attack against the Bible.

See also: HISTORICAL JESUS, QUEST FOR.

Bibliography

R. S. Cromwell, David Friedrich Strauss and His Place in Modern Thought (Fairlawn, 1974); H. Frei, 'David Friedrich Strauss', in N. Smart et al. (eds.), Nineteenth Century Religious Thought in the West (Cambridge, 1985); H. Harris, David Friedrich Strauss and His Theology (Edinburgh, 1982).

H. HARRIS

STRONG, AUGUSTUS HOPKINS (1836–1921)

Strong was a Baptist minister, theologian and seminary professor. Rochester, New York, was the scene of his birth, death and the majority of his ministry. Strong received his BA from Yale in 1857, graduated from Rochester Seminary in 1859, and spent 1859–60 in study in Berlin. He was minister at the First Baptist Church, Haverhill, Massachusetts, 1861–65, and at the First Baptist Church, Cleveland, Ohio, 1865–72. He served from 1872 to 1912 as president and professor of systematic theology at Rochester Seminary, and was president emeritus from 1912 to 1921. His mature thought is reflected in Christ in Creation and Ethical Monism and the 1907 edition of his Systematic Theology. Strong sought to maintain traditional orthodoxy within the Calvinistic framework, while adopting both evolutionary thought and biblical higher criticism. The radical immanence of Christ in creation became his key for balancing this tension. His views of creation, providence, inspiration, human sinfulness, divine justice, atonement and world missions were shaped by this principle.

See also: SOUTHERN BAPTIST THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

J. A. Aloisi, 'Augustus Hopkins Strong and Ethical Monism', PhD thesis, The Southern Baptist Seminary (2012); C. F. H. Henry, Personal Idealism and Strong's Theology (Wheaton, 1951); G. Wacker, Augustus H. Strong and the Dilemma of Historical Consciousness (Macon, 1985).

T. J. NETTLES

STRUCTURALISM

Structuralism is the name commonly applied to a movement that emerged within a circle of French linguistic philosophers following the publication of Ferdinand de Saussure's Cours de linguistique générale in 1916. Saussure (1857–1913) and those who follow him argue that language reflects certain universal patterns or structures, which in turn reflect universal orders within the human brain. From this it was concluded that all narrative, especially the more unconscious or 'folk' literature, will reflect in some way the settled 'deep structures' by which societal consciousness is governed.

Biblical studies

Although most French structuralists have been far more interested in primitive mythology than in biblical studies, their work has inspired a number of experiments by students of Scripture, in which the methods more than their philosophical underpinnings have been applied to biblical texts. These studies are commonly known by the name 'structural analysis', a broad umbrella term that has come to signify any approach to Scripture which looks at the material 'synchronically' (relationships are to be found within the text), rather than 'diachronically' (relationships are to be found in various historical stages of the development of the text), as in traditional biblical criticism.

An important distinction must be made between the true structuralist, whose philosophical bent has frequently led to an abandonment of *history as a category of meaning, and the various practitioners of structural analysis in biblical studies circles in the late twentieth century. Very few biblical scholars share the rejection of history which marks true structuralism, and some of the most fruitful work being done today looks for synchronic relationships, but couples the study with diachronic research as well.

A further concern of 'semiology', as structuralism is often called, is to trace the dynamics operative in the process 'text to reader', in place of traditional biblical studies' concern for the process 'author to text'. A common conviction holds that not only the structures of societal thinking which are found in the *mythologies of the past, but also the 'deep structures' of the society or group which in a later age receives the message, are important. For a full linguistic picture, then, one must look at the original mythological structures, and then the structures operative in the receiver society, comparing the two and tracing the development of the myth in that light.

Method

The object of true structuralist research is not primarily to reveal meaning in the text itself, but rather to discover how the text, as a reflection of the deeper structures which transcend time and circumstances, conveys a *symbolic and timeless structure or meaning. This has led structuralists, as opposed to the biblical 'structural analysts', frequently to prefer the category 'myth' over the study of historical narrative, and has in turn led to some rather eccentric approaches to biblical material.

Claude Levi-Strauss (1908–2009), one such structuralist, grouped together all the mythological texts of a given culture, finding in those texts 'variations of a basic myth', reducing the events of each story studied to short sentences which he calls 'mythemes'. The mythemes are then grouped together, and from them the more comprehensive 'view of reality' emerges (C. Levi-Strauss, 'The Structural Study of Myth', in Structural Anthropology, ET, Garden City, NY, 1963). Applying the methods of Levi-Strauss, Edmund Leach (1910–89) gives an example of how biblical studies might look from a structuralist viewpoint, in his Genesis as Myth and Other Essays (London, 1969), a series of essays which amply illustrate the reasons why biblical scholars have generally rejected the method in its purest form.

Turning to more traditional biblical studies, one finds a growing body of material. From an initial critique of Leach ('Some Comments on Structural Analysis and Biblical Studies', Supplements to VT 22 [Congress Volume, Uppsala, 1971], Leiden, 1972, pp. 129–142, and 'Structural Analysis: Is It Done with Mirrors?', Interpretation 28, 1974, pp. 165–181), R. C. Culley proceeded to apply the method to various groups of biblical stories, while making it clear that his philosophical and methodological approach varied significantly from that of the structuralists. (See Culley's Studies in the Structure of Hebrew Narrative, Philadelphia and Missoula, 1976.)

Additional biblical scholars have taken up the task, most of whom readily argue for a sharp modification of French structuralist presuppositional and methodological approaches. Some of the new work is probably little more than a shift from historical to internal structural concerns in looking at the text, but some fresh insights in how to study the Bible have emerged in the wake of the new discipline. If nothing else, the text itself, rather than some putative form of reconstructed earlier version, has again become the focus of attention, surely a needed emphasis in contemporary biblical scholarship.

This is precisely the point of Jacques Derrida's famous phrase, 'il n'y a pas de hors-texte' ('there is nothing outside of the text'). In contrast, then, to the structuralists, these mid- to late-twentieth-century largely French post-structuralist philosophers responded critically to key features of structuralism. Often linked with *postmodernism, these writers include Michel *Foucault, Gilles Deleuze, Roland Barthes, Judith Butler and Umberto Eco. While differing at important points, their approach to knowledge argued that in order to understand cultural objects (e.g. a text) it was necessary to study both the object itself and important features surrounding the text, including various formal and informal conceptual structures that gave rise to the object as well as the experiences drawn from relating to that object. In these ways, post-structuralism both destabilized and complexified knowledge in ways seeking to be more broadly engaged with cultural objects and more open to the reality of the surrounding world.

See also: HERMENEUTICS.

Bibliography

C. E. Armerding, The Old Testament and Criticism (Grand Rapids, 1983); J. W. Rogerson, Myth in Old Testament Interpretation (Berlin and New York, 1974); K. J. Vanhoozer, Is There a Meaning in This Text? (Grand Rapids, 1998).

C. E. ARMERDING

SUBORDINATIONISM, see TRINITY

SUBSTANCE

Substance is the word most commonly used in Christian theology to denote the objective reality of the one being of *God. Strictly speaking, it derives from the Latin equivalent (substantia) of the Greek word hypostasis*, which means 'an objective reality capable of acting'. Greek theology, however, following *Origen, claimed that there were three hypostaseis in God, which caused confusion when *Hilary of Poitiers translated this word as substantiae (plural) in his De Trinitate.

Latin usage had been determined by *Tertullian, who used substantia to refer to what the Greeks usually called ousia (essence, being). This was almost certainly because he equated ousia with hypostasis, as the single objective reality in God. Behind the confusion of terms, therefore, there lies a different approach to theology, one which seeks to discover the Trinity in the unity of God, rather than the other way round. In the creed of the Council of Nicaea (325), homoousios, a compound of ousia, was used to affirm the full divinity of the Son as 'of one substance' with the Father (see *Trinity).

The term ousia was widely used in pre-Christian philosophy, where its meaning was roughly equivalent to 'real thing'. However, philosophical usage was elastic, and though it certainly influenced Christian thinking, it did not possess a single, well-defined concept of ousia. Christians were undoubtedly convinced, primarily from the Scriptures, that the word should be used of God. This was because the God of the Bible was called by the name I AM, or He Who Is (ho ōn; Exod. 3:14; cf. John 8:58).

Certain branches of the Christian *mystical tradition have held that the essence of God is in some sense visible, but most theologians have maintained that it is unknowable by any creature. Its attributes were listed by *John of Damascus as 'anarchy' (i.e. without beginning), uncreatedness, unbegottenness, imperishability, immortality, eternity, infinity, limitlessness, boundlessness, omnipotence, simplicity, uncompoundedness, incorporeality, immutability, impassibility, unchangeability, unalterability and invisibility.

This list was simplified and systematized by *Thomas Aquinas, whose teaching has become the foundation of classical Western *theism. The Reformers accepted this on the whole, though they dismissed speculation about God's substance and urged the church to concentrate instead on knowing him in his persons.

In modern times, the traditional language of divine substance has come under severe attack. In particular, *process theology accuses it of conveying a static view of God, even though Marius *Victorinus, and the Augustinian tradition after him, believed that God's being was motion (esse=moveri). Process theology follows the tradition of *natural theology in trying to understand the ousia of God in philosophical and scientific terms, but this cannot be done successfully. If we are to speak of the divine substance today, we must do so in the light of the Bible's teaching about God as the I AM, which is not bound to any philosophical system of interpretation.

Bibliography

J. B. Cobb, A Christian Natural Theology (Philadelphia, 1966); E. L. Mascall, The Openness of Being (London, 1971); A. Plantinga, Does God Have a Nature? (Milwaukee, 1980); G. C. Stead, Divine Substance (Oxford, 1977); R. Swinburne, The Coherence of Theism (Oxford, 1977).

G. L. BRAY

SUBSTITUTION AND REPRESENTATION

It is generally accepted among Christian theologians that Jesus acted as our representative in his work of *atonement. By this is meant that his life, death, resurrection and continuous intercession accrue to our benefit. His work is for us. There is also, however, in the Scriptures a dimension of substitution in the atonement of Christ and specifically with reference to his death. In Rom. 3:23–26 Christ is said to suffer in our place as a substitutionary bearer of the judgment which we deserve. This presented answers to the question of how God can be just and yet *justify the ungodly when his wrath is revealed against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men. God the Son endures judgment as our substitute and becomes the propitiation whereby God is able to receive sinners. This emphasis is reinforced when Christ is identified as the suffering servant: 'He was wounded for our transgressions . . .' (Isa. 53:5, RSV). Two passages also speak of him as a ransom. In Mark 10:45, the Son of man gives his life a ransom for many, and in 1 Tim. 2:6 Christ is said to have given himself as a ransom for all. The ransom concept has a powerful substitutionary connotation. Similarly, the application of the OT symbolism of the scapegoat (Lev. 16:8) to Jesus is undoubtedly substitutionary (Heb. 9:7, 12, 28).

Apart from Romans, there are two primary verses on which this view is based. In 2 Cor.

5:21, Paul argues that Jesus, who is sinless, identifies with sin to such a degree that mysteriously he is said to be made sin for our sake. The concept of substitution is perceived in that he is treated not on the basis of what he is, but what we are. He became our substitute. In Gal. 3:13, Paul argues that in order for Jesus Christ to redeem us from the curse of the law, he himself must endure, in our place, the curse of sin which we deserve.

Those scholars who reject this concept of the atonement do so for at least three reasons.

(1) Vincent Taylor (1887–1968), for example, argues that Paul consistently does not use the substitutionary preposition anti ('instead of, in place of') but rather the representative hyper ('on behalf of, for the sake of') in expounding the death of Jesus. (He rejects 1 Tim. 2:6 as non-Pauline.) In response, it has been pointed out that hyper can have the force of anti in Hellenistic Gk and that, for example, in Rom. 3:25 where it is used with hilastērion (propitiation) it is clearly substitutionary in intent.

(2) The concept of God's personal *wrath is questioned by C. H. *Dodd, who finds it incongruous to his inherent love and pleads for the wrath of God to be seen as inevitable and inherent consequences of man's rebellious spirit. The object of atonement is therefore said to be man and his sin, not God and his wrath. Hilastērion is then translated 'expiation', which is focusing upon sin and its consequences for man, rather than 'propitiation' which has as its focus the fulfilment of the justice of God. In reply, it must be said that wrath, in biblical terms, is not uncontrolled pique, but the inevitable response of personal pure love to that which is unholy. Again, although wrath may be the need for atonement, love is the ground of atonement. God takes the initiative not only in dealing with sin (in expiation), but in removing the personal opposition to our access into his righteous presence (propitiation). Love and wrath are not therefore contradictory in God.

(3) The idea of transactional guilt, i.e. of someone else being asked to carry our responsibility in order to make reconciliation, is said to be essentially immoral. It has to be recognized that at times the notion of Christ's substitution has been presented crudely and devoid of mystery. Nevertheless, this element in the work of Christ can be seen as a corollary of grace whereby God secures for us totally and incomprehensibly what we cannot do for ourselves.

There is more to the atonement than an objective substitution by Christ in the place of sinners. This is one of a number of complementary motifs used by the biblical writers, which subjectively increases our security and excites our worship. The confidence that in Christ we cannot be condemned because he has been condemned in our stead leaves the Christian in humble and speechless wonder.

See also: CROSS; SUBSTITUTION, PENAL.

Bibliography

R. W. Dale, The Atonement (London, 1894); J. Denney, The Death of Christ, ed. R. V. G. Tasker (London, 1951); C. H. Dodd, The Epistle of Paul to the Romans (London, 1932); R. S. Franks, A History of the Doctrine of the Work of Christ (London, 1918); E. M. B. Green, The Empty Cross of Jesus (London, 1984); L. Morris, The Apostolic Preaching of the Cross (London, 1965); idem, The Cross in the New Testament (London, 1965); J. K. Mozley, The Doctrine of the Atonement (London, 1915); J. R. W. Stott, The Cross of Christ (Leicester, 1986); V. Taylor, The Atonement in New Testament Preaching (London, 1940).

T. W. J. MORROW

SUBSTITUTION, PENAL

The central feature of the Christian doctrine of *salvation is the *atonement effected by *Jesus Christ through his death on the *cross at Calvary. In the NT, there are various metaphors or models which help to explain the meaning and significance of this atonement. Since the early Church Fathers, penal substitution has been the controlling model used by the church to explain the atonement, the other metaphors and models being used to supplement this primary model. This has been particularly true within evangelical Christianity.

Penal substitution is an explanation of the atonement which says that Jesus Christ, the Son of God, standing in the place of sinful human beings, took upon himself the wrath of God due to those sinners. The sinners for whom Jesus died are therefore pardoned and accepted by God. This pardon and acceptance is appropriated through faith in Jesus Christ.

Recently, even among evangelicals, penal substitution as an understanding of the atonement has been challenged for various reasons. First, it is argued that to speak of the Father forsaking the Son on the cross is unthinkable, given a biblical doctrine of the unity of the Trinity. Second, it is argued that since there are many models and metaphors for the atonement, no one model must be allowed to dominate. Third, it is argued that union with Christ, rather than penal substitution, should be the controlling factor in any theology of atonement. Fourth, it is argued that the notion of the Father punishing the Son constitutes a form of celestial child abuse which should have no place in Christian theology. Fifth, it is argued that the penal substitutionary view gives the impression of an angry God who only becomes a loving God after he has been appeased by the sacrifice of his Son.

Those who affirm penal substitution regard the last two of these criticisms as simply a misunderstanding of their position, but they do recognize the strength of the first three criticisms, while continuing to maintain their position. Clearly, if penal substitution is to be maintained, then first, care must be taken to expound the atonement in the light of God's trinitarian being and his overall purpose and plan; second, use must be made of every model and metaphor of atonement, albeit under the controlling model of penal substitution; and third, proper emphasis must be given to union with Christ.

See also: GUILT AND FORGIVENESS; REDEMPTION.

Bibliography

H. Boersma, Violence, Hospitality and the Cross (Grand Rapids, 2004); C. E. Hill and F. A. James III, The Glory of the Atonement (Downers Grove, 2004); S. Jeffery, M. Ovey and A. Sach, Pierced for Our Transgressions (Nottingham, 2007); P. Wells, Cross Words: The Biblical Doctrine of the Atonement (Fearn, 2006).

A. T. B. MCGOWAN

SUFFERING

The reality of human suffering has long been seen as a problem for *theism. How can the presence of *evil and suffering in the world be reconciled with belief in God? In the Greek philosophical tradition people have been wrestling with this problem at least as far back as Epicurus, who lived three centuries before Christ (341–270 BC). In the Hebrew tradition the struggle of faith and doubt that is prompted by the existence of suffering goes back at least 300 years earlier to the books of Job, Isaiah, Lamentations and to some of the Psalms. Likewise, in other religious traditions and cultures, suffering presents itself as a challenge to belief in the divinely bestowed order and goodness of human life. Certain kinds of suffering, such as the pain caused by heat when we approach a fire too closely, are readily enough understood and present no threat to theistic belief, but cases of innocent or unjust suffering constitute a challenge to belief in a just, almighty and benevolent God. Within the category of innocent suffering we may distinguish further between the suffering inflicted by human beings upon others and the suffering that results from natural occurrences or ‘acts of God’, such as earthquakes, tidal waves, disease and the like. The attempt to account for the presence of both kinds of suffering while maintaining some form of belief in God is known as *theodicy.

One of the most well-known formulations of the problem is that of the Scottish philosopher David *Hume, who asks, ‘Is God willing to prevent evil, but not able? then he is impotent. Is he able, but not willing? then he is malevolent. Is he both able and willing? whence then is evil?’ This intellectual conundrum has exercised philosophers a great deal, but it treats the problem as essentially theoretical. Contrast this with the problem of evil and suffering posed from out of the midst of actual suffering. In this case the question is put as an agonized cry against God and requires not only philosophical consideration, but also pastoral response. This is the question of the anguished parents who sit at the bedside of their dying child, or of those whose lives have been torn apart by tragedy and the death of loved ones. In such cases the question of suffering is framed as a cry for help to a God who does not seem to answer. This is the theological and pastorally oriented question about evil and suffering which looks not for the philosophical resolution of a logical difficulty, but for a more profound theological response about the presence or absence of God in situations when darkness covers the earth.

There have been four main lines of response to the philosophical conundrum of suffering. Many of these appear, but are also contested, in the Christian tradition.

(1) The ‘just deserts’ theory of human suffering supposes that suffering is a consequence of *sin. According to this view, people who suffer get what they deserve, either because foolish acts lead to harmful consequences, or because God is thought to punish the guilty. In each case the appropriate response is repentance and a reformation of one’s life. While there is undoubtedly a correlation in some cases between unwise or sinful human action and suffering, the just deserts theory fails to account for the vast swathes of innocent suffering inflicted on people through no fault of their own.

(2) A second view, called the harmony view, holds that suffering is not the tragedy we suppose it to be. The Greek philosopher Plotinus, for instance, argued that with a proper perspective we will see that in the grand scheme of things suffering pales into insignificance in comparison with the beauty and rationality of the universe. This is a view that is frequently judged to be unhelpful, both intellectually and pastorally.

(3) The soul-making theory of suffering proposes that suffering may be turned to God’s good purpose as a means through which we become better human beings. Much like the situation of a person training for a marathon who runs on through the pain in order to achieve the high goal, suffering is perceived to be a means of ‘soul-making’, of perfecting the creatures God intends us to be. A sophisticated version of this view, advocated by John *Hick, holds that while God does not ordain every instance of suffering, a world that includes suffering is the best kind of world for perfecting human beings as moral and spiritual agents. While it may be true that suffering can sometimes produce good effects, the greatest difficulty confronting this view is the problem of proportionality. It fails to explain, for example, why a starving child in a war-torn country suffers so much, while others in affluence suffer so little. The soul-making theory prompted the character Ivan in Fyodor Dostoyevsky’s novel, The Brother’s Karamazov, to protest against a God who could set the world up on such terms. The innocent suffering of even one little child cannot justify some future good, Ivan contends.

(4) The free-will defence suggests that because God seeks a free and loving relation with human beings, we must be created with free *will. Evil and suffering are an unfortunate consequence of this policy, as humanity abuses its freedom and chooses paths that lead to suffering and evil rather than to communion and love. This view has often been advocated by Christian theologians and has the dual merits of cohering with a central strand of biblical thought and taking seriously humanity's own responsibility for the causes of a great deal of human suffering. It suggests also that we must be involved in working towards the alleviation of suffering. Proponents of the free-will defence commonly acknowledge, however, that this argument does not provide an explanation of all suffering. Natural disasters commonly cause suffering that cannot be attributed to human free will.

A fundamental difficulty attending the philosophical attempts to solve the conundrum of suffering is that they tend to promote complacency in the face of suffering. If there are good reasons for suffering, then there is little incentive to take action against it. In the ministry of *Jesus, by contrast, we may discern a profound sympathy for those who suffer and a consistent effort to alleviate suffering. It is in consideration of the ministry of Jesus that we come upon the question of what God has to do with human suffering. In him we see the God who responds with compassion to human suffering. 'Compassion' means to 'suffer with'. Jesus responds to suffering by entering into the midst of it, shouldering its burden, and by becoming active against it. The manifesto of Jesus' ministry delivered in the synagogue in Nazareth (Luke 4:16–21) has the relief of suffering as a central feature of the coming kingdom of God.

The divine compassion and the divine opposition to suffering and evil lead penultimately to that event of horror and pain which lies at the heart of Christian faith. To inquire how God relates to human evil and suffering brings us through Gethsemane to Calvary and then to the foot of the *cross. It brings us to the place where Christ took upon himself the suffering of the world and places us within earshot of that agonized cry at the last, 'My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?' At Calvary, human suffering is revealed in its greatest depths. T. F. *Torrance has written that by taking these words upon his lips Jesus reveals that he enters our situation of suffering, utters our cry and asks our questions of protest, in order both to ask them in truth and to receive the answers. Jesus' cry is a cry of real dereliction and real suffering. The Christian *gospel offers the news that the Son of the Almighty God has set aside power and has come to be among us, to share in our suffering, to take our burden upon himself, and ultimately, with the resurrection, to open up the possibility of new life beyond all suffering and pain. P. T. *Forsyth, followed more recently by Jürgen *Moltmann, Kazoh Kitamori, Eberhard *Jüngel, Hans Urs von *Balthasar, Alan Lewis, and many others, contends that it is at the cross that God does his own theodicy. He answers the questions of human suffering, not with an explanation, but by meeting it with his own compassionate presence in order that it be brought to an end. The end of all suffering is therefore a key component of Christian *hope, founded upon Christ's victory over suffering and death.

This approach to the problem of suffering has occasioned a renewed discussion in recent theology of the doctrine of divine *impassibility. The patristic theologian *Cyril of Alexandria once remarked that the Son of God suffers impassibly in the flesh. The doctrine of divine impassibility is not, accordingly, a denial of the suffering of Christ, the divine Son of God, but rather involves the assertion that God is not subject to change from forces external to himself. The suffering of the impassible God is thus an exercise of God's being as love and is not his victimization at the hands of alien powers.

A final form of human suffering that has occupied Christian thinkers is the suffering of *martyrdom. Beginning with Jesus himself, it has commonly been recognized that faithfulness to God will often bring the believer into conflict with the principalities and powers of a fallen world. In its most extreme form this may result in martyrdom, but Søren *Kierkegaard, among others, has argued that suffering, if not always death, will be a mark of all Christian discipleship. To take up one's cross and follow Christ is to choose a difficult road that, when followed resolutely, will bring the suffering caused by opposition and enmity.

Bibliography

G. Gutiérrez, On Job: God-Talk and the Suffering of the Innocent (ET, Maryknoll, 1987); J. Hick, Evil and the God of Love (London, 1966); K. Kitamori, Theology of the Pain of God (London, 1966); A. E. Lewis, Between Cross and Resurrection: A Theology of Holy Saturday (Grand Rapids, 2001); J. Moltmann, The Crucified God (ET, London, 1974); D. Soelle, Suffering (ET, Philadelphia, 1975); A. Torrance, 'Does God Suffer? Incarnation and Impassibility', in T. Hart and D. Thimell (eds.), Christ in Our Place: The Humanity of God in Christ for the Reconciliation of the World (Exeter and Allison Park, 1989); T. G. Weinandy, Does God Suffer? (Edinburgh, 2000).

M. A. RAE

SUNDAY, see SABBATH

SUPEREROGATION, see MERIT

SUPERNATURAL

In the OT there is no Hebrew word equivalent to the English word 'natural', nor is there any concept of an unbreakable natural order independent of God. The world is continually dependent upon God in every respect. That which we refer to as '*nature' (e.g. the seasons changing, the rain falling), the OT perceives as the outworking of God's gracious *providence in history. In such a context any idea of the supernatural as the interruption of an unbreakable natural order of cause and effect would be totally foreign. A 'miracle' is not an event with a 'divine cause' as distinct from a 'natural cause', but is rather an event in which God's power is particularly (and sometimes unusually) evident; a 'sign' in which the grace and judgment of God's redemptive purpose are especially revealed.

The inheritance of Greek *metaphysics and the notion of God's 'otherness' led inevitably to an implicit *dualism between God and the world, the supernatural and the natural, faith and reason. In the context of Newtonian physics the world was considered as a closed system of cause and effect, a system in which a 'supernatural' event must be viewed as an unwarranted intrusion. The removal of God from a closed natural order through *deism and his identification with it through *pantheism both imply a dismissal of the supernatural, a demythologizing of Scripture and a rejection of the possibility of present-day miracle.

The use of the term 'supernatural' (other than in the colloquial sense of 'extraordinary') with its dualistic connotations is therefore neither helpful nor scriptural, but an unnecessary diversion from a biblical faith in the transcendently immanent God whose actions reveal both the covenantal faithfulness and the sovereign freedom of his grace.

Recent *Roman Catholic theology has seen the tendency to separate nature and grace, which owed much to *Thomas Aquinas, challenged by theologians such as Karl *Rahner and Henri de Lubac (1896–1991). They have developed the concept of nature as itself 'graced', the sphere of God's loving activity. This outlook helped to shape the thought of the Second *Vatican Council.

Bibliography

D. Grummett, De Lubac: A Guide for the Perplexed (London, 2007); C. E. Gunton, 'Transcendence, Metaphor, and the Knowability of God', JTS 31, 1980, pp. 501–516; H. de Lubac, The Mystery of the Supernatural (rev. edn, New York, 1998); J. Oman, The Natural and the Supernatural (Cambridge, 1950); T. F. Torrance, Theological Science (Oxford, 1969).

J. E. COLWELL

SUPERSESSSIONISM

In its narrow sense, supersessionism refers to the relationship between Israel and the church. Accordingly, the life, death and resurrection of Jesus Christ climaxes and fulfils God's covenant with Israel to make way for the new *covenant revealed in Christ and the outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon the early church. The new covenant thus renders the old covenant salvifically null and void. Some hold that the supersession of the old covenant leaves no further role for ethnic Israel in God's unfolding drama of redemption. The new covenant subsumes ethnic and national identities, uniting persons of every race and nation in the church. Other supersessionists, however, argue that Israel remains uniquely chosen of God even if that election remains frustrated apart from the recognition of Jesus Christ as the Messiah. Hence, the promise of ethnic Israel's election is superseded only to the degree that the church now participates in the salvation prepared for God's chosen people.

In its broader sense, supersessionism refers to Christianity's relationship to the history, language, knowledge and aspirations of all peoples and nations. Positively, supersession entails the extension of knowledge, history and religious yearning that is fulfilled in and through faith in Jesus Christ. Various non-Western theologians have embraced this understanding of supersession in that it presents Christianity in continuity with *culture and even serves as a catalyst for its extension and fulfilment. Supersession, however, can be viewed as intercultural, as faith in Christ deconstructs and displaces that which it regards as false and idolatrous.

Objections to biblical and theological supersessionism are raised from numerous perspectives. Various theologians and biblical scholars have argued that the church exists only in continuity with Israel. Thus, redemption ought to be understood in light of God's ongoing irrevocable election of Israel, which by grace has now been made available to Christians but not to the detriment of God's ongoing relationship with Israel. *Dispensationalists, on the other hand, believe that the church and Israel enjoy distinct covenantal dispensations, and thus the Jews will inherit the promise of the covenant in a future restoration of Israel. More radical critics of supersessionism view the doctrine as necessarily triumphalist and oppressive. They argue that failure to recognize and affirm the diversity and integrity of various ways human beings experience and respond to the divine has historically led to cultural, religious and political repression.

Bibliography:

S. Bader-Saye, Church and Israel after Christendom: The Politics of Election (Boulder Colorado, 1999); K. Bediako, Theology and Identity: The Impact of Culture upon Christian Thought in the Second Century and in Modern Africa (Oxford and Irvine, 1999); R. K. Soulen, The God of Israel and Christian Theology (Minneapolis, 1996); N. T. Wright, What Saint Paul Really Said: Was Paul of Tarsus the Real Founder of Christianity? (Oxford and Grand Rapids, 1997); D. S. Yeago, 'Messiah's People: The Culture of the Church in the Midst of the Nations', Pro Ecclesia 6, 1997, pp. 146–171.

T. HARVEY

SUPPER-STRIFE, see EUCHARIST

SUPRALAPSARIANISM, see HYPER-CALVINSIM; PREDESTINATION

SWEDENBORGISM, see SECTS

SWISS CONFESSION, see CONFESSIONS OF FAITH

SYMBOL

Symbols mediate meaning, but demand interpretation. They are grounded in the rationality and beauty of creation, but are vulnerable to idolatry and distortion within history.

Contemporary theological appropriations of the term 'symbol' take place in dialogue with a range of increasingly complex and contested philosophical uses. These dialogues reflect both perennial philosophical questions about relationships between reality and representation and more recent *postmodern inflections of 'semiotics', concerned with questions of presence and reference.

Theology must also reckon with developing disciplinary debates around the term within anthropology and psychology, as well as cultural and media studies, without forgetting its specific histories as a theological, linguistic and mathematical term.

Much of the complexity involved in defining a 'symbol' stems from application of this term to language itself, such that 'words' as well as objects or images can be symbols. For example, Aristotle's exposition in On Interpretation (1.16a 3–8) sets out an economy of representation in which 'spoken words are the symbols of mental experience and written words are the symbols of spoken words'.

One common problem concerns how or whether to distinguish a symbol from a sign. Responses are heavily dependent upon particular lines of argumentation, but it is now common (e.g. C. S. Peirce) to nest the term 'symbol' within the larger category 'sign' and treat it as a particular kind of sign.

Uses peculiar to Christian practice include Cyprian's third-century description of the baptismal (Apostles') creed as symbolum apostolorum, a sign of Christian identity and a representation of the whole Christian confession. This was later applied by analogy to other focal statements of Christian belief such as the Lord's Prayer. Within the history of Christian doctrine, the term is closely allied to debates around *sacramental theology. The Communion elements of bread and wine came to be referred to as 'the symbols' (see *Eucharist), but other key Christian symbols would also include water, blood, fire, etc.

While some Western anthropologists such as Mary Douglas and Victor Turner have stressed the 'natural' or 'organic' origins of symbols, the example of the *cross as symbol involves a more 'cultural' understanding, in which the meaning of symbols has to be construed in relation to specific narrative contexts. Following on from this, the idea of an 'unnatural' symbol may also be present to varying degrees within specific heightened narrative and poetic traditions (e.g. apocalyptic). Here we are concerned with the extent to which we should think of symbols as given (in creation), made (in history) or perceived (forged in acts of human creativity or imagination).

Theological understandings of the sacraments or ordinances of *baptism and Communion have diverged sharply in their attitude towards the language of symbol and its relation to the language of 'presence'. Those within a Catholic, Lutheran or Calvinist tradition have often critiqued 'Zwinglian' positions for advocating a 'merely symbolic' understanding, but this may in turn beg questions as to how such critics are construing both the mediation of symbol and the mode of divine presence.

Key early and medieval theological treatments of symbol/sign are found in *Augustine's On Christian Doctrine and On the Trinity, and in *Boethius, *Anselm of Canterbury, Peter *Abelard, Roger *Bacon and *William of Ockham. Within modern theology, the concept of symbol was particularly prominent in the theology of Paul *Tillich and the hermeneutics of Paul *Ricœur. Anthony Thiselton highlights the influence of psychoanalytical theory on both thinkers, with Tillich's benign, integrative view of symbol indebted to Jungian psychology and Jung's theory of archetypes, while Ricœur's more ambivalent treatment owes more to Freud. Karl *Rahner also made extensive use of the term in his Christological formulations, positing a symbolic relation between Christ's humanity and divinity.

Bibliography

C. Bell, Ritual (Oxford, 1998); M. Douglas, Natural Symbols: Explorations in Cosmology (London, 1996 [1970]); Oxford English Dictionary, entry on 'symbol' tracks early English language uses; K. Rahner, Theological Investigations, vol. 4 (Baltimore, 1967); P. Ricœur, Interpretation Theory (Fort Worth, 1976); J. K. A. Smith, Speech and Theology: Language and the Logic of Incarnation (London, 2002); A. Thiselton, New Horizons in Hermeneutics (London, 1992); P. Tillich, Systematic Theology, vol. 1 (Chicago, 1973); K. Vanhoozer, Biblical Narrative in the Philosophy of Paul Ricœur (Cambridge, 1990).

D. GAY

SYMEON, see MACARIUS (PSEUDO)

SYMEON THE NEW THEOLOGIAN (949–1022)

Symeon the New, or 'the Younger', is one of the most significant figures in the revival of Byzantine letters and church life that can be marked in the eleventh century. He was an aristocrat, possibly a eunuch, and was brought by his family for imperial service at Constantinople at the age of eleven. With the rise to power of the young Emperor Basil II (Bulgarocrator) in 976 his family's influence was overthrown, and the young Symeon (already a Senator by that period) moved sideways into a monastic career in which he excelled, soon becoming an independent abbot of St Mamas, a monastery in the heart of the imperial capital, from which he conducted a noisy campaign of resistance to the emperor, especially denouncing the emperor's court theologian, the Synkellos Stephen. He argued the issue that authority in the church ought to emanate only from spiritual charism. Only those who had 'seen and experienced' the grace of the Spirit of God should speak about it. His writings, chief among them the Catecheses and his Practical and Theological Chapters where he sets out his ideas on monastic life and devotion, and also his most extraordinary Hymns of Divine Eros, one of the most rhapsodic and ecstatic documents ever witnessed in the history of Christian literature to that date, demonstrate him to be an impassioned and lyrical writer, attempting to reclaim the great experiences and charisms of the church of times past, and lambasting those who argued that Christianity had lost those charisms in the course of growing old. He lays immense stress on the necessity of a 'spiritual father' who will mediate (and exemplify) the living charisms of Christian religion across each generation, and his work is full of references to visions of Christ in light, and sensations of the Holy Spirit in the form of deep affections (warmth of heart and abundant tears). Posthumously, he became a highly favoured author on Mount Athos, and was something of a founding father of the (much later) *hesychast movement, which took up some of his theological ideas. In his own time, however, he seemed to have only a limited school. The emperor moved, successfully, to have him deposed from his office on the grounds of heterodoxy. He was sent into exile in 1009, across the Bosphorus at Paloukiton, where he regathered a small monastic community, and continued writing religious lyrics until his death in 1022.

See also: EASTERN ORTHODOX THEOLOGY; SPIRITUALITY.

Bibliography

B. Krivocheine, In the Light of Christ (New York, 1987); G. Maloney, St. Symeon the New Theologian: Hymns of Divine Love (New Jersey, 1999); J. A. McGuckin, 'Symeon the New Theologian and Byzantine Monasticism', in A. Bryer (ed.), Mount Athos and Byzantine Monasticism (Brookfield, 1996); H. J. M. Turner, St Symeon the New Theologian and Spiritual Fatherhood (Leiden, 1990).

J. MCGUCKIN

SYNCRETISM

The term was first used by Plutarch, referring to the ability of Cretan warring factions to unite against a common enemy. In the seventeenth century it was applied to those such as Georg Calixtus (1586–1656), who sought unity between Protestant denominations. In the nineteenth century it was adopted by the *history-of-religions school to describe any religion that was the result of fusing two or more religions. Sikhism, which is a fusion of Hinduism and Islam, would thus be described as a syncretistic religion. Biblical scholars of this school have argued that both OT and NT religion are syncretistic in this sense – that OT religion is a fusion of Babylonian and Hebrew (Hermann Gunkel, 1862–1932) or Phoenician-Canaanite and Hebrew (Ivan Engnell, 1906–64) religion, whereas NT religion is a fusion of Hellenistic Judaism and the primitive religion of Jesus (*Bultmann). It is also used in a broader sense to describe the process of borrowing elements by one religion from another in such a way as not to change the basic character of the receiving religion. It is questionable, however, whether such a broad definition is helpful, since it makes every religion syncretistic to some extent.

Bibliography

H. Ringgren, 'The Problems of Syncretism', in S. Hartman, Syncretism (Stockholm, 1969).

D. A. HUGHES

SYNERGISM, see WILL

SYRIAC CHRISTIAN THEOLOGY

Roman Syria, in its wider sense, was an extensive area centred on Antioch, but embracing Mesopotamia. Much of it was bilingual, with Greek being used as well as dialects of Aramaic, of which Syriac was an eastern dialect, spoken in northern Mesopotamia around Edessa and Nisibis. It was distinguished from other dialects of Aramaic by its script, but was basically similar. For some Syriac writers, it was their sole language.

Syria bordered on Palestine (and in the wider sense included Palestine), and also contained more Jews than any other country outside Palestine. For these reasons, as well as because of the common Aramaic language, Syriac Christianity had peculiarly close links with Palestinian Christianity and with Judaism. (Some scholars have suggested the influence of the Essene Judaism of Qumran on early Syriac Christianity.) Most of the early Christian literature from Palestine and West Syria is in Greek, and though it shows clear marks of Semitic culture (cf. *Antiochene School), the marks are naturally clearer in literature written in the Semitic language of Syriac. The influence of Syriac Christianity is also evident in the early Christian literature of Armenia and Georgia.

The old Syriac translation of the Bible, the Peshitta ('plain'), probably originated in a Syriac targum on the Pentateuch, made for the kingdom of Adiabene, after its conversion to Judaism in the first century AD. Chronicles also is thought to be a Jewish translation, but the other OT books as well as the NT were translated by Christians. The canonical OT books and Ecclesiasticus were translated from Hebrew, but the rest of the Apocrypha from Greek, somewhat later than the rest. There is an older translation of the Gospels than the Peshitta (the 'Old Syriac'), but the oldest of all was the Diatessaron (harmony) of Tatian (fl. c. 150–72), on which Ephraim (c. 306–73) wrote an extant commentary.

*Gnosticism was very active in Syria, and some of the oldest Syriac Christian literature, notably the Odes of Solomon (perhaps translated from Greek) and the Acts of Thomas, has lesser or greater Gnostic tendencies. Orthodox Syriac literature survives from the fourth century onwards. Aphrahat (fl. 330–50), the author of twenty-two Demonstrations (short treatises on biblical and ecclesiastical subjects), and Ephraim both date from that century. Ephraim wrote many biblical commentaries and controversial works, but is chiefly remembered as a poet and hymnwriter. His hymns are markedly theological as well as devotional in content, and he leans strongly to *asceticism. Asceticism had been a marked feature of Syriac Christianity from early times. Celibacy was even a condition of baptism, and *Marcion's teaching had wide appeal.

After the *Nestorian and *Monophysite controversies of the fifth century, Syriac-speaking Christianity was largely out of communion with catholic Christianity, but retained many older traits. The Nestorian liturgy of Addai and Mari (the legendary apostles of Edessa) is an important witness to the early evolution of the eucharistic liturgy.

Bibliography

S. P. Brock, The Harp of the Spirit [ET of eighteen poems of Ephraim] (London, 1983); R. Murray, Symbols of Church and Kingdom (Cambridge, 1975); J. Neusner, Aphrahat and Judaism (Leiden, 1971); I. Ortiz de Urbina, Patrologia Syriaca (Rome, 1965); Selections of works of Ephraim and Aphrahat, tr. J. Gwynn, are in NPNF.

R. T. BECKWITH

SYRIAN CHRISTIANITY

The Syriac Christian tradition was centred on Edessa (Urfa in modern Turkey) and, although both Greek and Syriac were used, it was Syriac (an Aramaic dialect) that became the principal language of the Syriac church. The origins of the Syriac church are unclear, but its literature and distinctive spiritual tradition emerged as the Bible began to be translated into Syriac and exercise a formative influence on Syriac writers.

The early date of these translations of Scripture (and indeed of Greek patristic works), coupled with their accuracy and tendency to be literal, makes them valuable witnesses to the original texts.

Yet more influential than the translation of the whole Bible or Peshitta ('simple version') into Syriac, which was not promulgated until the beginning of the fifth century, was Tatian's Diatessaron. Probably originally written in Syriac towards the end of the second century and soon afterwards translated into Greek, the Diatessaron was a harmony of the Gospels which reflected Tatian's encratic (severely ascetical) views and was used in services until the beginning of the fifth century.

Syriac writers made extensive use of Scripture, drawing on the Diatessaron and reflecting its asceticism. The most renowned of these were Aphrahat (fl. 330–350) and Ephrem (c. 306–c. 373). Aphrahat's treatises on Christian doctrine serve to illustrate how Syriac spirituality was largely uninfluenced by Greek philosophical ideas and had its own theological language. Ephrem, whose works include a commentary on the Diatessaron, was a biblical exegete, controversialist, poet and hymnographer. Early Syriac poetry is found in two forms, narrative (memra), which often reflects the Jewish Haggadah tradition, and hymns (madrasha), both noted for their beauty. Other significant authors include John the Solitary, whose mid-fifth century writings on spiritual development would significantly influence later writers, Jacob of Sarug, Philoxenus of Mabbug and Stephen Bar Soudaili in the sixth century, and in the seventh Jacob of Edessa and the monastic authors Dadisho Qatraya and Isaac of Nineveh, whose influential *mystical writings stressed God's love and human response to this. The monastic writer, John Saba, in the eighth century, the Metropolitan of Amid, Jacob Bar Salibi, in the twelfth, and Gregory Abul-Faraj/Bar 'Ebroyo, who was a significant thirteenth-century writer in the brief revival of the Syriac language after it had been overtaken by Arabic, are also worthy of note.

A number of Syriac writings are of particular importance. The Odes of Solomon, the origin, date and original language of which are still debated, consists of forty-two poems capable of *Gnostic interpretation but nevertheless generally orthodox. The earliest known work is The Book of the Law of the Countries by Bardaisan (154–222), which explores the themes of fate and free will. The Acts of Thomas (third century) provides evidence of early baptismal and eucharistic practices. The Greek fourth-century Pseudo-Clementine Homilies and Recognitions are probably based on a third-century Syriac work and provide evidence of early Syrian Judaistic Christianity. The anonymous fourth-century Liber Graduum (Book of Steps) addresses the changing needs of a Christian community in a hostile world.

The *ascetic nature of early Syriac Christianity is well known, and the Acts of Thomas provides evidence of this. Renunciation of marriage, property, home, stability and consuming meat and wine are typical. Up to the fourth century celibacy was a prerequisite for baptism and spiritual progression towards perfection; this ideal would remain fundamental to Syriac spirituality among more determined spiritual pilgrims. The goal was the angelic life and a return to life before the fall with the Christian a stranger in the corruptible world. In the fourth century there emerged a contemplative group called the Children of the Covenant who lived out these ideals, but by the end of the century monasticism became established. Among these later, rather individualistic 'solitary ones' is Symeon Stylites (c. 380–459), who lived and prayed on the top of a pillar for forty years but was equally noted for his wise counsel. The biographies of thirty of these ascetics were written by Theodoret of Cyrrihus (393–466) in his Historia Religiosa (History of the Monks of Syria). Not all Syriac spirituality was extremely ascetic (as is evident from the Liber Graduum), but it does reflect an early and independent Christian tradition. Syriac spirituality is concerned with the movements of the soul, passions and prayer, uses symbolism, sees the natural world as a window onto God's mysteries and frequently uses feminine imagery for God.

Gnosticism, *Marcionitism, Manichaeism and other *dualistic sects all had their appeal in early Syriac Christianity, but after these it began to reflect *Antiochene thought. After the Council of *Ephesus and the fifth-century Nestorian and *Monophysite controversies the Syriac church became largely independent. However, two distinct branches within Syrian Christianity soon arose: the 'West Syrian' to the West of the Tigris, now known as the Syrian Orthodox Church of Antioch and All the East and often called Jacobite (after Jacob Baradeus) or Monophysite (although Miaphysite is preferred), and the 'East Syrian' church in Persia, known as the Assyrian Church of the East and often called 'Nestorian' (see *Nestorius).

The Assyrian church undertook extensive missionary activity in Persia, Turkestan, China and India, but its remarkable success went into decline in the later Middle Ages with the rise of Islam. Both West and East Syrian churches have survived extensive persecution throughout history and into the modern era, which has resulted in movement and dispersion. The Syrian Orthodox Patriarchate has been forced to move many times, first from Antioch to Aleppo and later to such places as Deir Al Zafaran (near Mardin, Turkey), Homs in 1933 and finally Damascus in 1959. Syrian Christianity is also scattered through the Middle East, Syria, Iraq, Lebanon, Israel, Turkey, Europe, the Americas and Australia, and the substantial Malankara Orthodox Syrian Church of India (based in Kerala) has parishes worldwide. In addition to the Orthodox Syrian churches, the Syrian Catholic Church was established in the eighteenth century and the Eastern Syrian Protestant Church (Syrian Marthomite) was founded in the nineteenth century under the influence of British and American Protestant missionaries.

Although Arabic soon became the dominant language after the Muslim conquest of Syria in the seventh century, classical Syriac continues to be used for the liturgy and Scripture of modern churches in the Syriac tradition.

See also: EASTERN ORTHODOX THEOLOGY; ORIENTAL ORTHODOX THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

A. S. Atiya, History of Eastern Christianity (Notre Dame, 1968); S. P. Brock, 'Early Syrian Asceticism', Numen 20, 1973, pp. 1–19; C. Chaillot, The Malankara Orthodox Church: Visit to the Oriental Malankara Orthodox Syrian Church of India (Geneva, 1996); idem, The Syrian Orthodox Church of Antioch and All the East: A Brief Introduction to Its Life and Spirituality (Geneva, 1998); C. Chaillot and A. Belopopsky (eds.), Towards Unity: The Theological Dialogue between the Orthodox Church and the Oriental Orthodox Churches (Geneva, 1998); J. H. Charlesworth (ed.), The Odes of Solomon: The Syriac Texts (Missoula, 1977); R. A. Kitchen and M. F. G. Parmentier, The Book of Steps: The Syriac Liber Graduum, CS 196 (Kalamazoo, 2004); A. F. J. Klijn, The Acts of Thomas (Leiden, 1962); R. Murray, Symbols of Church and Kingdom: A Study in Early Syriac Tradition (London and New York, 2006); ANF and NPNF contain ET of Syriac works, including those by Aphrahat, Bardaisan, Ephrem, the Pseudo-Clementines and Tatian.

A. D. RICH

SYSTEMATIC THEOLOGY

Systematic theology is faith seeking understanding – of God, the world and ourselves – through an ordered presentation of the doctrines implicit in the biblical testimony to the history of *creation and *redemption. Both a cognitive and passionate enterprise, systematic theology exists to serve the church in coming to know and love the God of the gospel and in demonstrating its understanding through forms of obedient speech and practice, expressed via contemporary idiom and addressed to relevant cultural and intellectual issues.

Classic formulations

Theology is as old as the proclamation, explanation and application of the *Scriptures as the word of *God. The fragmentation of the theological disciplines into specialized compartments (e.g. biblical, systematic, historical, philosophical, practical) was, by contrast, a later development.

*Thomas Aquinas's Summa Theologia, aptly called a 'cathedral of the mind' (E. Gilson), presents biblical teaching according to a topical or logical rather than canonical or chronological order and employs categories drawn largely from Aristotle's philosophy (e.g. being, substance, cause). Aquinas presents theology as the science of God which is also taught by God through his revelation in Scripture.

Protestant examples of systematic theologies range from *Calvin's Institutes of the Christian Religion through *Schleiermacher's The Christian Faith and H. *Bavinck's Reformed Dogmatics, to similar works by contemporary theologians such as M. Erickson, T. *Oden, W. *Pannenberg and R. *Jenson.

Contemporary challenges

The distinctive task of systematics, in contrast to the other theological disciplines, is to present a faithful and relevant articulation of the Christian faith in terms of a coherent set of interrelated doctrines. Questions concerning the central principles and structure of such systems were perhaps easier to postpone in the modern era when reason was assumed to provide thinkers with objective and universal points of view. Today systematic theology faces three common objections:

(1) Systematic theology is abstract, not canonically concrete. Biblical scholars sometimes worry that systematic theology is too abstract, divorced from the flow of the history of salvation. Others worry that systematicians, in their zeal for coherence, run roughshod over the particularities of the text, thus obscuring the diversity, and fullness, of the biblical testimony.

(2) *Systematic theology is modern, hence reductionistic, and Western, hence imperialistic. The very idea of 'system' has become suspect in the so-called 'postmodern' era in which the situatedness of the theologian is thought to trump neutrality and objectivity. Every system is constructed by persons in particular contexts who make their choice of categories and structure to be somewhat selective and contingent, and hence prone to deconstruction. Reason's universal point of view has dissolved into a host of competing rationalities; *postmoderns and some non-Western theologians alike point out that what appears to be 'systematic' is in fact only a 'local theology'.

(3) Systematic theology is too focused on ideas rather than on the Word made flesh. K. *Barth issues a properly theological caution against investing too much in human systems of thought derived elsewhere than from God's self-revelation. In his Romans, his 'system' was limited to the recognition that God is God. Later, in his Church Dogmatics, his system was limited to the recognition that God has chosen not to be God without his covenant partner, man. Barth's theology remains systematic because it proceeds from a concentration on the name Jesus Christ as the key to understanding God and humanity alike.

Constructive suggestions

The key question for the systematic theologian concerns the way in which one orders and coordinates what God is saying in Scripture: what are the categories that comprise one's system and where do they come from? Everything depends on how one relates the parts to the whole and on what kind of coherence one ascribes to the whole. To the extent that the *gospel of *Jesus Christ pervades the whole, systematic theology strives for the coherence neither of a philosophy nor morality but of a storied account of what the Father is doing in the Son through the Spirit to redeem and renew creation.

A softer systematics: canonical narrative

What we may term ‘hard’ theological systems enjoy a high degree of intelligibility vis-à-vis the intellectual framework of the day, but at a cost, namely, that the content of the Bible may be governed by a conceptual scheme – by some ‘-ism’, like *Platonism or *existentialism – that ends up getting imposed upon the text.

For *Irenaeus, the ‘whole’ is more like a narrative than a system of geometry. Irenaeus’s ‘soft’ system consisted simply in recognizing the distinction in unity of creation and redemption and the typological connections that bind the history of Israel to the history of Jesus Christ. Such systematicity requires only that one take responsibility for the overall consistency of one’s beliefs.

A sapiential systematics: theo-drama

The story that unifies Scripture is perhaps best viewed as a drama of redemption, or rather, a theo-drama carried along by divine speech and action. Doctrine helps the church both to understand what God is saying/doing and to say/do that which corresponds to God’s word and act. Doctrine thus directs the church to participate fittingly in the biblically scripted drama of redemption as it continues into new situations.

The kind of wholeness or coherence for which systematic theology strives is dramatic. The emphasis on drama as enacted witness also addresses a final objection to systematic theology, namely, that it is too theoretical and hence unrelated to real life. At the heart of a good systematic theology, however, is not only a design for thinking but also a design for living.

Wisdom is the connecting link between theory and practice, between systematic, moral and spiritual theology. Becoming wise in Christ means not simply apprehending doctrines on an intellectual level, but living them out. It is a matter of practising the premise, presence and promise of the triune God: ‘Given what we have heard and seen as the gospel, what shall we next say and enact?’ (R. Jenson, Systematic Theology, p. 21).

At its best, systematic theology contributes to the renewing of our minds and imaginations through discerning unifying patterns of doctrine in the manifold testimony of the Spirit to Jesus Christ. Sapiential systematics is faith seeking, and demonstrating, understanding, by bearing faithful witness in word, thought and deed to the truth of God, world and self, made known theodramatically in the written, crucified and living Word of God.

See also: DOCTRINE; IMAGINATION.

Bibliography

H. Frei, Types of Christian Theology (Yale, 1992); J. González, Christian Thought Revisited: Three Types of Theology (Orbis, 1999); T. Guarino, Foundations of Systematic Theology (New York and London, 2005); C. Gunton, ‘A Rose by Any Other Name? From “Christian Doctrine” to “Systematic Theology”’, International Journal of Systematic Theology 1, 1999, pp. 4–23; R. Jenson, Systematic Theology, 2 vols. (Oxford, 1997); A. T. B. McGowan, Always Reforming: Explorations in Systematic Theology (Leicester and Downers Grove, 2006); D. Migliore, Faith Seeking Understanding (Grand Rapids, 2004); K. J. Vanhoozer, The Drama of Doctrine. A Canonical-Linguistic Approach to Christian Doctrine (Westminster, 2005); idem, Faith Speaking Understanding: Performing the Drama of Doctrine (Louisville, 2014); J. B. Webster, The Domain of the Word: Scripture and Theological Reason (London and New York, 2012).

K. J. VANHOOZER

SYSTEMATIC THEOLOGY, HISTORY OF

Systematic *theology seeks to organize doctrines comprehensively according to locus (term or subject). There are four major historical periods that have significantly shaped the way scholars engage in *systematic theology (although the term itself is a modern one): the *Patristic period, the Middle Ages, the Reformation and the modern period.

The Patristic period

Systematic theology began as catechesis for new Christian converts. Following the trinitarian structure of the baptismal commission (Matt. 28:19), the earliest churches expounded the meaning of the *gospel. These catechetical exercises were encapsulated in the baptismal *creeds, which were delivered to the baptizand (traditio) and recited back to the bishop prior to baptism (redditio). An example of this systematic form may be found in the catechetical lectures of Cyril of Jerusalem. A widely accepted baptismal creed was codified for general use through the ecumenical *councils of Nicaea (325) and Constantinople (381), establishing boundaries between orthodoxy and heresy.

*Origen has often been identified as the first systematic theologian. Although he did not attempt a complete systematization of doctrines, his Peri Archon (or, in Latin, de Principiis, Concerning First Things) began with a trinitarian exposition of the creed and proceeded to consider the doctrines of creation, humanity and sin, as well as angels, Scripture and eschatology. His affirmation of the unity of the Son with the Father alongside an affirmation of the Son's ontological subordination became the critical issue during the fourth and fifth centuries. After Origen, theologians such as *Athanasius and the Cappadocian Fathers debated central theological loci, especially the relationship of the Son and the Holy Spirit to God the Father. This resulted in the formulation of the central confession of the church's *trinitarian faith in the Nicene Creed, but produced no comprehensive systematic compendia.

Although *Gregory of Nyssa contributed a preliminary collection of theological topics in his Catechetical Oration (or Address on Religious Instruction), it was not until *John of Damascus wrote De Fide Orthodoxa (Exposition of the Orthodox Faith) that an exhaustive explanation of the Christian doctrines as defined by the councils was attempted. John brought together the teachings of Scripture and the Church Fathers in 100 chapters, organized according to important theological terms. The chapters, subsequently divided into four books, treated the doctrines of God, creation and salvation in the first three books. The final book considered the doctrines of Christ's two natures, the sacraments and eschatology.

The Middle Ages

After the barbarian invasions in the West, scholarship was preserved within the monasteries. Western theologians looked primarily to the writings of *Augustine of Hippo for their understanding of orthodoxy, but the African's works, though seemingly exhaustive, were not systematic. Although rooted in the cathedral schools established under Charlemagne, it was with the rise of the universities that systematic theology became a sustained discipline. Disputes over various controversial doctrines, for instance, the filioque clause, predestination and the Mass (see *Eucharist), initially dominated the landscape.

Peter *Lombard was the first Western theologian to organize Christian doctrines into a comprehensive system. Drawing upon the recent translation of John of Damascus from Greek into Latin, Lombard organized his Sententia in IV Libris Distinctae (Four Books of Sentences) by arranging the subjects of the Damascene into a tighter format. He collected authoritative citations by the Fathers and added his own arguments. In book one, Lombard considered God as Trinity, proofs for God's existence, and divine attributes. Book two assembled arguments regarding creation, angels, humanity and sin. Book three considered the doctrines of Jesus Christ and the redemption of humanity. Book four contained Lombard's treatise on the sacraments, of which he concluded there were seven, and a treatise on eschatology. Lombard's Sentences were required for subsequent students, and 'did more than any other text to shape the discipline of medieval *scholastic theology' (Marcia L. Colish, 'Peter Lombard', in Evans [ed.], Medieval Theologians, p. 182).

Lombard's coherent and comprehensive organization encouraged theologians to write extensive commentaries on the Sentences as a means of expositing doctrine. His structure still provides a typical, though by no means universally uniform, order for systematic theology: God, unity, Trinity; creation, angels, man, sin; Christology, redemption, virtues (or Christian life); sacraments (or ecclesiology) and eschatology. This pattern is followed, not only by medieval dogmatists such as *Thomas Aquinas, in his Summa Theologiae (Summary of Theology) and Summa contra Gentiles (Summary against the Nations), or Gabriel *Biel, in his Collectorium circa Quattor Libros Sententiarum (Collections around the Four Books of Sentences), but also by Protestant theologians.

The Reformation

Martin *Luther's revolt against medieval theology was not concerned with the structure of systematic theology, but with its content. He expressed himself primarily in occasional writings rather than systematic works. Luther's contribution to theology has been described as an 'event of word and faith', an event which later Protestant theologians sought to codify. Gerhard *Ebeling questioned whether placing Luther's discovery into 'the framework of a traditional dogmatic outline' is possible without the event being 'taken apart and torn asunder by being cast into a sequence' (Ebeling, Study, p. 135). Proponents of Protestant scholasticism (see *Orthodoxy/Scholasticism) deny that systematization transformed Luther's theology.

The only systems of doctrine Luther bequeathed to posterity are found in his large and small *catechisms, in which he followed the format of the Apostles' Creed, the Ten Commandments and the Lord's Prayer. Luther's catechisms were collected into the Lutheran Church's Book of Concord, providing an example of how Protestant confessional literature functions as official dogma. Philipp *Melanchthon, the first systematic theologian within the Protestant traditions, revised and expanded a scholastic theology, Loci Communes Theologici (Theological Commonplaces), beginning in 1521. He also contributed a systematic theology based upon the *Augsburg Confession. Melanchthon's works, however, focused primarily on those doctrines in dispute between Roman Catholics and Reformers, and were thus not intended to be comprehensive. A catechism written for a particular tradition provided the pattern for other Reformation systematic theologies, too. For instance, Caspar *Olevianus and Zacharias *Ursinus authored extensive treatments of the *Heidelberg Catechism.

Unlike Luther, Melanchthon and the Heidelberg theologians, however, most *Reformation systematic theologians followed a scholastic model rather than a catechetical form. Ulrich *Zwingli, Martin *Bucer and Peter Martyr *Vermigli offered preliminary attempts for codifying Reformation theology, but John *Calvin's Institutio Christianae Religionis (Institutes of the Christian Religion) exercised the most influence. Working through several revisions from 1536 to 1559, Calvin intended the Institutes to prepare students for biblical interpretation. Calvin followed a four-book format based on the Apostles' Creed, but reflecting a Reformation emphasis, he brought an extensive discussion of Scripture and revelation to the forefront.

As the successors of the early Reformers debated with opponents, they focused less upon interpretation and reformation, and more upon preserving and expositing an established faith. With regard to content, Theodore *Beza helped make predestination foundational for some post-Reformation Protestant systems. With the rise of such *Thomist theologians as Jerome Zanchi, the style became scholastic. A comparison of Zanchi's Opera Theologica (Work of Theology) shows a structural and philosophical correspondence with Aquinas's Summa Theologiae (Summary of Theology). The structures of systematic theology in Protestant orthodoxy demonstrate a continuing dependence upon earlier and contemporary Roman Catholic theologians, both with regard to logical structure and philosophical content.

The modern period

In the modern period, there were two major challenges to systematic theology as codified in Protestant orthodoxy: *Pietism and *rationalism. Philip Jacob Spener led a pietist reaction against scholasticism out of a desire to return to the simple piety of Luther, thus presenting a heartfelt challenge to the rigid structuring of theology. The *Enlightenment, with its optimistic rationalism, presented a comprehensive intellectual challenge to Christian theology. While Pietism deplored 'dead orthodoxy', rationalism had a profound effect upon both the content and structure of systematic theology. The major question presenting itself to theologians from the eighteenth through the twentieth centuries was: 'What is the relation between the classical [orthodox] and the humanist [rationalist] traditions?' (Tillich, Perspectives, p. 4). David Ford and Hans Frei offer a fivefold spectrum for classifying the answers to this question, ranging from the rejection of modernity to assigning 'complete priority to some modern secular philosophy or worldview, [so that] Christianity in its own terms is only valid in so far as it fits in with that' (Ford, Modern Theologians, pp. 2–3).

Systematic theology continued to set forth the loci of Christian theology, even as tension developed between Christian identity and its modern relevance. This creative tension manifested itself early in the system of Friedrich *Schleiermacher, the father of theological *liberalism. In order to reconcile Christianity with modernity, Schleiermacher made the concept of religious feeling fundamental (see *Religious experience). While re-presenting major doctrines according to human self-consciousness, he significantly removed the Trinity from its leading place, relegating the doctrine to an appendix. Emphasizing humanity and creativity, liberalism encouraged a complex variety of theologies catering to various publics, ranging from *existentialism to *liberation theology. Evangelical orthodox theologies have maintained a presence, mostly in secondary academies, but Karl *Barth ably reintroduced the Trinity and divine grace as priorities within academic theology through his Die Kirche Dogmatik (Church Dogmatics). Barth's magnum opus was structured according to a fourfold paradigm of God, creation, reconciliation and redemption, following a prolegomena upon the word of God. *Ecumenical theology now dominates many discussions, even as the *Eastern Orthodox, *Roman Catholic and Protestant churches continue to field systematic proponents.

Bibliography

G. Ebeling, The Study of Theology, tr. Duane A. Priebe (Philadelphia, 1978); G. R. Evans (ed.), Medieval Theologians: An Introduction to the Medieval Period (Oxford, 2001); idem, The First Theologians: An Introduction to Theology in the Early Church (Oxford, 2004); D. Ford, The Modern Theologians: Introduction to Christian Theology in the Twentieth Century (Oxford, 2nd 1997); J. N. D. Kelly, Early Christian Creeds (London, 3rd 1972); C. Lindberg, The Reformation Theologians: An Introduction to Theology in the Early Modern Period (Oxford, 2002); R. A. Muller, Post-Reformation Reformed Dogmatics: The Rise and Development Reformed Orthodoxy, ca. 1520 to ca. 1725, vol. 1 (Grand Rapids, 2nd 2003); P. Tillich, Perspectives on 19th and 20th Century Protestant Theology, ed. Carl E. Braaten (London, 1967).

M. B. YARNELL III

TAOISM AND CHRISTIANITY

In the Far East the influence of Taoism can be clearly seen in the lives of ordinary people. For example, in Taipei City, Taiwan, many Taoist temples attract thousands of worshippers and tourists. These Taoist temples are dedicated to some forty folk deities, for whom people prepare elaborate feasts and burn incense in an attempt to appease the gods and goddesses.

Some Buddhist deities are also worshipped in Taoist temples. Taoism and *Buddhism are so closely intermingled that people generally are confused about telling Taoist temples from Buddhist ones. One way of classification between the two religions is that temples with their names ending 'ssu' or 'an' are Buddhist temples, and those ending with 'kung' and 'miao' are Taoist. The influence of Taoism is also seen in a lesser degree in Korea and Japan. Since 1979 Taoism, along with Buddhism, Confucianism, Christianity and Islam, has revived in China.

Taoism was founded by Lao Tzu (604–531 BC), who lived in the period of wars and political disorders in China during the Middle Chou Dynasty (771–474 BC). He tried to find a solution to end the struggles through searching for Tao (The Way), that is, the moral and physical laws of nature. Taoism is mainly divided into two distinctive movements: philosophical Taoism and religious Taoism.

The teaching of Taoism is developed in the book Tao Te Ching by Lao Tzu and later writings of Chuang Tzu, his follower (399–295 BC). The basic idea of the Tao Te Ching is the doctrine of inaction (or Wu Wei, literally 'not doing') in trying to harmonize with nature. For Lao Tzu the best way to deal with pillage, tyranny and killing is to do nothing, because in human relations force defeats itself and produces reaction. He said, 'The more laws and regulations are given, the more robbers and thieves there are' (Ch. 57). Lao Tzu advocated the natural and spontaneous way over artificial regulations, organizations and ceremonies; this is why he vigorously attacked all formalities and ratifications. Wu-Wei does not mean that people should avoid all action in life, but they should avoid all hostile and aggressive actions against others.

Lao Tzu's ethical principle was deeply rooted in the natural law of the Heavenly Way. He wrote, 'Man follows the example of the law of the land, the land follows the example of the law of Heaven, Heaven follows the example of the Way, and the Way follows the example of the law of natural law' (Ch. 199). Lao Tzu considered that Confucius' teaching of Jen (virtue), I (righteousness), and Li (propriety) in 'Wu Lun' (five human relationships) was basically human work and artificial; Lao Tzu's ethical teaching went much deeper into the law of nature, known as 'the Way'.

Philosophical Taoism began to decline in the fourth century when Buddhism spread in China. Buddhists adopted Taoist terminology to express their philosophy, while Taoists borrowed religious ideas, divinities and cults from Buddhism. Thus, Buddhism and Taoism fused very well among ordinary people's thinking. This popular type of religious Taoism absorbed local nature deities, and adopted magic, fortunetelling, animism and control of spirits.

Taoism, Buddhism and Confucianism are significant religions of the Far East. While Taoism and Buddhism were more religiously oriented, Confucianism's chief significance is mainly in the area of ethics. Buddhism effectively appealed to people with its doctrine of salvation (Nirvana) from suffering, while Taoism gave the people gods of nature and national heroes to worship.

In contrast with Christianity, the Taoist concept of God is polytheistic. The people pray to many gods, including the gods of agriculture, medicine, literature, birth, city, land, goddess of the sea, and national heroes. Praying to each god will hopefully bring help and blessings to those in special need. Because of their doctrine of inaction, many Taoists are fatalists.

See also: CHRISTIANITY AND OTHER RELIGIONS.

Bibliography

H. G. Creel, What Is Taoism? (Chicago, 1970); A. F. Gates, Christianity and Animism in Taiwan (San Francisco, 1979); H. Welch, Taoism: The Parting of the Way (Boston, 1965).

BONG RIN RO

TAYLOR, JEREMY (1613–67)

After studying at Cambridge, Taylor became chaplain to Charles I, and Rector of Uppingham. During the English Civil War he was a chaplain in the Royalist army and after a brief imprisonment he served as chaplain to Lord Carbery at the Golden Grove in Wales. After the restoration of the monarchy in 1660 he was made Bishop of Down and Connor in Ireland, receiving additional jurisdiction over the Diocese of Dromore in 1661. He also served as Vice Chancellor of Trinity College, Dublin.

Taylor was an independent thinker whose theology was rooted in the Bible and the teaching of the Fathers, also placing great importance on the use of reason (see *Rationalism), the role of conscience and the need and possibility for repentance and holiness. In today's terms his theology might be described as a paradoxical combination of Catholic, Reformed and liberal elements. Taylor is best known for his works of *spirituality such as Holy Living and Holy Dying, for a slightly tortuous work of moral theology, the Ductor Dubitantium and for his plea for religious *toleration, A Discourse on the Liberty of Prophesying. He also wrote the earliest English life of Jesus, The Great Exemplar, and a number of works vigorously defending Anglican theology and practice against Presbyterianism and Independency on the one hand and Roman Catholicism on the other.

Bibliography

Works: T. K. Carroll (ed.), Jeremy Taylor: Selected Works (New York, 1990); M. Gest, The House of Understanding: Selections from the Writings of Jeremy Taylor (Philadelphia, 1954); R. Heber (ed.), The Whole Works of the Right Reverend Jeremy Taylor (London, 1928).

Studies: C. FitzSimmons Allison, The Rise of Moralism: The Proclamation of the Gospel from Hooker to Baxter (New York, 1966); H. R. McAdoo, The Eucharistic Theology of Jeremy Taylor Today (Norwich, 1988); D. Scott, Christian Character: Jeremy Taylor and Christian Ethics Today (Oxford, 1991).

M. DAVIE

TEILHARD DE CHARDIN, PIERRE (1881–1955)

Born in France, Teilhard de Chardin trained as a *Jesuit and as a palaeontologist. He clashed with his superiors in the Roman Catholic Church in the mid-1920s and was forbidden to continue teaching as a geologist because of his unorthodox ideas on original sin and its relation to evolution. From 1926 he lived in China, where he carried out palaeontological work, making important contributions to the study of one form of early man, Sinanthropus (Peking Man). On his return to France in 1946 he was forbidden to publish or teach on philosophical subjects. In 1951 he moved to New York where he worked until his death.

At the time of his death Teilhard's influence was limited. With the publication of The Phenomenon of Man (ET, London, 1959), his influence spread rapidly. Within a few years a spate of further books and collections of his writings appeared, including devotional works (Le Milieu Divin; ET, London, 1960), palaeontological writings, collections of his letters and largely speculative writings (The Future of Man; ET, London, 1964).

Teilhard's aim was to construct a *phenomenology of the universe, based upon scientific thinking, and providing a coherent explanation for the world. His synthesis incorporated immense evolutionary ideas, and brought together science, philosophy and theology. For him, evolution was a general condition to which all theories and systems must conform, and within which there was movement towards increasing complexity and consciousness converging ultimately towards a supreme centre, Omega.

Underlying much of Teilhard's thinking was the basic postulate that matter, like human beings, possesses a form of consciousness. All matter has a 'within' as well as a 'without'. Evolution is an ascent towards consciousness, which is supremely manifested in humanity.

Teilhard's thought consists of three main components: cosmic, human and 'Christic'. God was viewed as an integral part of the evolutionary process, since God and the evolving universe are united. Evolution therefore has a 'Christic' centre and humankind's duty is to advance this 'Christification'. The third component, the human, links the cosmic and the 'Christic', constituting the thinking layer (noosphere), which lies between the living layer (biosphere) and the ultra-human (Omega, Christ or God). Underlying Teilhard's vision was an intense optimism, an ardent desire to bring together his science and his Christianity, a strong *mystical sense, and a rejection of any form of *dualism of mind and matter. Ultimately, therefore, he viewed Christ as the organic centre of the cosmos, with Christ's body being equivalent to the cosmos itself.

Teilhard retained the basic concepts of Roman Catholic doctrine, although they were understood in terms of a world in evolution; hence his emphasis on the cosmic role of Christ rather than his redemptive role. His Christology was in the tradition of incarnational theology, with Christ as the goal and crowning point of the natural order.

Evil and sin became by-products of evolution, with sin being viewed as part of the evolutionary process and the fall as a symbol of the world's incompleteness. The incarnation of Christ took on universal evolutionary significance with limited meaning at the levels of individuals. Salvation was equated with the efforts of humankind to complete the mystical body of Christ.

See also: CREATION; SCIENCE AND THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

C. Cuenot, Teilhard de Chardin (London, 1965); R. Hooykaas, 'Teilhardism, a Pseudo-scientific Delusion', Free University Quarterly 9, 1963, pp. 1–83; D. G. Jones, Teilhard de Chardin: An Analysis and Assessment (London, 1969); H. de Lubac, The Faith of Teilhard de Chardin (London, 1965); E. Rideau, Teilhard de Chardin: A Guide to His Thought (London, 1968); C. Van Til, 'Pierre Teilhard de Chardin', WTJ 28, 1966, pp. 109–144; J. J. Duyvené du Wit, in P. E. Hughes (ed.), Creative Minds in Contemporary Theology (Grand Rapids, 1966), pp. 407–450.

D. G. JONES

TEMPLE, WILLIAM (1881–1944)

Son of an Archbishop of Canterbury (Frederick Temple) and bred to succeed to the Primacy of All England, William Temple emerged as the dominating influence on the Church of England in the period between the eclipse of Bishop Charles Gore in the 1920s and his own death two decades later. He was Bishop of Manchester (1921–9), Archbishop of York (1929–42) and Archbishop of Canterbury (1942–4).

Temple's influence was felt far beyond the established church into the *ecumenical movement, which he described in his enthronement sermon at Canterbury as 'the great new fact of our era'. Unpompous, genuine and endowed with an unflinching sense of humour, perfectly uniting personality and role, Temple reached out in his ministry of preaching and teaching, through books and the spoken word, to ordinary people and was dubbed 'the people's archbishop'. His sudden premature death was felt as catastrophic for the Church of England: it changed the course of *Anglicanism.

Temple was a leading light in innumerable good causes, social, educational, political, ecumenical: president of the Workers' Educational Association (1909); member (1922) and then chairman (1925) of the Archbishops' Commission on Christian Doctrine (Doctrine in the Church of England, 1938); chairman of the ecumenical Conference on Christian Politics, Economics and Citizenship (COPEC, 1924); and the (Anglican) Malvern Conference (1941); chairman of the second international conference on *Faith and Order (Edinburgh, 1937); president of the provisional committee for the formation of the *World Council of Churches (1938). Temple had a finger in every good pie and could do nothing wrong.

As a theologian, Temple was formed on the Bible (John's Gospel was his favourite of all books), on the Book of Common Prayer, on *Plato and personal *idealism, and on *Thomas Aquinas. Charles *Gore was a formative influence, but unlike Gore, Temple seems not to have known intellectual anguish; he was not a wrestler with truth, he saw it calmly. Only towards the end of his life, as totalitarianism darkened the face of Europe, did he confess that a theology of explanation and unification must give way to a theology of transformation and judgment. He saw the point of the revolution that Karl *Barth was bringing to Protestant theology, but Temple's vision remained one of the wholeness and wholesomeness of life, irradiated by the presence of Christ as Saviour and friend. There was no dualism in Temple, and to the last he held to the validity of *natural theology for the knowledge of God and natural law for how we should live.

The Platonic-Christian synthesis is developed in Mens Creatrix ('Creative Mind', 1917), Christus Veritas ('Christ the Truth', 1924) and matures into the impressive worldview of his *Gifford Lectures, given as Archbishop of York, Nature, Man and God (1934). His most popular work was Readings in St John's Gospel (1939–40), and his most influential statement was probably the Penguin best-seller Christianity and Social Order (1942). This tract for the times looked beyond the horrors of war to the social and economic reconstruction of Britain. Temple sketched an anthropology and a social theology before setting out principles of human and communal well-being. Though his recipe had obvious political implications, he stopped short of explicit political agendas with his famous 'middle axioms'. Temple did not plumb the depths: he was a consolidating and synthesizing thinker, whose work remains insufficiently dialectical. But Temple gave intellectual confidence to many lesser minds and made Christian faith attractive and credible.

Bibliography

P. Avis, 'Temple, William', in A. E. McGrath (ed.), The SPCK Handbook of Anglican Theologians (London, 1998); A. Hastings, 'William Temple', in G. Rowell (ed.), The English Religious Tradition and the Genius of Anglicanism (Wantage, 1993); F. A. Iremonger, William Temple: Archbishop of Canterbury (London, 1948); J. Kent, William Temple (Cambridge, 1992); A. M. Ramsey, From Gore to Temple (London, 1960); S. Spencer, William Temple: A Calling to Prophecy (London, 2001); A. Suggate, William Temple and Christian Social Ethics Today (Edinburgh, 1987).

P. D. L. AVIS

TEMPTATION

The verb 'to tempt' in Western thought is almost wholly associated with allurements into sinful situations and compromise (seduction), but this is not the primary biblical usage, which is of 'making trial of' in the sense of testing. In this sense the idea may be wholly benevolent, as in testing a person's quality (strength or weakness) with a view to improving it, something God does frequently to further *sanctify his people.

Historically and systematically, temptation has been understood as enticement or allurements to *sin in the sense prayed against in the Lord's Prayer, 'Lead us not into temptation' (Matt. 6:13; Luke 11:4), or the warning to watch and pray 'that you will not fall into temptation' (Matt. 26:41; Mark 14:38; Luke 22:40, 46). In this sense, God does not 'tempt anyone' (Jas 1:13).

Sociologists reflect on primitive cultures in which the idea of temptation seems to be lacking, leading them to suggest either that it reflects the preoccupation of Western civilization with *guilt, or that it is the result of a society devoid of Christian influence. *Roman Catholic theology, following Augustine, emphasizes universal 'inclination to sin' (concupiscence) adding that strength to resist such inclinations is derived from prayer and participation in the sacraments of penance and the Eucharist. *Eastern Orthodoxy likewise places an emphasis upon 'mastery of passions' through prayer, fasting, voluntary obedience and regular participation in the sacraments (mysteries).

*Reformed theology, following Augustine, refers to the fourfold state of human existence: (1) primitive integrity; (2) entire depravity; (3) begun recovery; and (4) consummate happiness or misery. These in turn are states in which man is (1) able to sin, able not to sin (posse peccare, posse non peccare); (2) not able not to sin (non posse non peccare); (3) able not to sin (posse non peccare); and (4) unable to sin (non posse peccare). Temptability, therefore, exists as part of the created condition of Adam and Eve and remains as a possibility in the state of grace or regenerate condition.

Natural desires can become sources of temptation when their fulfilment is sought in unethical ways, or for impure motives, or as ends in themselves.

Differences as to the ability to resist temptation exist because of differences in understanding the extent to which the old self manifests life and influence in the regenerate. These range from a lifelong struggle requiring active human effort in resisting temptation through the means of grace, especially prayer and watchfulness, involving resistance and effortful non-compliance along patterns of mortification (*Reformation and *puritan theologians were essentially following a path defined by late medieval theologians on this point) to the possibility of (Wesleyan) *perfectionism. John Wesley believed that Christians are not wholly free from temptations. Some may not feel tempted, but this is due to non-resistance. Others will know periods of freedom but temptations will recur. Thus the 'perfection' attainable on earth differs from that in heaven.

Theologians have also debated the temptability of Christ as a category of his *sinlessness or impeccability. In a desire to retain continuity with human nature, some have insisted that Christ inherited a fallen human nature, else he could not be human (e.g. Edward *Irving, MacLeod *Campbell, H. R. MacIntosh, Karl *Barth, C. E. B. Cranfield, T. F. *Torrance), and others, wishing to maintain Christ's temptability, have been equally insistent that he could not have borne a fallen human nature (D. MacLeod).

As 'the tempter' (Matt. 4:3; 1 Thess. 3:5), theologians have also debated the role given to Satan (by God's permission or decree) to tempt by manipulation of circumstances within limits carefully established by God (cf. Job 1–2) (see *Devil, demons). His schemes are limited, though cunning: attempting in one way or another to cause Christians to collapse under the burden of trial through exaggeration of their difficulty, or implanting doubt as divine motives in providence, or by evisceration of the right ways of escape by persuading wrong avenues that lead instead to despair. Temptations are Satan's work, but they are always under the supervision and control of God. The exact relation between God's control and Satan's freedom is a matter of constant debate between theologians, suggesting either compatibilism or more 'risky' views in which certainty of divine victory is in varying degrees of doubt.

Bibliography

L. Berkhof, Systematic Theology (Grand Rapids, 1996); D. Bonhoeffer, Temptation (London, 1955); M. Erickson, Introducing Christian Doctrine (Grand Rapids, 1999); C. S. Lewis, The Screwtape Letters (London, 1942); J. Owen, Of Temptation (1658), in W. H. Goold (ed.), The Works of John Owen, vol. 6 (repr. London, 1965–66); D. MacLeod, The Person of Christ (Leicester, 1998); J. I. Packer, Rediscovering Holiness (Ventura, CA, 1999); United States Catholic Catechism for Adults (2006).

D. W. H. THOMAS

TERESA OF AVILA (1515–82)

St Teresa of Avila is among the most beloved and prominent of Christian mystics. Born in Old Castile, Spain, Teresa was raised by pious parents. Impacted by the lives of saints and the Letters of St Jerome, Teresa left her parents' home at age nineteen to enter the Monastery of the Incarnation of the Carmelite nuns at Avila. She went on to become a prominent *mystic, founder of the Discalced ('shoeless') Carmelites (with St John of the Cross), church reformer, spiritual writer and the first woman to be named a Doctor of the Church.

Teresa's main writings are The Life of St Teresa of Avila (her autobiography, 1565), The Way of Perfection (1566) and The Interior Castle (1580). They are remarkable sources of spiritual and theological reflection. Attempting to synthesize these three works does not do justice to the fact that they are based upon her own spiritual journey and experiences, involving dynamics that change over time. Therefore, in order to understand them, it is most illuminating to consider briefly the contents of each one. In the Life, Teresa describes her own spiritual growth and suggests the metaphor of a garden to describe progress in the life of prayer. Teresa explains that there are four ways that this garden obtains water, each one representing how a person interacts with God through prayer: first, by hand from a well (the labour of beginners); second, from a windmill and aqueducts (when one is initiated into the passive blessings of the 'prayer of the quiet'); third, by diverting a river or stream (the intensification of the prayer of the quiet); and fourth, from rain (when the soul receives divine graces and experiences union with God).

In The Way of Perfection, her most ascetic work, Teresa discusses the major virtues (love, detachment and humility), the practice of *prayer, and how to utilize the Lord's Prayer in the quest for union with God.

The Interior Castle, normally considered her most developed work, employs the image of a castle with seven dwelling places, each one representing a new level of intimacy with God, with the seventh place at the centre of the soul where the King of glory dwells in the greatest splendour. Those who move to this seventh stage participate in the life of the Trinity (John 14:23), which is made possible by the incarnation of Christ and the church's sacraments, especially the Eucharist.

Bibliography

Selected works: K. Kavanaugh and O. Rodriguez, The Collected Works of St Teresa of Avila, volume 1: The Book of Her Life, Spiritual Testimonies, Soliloquies (Washington DC, 1987); idem, The Collected Works of St Teresa of Avila, volume 2: The Way of Perfection, Meditations on the Song of Songs, The Interior Castle, rev. edn (Washington DC, 1980).

Selected studies: G. T. Ahlgren, Teresa of Avila and the Politics of Sanctity (Ithaca, 1989); E. Arenal and S. Schlau, Untold Sisters: Hispanic Nuns in Their Own Works, tr. A. Powell (Albuquerque, 1989); J. Bilinkoff, Avila of Saint Teresa: Religious Reform in a Sixteenth-Century City (Ithaca, 1989); R. Williams, Teresa of Avila (Harrisburg, 1991).

B. BINGAMAN

TERTULLIAN (fl. c. 196–c. 212)

Tertullian began writing in Carthage, North Africa, towards the end of the second century, his undisputed works dating from c. 196 to c. 212. Some scholars claim to detect fresh doctrinal distinctives in his later work when he was sympathetic to *Montanism. He has been characterized both as 'the last of the Greek *apologists' and as 'the first of the Latin fathers'. Both descriptions are appropriate, since he preserves in his work a compendium of mainstream Christianity, while significantly foreshadowing the Latin Church's preoccupation with *power and stressing such legal themes as confession, *penance, renunciation and *merit.

Tertullian concentrated much of his fire against 'Christian' options tolerant of *dualism, most cogently in his *Against Marcion. Other dualistic systems attacked were *Gnosticism and the philosophy of Hermogenes who, in Tertullian's view, raised the status of primeval matter to the level of the unique God.

Tertullian claimed throughout his writings that he defended the doctrinal regula fidei (rule of faith) universally held by churches in the apostolic tradition (Against Praxeas 2; Prescription of Heretics 13, 36; Veiling of Virgins 2). The pillars of this confession, shared by his great predecessor *Irenaeus of Lyon, affirmed one Creator of all things, the *incarnation of the divine Word and the ultimate *resurrection of the dead. When we begin, however, to unpack this simple scheme, we meet a comparable commitment to significant implied details. The *Creator, accordingly, forms the universe from nothing (creatio ex nihilo), since only this guarantees his uniqueness as God and protects the intrinsic worth of the creation product itself. Hence, in his opposition to *docetism, Tertullian was able to deem the 'flesh' or humanity of Christ a worthy vehicle of God's presence (Against Marcion 2:4, 3:10, 5:14; Flesh of Christ 6, 16), and boldly identified the gracious God at work in Christ with the very creator-deity whom Marcion dismissed as malevolent or weak. Tertullian went even further and included Christ himself in the functions of creation and judgment, thus effectively placing him on the divine side of the creator-creation division (Against Marcion 4:20, 29, 30, etc.), while still repeatedly underlining the reality of Christ's human nature (ibid., 2:27, 5:14; Flesh of Christ 5, 16).

The case for future general resurrection equally rested on the doctrine of creation. The power which made all things from nothing could similarly recall persons from the dissolution of death and weave a new resurrection order in nature (Resurrection 7, 42, 57).

The feeling for divine power pervasively present in Tertullian's thought did not mean that he had no vision of divine grace. The incarnation for him was no mere display of God's might and majesty, but an essentially saving operation (Against Marcion 4:37, 5:14, 17; Flesh of Christ 5, 14). The power which undertook our salvation reached even to the cross where Christ 'reigned from the tree' (Against Marcion 3:18, 19, 21). Similarly, the *Holy Spirit, by virtue of his powerful role in creation, was the re-creating Spirit of grace who was at work in *sanctification (Against Praxeas 12), in the *sacraments (Baptism 3, 4), in prayer (Prayer 1) and in forgiveness (Purity 21).

Tertullian is chiefly famous, however, for his formulations of the *Trinity, at their most mature in his work Against Praxeas, directed at second-century *Monarchianism. For the Monarchians there existed only one undifferentiated divine ruler, who assumed, in succession, appropriate roles in the work of redemption. Tertullian freely conceded the principle of one rule, but held this rule to be administered through the Son and the Holy Spirit as co-regents of the Father. Despite this equality of status, Tertullian nevertheless recognized a delegation of the power of the kingdom to the Son in his redemptive self-humbling. He thereby supplied a concrete distinction between Father and Son, which broke the tight monothestic mould of Monarchianism.

In his trinitarian doctrine Tertullian made varied and complex use of the term substantia (*substance). Most scholars are agreed that the later trinitarian theology of *Athanasius and the ecumenical *councils should not be read into Tertullian's use of the term. The Latin term signified for him the uniquely divine spirit-substance of which the Son and Spirit partook mainly by virtue of their emergence out of the one God as agents in the work of creation. Underlying this dynamic, economic Trinity was the *Logos theology inherited from earlier apologists and which was highly subordinationist.

Balancing the substantia was the term persona (person), which primarily highlighted the Johannine conversations of the Father and Son, thus establishing real distinctions between them in the economy of redemption. One should not assume a formulation in Tertullian's mind of all that may go with the modern word 'person' (such as self-consciousness, self-determination, etc.), though the biblical setting makes some such conception natural (cf. Hypostasis*).

Tertullian's trinitarian doctrine has, rightly, been called an 'economic Trinity', since all his formulations are set within the works of creation and redemption, hardly addressing at all a Trinity within the divine nature quite apart from God's activity. This is typical of his theology generally, which bore many marks of the Latin world's practicality and functional thinking. For Tertullian, God was active rather than abstract.

In considering the death and resurrection of the Son of God, Tertullian comments that 'it is certain because it is impossible'. This apparently irrational statement highlights his famous alleged antipathy towards philosophy. Evaluation of Tertullian on this score, however, should take account of the fact that he constantly, though very selectively, plundered contemporary sources (especially *Stoicism), was severely rationalist in many of his discourses and was concerned mainly to oppose syncretistic expressions of the Christian faith rather than philosophy in general.

Although Tertullian's originality as a theologian is sometimes questioned, and although dependence on earlier apologists is freely admitted by him (Against Valentinians 5), his marshalling of the material and his own trenchant presentation of it produced not only an invaluable compendium of second-century thought, but many original formulations which justify his celebrated position in the history of Christian doctrine.

Bibliography

Works: Rev. Alexander Roberts and James Donaldson (eds.), Ante-Nicene Christian Library, vol. 7 (1867–1872), republished in Ante-Nicene Fathers, vol. 4 (Edinburgh, 1885).

Studies: R. H. Ayers, Language, Logic and Reason in the Church Fathers: A Study of Tertullian, Augustine and Aquinas (New York, 1979); T. D. Barnes, Tertullian: A Literary and Historical Study (1971), repr. with appendix of revisions (Oxford, 1985); G. Bray, Holiness and the Will of God: Perspectives on the Theology of Tertullian (London, 1979); J. Daniélou, A History of Early Christian Doctrine before the Council of Nicaea: vol. 3, The Origins of Latin Christianity (London, 1977); E. Evans, Tertullian's Treatise Against Praxeas (London, 1948); idem, Tertullian's Treatise on the Incarnation (London, 1956); idem, Tertullian's Treatise on the Resurrection (London, 1960); R. Kearsley, Tertullian's Theology of Divine Power (Carlisle, 1998); W. P. Saint, 'On Penitence and on Purity', in Tertullian: Treatises on Penance (London, 1952).

R. KEARSLEY

THEISM

In a broad sense, theism is synonymous with belief in God, usually one God, as in *monotheism. This usage does not distinguish it from *deism and *pantheism, nor does it look beyond philosophical theory to historical religions. In a more specific sense, then, theism refers to the belief in a personal creator-God, distinct from the world (contra pantheism) yet constantly active in it (contra deism), who is therefore worthy of worship. As *Creator, the God of theism is both intelligent and powerful. As personal, he is capable of self-revelation, a moral being with just and benevolent concerns for his creatures. As alone transcendent, he is free to act sovereignly in the creation. In this immanent activity, he seeks his own good purposes for history in general and for individual persons.

In this more specific sense, three major theistic religions may be identified: *Islam, *Judaism and Christianity. Each affirms one personal creator-God, self-revealing, active in creation, and worthy of worship. Of these three, Christianity gives the fullest account of God's involvement in his creation, in terms of the incarnation and redeeming work of the eternal Son of God.

Theism as a philosophical position may be traced to *Plato in the West. It was carefully developed by medieval Moslem, Jewish and Christian thinkers, among the latter notably *Augustine, *Thomas Aquinas and *Duns Scotus. In modern times, theologians such as John *Calvin and philosophers such as *Descartes and *Kant shaped the tradition. Recent advocates include Basil Mitchell (The Justification of Religious Belief, Oxford, 1981), Richard Swinburne (The Coherence of Theism, Oxford, 1977) and Alvin *Plantinga (God, Freedom and Evil, Grand Rapids, 1978).

A. F. HOLMES

THEOCRACY

Originating from the Greek compound, theokratia, theocracy was first coined by Flavius Josephus in description of the Jewish government as 'ascribing to God the rule and power' (Against Apion II, 165). However, the term is also used to signify societies in which there is a union of church and state and the civil power is dominated by the ecclesiastical body (i.e. a 'hierocracy'). These two senses of the term reflect the complexity of its usage in reference to church and *state relations throughout history, and suggest how the term's general reference to the ultimate authority of God may be acknowledged irrespective of a particular government system.

Theocratic models in church history

Based upon the understanding of the term as a society dominated by the *church or its clergy, scholars have cited examples of theocracy in Byzantine Christianity, medieval Catholicism, Calvin's Geneva and Cromwell's England, to name a few.

During the early medieval period, this dynamic was made possible through the Donation of Constantine, which granted the *papacy both spiritual and temporal power over Italy. Although the document was later exposed as a forgery in 1440 by Lorenzo Valla, initially the papacy used it to claim legitimacy for the secular rule of Italy. One may consider Pope Gregory VII (c. 1021–85), who implemented reform based upon the belief that the 'papal monarchy' held supreme authority over matters of church and state. Consequently, the Investiture Conflict erupted between Gregory and the German Emperor Henry IV in 1076 and 1080, which was left unresolved until the Concordat of Worms in 1122. Nevertheless, this claim of papal absolute authority over the secular world was further pushed by Pope Innocent III in the following years.

Yet, theocracy does not always describe a civil society governed by clergy. For example, studies on the *Puritan migration to New England during the 1630s under the leadership of John Winthrop and John Davenport reveal the effects that theocratic ideals had upon the civil system. One of the practices instituted was the exclusion of freemen without church membership from serving in political positions or choosing magistrates. Nevertheless, insistence that the spiritual governing body would not interfere with the civil body was still maintained. As A. Zakai claims, 'In shaping their Christian commonwealth, Puritans thus aimed neither at unification nor at complete separation of Church and State' (The Journal of Religious History 14, p. 138). In fact, the intention was not 'to invest ministers with political power but rather . . . to appoint civil magistrates who would govern according to God's word and will' (ibid., p. 139) and uphold the church.

In a similar vein, one may perceive the dynamic between church and state relations within the Reformed context as representing a complementary model of support based upon the understanding that all authority stemmed from God. In Geneva, for example, the Reformation was regarded as both a spiritual and a political revolution wherein the well-being of the church was considered inextricably linked to the good of the state and vice versa. As J. T. McNeill clarifies in reference to Calvinism (see *Reformed theology), 'the system was a theocracy in the sense that it assumed responsibility to God on the part of secular and ecclesiastical authority alike and proposed as its end the effectual operation of the will of God in the life of the people' (The History and Character of Calvinism, New York, 1954, p. 185). Yet, this never meant the subordination of the civil power to the church. Indeed, one may consider *Calvin's insistence on the separate jurisdictions of the church and state within his Institutes (4:11). Moreover, the *Westminster Confession is additionally adamant that 'ecclesiastical persons' are not exempted from the magistrates' power (ch. XXIII. iv). That being said, the state, as much as the individual, was subject to the will of God and bound to support and protect the church.

The *Anabaptists or Radical *Reformers represent other divergent views on the relationship between church and state during the Reformation period. Thomas *Müntzer, for example, advocated the establishment of the kingdom of God on earth through punishment of the godless and protection of the elect in his Sermon to the Princes in 1524. Moreover, based upon the apocalyptic visions of Melchior Hoffman and the leadership of Jan van Leiden, a theocratic government wherein God's will was enacted as civil law in expectation of Christ's second coming was established at Münster in 1533. Jurisprudence was enforced there by the civil sword according to the laws of Scripture.

Subsequently, the failure of this enterprise led to the rejection of such militancy under the leadership of Menno *Simons.

Thus, the complexity of the term 'theocracy' is evident by the above examples as either designating a society in which the clergy ruled the secular sphere or one in which both political and ecclesiastical authorities carried out the will of God.

Bibliography

J. Barclay, Against Apion, in S. Mason (ed.), Flavius Josephus: Translation and Commentary, vol. 10 (Leiden and Boston, 2007); H.-J. Goertz, 'Karlstadt, Müntzer and the Reformation of the Commoners, 1521–1525', in M. Baylor (ed.), The Radical Reformation (Cambridge and New York, 1991); K. Greyerz (ed.), Religion and Society in Early Modern Europe, 1500–1800 (London and Boston, 1984); H. Hopfl, The Christian Polity of John Calvin (Cambridge, 1982); M. Pacaut, La Théocratie: L'Église et le pouvoir au Moyen Age (Paris, 1989); J. Roth and J. Stayer (eds.), A Companion to Anabaptism and Spiritualism, 1521–1700 (Leiden and Boston, 2007); S. Runciman, The Byzantine Theocracy (Cambridge and New York, 1977); A. Zakai, 'Theocracy in New England: The Nature and Meaning of the Holy Experiment in the Wilderness', The Journal of Religious History n.s. 14, 1986, pp. 133–151.

J. P. McNUTT

THEODICY

From Gk Theos, 'God', and the root dik-, 'just', theodicy seeks to 'justify the ways of God to man' (Milton). A theodicy is thus an attempt to reconcile the existence of an omnipotent, omniscient and loving God with the occurrence of evil and suffering in the world. Why does a supposedly loving and all-powerful *God create a world in which creatures suffer horrendous evil? The term 'theodicy' was first used by the German philosopher Gottfried Wilhelm Leibniz in his treatise on this subject published in 1710.

Theological and philosophical responses to the experience of *evil and *suffering are frequent in Judeo-Christian writings. One highly influential figure is *Augustine of Hippo who, following a tradition extending back to Plato, argued that evil is privatio boni – the privation, or lack, of the good. Augustine wished to emphasize that what is primary and original in creation is goodness (Gen. 1:31) and that evil is an intrusion within creation; it is the absence of goodness. Thus, for example, sickness is the absence of health, or the weapons of war indicate the absence of peace. Augustine is primarily arguing against Gnostic and Manichean traditions which were *dualist; they argued that good and evil were two opposing and co-original forces, often associating matter with evil. For Augustine, however, evil is not something 'in itself'; the good is ontologically primary, and evil is parasitic on the good because evil is merely the absence of the good. Of course, evil is experienced as a positive force and not merely as an 'absence'. However, Augustine is not concerned with how we experience evil, but with what evil is in relation to God and creation. He claims that, next to God and his good creation, evil is quite literally nothing. In strict terms, Augustine's approach is not a theodicy because he does not seek to justify the occurrence of evil. Augustine taught that only the good is justifiable because goodness is rational and intelligible. Evil, on the other hand, is intrinsically unintelligible. How could there be reasons for horrendous evils such as cancer in children? Famously, Augustine did not provide any reasons for the *fall, because there could be no reason to turn from God. Instead, Augustine writes of God's *redemptive response to evil in Christ and our role as free moral agents in bringing evil into the world.

The notion that evil is a privation of the good was highly influential until the early modern period. However, it is with the advent of modern philosophy and theology that theodicy, understood strictly as the attempt to justify God, becomes a major topic of concern. In this period, particularly under the influence of David *Hume and Immanuel *Kant, the notion of an a-theological moral standard lying outside God which can thereby be used to 'judge' God becomes influential and prominent. God becomes a moral agent. This marks the beginning of a distinction between those philosophical (or *natural theological) arguments which seek to justify God in the face of evil and suffering (theodicy), and those theological responses which refer to what God has actually done in Christ with respect to sin, evil and suffering within the economy of *salvation (soteriology).

Theodicy in its modern guise often distinguishes between 'natural evil' (those evils such as suffering caused by natural disasters which occur due to nature and not human agency) and 'moral evil' (those evils which arise because of human agency, such as war or torture). However, many philosophers and theologians reject this distinction because certain occurrences of evil and suffering seem to be neither straightforwardly 'natural' nor 'moral'. For example, the suffering due to an earthquake (natural evil) could equally be due to housing being deliberately built in high-risk areas for reasons of exploitation and profit (moral evil). It is also not clear in what sense an earthquake is evil in itself. Nevertheless, one of the most popular theodicies, known as the free-will defence, applies particularly to so-called moral evil. It is claimed that much of the evil and suffering in the world is not due to divine action, but to human beings who are created as free moral agents and who are therefore at liberty to perform evil as well as good acts. A world which consists of such free agents is judged to be intrinsically better than a world of automatons who necessarily (rather than freely) perform good actions. The possibility of a world of free agents who nevertheless always perform good actions is discussed in the literature (see Mackie, The Miracle of Theism). Alvin *Plantinga's work on free will and evil has been particularly influential (see *Will).

John *Hick's 'soul-making' theodicy has generated much discussion with regard to so-called natural evil. Hick supposedly follows *Irenaeus of Lyon in claiming that God allows evil and suffering as a means by which souls might be fashioned for eternal life. It is argued that humans are created with potential and, through the process of suffering and the making of significant free choices, mature into the likeness of God as creatures able to share the divine life. This theodicy has obvious appeal to those whose experience of evil and suffering is not only painful, but also a time of growth which changes their perspective on themselves, their neighbour and God. It is also suggested that coping with the suffering of loss teaches one to value the gifts of life in a more profound way. However, Hick's theodicy is prone to some telling criticisms. For example, in common with a large number of theodicies, evil and suffering is justified by rendering it in some way good for us. This does not seem to account well for the highly destructive experience of acute evil which is all too common in human lives. Hick responds to such criticisms in his Evil and the God of Love.

Amongst other contemporary contributions to theodicy, the English philosopher Richard Swinburne has argued that there may be reason for God to permit certain forms of suffering and evil because they allow the display of 'higher order goods'. The performance of particular forms of extreme courage or generosity, for example, are logically dependent on certain kinds of suffering. This is a variation on the argument that, in order to know or perform the good, we must also have some experience or knowledge of evil. Notice that Swinburne's position, in making certain goods logically dependent on certain evils, is the reverse of Augustine's: the good is now parasitic upon evil and not vice versa.

The traumatic suffering during the world wars of the twentieth century, and particularly the genocide perpetrated by the Nazis, provoked a number of responses with respect to evil, particularly from theologians (see *Holocaust). In contrast to much philosophical theodicy, these theologians turned to the specifics of God's revelation in *Jesus Christ. Jürgen *Moltmann has argued that God suffers in solidarity with creatures and that this experience is a crucial aspect of the divine characteristics of love and sympathy. For Moltmann, to be incapable of suffering is to be incapable of *love. Such suffering love, which is eternally present in God himself, is redemptive within human history. By contrast, Karl *Barth, in common with traditional Chalcedonian orthodoxy, maintained God's *impassibility, but emphasized God's suffering solidarity in the *incarnation and the human nature of Christ. Consistent with his rejection of natural theology, Barth resisted any philosophical notions of God's omnipotence (particularly discussions of what God might or might not do with regard to eliminating evil) in favour of an emphasis on what is actually revealed in Christ concerning the redemption of evil and suffering.

Other recent discussions of evil and suffering have sought to emphasize St Paul's teaching in Rom. 8 that we must 'consider that the sufferings of this present time are not worth comparing with the glory about to be revealed to us' (v. 18). Such responses to evil and suffering stress that, viewed *eschatologically, the experiences of this life, even the most horrific evils imaginable, are wholly overwhelmed by the richness of the heavenly life which God offers (see Adams, Horrendous Evils and the Goodness of God and Christ and Horrors: The Coherence of Christology). Meanwhile, there has been an attempt to render the discussion of evil less metaphysically and theologically abstract by examining the ways in which Jews and Christians respond in practice to the experience of evil and suffering and continue to find speech about God meaningful and rational in the face of human tragedy (see Phillips, The Problem of Evil and the Problem of God). Such an approach does not seek 'solutions' to the quandary of the so-called 'problem of evil' in the form of justifications of God, but rather examines why the expression of the problem of evil is itself problematic with respect to the doctrines of God and creation, and why the modern project of theodicy is open to theological challenge (see especially Hart, The Doors of the Sea: Where Was God in the Tsunami?).

Bibliography

M. M. Adams, Horrendous Evils and the Goodness of God (Ithaca, 1999); idem, Christ and Horrors: The Coherence of Christology (Cambridge, 2006); M. M. Adams and R. M. Adams (eds.), The Problem of Evil, Oxford Readings in Philosophy (Oxford and New York, 1990); Augustine of Hippo (tr. Henry Chadwick), Confessions (Oxford and New York, 1991), esp. book VII; K. Barth CD III/3, §50; B. Davies, The Reality of God and the Problem of Evil (London, 2006); S. T. Davis (ed.), Encountering Evil: Live Options in Theodicy (Louisville, 2001); G. Evans, Augustine on Evil (Cambridge, 1982); D. B. Hart, The Doors of the Sea: Where Was God in the Tsunami? (Grand Rapids, 2005); J. Hick, Evil and the God of Love (London, rev. edn, 2007); D. Hume (ed. Stanley Tweyman), Dialogues Concerning Natural Religion (London and New York, 1991), parts 10 and 11; P. van Inwagen, The Problem of Evil (Oxford and New York, 2006); G. W. Leibniz, Theodicy: Essays on the Goodness of God, the Freedom of Man and the Origin of Evil (Chicago, 1985 [1710]); J. Mackie, The Miracle of Theism: Arguments for and against the Existence of God (Oxford and New York, 1982), ch. 9; J. Moltmann, The Crucified God (London, 2001); D. Z. Phillips, The Problem of Evil and the Problem of God (London and Minneapolis, 2004); A. Plantinga, God, Freedom and Evil (Grand Rapids, 1974); K. Surin, Theology and the Problem of Evil (Oxford and Eugene, 1986); R. Swinburne, The Existence of God (Oxford and New York, 2004), ch. 11; idem, Providence and the Problem of Evil (Oxford and New York, 1998); J. Swinton, Raging with Compassion: Pastoral Responses to the Problem of Evil (Grand Rapids, 2007).

S. A. OLIVER

THEODORE OF MOPSUESTIA, see
ANTIOCHENE SCHOOL

THEODORET OF CYRRHUS, see
ANTIOCHENE SCHOOL

THEOLOGICAL EXEGESIS

Theological exegesis is the exposition of the biblical material according to theological principles considered by Christians throughout the ages to be inherent to *Scripture. It is contrasted to, but not necessarily incompatible with, historical-critical exegesis, which tends to assess biblical texts according to the norms of modern historical study. Theological exegesis can be understood as being concerned with the theological truthfulness of biblical texts, inquiring what they are saying about God the Father, Son and Holy Spirit in relation to humanity and the doctrines of *creation, *fall and *redemption. For example, theological exegesis of the Gospel texts about Jesus' resurrection would not only inquire about the likelihood of the resurrection having occurred historically, but would ask what is the theological significance of the resurrection: what does this event say about the nature, will and purpose of God for creation and humanity. Exegesis did not originate in the universities, but within the church. The growth of *patristic and medieval studies in the twentieth century among Catholic and Orthodox scholars, and the increasing interest in these fields among evangelicals, is an important part of the field of theological exegesis. The patristic era is particularly important due to its being the common heritage of all Christian denominations.

Some basic principles which emerged in the early church are necessary to grasp if the study of theological exegesis is to bear fruit. The earliest Christian writers, including the apostles and the Apostolic Fathers, assumed that the OT was a Christian book which was rightly understood as speaking prophetically about *Jesus *Christ. The testimony of the apostles to Christ was considered to be a doctrinal norm parallel to the OT. This testimony was considered to be 'tradition' in a loose non-technical sense of having been handed down by the apostles to the next generation of Christians. The use of the Bible by *heretics in the second and third centuries AD forced theologians to produce more specific principles of exegesis. *Tertullian used the 'rule of faith', which he took to be the central truths about Father, Son and Holy Spirit, as the principle by which exegesis of Scripture should be done. Given that heretics held erroneous views on Father, Son and Holy Spirit, their exegesis of Scripture was erroneous. Moreover, correct exegesis could only occur where Christian faith and discipline were upheld, i.e. in the church. Theological exegesis therefore takes place primarily in and for the church.

Theological exegesis is best seen as reading Scripture within the *communion of saints, i.e. alongside past and present generations of theologians in the service of the churches worldwide. Most great pre-modern theologians were *preachers. This means that theological exegesis involves working in theological ethics. John L. Thompson's recent work on pre-modern exegetical debates on the relationship between women and men is a good example of theological exegesis done to aid preachers. Thompson shows how pre-modern exegetes, especially the Reformers, debated with each other and asked questions that Christians continue to ask today of the texts, but also attend to the texts in a way that repays careful re-reading. At the same time, he includes modern concerns such as feminist ones in his interaction with the texts. Finally, the American scholar Philip Jenkins argues that the Bible is seen as a book that depicts social and cosmic reality to a much greater degree in the non-Western world than in the West, and this makes theological exegesis obviously based on *historical as well as eternal theological truthfulness. For example, if healing and exorcism are normal parts of life in a particular culture, theological rather than more sceptical exegesis will prevail.

Bibliography

S. E. Fowl, The Theological Interpretation of Scripture: Classic and Contemporary Readings (Oxford, 1997); R. M. Grant and D. Tracy, A Short History of the Interpretation of the Bible (London, 1984); C. A. Hall, Reading Scripture with the Church Fathers (Downers Grove, 1998); J. L. Thompson, Reading the Bible with the Dead: What You Can Learn from the History of Exegesis That You Can't Learn from Exegesis Alone (Grand Rapids, 2007); N. T. Wright, Scripture and the Authority of God (London, 2005).

C. A. E. MOSELEY

THEOLOGICAL METHOD

The term method is a compound of two Greek terms: meta (denoting a higher-order kind of reflection) and hodos ('way'). The early Christian movement was also called the 'Way' (Acts 9:2; 18:25–26; 24:14), and Jesus uses the same Greek term when he identifies himself as 'the way and the truth and the life' (John 14:6). Theological method is thus reflection on the way we come to a saving knowledge of *God.

The problem: how to speak of God

Three questions – 'Where do we begin?'; 'How do we proceed?'; 'What do we use to measure our progress?' – correspond to the key methodological issues: starting points, sources and norms.

By and large, theologians have appealed to sources of knowledge: Scripture, reason, tradition and experience. These four were identified as the '*Wesleyan Quadrilateral' by Albert Outler, but they are not peculiar to Wesley. As to which should be the starting point, each has had its champions, though most view the biblical story as the raw material of theology: the bricks and straw that theologians use to build doctrinal systems.

As to norms, most theologians appeal to divine *revelation (what God teaches by self-communication), though there is ongoing disagreement as to its locus. *Aquinas is representative of the Western tradition in identifying revelation with the content of Scripture. However, especially since modern times others have identified revelation with either truths of reason, religious experiences, or church tradition (see *Scripture and tradition).

General prolegomena: method-driven approaches

Method has become the predominant concern of modern thinkers. Those who view theology as an academic discipline tend to fuss about method: what matters most is having a sound procedure for getting knowledge in general. In light of the success of the scientific method in particular, some theologians believe that knowing God should be pursued as we pursue knowledge in other areas of inquiry. For these, what must be said first ('prolegomena') concerns method itself.

Scientific methods

Theologians have sought to be scientific for centuries. Aquinas considered theology a science because, like other sciences, it proceeded deductively from first principles (though in his case, the foundation was not empirical facts but the articles of faith, the revealed propositions in the Bible). Similarly, Charles *Hodge considered theology as the science of the Bible (a 'storehouse of facts'), though for him, in the context of nineteenth-century scientific method, its hallmark was the inductive method: the close observation of the facts of the Bible and their interrelationships – in a word, exegesis. In the late twentieth century, T. F. *Torrance compared theological method to contemporary scientific method as elucidated by Michael Polanyi and exemplified by Einstein, and this approach has been followed by Alister E. McGrath.

Hermeneutical methods

Because the Bible is the primary source for knowing God, theologians have given extensive attention to theories of textual interpretation (hermeneutics). Conservatives and liberals alike often approach the Bible 'like any other book', aiming to recover either the historical author's intended meaning or, alternately, a mode of understanding oneself and others projected by the world of the text (*Ricoeur).

Special prolegomena: matter-driven approaches

Despite the advantage in employing frameworks of discourse that are intellectually respectable and in principle available to all, we must not forget that the object of theological reflection, God in self-revelation, is not like worldly objects. Those who view theology as a church-based discipline insist upon employing methods that are adequate to their unique subject matter.

Theology 'from below'

Some who begin with divine revelation nevertheless insist that we know God not as he is in himself, but only through his effects in human experience. *Schleiermacher viewed theology as the analysis of religious feelings; doctrine is religious feeling set forth in speech.

Paul *Tillich's 'method of correlation' works by discerning questions concerning the meaning of human existence implicitly posed by philosophy, the arts, even popular *culture. Cultural experience raises the questions to which the symbols in the Bible – creation, the cross – respond.

Still others begin with ecclesial experience. Theology on this view is an exercise in Christian self-description. From this perspective, Aquinas and Hodge make theology too much like geometry, beginning as they do with propositions and facts. Nancey Murphy and Stanley *Grenz call theologians to go beyond such *foundationalism: knowledge is less like a pyramid (built from the bottom up) than a web or mosaic of belief that forms a coherent whole. The 'whole' in question is a tradition that is historically extended and socially embodied in, or as, the *church. 'Non-foundationalists' view theology in terms of setting forth the coherence of Christian life and thought by offering 'thick descriptions' of the language and culture of the ecclesial community (*Lindbeck).

Theology 'from above'

Even theologians who make Scripture their primary source do not always agree on its function. Whereas theologians traditionally identified what is revealed in the Bible with its doctrines or propositions, Karl *Barth identified the word of God with God himself freely, actively, and personally speaking. Because Christ himself is the revelation of God, Barth reasoned that Scripture becomes a form of the word only when God freely and sovereignly acts, enabling biblical language to bear witness to the risen Christ. The goal of theology is to participate with the biblical authors in the subject matter; theological method consists largely in obedient listening (exegesis) and active response (ethics).

From scientia to sapientia: the way of wisdom

The method of theology must be adequate to its matter. Theology is faith seeking understanding, but understanding of what? Theology's subject matter – God and his relation to the world – has recently been described as 'theodramatic' inasmuch as it centres not on a philosophy or morality but gospel: on what God says and does (Gk drao = 'I do'). Theology sets out to understand what God was/is saying and doing in Christ. Understanding is the operative term, for only when we understand where we are and what is happening, can we continue walking the way.

Here we may speak of theology 'from the side' inasmuch as the focus is on God's speech and action on the plane of history, especially in the definitive word-act that is Jesus Christ ('God with us'). This *Christological first principle gives rise to two others.

Getting theodramatic understanding: the canonic principle

The canonic principle states that Scripture is the supreme authority for Christian faith, life and thought, the normative specification of the truth of Jesus Christ. Those who would understand the drama of *redemption must study its authoritative script. The task of theology has less to do with formulating grand theoretical systems than with helping disciples – the supporting actors – to understand the play and their part in it.

Such a theodramatic method affirms the new-found interest in biblical *narrative, but goes further by emphasizing the way in which contemporary readers participate in the action. In the context of drama, interpretation means performance. Doctrine helps us to understand what has already been done (by the triune God) and what remains to be done (by us).

Consequently, theological method belongs less to theoretical science than to practical wisdom. It is as much concerned with design for living as with systems of knowledge. Theology's task is ongoing, not because the gospel changes, but because the historical stage, cultural scenery, and intellectual setting of the church – the company of gospel players – is constantly changing. Doctrine serves the church by helping to form disciples with good judgment: the ability to discern what is theodramatically fitting for disciples to say and do in new contexts.

Demonstrating theodramatic understanding: the catholic principle

While Scripture is the normative specification of the substance of the faith, reason, tradition and experience enjoy ministerial authority to the extent that they help clarify and unpack the meaning of biblical testimony.

Of particular importance is tradition, the history of the church's best interpretations or 'great performances' (K. J. Vanhoozer, The Drama of Doctrine, p. 449). Because no single interpretative approach or community will discern all that there is to be gleaned from the Scriptures, theodramatic method also espouses a 'catholic' principle which stipulates that the ethnic and social diversity of the church is the enabling condition for an enriched and enlarged understanding. The canonic principle keeps us centred; the catholic principle keeps us bounded. Doing theology demands both canon sense and catholic sensibility.

Theological method succeeds when it sets and speeds disciples on their way, or rather the way of Jesus Christ, enabling them to speak and do the truth – about God and the gospel and hence about the world and ourselves – in love to the glory of God.

See also: HERMENEUTICS; SCRIPTURE, DOCTRINE OF; SYSTEMATIC THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

P. L. Allen, Theological Method: A Guide for the Perplexed (London and New York, 2012); D. Clark, To Know and Love God: Method for Theology (Wheaton, 2003); A. Dulles, The Craft of Theology: From Symbol to System (Dublin, 1992); S. Grenz, Revisioing Evangelical Theology (Downers Grove, 1993); T. Hart, Faith Thinking: The Dynamics of Christian Theology (London, 1995); D. Kelsey, Proving Doctrine: The Uses of Scripture in Modern Theology (Harrisburg, 1999); G. Lindbeck, The Nature of Doctrine (Philadelphia, 1984); A. E. McGrath, A Scientific Theology, 3 vols. (Edinburgh and London, 2001, 2002, 2003); N. Murphy, Beyond Liberalism and Fundamentalism (Valley Forge, 1996); C. Ott and H. Netland (eds.), Globalizing Theology: Christian Belief and Practice in an Era of World Christianity (Grand Rapids, 2006); D. Stiver, Theology after Ricœur: New Directions in Hermeneutical Theology (Louisville, 2001); T. F. Torrance, Theological Science (London, 1969 and Edinburgh, 1996); D. Treier, Virtue and the Voice of God (Grand Rapids, 2006); K. J. Vanhoozer, First Theology: God, Scripture, and Hermeneutics (Downers Grove, 2002); idem, The Drama of Doctrine: A Canonical-Linguistic Approach to Christian Theology (Louisville, 2005).

K. J. VANHOOZER

THEOLOGY

Theology is derived from the Gk theologia, compounded of two words, meaning basically an account of, or discourse about, gods or God. Among the Greeks, poets such as Homer and Hesiod were called theologoi. Their stories about the gods were categorized as 'mythical theology' by *Stoic writers, who spoke also of 'natural or rational theology', which was close to Aristotle's 'theological philosophy' – broadly what today would be referred to as *philosophical theology or *metaphysics.

Although *Philo called Moses a theologos (i.e. one who speaks of God, God's spokesman), no form of the Greek word appears in the LXX of the OT or in the NT (a few manuscripts entitle its last book 'The Revelation of John the Theologos'). Its Christian usage begins with the *apologists, for whom the verb sometimes means 'ascribe divinity to, call God', a meaning which it frequently has in the later disputes about the deity of Christ (see *Christology) and of the *Holy Spirit. But by AD 200 both the Greek and its Latin transliteration were being used of teaching, normally Christian teaching, about God. *Athanasius applies theologia to knowledge of God in his own being, as distinct from his dealings with the world, and others such as *Augustine restrict it to teaching about the Godhead. Only occasionally in the Fathers does 'theology' refer to a broader range of church doctrine. It belongs within the community of faith, and no separation is made between teaching about God and knowledge (i.e. apprehension and experience) of God. Theologia can even mean 'praise of God'.

It was chiefly through the *scholastic writers and the new universities of Europe that theology became a more systematic exercise, a field of study and teaching, even a discipline or a science. This usage was not entirely new – it picked up pre-Christian Greek uses and some in the Fathers also – but it foreshadowed the development of theology as an academic discipline no longer necessarily located in the Christian community. At the same time, the schoolmen increasingly distinguished between different kinds of theology, alongside a common distinction between theology and philosophy, which broadly corresponded to their distinction between *faith and reason. Although the Reformers were generally impatient of the distinctions beloved of the schoolmen, their successors in the age of confessional orthodoxy or Protestant scholasticism adopted or developed an extensive categorization of different kinds of theology.

In the modern world, 'theology' is often used in a comprehensive sense, embracing all the disciplines involved in a university course or in training for church ministry (i.e. including the biblical languages, church history, homiletics, etc.). It may thus be an academic discipline alongside, for example, English literature or physics. More precisely, the word denotes teaching about God and his relation to the world from creation to the consummation, particularly as it is set forth in an ordered, coherent manner. (It is rarely used solely of the doctrine of God himself.) It is normally made more specific by one or more of a wide range of qualifiers, which may indicate the church or tradition it belongs to (e.g. *monastic, *Roman Catholic, *Reformed, *evangelical, *ecumenical), its material basis (e.g. *natural; biblical; confessional, i.e. grounded in a church *confession; symbolic, i.e. based on a church's 'symbols', which here means *creeds, etc.), its doctrinal content (e.g. *baptismal, *trinitarian), its organizing centre or dominant motif or focus (e.g. *covenant, *liberation, incarnational, *feminist, *theology of the cross – each of which denotes more than mere subject matter), its purpose as determined by its audience (e.g. *apologetic, polemical), etc.

Among the main disciplines of theological study today must be counted biblical, *historical, *systematic, *philosophical, pastoral and practical theology, and others pursued less widely, such as *dogmatic, *liturgical and *fundamental theology. Most kinds of theology have less and less a confessional or denominational character.

The acid test for all theology was well expressed by *Thomas Aquinas: 'Theology is taught by God, teaches of God, and leads to God.'

Bibliography

G. F. van Ackeren, in NCE 14, pp. 39–49 (a Catholic discussion, including 'positive' and 'speculative' theology); G. Ebeling, in RGV VI, cols. 754–769; R. Hedde, in DTC 10, cols. 1574–1595; F. Kattenbusch, 'Die Entstehung einer Christlichen Theologie: Zur Geschichte der Ausdrücke Θεολογία, Θεολογείν, Θεολογος', ZTK n.s. 11, 1930, pp. 161–205; F. Whaling, 'The Development of the Word "Theology"', SJT 34, 1981, pp. 289–312.

D. F. WRIGHT

THIELICKE, HELMUT (1908–85)

Born in Barmen, Thielicke graduated PhD in 1931 and ThD in 1934. He first pastored and taught in Württemberg. Having offended the Nazi regime by questioning the so-called 'orders' of *race and people, he was for a time forbidden to speak, write or travel except in a small area. Yet he had a powerful pulpit ministry during the war years and immediately after. In 1945 he took up a professorship at Tübingen and in 1954 transferred to Hamburg, where he served as rector in 1961. Famous as a preacher, he continued to address large congregations and sponsored an indirect evangelistic venture to spread Christian knowledge by discussion, pamphlets, and radio and television talks.

His main contribution, however, came through his writings, most of which have been translated into English. Even under Hitler's ban he managed to smuggle an early version of his work on death out of the country in a diplomatic bag. After the war he published selections of sermons (e.g. The Silence of God, The Final Dereliction), in which he delivered a prophetic message for an apocalyptic situation. His academic programme, apart from some early works, began with the many volumes of the Theological Ethics, available in three volumes in English. The three volumes of The Evangelical Faith developed his dogmatic thinking, and Modern Faith and Thought offered a commentary on recent theological history, especially in Germany. Among works designed for more general readers, The Hidden Question of God, Living with Death, and an essay in *anthropology entitled Being Human – Becoming Human, deserve special mention. Reminiscences (Zu Gast auf einem schönen Stern) provide valuable insights into his life, thought and times.

As a preacher, Thielicke addressed the deep questions of life that emerge in days of crisis. His response to them was to press through to the final issues of human nature and destiny that lie behind immediate problems. He thus reformulated the questions, so as to point to the higher divine purpose fulfilled in Christ. Proclamation of the word of Christ forms the church's primary task, in the discharge of which *preachers tread a fine line between irrelevance and false accommodation. They best achieve this by combining expository and topical material and relying on the self-evident truth of the message as it is applied by the Spirit. The issues raised in the crises of life include many *ethical problems, e.g. lying to protect victims of persecution, political assassination, and the new questions of *sex and medicine. Tackling such issues first in his scholarly work, Thielicke laid bare the theological truths which underlie their solution, namely, *creation in God's *image, the fall, the relation of indicative and imperative in the new life, the role of *natural law, the tension of *law and gospel, the question of compromise in living the Christian life in a fallen world, and the continuing need for forgiveness as we are righteous in hope (spe) but sinners in fact (re).

Discussion of ethical problems brought Thielicke to the heart of the gospel, and in The Evangelical Faith he explored God's answer to the plight of human alienation which comes to expression in the modern cleavage of the religious and the secular. God himself initiates restoration by accepting solidarity with us in Christ and bringing us to new life through the Spirit. Utopias hold out only false promises, and social reconstruction is impossible without individual renewal. Yet the new aeon has dawned, advance is thus possible, and by God's action, mediated by the word and Spirit, the race may again become, and be, human, notwithstanding every threat. Participating in this mediation is the church's first responsibility; on its fulfilment depends the church's life or death.

Readers may often find Thielicke wordy, repetitive and provocative, and at times obscure. Yet for those who use discernment he makes a notable contribution to preaching, ethics and *dogmatics. He raises crucial issues, displays their final significance as he pushes through them to the issue of God, and indicates their one authentic solution in the work that God has done, and does, through Christ and the Spirit.

Bibliography

Works: Notes from a Wayfarer: The Autobiography of Helmut Thielicke, tr. D. R. Law (New York, 1995).

Studies: G. W. Bromiley, 'Helmut Thielicke', in D. G. Peerman and M. E. Marty (eds.), A Handbook of Christian Theologians (Nashville, 2nd 1984).

G. W. BROMILEY

THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES

The Thirty-Nine Articles are a statement of faith produced by the Church of England during the reign of Queen Elizabeth I (1558–1603). Together with the Book of Common Prayer and its accompanying Ordinal, and the model sermons known as the Homilies, the Articles were intended to set out a basic framework of faith and practice for the Church of England, for, as Archbishop Matthew Parker put it: '... the glory of God, the advancement of true religion, and the salvation of Christian souls'.

The Articles were issued in 1571 in both Latin and English. They represent a revision by Archbishop Parker and other bishops, such as John *Jewel, Bishop of Salisbury, of an earlier series of Articles, the Forty-Two Articles, which were produced by Archbishop Thomas *Cranmer in 1553.

The Articles can be divided into eight sections. Articles 1–5 are concerned with the doctrine of God, articles 6–8 with Scripture and the creeds, articles 9–18 with sin and salvation, articles 19–21 are concerned with the church and its authority, articles 22–24 with errors to be avoided in the church, articles 25–31 with the sacraments, articles 32–36 with church discipline, and articles 37–39 are concerned with Christians and civil society.

As J. I. Packer notes ('The Status of the Articles', in J. C. de Satgé et al., The Articles of the Church of England [Oxford, 1964]), the Articles are 'consciously eclectic' in their theology: 'They set out the trinitarian faith of the ecumenical creeds (1–5) as biblical and necessary to salvation (6–8), together with *Augustine's doctrine of sin (9–10); *Lutheran teaching on justification, grace and the church (11–21, 23, 34, 37), as given in the Augsburg confession of 1530 and Württemberg Confession of 1552 . . . and sacramental teaching of the Swiss sort, with at one point an anti-Lutheran edge (29).' In addition to their positive teaching, the Articles also reject various aspects of the theology of the medieval Catholic Church and of the *Radical Reformation.

In the Church of England today the Thirty-Nine Articles remain one of the sources upon which the church's doctrine is grounded. Clergy, Readers and licensed lay workers in the Church of England have to declare their belief in the faith to which the Articles 'bear witness'. The Articles also remain an important part of the doctrinal inheritance of the wider Anglican Communion, although only a minority of the provinces of the Communion now make formal reference to the doctrinal authority of the Articles in their constitutions.

See also: ANGLICANISM; CONFESSIONS OF FAITH.

Bibliography

J. C. de Satgé et al., The Articles of the Church of England (Oxford, 1964); W. H. Griffith Thomas, The Principles of Theology (London, 1951); C. Hardwick, A History of the Articles of Religion (London, 1895); O. O' Donovan, On the Thirty-Nine Articles (Exeter, 1984); P. Toon, 'The Articles and Homilies', in S. Sykes and J. Booty (eds.), The Study of Anglicanism (London, 1988).

M. DAVIE

THOMAS AQUINAS (1225–74)

The greatest of the thirteenth-century scholastic theologians, known both for his theological and philosophical work, Aquinas was born the son of the Count of Aquino at Roccasecca, near Naples. As a young man he joined the *Dominicans, a new mendicant order, in spite of strong opposition from his family who wanted him to become a traditional *Benedictine monk. The Dominicans emphasized both a return to the gospel and academic learning, for their mission was to preach and hear confessions. Aquinas was immediately sent to the University of Paris to study. He spent the rest of his life teaching theology, at Paris (1256–9 and 1269–72), Rome, Naples and Viterbo.

The major problem facing the thirteenth century was that of dealing with the recently rediscovered thought of *Aristotle. Aristotle gave a much richer account of the natural world than the West had yet known; but as interpreted by Arab commentators, he also held positions opposed to Christianity, such as the eternity of the world and the existence of one agent intellect for all. Some theologians responded by rejecting Aristotle completely; others accepted him uncritically, holding that what is true in philosophy does not always agree with what is true in theology. By contrast, Aquinas welcomed what was true in Aristotle, but systematically revised what he found to be inadequate or in error. Since all truth is from God, it is one. In principle there can be no conflict between *faith and reason. Where Aquinas found conflict, he sought to show that it was because of errors in human understanding.

With regard to the eternity of the world, Aquinas argues that reason cannot prove that the world is eternal, but the fact that it has a beginning and will end is known from *revelation. On the issue of personal *immortality, Aquinas deepens Aristotle's psychology significantly, showing how man (see *Anthropology) is a single substance composed of matter and form, but his form is immaterial and so immortal. On this basis he attacked the view that there is only one soul for all people, the interpretation of Aristotle given by *Averroes and his followers. At the same time Aquinas was modifying the traditional anthropology in the Christian West, which, following *Augustine, had tended to be dualistic. Because Aquinas adapted Aristotelian methods and principles in organizing theology, he was looked upon, and even opposed, as an innovator.

Like other scholastic theologians, Aquinas began his career by writing a commentary on Peter *Lombard's Sentences. Because of opposition to his order at Paris his licence to teach was delayed, but was soon granted on order from the pope. Throughout his career Aquinas gave lectures on Scripture to students. Some of these have come down to us in the form of commentaries. Better known are his 'disputed questions', On Truth, On the Power of God, On Evil, On Spiritual Creatures and On the Soul, which are the product of university courses and formal disputations. In addition, Aquinas wrote commentaries on works of *Boethius and the Dionysian work, On the Divine Names (see *Pseudo-Dionysius). His greatest works as a commentator were his commentaries on the major works of Aristotle, including the logical works, Physics, On the Soul, Metaphysics and Ethics. Aquinas is best known, however, for two works produced apart from his teaching, the Summa contra Gentiles and Summa Theologica. The latter, which was intended as a summary of theology for beginners, has three parts: the first contains the doctrine of *God and how things come from God; the second treats how human creatures return to God, dealing first with moral matters in general and then giving a detailed account of the virtues and vices; the third part considers the *incarnation and *sacraments. Aquinas had completed about half of the third part when he stopped writing and died a few months later.

In the Aristotelian account of the sciences, the highest part of philosophy included theology, considering such matters as the first movers. While acknowledging this theology and using some of its results, such as the proofs of God's existence, Aquinas argues nevertheless that there is need for sacred theology in addition to the theology of the philosophers. Sacred theology is based on revelation, and it makes known truths about man's end that cannot be known through reason. In addition, it also reveals truths that reason can grasp, because these truths are necessary for *salvation; but through reason only a few could grasp them, and then only after much study and still mixed with many errors.

For Aquinas, sacred theology is a science unlike any other; for while all others are based on human reason, it is based on what God has revealed. A wide variety of matters are considered in sacred theology, but they are all considered from the point of view of being revealed. Because sacred theology is founded on divine knowledge which cannot err, it possesses greater certitude than any science founded on human reason. Nevertheless, because of the weakness of our ability to understand divine things, they may appear doubtful to us, even though they are certain in themselves. Because of its origin in revelation, the strongest argument in this science is to appeal to *authority – the weakest argument in the other sciences. Aquinas denies that it is possible to argue to the articles of faith, which are the principles of this science, but one can answer objections rooted in misunderstanding. It is wrong to try to use reason as a basis for believing, but it is meritorious to try to understand what one has believed (see *Faith and reason).

In discussing issues, Aquinas consistently employs the works of the Fathers and the ancient philosophers, adopting Paul's use of the poets as his model. Thus the best arguments of the philosophers show that there is a first mover, first efficient cause, etc., and Aquinas concludes in each case that this is what everyone understands to be God. Of course, God is much more than just a first mover, so from this beginning Aquinas goes on to show that God is one, good, infinite, eternal and *Trinity. Similarly with regard to the end of man, Aquinas accepts the view of the ancient philosophers that man's end is happiness, but he argues that it is to be found only in heaven, in the *vision of God of the blessed; in this life there is only imperfect happiness, which is what the philosophers grasped to a greater or lesser degree. In his discussion of *law, Aquinas argues for a natural law which is in man, a participation in the divine law and a guide for the formation of the laws made by human legislators. The Decalogue, as given to the Israelites, is held to be a divinely given formulation of the content of the natural law. For Aquinas, nature is from God and so is good, but – because of sin – divine aid is needed in order both to regain the good of nature and to return to God.

Within fifty years of his death, the Dominicans had adopted Aquinas as the doctor of their order. Centres of Thomistic scholarship have flourished in many countries from the fifteenth century on. Today he remains the most influential theologian of the medieval church.

See also: THOMISM AND NEO-THOMISM.

Bibliography

Works: Summa contra Gentiles, tr. A. C. Pegis et al., On the Truth of the Catholic Faith, 5 vols. (Garden City, NY, 1955–57); repr. as Summa . . . (Notre Dame, IN, 1975); Summa Theologica, ET in 59 vols + index (London, 1964–81).

Studies: M. D. Chenu, Toward Understanding St Thomas (Chicago, 1964); F. C. Copleston, Aquinas (Harmondsworth, 1955); B. Davies, The Thought of Thomas Aquinas (Oxford, 1992); E. Gilson, Le Thomisme (Paris, 1965); F. Kerr, 'Thomas Aquinas', in G. R. Evans (ed.), The Medieval Theologians (Oxford, 2001), pp. 201–220; M. Levering, Christ's Fulfilment of Torah and Temple: Salvation According to Thomas Aquinas (Notre Dame, IN, 1997); R. McNery, St Thomas Aquinas (Boston, 1977); T. F. O'Meara, Thomas Aquinas: Theologian (Notre Dame, IN, 1997); F. van Steenberghen, Thomas Aquinas and Radical Aristotelianism (Washington DC, 1980); A. Vos, Aquinas, Calvin and Contemporary Protestant Thought (Grand Rapids, 1985); J. A. Weisheipl, OP, Friar Thomas D'Aquino (Garden City, 1974). See also Bibliography under Thomism.

A. Vos

THOMISM AND NEO-THOMISM

Thomism is the theological tradition which springs from *Thomas Aquinas and his followers.

Aquinas's theological views

The wide-ranging writings of Aquinas covered the whole gamut of Christian thought.

Faith and reason. Like *Augustine, Aquinas based faith in God's revelation in Scripture. Support for faith was found in miracles and rational arguments. Aquinas presented 'five ways' to prove the existence of God (Summa, I:2:3). Since he believed sin obscures human ability to know, however, belief (not proof) is necessary for most. While belief is never based on reason, nonetheless believers should reason about and for their faith. Aquinas's reasons for belief that God existed were spelled out in his famous 'five ways'. He argued (1) from motion to an unmoved mover, (2) from effects to a first cause, (3) from contingent beings to a necessary being, (4) from degrees of perfection to a most perfect being, and (5) from design to a designer. In addition to truths which are in 'accord with reason', there are some (e.g. *Trinity, *Incarnation) which go 'beyond reason' and can be known only by faith.

Epistemology. Thomas held that all knowledge begins in experience. There is nothing in the mind which was not first in the senses, except the mind itself. For we are born with an a priori, innate capacity to know. All knowledge is dependent on first principles, such as (1) identity (being is being), (2) noncontradiction (being is not non-being), (3) excluded middle (either being or non-being), (4) causality (non-being cannot cause being), and (5) finality (every being acts for an end). Once these principles are properly known, they are seen to be self-evident, or reducible to the self-evident.

Metaphysics. It is the task of the wise person to know order. The order reason discerns in its own acts is logic. The order it produces in acts of will is ethics. The order produced by reason in external things is art. But the order reason contemplates but does not produce is nature. Nature contemplated as sensible is called physical science. Nature understood, in so far as it is quantifiable, is mathematics. And nature viewed in so far as it is being is metaphysics. The most important affirmation of Thomas's metaphysics is: 'Act in the order in which it is act is unlimited and unique, unless it is conjoined with passive potency.' Only God is pure actuality. All creatures are composed of actuality and potentiality. God has no form, but is pure actuality. Angels are completely actualized potencies (pure form). And the human being is a composition of form (soul) and matter (body) with progressive actualization.

God. God alone is pure Existence (the 'I Am'). He is Being; everything else has being. God's essence is to exist. He is a Necessary Being. All else is contingent. God cannot change since he has no potentiality for change. Likewise, since time involves change (from a before to an after), God is a-temporal or eternal. God is simple (indivisible) since he has no principle (potency) for division. He is also infinite (not-finite), having no potency to limit him. Besides these metaphysical attributes, God is also morally perfect (just, good) and infinitely wise.

Religious language. Our language about God is analogous (see *Analogy). It cannot be univocal, since God's knowledge is unlimited and ours is limited. Neither can it be equivocal; since creation must resemble the Creator, the effect is like its efficient cause. Nonetheless, there are great differences between an infinite God and finite humanity. Hence, the way of negation (via negativa; see *Apophatic theology) is necessary. We can apply to God only the perfection signified (e.g. goodness, truth), but we must negate the finite mode of signification by which these perfections are found in creatures.

Creation. God created out of nothing (ex nihilo). An eternal creation is logically possible, because there is no logical contradiction in a cause causing from eternity. Nonetheless, by revelation we know that the universe began. No time existed before creation. God did not create in time; rather, there was a creation of time with the world.

Humanity. Following Aristotle, Aquinas held that the human being (see *Anthropology) is a hylomorphic unity of body and soul. Despite this unity of soul-body there is no identity between them. Rather, the soul survives death and awaits reunion with the body at the resurrection. God directly creates each individual human soul in its mother's womb (see *Soul, origin of).

Ethics. There are first principles not only of thought, but also of action (called *laws). Eternal law is the plan by which God governs all creation. Natural law is the participation of rational creatures in this eternal law. Human law is the application of natural law to local communities. And divine law is the revelation of God's law through the Scriptures and the church.

There are two types of virtue: natural and supernatural. The former are the classic virtues of prudence, justice, courage and temperance. The latter are faith, hope and love.

Thomism and Neo-Thomism

Thomism is a movement which follows the thought originating with Thomas Aquinas. Upon his death, his teachings were adopted by various individuals, most notably by his *Dominican brothers. Several propositions of Aquinas were condemned by church authorities in 1277, but primarily due to Dominican efforts his system was eventually established. Aquinas was canonized in 1323.

Thomists used an *Aristotelian mode of thought and expression, in contrast to *Franciscans who were more *Platonic. This led to lively debates between the orders through the ages.

A central figure in developing Thomism was Thomas de Vio Cardinal Cajetan (1469–1534) who opposed *Luther. Cajetan held several distinctive interpretations of Aquinas. Notable is his view that analogy is best understood as the possession of an attribute by two essences, rather than properly by only one. He also thought more in terms of abstract essences than existing substances. Finally, he raised doubts concerning the provability of God's existence and man's immortality.

By the sixteenth century Thomism became the leading school of Catholic thought. The *Jesuit order (approved in 1540) aligned itself with Aquinas, and in many of its pronouncements the *Council of Trent consciously expressed itself in Thomistic phrases. In the seventeenth century John of St Thomas (1589–1644) was a major representative of Thomism. But it became ingrown in the eighteenth century and faded. Thomism experienced a revival in the nineteenth century, however, due largely to its emphasis on human dignity in the face of the Industrial Revolution. By the time of the First *Vatican Council (1869–70), Thomism was again in vogue and triumphed in 1879 when Pope Leo XIII, in Aeterni Patris, gave official recommendation to it, which gave impetus to a movement known as Neo-Thomism.

Neo-Thomism is a twentieth-century revival of Thomistic thought. Two main groups emerged: the Transcendental Thomists, such as Joseph Maréchal (1878–1944), Bernard *Lonergan and Karl *Rahner, adapted Thomism to *Kantian thought; others under the leadership of Reginald Garrigou-Lagrange (1877–1964), Etienne *Gilson and Jacques *Maritain sought to expound Aquinas himself. Thomism crossed denominational lines and included Anglicans such as E. L. Mascall (1905–93) and even many non-Catholics.

The distinctive teaching of Neo-Thomism is the maxim that 'existence precedes essence'. By this it is meant that one knows by intuition that something exists before one knows what it is. For this reason Maritain claimed that Thomism is the origination of *existentialism.

The Neo-Thomist tradition has been carried on by notables such as Frederick Copieston (1907–94) in Great Britain, Joseph Owens (1908–2005) in Canada, and James Collins (1917–85) and Vernon Bourke (1907–98) in the United States.

Bibliography

V. J. Bourke, Thomistic Bibliography: 1920–40 (St Louis, 1945); T. L. Miethe and V. J. Bourke, Thomistic Bibliography: 1940–78 (Westport and London, 1980).

R. Cessario, A Short History of Thomism (Washington DC, 2006); E. Gilson, The Christian Philosophy of St Thomas Aquinas (New York, 1956); J. Maritain, Scholasticism and Politics (London, 2nd 1945); idem, Distinguish to Unite, or the Degrees of Knowledge (New York, 1959); G. McCool, The Neo-Thomists (Milwaukee, 1994). See also bibliography under Thomas Aquinas.

N. L. GEISLER

THORNTON, L. S., see ANGLO-CATHOLIC THEOLOGY

THORNWELL, JAMES HENLEY (1812–62)

An eminent theologian, teacher, minister within the Presbyterian Church in the United States (PCUSA), Thornwell was one of the founders of the Presbyterian Church in the Confederate States of America (1861). As a minister he served at Lancaster, SC (1835–8) and Columbia, SC (1840–1; 1855–61). In 1847 the General Assembly elected him as moderator, the youngest man ever to be so elected. From 1841 to 1851 he was professor at South Carolina College, and its president from 1852 to 1855. He taught didactic and polemic theology at the seminary in Columbia, SC, from 1855 to 1862. Thornwell was a strong and able defender of the Westminster Standards. His polemical ability arose from a passion for truth rather than native pugnacity.

Before the PCUSA divided between North and South, the most severe conflict engaged in by Thornwell was with Charles *Hodge. The conflict culminated with an encounter in 1860, at Rochester, New York, on the issue of the administration of missions. The issue expanded into concerns over the nature of *Presbyterianism, with special reference to the importance of the regulative and constitutive principles of Scripture, the legitimacy of virtually autonomous boards for the support of benevolent activities, and whether a ruling elder is to be considered a presbyter. Thornwell contended that *church government was no less a matter of revelation than doctrine. Hodge argued that the details of the system were not given in Scripture. Thornwell contended that committees of the presbytery, rather than boards, should control church benevolences; Hodge saw nothing unscriptural in boards. Thornwell saw ruling elders as full presbyters, acting for the church in the courts, while he felt Hodge's theory distinguished too radically between clergy and *laity and created a hierarchy.

Concerning the most volatile issue of his day, *slavery, Thornwell believed that from a study of the biblical material one could not conclude that slavery per se was immoral. Moreover, it had become so highly politicized that he defended the justness of the Confederate cause and supported the separation of Southern churches to serve the new nation.

Bibliography

Works: The Collected Writings of James Henley Thornwell, 4 vols. (New York, 1871–72; repr. Edinburgh, 1986).

Studies: D. B. Calhoun, A Place for Truth: The Bicentennial James Henley Thornwell Lectures (Greenville, 1996); E. B. Holifield, The Gentleman Theologians: American Theology in Southern Culture, 1795–1860 (Durham, 1978); B. M. Palmer, The Life and Letters of James Henley Thornwell (Richmond, 1875; repr. Edinburgh, 1974); T. W. Rogers, 'James Henley Thornwell', Journal of Christian Reconstruction 7, 1980, pp. 175–205; L. G. Whitlock, 'James Henley Thornwell', in D. F.

Wells (ed.), Reformed Theology in America (Grand Rapids, 1985).

T. J. NETTLES

THURNEYSEN, EDUARD (1888–1974)

Thurneysen was a Swiss theologian who associated with Karl *Barth as a student at Marburg, and who renewed his friendship with Barth while he was the pastor of a small church at Leutwil, Aargau (1913–20) at the same time Barth was pastor in the nearby Swiss village of Safenwil (1911–21). During this time, the world entered the First World War, and the Kaiser's war policy was supported by Barth and Thurneysen's former teachers, highlighting the failure of German liberal theology (see *Liberalism, German) to negotiate the modern world. In the early 1920s, together with Barth, Emil *Brunner, Rudolf *Bultmann and Friedrich *Gogarten, Thurneysen was part of a generational movement against the dominant liberal theology which made humanity rather than God and God's *revelation the central theme of theology. Understood as the leading thinkers developing so-called '*dialectical theology', they discovered a new world by turning to the word of God as the real world. Between 1923 and 1933 this group published the journal Zwischen den Zeiten ahead of the break of Thurneysen (following Barth) with Gogarten (becoming a Nazi supporter) and Brunner (advocating *natural theology). Thurneysen advanced the eschatological idea that rather than a dualistic future world for *eschatology, it is precisely this present world where the future promise in Jesus Christ shall come to his followers.

Bibliography

H. J. Ponsteen, Karl Barth en Eduard Thurneysen (de theologische relevantie van een levenslange vriendschap) (Oosterbeek, 1989); K. Raschzok, Theologische Realenzyklopädie, 33 (2002), pp. 524–527.

J. S. SEXTON

TILLICH, PAUL (1886–1965)

Writing as a philosophical theologian, Tillich sought to mediate between Christian theology and secular thought. He viewed his task as one of apologetics, provided that we define *apologetics in his own way, as an 'answering theology' which is offered on the basis of a shared area of common ground. He studied and subsequently taught in several German universities, and although he emigrated to the United States when Hitler came to power in 1933, his thought remains firmly rooted in German philosophical traditions. He is indebted to the *Romantic movement (e.g. to *Schleiermacher and to F. W. J. von Schelling, 1775–1854) but also to the *phenomenology of Edmund Husserl (1859–1938) and Martin *Heidegger. He also drew heavily on the psychology of Jung, especially in his work on symbols.

Tillich's major mature work was his three-volume Systematic Theology (1951, 1957, 1963). Its central principle is the method of correlation: 'In using the method of correlation, systematic theology proceeds in the following way: it makes an analysis of the human situation out of which existential questions arise, and it demonstrates that the symbols used in the Christian message are the answers to these questions' (Systematic Theology I, p. 70). Tillich's work is then organized around five major correlations: reason and revelation; being and God; concrete human existence and Christ; life in its ambiguities and the Spirit; the meaning of history and the kingdom of God. Tillich acknowledges that these questions and answers may influence each other in their formulations. For this reason many secular philosophers have expressed suspicions about the genuineness of the 'questions', while many theologians criticize the 'answers' as representing accommodations towards the questions. But Tillich sees his own role as that of a theologian of mediation. He seeks to mediate between theology and philosophy; between religion and culture; between Lutheranism and socialism; between the traditions of Germany and those of America. He insists that no isolated system of doctrine or theology can embrace the whole truth. Fragmentation and compartmentalizing are symbols of the demonic; wholeness points to God.

This is bound up with what Tillich has termed 'the *Protestant principle'. Since no single system of thought can encompass the reality of God, theology can never be final. It must always be in process and correction. God remains above and beyond all formulations in theology, including the formulations of the Bible itself. Pastorally, Tillich sees this principle as a defence against idolatry (see *Images). It is possible to think that we have either found or rejected God, when in reality we have encountered only a reduced image of him. The God who is truly God is ultimate. In Tillich's language, he is 'ultimate concern'. Tillich attempts to argue that an attitude of ultimate concern can have only the Ultimate as its object. 'Ultimate concern' thus has a double meaning, describing both the attitude and the reality to which it is directed. By this means Tillich seeks to replace the traditional criteria of theological content by the test of an attitude of ultimate seriousness. But this double meaning of ultimate concern can seem plausible only within a particular German philosophical tradition.

Theology, Tillich insists, uses the language of *symbol. Symbols point to that which they symbolize, but they also participate in it in the kind of way that the American flag is said to participate in the dignity of the nation. In particular, Tillich stresses the power of symbols to create or to destroy, to integrate or to fragment. They open up dimensions of reality, but also resonate with the preconscious depths of the human mind. Following Jung, Tillich stresses the creative and healing power of symbols which well up from the unconscious. While cognitive statements have the effect of reducing God to 'a' being alongside other beings, Tillich believes that symbols point beyond themselves to God who is the ground of being. Symbols are born and die, as human experience changes. But although he rightly stresses their power, Tillich provides no adequate criterion to test their truth, and his theory of symbols is insufficiently grounded in a comprehensive account of language and meaning.

Bibliography

Main works include: The Protestant Era (Chicago, 1947); Systematic Theology, 3 vols. (Chicago, 1951, 1957, 1963); The Courage to Be (New Haven and London, 1953); Theology of Culture (New York, 1959).

R. C. Crossman (ed.), Paul Tillich: A Comprehensive Bibliography and Keyword Index of Primary and Secondary Writings in English (Metuchen, 1984).

Studies: J. L. Adams, Paul Tillich's Philosophy of Culture, Science, and Religion (New York, 1965); D. M. Brown, Ultimate Concern: Tillich in Dialogue (New York, 1965); J. P. Clayton, The Concept of Correlation (Berlin, 1980); K. Hamilton, The System and the Gospel

(London, 1963); C. W. Kegley and R. W. Bretall (eds.), The Theology of Paul Tillich (New York, 1952); D. H. Kelsey, The Fabric of Tillich's Theology (New Haven, 1967); D. W. Musser and J. L. Price, Tillich (Nashville, 2010); W. and M. Pauck, Paul Tillich (New York, 1976); R. Re Manning (ed.), The Cambridge Companion to Paul Tillich (Cambridge, 2009); J. Heywood Thomas, Paul Tillich: An Appraisal (London, 1963).

A. C. THISELTON

TIME AND ETERNITY

Popular opinion (at least in European culture) tends to think of eternity as timelessness. The world exists 'within' time, which may be represented as a line on which the world is moving from the past into the future. Since *God is not an entity in the world, then it is assumed that he exists above and beyond time 'in' a timeless eternity. But developments in the twentieth century called that popular picture in question.

First, whereas scientific thinking at least from Newton had differentiated time from space, Einstein's theory of relativity required that these two be associated as different dimensions of the same reality, the universe. Secondly, in biblical studies, scholars became more aware that the rigid distinction between time and eternity was more characteristic of Greek culture than of the thinking of the writers of the OT or even the NT. In the OT, the Hebrew word 'ôlām, translated 'eternity', did not imply timelessness, but very long periods of time, an 'age', or even everlasting time. NT writers assumed a Jewish *eschatological framework which believed that 'this present evil age' (aiōn, Gal. 1:4) would come to an end (eschaton), and the future time of God's *kingdom would begin, 'the age to come' (Eph. 1:21). But for Christians 'the age to come' had paradoxically already come in Jesus, particularly with his *resurrection, in anticipation of the future coming of the kingdom.

The idea of eternity as 'timelessness' is now seen to have developed in the Greek philosophical tradition. With roots in Parmenides and *Plato, the idea of absolute timelessness emerged with Plutarch and Plotinus and was introduced into Christian thought by *Origen and *Augustine. It became seen as an implication of *creation ex nihilo that God must be in a timeless eternity and not be 'in' time since time was part of creation. Boethius formulated the classic definition: 'Eternity then is the whole, simultaneous and perfect possession of boundless life.' It had to be distinguished from 'sempiternity', which was his word for everlasting duration. God was held to be immutably eternal in the full sense that past, present and future were all simultaneously present to him in the 'Eternal Now'. His so-called 'foreknowledge' therefore was not looking 'forward', but simply his omniscience. *Thomas Aquinas brought this idea of the absolute timelessness, simplicity and immutability of God to its highest expression in what is now known as 'classical *theism'.

*Hegel was the genius who challenged the whole tradition back to Parmenides and argued that God's 'being' was to be understood not in terms of static timelessness, but in dynamic 'becoming'. God, or Absolute Spirit, creates an Other, the world, and then reconciles this Other to himself in Becoming. The metaphysical movement of Spirit is therefore in Being, Negation and Becoming, and this is the true meaning of what is pictured in the Christian doctrines of the incarnation and the *Trinity. The static *idealism of Plato is thus replaced with a dynamic idealism: the Platonist dualism between eternity and time is replaced with an eternity which realizes itself in everlasting time. The influence of this Hegelian metaphysic (see *German idealism) can be seen in the way in which some subsequent theologians think of God and the world, eternity and time.

Today different Christian philosophers advocate different views of the relation of God to time and eternity. Paul Helm defends classical theism, whereas Nicholas Wolterstorff argues for divine temporality. Others advocate some kind of combination of the two (William Lane Craig) or a nuanced view between the two in 'relative timelessness' (Alan Padgett). Among dogmatic theologians, Karl *Barth wanted to dispense with any idea of God's static, timeless eternity and yet to keep something of Boethius' view of the simultaneity of past, present and future to God. His distinction between created time and 'God's time' was developed by T. F. *Torrance. As Einstein rejected Aristotle's concept of time and space as 'receptacles' in which entities existed and events happened, and instead thought of time as one of the dimension of the space-time universe, so (Torrance suggests) we may think of 'eternity' as God's time. It therefore remains a mystery to us, but as time is not some reality superior to the universe 'in' which it exists, but is rather a dimension of the universe, so 'eternity', or God's time, is not something superior to God in which God exists, but is rather a dimension or function of his Being. And God cannot be portrayed as inert or static. Further, since God has become incarnate in Jesus, the co-ordination of time and 'eternity' are to be understood with reference to the God-man. Similarly Robert Jenson has criticized the foundational Western assumption that time is a progressive movement from the past into the future and argued that it must be reconceived in its relationship to the triune God who is the God of Israel.

Bibliography

J. Barr, Biblical Words for Time (London, 1962); K. Barth, CD II.1, pp. 608ff.; III.1, pp. 67ff.; III.2, pp. 437ff.; O. Cullmann, Christ and Time (ET, London, 1959); G. Ganssle (ed.), Four Views: God and Time (Downers Grove, 2001); P. Helm, Eternal God: A Study of God Without Time (Oxford, 1988); D. Knight, 'Jenson on Time', in C. E. Gunton (ed.), Trinity, Time and the Church (Grand Rapids, 2000); A. G. Padgett, God, Eternity, and the Nature of Time (New York, 1992); C. Tapp and E. Runggaldier (eds.), God, Eternity and Time (Farnham, 2011); T. F. Torrance, Space, Time and Incarnation (Oxford, 1969); idem, Space, Time and Resurrection (Edinburgh, 1976).

T. A. NOBLE

TOLERATION

Toleration is the recognition that a community can permit religious pluralism and be enriched. It is a modern idea, and only possible in societies which deny ultimate authority to state or church, cherish the liberty of the individual *conscience to reach different conclusions, and legally uphold freedom of enquiry and speech. The drawing of these boundaries is never completed. Christians with power to persecute have rarely resisted the temptation.

The beginnings of toleration are found in the sixteenth–eighteenth centuries. These are varied – the desire of Reformation Christians to worship outside Roman Catholicism, unhappiness about intolerance of national churches which led to partial separation of church and *state, pleas of individuals for an end to persecution, development of theories of natural law (see *Law) and personal rights and recognition of the tragic consequences of religious war, which destroyed the foundations of religion and society.

Sebastian Castellio (1515–63) raised important objections against the persecution of heretics such as Servetus, but his pleas fell on deaf ears. Jacobus Acontius (1492–c. 1566) sought to undermine intolerance by setting out the basic oneness and simplicity of Christian faith, deploring fierce debates about the fine points of dogma. Arguments for limited toleration were urged by persecuted Protestants and Roman Catholics alike, but only in Poland and France was this tried, ending in 1660 and 1685 respectively with the expulsion of Protestants from both countries. In Holland, remarkable toleration of variety within Protestantism emerged, and this provided a haven for religious refugees from all over Europe. Thinkers such as *Grotius and *Spinoza gave theological and philosophical justification for this. In England, the rejection of religious unity within the Church of England led to the emergence of Independents, *Baptists and *Quakers, who pleaded for liberty of conscience and religious equality. This was granted in limited form during the Commonwealth and Protectorate and was largely achieved by the early twentieth century. The American colonies of Rhode Island and Pennsylvania provided the most remarkable and lasting experiments in toleration, inspired by the convictions of Roger Williams (c. 1603–83) and William Penn (1644–1718), which ultimately made the USA a haven for religious and political refugees during the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries.

Thinkers such as *Locke, Pierre Bayle (1647–1706), *Lessing and J. S. Mill (1806–73) also provided important rational justifications of toleration, far in advance of existing law. This secular approach to toleration gained momentum during the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, when revolutions and political change steadily undermined the coercive power of national churches.

Growing *relativism has increased toleration based on secular assumptions, but contemporary repression of dissent demonstrates how fragile are the intellectual and political foundations of toleration. Developing a positive theology and commitment to toleration, which does justice to the tragedy of the *Holocaust as the supreme example of Christian intolerance, is an awesome task. Equality before the law is essential, as is legal protection for the religious freedom of ministries and individuals. Toleration, for Christians, must be grounded in creation and redemption. All bear the image of God. That is developed uniquely through Christ's new creation. The gift of inner freedom before God must be complemented by outer freedoms which enhance the potential of others before God.

Bibliography

R. H. Bainton, The Travail of Religious Liberty (Philadelphia, 1951); G. Barzilai, Law and Religion (Farnham, 2007); C. Beneke, Beyond Toleration: The Religious Origins of American Pluralism (Oxford, 2006); M. A. Hamilton, God vs. the Gavel: Religion and the Rule of Law (Cambridge, 2005); W. K. Jordan, The Development of Religious Toleration in England, 4 vols. (London, 1932–40); H. Kamen, The Rise of Toleration (London, 1967); E. Käsemann, Jesus Means Freedom (London, 1969); J. C. Murray, The Problem of Religious Freedom (London, 1969); H. Oberdiek, Tolerance Between Forbearance and Acceptance (Lanham, 2001); W. J. Sheils (ed.), Persecution and Toleration (Oxford, 1984); P. J. Wogoman, Protestant Faith and Religious Liberty (Nashville, 1967).

I. BREWARD

TOLSTOY, LEO (1828–1910)

Leo Tolstoy, the Russian novelist and social reformer, lost both his parents early in life and was brought up by aunts on the family estate near Tula. A child of the aristocracy, he knew wealth and social prestige from the beginning. He had little interest in university life and withdrew without taking a degree, but he read widely and became absorbed in the social theories of Jean-Jacques *Rousseau. To study educational systems and municipal governments he made trips to Europe in 1857 and 1860. In 1861 he liberated his serfs. The following year he married Sonya (Sofya) Andreyevna Bers, who bore him thirteen children.

The appearance of War and Peace (1860), one of the great novels of Western literature, brought Tolstoy wide acclaim. Anna Karenina (1877) is a masterly study of a strong but unhappy woman. In his fiction Tolstoy stresses the tension between moral restraint and the natural desire to live without the constraints of society. He is a master of large panoramic scenes, character study and penetrating moral insights.

Fame failed to bring inner peace to Tolstoy, however, and he cast in his lot with the peasants following a mystical experience c. 1880. He disowned his title, quarrelled with the Orthodox Church (which excommunicated him in 1901) and turned over his wealth to his wife and children. Setting out on a journey by rail with his daughter Alexandra, he died en route.

With genuine zeal Tolstoy fashioned his own religion, incorporating some Christian elements and urging love and charity toward all humankind. He rejected Christian supernaturalism in favour of an inner power in human nature, and took his basic principles from an adaptation of the Sermon of the Mount, emphasizing especially non-resistance (see *Pacifism) and simplicity of life. His rejection of ecclesiastical and civil authority has been described as 'Christian anarchism'.

See also: RUSSIAN ORTHODOX THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

Selected works: What I Believe (ET, London, 1885); My Confession and the Spirit of Christ's Teaching (ET, London, 1889); The Kingdom of God Is Within You, 2 vols. (ET, London, 1894).

Studies: A. H. G. Craufurd, The Religion and Ethics of Tolstoy (London, 1912); K. B. Feuer, Tolstoy and the Genesis of War and Peace (Ithaca, 1996); H. Troyat, Tolstoy (Garden City, 1967).

P. M. BECHTEL

TORRANCE, THOMAS FORSYTH (1913–2007)

The Scottish theologian Thomas Torrance was born in Chengdu, Sichuan, China, the son of missionary parents. He gained his MA (1934) and BD (1937) at the University of Edinburgh, where his theology teachers were Hugh Ross *Mackintosh (systematic theology), Daniel Lamont (practical theology), John *Baillie (divinity) and William Manson (NT). Mackintosh's influence is particularly significant in introducing Torrance to the study of the theology of Karl Barth. Thereafter, Torrance studied under Barth at Basel, 1937–8. He was appointed Professor of Systematic Theology at Auburn Theological Seminary in 1938, but with the onset of the Second World War he returned to the UK and began further study at Oxford (1939–40). Torrance was ordained to the ministry of the Church of Scotland in March 1940, and saw service during the war years as a chaplain on the front line during the Italian campaign. He returned to Basel in 1946 and completed his doctoral thesis, The Doctrine of Grace in the Apostolic Fathers. He went back to parish ministry in 1947 before being appointed Professor of Church History at Edinburgh in 1950 and then to the Chair of Christian Dogmatics (1952–79). He was one of the founding editors of the Scottish Journal of Theology in 1948 and was co-editor (with D. W. Torrance) of Calvin's NT commentaries. He served as Moderator of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland in 1976, and received the Templeton Foundation Prize for Progress in Religion in 1978 in addition to eight honorary doctorates.

The theology of Karl Barth

Torrance's engagement with *Barth dates, as noted above, from an early point in his career and is particularly evidenced in his books Karl Barth: An Introduction to His Early Thought 1910–1931 (London, 1962) and Karl Barth: Biblical and Evangelical Theologian (Edinburgh, 1990). In the former, Torrance established a paradigm for the interpretation of Barth which remains particularly influential in the English-speaking world. Further, he was co-editor (with G. W. Bromiley) of the English translation of Barth's Church Dogmatics, which served to introduce Barth's theology across the English-speaking world. Torrance's interaction with, and interpretation of, Barth is fundamental to our understanding of his subsequent theological development.

Theological science

The publication of Theological Science (1969) signalled the beginning of an exploration of the interaction between theology and natural science which is rooted in the same concerns that animated Torrance's interpretation of Barth. That is, our concern is with 'the actual knowledge of God', disclosed by 'God in His Self-revelation', which is the 'Self-disclosure in His Being and His Act' (p. 350). Equally, Torrance is concerned to explore the nature of the discipline of theology, particularly in its interaction with the wider scientific community (see *Science and theology). Thus, he seeks to identify the place of the theological science in relation to the natural sciences, particularly physics, whilst maintaining that: 'Theology is the unique science devoted to the knowledge of God, differing from other sciences by the uniqueness of its object which can be apprehended only on its own terms and from within the actual situation it has created in our existence in making itself known' (p. 281). Torrance further developed his understanding of this relation in a series of books, drawing on the parallel thinking on scientific epistemology by the Hungarian chemist, Michael Polanyi. These include: Space, Time and Incarnation (1969); Space, Time and Resurrection (1976); Christian Theology and Scientific Culture (1980); The Ground and Grammar of Theology (1980); Reality and Evangelical Theology (1982); Transformation and Convergence in the Frame of Knowledge (1984) and Reality and Scientific Theology (1985).

According to Torrance and Polanyi, all scientific knowledge has both an objective and subjective pole. So, for example, in The Ground and Grammar of Theology, Torrance's conception of theological science is developed through an ongoing dialogue with the natural sciences in an attempt to overcome a *dualist split in theological thought and to recover a unitary approach to our knowledge of God. He contends that this recovery is already evident in the natural sciences, but that theology cannot enter into dialogue with natural science because it has 'lost any common basis in the intelligibility of the created universe' (p. 16). In recovering this unitary approach, the scientist, in particular, is able to fulfil a vocation as a 'priest of creation', whose 'basic function' is 'to bring the universe to view and understanding in its inherent harmonies and regularities and thus to allow the basic design, the meaning, of the universe to become disclosed' (pp. 1–43, 110–112).

An important consequence of Torrance's approach is a transformation in the place and significance of *natural theology. Conscious of Barth's rejection of natural theology, Torrance interprets that rejection as 'a rejection of an independent natural theology – treated as a conceptual system on its own, antecedent to the rise and formulation of actual knowledge of God'. In response, Torrance seeks to locate natural theology within 'the material content of theology' and to regard it as 'the space-time structure embedded in a dynamic and realist theology’.

The church: one, holy, catholic and apostolic

Integral to Torrance’s theological work has been his commitment to the *church, as witnessed to in his participation in the life of the Church of Scotland (see *Presbyterianism) and concern for the *Reformed theological heritage of his native land, exemplified in his early works The Mystery of the Lord’s Supper (1958) and The School of Faith (1959). The Special Commission on Baptism of the Church of Scotland (1955–62), of which he was convener, shaped the law, practice and understanding of *baptism within the church for more than a generation, and is deserving of renewed study. Further, Scottish Theology (Edinburgh, 1996) offers a particular interpretation of the Scottish theological tradition which seeks to integrate it into an overarching and comprehensive schema.

Interwoven with this is Torrance’s concern for the fullness of the life of the church and in particular with *Faith and Order considerations, and this is demonstrated in the collected papers, Conflict and Agreement I (1959), Conflict and Agreement II (1960) and in Theology in Reconciliation (1975), as well as by his ongoing commitment to ecumenical dialogue. Of especial note is his concern for dialogue with the Orthodox Church (see *Eastern Orthodox theology), and the tradition of the Greek Fathers, as exemplified in the edited papers, The Incarnation: Ecumenical Studies in the Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed A.D. 381 (1981), Theological Dialogue between Orthodox and Reformed Churches I (1985) and Theological Dialogue between Orthodox and Reformed Churches II (1993), as well as in Trinitarian Perspectives (1994).

The Holy Trinity

This acknowledgment of the place of the Greek Fathers is profoundly reflected in Torrance’s concern for the maintenance of the Christian faith as expressed in the Nicene-Constantinopolitan *Creed (AD 381), and in his appreciation of the theological contribution of *Athanasius in securing the identity of the Son of God as consubstantial with that of the Father (see *Christology). In The Trinitarian Faith (1988), Torrance states that he regards the Creed as ‘essentially the fruit of Eastern Catholic theology’ and that: ‘The basic decision taken at Nicaea made it clear that the eternal relation between the Father and the Son in the Godhead was regarded in the Church as the supreme truth upon which everything else in the Gospel depends.’ Further, the identity of the Spirit as consubstantial with that of the Father and the Son is particularly developed ‘from the essential structure of knowledge of God grounded in his own self-communication through the Son and in the unity of the Spirit’ (pp. 2–3, 9).

Torrance’s class lectures, published posthumously as Incarnation (2008) and Atonement (2009), reveal the depth of Torrance’s thinking on what he always called the heart of his theology, the ‘vicarious humanity’ of Christ. But it was in the later part of his career after his formal retirement from teaching that Torrance emerged as a significant ‘theologian of the Trinity’ (Molnar). He advocated the view that a doctrine of the *Trinity which took its lead from Athanasius rather than the Cappadocians (see *Basil of Caesarea, *Gregory of Nazianzus, *Gregory of Nyssa) would avoid the difficulties which eventually led to the great division between the Eastern and Western churches on the filioque clause. Torrance also emphasized (in contrast to John *Zizioulas) that the Son was begotten not from the ‘Person’ of the Father, but from the Being (ousias) of the Father, as explicitly stated in the original creed of the Council of *Nicaea (325). The Being (ousia) of the Father could not therefore be regarded as some ‘impersonal’ substance, but as fully personal. Torrance was not a patrologist interested primarily in reproducing the doctrine of the Fathers, but a dogmatician who articulated an original and contemporary Reformed and evangelical reconstruction of patristic trinitarian theology.

Torrance’s trinitarian theology can be seen as taking into account the contributions of Barth and *Rahner. But unlike Barth he writes of the distinct ‘Persons’ of the Trinity, distinguished and united by their ‘onto-relations’, and he is not prepared to allow ‘Rahner’s rule’ to be interpreted in such a way as to eliminate the transcendence of the Immanent Trinity. He sees some value in the concern of those who espouse the ‘social analogy’, but more strongly emphasizes the unity of the Trinity. He is not driven by the desire of some to make the doctrine of the Trinity ‘relevant’ to social and egalitarian concerns (as with *Moltmann), but more concerned to see the deep integration of the doctrine of the Trinity with the Christian gospel and thus to articulate a trinitarian soteriology (see D. O. Eugenio, Communion with the Triune God). The whole trinitarian shape of his theology is deeply permeated by his Reformation perspective that *salvation is by grace.

Conclusion

Torrance's contribution to theology is at once evangelical and catholic, Reformed and orthodox, in its breadth and scope. The concern to explore the possibility of our knowledge of God in the light of his self-revelation in Christ, complemented by the concern to enter into dialogue with the physical sciences, marks his theology as one rich in promise and potential in our contemporary age. Equally, the *ecumenical implications of his theology require to be embraced in order that their depth may be fully comprehended. Torrance was undoubtedly the most prolific Scottish theologian of the twentieth century, and in the opinion of many, the most outstanding British *dogmatician.

Bibliography

Selected works: The Doctrine of Jesus Christ: The Auburn Lectures 1938/39 (Eugene, 2001); Calvin's Doctrine of Man (London, 1949); Theology in Reconstruction (London, 1965); The Trinitarian Faith (Edinburgh, 1988); The Mediation of Christ (Edinburgh, 21992); Trinitarian Perspectives (Edinburgh, 1994); Divine Meaning (Edinburgh, 1995); The Christian Doctrine of God (Edinburgh, 1996); Scottish Theology (Edinburgh, 1996); Incarnation: The Person and Life of Christ (Milton Keynes and Downers Grove, 2008); Atonement: The Person and Work of Christ (Milton Keynes and Downers Grove, 2009) .

Studies: E. M. Colyer, How to Read T. F. Torrance: Understanding His Trinitarian and Scientific Theology (Downers Grove, 2001); idem (ed.), The Promise of Trinitarian Theology: Theologians in Dialogue with T. F. Torrance (Lanham, 2001); A. E. McGrath, Thomas F. Torrance: An Intellectual Biography (Edinburgh, 1999); P. D. Molnar, Thomas F. Torrance: Theologian of the Trinity (Williston, 2009).

Studies of particular themes: P. Cass, Christ Condemned in the Flesh (Saarbrücken, 2009); D. O. Eugenio, Communion with the Triune God: The Trinitarian Soteriology of T. F. Torrance (Eugene, 2014); Kye Won Lee, Living in Union with Christ: The Practical Theology of T. F. Torrance (New York, 2003); J. D. Morrison, Knowledge of the Self-Revealing God in the Thought of Thomas Forsyth Torrance (New York, 1997); C. Weightman, Theology in a Polanyian Universe: The Theology of Thomas Torrance (New York, 1994).

J. L. McPAKE

TRACY, DAVID (b. 1939)

David Tracy, distinguished professor of Roman Catholic studies at the University of Chicago Divinity School since 1987, received seminary training at St Joseph's in Yonkers, New York, acquired his licentiate in 1964 and a doctorate in 1969 from the Gregorian University in Rome. He was ordained a priest in the Diocese of Bridgeport, Connecticut in 1963.

Tracy's theological project – ranging from work on Bernard *Lonergan, fundamental theology, systematics, hermeneutics, church history, inter-religious dialogue and the naming of God – manifests certain characteristics. One is that Lonergan's transcendental imperatives – 'Be attentive, be intelligent, be rational, be responsible, develop and, if necessary, change' – mark Tracy's theological work. A second characteristic is the revisionist nature of his theology. In his Blessed Rage for Order (1975) and The Analogical Imagination (1981), Tracy argues for ongoing revision of traditional Christianity and traditional modernity, building on Paul *Tillich's method of correlation. Third, Tracy emphasizes the centrality of interpretation in the task of the theologian. According to Tracy, the interpretive task of the theologian includes keeping in mind the following aspects of theology: that it is 'situated', as postmoderns say; it is most fruitful when done in dialogue; it is to be public; it is pluralistic in nature; and it is ambiguous at times.

While Tracy's previous work moved along revisionist lines, his more recent research has taken him in a new direction, that of exploring *mystical and neo-*Platonic traditions of thought along with postmodern thinkers. Tracy is drawing on the notion of the 'incomprehensibility' of God in *Pseudo-Dionysius (the unknown sixth-century mystic), and on Martin *Luther's teaching on the 'hiddenness' of God (see *Hidden and revealed God). Tracy proposes that theologians should fragment and negate positive language about God (see *Apophatic theology), as well as seek to understand God through the weakness of the cross (Luther).

Bibliography

Selected works: The Achievement of Bernard Lonergan (New York, 1970); The Analogical Imagination: Christian Theology and the Culture of Pluralism (New York, 1982); Dialogue with the Other: The Inter-Religious Dialogue (Grand Rapids, 1990); Plurality and Ambiguity (Chicago, 1994); Blessed Rage for Order: The New Pluralism (Chicago, 1996); 'An Interview with David Tracy', by Lois Malcolm, in The Christian Century, February 13–20, 2002, pp. 24–30.

Selected studies: W. Jeanrond and J. L. Rike, Radical Pluralism and Truth: David Tracy and the Hermeneutics of Religion (New York, 1991); T. H. Sanks, 'David Tracy's Theological Project: An Overview and Some Implications', Theological Studies December, 1993, pp. 698–727.

B. BINGAMAN

TRADUCIANISM, see SOUL, ORIGIN OF

TRAGEDY

Although the term 'tragedy' often refers to some grave misfortune, this usage is derivative from its more fundamental sense that refers to a literary genre. The derivation arises because it is commonly thought that tragedies end in disaster, but this is actually not right – in fact, only about half of the extant Greek tragedies end badly for the protagonist.

The genre originated in Athens in the sixth century BC, with the plays part of an annual festival honouring the god Dionysius. The Greek tragic theatre continued into the Hellenistic period, but lost most of its vitality after Athens's defeat by Sparta in the Peloponnesian War. Extant Greek plays include those written by Aeschylus, Sophocles and Euripides; Roman examples include two by an unknown author and nine by Seneca. After this, we have no more extant plays (or writings on tragedy) until the Renaissance and later, with Racine being the most prominent neo-classical example. Shakespeare, of course, is a dominating figure here, and almost deserves his own category. The style continues in the works of Samuel Beckett, Arthur Miller and others.

The ancient tragic poets, more than simply entertainers, were significant contributors to political and philosophical debates, including the effects of military expeditions. Along with the sophists, they are *Plato's principal foils, and it is the tragedians on whom *Aristotle focuses in his Poetics. After the Renaissance, philosophers such as *Hegel, Schopenhauer, and *Nietzsche rediscovered Greek tragedy, and, abetted by conversations between philosophy and literary theory, this engagement continued in the twentieth century.

Theologians have been less enthusiastic about the value of tragedy for their craft – think of *Niebuhr's famous argument that Christianity moved humanity 'beyond tragedy'. Biblical scholars have been more receptive, with some analysis of the story of King Saul and the Gospel of Mark as tragedy. More recently, however, theologians have begun to re-engage with tragedy, especially with the rise of the field of religion and literature.

Given its engagement with social issues in rapidly changing times and with nations at war, Greek tragedy has much to offer contemporary theological *anthropology. The ancient heroes were tragic because they structured their identity according to older Homeric virtues in a world in which these roles and identifications no longer made sense. They are no longer Homeric heroes, but are not yet citizens of the polis. Repeatedly, the heroes become bewildered at the unexpected effects of their choices, and become alienated from both their society and themselves. They are beset by contradictions (able to control nature but not themselves, both guilty and innocent, able to understand social and political realities but not their own motivations) in a world in which justice, and even truth, seems to constantly shift. In this context, the tragic poets ask what it means to be a human being – a creature they can describe sometimes as noble, sometimes as a deimos, an incomprehensible and baffling monster. For those theologians who think we are in a postfoundationalist, *postmodern world (both contested claims), the Greek tragedies deserve serious study.

See also: CULTURE.

Bibliography

L. D. Bouchard, Tragic Method and Tragic Theology: Evil in Contemporary Drama and Religious Thought (University Park, PA, 1989);

J. C. Exum, Tragedy and Biblical Narrative: Arrows of the Almighty (Cambridge, 1992); S. L. Nicholson, Three Faces of Saul: An Intertextual Approach to Biblical Tragedy (Sheffield, 2002); R. Niebuhr, Beyond Tragedy: Essays on the Christian Interpretation of History (New York, 1937); L. A. Ruprecht, Jr, Tragic Posture and Tragic Vision: Against the Modern Failure of Nerve (New York, 1994); K. M. Sands, Escape from Paradise: Evil and Tragedy in Feminist Theology (Minneapolis, 1990); K. Taylor and G. Waller, Christian Theology and Tragedy: Theologians, Tragic Literature and Tragic Theory (Farnham, 2011).

J. A. KNIGHT

TRANSCENDENCE, see GOD

TRANSFIGURATION

The story of the transfiguration is recounted in all three Synoptic Gospels: Matt. 17:1–8, Mark 9:2–8 and Luke 9:28–36. John does not include it in his narrative, but there may be an echo of it in John 1:14, ‘we have seen his glory, the glory as of a father’s only son’ (NRSV). In 2 Pet. 1:16–18, the author reveals that he and others had been with the Lord on the holy mountain, where he received honour and glory from God the Father. Luke’s account does not use the word metamorphothe. He records only that the appearance of Jesus’ face changed. The idea of transfiguration appears twice in Paul (Rom. 12:2; 2 Cor. 4:16–17), but in both instances it refers to the inward spiritual transformation of believers.

Suggestions as to the precise site of the transfiguration are conjectural at best. The timing, on the other hand, is very precise: six days after Peter’s confession at Caesarea Philippi (Mark 9:2). This is probably of psychological as well as chronological significance. The transfiguration comes at the beginning of the passion narrative, and thus at a moment when Jesus stood in profound need of encouragement. As he begins the journey to Calvary, the voice from heaven assures him of his divine identity, and of the Father’s love and approbation.

The event ought also to have brought encouragement to the disciples. The glimpse of his glory lent credibility to Jesus’ promise that beyond the *cross lay *resurrection, and this hope ought to have sustained them in the darkness that followed. This, as *Chrysostom suggests, may have been why he brought the three disciples with him in the first place: ‘to show the glory of the cross, and to console Peter and the others in their dread of the passion, and to raise up their minds.’ In the event, it brought no such consolation, but this does not detract from the fact that the story of the crucifixion is framed on one side by the transfiguration as it is on the other by the empty tomb. This rhetorical arrangement is as significant for the modern reader as the original historical setting was for the disciples.

Inevitably, the historicity of the event has been questioned. Lohmeyer saw it as a purely theological construction designed to portray Jesus as the messianic fulfiller. *Bultmann saw it as a resurrection-appearance story read back into the earthly life of Jesus. In the Synoptics, however, the story of the transfiguration is no different in genre from the story of Peter’s confession, which precedes it. The evangelists clearly intended to portray the one, no less than the other, as historical fact. The details bear this out. The reference to ‘after six days’, for example, is an extremely precise chronological marker; and Peter’s suggestion that they build three tabernacles, along with Mark’s reference to a ‘fuller’ (κτν), both supply the sort of human touches to be expected in eyewitness reports. The key details, too, are completely different from later resurrection-appearance stories, none of which portrays a transfigured Christ, and none of which alludes to heavenly visitors, a cloud or a voice from on high. On the other hand, in all the other appearance stories Jesus speaks. In this one, he utters not a word.

But, supposing it to be historical, what sort of historical incident was it? The details are hard to fit into anything purely visionary. The disciples, as well as Jesus, clearly saw and heard something. They saw his appearance change. They saw Elijah and Moses. They heard the voice from heaven, and they heard the instruction to keep the whole affair to themselves till after the resurrection. All the signs are that for both Jesus and the disciples the experience was a matter of objective sense-perception.

What was the significance of the event? First, it was a revelation of the present, underlying *glory of Jesus. This is the line taken by both *Calvin and *Barth, and it is confirmed by the presence in the narrative of the voice from heaven, which clearly endorses the divine identity of Jesus. Calvin starts with the idea of the veiling (krupsis) of the glory of Jesus in the incarnation. The kenosis had not involved his laying aside his divine nature, but it did involve his concealing it. Here, on the mount of transfiguration, the veil is drawn aside, though Calvin (Harmony of the Gospels of Matthew, Mark and Luke, vol. 2, p. 198) is at pains to point out that the disciples saw only symbols of the glory, not the real glory itself: 'this was not a substantial revelation of Christ's heavenly glory, but He gave them in symbols, consonant with the capacity of their flesh, a partial taste of what they could not yet receive fully.'

Barth's approach is slightly different. He points out that though John does not report the transfiguration, he does refer to Jesus showing his glory. One clear instance of this is John 2:11, where the glory is revealed through the miracle of turning water into wine. The transfiguration, too, was a miracle, but it was a miracle with one unique feature: it was performed not by Jesus, but on Jesus. He did nothing. 'Everything suggests a theophany,' writes Barth (CD, III.2, p. 478). Whatever its pointers to the future, the transfiguration was a declaration that he already was what the future would declare him to be.

Yet the context demands that we also see the transfiguration as a revelation of Jesus' future glory as the Son of Man. All three Synoptics directly connect the event to Jesus' promise: 'some who are standing here will not taste death before they see the kingdom of God come with power' (Mark 9:1). The link can hardly be a coincidence. The transfiguration clearly had *eschatological connotations. It was a glimpse of the end-time.

But what sort of glimpse? Does it point to the resurrection or to the parousia? Boobyer argues strongly for the latter, but the antithesis may be unnecessary. True, in the resurrection appearances recorded in the Gospels, Jesus looks nothing like his appearance on the holy mountain, but the resurrection must be taken with the *ascension and the heavenly session, in which Jesus has already come into full possession of his glory. The Christ of Patmos and the Damascus Road is as glorious as the Christ of the transfiguration, and there is no reason to think that the body of Jesus undergoes any further glorification between his ascension and the parousia. He will come as he already is.

But for the revelation (apokalupsis) and appearing (epiphaneia) of this glory we must await the parousia. What the three saw on the holy mountain the whole world will see when the Son of Man comes in his glory. Then, too, there will be clouds, heavenly attendants and a voice from heaven.

But is even this all? In all three Synoptics, the preceding context has recorded Christ's words on the cost of discipleship, but beyond the cost lie transfiguration and glory. Hence Anselm's observation (quoted in Ramsey, The Glory of God and the Transfiguration of Christ, p. 119) that 'He showed them his own glory and the glory of his own.' What the three saw was a glory which would one day be their own.

See also: JESUS.

Bibliography

K. Barth, CD, III.2; G. H. Boobyer, St Mark and the Transfiguration Story (Edinburgh, 1942); J. Calvin, A Harmony of the Gospels: Matthew, Mark and Luke (ET, Michigan and Carlisle, 1975); Chrysostom, Homilies on the Gospel of St. Matthew, LVI, NPNF, vol. 10; A. M. Ramsey, The Glory of God and the Transfiguration of Christ (London, 1949).

D. MACLEOD

TRANSMIGRATION OF THE SOUL, see METEMPSYCHOSIS

TRANSUBSTANTIATION, see EUCHARIST

TRENT, COUNCIL OF

Protestantism was a catalyst rather than a cause of this reforming council (1545–63). From an inauspicious start with poor attendance, the Council was to go on to assert the Catholic position on four major matters: *Scripture and tradition; *justification by faith; the Mass; and the authority of the church.

John Driedo's programmatic work (On the Church's Scriptures and Doctrines, 1534), which stated that the church could find in Scripture and apostolic traditions teachings which were hitherto latent, was echoed in the 1546 Decree Concerning the Canonical Scriptures: 'that these truths and rules are contained in the written books and in the unwritten traditions, which, received by the Apostles from the mouth of Christ Himself, or from the Apostles themselves, the Holy Ghost dictating, have come down to us, transmitted as it were from hand to hand'. The traditions of the apostles and the NT Scriptures have come from the one source – the revealed gospel of Jesus Christ – and through two channels from that source should now be received as one stream. The Vulgate, including the deuterocanonical books, was reaffirmed as the authoritative translation, but the question of vernacular translations was avoided.

The emphasis of the Decree in 1547 was on justification as the healing and renewing of the soul. One could and should prepare for the gift of faith: eternal life would be both reward and gift. Justification by faith alone was denied. To be saved in Christ meant to be in the realm of his sacramental presence. So, sacrifice, not just commemoration was emphasized in the 1551 proceedings. Yet the Mass (see *Eucharist) was not a repetition of the cross, but its unbloody application. A functionalist view held that that which effects spiritual nourishment was assumed, without prejudice to the theory of transubstantiation as expounded by Lateran IV. The position is that *sacraments (and there are seven of them) confer grace on those who put no obstacles, and that they build faith, but do not require it for their efficacy. In the last session (1562–3), the Mass did not derogate from, but confirmed, the cross. The Last Supper was the fulfilment of Mal. 1:11, and the command of Christ made the apostles priests of a sacrifice.

The church was to assert its authority in local areas, not least through processions with the eucharistic host. Pius IV could make it clear that the Eucharist in both kinds was not to be permitted for the laity, and authored a *catechism to communicate the truths of Trent. Processions became celebrations of the triumph of truth over lies and error, to amaze enemies of the church with a Jesuit-influenced expectation of genuflecting, hats off, before the host.

See also: COUNCILS; ROMAN CATHOLIC THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

H. Jedin, A History of the Council of Trent, 2 vols. (London, 1957–61); J. O'Malley, Trent and All That: Renaming Catholicism in the Early Modern Era (Cambridge and London, 2000).

M. W. ELLIOTT

TRINITY

The doctrine that there is one God who exists and has manifested himself in three distinct persons is fundamental to Christianity and distinguishes it from related forms of *monotheism like Judaism and Islam. It is closely connected to *Christology, since it was the belief that Jesus Christ is God that made it necessary to develop a theology which could encompass that belief within a monotheistic framework. The term 'Trinity' is not found in the Bible, but was invented by *Tertullian as a translation of the Greek trias, a word which was already in use to describe the threeness of God but which did not have an explicitly theological meaning.

Whether the doctrine can be found in the Scriptures or not has long been a matter of controversy. In the early church, several attempts were made to find indications of the Trinity in the OT, and theologians frequently cited such things as the plural name of God (Elohim) and the apparent personification of both the Word and the Spirit of God as evidence for this. Of particular significance was the appearance of the three men (or angels) to Abraham at Mamre (Gen. 18), whom Abraham addresses in the singular as 'Lord'. *Philo of Alexandria (d. 50), who was not a Christian, believed that this demonstrated that the number three was somehow present in God, and it was he who first used the word trias to describe him. This reference was not picked up in the NT, but by the third century it had become a part of Christian apologetic and it is still frequently encountered, especially in the *Eastern Orthodox Church, where there is a long tradition of painting Abraham and the three men in an icon known as 'The Old Testament Trinity'. On a different note, Augustine believed that the *image of God (Gen. 1:26–27) in human beings is the image of the Trinity, and he used this belief to develop a highly sophisticated theory about the tripartite structure of the human mind. In spite of these venerable traditions, however, modern scholarship is virtually unanimous in rejecting these texts as a basis for the construction of a trinitarian doctrine.

The NT contains indications of trinitarian belief which may be subdivided into two distinct categories. The first of these are the direct formulaic references to the Trinity, of which there are two. The first of them occurs in Matt. 28:19, where Jesus tells his disciples to baptize all nations in the name of the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit. The second is in 2 Cor. 13:14, where the apostle Paul concludes his epistle with the famous blessing which speaks of the grace of Christ, the love of God (the Father) and the fellowship of the Holy Spirit. The authenticity of the Gospel reference has been questioned by some, but there can be no doubt that a trinitarian confession of faith was associated with the rite of baptism from a very early time, and that failure to observe this pattern resulted in a defective initiation rite (Acts 8:15–17). It is hard to see why this should have been so if the command to practise a threefold baptism did not go back to Jesus himself. The Pauline blessing stresses the importance of Christology for our understanding of the Trinity and incidentally reminds us that the Father manifests the fullness of God in a special way. It is impossible to say that all undifferentiated uses of the word 'God' in the Bible refer primarily or exclusively to the Father, but it is certain that they never designate the Son or the Holy Spirit, who are always mentioned specifically. This suggests that the Father sometimes represents the fullness of God in a way that the other persons do not, and this observation has led some theologians to conclude that he is superior to the other two, something which orthodox trinitarian theology has always strenuously resisted.

More significant are the indirect references to the Trinity in the NT, of which there are more than thirty. These are texts in which all three persons are mentioned, but in a non-formulaic way. An early example is Gal. 4:6: 'God sent the Spirit of his Son into our hearts, the Spirit who calls out, "Abba, Father".' Another is Eph. 2:18: 'For through him [Christ] we both have access to the Father by one Spirit.' Passages like these cannot have been inserted into the original text in order to defend a later trinitarian doctrine, and they demonstrate how the Trinity functions in the spiritual life of the Christian.

This observation is especially important because it was out of Christian experience that the doctrine of the Trinity developed. The early church was obliged to confess the divinity of both Christ and the Holy Spirit, because that is the way in which believers experienced them in their lives, but at the same time they also knew that there was only one God. It was the struggle to reconcile these beliefs that led to many of the controversies which marked the life of the church in the fourth and fifth centuries. Out of them there emerged a theological vocabulary which was capable of accommodating the subtle definitions which continue to characterize trinitarian theology today.

The need to protect monotheism led many early theologians to conclude that a Trinity emerged because at some point God produced his Word and his Spirit in order to create and redeem the world. Various theories were canvassed, including one which suggested that the persons of the Trinity correspond to different epochs of divine self-revelation, the Father being the God of the OT, the Son the God of the Gospels and the Holy Spirit the God of the post-Pentecostal church. A variant of this suggested that the differences were due to the different functions which God performs in relation to his world: as Creator he is the Father, as Redeemer he is the Son, as Sanctifier he is the Holy Spirit. Theories of this kind are called 'modalist' because they claim that the differences of the persons are seen in the modes in which God acts. Modalism falls down because God's threeness is reduced to a phenomenon of time and space and because it makes it impossible for one person of the Trinity to relate to another, which clearly conflicts with the NT evidence. Modalism is sometimes regarded as the 'typical' heresy of the Western church, which supposedly stresses the unity of the one God and derives the Trinity from that.

Another approach to the doctrine which is found in the early church may be called 'subordinationist'. This is the belief that the Father is superior to the other two persons, who are defined in relation to him, whereas he stands alone. The generation of the Son was held to take place in time, at the beginning of creation (cf. Prov. 8:22). The procession of the Holy Spirit was also said to be from the Father (cf. John 15:26) and to have taken place after the generation of the Son, though it is not entirely clear when. Beliefs of this kind circulated widely in the Eastern church and eventually resulted in *Arianism, which denied the full divinity of the Son and (at least, by implication) of the Holy Spirit. It was the struggle to affirm that the Son and the Holy Spirit were fully God, and therefore equal to the Father in every respect, which eventually produced the trinitarian doctrine which became and still remains the classical, orthodox expression of the Christian faith.

A constant problem in trinitarian thought was finding the right words to express both the unity and the diversity of the Godhead. It was generally agreed that as a being, God is one and unique. This was denoted by the Greek word ousia and by the Latin words substantia and later essentia. By declaring that the Son was homoousios (consubstantial) with the Father, the first council of *Nicaea in 325 canonized this usage, which has never been seriously challenged.

Finding the right way to express the ‘three-ness’ in God was much more difficult. Origen used the term hypostasis, which he probably got from Heb. 1:3, and Tertullian used persona, which he took from Roman law but which went back to Greek theatre, where it meant ‘mask’. The conceptual difference between these two words is that hypostasis refers primarily to the manifestation of a distinct identity, whereas persona, at least in its legal sense, stresses the activity of a subject. Unfortunately, many Greek theologians failed to appreciate this and thought that by calling the hypostases of the Godhead personae, Tertullian had lapsed into modalism, because to them persons were only masks which indicated the different roles which God might play in the cosmic drama. The confusion was eventually sorted out by Basil of Caesarea, who realized that hypostasis and persona meant the same thing, a conclusion which was eventually endorsed by the council of *Chalcedon in 451.

In the Middle Ages much effort was expended on defining the meaning of persona. *Boethius called it ‘the individual subsistence of a rational nature’, and later theologians defined it as ‘relation’, claiming that it is not possible to be a person without being in relationship with other persons. Today, this concept dominates the field, and much modern trinitarian thought is preoccupied with relationship questions, both divine and human. At the Reformation and periodically since then, attempts were made to reject this vocabulary on the grounds that it was non-biblical and too philosophical in orientation, but to date no satisfactory alternative has been found, and in recent years the traditional language has been rejuvenated as part of the general rediscovery of trinitarian doctrine as a whole.

After the council of Chalcedon in 451 the church was generally agreed in its trinitarian doctrine, even though it was divided over Christology. Controversy did not arise until some time later and became serious only in the ninth century, when Patriarch Photius of Constantinople (d. 886) wrote a detailed refutation of the Western (Latin) doctrine. The trouble was caused by the way in which the Eastern Church understood the role of the Father as the ‘source of deity’ in the Trinity. According to that way of thinking, the Son derived his divinity by being ‘begotten of the Father’, and the Holy Spirit derived his by ‘proceeding from the Father’. The different modes of causation determined the distinct identity of these two persons, and the Father was defined as the one who was both unbegotten and uncaused. In contrast to this model, the Western church, following *Augustine, understood the Trinity as a community of *love. According to this way of thinking, the Father was the Lover, the Son was the Beloved and the Holy Spirit was the Love which flows between them and creates the ‘bond of unity’ in the Godhead. If this model is followed, it becomes evident that the Holy Spirit must not only proceed from both the Father and the Son, but that he must do so in equal measure, since otherwise their love for one another would be imperfect. In the subsequent struggle against Arianism, the Western church gradually introduced this ‘double procession’ of the Holy Spirit into the Nicene Creed by placing the Latin word filioque (‘and the Son’) in the third article. Photius thought that this created two sources of deity in God and so compromised the fundamental principle of monotheism.

The original dispute was papered over, but it erupted again in the thirteenth century, by which time many other factors had combined to alienate the Eastern and the Western churches. At the council of Florence in 1439 it was decided that the formula ‘who proceeds from the Father through the Son’ would satisfy the demands of both sides, but this compromise was rejected in the East. The matter has been raised again in recent ecumenical dialogues, but has proved impossible to resolve. The Eastern churches have remained adamantly opposed to any accommodation to Western thought on the matter, and the Western ones, though sympathetic to the Eastern position, have not been willing to abandon their Augustinian heritage.

The Protestant *Reformers accepted the traditional doctrine of the Trinity, though they tried to avoid any suggestion of subordinationism by stating that each of the persons of the Godhead was ‘God-in-himself’, and suggesting that their trinitarian relations were the result of a mutual agreement, rather than something imposed by the Father on the others. They were also concerned to develop the work of Christ and the work of the Holy Spirit as distinct theological categories, which further emphasized both the individuality of the persons and their mutual interdependence.

In the seventeenth century, a sceptical *rationalism questioned the integrity of a doctrine which said that God was three and one at the same time, and many were persuaded to abandon it in favour of *Unitarianism. Though no church formally adopted this as its confession of faith, a pragmatic unitarianism became very common, and the doctrine of the Trinity was pushed into the background. The ultimate sign of this was the fact that it was relegated to a mere appendix in Friedrich *Schleiermacher's influential dogmatic work, The Christian Faith.

It was in reaction to this that Karl *Barth reversed his theological priorities in his Church Dogmatics and put the Trinity at the forefront of his theological concerns. Barth was basically an Augustinian who conceived of the Godhead in terms of the 'revealer', the 'revealed' and the 'revelation', but he demonstrated his indebtedness to the semi-unitarian liberal tradition by rejecting the term 'person' in favour of 'mode of being'. For Barth there was only one person in God: Jesus Christ, who revealed him to the human race and in whom everything we confess about the Godhead is to be found. This Christocentric approach was much criticized, and it was often claimed that Barth was really a 'Christomonist', but he denied this.

Whatever Barth's own views were, there can be no doubt that he sparked a revival of trinitarian thought which has not yet run its course. Both in Protestant and in Roman Catholic circles there was a vast outpouring of trinitarian studies in the twentieth century, and the rediscovery of Eastern Orthodoxy, with its strongly trinitarian piety, contributed still further to this. By the dawn of the new millennium, trinitarianism had become something of a theological fad, and it now seems that it is almost impossible to write on any subject without expounding its trinitarian dimension. This is a complete reversal of the position which had obtained a century earlier, but it may have gone too far and there is a real danger that the next few years will see a reaction against the current enthusiasm. On the other hand, the recent history of this doctrine shows very clearly that classical orthodoxy has the power to rebound from criticism and reinvigorate theological discussion when that is least expected. The doctrine of the Trinity, always the chief distinguishing mark of orthodox Christianity, has once more become a living expression of faith and a creative force in contemporary theology which is sure to produce even more fruit in the years ahead.

See also: COUNCILS; CREEDS; GOD; HOLY SPIRIT; JESUS.

Bibliography

G. L. Bray, The Doctrine of God (Leicester, 1993); P. M. Collins, Trinitarian Theology, West and East (Oxford, 2001); E. J. Fortman, The Triune God: A Historical Study of the Doctrine of the Trinity (London, 1972); R. P. C. Hanson, The Search for the Christian Doctrine of God (Edinburgh, 1988); B. C. Leslie, Trinitarian Hermeneutics: The Hermeneutical Significance of Karl Barth's Doctrine of the Trinity (New York, 1991); R. Letham, The Holy Trinity in Scripture, History, Theology and Worship (Phillipsburg, 2004); T. F. Torrance, The Trinitarian Faith: The Evangelical Theology of the Ancient Christian Church (Edinburgh, 1988); A. W. Wainwright, The Trinity in the Old Testament (London, 1962).

G. L. BRAY

TRITHEISM

Tritheism is the belief that the *Trinity is not one God but three. It can arise if the persons of the Trinity are regarded as *substantial beings in their own right, sharing a common divinity only in the sense that people share a common humanity.

Tritheism has never been the official teaching of any church. It is at best an error which some Christians may have fallen into in their attempts to explain the Trinity. Jerome accused the Greek church of holding a form of tritheism, on the ground that the Greeks referred to the persons of the Trinity as hypostaseis, which he took to mean 'substances'; but he was mistaken in this and had to be corrected. Christians today are sometimes accused of tritheism by Jews, and particularly by Muslims, and also by such *sects as Jehovah's Witnesses, though the accusation has always been strenuously denied and does not in fact reflect any major strand in Christian theology.

Bibliography

J. N. D. Kelly, Jerome (London, 1975), pp. 52–55.

G. L. BRAY

TROELTSCH, ERNST (1865–1923)

A wide-ranging German scholar who worked in the areas of history, theology, philosophy and sociology, Troeltsch taught theology in the Universities of Bonn (1892) and Heidelberg (1894) and philosophy in the University of Berlin (1915). He was the systematic theologian of the *history-of-religions school, and was chiefly influenced by Kant, *Hegel, *Schleiermacher, *Ritschl and *Dilthey. His main concern was to deal with the problem of relativism which arose through the new understanding of history. He and others were convinced of the influence of culture on the formation of religion, but that discovery threatened the normative nature of moral and religious values and the absoluteness of Christianity.

He first approached the problem in 1902 in The Absoluteness of Christianity and the History of Religion and last dealt with it in lectures which he would have delivered in England but for an untimely death. These were subsequently published under the overgeneralized title of Christian Thought: Its History and Application (1923). He both feared and was fascinated by the problem of historical relativism. He tried to resolve the problem by positing that man was irreducibly religious and that religion itself could not be reduced to non-religious factors. He argued for the superiority of the Christian religion on the grounds that it gave the greatest value to human personality through its belief in a personal God, and therefore was of a higher form than Eastern religions, which devalued the human personality. He himself became less convinced of the absoluteness of Christianity as his studies progressed, and he became increasingly uneasy about the validity of Christian missions.

He is best remembered for The Social Teaching of the Christian Churches (1912; ET, 1931), in which, with massive historical insight, he related the churches' ethics to their cultural situation. He developed the idea that Christianity has three basic organizational orientations, namely *church, *sect and *mysticism. His formulations, which were much influenced by the German sociologist Max *Weber, have had a profound effect on the development of the *sociology of religion.

Troeltsch was a significant churchman of a liberal Protestant persuasion and an active politician, being at one stage a government minister for education. His ideas have recently come back into favour, since in many ways they laid the foundations for theologies which believe that man has come of age. For most, however, his answers to the problems of historical relativism are unsatisfactory, not least because they sacrifice much that is essential to Christian faith.

Bibliography

R. H. Bainton, 'Ernst Troeltsch – Thirty Years After', Theology Today 8, 1951, pp. 70–96; J. P. Clayton (ed.), Ernst Troeltsch and the Future of Theology (Cambridge, 1976); B. A. Reist, Toward a Theology of Involvement: The Thought of Ernst Troeltsch (London, 1966).

D. J. TIDBALL

TRUTH

In the OT, 'emet signifies covenant faithfulness and reliability, a moral attribute ascribed both to God (e.g. Ps. 86:15; Jer. 42:5) and to humans (Exod. 18:21). Truth is primarily ascribed to sayings or teachings; both promises and statements are words upon which hearers may rely. Truth is not mere accuracy, eliciting intellectual assent only; it is reliability, worthy of personal commitment and trust.

Theories of truth

Western philosophy has given more attention to truth as a property of statements or propositions than to the biblical sense of truth as an attribute of personal action. According to *Aristotle, truth is a matter of saying of what is that it is, and of saying of what is not that it is not. This intuition that language reflects reality led to the traditional definition of truth as the correspondence of a statement to the state of affairs to which it refers.

While ancient and medieval philosophers were prone to think of truth as a 'metaphysical project' (R. L. Kirkham, Theories of Truth), an attempt to show how language measures up to the world, modern thinkers tended to view truth in terms of the human scientific, existential and aesthetic experience. For many Enlightenment thinkers, objective truth was the desired end product of the scientific method (human critical thinking); *Kierkegaard, however, insisted that truth is subjectivity, by which he meant that it involves passionate commitment (doing the truth) and not intellectual assent only. For *Heidegger and Gadamer, the experience of the work of art became the paradigm for thinking about truth as a disclosure event that enlarges one's self-understanding.

Many contemporary thinkers tend to abandon the metaphysical project of saying how correspondence to reality satisfies the condition for truth, in favour of reducing truth to an 'epistemic project' according to which truth coheres with what we already know or are warranted in asserting. In theology, the coherence theory shows up in non-*foundationalist methods that make truth a function of what coheres with the biblical narrative. George *Lindbeck, for example, views truth as 'intrasystematic' – a matter of what can be absorbed into the narrated world of the biblical text.

Other non-foundationalists prefer a more pragmatic theory, in which what is true is a matter of serving some end (e.g. fostering love of God and neighbour) successfully. By way of contrast, a *postmodern like *Foucault, who follows Nietzsche, treats truth claims with suspicion, viewing them as masks for the will-to-power – disguised forms of political and social oppression.

The correspondence theory, then, though intuitive, is not without its rivals – and its challenges. How, for example, does language correspond to the world? The so-called 'picture theory' of meaning, in which words name objects and sentences represent facts, does not account for the diversity of what speakers and writers actually do with words. Further, the 'traditional Western concept' of truth (P. Hicks, Evangelicals and Truth, p. 10), with its stress on objectivity (truth is outside us), universality (truth is the same for all people) and eternity (truth lasts for ever), fails to address the post-modern emphasis on human situatedness and hence the inaccessibility of objective truth.

The gospel: trinitarian truth

Given the core kerygma ('He is risen'), however, Christians must insist that gospel truth is not only 'according to the Scriptures' but 'corresponding to reality'. The best way forward is to follow critical realists who advocate a minimalist or 'chastened' correspondence account which stipulates that true language or thought is about something real, even though we are not always able to specify the exact nature of the correspondence relation. Some things are true even though they are in principle beyond the reach of sufficient evidence or verifiability (e.g. that God is triune).

'But the Lord is the true God' (Jer. 10:10). Truth is grounded in the God who acts faithfully in accordance with his word. The fourth Gospel identifies *Jesus as the truth (John 14:6): the utterly reliable Word of God. Jesus is the 'first truth', the definitive revelation of God, humanity, and of the evangelical action. Jesus is clue and catalyst to what God is doing to renew all things. The stories of Jesus display the already/not yet reality to which all true statements must ultimately correspond.

Jesus the truth has commissioned his own witnesses. The truth of Scripture is not a function of the genius of its authors, but of its role in the economy of divine *revelation. The biblical texts are creaturely realities set apart by the Spirit for the sake of facilitating saving knowledge of God. The Spirit who inspires the biblical texts also illuminates its readers, transforming them from sinners who suppress the truth in unrighteousness (Rom. 1:21–25) to saints who are set apart as truth's witnesses (John 17:17).

The Trinity sums up what Christians want to say about truth and theology. The Father's Word, Jesus Christ, is the primary truth bearer; the Spirit seals this true Word in our hearts. As inspired testimony to Jesus Christ, the Scriptures become the ground and framework for evaluating all other truth claims. Theology ought therefore to reject the 'dependency thesis' according to which Christian beliefs depend for their truth on some other set of beliefs.

Saving truth: theodramatic correspondence

The truth made known in Jesus Christ through the Spirit of truth (1 John 5:7) goes hand in hand with God's hesed or covenant love (Exod. 34:6). Truth in the context of theology must never be merely theoretical (a correspondence relation), but practical and transformative as well (a covenantal relation). Truth is ultimately not simply something to be believed, but something to be done (the good), appreciated (the beautiful) and adored (the doxological) (see *Worship).

The truth of the gospel – that the Father is making all things new in Christ through the Spirit – is the ultimate truth about God, the world and ourselves. Christians speak, do and suffer the truth whenever their speech and action correspond with and fit into this theodrama.

See also: EPISTEMOLOGY; PHILOSOPHY AND THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

W. Alston, A Realist Conception of Truth (Ithaca, 1996); D. K. Clark, To Know and Love God: Method for Theology (Wheaton, 2003); P. Hicks, Evangelicals and Truth (Leicester, 1998); R. L. Kirkham, Theories of Truth: A Critical Introduction (Cambridge, 1995); A. Köstenberger (ed.), Whatever Happened to Truth? (Wheaton, 2005); B. Marshall, Trinity and Truth (Cambridge, 2000); G. Sumner, The First and the Last: The Claim of Jesus Christ and the Claims of Other Religious Traditions (Grand Rapids, 2004); K. J. Vanhoozer, 'The Trials of Truth', in K. J. Vanhoozer, First Theology (Downers Grove, 2002).

K. J. VANHOOZER

TÜBINGEN SCHOOL

Tübingen is a university town in Württemberg, south Germany. The name 'Tübingen School' refers to a small group of NT scholars who, in the middle years of the nineteenth century, were associated with Ferdinand Christian Baur (1792–1860), professor of theology at the university. Prominent members of the school were Eduard Zeller (1814–1908), Baur's son-in-law, and Albert Schwegler (1819–57). More loosely attached were Albrecht *Ritschl, Adolf Hilgenfeld (1823–1907) and Gustav Volkmar (1809–93).

Although Baur is recognized as head of the school, the significance of the name 'Tübingen' begins with David *Strauss' Life of Jesus, for it was its appearance in 1835 which caused the name 'Tübingen' to become almost synonymous with 'unbelief'. Henceforward, the investigations into the NT by Baur and his disciples were regarded with extreme scepticism by the orthodox, since the non-miraculous theological position of Strauss was maintained by the entire school. 'With a miracle,' wrote Baur, 'all explanation and understanding ceases.' This non-miraculous viewpoint may be called the Tübingen theological perspective. From this presupposition, there began a concentrated investigation into the authorship and dating of all the books in the NT.

Within this overruling theological perspective there was a more limited *historical perspective, first developed by Baur during the 1830s. This envisaged the history of the early church as a struggle between two rival parties – the Jewish Christian party led by Peter, and the Gentile Christian led by Paul. For a century these two parties stood over against each other in bitter hostility, and only towards the end of the second century did they become reconciled in a higher irenic and mediating movement in which both were ultimately absorbed. In accordance with this historical perspective, all the NT books were now assessed in order to ascertain their 'tendency' (Tendenz) – whether Petrine, Pauline or mediating. Once their tendency had been established, their authorship and dating were more accurately determined by fitting the books into the historical framework which Baur had already worked out. Only five books of the NT were regarded as authentic – Romans, 1 and 2 Corinthians, Galatians and the Apocalypse of John. All other books were ascribed to unknown hands, mostly in the second century.

The high point of the school was reached in 1846 with Schwegler's two-volume work, The Post-Apostolic Age, which provided a comprehensive portrayal of the school's position. But from the following year the school slowly began to break up, and with Baur's death in 1860 it may be said to have reached its end. Baur's historical perspective gradually revealed itself as untenable; the historical framework into which he fitted his tendencies was based in part on a misunderstanding of the historical evidence. The Clementine Homilies, in which Baur perceived a caricature of the apostle Paul in the person of Simon the magician, were composed later (third or fourth century) than Baur's second-century estimate, and did not portray Paul in disguise. The investigation of the Ignatian letters (see *Apostolic Fathers) by Theodor Zahn and J. B. Lightfoot in the 1870s drove the final nail into the Tübingen coffin, in that these letters, written by Ignatius in the early second century, revealed no trace of the bitter controversy which Baur had postulated as raging between Jewish and Gentile Christians in Ignatius' day. Other evidence also disproved the late dating which Baur had assigned to the NT books.

In its influence on NT scholarship the Tübingen School was undoubtedly the most important movement in nineteenth-century theology, in that non-miraculous presuppositions constituted the basis of its methodology. Prior to 1835, biblical scholarship had examined historical and theological questions under the implicit presupposition of the authenticity and general veracity of the biblical records. With Strauss that theological perspective was completely overturned, in that no miracle was henceforth to be admitted. Christianity in its origin and development was to be regarded as completely *un*supernatural. With Baur this same position was maintained – a non-supernatural theological and historical perspective determined all biblical interpretation.

Bibliography

H. Harris, The Tübingen School (Oxford, repr. 1990 [1975]); P. C. Hodgson, The Formation of Historical Theology (New York, 1966); A. E. McGrath, The Making of Modern German Christology (Oxford, 1986); R. Morgan, 'Ferdinand Christian Baur', in N. Smart et al. (eds.), Nineteenth-Century Religious Thought in the West (Cambridge, 1985).

H. HARRIS

TURRETIN, FRANCIS (1623–87)

François Turretini was one of the most important Reformed systematic theologians of post-Reformation *Protestant orthodoxy. His influence on subsequent *Reformed theology has been considerable, although he is little known in contemporary theological circles.

Turretin was born to a wealthy mercantile family that originated in Lucca, Italy, but had fled the Inquisition and settled in Switzerland. Francis was educated in Geneva and visited intellectual centres in the Netherlands and France. He returned to Geneva to become pastor of the Italian congregation in 1648 and was appointed Professor of Theology at the Academy in 1653, having turned down the chair in philosophy in 1650. He retained both positions until his death.

Turretin wrote a number of controversial works, and was involved in the composition of the Formula Consensus Helvetica of 1675, along with John Henry Heidegger. Aside from this, his most enduring theological achievement is his Institutes of Elenctic Theology. This was the product of his encyclopaedic knowledge of the history of Christian doctrine, as well as deep engagement with the theological and philosophical currents of his own age, making this work one of the most important dogmatic systems of the period. It is a didactic and at times polemical work, being an instance of the 'school method' practised by medieval and post-Reformation divines. This means each locus is cast in a question-answer format, covering each topic in a comprehensive, logical manner. Turretin's work has suffered at the hands of some nineteenth- and twentieth-century theologians, for whom post-Reformation Reformed theology was an arid "scholasticism", in contrast to *Reformation thought. More recent scholarship has overturned this mistaken account of the development of Reformed theology. One of the most important distinctions made in this literature is between the scholastic (i.e. elenctic) method dogmatists like Turretin appropriated from medieval thinkers, and the content of that theology, which is arguably a legitimate development from the Reformation theology of Calvin.

Turretin's Institutes was recognized as a major achievement in Europe. But it was in the USA that it had its most enduring impact. His Institutes was adopted as a textbook by *Princeton Theological Seminary where Charles *Hodge commissioned an English translation, carried out by the Princeton classicist, George Musgrave Giger. This work forms the basis of the current English translation of Turretin's opus.

Bibliography

Works: Institutes of Elenctic Theology, 3 vols., tr. G. M. Giger, ed. J. T. Dennison, Jr (Phillipsburg, 1992–1997); The Atonement of Christ, tr. J. R. Wilson (Grand Rapids, 1978 [1859]).

Studies: W. J. van Asselt, Introduction to Reformed Scholasticism (Grand Rapids, 2011); W. J. van Asselt, J. M. Bac and R. T. de Velde (eds.), Reformed Thought on Freedom: The Concept of Free Choice in Early Modern Reformed Theology (Grand Rapids, 2010); O. D. Crisp, 'Francis Turretin on the Necessity of the Incarnation', in Crisp, Retrieving Doctrine: Essays in Reformed Theology (Downers Grove, 2011), pp. 69–91; J. T. Dennison, Jr, 'The Twilight of Scholasticism: Francis Turretin at the Dawn of the Enlightenment', in C. R. Trueman and R. S. Clark (eds.), Protestant Scholasticism: Essays in Reassessment (Carlisle, 1999), pp. 244–255; P. Helm, "'Structural Indifference" and Compatibilism in Reformed Orthodoxy', Journal of Reformed Theology 5.2, 2011, pp. 184–205; R. A. Muller, ‘Scholasticism Protestant and Catholic: Francis Turretin on the Object and Principles of Theology’, Church History 55, 1986, pp. 193–205; S. Rehnman, ‘Alleged Rationalism: Francis Turretin on Reason’, CTJ 37, 2002, pp. 255–269; idem, ‘Theistic Metaphysics and Biblical Exegesis: Francis Turretin on the Concept of God’, Religious Studies 38, 2002, pp. 167–186; P. Wallace, ‘The Doctrine of the Covenant in the Elenctic Theology of Francis Turretin’, Mid-America Journal of Theology 13, 2002, pp. 143–179.

O. D. CRISP

TYCONIUS, see DONATISM

TYNDALE, WILLIAM, see REFORMERS, ENGLISH

TYPOLOGY, see HERMENEUTICS

ULTRAMONTANISM, see PAPACY

UNDERHILL, EVELYN (1875–1941)

Evelyn Underhill was in private life Mrs Hubert Stuart Moore. She was an English *Anglo-Catholic expositor of mysticism (see *Mystical theology) and Christian *spirituality. In her copious writings, as in her own Christian pilgrimage, she wrestled with the problem of relating personal spiritual experience (which, she believed, underlies every living religion) to the formal theology of the church. Her classic analytical survey Mysticism (London, ¹²1930 [1911]) presented Christian doctrines as symbolic maps or diagrams of subjective encounters, both individual and corporate, with ‘ultimate reality’; but under the influence of the Roman Catholic theologian Baron Friedrich von *Hügel she came to see these doctrines as expressing objective truth about God’s historical and ongoing interaction with his creation, and as thereby holding together the experiential, biblical, liturgical and sacramental channels of divine *revelation to which they provide an interpretative key. This position was perhaps most clearly articulated in Man and the Supernatural (London, 1927) and The School of Charity: Meditations on the Christian Creed (London, 1934), but was also reflected in many other writings of her later years, which culminated in the magisterial study Worship (London, 1936). Her thesis that mystical experience and orthodox Christian theology are mutually complementary, together with her tireless ministry as a retreat conductor, spiritual counsellor, religious journalist, public speaker and broadcaster, contributed significantly to the revival of widespread British interest in the interior life of faith during the first half of the twentieth century.

Bibliography

C. J. R. Armstrong, Evelyn Underhill (Oxford, 1975); L. Barkway, ‘Evelyn Underhill in Her Writings’, in L. Menzies (ed.), Collected Papers of Evelyn Underhill (London, 1946), repr. in E. Underhill, The Mount of Purification (London, 1960); A. Callahan, Evelyn Underhill: Spirituality for Daily Living (Lanham, 1997); M. Cropper, Evelyn Underhill (London, 1958); D. Greene, Evelyn Underhill: Artist of the Infinite Life (Notre Dame, 1998); C. Williams (ed.), The Letters of Evelyn Underhill (London, 1943).

S. J. SMALLEY

UNIFICATION CHURCH, see SECTS

UNION WITH CHRIST

An ongoing task facing Christian reflection is to conceive how the life, death and resurrection of *Jesus can be of benefit to those who believe. How are his spiritual achievements, his dramatic history and his unique status able to transform the lives and standing before God of those who are temporally, geographically and culturally far removed from him? The church’s various attempts to respond to these questions are brought together under the doctrine of ‘union with Christ’.

Incarnational union

A widespread view among the Fathers of the early church that continues to be upheld in the *Eastern Orthodox tradition is that the *incarnation, the act of the eternal Son of God whereby he took human nature to himself, is not merely the foundation of our salvation, but is a constituent element of it. The incarnation is viewed as salvific in and of itself. The idea is that in *Christ God became one with us in order to make us one with him; he stooped to take our nature, in order that we might be restored and so become partakers of his divine nature. The nature which he assumed to himself he healed from its tendency towards sin and decay. This understanding of the divine Word's union with human nature as that which, at least in part, effects our *salvation is dependent on the notion that 'human nature' has some form of corporate reality apart from its particularization in individual humans. It is held that when the Son of God became incarnate, human nature was itself transformed, and all humans as participants in that nature potentially share in the renewal of their being. Some, however, find it difficult to conceive how the incarnate Christ can be both a particular human being and also the realization of human nature in general. Others have a concern that this theory interprets Jesus' birth, rather than his life, death and resurrection, as central to his saving ministry and so appears to run counter to the emphasis of the NT authors on the salvific centrality of the Easter events. An incarnational union is sometimes spoken of as a 'physical' theory of the *atonement in that it gives priority to matters of substance and being rather than those of obedience and faith in its understanding of human salvation.

United by faith

The Protestant emphasis on *faith as that which unites us to Christ owes much to the German Reformer Martin *Luther. Luther argued that humans have no ability of themselves to do anything of value to achieve salvation. In fact they no longer have the freedom to do anything at all that is truly good. Consequently, their salvation must come completely from Christ and not from any human endeavour. The individual's recognition of their inability and of Christ's sufficiency is the impetus for the exercise of faith. On the one hand, the human soul is full of *sin, death and damnation. On the other, Jesus Christ is full of *grace, life and salvation. Faith is that which unites the soul with Christ as a bride is united with her bridegroom. Luther argued: 'Let faith come between the soul and Christ and sins, death and damnation will be Christ's, while grace, life and salvation will be the soul's; for if Christ is a bridegroom, he must take upon himself the things which are his bride's and bestow upon her the things that are his' (Selections from His Writings, p. 60). This theory of a 'double imputation' was formative in the development of the Lutheran, and so Protestant, view of *justification. The difficulty with it, for some, is that it suggests that human faith is the bond that binds the believer to Christ, and so, contrary to Luther's original intention, the believer's union with Christ is held to depend on an unreliable human faculty.

Covenantal union

The *Reformed tradition sought to explain the church's union with Christ from the perspective of *covenant, that is, the divine institution of mutual obligations between God and humankind. The covenant provides the framework for the exercise of human faith, *love and obedience within the secure divine commitment to forgive, transform and safeguard his people. Consequently, a covenantal union understands Christians to be united with God through Christ in a relationship grounded on the divine promises that have their foundation in Christ's mediatory work. Within the general covenant character of God's dealings with humankind, one aspect of Paul's teaching, sometimes called federal union, has been especially noted and developed within later Reformed tradition. The way in which men and women are dealt with by God 'in Christ' is seen to parallel his dealings with humankind 'in *Adam'. God deals with 'the many' through a representative person, or 'federal head', in the one case imputing Adam's sin to his descendants, in the other, Christ's *obedience and *atonement to his followers, with all that flows from that. Being united to Christ is understood then as participation in this covenantal union with him as our 'federal head'. The covenant has its ultimate foundation in the eternal decision of God to be gracious rather than in the temporal response of the believer to the gospel. This means that the concept of grace or election (see *Predestination) has priority over the human act of faith, which is itself viewed as a gift of grace. Some are concerned that this suggests an arbitrariness in God's dealings with humankind.

Sacramental union

The *Catholic tradition, in particular, has laid stress on the *sacraments as the means of initiating and continuing union with Christ. Christian incorporation into Christ, by which one becomes a member of his body, is through *baptism as the outward sacramental rite of initiation coupled with repentance and faith in Jesus Christ as the inner means of appropriation. Baptism in Christ's name unites the baptized with Jesus Christ, especially with his death, burial and resurrection. Similarly, the *Eucharist or Holy Communion, as the covenant rite or sacrament of continuance in Christ and his body, enables Christians to nurture, deepen and strengthen their relationship or union with Christ and with one another, as they truly partake of Jesus through the elements of wine and bread. Communion focuses on Christ's death as the self-sacrificing event of divine reconciliation and the source of a Christian's new life in him. Sacramental union is closely related structurally to a union of faith. Historically, however, the nature of the relation between the agency of the sacraments and that of saving faith in uniting us to Christ has been vigorously contested, and the interpretation of both baptism and Holy Communion has been the cause of much hostility and division among the various branches of the church.

Experiential union

The Son of God became human, shared in our condition and lived a life that is the paradigm or primary example for all Christians. However, nearly all the traditions have emphasized that it is the privilege of believers not merely to follow him but to actually participate in Jesus' life, death and *resurrection. Union with Christ is understood to mean that we share through baptism in his death so that the dominance of sin should no longer be determinative of our own individual experience. It also means that the believer participates in Christ's resurrection, not simply at the end of the age, but during this present life through the empowerment of the *Spirit. Christians share Jesus' status, relationship and privileges as sons and daughters of God and are called to suffer with him, to pass through physical death to ultimate physical resurrection and so reign with him in glory. His eternal inheritance as man is also theirs. En route to that goal all Christians are called into progressive conformity to his *image, continually renewing and transforming their characters into God's likeness by the power of his Holy Spirit and by the application of God's revealed will to every aspect of their lives. In short, it is through union with Christ that Christians are *sanctified or made to be holy (see *Christian life).

Spiritual or mystical union

The final perspective on union with Christ, stressed particularly by the *mystical, *pietist and *charismatic traditions, is that the Christian is united to Christ in his or her conscious experience. This is sometimes called 'mystical union', and is rooted in the mystery of the encounter of the spirit of man and the Spirit of God or of Christ, often using the analogy of a bride and her groom. It originates in a new birth brought about within a person by the Holy Spirit, and centres on the hidden life of *prayer, meditation, contemplation and *worship. The object of these spiritual disciplines is to deepen one's knowledge of the Lord and one's love-relationship with him. It requires the submission of the whole of one's life to him in trust and obedience, knowing that such a submission of love in response to love is the route to our greatest possible fulfilment. It is believed that those fully renewed in God's image will enjoy unfettered and unclouded fellowship with him, freed from every delusion of independence which would block the free flow of pure love, truth, trust, cooperative obedience and delight between themselves, their Creator and the other creatures. Some are concerned that such an emphasis on personal devotion can be idealistic and inward-looking and tends to undermine the calling for Christians in humility and brokenness to serve God in the world.

Informed by the perspectives of these various traditions we could say that our union with Christ has its foundations in the loving purpose of a covenanting God; is established by the saving ministry of his incarnate Son; is entered into through the outward (sacramental) response of an inner trusting faith in the promises of the gospel; sanctifies us by transforming us into the likeness of Jesus as the Spirit baptizes us into his life and privileges; and introduces us to an intimate loving relationship with Christ, and through him to the Father, which we shall experience through time and eternity.

Bibliography

J. Dillenberger (ed.), Martin Luther: Selections from His Writings (New York, 1961); Gregory of Nazianzen, Epistle to Cledonius the Priest against Apollinarius (The Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers, second series, vol. 7); M. Horton, God of Promise: Introducing Covenant Theology (Grand Rapids, 2006); A. Murray, Abide in Christ (New Kensington, 2002); J. Murray, Redemption Accomplished and Applied (London, 1961); J. I. Packer, Knowing God (London, 1975); A. J. Spence, The Promise of Peace: A Unified Theory of Atonement (London, 2006).

A. J. SPENCE

UNIQUENESS OF CHRIST

The contemporary questions about the uniqueness of Jesus Christ are: 'In what is he claimed to be unique?' and 'Is that claim valid?' In one sense, everything and everyone is unique. So how has the church advanced the claim that *Jesus is unique?

The NT narrative acknowledges that Jesus was not alone in being thought to be a miracle worker or a messiah. Other miracle workers and messiahs had appeared. He was not alone in being thought to be divine – there were many gods and lords in the Romano-Greek world. However, the NT also makes clear that Jesus made the outright claim in public that he was unique (John 14:6), and others made the claim about him based on what he said and did (Acts 4:12; 17:31). Though there were many gods and lords, Jesus was the Lord of lords and King of kings (1 Cor. 8:5–6; Rev. 17:14).

The claims made for the uniqueness of Jesus centred mainly on his death and resurrection.

He was not just any crucified malefactor. He claimed to be in person the anointed bringer of God's hoped-for *kingdom, the renewal of humankind and all creation according to the promises of the OT (Matt. 1:22–23; 2:5–6). His healing miracles were witness to this (Luke 7:22; cf. Isa. 35:1–6).

His death on a *cross appeared to wipe out all these claims. How could Jesus be messiah if he himself died under God's curse? How could he have brought God's kingdom of eternal life if he ended up dead? The *resurrection was the vindication of his claim to have brought the kingdom of God active in power into this world. If Jesus had overcome death, then the kingdom was here in power.

The NT gives evidence of this present power of the kingdom of God through the work of the *Holy Spirit in the community formed by faith in Jesus as the Christ. This power was particularly evident in bringing people together in this community across the accepted boundaries of hostility in society: race, class and gender (Gal. 3:28; Eph. 2:15–16). This community experienced and pointed to the unity of all things in Jesus who created them (Col. 1:20).

This posed a further question. Since death is for *sin, and Jesus did not die for his own sin, since death could not hold him, for whose sins had he died? The answer from the Scriptures was for the sins of the whole world.

Jesus' *atoning death for sinful humanity is unique in world religions in that sinful humanity is held to be saved not by any works of righteousness in response to his example, but by faith in his death and resurrection.

Jesus' role was therefore clear: his death and resurrection had achieved *salvation from sin and the presence of the kingdom. The completion of salvation would be when Jesus returned with the glory of God to establish the kingdom openly and fully, recognized by all (1 Thess. 4:16–17; Phil. 2:10–11) (see *Eschatology).

But the early church faced a problem as it expanded beyond Palestine. In the Greek culture, God could not be said to suffer. Since Jesus suffered, he must in some way be less than God. This problem was addressed from the point of view of salvation. The straightforward claim was made that only God could save humankind, no-one else. So to save us, Jesus had to be God. But to save us, and not others than us, Jesus also had to be like us, a human being. The Christian creeds upheld the biblical witness to Jesus' uniqueness by defending both his true deity and his true humanity. This claim to full divinity and full humanity in one person is a claim unique to Christianity (see *Christology).

How then is the claim that Jesus is unique validated? This claim has always been contested. The NT is full of controversy about Jesus. It calls for controversy, proclamation, contending for and defence of the faith. Religion is always a contested area. The church's claims that Jesus is unique have always been against the background of those who would deny that Jesus was King of kings and Lord of lords.

Therefore Jesus' own actions as a miracle worker, or teachings as a prophet, or statements of his relationship with his Father, do not of themselves establish his uniqueness. People have questioned the possibility of miracle, of one person being God and man, and of God restricting his universality to one particular *revelation. In the religious climate of the twenty-first century, people make many claims for religious leaders who have carried out miracles, given spiritual teaching and have a special relationship with God. The claim for Jesus' uniqueness is then held to be a claim about the unique position he is given in the lives of his followers, not about his unique position for all humanity.

But the full nature of the biblical and Christian claim for Jesus is unparalleled for any other person. How then is the claim validated in twenty-first-century religious culture that Jesus alone brings salvation and is alone in being able to be God to save us and to save humanity? The truth of this claim is to be established by whether it coheres with what is known to be true on other grounds. Does it fit with the evidence and does it fit with experience?

The evidence centres on Jesus' sinless life and character, the factual reality of his death and the evidence for his bodily resurrection. That evidence is consistent with the claim that God was in Jesus reconciling the world to himself, that Jesus was God bearing the world's rebellion against him and that Jesus rose from the dead victorious over the forces of evil and death. If the dead body of Jesus is discovered, then those claims fall to the ground as flying in the face of the evidence. The evidence is consistent with, but does not prove, the claims.

Do the claims fit with experience? For many, the claims of Jesus fit with their own personal experience of life – whether it is one of sin, oppression, need for identity, purpose and fulfilment, forgiveness from God or others, addictions, healing or hopelessness. It is here that many hundreds of millions have found Jesus to be the one who enabled them to experience their potential as the image of God.

But these claims are not only verifiable in personal experience.

Historically, Christian faith has grown on the margins of society. In the NT, Jesus' ministry was in Galilee. After the fall of the Roman Empire, Christian faith continued on the edges of Europe in its northern islands. In the twentieth and twenty-first centuries, the number of Christians in Africa grew from 10 million to over 360 million. The centre of gravity of Christians is among the poor. This experience fits with the claim of the Bible that God delivers, protects and brings good news to the poor, and that the same God is suspicious of the actions and agendas of the rich and powerful.

The claim for the uniqueness of Jesus is that he is the unique revelation of the action of the God of the Bible, who is the God who delivered Hebrew slaves from Egypt and brought good news to the poor in Jesus (see *Gospel). Entirely consistent with this action is the action of those who in the name of Jesus fought for the freedom of slaves in the nineteenth century. He is the unique revelation of the God who reconciles all things to himself. Entirely consistent with this is the experience that in the Roman Empire the Christian faith was the only one open to people of all races and position.

This way of presenting the claims of Jesus is especially relevant today in a world which is particularly aware of the plight of the *poor and the division between the rich and the poor, which in Christian terms is an expression of human sin. Who can save people from this sin and its effects? To whom are poor people turning to find their salvation? And who is turning the hearts and the minds of the non-poor to consider the poor? By saying that his message and activity was good news to the poor, Jesus was tying his claims to verifiable evaluation. That verification depended on the obedience and actions of his followers.

Bibliography

Michael Nazir-Ali, The Unique and Universal Christ (Paternoster 2008).

C. M. N. SUGDEN

UNITARIANISM

Though Unitarians reject *creeds and have a wide spectrum of beliefs, they stress the oneness of God and deny the divinity of Jesus Christ and the Holy Spirit. They are committed to freedom, reason and tolerance as the context essential to a religion that is truly personal and social. Organized ecclesiastically only since the Reformation, they have some precursors such as the *Monarchians and *Arians.

Renewed attention to the literal meaning of the Scriptures led scholars such as Juan de *Valdés, Bernardino *Ochino and Michael Servetus (1511–53) to claim that *trinitarian theology had little biblical foundation. Servetus believed that purging Christianity of such corruptions would complete the restitution of primitive Christianity and hasten the conversion of Jews and Muslims. His views were widely rejected, but his execution in Geneva did nothing to prevent other radicals raising similar issues in Hungary and Poland, where anti-trinitarian ideas were widely held.

In Holland and England, the influence of *Socinianism and reaction against Calvinist orthodoxy led to important questions being raised about the relation of Scripture and dogma by such distinguished thinkers as Grotius and John Milton (1608–74). Unitarian ideas were taught by John Biddle (1616–62), but he was severely dealt with by the authorities and died in prison. His concern for purifying doctrine of unbiblical additions went with deep concern for holiness of life. This seriousness was an abiding note of the Unitarian way.

Convictions about the credibility of the doctrine of the Trinity were weakened as many dissenters rejected subscription to creeds and *confessions as unscriptural. In the Church of England, many moved to a loosely 'Arian' position, because, like Samuel Clarke (1675–1729), they could find no scriptural justification for the doctrine of the Trinity. While denial of the Trinity was an offence until 1813, many simply ceased to preach and teach what they did not believe, rather than risk the penalties of public denial. Many Presbyterian congregations in England and Ireland moved steadily away from Westminster orthodoxy (see *Westminster Confession) into a less dogmatic, more simply biblical Christianity. Richard Price (1723–91) and Joseph Priestley (1733–1804) rejected foundation doctrines such as the divinity of Christ and the inspiration of Scripture. That opened up entrance to new philosophical, scientific and religious ideas, where the authority of reason and experience was given increasing weight.

A different tributary of Unitarianism came from Theophilus Lindsey (1723–1808), who resigned from the Church of England because of his anxieties about worship being corrupted by pagan philosophical additions. He drew up a new liturgy for his followers, and came to believe that the narratives of Jesus' birth were legendary and that Jesus was fully and solely human. For these early Unitarians, worship was to be addressed only to the Father. They revered Jesus and underlined his religious authority, but argued that correct understanding of the Scriptures led to a necessary distinction between the Father and Jesus in worship.

As they became more aware of German biblical criticism, their use of Scripture as authoritative changed. They had to search for a new basis for religious authority. Thomas Belsham (1750–1825) organized the first general Unitarian Society in 1791 and specifically excluded Arians. From this time onwards the term 'Unitarian' developed a more particular ecclesiastical meaning in Britain, and more slowly, in the USA, as well as indicating a wide range of theological positions. In England there were two major strands of thinking. One stressed human religion rather than God's reality and was politically radical. The other had mystical tendencies and emphasized the intrinsically divine character of Christianity. James Martineau (1805–1900) was especially important in this area; he did much to deepen the theology and spirituality of Unitarian congregations. Reason's place was one of the distinctive features of Unitarianism by the end of the nineteenth century. Unitarians found it hard to balance generous fellowship and definite teaching. They were deeply involved in parliamentary and civic reform, social welfare, education and intellectual life, but in the twentieth century their religious influence steadily waned with the decline of the free churches. Sustaining a distinctive religious community without boundaries has proved an almost impossible task.

Similar trends occurred in the USA, where many *Congregational churches moved into a non-dogmatic Arian position, rejecting Calvinistic emphases on original sin, atonement and predestination in favour of convictions about the perfectibility of humankind. The liberalizers won control of Harvard early in the nineteenth century, and, with leaders like William Ellery Channing (1780–1842), who sought to free Christianity from past corruptions so it could perfect human nature, the movement gathered momentum. More radical leaders such as Theodore Parker (1810–60), who shocked conservative Unitarians by his insistence that Christianity did not depend on the historical existence of Jesus, but on the truth of his teaching, had a powerful influence.

Unitarian views seemed to many educated Americans the growing edge of Protestantism. Convictions about the unipersonality of God were only a part of the movement's appeal. Openness to new knowledge and commitment to social reform helped to Christianize post-revolutionary and scientific optimism in the USA, as well as providing a sympathetic approach to other religions. Their emphasis on Jesus' humanity, and their rejection of traditional soteriology and worship, led to Unitarianism becoming a liberal religion of self-improvement and benevolence, free from credal and ecclesiastical boundaries.

Its influence declined in the twentieth century, as the theistic and biblical heritage has become less formative, and it became shaped more and more by the American social context. In an increasingly illiberal and pessimistic world, the varied Unitarian message seems increasingly limited culturally. The lack of denominational identity in the Unitarian Universalist Association, formed in 1961, may make survival difficult, for Unitarians have never displayed a strong missionary spirit. Nevertheless, they have played a significant role in the *liberalization of Protestant orthodoxies by their approach to revelation, their emphasis on reason and experience, their passion for freedom of theological enquiry and their distrust of human creeds and organization as an adequate context for the best insights of Jesus.

Bibliography

C. G. Bolam et al., The English Presbyterians from Elizabethan Puritanism to Modern Unitarianism (London, 1968); H. McLachlan, The Unitarian Movement (London, 1934); E. M. Wilbur, A History of Unitarianism, 2 vols. (Cambridge, 1946–52); C. Wright, The Liberal Christians (Boston, 1970).

I. BREWARD

UNIVERSALISM

The word ‘universalism’ has been used in two senses in Christian theology. Of these, the first is generally accepted, and the second usually rejected, in orthodox thinking.

In reference to biblical thought, ‘universalism’ frequently denotes the view, common to OT and NT that the purposes of God are not limited to any one nation or race, but extend worldwide. Based on *monotheism, this idea comes to expression in the worldwide scope of the promises to Abraham (Gen. 12:3, etc.), in the welcome afforded to those coming into the people of God from other nations (Rahab, Ruth, etc.), and above all in the frequent prophetic vision of the nations of the world coming within the scope of that salvation planned by God for his people. This last takes two forms in particular: the Gentiles will come and worship Israel’s God on Mount Zion (Isa. 2:1–5, etc.); salvation will extend beyond the borders of Israel, out into the pagan world (Mal. 1:11, 14, etc.). In the NT this belief in the worldwide scope of salvation comes to expression in the mission to the Gentiles, which Paul bases explicitly on monotheism itself (Rom. 3:27–30; 10:12–13), understood in the light of Christ and the Spirit. The emphasis here is that people from every nation, race, tribe, language (and indeed every moral background) are welcome in the kingdom of God; there is ‘neither Jew nor Greek, slave nor free, male or female, for you are all one in Christ Jesus’ (Gal. 3:28). The one God has one family. This doctrine has come under attack since the Second World War from those who maintain that God has two *covenants, one for Jews and one (the Christian one) for everybody else (see *Judaism and Christianity), but this position has no basis in Scripture.

The second use of the word denotes the belief that all human beings, without exception, will eventually attain salvation. This belief has taken various forms:

(1) In the patristic period it was maintained by *Origen and others, with varying degrees of certainty, that God would eventually restore the entire created order, including Satan himself, to a perfect state (hence the Gk apokatastasis, ‘restoration’, is often used to designate this belief). Though this can claim some apparent biblical foundation (e.g. Col. 1:18–20), it was seen to be more Platonic than biblical, and was condemned at the Council of Constantinople in 553.

(2) The powerful influence of *Augustine ensured that this form of universalism did not regain popularity until the *Reformation, when it was embraced by some of the extreme Radical Reformers (see *Reformation, Radical), being condemned again in ch. 17 of the *Augsburg Confession.

(3) Contemporary universalism stems largely from *Schleiermacher (with some predecessors in the seventeenth century). He argued that the sovereign love of God is bound to save all eventually, and that heaven would be spoilt if its inhabitants were forced to witness the eternal sufferings of the damned. Nineteenth-century English theology debated this topic with some acrimony. Many theologians broke away from the traditional doctrine of hell without forming one consistent alternative, some opting for ‘conditional immortality’, which avoids Schleiermacher’s second argument, others for the idea of a second chance after death, which allows for his first. The notion of continued spiritual growth and development, which has influenced much contemporary universalism, has a good deal in common with the evolutionism of the *Romantic movement. Some universalist groups founded new churches in the nineteenth century, some of whose members later (1961) joined with *Unitarian groups.

(4) In the twentieth century universalism spread further, partly due to a relaxing of biblical authority. Although, strictly speaking, neither *Barth nor *Brunner taught universalism proper, both held it to be a possibility for which one might hold out hope. *Tillich regarded hell as a symbol which had lost its character of 'eternal damnation'. J. *Hick argued that only universalism makes sense of worldwide *suffering and prevents Christianity from becoming triumphalistic in its attitude to other faiths. In some modern Roman Catholic theology the adherents of such faiths are regarded as '*anonymous Christians' (*Rahner), either despite the fact that they are in error or because their religions are really disguised versions of the truth. In modern universalism, appeal is often made to the apparent teaching of such passages as Rom. 11:32, held to be in tension with passages predicting *judgment, and recourse is often had to the idea of the limitless ages of future time, after death, during which the love of God will eventually draw all people freely to accept the proffered salvation. In writers such as Hick the doctrine is allied to a considerable relativizing of traditional Christian claims about, e.g. the divinity of Christ. In writers such as J. *Moltmann, universalism is held together with a doctrine of the Trinity and the deity and humanity of Christ. In recent debate an attempt has been made to argue for universalism within an evangelical theology, giving full weight to the authority of Scripture.

Arguments which can be marshalled against this second kind of universalism are as follows:

(1) The biblical evidence for the certainty of future judgment and condemnation of at least some is extremely strong, strong enough to function as a warning even for professing Christians (1 Cor. 3:12–15; 10:12), and the texts commonly held to teach universalism can be shown to admit of other, more probable, explanations. There is no biblical warrant for the idea of a 'second chance' after death.

(2) The second sort of universalism undercuts the first (which is clearly scriptural), in that it makes Christianity one way, one family, among many. This is to compromise *Christology, the doctrine of the *Holy Spirit, and monotheism itself (by providing at best a radically different alternative to biblical monotheism, seeing all the gods worshipped in the world, including the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, the Father of Jesus, as different manifestations of the one god who lies behind all, a view which has some echoes at least of the sin of the golden calf [Exod. 32:4]).

(3) The responsibility of human beings to choose to obey their Creator God is seriously undercut by universalism. (This is more than simply to say that universalism cuts the nerve of *evangelism and moral exhortation, though that can also be true.) A doctrine of hell can thus be part of an affirmation of God's intention to let his human creatures exercise their human responsibility. Orthodox Christianity need not lapse into the *dualism, rightly rejected in universalism, of seeing hell as a kind of concentration camp in the middle of heaven. To choose that which is not God is to choose that which distorts, fragments and ultimately destroys genuine humanity itself.

(4) Universalism, particularly the modern variety, tends to reduce the seriousness of *sin. In a world which continues to witness moral evil of frightening proportions and dimensions, a failure to condemn absolutely would be evidence of basic moral blindness.

(5) Although a biblical theology does not forbid the notion that some may worship the true God, and genuinely serve him, without ever hearing the message of the gospel (so, according to some, Rom. 2:14–16), it does not encourage the idea that there will be a large company of such people.

See also: CHRISTIANITY AND OTHER RELIGIONS; ESCHATOLOGY.

Bibliography

R. Bauckham, N. T. Wright et al., in Them 4:2, 1979, pp. 48–69; N. M. de S. Cameron (ed.), Universalism and the Doctrine of Hell (Carlisle and Grand Rapids, 1992); J. Hick, Evil and the God of Love (London, ²1977); idem, God and the Universe of Faiths (London, ²1977); idem, Death and Eternal Life (London, 1976); C. S. Lewis, The Problem of Pain (London, 1940); R. Parry and C. Partridge, Universal Salvation? The Current Debate (Carlisle, 2003); J. A. T. Robinson, In The End, God (London, ²1968); G. Rowell, Hell and the Victorians (Oxford, 1974); D. P. Walker, The Decline of Hell

(London, 1964); N. T. Wright, Surprised by Hope (London, 2007), ch. 11.

N. T. WRIGHT

URSINUS, ZACHARIAS (1534–83)

Zacharias Ursinus was a Silesian Reformed theologian. Born into a Lutheran home, he studied with *Melancthon in Wittenberg (1550–7) before taking a teaching post in his home town of Breslau (1558–60). During a year of study with Peter Martyr *Vermigli in Zurich (1560–1), he gradually moved into the *Reformed theological orbit. In 1561 he accepted an invitation to become rector of the Sapience College (seminary) in Heidelberg and later served also as Professor of Dogmatics at the University of Heidelberg (1562–8). Forced to flee in 1577 when the city reverted to Lutheranism, he spent the remainder of his life teaching at the Casimirianum, a Calvinist university in nearby Neustadt.

Ursinus is best known as the primary author of the *Heidelberg Catechism (1563), a consensus confession that sought to unify the diverse theological parties in the German Palatinate. He was also an important early Reformed covenant theologian, the first ever to use *covenant as the organizing theme in a system of theology and to speak of a pre-fall ‘covenant of creation’ (Summa Theologiae, 1562). Finally, he contributed in a significant way to the rise of Reformed orthodoxy, synthesizing the theology of second-generation Reformers like *Calvin and *Bullinger with the established methods of *scholasticism.

Bibliography

L. D. Bierma et al., An Introduction to the Heidelberg Catechism: Sources, History, and Theology (Grand Rapids, 2005); D. Visser, Zacharias Ursinus: The Reluctant Reformer – His Life and Times (New York, 1983).

L. D. BIERMA

VALDÉS, JUAN DE (c. 1498–1541)

Valdés was a Spanish Catholic author of evangelical writings. He was born at Cuenca, studied at Alcalá de Henares, corresponded with *Erasmus and became one of Spain’s leading Erasmusians. Falling foul of the Spanish Inquisition with Diálogo de Doctrina Cristiana (1529), he was declared a *heretic, but escaped the consequences by leaving Spain for Rome. Here he found favour with Pope Clement VII and was ordained. On the election in 1534 of Pope Paul III (whom he detested) he settled in Naples, where he remained in communion with the Roman Catholic Church until his death. The unique and deepening spirituality of his later years followed some profound experience when ‘Christ was revealed’ to him; it is first sensed in Alfabeto Cristiano (1536) and fully felt in his commentaries on Scripture (Matt., Rom., 1 Cor., etc.). He lived like an other-worldly recluse, yet exerted incalculable influence on a select circle of society ladies, *humanists and distinguished clerics: Pietro Carnesecchi (1508–67), Celio Secundo Curione (1503–69), Marc Antonio Flaminio (d. 1550). *Ochino, *Vermigli and countless others came under the fascination of his teaching. The linchpin of his doctrine was *justification by faith (with a pre-Quaker emphasis on inner light), and he drew on Protestant sources, especially Calvin’s Institutes. His major work is his The Hundred and Ten Considerations (c. 1540; ET, Oxford, 1638), of which the Spanish original has not survived.

See also: REFORMATION, CATHOLIC COUNTER-

Bibliography

D. A. Crews, Twilight of the Renaissance: The Life of Juan de Valdés (Toronto, 2008); J. C. Nieto, Juan de Valdés and the Origins of the Spanish and Italian Reformation (Geneva, 1970).

P. M. J. MCNAIR

VAN MASTRICHT, PETER (1630–1706)

Peter van Mastricht, a major figure in post-Reformation *Reformed orthodoxy, was born in Cologne, in Germany, in 1630 and was educated at the Universities of Duisburg and Utrecht before serving pastorates in Cleves and Gluckstadt. He was then called first as Professor of Oriental Languages at Frankfurt in 1662, then as Professor of Theology at Duisburg from 1669 until he succeeded Gisbert Voetius as Professor of Theology at Utrecht in 1677 where he served until his death. His most famous work was his Theoretico-Practica Theologia (1682–7), which served as a representative example of what historian Richard A. Muller refers to as 'high orthodoxy'. This work was later translated into Dutch and was influential on such seminal Reformed theologians as Jonathan *Edwards. Muller argues that it was well received during the *Dutch Nadere Reformation.

Mastricht maintained a very high view of *Scripture, arguing that the Holy Spirit infallibly directed the human writers of Scripture to produce a Bible that is without error. The personal weaknesses of biblical authors such as Moses, who complained to God that he was not a good speaker, pointed to the powerful role that the Holy Spirit exercised in the composing of the biblical text. Mastricht also includes his discussion of faith within the rubric of the doctrine of Scripture. Salvific faith, he said, is the act of *faith that is required for salvation. Faith includes knowledge, assent and the faithful apprehension of divine truth. Faith for Mastricht was no mere intellectual assent to a set of doctrinal propositions, but included the practical application of the will.

The section from the Theoretico-Practica Theologia on the topic of *regeneration was translated into English in 1770 and has been republished in 2002 under the title A Treatise on Regeneration. Mastricht dealt with the necessity of regeneration, its irresistible nature, the fact that it flows from God and not from our free will, and its practical application for the spiritual life of the believer. For Mastricht, regeneration comes logically prior to faith and is given to the believer by the Holy Spirit. Once the believer is regenerated, they develop religious affections by which they desire to be obedient to God and detest whatever is contrary to God's will. It is this emphasis on religious affections that the famed American Reformed theologian Jonathan Edwards developed. On the cover of the English translation, Edwards is quoted as saying, 'This book [Theoretico-Practica Theologia] is much better than any other book in the world, excepting the Bible, in my opinion.'

Bibliography

Works: A Treatise on Regeneration, ed. B. Withrow (Orlando, 2002).

Studies: A. Goudriaan, Reformed Orthodoxy and Philosophy, 1625–1750: Gisbertus Voetius, Petrus van Mastricht, and Anthonius Driessen (Leiden, 2006); R. A. Muller, Post-Reformation Reformed Dogmatics: The Rise and Development of Reformed Orthodoxy, ca. 1520–1725, 4 vols. (Grand Rapids, 2003).

M. I. KLAUBER

VAN TIL, CORNELIUS (1895–1987)

A Reformed theologian and presuppositional apologist, Van Til was born at Grootegast in the Netherlands to a pious Calvinist family, who migrated to the United States in 1905 and became active in the Christian Reformed Church (which was Dutch in origin).

He studied at the Christian Reformed Calvin College and Seminary in Grand Rapids, and continued his education at Princeton Seminary and University. There he studied under Geerhardus *Vos, Casper W. Hodge (1870–1937), Robert Dick Wilson (1856–1930), Oswald T. Allis (1880–1973) and J. Gresham *Machen. At the university, he studied under the personalist idealist philosopher, A. A. Bowman (1883–1936). Also influential in his Princeton training was the biblical and dogmatic theologian B. B. *Warfield.

In 1925, Van Til married Rena Klooster (d. 1978). In 1927, he was ordained and called by the Spring Lake Church of Classis Muskegon in Michigan, his first and only pastorate. Van Til taught *apologetics at *Princeton Seminary in 1928, but, along with Wilson, Allis and Machen, he resigned from the Seminary in 1929 owing to its reorganization under a theologically more liberal board of directors. That same year, Van Til became one of the original professors of the newly organized Westminster Theological Seminary in Philadelphia, which carried on the conservative *Reformed tradition of Old Princeton. He remained at Westminster as professor of apologetics until his retirement in 1975. He joined the Orthodox Presbyterian Church soon after its inception in 1936.

From the 1940s until the late 1970s, Van Til was a most prolific writer. His major contribution was in the area of apologetics, with particular reference to the foundational questions of introductory theological *methodology and structure. Van Til's distinctive approach is 'presuppositionalism', which may be defined as insistence on an ultimate category of thought or a conceptual framework which one must assume in order to make a sensible interpretation of reality:

The issue between believers and non-believers in Christian theism cannot be settled by a direct appeal to ‘facts’ or ‘laws’ whose nature and significance is already agreed upon by both parties to the debate. The question is rather as to what is the final reference-point required to make the ‘facts’ and the ‘laws’ intelligible. The question is as to what the ‘facts’ and ‘laws’ really are. Are they what the non-Christian methodology assumes they are? Are they what the Christian theistic methodology presupposes they are? (Defense of the Faith, Philadelphia, ³1967)

Not only to ‘prove’ biblical Christianity, but to make sense of any fact in the world, Van Til holds that one must presuppose the reality of the ‘self-contained’ triune God and the self-attesting revelation of the Scriptures. From this basis, the redeemed person then reasons ‘*analogically’, attempting ‘to think God’s thoughts after him’. This means humans may know reality truly (for God, in whose image they are created, knows it truly), but not exhaustively (for God is infinite and they are finite).

The presuppositionalist endeavours to convince the unregenerate first by demonstrating that, on unregenerate presuppositions of chance occurrence in an impersonal universe, one cannot account for any sort of order and rationality. Next, he tries to show that life and reality make sense only on the basis of Christian presuppositions.

Van Til vigorously criticized the traditional apologetic approach of both Catholics and Protestants as failing to challenge the non-Christian view of knowledge, as allowing sinners to be judges of ultimate reality, and of arguing merely for the probability of Christianity. He considered himself in the line of *Kuyper and *Bavinck in his presuppositionalism, and opposed the ‘evidentialism’ of *Thomas Aquinas, Joseph *Butler and Warfield.

Both Van Til’s apologetic stance and his stringent critique of Karl *Barth (as a ‘new modernist’) have created continuing controversy. G. C. *Berkouwer, James Daane (1914–83), J. W. Montgomery (b. 1931), John Gerstner and others in the evangelical and Reformed traditions have written at length against Van Til’s position as lacking in exegesis of Scripture, and as tending to irrationalism, *fideism and ‘reasoning in a circle’. Other students of Van Til have sought to develop his insights and apply them to theology and ethics.

Bibliography

G. Bahnsen, Van Til’s Apologetic: Readings and Analysis (Philipsburg, 1998); J. Frame, Cornelius Van Til: An Analysis of His Thought (Philipsburg, 1998); J. R. Muether, Cornelius Van Til: Reformed Apologist and Churchman (Philipsburg, 2008); D. Vickers, Cornelius Van Til and the Theologian’s Theological Stance (Wilmington, 1976); W. White, Van Til, Defender of the Faith (Nashville, 1979).

D. F. KELLY

VATICAN COUNCILS

The First Vatican Council occurred under the *papacy of Pius IX (1846–78) in 1868, and was completed by 1870. The purposes of the council were to define the constituent parts of the Catholic faith and to establish the doctrine of papal infallibility – the notion that because the pope is Christ’s representative on earth, his decrees are without error. The Dogmatic Constitution on the Catholic Faith and the First Dogmatic Constitution on the Church of Christ were the two main documents of the council, addressing Catholic doctrinal theology and papal infallibility, respectively.

Sensing the need to define more clearly the social role of the Catholic Church, particularly during the turbulent decades of the mid-twentieth century, the Second Vatican Council was convened in 1962 under Pope John XXIII (1958–63). It concluded in 1965 under a different pope, Paul VI (1963–78).

The Second Vatican Council has significantly more documents – sixteen – than that of the first council. Though many of the theological ideas remain unchanged from the first council to the second, the tone of Vatican II is notably geared toward a more progressive social ethic than that of Vatican I. Thus, the documents of Vatican II still promote natural moral law theology, the notion that humans possess a universal rational faculty that is ‘naturally’ inherent to them, and that through the exercise of their reason, they are capable of making morally sound judgments. Vatican II also still allows for the doctrine of papal infallibility, though this idea receives considerably less attention than it did in Vatican I.

In terms of the social ethics of Vatican II, the two most important documents are Lumen Gentium and Gaudium et Spes. Lumen Gentium is only one of two dogmatic constitutions in the entirety of Vatican II (Dei Verbum is the other), and its primary concern is to define the Catholic Church for today. It stresses the church's mysterious nature, particularly in regard to its unique relationship with Jesus Christ on the one hand, and in its role as an historical instrument of Christ on the other. Gaudium et Spes focuses its attention on the particular social ethics of the church defined in Lumen Gentium, giving special attention to the anthropocentric and existential concerns of humanity that were indicative of so much of the social philosophy from that same time period. Of the two councils, Vatican II continues to have the greater influence in Catholic moral theology today.

See also: COUNCILS; ROMAN CATHOLIC THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

W. M. Abbott (ed.), The Documents of Vatican II: All Sixteen Official Texts Promulgated by the Ecumenical Council 1963–1965 (London, 1966); R. F. Bulman and F. J. Parrella (eds.), From Trent to Vatican II: Historical and Theological Investigations (Oxford, 2006); E. C. Butler, The Vatican Council, 1869–1870: Based on Bishop Ullathorne's Letters (London, 1962); R. Charles, The Social Teaching of Vatican II: Its Origin and Development – Catholic Social Ethics, an Historical and Comparative Study (Leominster, 1982); J. Mahoney, The Making of Moral Theology: A Study of the Roman Catholic Tradition (Oxford, 1987).

J. K. BURK

VERIFICATION AND FALSIFICATION

Verification is simply the procedure carried out to determine whether a statement is true or false. The usual tests of a statement's truth are coherence, correspondence with reality, and pragmatism. The coherence view stresses that a statement is true because it fits in or coheres with all other statements. The correspondence theory argues that true statements are those which accurately correspond to or picture reality as it is. The pragmatic theory stresses that what is true is what works in practical terms. In modern philosophy, the *logical positivist school based on the Vienna Circle produced a programme for verification and falsification.

Logical positivism and empiricism

The positivists, following the *empiricist approach to knowledge, stressed that for any sentence to be meaningful it must express a statement or proposition which is either analytic (true by definition, by necessity, or a priori) or empirically verifiable. The empirically verifiable statements were thus a posteriori, concerned with contingent facts known only by sense-experience. This division was used by the positivists to dismiss theology and metaphysics as meaningless using the 'verification principle'.

Verification principle (principle of verifiability)

This declared that a statement is meaningful if, and only if, it can be verified by sense-experience. Statements in *logic and mathematics were meaningful on an analytic basis for they were true by definition, though they gave no information about the real world. Statements of science or empirical fact were meaningful, for they could be tested by sense-experience. Statements of ethics and aesthetics were not literally meaningful, but rather expressed feelings, attitudes, taste and one's emotional response. This approach developed in positivism and empiricism the 'emotive' theory of ethics, which suggested that all ethical judgments were expressions of feeling and attempts to arouse similar feelings in others. Statements of metaphysics (e.g. about reality or creation) or theology were literally meaningless. They were either expressions of personal taste or nonsensical. They could not be true and were not objective according to the verification principle. Philosophy was no longer to make claims beyond the clearly observable, but only to clarify meaningfulness in the here-and-now realm of scientific fact.

This position seemed to give victory to the empiricist and to dismiss religion's and theology's claims to truth. However, the verification principle was soon seen to have problems. It was debated whether it applied to sentences, statements or propositions and how one separated out these different levels. The status of the principle was highly doubtful. If the verification principle was itself subjected to its own canon, then it failed the test. Thus it was literally meaningless. It could not be argued that the statement was true by definition, for it can be doubted or rejected without contradiction. The positivists tried to safeguard it as a recommendation for action or an assumed first principle, but this smacks of special pleading.

The principle also excluded areas which the positivist/empiricist wanted to include. Historical statements, such as 'Caesar crossed the Rubicon', could not be tested, for they were in the past. Likewise, and more seriously, all claims of a universal form could not be verified. This meant that all statements or general scientific laws could not be totally verified, for we never exhaust all possible sense-experiences and an exception may be waiting in the next sense-experience. Thus, in excluding religion, theology and metaphysics, historical and scientific statements were also ruled out.

This led to attempts to adapt the principle from a strong sense of verification to a weaker sense. This argued that a statement is meaningful if, and only if, we know how to verify it by sense-experience in principle. This weaker version seemed to pose less of a threat, for as long as some kind of verification was available, then this would satisfy the 'in principle' condition.

A. J. Ayer (1910–89) and R. Carnap (1891–1970) tended to move verification in the direction of testability and confirmability. Karl Popper (1902–94) stressed falsifiability.

Falsification principle

Following the model of natural science, Popper realized that universal statements could not be verified, but could be falsified by counter-examples. Indeed, the natural progression in science was to develop hypotheses with a view to testing them, by attempting to disprove them by one or more negative instances. In a sense, the more falsifiable the hypothesis, the more valuable it is likely to be. If no negative instances are found, then we may have confidence in the truth of the hypothesis. Built into this move is a recognition that both acceptance and rejection of hypotheses are incomplete and provisional. This procedure cannot establish the truth of scientific laws, and says nothing about non-scientific areas such as theology and metaphysics except that they are not science. The most that can be claimed for scientific laws by the method of falsification is probability, which is very far short of the certainty which was the initial aim of the logical positivist and empiricist.

Recent moves

While theology has continued to be attacked and defended on the basis of the verification and falsification principles, modern philosophy has tended to move away from strict verification to a much wider approach to linguistic and conceptual analysis. In philosophy of religion, much has been made of the 'Don't ask for the meaning, ask for the use' approach based on the later *Wittgenstein. This appears to allow religion and theology to function on their own terms, immune from external criteria or criticism. It is within the theological circle that meaning and truth are to be found. The Bible, however, is not afraid of seeing the Christian faith in terms of truth or falsity. Christians make claims for faith and offer evidence in support of their faith. Paul argues that if Christ did not rise from the dead, then Christianity is pointless and Christians are to be pitied. This would be a clear case of falsification. Christians need to develop appropriate criteria for truth and falsity, orthodoxy and *heresy, which will allow truth claims to be made and reinforce the spreading of the gospel and the defence of the faith.

See also: RELIGIOUS LANGUAGE; TRUTH.

Bibliography

A. J. Ayer, Language, Truth and Logic (London, 1946); K. Popper, Logic of Scientific Discovery (ET, London, 1959); F. Waismann, 'Verifiability', in A. Flew (ed.), Logic and Language (Oxford, 1951); J. Wisdom, Philosophy and Psychoanalysis (Oxford, 1953). See also Bibliography for *Logical positivism.

E. D. COOK

VERMIGLI, PETER MARTYR (PIETRO MARTIRE) (1499–1562)

This Italian Protestant Reformer was born in Florence and died in Zurich. The son of a shoemaker, he entered the Canons Regular of St Augustine of the Lateran Congregation at Fiesole in 1514 and was professed in 1518. His most formative years (1518–26) were spent at Padua University, where he taught himself Greek and received his doctorate; he later learned Hebrew at Bologna.

While Abbot of S. Pietro ad Aram in Naples (1537–40) he came under the influence of Juan de *Valdés, who introduced him to Protestant writings. Elected in 1541 Prior of S. Frediano at Lucca, a position of considerable importance, he initiated a series of far-reaching reforms, both educational and ecclesiastical; but, called to account for his actions, he chose to renounce his vows and fled to Zurich and the Protestant camp in 1542.

After five years with *Bucer at Strasbourg, where he expounded the OT and married an ex-nun from Metz, he was invited to England by *Cranmer in 1547 and was appointed Regius Professor of Divinity at Oxford and a canon of Christ Church. Here his lectures on 1 Corinthians provoked in May 1549 the public disputation on the Eucharist described in John Foxe's Acts and Monuments (see *Reformers, English). The following year he was involved in the vestiarian controversy. He assisted Cranmer in the revision of the Anglican liturgy (part of the 1552 Communion service is his), reform of the ecclesiastical laws and the formulation of the Forty-Two Articles (the statement on predestination is attributed to him). On Mary's accession he was allowed to return to Strasbourg.

In 1556 he was invited to Zurich, where he occupied the chair of Hebrew until his death. His last venture abroad was to attend the Colloquy of Poissy in 1561, when he spoke in Tuscan to persuade his fellow-Florentine, Catherine de Medici.

Vermigli influenced the Reformation's course in ways both hidden and apparent, for, unlike most of his exiled compatriots, he became, and remained, a bastion of biblical orthodoxy. He was the friend and confidant of *Bullinger and *Calvin, and a father in God to many of the Marian exiles from England – especially John *Jewel, who lived with him at Strasbourg and Zurich. Because of his calm, informed and balanced judgment, his opinion was sought on many issues of the day. The influence he exerted on Queen Elizabeth and the English Reformation settlement is attested but imponderable.

Deeply skilled in the three classical languages, he excelled in *patristic learning, while his *Aristotelian training at Padua made him a formidable controversialist. He was a voluminous writer and erudite exegete, his commentaries on Scripture remaining standard works of Protestant reference for generations. His major contribution to the Reformation was in the arena of *eucharistic doctrine, and his Defensio (against Stephen Gardiner) has been judged the weightiest treatise of the era on this subject. Calvin declared that 'the whole [doctrine of the Eucharist] was crowned by Peter Martyr, who left nothing more to be done'.

Vermigli taught that a *sacrament is a work of God from beginning to end, and consists of a dynamic relatio between two distinct realities rather than a given quid. In the Eucharist the two realities are the fundamentum (the bread and wine on the table) and the terminus (the body of Christ in heaven). The sacrament is created by the concurrence of three factors: Christ's historic institution, God's word in consecration, and the Holy Spirit's power in reception. Employing a subtle but consistent distinction, he maintained that the believer truly and spiritually (but not 'really' and corporeally) feeds on Christ's glorified flesh and blood in partaking of the consecrated elements. These suffer no change of substantia, yet become, not Christ's body and blood, but the sacrament of his body and blood. The signa of bread and wine are raised to the dignity of visible words of God by being transformed into the instrument of the Spirit. But sacramentum est tantum in usu ('the sacrament exists only in its use') means that the Eucharist is an event that happens rather than an object to be venerated or reserved, and it happens when it is received by faith: hence the manducatio impiorum ('eating by the ungodly') is sacramentally a non-event. But for believers there is a duplex manducatio ('twofold eating'): with their mouths they eat the outward symbols, yet by the same act with their spirits they eat the true body of Christ in heaven.

Bibliography

Works: Life, Letters, and Sermons, ed. J. P. Donnelly (Kirksville, MO, 1999); The Peter Martyr Library, eds. J. P. Donnelly et al. (Kirksville, 1994–).

Studies: S. Corda, Veritas Sacramenti: A Study in Vermigli's Doctrine of the Lord's Supper (Zurich, 1975); J. P. Donnelly, Calvinism and Scholasticism in Vermigli's Doctrine of Man and Grace (Leiden, 1976); J. P. Donnelly and R. M. Kingdon, A Bibliography of the Works of Peter Martyr Vermigli (Kirksville, 1990); G. Duffy and J. C. McLelland, Life, Early Letters and Eucharistic Writings of Peter Martyr (Oxford, 1989); R. M. Kingdon, The Political Thought of Peter Martyr Vermigli: Selected Texts and Commentary (Geneva, 1980); T. Kirby, E. Campi and F. A. James III (eds.), A Companion to Peter Martyr Vermigli (Leiden, 2009); J. C. McLelland (ed.), Peter Martyr Vermigli and Italian Reform (Waterloo, Ontario, 1980); P. M. J. McNair, Peter Martyr in Italy: An Anatomy of Apostasy (Oxford, 1967).

P. M. J. MCNAIR

VICTORINES

The Victorines were a twelfth-century group of commentators, poets, exegetes and mystical writers who were part of the staff of the Abbey Church of St Victor in the suburbs of Paris. They lived in community and followed a collection of *ascetic instructions attributed to St *Augustine. The school was founded in 1108 by William of Champeaux (c. 1070–1121; teacher of *Abelard), and adopted its own Book of Rules under its first abbot Gilduin (1135–53). The Victorines had a widespread influence on communities and monasteries in France, Italy, Germany, England, Denmark and Ireland. Aiming at a balance between monastic life and devotion to scholarship, these priests served the student population of Paris and tried to create a synthesis of the new learning of the medieval schools with the traditional approach of the Fathers. These activities, they believed, should find their focus in contemplating and loving God.

The most famous representatives of the school were Adam of St Victor (c. 1110–c. 1180), a lyric poet and liturgist; Hugh of St Victor (c. 1096–1141), a biblical commentator who laid out a method of scriptural study in his Didascalion; Richard of St Victor (c. 1123–1173), a spiritual writer who emphasized the mystical meaning of Scripture; and Andrew of Wigmore (d. 1175), an exegete who concentrated on the literal study of the Bible.

Bibliography

F. Copleston, A History of Philosophy, vol. 2:1 (Westminster, 1950); M. Haren, Medieval Thought (New York, 1985); J. Leclercq et al., A History of Christian Spirituality, vol. 2 (London, 1968); B. Smalley, The Study of the Bible in the Middle Ages (Oxford, ²1952); M. Swanson, The Twelfth-Century Renaissance (Manchester, 1999).

R. G. CLOUSE

VICTORINUS (AFER), CAIUS MARIUS (fl. 350–365)

Victorinus was a Christian Neoplatonist from Africa (hence distinguished as 'Afer'). He became a famous rhetorician in Rome, and as a pagan wrote rhetorical and logical works (mostly lost), including translations of, or commentaries on, Aristotle, Cicero and the Neoplatonists Plotinus and Porphyry (see *Aristotelianism; *Platonism). He was thus an important link between Greek and Latin worlds of thought. His bold conversion to Christianity in mature life (c. 355) later impressed Augustine (Confessions VIII, ii. 3–v. 10), who had read his Neoplatonic translations. Victorinus lost his professorship under the pagan emperor Julian in 362.

His surviving Christian works comprise three against *Arianism (To Candidus, on the Generation of the Divine Word; Against Arius; The Acceptance of Homoousios), a commentary on Paul's Galatians, Ephesians and Philippians, and a few hymns. He also wrote against *Manichaeism and on Scripture. He was perhaps the first systematic theologian of the *Trinity (cf. P. Henry, JTS 1950, pp. 42–55), primarily in metaphysical rather than scriptural terms, and including a 'psychological trinitarianism' akin to Augustine's. His importance lies in his pioneering Christian-Neoplatonic synthesis, in which he stretched Neoplatonism in an attempt, which was not wholly successful, to accommodate the faith of Nicaea (see *Councils). Despite the obscure complexity of his thought, he blazed the trail for Christian Platonism in the West.

Bibliography

Trinitarian works in Sources Chrétiennes 68–69, ET in FC 69; Pauline commentary, A. Locher (ed.), Bibliotheca Teubneriana (Leipzig, 1972), no ET; R. A. Markus in CHLGEMP, pp. 329–340.

D. F. WRIGHT

VINCENT OF LERINS, see CATHOLICITY

VIRGIN BIRTH

In accordance with popular usage, the term 'virgin birth' will be used in this article to refer to the virginal conception of Jesus, the belief that he was conceived by the Virgin *Mary without sexual intercourse. There is also, in the Catholic tradition, a later belief that Mary's virginity was physically preserved during the actual birth process – i.e. that the hymen was not broken. This belief is found in *Leo's Tome, which was officially accepted by the Council of Chalcedon. It has been questioned by at least some Roman Catholic scholars, such as Karl *Rahner.

The virgin birth is taught clearly in only two NT passages: Matt. 1:18–25 and Luke 1:26–38. Others are sometimes cited (such as Mark 6:3; John 1:13 – on which see below; Gal. 4:4) but there is no certain reference to the virgin birth in any of these latter passages. The paucity of references in the NT is sometimes given as an argument against the historicity of the doctrine. But it should be noted that the virgin birth is almost the only point in common between the two infancy narratives, a clear indication that it is based on an earlier, common tradition. It should also be noted that, in view of the gospel record, the alternative to the virgin birth is not a normal birth within wedlock (for which there is no evidence) but an illegitimate birth (which seems to be the charge in John 8:41 and which is countered in Matt. 1:18–25).

The virgin birth is common to all mainstream orthodox Christian confessions. In the early church it was questioned only by *Ebionites (who denied Jesus' deity) and by *docetists (who denied his true humanity). It was included in the early *creeds and is affirmed today in the Apostles' and Nicene Creeds. With the rise of *liberal theology it has increasingly come to be questioned. This is largely because the normative status of Scripture is denied, and sometimes also because the possibility of the miraculous is denied. Because of its inclusion in the creeds and because of confusion between the virgin birth and the incarnation, the doctrine of the virgin birth has often become a central point of controversy. It has thereby been given a prominence out of proportion to its place in the NT or its theological significance.

The NT teaches that Mary remained a virgin 'until she gave birth to a son' (Matt. 1:25). But in the following century the belief emerged that she remained perpetually a virgin, that her marriage with Joseph was never consummated. This view was opposed by some – notably *Tertullian and some of the fourth-century opponents of *asceticism. But the dominant majority view in the early church was that Mary remained a perpetual virgin and that Jesus' 'brothers' were either Joseph's children from a previous marriage or Jesus' cousins (*Jerome). This doctrine was not at first opposed by the Reformers. *Calvin reserved judgment on the question, and the strongly Protestant Geneva Bible (1560) repeatedly defends the doctrine. But more significant than the numerical support for this belief is the lack of early evidence for it and the dogmatic motivation behind it, namely an unbiblical belief that sexual intercourse is defiling.

In the popular mind the virgin birth is often confused with the *incarnation. This confusion has been encouraged by some of the literature on the subject. The doctrine of the incarnation states that the eternal Son, the second person of the Trinity, became man. The doctrine of the virgin birth states that this man Jesus did not have a human father. It does not state that God was his father. The virgin birth is not to be confused with pagan myths about gods mating with beautiful women. The virgin birth means that Jesus' conception was miraculous, that he had no human father. This is not to be confused with the belief that he was the eternal Son of God become man.

Granted that the virgin birth and the incarnation are distinct, do they logically entail one another? No. The virgin birth does not of itself prove the deity of Christ. *Arians (who deny Christ's deity), *adoptionists (who deny the incarnation) and Muslims have all traditionally believed in the virgin birth. The virgin birth is a supernatural conception which shows Jesus to be someone very special. It does not prove his deity. Conversely, while it can be argued that the incarnation required a supernatural birth, this does not necessarily mean a virgin birth. Scripture tells that Jesus was as a matter of fact conceived by a virgin. It never tells us that this was the only possible way for him to have been conceived.

What then is the relationship between the virgin birth and the incarnation? The virgin birth is not meant to be a biological explanation of the incarnation. It has sometimes been expounded in such terms, and it is at least partly for that reason that *Brunner and *Pannenberg both rejected the doctrine. The virgin birth is better seen, as by *Barth, as a sign pointing to the incarnation. It is fitting and congruous with the incarnation, to which it bears witness; Jesus' miraculous birth points to the fact that he was a unique person.

The virgin birth was criticized by J. A. T. *Robinson, among others, because it makes Jesus different from us, not truly human. (It is ironic that those who have the most to say about functional Christology often take diametrically opposed positions when it comes to Jesus' humanity.) In response, R. F. Aldwinkle has fairly stated that 'it is not the method by which a human being comes to be such which is decisive but the end product itself, namely a human being'. But there is a deeper issue here. The role of Christ requires that there should be both continuity and discontinuity between him and us; that he should be one of us (Heb. 2:10–18) and yet also different from us. Jesus is the second *Adam – one of the human race, yet inaugurating a new redeemed humanity. The virgin birth points to this combination of continuity and discontinuity.

Traditionally, it has often been held that the virgin birth is necessary for the sinlessness of Jesus Christ. This idea was introduced by some of the early Fathers (especially *Augustine) because of their beliefs about original *sin. Augustine held that lust is involved in all intercourse in fallen humanity. If this is so, then the virgin birth clearly protects Christ from being the product of sinful activity. But such a theory has no biblical basis. A modern variant of this argument is found in the claim that original sin is transmitted through the male line. This theory serves to explain how the virgin birth exempts Jesus from original sin, but there is no biblical basis for it.

Karl *Barth discerned in the virgin birth a denial of humanity's natural capacity for God, a favourite Barthian theme. According to this view, the significance of the virgin birth is the absence not of the sex act or of human lust, but of active human participation. Humanity is involved, but only as a 'non-willing, non-achieving, non-creative, non-sovereign, merely ready, merely receptive, virgin human being' (CD I.2, p. 191). Men rather than women are the active agents in the history of the world, and therefore the male must be set aside in the conception of Christ. This view is open to various objections. In addition to its sexist overtones, it appears to teach the total depravity of all males! But Barth is not without justice in applying the doctrine of the virgin birth to the realm of grace.

There is a variant reading of John 1:13 which affirms that Christ was 'born not of natural descent, nor of human decision or a husband's will, but born of God'. This is all but universally agreed not to be the original reading, but the verse is not without relevance. It is highly likely that John knew the tradition of the virgin birth, and it is possible that he was deliberately drawing a parallel between the virgin birth and regeneration. In conversion, as in the virgin birth, the initiative and the sovereignty lie with God.

Bibliography

T. Boslooper, The Virgin Birth (London, 1962); R. E. Brown, The Virginal Conception and Bodily Resurrection of Jesus (London, 1974); D. Edwards, The Virgin Birth in History and Faith (London, 1943); R. Gromacki, The Virgin Birth (Grand Rapids, 2002); A. N. S. Lane, 'The Rationale and Significance of the Virgin Birth', Vox Evangelica 10 (1977), pp. 48–64; J. G. Machen, The Virgin Birth of Christ (London, 1930); T. S. Perry and W. J. Abraham (eds.), Mary for Evangelicals (Downers Grove, 2006); H. von Campenhausen, The Virgin Birth in the Theology of the Ancient Church (London, 1964).

A. N. S. LANE

VISION OF GOD

The vision of God (visio dei), also called the beatific vision, is one of the classic theological definitions of the *eschatological goal of humanity.

The pagan world into which early Christianity spread also aspired to the vision of God in the form in which this was envisaged in the *Platonic tradition. This influenced the development of patristic and medieval thinking about the vision of God, with some unfortunate results. Instead of the context of personal fellowship with God in which the biblical notion of the vision belongs, Platonic influences promoted a more purely intellectualist and individualist understanding of the vision, as intellectual contemplation of eternal being, anticipated in this life in solitary *mystical ecstasy. With it came the Greek distinction between contemplation and action, which created a tension in medieval Christianity between the pursuit of the vision of God in the contemplative life, which required withdrawal from society, and the practice of neighbourly love in the active life. The Platonic form of the vision of God also tended to relativize the incarnation. Because the beatific vision was considered simply as the goal of monastic flight from the world, of *ascetic discipline and of all-too-Platonic forms of mysticism, the Reformers, followed by most Protestant theology, largely neglected the notion; but in doing so they neglected an important element in the eschatological hope of the NT and lost some of the valuable insights of medieval theology and spirituality.

In medieval Western theology the beatific vision was defined as the direct, intuitive, intellectual vision of the essence of God, whereas the Eastern church denied that God can be seen in his essence (see *Eastern Orthodox theology; *Hesychasm; *Iconoclastic controversies). The Council of Vienne (1311–12) and *scholastic theology insisted that the natural powers of the created intellect are incapable of the vision of God, which is a supernatural gift of God's grace to the faithful after death. Controversy over the views of Pope John XXII (1316–34) led to the decree of the Council of Florence (1439) to the effect that the beatific vision is already enjoyed by the redeemed in heaven before the last judgment.

Debate has taken place over whether or not the 'essence' of God can be seen (Benedict XII in the fourteenth century wrote of the saints 'who saw the essence of God'). The Council of Florence, however, went further and spoke with clarity about seeing the triune God, as he is, suggesting that God can be seen as he is in himself (visio Dei per essentiam), a thing impossible (theologians brought up God's incomprehensibility) for a mere creature and requiring the light of glory (lumen gloriae) to bring about. Western theologians (Thomas Aquinas) argued that in the beatific vision (visio beata) this essence could be seen; Gregory Palamas and the East argued that it could not. These discussions have included the twin discussion of the relationship of nature and grace, and the nature of the knowledge of God as analogical or univocal, both in this world and the world to come.

Further debate has also been waged over whether the visio dei is possible here on earth. The apostle Paul spoke of 'visions and revelations' and of being 'caught up to the third heaven' (2 Cor. 12:1–4).

The doctrine of the vision of God teaches that God himself is the ultimate goal of human life, that he will be known by the redeemed in heaven in an immediate relationship involving their whole persons, endlessly satisfying both the love of beauty and the love of truth, the object of all their attention and the source of all their joy. As Augustine (City of God, XXII.29) well recognized, the vision of God will not exclude but will include the corporate life of the redeemed and the reality of the new creation; for in the new creation all things and people will reflect God's glory, and he will be seen in all.

Bibliography

G. C. Berkouwer, The Return of Christ (Grand Rapids, 1972); V. Eosky, The Vision of God (London, 1963); A. E. Green, NCR II, pp. 186–193; K. E. Kirk, The Vision of God (London, 1931); J. Moltmann, Theology and Joy (London, 1973); J. Ratzinger, Eschatology: Death and Eternal Life (Washington, 1988).

D. W. H. THOMAS

VOCATION

There has been a subtle change in how vocation is understood recently. In the past, one might have started with a calling to a particular *ministry within the church (e.g. deacon and priest or evangelist and overseer) or perhaps to a particular role in society (e.g. a teacher or a medic/nurse). Contemporary theologians (from Karl Barth to Rowan Williams), however, are inclined to begin with the notion of a general calling to be human. Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry (the Lima Document) speaks of God calling 'the whole of humanity to become part of God's people' (p. 20). Such a statement comes out of a desire to work out exactly what it means to be imago Dei*. Yet, there is awareness that such a starting point needs careful nuancing, particularly given the ability of humans to indulge in illusions regarding their own omnipotence. Thus in the midst of the capacity for great glory (2 Cor. 3:18; cf. Irenaeus, Adv. Haer. 20. 7), there is the acknowledgment of frailty, vulnerability and mortality.

This general vocation to fulfil the calling to be a human being leads into the specific calling that is given to baptized Christians. Generally speaking, Christian believers of all traditions see that it is *baptism rather than any other rite, for example ordination, which is foundational to understanding the particular calling that Christian people have to exercise in the world. Such a starting point comes from a rediscovery of the ministry of all believers (the laos), out of which particular ministries are given birth. For it is in baptism that the Christian is closely associated with the incarnation, death and resurrection of Jesus Christ. This identification which baptism brings with Christ in his *incarnation demonstrates the importance of the rite for shaping individual and corporate ministries within the body of Christ.

Thus, while Christians from the majority of denominations would affirm the sanctity of specific ministries, such roles and functions are rooted themselves in the general baptismal calling. This does not diminish particular roles or functions, but rather assumes that the voice of God can be heard by all Christians, and that the primary function of the priest, presbyter, elder or evangelist is to equip the rest of the church in its vocation to participate in the wider missio Dei*. The Lima Document notes that relationship between those with specific public ministries and that of the laity is organic and interrelated. 'On the one hand, the community needs ordained ministers. Their presence reminds the community of divine initiative . . . On the other hand, the ordained ministry has no existence apart from the community' (pp. 21–22).

It is because of the rediscovery of the inter-relatedness of ministers and people that there has been another shift in our understanding of vocation. Vocation is not restricted to the ecclesiastical arena, but, as David Ford has argued, encompasses the working out of the promise of baptism wherever the individual Christian is. Thus, while the rest of the world might have lost the sense of the sacred in its understanding of particular vocations, churches have been rediscovering that vocation is worked out in the workplace, at home or in education, just as much, and sometimes if not more so, than within the confines of the church. This was what the Protestant Reformers and their immediate successors had asserted, in contrast to the medieval tendency to restrict vocation to those called to priestly or monastic life, or to secular rule.

Bibliography

Faith and Order, Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry, Paper 111 (Geneva, 1982); D. Ford, Self and Salvation: Being Transformed (Cambridge, 1999); R. Williams, On Christian Theology (Oxford, 2000).

VOETIUS, GISBERTUS (1589–1676)

Gisbertus Voetius, a leading light of the Dutch Second Reformation, was born at Heusden, the Netherlands, to a prominent family of Westphalian descent and Reformed persuasion. He studied theology at the University of Leiden (1604–11), where he was influenced by Franciscus Gomarus, a staunch *Calvinist.

Voetius pastored at Vlijmen (1611–16) and at Heusden (1617–34). While at Heusden, he served as a delegate to the Synod of *Dort (1618–19), wrote influential scholastic works against *Arminianism, established himself as a writer of practical piety, assisted in the reformation at 's-Hertogenbosch, and developed the first comprehensive Protestant theology of *missions.

From 1634 to 1676, Voetius served at the Academy of Utrecht as professor of systematic theology, ethics and church polity. He also taught logic, metaphysics, and the Semitic languages Hebrew, Arabic and Syriac. For thirty-six years, he served as a preacher and pastor in addition to carrying a full teaching load.

Voetius's prolific writings include Exercitia et Bibliotheca studiosi theologae (1664; The Exercises and Library of a Studious Theologian), a comprehensive, 700-page introduction to theological literature and a four-year programme of theological study emphasizing that theology must be known and practised; Selectarum disputationum theologiarum, selections from theological debates; Politicae Ecclesiasticae, material on church polity that represents the ecclesiastical ideals of the Dutch Second Reformation; and Te asketika sive Exercitia Pietatis (1654; 'Ascetica' or the Exercises of Godliness), a detailed manual of piety in theory and practice.

As a polemical theologian, Voetius opposed the covenant theology of Johannes Cocceius, the rational philosophy of René *Descartes and the mystical subjectivism and separatism of Jean de Labadie.

Over time, a group of friends and students called the 'Utrecht circle' came to appreciate and support Voetius's convictions. By the time Voetius died on 1 November 1676, dedicated Voetians were in every university and ecclesiastical province of the Netherlands. Though he did not create a new theology, Voetius was a competent systematizer who influenced thousands. He was instrumental in training hundreds of ministers who followed him in striving to maintain harmonious union between orthodox doctrine and vital piety.

See also: REFORMED THEOLOGY.

Bibliography

Works: Selectarum disputationum theologicarum, 5 vols. (Amsterdam, 1648–69); Politicae Ecclesiasticae, 4 vols. (Amsterdam, 1663–76); Reformed Dogmatics: Seventeenth-Century Reformed Theology Through the Writings of Wollebius, Voetius, and Turretin, ed. and tr. J. W. Beardslee III (New York, 1965); Spiritual Desertion, with J. Hoornbeek, ed. M. E. Osterhaven, tr. J. Vriend and H. Boonstra (Grand Rapids, 2003).

Studies: J. R. Beeke, Gisbertus Voetius: Toward a Reformed Marriage of Knowledge and Piety (Grand Rapids, 1999); H. Hanko, ‘Gijsbert Voetius: Defender of Orthodoxy’, The Standard Bearer 72, 1996, pp. 229–232; T. A. McGahagan, ‘Cartesianism in the Netherlands, 1639–1676: The New Science and the Calvinist Counter-Reformation’ (PhD diss., University of Pennsylvania, 1976); J. van Oort, ‘Augustine’s Influence on the Preaching of Gisbertus Voetius’, in Collectanea Augustiniana, vol. 2, ed. B. Bruning et al. (Louvain, 1990).

J. R. BEEKE

VOLTAIRE (FRANÇOIS-MARIE AROUET) (1694–1778)

The eighteenth century in Europe witnessed the release on a portentous scale of a blistering attack on traditional Christianity and its clerical representatives. Amongst the detractors none was more eloquent than Voltaire. A scintillating writer, able to represent with devastating skill much of his age’s hostile discontent with the establishment, he conducted a passionate literary crusade in the cause of justice and humanity against the damaging superstitions and malpractices of the received faith. His authorship was prolific and wide-ranging in style and subject matter, and its unity can be variously described; but the religious question figures prominently in his productions. He early came under the influence of the English *deists, and this, together with continental sources, abetted the development of his own deism. Voltaire was not a systematic or profound philosopher or theologian, but he was effective enough to enjoy outstanding acclaim as a writer in his native France, and Europe generally, by the end of his turbulent life.

In Voltaire’s writings, we meet the standard criticisms made in his day against Christianity’s claims to be a revealed religion. The Bible was perceived to contain absurdities, contradictions, errors and immoralities and thus to be a shabby candidate for status as divine *revelation. Its depiction of God, especially in the OT, could be singularly unworthy of the supreme being. Yet Voltaire was neither *atheistic nor merely negative. His God was real, but freed from the tyrannous caprice of his usual representation; the atheistic *materialism of d’Holbach (1723–89) drew forth from Voltaire, late in his life, a defence of *theism. The appropriate substitute for revealed religion was natural religion, whereby the moral virtues of benevolence and fraternal love would resolve many of the social ills generated in Europe by erroneous belief.

However, Voltaire was no shallow optimist. In the wake of the Lisbon earthquake and in the course of the Seven Years War (1756–63), he grappled with the problem of suffering and earthly injustices. Candide (1759), his most widely known work, attacks (among other things) the philosophical optimism which holds this to be the best of all possible worlds. Less trenchant and less idealistic, perhaps, than his contemporary Jean-Jacques *Rousseau, Voltaire was not blinded by the promise of humanity to its perplexities. Ultimately only a vigorous struggle to change the world, not an essay in speculative *metaphysics, would achieve the desired ends.

Voltaire died, as he put it, ‘worshipping God, not hating my enemies, loving my friends, detesting superstition’. This endeavour was undertaken resolutely outside the traditional framework. While debate about that framework continues, Voltaire’s contribution will be neglected by many, but few who agree with him that ‘never will twenty folio volumes produce a revolution; it is the portable little books of thirty sous which are to be feared’ will underestimate it.

Bibliography

Works: Complete Works, ed. T. Besterman et al. (Geneva and Oxford, 1968 onwards).

Studies: T. Besterman, Voltaire (Oxford, 1976); N. Cronk (ed.), The Cambridge Companion to Voltaire (Cambridge, 2009); I. Davidson, Voltaire: A Life (London, 2010; rev. edn, 2012); H. Mason, Voltaire (London, 1975);

R. Pomeau, La Religion de Voltaire (Paris, 1969); N. L. Torrey, Voltaire and the English Deists (New Haven, 1930).

S. N. WILLIAMS

VOLUNTARISM

A theory or doctrine is voluntaristic when it gives explanatory emphasis to the *will at the expense, particularly, of the intellect or of moral character. For example, in discussions of the relation between morality and divine authority, certain writers (e.g. *Duns Scotus in the medieval period, and Samuel *Rutherford in the Puritan period), in an effort to do justice, as they see it, to divine sovereignty, have maintained that a principle is morally good or obligatory simply in virtue of the fact that God has willed it (and not because, say, it accords with God's moral nature). Thus Rutherford held that, had he so willed, God could have pardoned sin without an atonement. In criticism, it may be said that such a debate proceeds on too abstract and speculative (and perhaps too *anthropomorphic) a view of the divine nature. A voluntarist account of faith emphasizes the role of free will and of personal trust at the expense of the apprehension of and assent to truth, and is characteristic of *Arminianism but more especially of modern irrationalism.

Voluntarism is to be distinguished from voluntarism, the idea that the Christian church is distinct from the state and that which church one joins and supports is a matter of personal choice.

Bibliography

Duns Scotus, The Oxford Commentary on the Four Books of the Sentences, II.xxxvii, tr. D. J. Walsh, in A. Hyman and J. J. Walsh (eds.), Philosophy in the Middle Ages (Indianapolis, 1973); J. Owen, A Dissertation on Divine Justice (1653), in Works, ed. W. H. Goold (1850–55; repr. London, 1965–68), vol. X; P. Quinn, Divine Commands and Moral Requirements (Oxford, 1978).

P. HELM

VOS, GEERHARDUS (1862–1947)

Born in the Netherlands, Vos was professor of biblical theology at Princeton Theological Seminary from 1893 to 1932.

Vos is important for his pioneering work in biblical theology, based on a conviction of the plenary inspiration and supreme authority of Scripture. He is among the first, and certainly the most gifted, in Protestant orthodox tradition to grasp the fundamental significance of the fact that God's special, redemptive revelation comes as an organically unfolding historical process, and to draw methodological (*hermeneutical) consequences from this fact. A controlling thrust of his life's work is that the Bible is not merely a collection of postulates about God, man, the world, etc., but that post-fall verbal *revelation is a function of redemption; revelation is invariably focused on, and patterned by, the ongoing history of God's redemptive acts which has its centre and consummation in Christ. An important effect of this stress on the historical, *covenantal character of biblical revelation has been to point the way toward maintaining a properly high view of *Scripture, without falling into the unduly intellectualistic understanding of Christian faith that has sometimes accompanied that view.

Bibliography

R. B. Gaffin, Jr (ed.), Redemptive History and Biblical Interpretation: The Shorter Writings of Geerhardus Vos (Philadelphia, 1980) – contains an account of Vos's life and complete bibliography.

R. B. GAFFIN, JR

WALDENSIANS

Waldensians (also called Waldenses or Vaudois) are adherents of a twelfth-century evangelical movement that began in the context of Catholicism, was rejected by successive popes, became schismatic and suffered severe persecution from church and state both before and after the Reformation. It survives to this day. Similar in style and inspiration to the *Franciscan movement a generation later, it was founded by Peter Waldo, a rich merchant of Lyons who in 1173 was moved by Christ's words in Matt. 19:21 to sell all he had and give to the poor. He caused the Vulgate NT to be translated into the vernacular, and from 1177 gathered round him men and women dedicated to obey and preach the gospel to the letter. Catholics said of them: 'They go about in twos, barefoot, in woollen clothes, owning nothing but holding all things in common like the apostles.'

Banned by Pope Lucius III in 1184 for unauthorized preaching, these 'Poor Men of Lyons' organized themselves into an alternative church that spread widely through Latin Christendom. Ministers (called barbes) were ordained as bishops, priests and deacons with vows of poverty, chastity and obedience. At first, they deviated little from Catholic orthodoxy, but later they forbade all swearing and military service, rejected *purgatory and indulgences (see *Merit), requiem masses and works performed by the living for the dead. Yet they kept the seven sacraments of Catholicism, celebrating the Eucharist once a year, practising auricular confession, doing penance and invoking Mary with certain saints. Women preached. Catholic repression was intense: in 1211 alone about eighty men and women disciples were burnt alive in Strasbourg.

In their biblicism, their evangelical lifestyle and their condemnation of the abuses and worldliness of medieval Catholicism, they were proto-Protestants, and at Chanforan in 1532 they made common cause with the Reformers, giving up the vestiges of Roman practice and adopting the Genevan doctrine of *predestination. Since then they have remained a *Protestant denomination, known in Italy as 'la Chiesa Evangelica Valdese'. After murderous opposition – such as the massacre of 1655 that provoked a sonnet by John Milton and intervention from Oliver Cromwell – they were granted religious freedom in 1848. Today they are a small community, located mostly in Italy and South America.

Bibliography

G. Audisio and C. Davison, The Waldensian Dissent: Persecution and Survival, c.1170–c.1570 (Cambridge, 1999); E. Cameron, The Reformation of the Heretics: The Waldenses of the Alps, 1480–1580 (Oxford, 1984); idem, Waldenses: Rejections of Holy Church in Medieval Europe (Oxford, 2000); M. D. Lambert, Medieval Heresy: Popular Movements from Bogomil to Hus (London, 1977); G. A. Left, Heresy in the Later Middle Ages (Manchester, 1967); Storia dei Valdesi: vol. 1, A. Molnar (1176–1532); vol. 2, A. A. Hugon (1532–1848); vol. 3, V. Vinay (1848–1978) (Turin, 1974–80); G. Tourn, The Waldensians: The First 800 Years, ET C. P. Merlino (Turin, 1980); idem, You Are My Witness: The Waldensians Across 800 Years (Torino, 1989).

P. M. J. McNAIR

WARFIELD, BENJAMIN BRECKINRIDGE (1851–1921)

Warfield was the last great theologian of the conservative Presbyterians at *Princeton Theological Seminary, New Jersey. His activity as a theologian coincided with the period when higher-critical views of *Scripture and evolutionary conceptions of religion were replacing evangelical convictions in most of America's major institutions of higher learning. Warfield distinguished himself as a scholarly defender of *Augustinian Calvinism, supernatural Christianity, and the inspiration of the Bible. Some of his views, especially on biblical inerrancy (see *Infallibility and inerrancy), continue to play an important role among evangelicals.

Warfield was born into a wealthy Virginia family and received his early education privately. He entered Princeton College in 1868, the year that James McCosh, last of the major proponents of the Scottish philosophy of *Common Sense, began his service as president. Warfield then studied at Princeton Seminary, where he came under the influence of the ageing Charles *Hodge. Warfield had pursued scientific interests avidly before deciding to train for the ministry, and he continued to be an eager amateur reader of scientific literature throughout his entire life. Perhaps for this reason, Warfield had less difficulty than many of his evangelical contemporaries in making peace with the scientific aspects of Charles Darwin's theory of evolution (see *Creation and evolution). He may also have been helped in this direction by the example of McCosh, who was both a forthright Calvinist and an unembarrassed theistic evolutionist. After graduating from seminary in 1876, Warfield married, travelled in Europe, served a brief pastorate in Baltimore, and was then called to teach NT at a Presbyterian seminary in Allegheny, Pennsylvania. In 1887 he succeeded Archibald Alexander Hodge (1823–86) as Professor of Didactic and Polemic Theology at Princeton.

Unlike several other Princeton theologians, Warfield was not an active churchman. His concerns were almost entirely intellectual and theological. His reserved personality, and perhaps the long years of care for his invalid wife, contributed to what his brother called 'a certain intellectual austerity, a loftiness and aloofness' (Ethelbert Warfield, 'Biographical Sketch', in Works, I, p. viii). Throughout his years at Princeton, Warfield wrote an incredible number of essays, reviews, pamphlets and monographs for both scholars and the laity. (He also regularly published hymns and poetry.) His scholarship was detailed and precise. He laboured to provide accurate summaries of his opponents, but could be astringent in pointing out their errors. Although he probably had the keenest intellect of any Old Princeton theologian, the nature of the times, especially with the growing diversification of academic life, gave his work a somewhat more fragmentary quality than that of his greatest predecessor, Charles Hodge. Warfield's primary contribution lay in three areas: the Bible, Calvinism and the nature of religious experience.

When higher-critical views of Scripture gained popularity in America, Warfield joined with other conservatives to define more exactly the divine inspiration and total truthfulness of Scripture. In 1881 he published with A. A. Hodge a famous essay on 'Inspiration' which set forth his position. Over the centuries, this piece argued, the Bible had received the most convincing demonstrations of its divine origin. The church's historic belief that the letter as well as the spirit of Scripture came from God was still a valid position. In this article, as in several other important essays, Warfield painstakingly investigated the Scriptures' testimony concerning themselves. His conclusion was that when the Bible spoke, God spoke. This 1881 essay placed somewhat greater emphasis on 'proofs' for Scripture than Charles Hodge had usually done, and it made more of the fact that the inspiration of Scripture (and its consequent freedom from error) applied, strictly considered, only to the original autographs of the text. But in general, Warfield was only restating in response to contemporary criticism the kind of confidence in Scripture that had once been commonplace in both Catholic and Protestant circles. In over 100 further writings on Scripture, Warfield drew attention repeatedly to the Bible's testimony about its own authority. He also asserted that terms like 'inerrancy' did not imply a mechanical process of inspiration. Warfield held rather that biblical inspiration involved a process of concursum whereby human actions and the working of the Holy Spirit coincided. This meant that historical study of the Bible was appropriate, just so long as such study did not presuppose an exclusively human origin for Scripture.

Warfield's convictions about the Bible had wide currency in his own day and have continued to be studied seriously in the present. Not so well known is his adherence to the theology of the *Reformation. When at the end of the century American Presbyterians debated whether to amend the *Westminster Confession (see *Reformed theology), Warfield responded with a series of careful studies on the meaning of that document. His own opinion never wavered: the Reformers of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries had provided sound guidelines for the church. To tamper with these in favour of modern views of human betterment or divine immanence would be fatal. Warfield penned several careful monographs on the Confession, many penetrating studies of *Calvin's thought, and a number of academic treatises on figures in the early church (especially Augustine). All testified to his belief that the theological principles of these earlier periods were fully sufficient for the present. In 1904 he summed up the burden of these historical exercises: 'Calvinism is just religion in its purity. We have only, therefore, to conceive of religion in its purity, and that is Calvinism' (Selected Shorter Writings, I, p. 389).

Warfield's convictions on *religious experience were the product of his high view of Scripture and his fervent Calvinism. He saw two major opponents to orthodoxy in his day: the modernism which exalted the spirit of the age over Scripture and over confessional traditions, and the popular piety which treated Jesus as merely a motivational force and the Holy Spirit as a private possession for personal manipulation. Against the first tendency, Warfield tried to rebut efforts at grounding religion in evolutionary optimism or the *romantic sense of the self. Against the latter, he wrote tracts decrying the shallowness of modern *fundamentalism, and many works pricking the pretensions of '*perfectionism'. In all of these efforts, Warfield held to the objectivity of God's work. God had objectively given his word in Scripture. He had objectively given the church as the means to offer grace through preaching, prayer and the sacraments. Those who relied on inward subjectivity, whether of the right or the left, to find what God had offered objectively were deluding themselves as well as scorning the work of God.

Warfield ranks with his contemporaries, the Dutchmen Herman *Bavinck and Abraham *Kuyper, and the Scot James *Orr, as the greatest of modern conservative Calvinist theologians. His works are not popular with the theological community at large, nor are they taken too seriously by evangelicals, except where they refer to Scripture. Yet they remain a reservoir for those who, with Warfield, revere the work of God in Scripture and the history of the church and who value careful intellectual labour applied to an understanding of that work.

Bibliography

Works: The Works of Benjamin B. Warfield, 10 vols. (New York, 1927–32; repr. Grand Rapids, 1981); Selected Shorter Writings of Benjamin B. Warfield, ed. J. E. Meeter, 2 vols. (Philipsburg, 1970, 1973).

Studies: J. H. Gerstner, ‘Warfield’s Case for Biblical Inerrancy’, in God’s Inerrant Word, ed. J. Warwick Montgomery (Minneapolis, 1974); W. A. Hoffecker, ‘Benjamin B. Warfield’, in Reformed Theology in America, ed. D. F. Wells (Grand Rapids, 1985); J. E. Meeter and R. Nicole, A Bibliography of Benjamin Breckinridge Warfield 1851–1921 (Nutley, 1974); T. F. Torrance, ‘Review of Warfield’s Inspiration and Authority of the Bible’, SJT 7 (1954), pp. 104–108; F. Zaspel, The Theology of B. B. Warfield (Wheaton, 2010).

M. A. NOLL

WEALTH, see POVERTY AND WEALTH

WEBER, MAX (1864–1920)

A German sociologist, Max Weber, with Émile *Durkheim, is often called a founder of modern sociology. Bred in the German idealist milieu with its historical emphasis, he was particularly interested in social change and studied religion as a factor in such change. His most famous work in this context was The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism (1904–05; ET London, 1930), in which he argued that the this-worldly *asceticism of Calvinists (see *Reformed theology), which was a consequence of the doctrine of *predestination, was an important factor in the formation of capitalist societies. This study was explicitly directed against the economic determinism of *Marxist theory and initiated a debate which is not yet finished, particularly since the technological revolution has intensified interest in the Protestant work ethic.

Weber, however, was not consistent in his opposition to social determinism. In support of his thesis in The Protestant Ethic, he engaged in a series of studies of world religions which was left uncompleted when he died. The main contribution of his Sociology of Religion (1922) is considered to be the development of a system for classifying different types of religious leader in terms of their social significance (i.e. the type of person who would be attracted to a particular type of leader), and the sort of organization established by them. This last facet was developed by Weber’s close friend, Ernst *Troeltsch.

Weber’s influence is still very apparent in the *sociology of religion, which has persisted with his attempt to establish natural laws in the area of sociology while clinging to belief in human self-determination.

Bibliography

R. Bendix, Max Weber (London, 1960); S. Budd, Sociologists and Religion (London, 1973); J. Freund, The Sociology of Max Weber (London, 1968); P. Ghosh, A Historian Reads Max Weber: Essays on the Protestant Ethic (Wiesbaden, 2008); D. Käsler, Max Weber: An Introduction to His Life and Work, tr. P. Hurd (Chicago, 1988); J. Radkau, Max Weber: A Biography (London, 2009); R. Swedberg (ed.), The Max Weber Dictionary (Stanford, 2005); S. Turner (ed.), The Cambridge Companion to Weber (Cambridge, 2000).

D. A. HUGHES

WESLEY, CHARLES (1707–88)

Charles Wesley was co-founder of the Methodist movement and a great hymn writer. Son of the Anglican clergyman, Samuel Wesley, and the incomparable Susanna, educated at Westminster School in London and at Christ Church, Oxford, and ordained to the priesthood of the Church of England in 1735, he developed a passion for evangelical and sacramental renewal in the church.

Charles frequently led the way in many of the personal and institutional developments that revolved around the rising Evangelical Revival of the eighteenth century. He founded the so-called ‘Holy Club’ while a student at Oxford and experienced God’s unconditional love in a ‘religious experience’ on 21 May 1738 that preceded the famous ‘Aldersgate Experience’ of his older brother *John, three days later. Charles's gift to the Revival and modern Christianity was the production of some 9,000 hymns and sacred poems through which the vast majority of people called Methodists learned theology. It is not too much to say that *Methodism was born in the song of this amazing hymn writer.

In the early years of the Revival, it was not uncommon for Wesley to preach in the open air to a spellbound crowd gathered by his rich voice singing one of his own hymns. The blossoming of his evangelical hymns began in 1739 with the advent of three successive editions of Hymns and Sacred Poems, jointly published with his brother John. But Charles also produced hymn collections on various themes, including the great festivals of the Christian year, the Trinity, families, times of trouble, and important theological topics such as 'God's everlasting love'. The 166 hymns in Hymns on the Lord's Supper, also a joint venture with John, demonstrated the centrality of the *Eucharist to their spirituality. Producing about 180 hymns per year until his death, Wesley's most important publication was the 1780 A Collection of Hymns for the Use of the People Called Methodist. For many years this hymn book provided the standard poetic explication of virtually every dimension of Methodist teaching. Charles's lyrical theology reflects the genius of a spirituality that united Anglican purity of intent with Puritan inward assurance, all within the larger context of the catholic Christian heritage and worked out in structures of accountable discipleship. His holistic vision of the Christian life linked warm-hearted piety and servant ministry among the poor. The concluding line of his famous hymn, 'Love Divine, All Loves Excelling', aptly describes his life and witness: 'lost in wonder, love, and praise.'

Bibliography

F. Baker, Charles Wesley as Revealed by His Letters (London, 1948); S T Kimbrough, Jr (ed.), Charles Wesley: Poet and Theologian (Nashville, 1992); K. Newport (ed.), Charles Wesley: Life, Legacy, Literature (Peterborough, 2007); J. E. Rattenbury, The Evangelical Doctrines of Charles Wesley's Hymns (London, 1941); idem, The Eucharistic Hymns of John and Charles Wesley (London, 1948); J. R. Tyson, Charles Wesley (Oxford, 1989).

WESLEY, JOHN (1703–91)

John Wesley was born in the rectory of Epworth, Lincolnshire, the fifteenth child of Samuel and Susannah Wesley. Together with his younger brother Charles (the hymnwriter), he gave leadership to the eighteenth-century Evangelical Revival and particularly to the Methodist movement.

Wesley was raised in a family with deep religious convictions. His grandfathers had distinguished themselves as *Puritan non-conformists. His father was educated in dissenting academies before deciding to return to the established church and attend Exeter College, Oxford. John's mother would have been an exceptional woman in any century.

John left home for school at Charterhouse in London when he was ten years old (1714), and went on to Christ Church, Oxford, in 1720 (BA, 1724; MA, 1727). He did not decide 'to make religion the business of his life' until 1725. This was his religious or moral conversion, and was no less real or important than his evangelical conversion thirteen years later. That same year he was ordained deacon, and the following year was elected fellow of Lincoln College. Through the influence of a 'religious friend' Wesley was guided to the writings of Thomas à Kempis (see *Imitation of Christ), Jeremy Taylor (1613–67) and later William Law. In the summer of 1727 he left Oxford to serve as his father's curate in Wroot, where he was ordained presbyter in 1728.

In 1729 he returned to Oxford at the request of Lincoln College and soon became spiritual leader of the small group of students his brother Charles had gathered. This band was called the 'Holy Club' by other students; later they were known as 'Methodists'. Together they studied the Greek NT, abridged numerous theological and devotional works, fasted twice a week, partook of the sacrament weekly and regularly visited those sick or imprisoned.

After their father's death in 1735, John and Charles left Oxford for Georgia. The two primary benefits of the brief mission came through contact with the German *Moravians and the new practice of giving special religious instruction to small groups of the most committed parishioners (men and women). Shortly after John's return to England in 1738 he met Peter Böhler, a Moravian minister who stressed the importance of *justification by faith alone, accompanied by an inner *assurance of salvation and victory over all known sin. Convinced by Böhler's arguments from Scripture, historic Christianity and the experience of several witnesses, Wesley began to seek and to preach justification by faith alone.

On 24 May 1738, at a small Moravian meeting in Aldersgate Street in London, Wesley felt his 'heart strangely warmed' while listening to the reading of Luther's preface to Romans. Modern scholars do not agree as to the exact nature of this evangelical experience, but history attests to the fact that nothing in Wesley was left untouched by it. The warmth of his evangelical experience was united with that of his brother Charles and another member of the Holy Club (George *Whitefield) to produce the flame of the Evangelical Revival and catch the attention of London, Bristol and the press.

The evangelical stress on a personal experience of salvation by faith alone was considered 'new doctrine' and unnecessary by most leaders of the Church of England (who maintained that a person was sufficiently saved by virtue of infant baptism). Established churches were soon closed to the Methodist preachers, forcing them into the open air. In April 1739 George Whitefield invited John to Bristol to organize the multitude of new converts among the Kingswood coal miners into small groups for Christian nurture and discipleship (one of Wesley's great talents).

The centre of Methodist theology was *love: the *love of God for all persons and the *grace of God available to all through faith in Jesus Christ alone for salvation.

This view of (prevenient) grace maintained that God reaches out to each person, offering a personal relationship and ensuring each one a valid opportunity to respond. Justification or saving faith was also a result of grace. *Conversion was understood as one experience with two inseparable parts: justification, in which the *righteousness of Christ was attributed (or imputed) to the believer; and the new birth or *regeneration, in which the Spirit began to produce (or impart) the righteousness of Christ. Sanctifying grace described the work of the Holy Spirit in the life of the believer between conversion and death. Wesley understood this activity to be both instantaneous and progressive. Because it is a work of grace received by faith alone, *sanctification could be instantaneous. Yet 'entire sanctification' was primarily understood as love for God and others. Therefore, sanctification was the infinite and dynamic love of God at work in a finite believer. In this sense, sanctification could never be a static state of 'absolute perfection' (which Wesley always denied), but rather must, in some sense, always be progressive (see *Perfection, perfectionism).

John Wesley's Methodism was more than just a theology. It was an understanding of the Christian life which stressed a joyful personal relationship with a loving Father. This relationship found expression through worship toward God and loving action toward others. Love for those who were lost meant 'offering them Christ' in *evangelism. Love for the poor meant social concern – homes for widows and orphans, free health clinics, help with food and clothing, schools and Sunday schools, etc. Love for the newly converted meant provision for discipleship – small nurture groups; opportunities to receive the sacrament of Communion when they were excluded from the parish church; books of hymns and sacred poems; Bible study notes; books of prayers; tracts; children's prayers, lessons and hymns; adult Christian literature (both theological and devotional); a monthly Christian magazine; in all over 400 different publications in his lifetime. Love for others in the Christian community meant honest attempts to put aside prejudice and focus on winning the lost (e.g. 'Letter to a Roman Catholic'), along with an *ecumenical willingness to appropriate genuine spiritual contributions from every tradition. Love for all nations caused Wesley to say 'the world is my parish'. His own evangelistic travels took him to Georgia, Germany, Wales, Ireland and Scotland. Wesley sent Methodist preachers to North America from 1769 onward, and, after the war with Britain, ordained them to continue their work on the frontier.

Wesley's personal efforts were formidable. During his fifty-two years as an itinerant, he averaged 4,000 miles annually, and preached more than 40,000 sermons in all. Yet the real genius of his work was in his ability to enlist, organize and develop the spiritual talents of others, both men and women. Through a growing structure of small groups, local leaders and travelling preachers, Wesley was able to maintain both the passion for evangelism and its fruit. He never lost sight of the need to nurture and disciple those newly won to Christ. In a real sense, John Wesley's Methodism was a revival of pastoral care and a product of *lay ministry (both male and female), as well as a response to evangelical theology and preaching. Through Wesley and Methodism, a viable Christian *spirituality was available to the masses of industrial labourers in eighteenth-century Britain.

See also: METHODISM.

Bibliography

Works: Sermons, ed. E. H. Sugden, 2 vols. (London, 1921); Letters, ed. J. Telford, 8 vols. (London, 1931); Journal, ed. N. Curnock, 8 vols. (London, 1938); Works, ed. T. Jackson, 14 vols. (Grand Rapids, 1975); Works, ed. F. Baker, A. C. Outler, R. P. Heitzenrater et al., 18 vols. (Nashville, 1980–).

Studies: K. J. Collins, The Theology of John Wesley (Nashville, 2007); V. H. H. Green, The Young Mr Wesley (London, 1961); R. P. Heitzenrater, The Elusive Mr Wesley, 2 vols. (Nashville, 1984); H. Lindström, John Wesley and Sanctification (London, 1946); R. L. Maddox, Responsible Grace: John Wesley's Practical Theology (Nashville, 1994); R. L. Maddox and J. E. Vickers, The Cambridge Companion to John Wesley (Cambridge, 2010); T. C. Oden, John Wesley's Teachings, 3 vols. (Grand Rapids, 2012); A. C. Outler (ed.), John Wesley (New York, 1964); H. Rack, Reasonable Enthusiast: John Wesley and the Rise of Methodism (Philadelphia, 1989); M. Schmidt, John Wesley: A Theological Biography, 2 vols. in 3 (London and Nashville, 1962–73); R. G. Tuttle, John Wesley: His Life and Theology (Grand Rapids, 1978); L. Tyerman, Life and Times of John Wesley, 3 vols. (London, 1873); C. W. Williams, John Wesley's Theology Today (London, 1960).

T. R. ALBIN

WESLEYAN QUADRILATERAL

Albert C. Outler, a leading voice in the recovery of John *Wesley's stature as a serious theologian, coined this phrase to describe Wesley's theological method in an article written in 1972. He proposed that Wesley added a fourth factor, experience, to the Anglican triad of Scripture, tradition and reason enunciated by Richard *Hooker as the factors to be considered in constructing and justifying doctrine. Outler was not the first to recognize the four factors in Wesley's method, but his phrase brought the idea to prominence. It was widely accepted (particularly among American *Methodists) that this characterized Wesley's distinctive theological method, and certainly Wesley refers repeatedly to all of these, although never all four at one time.

Subsequently, however, there was considerable debate about what exactly is meant by 'tradition', 'reason' and 'experience' and how they relate to each other and to Scripture. John Cobb even argued that in the modern era, reason and experience had to be given the greater weight. William J. Abraham, who at first endorsed the quadrilateral as a fairly accurate analysis of Wesley's theological method, has now rejected it.

Randy L. Maddox presents a clearer formulation when he suggests that the quadrilateral 'could be more adequately described as a unilateral rule of Scripture within a trilateral hermeneutic of reason, tradition, and experience' (Responsible Grace, p. 46). Wesley undoubtedly followed the Reformation in holding to the authority of Scripture. For him, tradition, reason and experience were factors in the doctrinal interpretation of *Scripture, or could speak to corroborate the teaching of Scripture or determine questions that went beyond explicit scriptural teaching.

However inexact and fraught with questions these four terms may be (as Abraham argues), they are words used by Wesley. Their formulation as a so-called 'quadrilateral' should perhaps be seen as a first, helpful but (in the end) provisional and inadequate attempt to encapsulate Wesley's theological method. But it may also be questioned whether the consideration of these four factors is distinctive to Wesley.

Bibliography

W. J. Abraham, 'The Wesleyan Quadrilateral', in T. H. Runyon (ed.), Wesleyan Theology Today: A Bicentenary Theological Consultation (Nashville, 1985); idem, Canon and Criterion in Christian Theology: From the Fathers to Feminism (Oxford, 1998); R. Bauckham and B. Drewery (eds.), Scripture, Tradition and Reason: A Study in the Criteria of Christian Doctrine (Edinburgh, 1988); S. W. Gunter et al., Wesley and the Quadrilateral: Renewing the Conversation (Nashville, 1997); S. J. Jones, John Wesley's Conception and Use of Scripture (Nashville, 1995); R. L. Maddox, Responsible Grace: John Wesley's Practical Theology (Nashville, 1994); A. C. Outler, 'The Wesleyan Quadrilateral—in John Wesley', Wesleyan Theological Journal 20, 1985, pp. 7–18; D. A. Thorsen, The Wesleyan Quadrilateral: Scripture, Tradition, Reason and Experience as a Model of Evangelical Theology (Grand Rapids, 1990).

T. A. NOBLE

WESTCOTT, BROOKE FOSS (1825–1901)

Westcott was an English NT scholar and bishop, best known for his partnership at Cambridge (where he was Regius Professor of Divinity from 1870) with J. B. Lightfoot (1828–89) and F. J. A. Hort (1828–92) on an NT commentary based on a reliable Greek text. Although the project was not completed, Hort's introduction to the Westcott and Hort New Testament in the Original Greek (1881–2) remains a classic statement of the principles of textual criticism, and Westcott's commentaries on John (1880), the Johannine epistles (1883) and Hebrews (1889) are still valued for their spiritual insight and pioneering application of patristic exegesis, even if the text is sometimes over-translated. (Lightfoot produced his own equally famous commentaries on Galatians [1865], Philippians [1868] and Colossians with Philemon [1875], as well as critical editions of some of the *Apostolic Fathers—Clement of Rome, Ignatius and Polycarp.)

Less remembered now, but perhaps more significant at the time for the Church of England and the public's perception of her interests, was Westcott's concern for social issues. He was the first president of the Christian Social Union (founded 1889) and, like Lightfoot before him, was called from academic life to be Bishop of Durham (1890–1901). There he used his influence and administrative skills to mediate in the 1892 coal strike and developed an incarnational theology sharing much with the *Christian Socialism of F. D. Maurice in his sermons and addresses around the diocese.

Several of the Bishop Westcott Memorial Lectures deal with aspects of Westcott's thought.

Bibliography

S. Neill, The Interpretation of the New Testament 1861–1961 (London, 1964); F. Olofsson, Christus Redemptor et Consummator: A Study in the Theology of B. F. Westcott (Uppsala, 1979).

P. N. HILLYER

WESTMINSTER CONFSSION AND STANDARDS

During the English Civil War between Charles I and Parliament, the Westminster Assembly was set up by Parliament to establish a 'covenanted uniformity' in theology and church government. It was to be 'an Assembly of learned, godly and judicious Divines', although it was not an ecclesiastical body but an advisory body for Parliament. The Westminster Assembly met from 1 July 1643 until 22 February 1648. It consisted of 121 ministers, plus ten from the House of Lords and twenty from the House of Commons, all of whom were full members of the Assembly. The Church of Scotland also sent representatives: four ministers and two elders. The chairman (the Prolocutor) was initially William Twisse, and after his death Charles Herle. The average attendance was around sixty to eighty at each session, although only about twenty played a significant part in the debates.

One of the earliest events in the life of the Assembly was the signing and approving of the Solemn League and Covenant. This was the document which committed the Scottish Parliament to support of the English Parliament in its struggle against Charles I. It also enshrined the principles of the National Covenant of 1638. The Assembly had begun by revising the *Thirty-Nine Articles, but on 12 October, shortly after signing and approving the Solemn League and Covenant, Parliament instructed the Assembly 'to consider among themselves of such a discipline and government as may be most agreeable to God's holy Word'. This took until almost the end of 1644 and resulted in two documents. The Directory for the Publick Worship of God was written in opposition to the liturgy then being used in the Church of England. It describes what should happen when the congregation gathers for worship, speaks about the public reading of Scripture, provides a sample prayer before the sermon, speaks about the preaching of the word and the prayer afterwards, then provides guidelines for the administration of the sacraments. It also gives instructions for the proper use of the Lord's day. Ministers are given help regarding the solemnization of marriage, the visitation of the sick, the burial of the dead, and guidelines for days of public fasting and of public thanksgiving. It concludes with some notes on the singing of psalms. The Form of Presbyterial Church Government contains instructions about the government of the church, not least regarding the duties of ministers, elders and deacons. It also deals with the various courts of the church, including presbyteries and assemblies. Finally, it explains the meaning of ordination and gives instructions for such ordinations.

The Assembly then turned their attention to preparing a confession of faith. The finished Westminster Confession of Faith (henceforth WCF) was presented to Parliament on 3 December 1646. They were required by Parliament to add notes and Scripture proofs, which they did, and the final version was presented to Parliament on 29 April 1647. The WCF consists of thirty-three chapters and represents a major codification of the developing *Reformed theology, which had its origins in the work of *Zwingli and *Calvin. Its chapters on the doctrine of God and the person and work of Christ place it firmly in the Nicæan and Chalcedonian tradition (see *Creeds). Its chapters on justification and sanctification follow the mainstream of the *Reformation. Its chapters on God's eternal decree, the fall of man, effectual calling and the perseverance of the saints reflect the Calvinistic tradition of the Reformation in which it is located, as do the chapters on the sacraments. Part of the significance of the WCF lies in the fact that it was the first confessional statement to fully expound federal theology (see *Covenant), following Archbishop Usher's Irish Articles which had already presented this theology in its 'seed form'. It also marks a significant change from earlier creeds and confessions in that the greater part of it is concerned with personal salvation and the ordo salutis.

When the WCF was finalized, it was shortly thereafter adopted and approved by the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland. In England it was of less permanent significance. The *Presbyterian Church was established in England on 13 October 1647, but Cromwell's army undermined this. Finally, in 1662, Charles II ejected the Presbyterian ministers, and that effectively spelled the end of Presbyterianism in England.

The Assembly then prepared the Shorter Catechism, presented on 5 November 1647, and the Larger Catechism, presented on 14 April 1648. These *catechisms provided a summary of the teaching of the WCF, especially for the education of the young.

Almost every Presbyterian church in the world either has (or used to have) the WCF as its principal subordinate standard of doctrine. It was also adopted by the original Synod in North America in 1729 and was later amended and revised in 1787.

See also: CONFESSIONS OF FAITH.

Bibliography

The Westminster Confession of Faith; W. Beveridge, A Short History of the Westminster Assembly (Greenville, 1993); S. W. Carruthers, The Everyday Work of the Westminster Assembly (Greenville, 1994); J. L. Duncan III (ed.), The Westminster Confession into the 21st Century, 2 vols. (Fearn, 2003, 2004); A. I. C. Heron, The Westminster Confession in the Church Today (Edinburgh, 1982).

A. T. B. MCGOWAN

WHEATON DECLARATION

The Wheaton Declaration was issued by an ecumenical conference of evangelical missionaries who met at Wheaton College in Illinois on 9–16 April 1966. This 'Congress on the Church's Worldwide Mission', called by the Interdenominational Foreign Mission Association and the Evangelical Foreign Missions Association, attracted over 900 missionaries and national leaders, and was the largest evangelical gathering of the kind in North America to that date. The Congress's 'Declaration' called for greater cooperation and more research about evangelistic work. It also confessed that evangelicals had not applied biblical teaching to many of the great critical issues of the modern world, including *race relations, *family decay, war, social revolution and communism (see *Marxism and Christianity). On directly theological matters, it affirmed that the Bible, 'the only authoritative, inerrant Word of God', was the proper source of all missionary strategy. It denied that other *religions led truly to God (see *Christianity and other religions), while at the same time acknowledging that '*cultural accretions' sometimes compromised evangelical proclamation of the gospel. It reaffirmed the reality of eternal punishment (see *Eschatology) and repudiated the idea that all people would some day be redeemed (see *Universalism). And it warned about the danger of treating the Roman Catholic Church as a sister church. The Wheaton Congress helped pave the way for even larger international gatherings of evangelicals at Berlin (1966), *Lausanne (1974) and elsewhere.

Bibliography

H. Lindsell, 'Precedent-Setting in Missions Strategy', CT, 29 April 1966, p. 43; 'The Wheaton Declaration', CT, 13 May 1966, p. 48.

M. A. NOLL

WHITEFIELD, GEORGE (1714–70)

George Whitefield, the preacher and evangelist, was born at Gloucester, England. While an undergraduate at Oxford he was converted and experienced a call to the ministry of the Church of England. Following his ordination he preached his first sermon, which was said to have driven fifteen hearers mad. Tremendous congregations flooded the churches to hear him, but being denied the constant use of these buildings he resorted to the open air. Needing help, he influenced John (and Charles) *Wesley to undertake an outdoor ministry too. He preached twice and sometimes three times a day and proved able to make himself heard by crowds of 20,000; this was his manner of life from the age of twenty-two until he died at fifty-five.

Whitefield carried his message throughout most of the English-speaking world of that time. Important in this labour were his seven visits to America and fifteen to Scotland, together with his frequent ministry in Wales. He preached repeatedly in almost all the counties of England, founded two large churches in London and ministered regularly to the nobility at the home of Lady Huntingdon. At first he organized his followers into societies, and during his lifetime he was known as 'the leader and founder of *Methodism'.

Whitefield was drawn toward Calvinist theology (see *Reformed theology) even before his conversion and thereafter increased in his understanding of its doctrines. But John Wesley, in addressing a congregation of Whitefield's people, preached a severe sermon against *predestination. He published the sermon and Whitefield produced a reply. He wrote graciously, but Wesley was offended and broke off fellowship. Methodism was thereby divided into two branches, the Calvinistic (see *Calvinistic Methodism) and the *Arminian.

Whitefield sought to effect a reconciliation, but soon realized there was little hope of doing so as long as he remained at the head of his branch of the work. He determined to relinquish his leadership and allow Wesley to have first place. To the many who urged him to retain his prominence, he replied, 'Let the name of Whitefield perish, but Christ be glorified!' He became 'the servant of all', and throughout the rest of his life he helped any evangelical minister and especially assisted Wesley.

His ministry combined a clear declaration of the sovereignty of God with the free offer of salvation to all who would believe on Christ. A powerful urgency characterized his delivery; he often broke into copious tears as he pleaded with sinners. His major themes were the holiness of God and the sinfulness and helplessness of man, and justification through the *atonement of Christ. He was a man of holy life, and as Wesley suggested when preaching at his funeral, history records none 'who called so many myriads of sinners to repentance'.

Bibliography

Works: The Works of the Rev. George Whitefield, 6 vols. (London, 1771); George Whitefield's Journals (London, 1960); George Whitefield's Letters (Edinburgh, 1976).

Studies: A. Dallimore, George Whitefield, 2 vols. (Edinburgh and Westchester, 1970, 1980); F. Lambert, 'Pedlar in Divinity': George Whitefield and the Transatlantic Revivals, 1737–1770 (Princeton, 1994); H. S. Start, The Divine Dramatist: George Whitefield and the Rise of Modern Evangelicalism (Grand Rapids, 1991).

A. DALLIMORE

WHITEHEAD, A. N., see PROCESS THEOLOGY

WIESEL, ELIE (b. 1928)

Elie Wiesel is the most influential *Holocaust survivor in the world today. He was born in Sighet, North Transylvania (now part of Romania) on 30 September 1928. The Jews of Sighet were deported to Auschwitz-Birkenau in May 1944. Wiesel's mother and younger sister, Tzipora, were killed immediately on arrival. His father died in Buchenwald in January 1945 following a death march from Auschwitz. Wiesel was liberated on 11 April 1945. He later discovered his two elder sisters had also survived.

Wiesel decided against returning to Sighet. Initially he lived in France, then moved to the United States and became a naturalized American citizen in 1963. As the first chair of the United States Holocaust Memorial Council, Wiesel presided over the creation of an annual national commemoration of the Holocaust (the Days of Remembrance) in 1979, and the initial planning for the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum (which opened in 1993). His contributions to American public life were formally marked with the award of the Congressional Gold Medal (1985) and the Presidential Medal of Freedom (1992). International accolades include the Nobel Peace Prize (1986) and an honorary knighthood from the British government (2006).

Wiesel's work straddles different genres. Initially a journalist, he became a full-time writer in the mid 1960s and primarily writes in French. He has published novels, plays, a cantata, liturgies for Yom hashoah (Holocaust Remembrance Day, co-written with Albert Friedlander) and Passover, as well as numerous essays on biblical, Talmudic and Hasidic figures, recasting their stories in light of the Holocaust (e.g. portraying Isaac as the first survivor and Jeremiah as the first survivor-witness).

Wiesel insists he is not a theologian and maintains that there can be no theology either about or after Auschwitz. Nevertheless, he has profoundly influenced the development of Holocaust theology and contemporary Jewish-Christian relations. Theologians cite Wiesel and his work, particularly Night (1958, ET 1960), as the authoritative testimonial voice on the subject of God and the deathcamps. Presented as an account of the impact of the Holocaust on his childhood faith, Night introduces the motif of the trial of God that dominates Wiesel's subsequent work. The text, and Wiesel's account of the public hanging of a young child (an account that can be read as a rewriting of the crucifixion) has inspired numerous Christian theologians (including Dorothee Soelle, Jürgen Moltmann and Paul Fiddes) to reflect on the theology of the cross and divine suffering (see Impassibility of God and human suffering*).

Bibliography

R. Franciosi (ed.), Elie Wiesel: Interviews (Jackson, 2002); C. Rittner (ed.), Elie Wiesel: Between Memory and Hope (New York, 1990); M. Sarot, 'Auschwitz, Morality and the Suffering of God', Modern Theology 7, 1991, pp. 135–152; E. Wiesel, Night, new tr. M. Wiesel (London, 2006).

I. WOLLASTON

WILL

It is a fundamental characteristic of human beings that they are capable of taking decisions about what they should do, and of carrying them out. According to Scripture such powers are an important part of the imago Dei ('image of God'). But what, more exactly, is the power to decide and how does it relate both to the divine will, and to the effects of sin* and divine grace* upon human nature?

Some have thought that the will is confined to the power to execute what the understanding believes that it is best, in all relevant circumstances, to do. The person expresses such preferences by appropriate mental acts, 'volitions', which bring about physical actions unless prevented by other circumstances (e.g. physical weakness or the compulsion of others). While some attribute to the will in this sense the power of acting against the understanding, what is sometimes called the power of contrary choice or the freedom of indifference, others have argued that such a theory is incoherent. Augustine* thought of the will in more dispositional terms, as the metaphysical and ethical directedness of human nature, as a set of preferences which, if not hindered by external factors, will express itself in actions of a certain character.

On either view there is a prima facie problem of reconciling the activity of the human will with the divine. Those who have attributed powers of contrary choice or self-determination to the human will have often attempted to effect such a reconciliation by limiting the scope of the divine decree in some respect, for example, by denying that God foreordains all human actions, while allowing that he foreknows them (see Predestination*). Others have rested content with maintaining that while God foreordains all human actions he is not the author of sin; either because, since sin is a deficiency,

God cannot be its author, or by holding that since to be free is to do what one wants to do, the occurrence of such wanting guarantees freedom and responsibility, whatever the exact nature and scope of the divine decree.

The question of the effects of sin upon human nature raises moral rather than metaphysical issues (see *Fall). No-one in the central Christian tradition has asserted that sin changes human nature into a nature of another kind. And yet if human beings are in bondage to sin, and cannot live in such a way as to please God by keeping his law, then divine grace is needed to renew them, and the question arises how divine renewal of such strength and depth can be efficacious if the human will is metaphysically free to resist and to reject it. So how the divine will in its savingly gracious operations harmonizes with the human will is a special case of the more general question of the relation between the human will and the divine will. Even if it is said that such divine grace constitutes a rescue, it is still nevertheless a rescue which does not violate the distinctive powers of human nature, but rather restores and redirects them. Such radical conclusions have been disputed by adopting less radical views of human need and of the divine provision.

Besides these metaphysical issues the effect of sin on the human will also raises ethical questions, particularly the question as to whether a person without grace is ethically free.

Discussion is sometimes confused because of a failure to distinguish the moral from the metaphysical dimension; at other times the biblical teaching on the bondage of the will to sin is resisted on the grounds that it is mistaken to make a distinction between the moral and the metaphysical. Rather, it is asserted that the power of contrary choice is the supreme moral value. But it is clear that according to Scripture redemption in principle secures the restoration of a particular ethical directedness lost at the fall. The *freedom that Christ brought is not so much an increase in the range of possible human powers, as a change in that range through release from the corrupting and enslaving power of sin.

In the history of Christian theology, *Augustinianism, both in its pre-Reformation and post-Reformation phases, has equally stressed the all-encompassing nature of the divine decree, and the bondage of the human will (voluntas) to sin, while still maintaining that God is not the author of sin, neither is violence done to the human will in gracious conversion. Those who, like Jonathan *Edwards, are in the Augustinian tradition, but who have adopted a non-Augustinian view of the will, have tried not altogether successfully to mitigate the consequences of this position for human responsibility by distinguishing between moral and natural ability and inability, arguing that while sin disables morally, it does not do so naturally.

One attempt to mediate between Augustinian and *Pelagian conceptions of the will has emphasized the idea of co-operation (sometimes called 'synergism') between the human and the divine will. But such a proposal is inherently unstable, being liable to lapse into a monergism of either the divine or the human will. It is not clear how, metaphysically, such a co-operation could be effected, nor is it easy to see how such a view could do justice to the biblical teaching already noted.

If, on the Augustinian view, the will is wholly dependent on the coming of enlivening grace, could it prepare itself for such a grace (see *Semi-Pelagianism)? Debate on 'preparationism' has been plagued by a lack of clarity over the central terms. Clearly, no consistent Augustinian could hold that a person might prepare himself to be renewed, for such preparation is encompassed in any renewal. But this is not to say that individuals may not, unknowingly, be prepared by grace for conversion, or that they ought to adopt a policy of total passivity when faced with the overtures of the gospel.

Bibliography

Augustine, Enchiridion, Free Will, and Other Works; D. and R. Basinger (eds.), Predestination and Free Will: Four Views of Divine Sovereignty and Human Freedom (Downers Grove, 1986); V. J. Bourke, Will in Western Thought (New York, 1964); J. Edwards, The Freedom of the Will, Works, vol. 1 (New Haven, 1957); J. Ellul, The Ethics of Freedom (London, 1976); A. Farrer, The Freedom of the Will (London, 1958); E. Gibson, The Spirit of Medieval Philosophy (London, 1936); E. Gilson, The Christian Philosophy of St Augustine (London, 1961); J. N. Lapsley (ed.), The Concept of Willing (Nashville, 1967); M. Luther, The Bondage of the Will, tr. J. I. Packer and O. R. Johnston (Cambridge, 1957); D. Müller, NIDNTT III, pp. 1015–1023.

P. HELM

WILLIAM OF OCKHAM (1280/5–1349)

The English *scholastic theologian and philosopher William of Ockham joined the *Franciscan order and studied at Oxford. Following the usual programme in theology, he first lectured on the Bible and then on the Sentences of Peter *Lombard (probably 1317–19). Before he received his licence to teach, charges of heresy were brought against him by the chancellor of his university. Ockham was called to the papal court at Avignon in 1324 to defend himself. Articles of censure were drawn up, but the inquiry was never completed. While at Avignon, Ockham was drawn into his order's dispute with the pope concerning evangelical poverty. In 1328 he fled to Pisa where Emperor Lewis of Bavaria, an opponent of the pope, was residing. Excommunicated after leaving Avignon, Ockham stayed at the imperial court for the rest of his life. He died in Munich, probably of the Black Death.

Ockham's flight from Avignon divides his career: before, he was an academic, writing theological and philosophical works; after, he became a polemicist, defending his order and the emperor and condemning the pope for heresy and abuse of spiritual power.

The Commentary on the Sentences presents the most complete account of Ockham's thought, but he revised and edited only the first book (the Ordinatio). The other three books are available only in an unrevised 'report' (Reportationes). Also important is the Summa Logicae, since it is a more mature expression of his logic.

Ockham is the most important figure in the development of the 'modern way', the *nominalist or terminist movement, as opposed to the moderate realism of the 'ancient way' represented by such theologians as *Bonaventura, *Thomas Aquinas and *Duns Scotus. While some interpreters have held that Ockham was a destroyer who upset the careful balance between *faith and reason worked out by the earlier schoolmen, other interpreters have seen authentic Christian concern as the source of his position.

The root of his thought is an awareness that everything depends on *God as creator and conservator for both its existence and its place in creation. The logical implications of this dependence are worked out in his teaching that God has the power to conserve, destroy, create separately or differently everything found in experience or held on faith. This does not mean that Ockham distrusts the reliability of nature or God; rather, he accepts the regularities of nature and the constancy of moral norms, but shows the limitations of natural certainty in the light of God's omnipotence. This opposition to all necessity in creation is a Christian response to a natural *determinism that had become prominent in the arts faculty in Paris around 1270. So for Ockham, God is omnipotent and free, able to do everything that does not involve a logical contradiction, and the world is totally *contingent. True statements about finite things are contingent truths dependent on the divine will.

For Ockham, only individuals exist. The immediate awareness of individuals, intuitive knowledge, is the basis of knowledge of individuals. The objects of intuitive knowledge are not limited to material things, for there is intuitive knowledge of acts of desiring and will. Both sense-perception and introspection are sources of natural knowledge of reality. Through generalization other individuals of the same nature can be known, and this is the basis of the knowledge found in universal propositions.

Ockham insists that only propositions in the mode of possibility can be necessary. Hence it is not possible to infer the existence of what is not known, including the existence of God, from what is known. Where prior schoolmen had analysed diverse aspects of being, Ockham replaced such *metaphysical analyses with a logical analysis of the use of terms, their significative or non-significative role in propositions, and connections in arguments. Ockham does not deny the principle of causality or reduce it to the idea of regular sequence, but says we can discover the cause of an event only through experience. In general, Ockham rejects most of the metaphysical teachings of the earlier schoolmen.

In his political tracts, Ockham was mainly concerned with curbing the abuses that stemmed from the pope's claim to absolute power (plenitudo potestatis). He did not seek to subordinate either ecclesiastical or temporal power to the other, but wanted freedom from total ecclesiastical power. He sought to achieve this by restricting each power to its own sphere. True spiritual power is displayed in Christ, who renounced all possessions and attempts to make him a temporal king and lived on alms and exercised only a spiritual mission. Ockham made non-involvement in temporal matters the criterion of legitimate spiritual power; the pope errs when he claims temporal power where Christ refused to exercise such authority. Neither the pope, nor civil rulers, nor the clergy alone, but wise men who sincerely love justice and are guided by the gospel are competent to judge what is legitimate for the church.

See also: SCHOLASTICISM.

Bibliography

Works: Predestination, God's Foreknowledge and Future Contingents, tr. M. McCord Adams and N. Kretzmann (East Norwalk, 1969); Ockham's Theory of Terms: Part I of the Summa Logicae, tr. M. J. Loux (Notre Dame, 1974); Ockham's Theory of Propositions: Part II of the Summa Logicae, tr. A. J. Freddoso and H. Schuurman (Notre Dame, 1980); Philosophical Writings, ed. and tr. P. Boethner and S. F. Brown (Nashville, 1989); Quodlibetal Questions, 2 vols., tr. A. J. Freddoso and F. G. Kelley (New Haven and London, 1991).

Studies: Standard histories of medieval philosophy contain an introductory account of Ockham's work. See also: M. McCord Adams, William of Ockham, 2 vols. (Notre Dame, 1987); J. P. Beckmann, Ockham: Bibliographie, 1900–1990 (Hamburg, 1992); G. Left, William of Ockham (Manchester, 1975); A. S. McGrade, The Political Thought of William of Ockham (Cambridge, 1974); E. A. Moody, 'William of Ockham', in EP 8, pp. 306–317.

A. Vos

WILLIAMS, CHARLES WALTER STANSBY (1886–1945)

Charles Williams, the English novelist, poet, critic and lay theologian, grew up in St Albans and was educated at St Albans Grammar School, University College, London, and the Working Men's College, London. He worked as a proofreader and editor at the Oxford University Press from 1908 until his death. He produced seven novels, ten volumes of his own poetry (besides editing many others), six biographies, many verse plays (most of which were privately printed), four volumes of literary criticism, several volumes of theology (which are difficult to number, since some, e.g. Religion and Love in Dante, London, 1941, and The Figure of Beatrice, London, 1943, are as much literary criticism as theology), and one brief and idiosyncratic history of the church, The Descent of the Dove (London, 1939).

Williams is best remembered for his novels (e.g. Descent into Hell, London, 1937, and All Hallows' Eve, London, 1945), and his cycle of Arthurian poems, published in two volumes, Taliessin Through Logres (Oxford, 1938), and The Region of the Summer Stars (Oxford, 1944). In his fiction and poetry as well as in his essays, Williams expounds his 'theology of romantic love', the key idea deriving from Dante's vision of Beatrice as an image of beauty that beckoned him on to God, the perfection of all beauty. Williams stresses the notions of 'exchange', 'substitution' and 'coinherence', as summing up the law of 'the City' [of God]. An early interest in Rosicrucianism, and brief membership in the Order of the Golden Dawn, do not appear to have compromised his lifelong Anglican orthodoxy.

Bibliography

G. Cavaliero, Charles Williams: Poet of Theology (Grand Rapids, 1983); L. Glenn, Charles W. S. Williams: A Checklist (Kent, 1975); A. M. Hadfield, Charles Williams: An Exploration of His Life and Work (Oxford, 1983); T. Howard, The Novels of Charles Williams (Oxford, 1983); C. A. Huttar and P. J. Schakel (eds.), The Rhetoric of Vision: Essays on Charles Williams (London, 1996).

T. HOWARD

WILLIAMS, ROGER (c. 1603–83)

Roger Williams, a *Puritan dissenter, founded Rhode Island colony, a template for the separation of church and *state. Born in England, he attended Charterhouse and Cambridge, taking a degree in 1627. He migrated to Massachusetts in 1631, taught in Plymouth, and was pastor at Salem. He urged colonists to break from government-supported religion. True worship, he said, is never coerced, and civil officials should not enforce the first four commandments. Banished from Massachusetts in October 1635, he went into the wilderness and lived with Indians to avoid deportation to England. The Providence settlement was established on land purchased in 1636 from the Indians. A social covenant, worked out in 1638, governed only civic life. Religious dissenters flocked there, and Williams secured the Rhode Island colony's charter in 1644. His foremost writings were The Bloody Tenent of Persecution (1644), which advocated that none be persecuted for conscience's sake, and The Bloody Tenent Yet More Bloody (1652). He regarded ancient Israel's relationship with God as unique and a model for the church but not other nations. He rejected Episcopal, Presbyterian and Congregational systems, and in 1639 joined America's first Baptist congregation. Soon disappointed, he withdrew, claiming thereafter to be a 'Seeker' who awaited the reappearance of apostolic Christianity.

Bibliography

E. Gaustad, Liberty of Conscience: Roger Williams in America (Grand Rapids, 1991); W. C. Gilpin, The Millenarian Piety of Roger Williams (Chicago, 1979); P. Miller, Roger Williams: His Contributions to the American Tradition (Indianapolis, 1951).

S. INGERSOL

WILLIAMS, ROWAN (b. 1950)

The Most Reverend and Right Honourable Rowan Douglas Williams was the 104th Archbishop of Canterbury, as well as a noted theologian and poet. He was born in Swansea, Wales, on 14 June 1950 to a Welsh-speaking family. He was educated at Dynevor School, Swansea, and later attended Christ's College, Cambridge, reading theology. He received a DPhil from Wadham College, Oxford, in 1975, writing about twentieth-century Russian Orthodox theologian Vladimir Lossky. He held a number of academic posts at Mirfield Theological College, the University of Cambridge, and Oxford University until in 1991 he was consecrated Bishop of Monmouth, then in 1999 Archbishop of Wales. In 2002 he was announced as the successor to George Carey as Archbishop of Canterbury. Williams stood down as Archbishop of Canterbury in 2012 in order to take up the position of Master of Magdalene College at Cambridge University.

Rowan Williams' theological publications are extensive, including historical works such as Arius: Heresy and Tradition and Teresa of Avila and theological works such as On Christian Theology and The Wound of Knowledge, which is a history of Christian spirituality. He has also published socio-critical essays, works of poetry, reflections on icons and collections of sermons. His writing and sermons demonstrate an appreciation of the rich diversity of the Christian tradition. He eschews simple oppositions, arguing that the complexities and ambiguities to be found in fiction, drama and poetry are often more accurate accounts of cultural realities. Williams also has a highly nuanced approach to theological writing, reflecting a wide range of influences. These include his study of the early Church Fathers, Russian Orthodox theologians such as Sergei Bulgakov and philosophers such as Gillian Rose (1947–95).

These diverse influences inform his belief that theology takes on celebratory, communicative and critical forms. None of these modes is dominant and must be continually considered in the light of Scripture, Christian tradition and experience. When Christians disagree, he advocates the practice of Christians reading the Bible together. Doctrinal themes, including creation, the incarnation and the Trinity, play an important role in his interpretation of ethical, political and social issues. Nevertheless, for Williams Christian orthodoxy is less a doctrine than a method of continually evaluating what we know of Jesus from the Christian life he initiated, and what in turn we learn of living a Christian life through the models put forth in Scripture. This way of thinking influences his approach to many ethical debates, including, most controversially, sexual ethics. In this context there is a tension between the thinking of Williams the theologian and Williams the church leader, which can be seen clearly by comparing his scholarly writing and his leadership as archbishop. For Williams, all human activity ought to be viewed in the light of the self-giving love of the Trinity, which models both giving and receiving.

Bibliography

Selected Works: The Wound of Knowledge: Christian Spirituality from the New Testament to St. John of the Cross (London, 1979); Resurrection: Interpreting the Easter Gospel (London, 1982); The Truce of God (London, 1983); Arius: Heresy and Tradition (London, 1987); Teresa of Avila (London, 1991); Open to Judgement: Sermons and Addresses (London, 1994); Christ on Trial: How the Gospel Unsettles Our Judgement (London, 2000); Lost Icons: Reflection on Cultural Bereavement (Edinburgh, 2000); On Christian Theology (Oxford, 2000); Ponder These Things: Praying with Icons of the Virgin (Norwich, 2002); Writing in the Dust: Reflections on 11th September and Its Aftermath (London, 2002); Poems of Rowan Williams (Newent, 2002).

Studies: M. Higton, Difficult Gospel: The Theology of Rowan Williams (London, 2004); T. Hobson, Anarchy, Church and Utopia: Rowan Williams on Church (London, 2005); R. Shortt, Rowan Williams: An Introduction (London, 2003).

J. P. MITCHELL

WINGREN, GUSTAF (1910–2000)

Gustaf Wingren succeeded Anders *Nygren as Professor of Systematic Theology (1951–77) at Lund in Sweden, and his work was in close dialogue both with that of his predecessor and, through him, with that of *Aulén. Of the three major Swedish theologians of the twentieth century, Wingren is the least well known, probably because his work is less richly dramatic and more cautious and corrective than that of Nygren and Aulén.

His published work is especially notable for its attempt to hold together the doctrines of *creation and redemption in a way which Protestant theology has traditionally found very difficult. His affirmation of creation and the moral law as starting points for Christian theology is intended to serve as a corrective to both Nygren's exclusive concentration on the descent-motif of agape and *Barth's Christocentrism and hostility to all talk of a relatively independent order of creation. In this way, he was enabled to give fuller weight to human reality outside the gospel. In *Christology, Wingren drew heavily on Nygren and *Irenaeus, but placed especial emphasis on the humanity of Jesus, the agent of salvation, once again underlining the significance of human action.

Bibliography

Works: The Christian's Calling (Edinburgh, 1958); Theology in Conflict (Edinburgh, 1958); Man and Incarnation (Edinburgh, 1959); Creation and Law (Edinburgh, 1961); Gospel and Church (Edinburgh, 1964).

Studies: B. Erling, 'Swedish Theology from Nygren to Wingren', Religion in Life 30, 1960–61, pp. 206–208; S. P. Schilling, Contemporary Continental Theologians (London, 1966).

J. B. WEBSTER

WISDOM IN EARLY CHRISTOLOGY

The concept of wisdom (sophia) in early Christian texts is a matter of current debate among scholars. The extent to which the few NT references to Christ in terms of wisdom echo OT and intertestamental references to wisdom is disputed, but the parallels should probably not be pressed too far. A number of texts in Jewish Wisdom literature appear to 'personify' the concept of wisdom; the nature and implications of this literary device have recently been re-evaluated.

The female personification of Sophia has been seen as an accident of gender in Hebrew and Greek grammar. However, in recent years some have sought to recover this feminine aspect of God, identifying a transformation in early Christian thinking from female Sophia to male Word (*Logos). The prologue to John's Gospel is seen as a strong example of this transformation, but the origin of the shift is debated by modern scholars. It has been noted that early Syriac Christianity found it easier to accommodate wisdom than Greek and Latin Christianity because the Semitic word for spirit is feminine, making it possible to identify the *Holy Spirit with Sophia and the mother of Christ. However, generally wisdom does not appear to have been regarded as a 'divine being' separate in some sense from Yahweh himself (cf. the personification of the 'name', 'glory', 'power' or 'arm' of the Lord), and the Christian doctrine of the pre-existence of Christ as the Son of God is not merely an adaptation of a supposed Jewish hypostatization of divine wisdom. The association of wisdom with Christ implied in certain NT passages emphasizes the link between creation and redemption.

In patristic *Christology the concept of wisdom, and in particular the wisdom passage in Prov. 8:22–31, becomes more prominent than in the NT. Although it is not typical of the Fathers in general, some writers identify wisdom with the Holy Spirit; for example, *Irenaeus, who understands wisdom to be pre-existent and collaborative in creation and salvation with the Word (Against Heresies 4.20.1–4). Theophilus of Antioch follows Irenaeus and, as the first to describe the Godhead as the Trinity, identifies the three persons as God, Word and Wisdom (To Autolycus 1.7; 2.15, 18). *Justin Martyr (Dialogue with Trypho 61, 129) quotes Prov. 8 as part of his argument that the Word (who is the divine Wisdom) is distinct yet inseparable from God. Athenagoras (Embassy 10) and *Tertullian (Against Hermogenes 18; 20; Against Praxeas 6–7) quote from Prov. 8 as part of a ‘two-stage’ history of the Logos: there is the Word immanent in the mind of God from all eternity and there is the Word expressed or sent forth for the purposes of creation.

*Origen (On First Principles 1.2.1–2) understands that wisdom in Prov. 8 refers to Christ, and by the time of the Arian controversy the idea that the OT wisdom passages spoke directly of Christ was so well established that Prov. 8:22–31, which in the LXX speaks of wisdom as ‘created’, ‘established’, ‘made’ and ‘begotten’, became a major storm centre. *Arius used this passage as one of his chief proof-texts and, in opposing his theology, *Athanasius provides the longest patristic commentary on Prov. 8.22 (Against the Arians 2.18–61, 72–82), asserting Christ’s full divinity and identifying him as both the Word and the Wisdom of the Father (Against the Arians 1.16), as does *Augustine later (On the Trinity 2.14). After the Council of *Ephesus there was a tendency to link attributes of wisdom to *Mary as Theotokos, and aspects of the female symbolism for God were, in some traditions, channelled into the veneration of Mary.

Bibliography

J. D. G. Dunn, Christology in the Making (London, 1989); C. H. T. Fletcher-Louis, ‘Wisdom Christology and the Parting of the Ways between Judaism and Christianity’, in S. E. Porter and B. W. R. Pearson (eds.), Christian-Jewish Relations through the Centuries, JSNTS 192 (Sheffield, 2000); M. Hengel, Studies in Early Christology (London, 1998); G. M. Jantzen, Power, Gender and Christian Mysticism (Cambridge, 1995); B. Newman, ‘The Transformations of Sophia’, Vox Benedictina 11, 1994, pp. 33–57; T. E. Pollard, Johannine Christology and the Early Church (Cambridge, 1970); R. R. Ruether, Goddesses and the Divine Feminine (Los Angeles, 2005).

A. D. RICH

WISLØFF, CARL FREDRIK (1908–2004)

Born in Drammen, Norway, Wisløff graduated from the Free Faculty of Theology, Oslo, in 1931. In 1958 he defended his PhD thesis Nattverd og Messe at the University of Oslo (ET, The Gift of Communion: Luther’s Controversy with Rome on Eucharistic Sacrifice, Minneapolis, 1964). Ordained in 1932, he became rector of the Practical Theology Department of the Free Faculty of Theology in 1940, and Professor of Church History in 1961.

Wisløff was one of the most outstanding representatives of evangelical Christianity in Scandinavia. A convinced *Lutheran, he also co-operated with evangelicals from different denominations, for instance in his collaboration on a new translation of the Bible into Norwegian. Wisløff’s vigorous defence of the inspiration and authority of all *Scripture was a source of tension between him and colleagues. *Justification by *faith is one of the main themes in his theology.

Wisløff’s paper on the *World Council of Churches (1952) gave Norwegian Christians guidelines for a critical attitude to the theological relativism advocated by the WCC. (The Norwegian Missionary Council withdrew from the International Missionary Council at the merger of the IMC and WCC in 1961.) Wisløff also strongly emphasized the *priesthood of all believers and urged freedom for Christian organizations and societies within the Church of Norway.

Wisløff was for many years a leading figure in the Norwegian Evangelical Student Movement and the International Fellowship of Evangelical Students. He was the author of more than thirty books, the best known being Jeg vet påhvem jeg tror (ET, I Know in Whom I Believe, Minneapolis, 1946), a *dogmatics translated into more than thirteen languages.

N. YRI

WITHERSPOON, JOHN (1723–94)

Witherspoon was a founder of American *Presbyterianism. Born in Gifford, Scotland, a minister’s son, he received his MA and theology degrees from Edinburgh University. He was the pastor to several Church of Scotland congregations, including Paisley, for twenty-five years and became renowned through his writings. In 1768 he crossed the Atlantic to become the sixth president of the College of New Jersey (now Princeton University). The college prospered under his leadership, and he instilled in the curriculum and among American Presbyterians generally a respect for Scottish *common-sense philosophy. That philosophy's affinity for science and reasonable approach toward Christianity reoriented *Princeton theology from the pietistic theology of one of his predecessors, Jonathan *Edwards. Witherspoon tutored many students who became active in revolutionary politics, including James Madison, a key architect of the American Constitution and the United States' fourth president. Witherspoon served in the Continental Congress 1776–82 and was the only clergyman to sign the Declaration of Independence. The college suffered greatly during the war, and he spent the post-war years rebuilding it. In 1789, he moderated the opening sessions of the Presbyterian Church's First General Assembly, held in Philadelphia, and influenced the denomination's stances on doctrine, polity and worship.

Bibliography

'John Witherspoon', Dictionary of American Biography, vol. 20 (New York, 1943), pp. 435–438; J. J. A. Mackay, 'Witherspoon of Paisley and Princeton', Theology Today January 1962, pp. 473–481; M. Noll, 'John Witherspoon', in M. G. Toulouse and J. O. Duke (eds.), Makers of Christian Theology in America (Nashville, 1997), pp. 82–84; M. L. L. Stohlman, John Witherspoon: Parson, Politician, Patriot (Louisville and Westminster, 1976).

S. INGERSOL

WITTGENSTEIN, LUDWIG JOSEF JOHANN (1889–1951)

Wittgenstein explored two distinct philosophical approaches to the problem of language, meaning and logical necessity. His importance as a creative thinker extends not only to philosophy, but also less directly to theology, *hermeneutics and questions of method in the social sciences. He was deeply influenced by the intellectual and cultural climate of Vienna, where he was born, but in 1908 he moved to England to study engineering, and after 1930 taught philosophy at Cambridge for much of his remaining life. His passionate concern to understand the foundations on which any subsequent problem rested drove him from engineering to mathematics, from mathematics to logic, and from logic to the philosophy of logic, which he studied at Cambridge under Bertrand Russell (1872–1970). His earlier thought (roughly 1913–29) is dominated by the problem of logical necessity, the limits of language, and the nature of propositions. In his later thought (especially after 1933) he finds the foundation of language not in abstract logic but in the ongoing stream of human life in its varied forms.

Wittgenstein's earlier thought is available in his Notebooks and in the brief but rigorous Tractatus Logico-Philosophicus. This work begins by distinguishing things (or logical objects) from facts (or determinate states of affairs). A name may refer to a thing; but a proposition depicts a state of affairs. The combination of logical elements within an elementary proposition corresponds structurally with the combination of things which constitute facts, or states of affairs. Wittgenstein alludes to the proceedings of a Paris lawcourt, in which dolls and other models were set up in various formations to depict alleged states of affairs relating to a car accident. He comments, 'In the proposition a world is, as it were, put together experimentally' (Notebooks, p. 7). 'A proposition is a model of reality as we imagine it' (Tractatus, 4.01). 'A thought is a proposition with a sense' (4). Hence, if we could combine all fact-stating propositions within a single logical system, we could comprehensively describe the whole world, articulate all determinate thoughts and thus reach the very limits of language. His last proposition in the Tractatus reads: 'What we cannot speak about, we must pass over in silence' (7). Unlike Russell and A. J. Ayer (1910–89), Wittgenstein did not make this part of a positivist doctrine. Indeed, what could not be 'said' might still be profoundly important.

From 1929 onwards, however, Wittgenstein became increasingly aware that 'the crystalline purity' of the fact-stating language of the logician's classroom was 'a preconceived idea'; one which can only be removed 'by turning our whole examination round' (Philosophical Investigations, section 108). As a logician he had said, 'There must be . . .' But if we actually 'look and see' (66), there comes before our eyes a wide variety of uses of language, each of which serves a concrete and particular situation. 'The speaking of language is part of an activity, or of a form of life' (23). Wittgenstein employed the term 'language-game' to draw attention to several points: that often (though not always) meaning depends on use; that meaning arises from the wholeness of language and 'the actions into which it is woven' (7); and that concepts change when there are changes in the situation in life which gives them their particular grammar. The richness and fruitfulness of this later angle of approach can be seen only when we follow Wittgenstein in attending to the concrete instances which he investigates. These are all language-uses which have significance for philosophy, but many also arise in theology and hermeneutics: understanding, meaning, intending, believing, thinking, fearing, expecting, loving and many more. The ‘grammar’ of believing, for example, cannot be separated from the speaker’s own stance in life. Thus: ‘If there were a verb meaning “to believe falsely”, it would not have any significant first person present indicative.’ Wittgenstein develops this approach further by examining the importance of shared practices and shared language-using behaviours. This has far-reaching consequences for the technical notion of ‘private’ language. Wittgenstein laid the foundation for work on language which we now take for granted, such as speech-act theory, and also re-enforced the importance of questions about community, context, and tradition, in hermeneutics and the social sciences.

See also: LOGICAL POSITIVISM; RELIGIOUS LANGUAGE.

Bibliography

Works: Remarks on the Foundations of Mathematics (Oxford, 1956); Tractatus Logico-Philosophicus (London, 1961); Lectures and Conversations on Aesthetics, Psychology, and Religious Belief (Oxford, 1966); Philosophical Investigations (Oxford, 1967); Zettel (Oxford, 1967); On Certainty (Oxford, 1969).

Studies: A. C. Grayling, Wittgenstein: A Very Short Introduction (Oxford, 2001); A. Janik and S. Toulmin, Wittgenstein’s Vienna (London, 1973); A. Kenny, Wittgenstein (London, 1975); N. Malcolm, Ludwig Wittgenstein: A Memoir (Oxford, 1958); R. Monk, How to Read Wittgenstein (Norton, MA, 2005); H. Morick (ed.), Wittgenstein and the Problem of Other Minds (New York, 1967); D. Pears, Wittgenstein (London, 1971); G. Pitcher, The Philosophy of Wittgenstein (Englewood Cliffs, 1964); R. Rhees, Discussion of Wittgenstein (London, 1970); Royal Institute of Philosophy Lecture VII: Understanding Wittgenstein (London, 1974); A. C. Thiselton, The Two Horizons (Exeter, 1980).

WOLLEBIUS, JOHANNES (1586–1629)

In 1611 Johannes Wollebius succeeded J. J. Grynaeus (1540–1617) as the cathedral preacher in Basle. In 1618 he succeeded Sebastian Beck (1583–1654) as professor of OT and he died of the plague at age forty-three. Wollebius’ most famous work was his Compendium of Christian Theology (1626). Written in Latin, it became the theological textbook in Basle and elsewhere and was republished in English and Dutch, in several editions. The critical Latin edition appeared in 1935 and the modern critical English edition appeared in 1965.

The Compendium is a remarkable example of lucid brevity and a fair witness to *Dort-era *Reformed theology. Contrary to the caricature of Reformed orthodoxy drawn in earlier scholarship, the Compendium is trinitarian, *Protestant and federal (see *Covenant) in soteriology; its hermeneutic is Christ-centred. Employing, for example, Franciscus Junius’ distinction between archetypal and ectypal theology, it witnesses to the methodological development of Reformed theology after *Calvin. Organized in two books, the Compendium is as concerned about ecclesiology and ethics as it is about predestination. In these characteristics it is typical of Reformed theology in Europe and Britain from Theodore *Beza to Peter *van Mastricht.

Bibliography

Works: Christianae Theologiae Compendium, ed. E. Bizer (Neukirchen, 1935).

Studies: J. W. Beardslee (ed.), Reformed Dogmatics: J. Wollebius, G. Voetius, F. Turretin (New York, 1965); E. P. Meijering, ‘The Fathers in Reformed Orthodoxy. Systematic Theology: A. Polanus, J. Wolleb, and Francis Turretini’, in I. Backus (ed.), Reception of the Church Fathers in the West, 2 vols. (Leiden, 1997); R. A. Muller, Post-Reformation Reformed Dogmatics: The Rise and Development of Reformed Orthodoxy, ca. 1520 to ca. 1725 (Grand Rapids, 2003); C. R. Trueman and R. S. Clark, Protestant Scholasticism: Essays in Reassessment (Carlisle, 1999).

R. S. CLARK

A. C. THISELTON

WOMAN, see ANTHROPOLOGY;

FEMINIST THEOLOGY; WOMANIST THEOLOGY

WOMANIST THEOLOGY

Womanist theology surfaced in the US in the 1980s. The term 'womanist', coined by Alice Walker in her book In Search of Our Mothers' Gardens: Womanist Prose, derives from the black folk expression used of audacious adolescent girls, 'you acting womanish'. Womanism emerged amongst African-American women who found that early feminism reflected the circumstances of white middle-class women (e.g. by fighting for the right to work, whereas black American women had always had to work), while the Civil Rights Movement was aimed at African-American men. Similarly, womanist theology arose in criticism of feminist theologies that omitted analysis of the oppression of colour and *black theologies that omitted analysis of the oppression of women. Hence, womanist theology re-examines Christian beliefs, traditions, practices and texts from the perspective of African-American women, critiquing negative stereotypes and seeking empowerment. Pioneering and influential scholars in this area include: Delores Williams, Toinette Eugene, Katie Cannon, Renita Weems and Jacquelyn Grant. Womanist theologians are conscious of the social construction of black womanhood (that is, the negative and controlling stereotypes of black women as mummies, matriarchs, sexual sirens and welfare queens) and the triple oppressions of *gender, *race and class. Womanist theology is referred to as 'God-talk' and is inclusive of words and actions aimed at liberating black women from androcentrism and social domination. Methodological approaches vary, including: retrieving the stories of black women in the biblical narrative; exposing biblical texts and interpretations that degrade women of colour; employing a range of non-biblical sources, fictional and non-fictional.

Biblical interpretation

Womanist theology reinterprets texts against the background of *slavery and the experience of racism in order to eradicate negative portrayals of black women. While *feminist theologians re-read the story of Abram and Sarai (Gen. 16:1–16; 21:9–21) from Sarai's point of view, Weems and Williams make Hagar central. For Weems, Hagar is reconsidered as a symbol of the economic exploitation and racism that characterizes the history of black women in America. In addition, for Williams, Hagar's story is one of resistance and survival, accompanied by significant encounters with God.

God

Womanist theology is deeply dissatisfied with the traditional image of a white patriarchal God and encourages black women to find God in themselves. In Sisters in the Wilderness, Williams asks, 'who do you say God is?' She emphasizes God's wrath, love and forgiveness in respect of the exploitation of the poor (as found in Hosea), and draws attention to the Spirit's anointing of Mary. The prayer and music of Gospel churches is a useful resource in ascertaining the meaning of God as experienced by black women, revealing that little distinction is made between God and Jesus.

Christology

According to womanist theologians, the suffering of Jesus on the cross has been used to reinforce the subordination of black women; hence, a black female Christ has been developed as a necessary corrective. Womanist theologians focus on the humanness rather than maleness of Christ and refer to acts of liberation from oppression as Christ-like. In White Women's Christ and Black Women's Jesus, Grant argues that for black women Christ is a black woman; whereas K. B. Douglas argues that Christ can be seen in the faces of all persons who work towards liberation, including black men (and other women).

Ethics

As a moral theology, womanist theology promotes the portrayal of black women as agents in the continued struggle against the threefold oppressions of gender, race and class employing Christianity (and other religions) as tools and resources for change. Cannon argues, in Black Womanist Ethics, that black woman's moral reasoning has been left out of theological *ethics and, therefore, that theological ethics has provided ideological foundations for systems that corroborate the stereotyping and oppression of black women. Womanist ethics works towards an inclusive ethic that learns from black women's history, culture and traditions and takes seriously the lives and experiences of black women; hence, womanist ethics begins with oppression and the struggle to survive, rather than autonomy and free choice. Nevertheless, while highlighting black culture, womanist ethics is critical of female complicity in oppression and of sexist teaching and practices within the black church (including homophobia). Womanist ethics sees black women as theologically valuable active participants in the church and seeks an end to the sexist stereotypes that justify self-sacrifice and ignore domestic violence. In essence, womanist ethics views sin as oppression, and salvation as liberation; it is, therefore, inclusive of all groups of oppressed persons, retaining close connections with feminist, black, Asian and mujerista theologies (see *Liberation theology).

Womanist theologians have produced groundbreaking work revealing the hidden gender and racial bias in Christianity. In addition, womanist theology has shown that white women, while historically oppressed on the basis of gender, have participated in the oppression of black women, and black men, while historically oppressed on the basis of colour, have participated in the oppression of black women, although there is still work to be done concerning the oppression of poor African-Americans by affluent African-Americans. Tensions remain concerning engagement with 'malestream' theology and, as an experience-based ethic, womanist theological ethics risks being exclusive; nevertheless, the intention and aim of womanist theology is to be inclusive.

Bibliography

K. Baker-Fletcher and G. Baker-Fletcher, My Sister, My Brother: Womanist and Xodus God-Talk (New York, 1997); K. G. Cannon, Katie's Canon: Womanism and the Soul of the Black Community (New York, 1995); idem, Black Womanist Ethics (Atlanta, 1988); K. B. Douglas, The Black Christ (New York, 1994); idem, Sexuality and the Black Church: A Womanist Perspective (New York, 1999); T. M. Eugene, 'Moral Values and Black Womanists', Journal of Religious Thought 44, 1988, pp. 23–34; J. Grant (ed.), Perspectives on Womanist Theology (Atlanta, 1995); idem (ed.), White Women's Christ and Black Women's Jesus: Feminist Christology and Womanist Response (Atlanta, 1989); E. Townes (ed.), A Troubling in My Soul: Womanist Perspectives on Evil and Suffering (New York, 1994); idem (ed.), Womanist Justice, Womanist Hope (Atlanta, 1993); R. Weems, Just a Sister Away:

A Womanist Vision of Women's Relationships in the Bible (San Diego, 1988); D. S. Williams, 'The Color of Feminism: Or Speaking the Black Woman's Tongue', Journal of Religious Thought 43, 1986, pp. 42–54; idem, Sisters in the Wilderness: The Challenge of Womanist God-Talk (New York, 1993).

E. MCINTOSH

WORK

Most people will spend the vast majority of their waking lives working at something, whether paid or unpaid. Not surprisingly, Scripture has plenty to say about how people ought to approach and carry out the perennial human task we call work. It instructs us that if we wish to eat we must work. Yet, it makes clear that toil and necessity are not all there is to life. Work is a gift and a blessing; it is even our co-mission with God. Its fruits are to be received with thankfulness and enjoyed. However, there also must be limits (*Sabbath) to our productive activity, manipulation of the earth and human consumption. Bound up with humanity's *fall, work too is subject to the curse, being tainted by the totalizing network of sin. Thus not all work is automatically good or sanctioned.

Nevertheless, Scripture also tells us that work has always been good for us and for *creation. It is necessary as a means of caring for ourselves, others, and even for the planet. It is also an arena within which personal and spiritual growth becomes possible. Thus, as we work with others and on creation, Scripture teaches us how to be honest, hard-working and diligent. It instructs us to promote and embody fairness and justice, especially for the weak and marginalized. It reorients us so that we can approach all of our work not simply for our own good but also for the good of others, the society and planet, and ultimately for God himself. In Scripture there are numerous lessons to be learnt about good and ethical work, work that is both pleasing to God and good for his creation.

And yet work is never really the primary theological matter or focal point for most biblical writers, if for any. The Scriptures address work and working life to be sure, but in most biblical texts this teaching is consequent, an application stemming from another theological or ethical point being made. Scripture as a whole simply does not intentionally offer something like a comprehensive theology of work.

Nevertheless, the church has always found it necessary to offer some exploratory reflection on work beyond Scripture, if simply practical teaching on the working life. She has wrestled with what Christians should and should not do as our work, as well as how we should conduct the work we undertake. And yet seldom has work itself been the subject or principal interest of the church's theological enquiry. Even *Luther, whom many credit with placing ordinary work on the theological agenda, was not chiefly concerned with the phenomenon of work itself. It was not for him a doctrine as was the theology of the cross. Luther does not offer a theology of work. Rather 'vocation' or calling was the doctrine he was expounding, and how and where our work (and everything else) found its place within our call to God, and thus Christian *discipleship.

Work itself has only recently in Christian theology come to be considered a 'doctrine' in its own right. Only since the mid-twentieth century have Christians sought specifically to understand work in terms of a theology of work. With the end of the Second World War and the need to rebuild Europe, Christian leaders sought to participate in the rebuilding process by showing how Christ and the Christian faith could play a vital role. They realized that European reconstruction itself hinged upon what people believed to be the goal, purposes, ways and ultimately the limitations of their work. As a resource the *WCC began developing what would eventually come to publication by Alan Richardson as The Biblical Doctrine of Work.

Likewise, French Catholic theologians around this same time began to query the possibility of theologies of 'secular realities' to aid in this rebuilding process. It is they who proposed the concept and laid the groundwork for what is now termed a 'theology of work'. Some scholars consider this theological turn to be the beginning of the process eventually culminating in the Second *Vatican Council. And, although the Council never produced a 'theology of work', most of its conclusions can be read as offering the necessary theological context and building materials for one. By 1981 Pope John Paul II offered the social encyclical Laborem Exercens (On Human Work) wholly devoted to the question of, and problems surrounding, human work. Although this is not a full-orbed theology of work (it is a pastoral letter teaching the faithful how to address what it identifies as the global social issue), it nevertheless offers the most comprehensive treatment of work itself officially sanctioned by the Vatican.

But what is a theology of work and how is this different from other Christian approaches to work and the working life? A theology of work is more than a summary of biblical teachings related to work, its products and practices. And it goes far beyond simply a Christian work ethic. It delves much deeper into the purposes, meaning, value and limitations of work than do most reflections offered within wider discussions like discipleship or justice. A Christian theology of work attempts to provide a comprehensive theological study, dogmatically reflecting on the nature and place of the phenomenon of work in God's universe; that is, in both human life and in the non-human creation. It is a theological exploration of work itself, undertaken by exploring work as the primary question, but with reference to the multitude of doctrines that theology has more traditionally expounded.

So why has a theology of work methodology only of late emerged within Christian theology? Why doesn't Scripture provide one as such? Why has the church only recently come to see work as a doctrine in its own right? It is primarily because work itself did not become an expressly theological problem (like the doctrine of the *Trinity did in the early church) until recently; that is, until the rise of industrial and post-industrial societies.

Until the industrial revolution there was nothing like work as we today know it and experience it sociologically and psychologically. The very concept of work was rather transparent. Work was universal, pervasive and a necessary part of life. But with few exceptions it was not the subject of careful philosophical let alone theological enquiry. The Greeks, with nobility generally, reasoned that labour should be limited to slaves or the masses. Yet by today's understanding of work, the 'philosopher kings' still worked by governing and engaging in the hard work of reasoning through political and social issues (philosophy).

Our contemporary, and now essentially globalized, conception of work grows out of our experiences in the Industrial Revolution with the rise of *capital and the subsequent rationalization of work and labour (see *Globalization). Adam Smith's economic and moral philosophy encapsulated these new more productive ways of working and organizing our working lives. Yet with the subsequent division of labour, a context arose where our daily work was increasingly disconnected from our lives around the home and family and eventually the village. Work became just another commodity that most of us would need to take to the 'job market' and sell to another. Our work and its products then belong to someone else, and thus become something other than an integrated expression of who we are and are becoming (e.g. a smith or shoemaker . . .). As Karl *Marx observed and explained, we become *alienated from our work and thus our very selves. We become disintegrated people, lost beings whose very personhood vanishes. We consequently fall, becoming lost in this new way of working. For Marx, the answer was to re-envision and reorganize work in such a way that our existence as producers is justified and thus we become able to save ourselves through our work.

It is therefore not surprising that contemporary work would become a specifically theological problem requiring a full doctrinal exposition. The need for salvation and justification has always led to theological proposals as to how God in Jesus Christ has undertaken this salvation for us. When work comes so close to theology that it offers an alternative soteriology, the church knows that the time has come to formulate a more comprehensive and specifically Christian theology of work.

Of course, a theology of 'works' is longstanding. The question of the relationship between our works (work of a particularly religious nature) and *salvation and *sanctification has been an enduring part of the theological landscape. We have been clear that our religious works are integrally related to, but in no way the basis or cause of, our salvation.

With the rise of new philosophical and sociological doctrines of work, such as the one offered by Marx, the church sees that the time has come to clarify where the theological problems lie in relation to this new working reality, and offer a carefully crafted theology of work prophetically appropriate for today's globalized world. It should by now likewise be obvious that any proposed theology of work, to be both comprehensive and compelling, will need to show how our ordinary work is integrally related to our salvation, and thus to the new creation, but not the cause or condition of it.

Bibliography

M. D. Chenu, The Theology of Work (Dublin, 1963); D. Cosden, A Theology of Work: Work and the New Creation (Carlisle, 2004); idem, The Heavenly Good of Earthly Work (Carlisle, 2006); L. Hardy, The Fabric of This World (Grand Rapids, 1990); Laborem Exercens: Encyclical Letter of the Supreme Pontiff John Paul II on Human Work (London, 1981); A. Larive, After Sunday: A Theology of Work (New York, 2004); A. Richardson, The Biblical Doctrine of Work (London, 1952); R. P. Stevens, The Other Six Days (Grand Rapids, 1999); M. Volf, Work in the Spirit: Toward a Theology of Work (Oxford, 1991).

D. T. COSDEN

WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES

Four streams fed into the work of the World Council: Life and Work (1925), *Faith and Order (1927), the International Missionary Council (1921) and the World Council of Christian Education, which arose out of the World Sunday School Association of 1889. These emphases still spell out major thrusts in the council's work, and while ideally they represent complementary programmes, they sometimes seem to offer conflicting priorities. Further encouragement came from the Ecumenical Patriarch's appeal in 1920 for a 'League of Churches' to act as a permanent instrument of cooperation and fellowship.

In July 1937 representatives of Life and Work and Faith and Order met in London and agreed to merge to establish a World Council of Churches. A committee, meeting in Utrecht in 1938, set up a provisional committee for a World Council of Churches in process of formation, under the chairmanship of William *Temple (England) with W. A. Visser 't Hooft (Holland) as secretary. Their hopes for convoking a first assembly in 1941 were delayed by the outbreak of the Second World War until 1948 when 147 representatives from all the main ecclesiastical traditions, except the Roman Catholic Church, assembled in Amsterdam. The Council's original basis, reflecting language inherited from the World Alliance of YMCAs, spoke of 'a fellowship of churches which accept the Lord Jesus Christ as God and Saviour'. This was expanded at New Delhi in 1961 to incorporate scriptural authority and a trinitarian faith by adding the words ‘according to the scriptures and therefore seek together to fulfil their common calling to the glory of the one God, Father, Son and Holy Spirit’.

Already facing ecclesiological questions consequent upon its foundation, the Council’s Central Committee meeting in Toronto in 1950 adopted what has come to be known as the Toronto statement which emphatically denied any intentions of the Council aspiring to any churchly status and certainly not to operate as a super-church. Nor would it challenge the church claims of any of its member bodies, or demand that they recognize other members as fully churches, thereby affording confidence to its Orthodox members. Only churches are allowed membership, and the Council has no power to legislate on their behalf. Such actions as it takes, and statements that it issues, depend on their intrinsic truth and value for acceptance.

Faith and order issues remain important as the churches explore major convergences in belief and practice. Mission is no longer construed as the activity of sender nations working principally through a battery of missionary societies operating in ‘receiver’ countries. As missio Dei, *mission is now seen as the work of the whole people of God in every nation. Interfaith dialogue appears on the *ecumenical agenda with new urgency (see *Christianity and other religions). As over against the view that the Council is only concerned with the political dimension, it is active in the contemporary search for *spirituality. Discussions of the church as an inclusive community are essential for some churches but contentious for others. Traditional concern for social justice and peace are now supplemented by the promotion of a green agenda in the context of the biblical doctrine of *creation, whilst increasingly difficult ethical issues in biotechnology claim attention. Diakonia is a generic term describing the quite remarkable story of the Council’s compassionate ministry.

The council brings together, not without difficulty, a wide diversity of Christian traditions, the principal being Orthodox, both Eastern and Oriental, Anglican, other Protestant, Pentecostal and African Instituted. Because of this it is difficult to discern a WCC theology as such, even though the staff and governing body members may develop policy documents within and across the Council’s many programmes. For example, the very notion of a WCC theology would be anathema to the Orthodox, for they could not identify with anything other than an Orthodox theology. Within the council, tension sometimes emerges between those engaged in trying to work for greater unity amongst the churches and the articulation of theological convergences, and those who look to the Council to exercise leadership in applying theology in developing new ways of conceiving mission and of relating, prophetically, to injustice.

Notwithstanding the wide embrace of the Council, a number of major traditions do not belong. The Roman Catholic Church, which is often to be found in national and regional councils of churches, argues that its catholicity claims would be compromised if it were to join a worldwide fellowship of churches as just another member. Because of this the Council relates to the Vatican through a joint committee which discusses matters of mutual concern.

Many evangelicals find it difficult to relate to a body that does not comprehensively share all their doctrinal affirmations and is perceived by some to be over-concerned with political actions, whilst placing too little emphasis on evangelism. That said, evangelicals are divided on the issue, and there has always been an evangelical presence on the staff and in the governing bodies of the WCC. In like manner, the number of Pentecostal churches in membership of the World Council does not represent the movement’s global strength. In recent years the WCC has initiated a series of meetings with these traditions involving both its own members and those outside.

The weight of council membership, now around 350 churches, has significantly moved towards the churches of the southern hemisphere and away from Europe and North America. Because the WCC is a council of churches, para-church bodies, though clearly crucial to worldwide Christian witness, are denied membership. Accordingly, since 1998 work has been taking place towards the establishment of a Global Christian Forum capable of overcoming all these deficiencies. It will bring together a broader spectrum of Christian organizations, but without any commitment in membership. Its first meeting took place in Limuru near Nairobi in November 2007.

Bibliography

J. Briggs, M. A. Oduyoye and G. Tssetsis (eds.), A History of the Ecumenical Movement:

Vol. 3, 1968–2000 (Geneva, 2004); M. van Elderen and M. Conway, Introducing the World Council of Churches (Geneva, 2001); G. Fackre, Ecumenical Faith in Evangelical Perspective (Grand Rapids, 1993); H. E. Fey (ed.), A History of the Ecumenical Movement: Vol. 2, The Ecumenical Advance, 1948–1968 (Geneva, ²1986); N. Lossky et al. (eds.), Dictionary of the Ecumenical Movement (Geneva, ²2002); R. Rouse and S. Neill (eds.), A History of the Ecumenical Movement: Vol. 1, 1517–1968 (Geneva, ³1986); G. Wainwright, The Ecumenical Movement: Crisis and Opportunity for the Church (Grand Rapids, 1983).

J. BRIGGS

WORSHIP

From the Old English weorthscipe ('worthiness', 'respect'), 'worship' means to ascribe worth to someone or something. In the broadest religious sense it can refer to the whole life of devotion to *God, which can encompass such diverse things as studying the sacred Scriptures, private prayer and the dedication of financial and material resources to God. More narrowly, 'worship' refers to the intentional corporate gathering of the church to hear the word of God and to respond with prayer, praise and thanksgiving.

More than just inspirational speech, worship involves an encounter with God, in which God empowers worshippers for lives of holiness and righteousness.

For many Protestants, the word 'liturgy' has become synonymous with 'worship'. Although often equated with 'a prescribed service order', the meaning of *liturgy is much deeper. The original Greek, leitourgia, refers to something done for or on behalf of the public, such as serving in a legislature or even paying taxes. 'Liturgy' implies that the worship gathering takes place on behalf of the world, insofar as the church offers the world's needs to God, and pleads for God's mercy on the world. Yet there is also the 'liturgy' of the church's going into the world on God's behalf to proclaim God's mercy and justice. Thus, 'liturgy' points to the worship gathering's relationship to both God and the world.

Why do Christians worship?

St Augustine said, 'you [God] have made us for yourself . . .' This means that humans, unlike other creatures, have the capacity to know that there is a Being whose powers and mode of existence utterly transcend ours. The experience of this One's presence evokes responses of awe, praise, confession of sin and human finitude, and service. Simply put, the awareness of God leads to the adoration of God.

But why do we worship with other persons? The reason is that we were created not only to be in communion with God's self, but also to be in communion with other humans (Gen. 2:19–25). We want to join with others in praising and adoring our Creator, because doing so enables us to be part of something greater than ourselves. Communal worship with others is a manifestation of the *image of God in humanity (Gen. 1:26–27), for Christians believe that God, as Trinity, is the ultimate communion of persons whose mutual interaction results in a great outpouring of love. In corporate worship, we manifest the divine image even as we experience the divine presence.

Therefore, the need to worship God and the need to be in communion with others are not in conflict. Indeed, when we gather with others to share our stories and our lives, to welcome each other into community, to experience the word of God as it challenges and upholds us, and to support one another in the response of faith, we experience the loving presence of God. Both the community and its liturgical actions mediate the presence of God to worshippers. In that case, worship is profoundly *incarnational in that it reflects God's self-manifestation in the human person of Jesus Christ.

What makes worship Christian?

Of course, worship is not something peculiar to Christians. What makes Christian worship distinctive is its *trinitarian character, its affirmation that God is Father, Son and Holy Spirit. This affirmation is liturgical in that worship names the triune God in its acclamations, benedictions, prayers, songs and sacramental formulae (e.g. 'I baptize you in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit'). When the church thus establishes the identity of the triune God, it places the worship under this God's power and authority and commits itself to the adoration and service of this God.

Christian worship is trinitarian in a theological sense, that is, with respect to its relationship to each person of the Trinity. Worship is offered to the first person of the Trinity, the Father (cf. John 17; Rom. 8:15), through the Son (cf. Heb. 7:23–25), in the power of the Holy Spirit (John 4:23–24; Rom. 8:15, 27; Eph. 5:18–20). This understanding is incarnated in the classic eucharistic prayers that address the Father, praising him for creation, Israel and the prophets; recall the saving work of the Son; and finally, ask the Father to send the Holy Spirit for the extension of his saving work into the eucharistic act. Many eucharistic prayers conclude with a trinitarian *doxology that summarizes the whole act of praise.

Ultimately, the trinitarian life of God that is modelled in worship will manifest itself in the lives of believers, through their mutual love and cooperation, as well as their common efforts to declare God's reconciliation to the world.

The basic shape of Christian worship

Worship throughout the universal church is diverse in ritual complexity, use of art, architecture and music, the piety of worshippers and styles of leadership. This diversity reflects the variety of theologies, histories and cultural contexts of churches. Yet a common shape for the Sunday service has emerged over the centuries: gathering, word, meal and sending.

In the gathering the church assembles in the presence and in the name of the triune God, making the transition from world to church. Typical acts include: (1) a call to worship, usually biblical words that bring the assembly before God; (2) a greeting (e.g. 'The Lord be with you') or trinitarian invocation ('In the name of the Father', etc.); (3) an opening prayer that invokes the presence of God and asks God to purify the hearts of worshippers (e.g. the Anglican 'collect for purity'); and (4) confession and pardon.

In the word God speaks to the church through the biblical readings and the sermon in order to convict of sin, call to repentance, promise forgiveness and exhort the assembly to holy living. Typically, a sermon bridges the biblical narrative and the listener's story so that the word becomes a living reality. Late-twentieth- and early twenty-first-century churches have utilized various non-sermonic means of proclaiming the word, such as plays, skits, dramatic readings, pantomimes and media presentations (e.g. video clips of motion pictures). The assembly responds to the word through professions of faith (a 'creed'), intercessory prayers for the church and world, and the Peace (an enacted sign of the wholeness and well-being that is salvation in Christ).

The meal begins with an offering of monetary gifts, symbolizing the self-offering of the assembly to God's service. The action may also include the presentation of the *eucharistic bread and wine as a way of affirming that the gifts of creation will be used by God for his saving purposes. The main act is the great thanksgiving in which the church gives thanks and praise to God over bread and cup for salvation in Jesus Christ. The faith-filled receiving of the eucharistic elements becomes an encounter with Christ himself, who offers forgiveness, peace and restoration. More than just a response to the word, the meal is truly a means of grace.

The sending serves as a transition from worship to the world. Sending rituals usually charge the assembly with faithful Christian living in the world, thereby making a connection to the assembly's mission. The ancient Latin dismissal 'Ite, misse est' ('Go. You are sent.') demonstrates this link insofar as 'misse' and 'mission' are from the same root word. Far from being a mere formality, then, the sending rite (especially the dismissal) challenges worshippers to enact the realities they have heard and experienced in worship.

Within the Sunday service, many Christians celebrate the rites of Christian initiation (i.e. baptism). The sacrament may take place within the gathering, as a reminder that baptism marks the beginning of the Christian life. Or it may be celebrated following the word, as a way of symbolizing how the candidate's acceptance of baptism, as well as the church's baptismal mission, are both responses to biblical imperatives. When celebrated within the Sunday service, baptism reminds the entire assembly of its baptismal death and resurrection with Christ – or, stated alternatively, its rebirth through water and the Holy Spirit.

For most, but not all, Christians, worship and sacraments will be borne along by song and other music. A 'gathering song' spiritually forms worshippers into a united body, just as it musically gathers the many voices into one for the praise of God. Songs also enable the assembly to proclaim the word of God and internalize its message, as well as envision a faith response to the word. Sending songs highlight and describe the church's mission in the world in light of the gospel. Many Christians affirm that music is far more than a decorative element in worship, but is actually God's gift to the church for the purpose of praising and glorifying him. As such, its primary purpose is to support the proclamation of the word and the celebration of the sacraments.

Challenges for today

Churches need to navigate between two extremes in worship. The first is ritualism, that is, a devotion to ancient rites and ceremonies for their own sake. While our worship must maintain continuity with that of previous generations because its basic pattern (or ordo) expresses the apostolic kerygma, the art, architecture, gestures, music and language of worship all need updating, reforming and enculturating in order to speak effectively to contemporary people (see *Aesthetics).

Also to be avoided is a pragmatism that makes worship into something 'useful' (e.g. religious education, political indoctrination, evangelism, etc.). Such an approach risks exalting human agendas over divine truth and reducing the church to a mere instrument of the missio Dei at the expense of its identity as the elect of God who were chosen before the creation of the world.

Ultimately, worship must be God-centred and accessible to the people of the church.

Bibliography

R. P. Byars, The Future of Protestant Worship: Beyond the Worship Wars (Louisville, 2002); S. Chan, Liturgical Theology: The Church as Worshiping Community (Downers Grove, 2006); M. J. Dawn, Reaching Out Without Dumbing Down: A Theology of Worship for the Turn-of-the-Century Culture (Grand Rapids, 1995); G. W. Lathrop, What Are the Essentials of Christian Worship? (Minneapolis, 1994); T. G. Long, Beyond the Worship Wars: Building Vital and Faithful Worship (Washington DC, 2001); E. Underhill, Worship (New York, 1936); R. E. Webber, The Worship Phenomenon (Nashville, 1994).

J. A. TRUSCOTT

WRATH OF GOD

There are references to the wrath of God throughout Scripture, but it is difficult for many to reconcile it with the focus on the *love of God which comes to a climax in the profound assertion of 1 John 4:16: 'God is love.' The strong emphasis on God as a God of justice and vengeance, particularly in Western Christianity both in the medieval and early modern periods, produced a strong reaction. Many Christians in the modern era have consequently rejected the idea of a last judgment in which God would condemn anyone to eternal punishment in hell (see *Judgment of God), along with the belief that on the cross, Jesus 'propitiated' or turned aside the judgment and wrath of God by substituting himself as the innocent one in place of guilty humanity. This reaction against belief in the wrath of God was therefore a powerful reason for the development of *universalism (the belief that in the end all will be saved). The question whether it is legitimate to speak of the wrath of God therefore has wide implications for *eschatology, for the doctrine of the *atonement, and indeed for the doctrine of *God.

C. H. *Dodd, a leading NT scholar of the mid-twentieth century, proposed in his commentary on Romans that we should understand the wrath of God, not as a characteristic of God himself, but as a primitive attempt to conceptualize the 'inevitable process of cause and effect in a moral universe'. Dodd's proposal was opposed by NT scholars such as Leon Morris, R. V. G. Tasker and C. E. B. Cranfield.

Two theological questions arise: whether it is an *anthropomorphism to speak of the wrath of God, and whether it contradicts belief in the love of God. If 'wrath' or 'anger' is regarded as vindictive and spiteful petulance, then it is indeed incompatible with the Christian understanding of God. But if all our language of God is in fact drawn from the human context and so must be understood to apply analogically to God, then this concept too needs to be refined. God's anger should not be conceived as the same as the anger of sinful humanity.

Nor is anger necessarily contradictory to love. While sinful human anger can arise from selfishness and self-assertion, even humans can have righteous anger. Cranfield pointed out, for example, that a righteous opposition to apartheid not only could, but should, elicit anger against injustice. Morris argued that it was a necessary part of moral character to abhor *evil as well as to love good. God's wrath can be seen as arising out of his righteousness and indeed his love. As Hosea was deeply grieved by the unfaithfulness of his wife, so the Lord was deeply grieved by Israel's unfaithfulness precisely because he loved Israel. So parents may react with a deeply grieving anger when confronted by a child destroying himself through a foolish lifestyle of drugs and misuse of alcohol: their anger arises out of their love.

In some such way the concept of the wrath of God may be understood as arising out of God's love. As 1 John 4:16 declares, in himself God is love. Indeed Christians think of the triune God as an eternal fellowship of love. God's loving giving of himself to his creatures only takes the form of wrath when faced by our *sin. While the atonement therefore reveals God's wrath, meaning his inflexible opposition to sin, at the deepest level it reveals that he is love.

Bibliography

A. T. Hanson, The Wrath of the Lamb (London, 1957); L. Morris, The Apostolic Preaching of the Cross (London, ³1965); J. I. Packer, Knowing God (London, 1973); H. Schönweiss and H. C. Hahn, in NIDNTT 1, pp. 105–113; R. V. G. Tasker, The Biblical Doctrine of the Wrath of God (London, 1951).

T. A. NOBLE

WRIGHT, N. T. (b. 1948)

A prolific author and erstwhile holder of various academic and ecclesiastical posts, N. T. (Tom) Wright, who was Bishop of Durham (2003–2010), has achieved towering status in both NT scholarship and the Anglican Communion. Whatever his final contributions to the church, Wright's publications – known for combining scholarly creativity with accessibility – ensure his position as one of the most important theological thinkers of the late twentieth and early twenty-first century. Amidst his various writing interests, most significant to date have been his work on Paul and *Jesus.

Paul

Alongside E. P. Sanders and J. D. G. Dunn, Wright is one of the most prominent figures within the so-called New Perspective on Paul. While there are significant differences between each of these three exegetes, Wright shares with them the conviction, discernible even in his 1980 doctoral thesis, that Paul's polemic against his opponents bore more on community self-definition than on any alleged legalism inherent in first-century Judaism. Against a virtually standard scholarly assumption of an early, low *Christology, Wright argues that the apostle's Messiah stands squarely within the framework of a modified Jewish monotheism; Messiah not only incorporates Israel but also embodies the culmination of Yahweh's creational purposes. Working on the premise that Paul and much of first-century Judaism saw itself in exile, Wright further argues that Paul's Messiah (as Israel) redeemed Israel from exile and thereby put an end to the law as well as the Jew-Gentile antagonisms which it engendered. Thus Wright sees Paul's controversy with the Judaizers concerning 'works of the law' more as an ecclesiological than a soteriological issue. Continued adherence to those practices by which Jews defined themselves (circumcision, dietary laws and calendrical observances) risked dividing the one, true people of God, who are to be marked off by their faith and confession that Jesus Christ is Lord. This marking off, which anticipates God's eschatological vindication of his people, is what Paul means by *justification. Understood this way, justification is not primarily about 'getting in' the covenant (conversion), but the appropriate means of identification that one is already in.

For Wright, the '*righteousness of God' (as it occurs, e.g. in Rom. 1:17) refers to God's own covenantal faithfulness and not, as *Luther would have it, a righteous status which God imputes to believers. Ultimately, the vindication of God's people depends on their incorporation into Christ. Whether this understanding of justification ultimately retains the effects of imputation, as classically understood, remains debated and in some quarters highly controversial. In his most recent writings on Paul, Wright has shown increasing interest in Paul's theological and political critique of Roman imperial ideology.

Jesus

Wright's most important treatments of Jesus can be found in the second and third volumes of his four-part Christian Origins and the Question of God. In the first volume of the series, Wright lays out his methodology of 'critical realism' for historical inquiry into Christian origins. Building on this in volume two, Jesus and the Victory of God, Wright argues that Jesus' ministry and teachings can best be explained as his taking on the vocation of prophet and Messiah, signalling the culmination of Israel's story, which includes the return from exile, the forgiveness of sins, the rebuilding of the temple and the in-gathering of the Gentiles. Along these lines, Jesus identifies himself as the Suffering Servant figure and in fact the embodiment of Israel's God who has returned to Zion. Wright works out his methods and results largely in response to the scepticism of the Jesus Seminar, whose influence peaked in the early 1990s. In volume three, Resurrection of the Son of God, Wright casts the notion of resurrection against the backdrop of second-temple Jewish (Pharisaical) understanding. Against various well-known explanations for the *resurrection, Wright argues that the early Christians' Easter belief is explicable on two facts: the sightings of the risen Lord and the empty tomb. These two facts in turn are explicable only by the fact of resurrection itself. By emphasizing Jesus as a Jewish figure, N. T. Wright takes his place in the 'Third Quest' of the *historical Jesus – a label coined by Wright himself.

Bibliography

Works: Christian Origins and the Question of God: Vol. 1, The New Testament and the People of God (London and Minneapolis, 1992); Christian Origins and the Question of God: Vol. 2, Jesus and the Victory of God (London and Minneapolis, 1996); What Saint Paul Really Said: Was Paul of Tarsus the Real Founder of Christianity? (Oxford and Grand Rapids, 1997); Christian Origins and the Question of God: Vol. 3, The Resurrection of the Son of God (London and Minneapolis, 2003); Paul: In Fresh Perspective (London and Minneapolis, 2005); Simply Christian: Why Christianity Makes Sense (London and New York, 2006); Surprised by Hope (New York, 2008); How God Became King (New York, 2013); Christian Origins and the Question of God: Vol. 4, Paul and the Faithfulness of God (London and Minneapolis, 2014).

N. PERRIN

WYCLIF, JOHN (c. 1329–84)

In his numerous books Wyclif discussed philosophy, politics and theology. His participation in contemporary political life was guided by the doctrine of 'dominion' which he expounded in De dominio divino (Divine Lordship, 1375) and De civili dominio (Civil Lordship, 1376). God is the supreme Lord, but he endowed humanity at creation with a derivative and conditional lordship over the world. Humanity is God's steward, but the *stewardship is entirely of grace and is forfeited if man falls into moral sin even though he may continue to hold possessions and exercise rule. But he who is in grace has a right to lordship even though he be destitute. In so far as the church is guilty of innumerable sins, it should forfeit its lordship and the state may strip it of its wealth.

The interest in Wyclif's theology centres upon its similarity to the thinking of the Protestant Reformers. The most striking resemblance is in his attitude to *Scripture. Scripture proceeds, as he puts it in De veritate Sacrae Scripturae (The Truth of Sacred Scripture), 'from the mouth of God'. It is the everlasting truth in written form and provides in essence all that needs to be known of law, ethics and philosophy. Scripture is superior in authority to the pope, the church and the teaching of the Church Fathers. It is the 'law of God' and its focus throughout is upon Christ. Wyclif's reverence for the Bible as the supreme authority for Christian thought and life is amply shown in his innumerable references to it, as well as in his resolve to have it translated into English and made available to the public at large.

Using the Bible as his standard, he launched an increasingly violent attack upon the wealth, power and decadence of the church. In De ecclesia (The Church, 1378) he explains that the members of the church are God's elect, for *predestination is the foundation of the church. But no-one, not even the pope, can be certain of his election, for the visible church includes the 'foreknown', that is the reprobate as well. But all true Christians have direct personal access to God and enjoy a common *priesthood. Wyclif lays heavy stress on moral character as a mark of the true Christian, and the immorality, the lust for temporal power and wealth amongst the clergy led him to call for the abolition of the monastic orders and the *papacy. By the same token he elevated the dignity of the true Christian layman to the extent of arguing that a priest was not necessary to administer Holy Communion.

He rejected the medieval doctrine of transubstantiation (see *Eucharist) and argued in De Eucharistia (The Eucharist, c. 1380) that the body of Christ is 'sacramentally concealed' in the elements. Similarly, he condemned indulgences (see *Merit) and the cult of the *saints, though reverence should be accorded to the Virgin *Mary.

Although Wyclif's thought was expressed in a typically medieval scholastic idiom, his teaching on Scripture and the primacy of preaching, as well as his condemnation of transubstantiation and his elevation of lay spirituality, justifies calling him 'the morning star of the Reformation', provided allowance be made for the greater clarity and sophistication of the Reformers' evangelical theology.

Bibliography

The works of Wyclif were published by the Wycliffe Society of London, 1843ff.; selections in ET, LCC 14, ed. M. Spinka, Advocates of Reform (London, 1953).

Studies: E. A. Block, John Wyclif: Radical Dissenter (San Diego, 1962); I. C. Levy (ed.), A Companion to John Wyclif: Late Medieval Theologian (Leiden, 2011); K. B. McFarlane, John Wycliffe and the Beginnings of English Nonconformity (London, 1952); J. Stacey, Wyclif and Reform (London, 1964); H. B. Workman, John Wyclif, 2 vols. (Oxford, 1926).

R. T. JONES

YALE SCHOOL

The term describes an influential approach to theology which flourished during the 1970s and 1980s at Yale Divinity School, most closely associated with H. *Frei and G. *Lindbeck and their students. Loosely inspired by *Barth, they united in opposing liberal revisionist views of Scripture and Christology by letting the biblical narratives speak on their own terms to identify both Jesus Christ and the church.

Frei's work on *hermeneutics shows that modern theologians, conservative and liberal alike, let extratextual theories about the nature and criteria of truth govern their interpretations of biblical narrative (Eclipse of Biblical Narrative). The truth of the Gospels was thought to refer either to the historical events behind the text or to existential human possibilities in front of the text (as P. *Ricoeur and D. Tracy of the rival '*Chicago school' maintained). Eschewing general theories, Frei reads the Bible on its own terms as a realistic, history-like narrative that means just what it says and whose main purpose is to identify Jesus Christ as the one who is now living. He later revised his view and identified the literal sense with the consensus reading in the history of the church.

Lindbeck too criticizes liberal theology for being 'experiential-expressivist': for assuming that religious experience precedes formation in community. His '*postliberal' alternative appropriates Wittgenstein's insight that meaning is learned by participating in language games: Christians learn how to speak of God by participating in the form of life or culture of the church (hence his so-called 'cultural-linguistic' approach). Intratextuality means that the church takes its bearings from the biblical narrative; in what is perhaps his most oft-cited quote, Lindbeck says that 'it is the text . . . which absorbs the world, rather than the world the text' (Nature of Doctrine, p. 118).

Bibliography

H. Frei, The Eclipse of Biblical Narrative: A Study of Eighteenth and Nineteenth Century Hermeneutics (New Haven, 1974); idem, Theology and Narrative, ed. G. Hunsinger and W. Placher (Oxford, 1993); G. Lindbeck, The Nature of Doctrine: Religion and Theology in a Postliberal Age (Philadelphia, 1984); C. C. Pecknold, Transforming Postliberal Theology: George Lindbeck, Pragmatism and Scripture (London and New York, 2005); T. Phillips and D. Okholm (eds.), The Nature of Confession: Evangelicals and Postliberals in Conversation (Downers Grove, 1996); A. Vidu, Postliberal Theological Method: A Critical Study (Carlisle, 2005).

K. J. VANHOZER

YODER, JOHN HOWARD (1927–97)

John Howard Yoder was a North American Mennonite theologian who made a case for the relevance of *Mennonite theology and ethics – and in particular its *pacifism – for the whole of the Christian church. In his early life he worked in France to reorganize the Mennonite church after the Second World War, overseeing children's homes and relief programmes. Subsequently he moved to Basel to study, where he was a student of Karl *Barth among others, and completed a PhD on the origin of Swiss Anabaptism. He served as professor at the University of Notre Dame and the Associated Mennonite Biblical Seminary, and in sabbaticals spent time in Argentina, where he encountered *liberation theology, and the Tantur Institute in Israel, prompting writings on the relationship between Christianity and *Judaism.

He was a prolific writer, publishing seventeen books and hundreds of articles.

Throughout his career Yoder sought to establish the radical social and political implications of Christian discipleship against those such as Reinhold *Niebuhr who argued that following the teaching of the NT was unrealistic in a fallen world. For Yoder this meant discarding the *Constantinian legacy of the church to rediscover a faithfulness to its origins in the person of Jesus Christ, unconditioned by expectations of the nation *state on its citizens. That the followers of Christ should be peaceful despite the many apparently urgent demands to be violent in pursuit or defence of their vision was fundamental to his vision of this discipleship. This pacifism was not based on the judgment that renouncing violence would be an effective means to peace and justice in the world, but on the understanding that it was a command of Christ to which Christians should be obedient. Yoder argued that Christians should relinquish responsibility for the ‘direction of history’ and place their hope not in the results of their own efforts but rather in God’s power and promise to triumph over the forces of evil. He engaged broadly with those of very different opinions, including detailed argument on the implications of the just-war tradition for issues in modern warfare. Yoder saw the role of the *church in shaping the life of Christian disciples as crucial, but also sought to escape a merely sectarian vision by seeing the vocation of the church as service to the world, witnessing to the way of life to which all are ultimately called.

In 1992 a Mennonite denominational task force confronted Yoder with thirteen charges of sexual abuse against women, reporting the deep pain of the women who had given testimony. In response to the recommendations of the task force, the Indiana-Michigan Mennonite Conference suspended his ministerial credential and urged him to seek counselling and make restitution to the women he had abused. Yoder frequently acknowledged participating with women in sexual practices, characterizing the abuse as experimentation in Christian sexuality. It is likely that more than a hundred women were abused by Yoder from the mid-1970s over a period of two decades, although no legal charges were ever filed (Rachel Waltner Goossen, ‘“Defanging the Beast”: Mennonite Responses to John Howard Yoder’s Sexual Abuse’, MQR 89, pp. 7–80).

Bibliography

Works: The Priestly Kingdom: Social Ethics as Gospel (Notre Dame, 1984); The Politics of Jesus: Vicit Agnus Noster (Grand Rapids, 1994); The Royal Priesthood: Essays Ecclesiological and Ecumenical (Grand Rapids, 1994); When War Is Unjust: Being Honest in Just-War Thinking (Maryknoll, ²1996).

Studies: C. A. Carter, The Politics of the Cross: The Theology and Social Ethics of John Howard Yoder (Grand Rapids, 2001); R. W. Goossen, ‘“Defanging the Beast”: Mennonite Responses to John Howard Yoder’s Sexual Abuse’, MQR 89, January 2015, pp. 7–80; M. T. Nation, John Howard Yoder: Mennonite Patience, Evangelical Witness, Catholic Convictions (Grand Rapids, 2006).

D. L. CLOUGH

ZION

Zion (sometimes written ‘Sion’) is synonymous with Jerusalem in both OT and NT, but in post-biblical writing is often interpreted *eschatologically. Its theological importance depends less on geography and more on history. Today in Jerusalem, Mount Zion denotes the hilltop at the south-west corner of the Old City and is the site of the institution of the Eucharist at the Last Supper and the founding of the church at Pentecost, as well as the traditional tomb of King David.

Christianity (and Judaism) proclaim and claim Zion as the city of God and of ‘the great king’, and the setting and symbol of salvation in the end of days. Its meaning was extended from a designation for a specific site and a name for a city to an allusion to the entire land of Israel, a symbol of the historic fate of the people of Israel, and finally to a vision of universal redemption. Zion’s multiple layers of meaning and its power to evoke a radically new era of reality are reflected in the use of the term by groups as diverse as Anabaptists who founded their Kingdom of New Zion in Münster in 1534, numerous churches (especially African and Protestant) who incorporate the word Zion in their name, the Church of the Latter-Day Saints (often called Mormons) for whom America is the land of Zion where the new Jerusalem will be established, and the founders of modern *Zionism such as Theodor Herzl.

Zion: the church

Thomas Aquinas's liturgical hymn Lauda Zion (Praise Zion) composed for the Mass of Corpus Christi demonstrates that whilst 'the great king' is Christ, Zion is mater ecclesia, the *church or body of Christ, the city of God on earth. As the place where the first church – the church of Jerusalem – was founded, it is the earthly mother of all churches. Zion is sometimes equated with *Mary, the virgin daughter of Zion who became the holy mother who enabled the incarnation. The Church Fathers and consequent theologians have applied the biblical praises and promises for the 'daughters of Zion' to Christians and Christianity.

The earthly Zion, Jerusalem, is often viewed with ambiguity. A strand of tradition denies it much importance, as, for example, in the story of Jesus' encounter with the Samaritan woman (John 4:1–42), or in Stephen's speech (Acts 7:1–53) before he was stoned. However, the notion of the incarnation bestows sacramental significance on tangible places, such as Zion, which are connected with Jesus' life, death, resurrection and ascension. Thus, the Emperor Constantine transformed Zion by major developments, including the building of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre and encouraging pilgrims to visit the holy city. Understood as sacred because it is the place where divinity and humanity encountered one another, pilgrims carried back relics to churches everywhere, thus constantly nourishing the bond with Zion. Henceforth, Christians made pilgrimages to 'The Holy Land': to sites linked to the life and ministry of Jesus, particularly in Jerusalem, Bethlehem and Galilee.

Paul displays special regard for the Jerusalem church as an important link between the Gentile church and Jewish Christianity but ultimately for Paul the true home of all Christians is not the 'present Jerusalem' but 'the Jerusalem on high' (Gal. 4:21–27). Jerusalem was increasingly spiritualized and transformed into a non-geographical eschatological 'heavenly' Jerusalem, identified with the true earthly manifestation of 'the city of God', the church. Thus every place where the Christian community gathers as the body of Christ becomes Zion.

In Christian theology today there is divergence of opinion about the significance of Zion as land. Walter Brueggemann argues that the subject of 'land' should become more central, and developed a theology of land. His view is in contrast to an earlier generation of scholars, such as W. D. Davies, who suggested that land was relatively unimportant and that Jesus paid little attention to the relationship between God, Israel and the land. Davies called this Christian de-emphasis on geographical specificity 'disenlandisement', pointing out that of the forty-seven references to Israel in the NT only three refer specifically to the land, while the overwhelming majority pertain to the Jewish people.

For contemporary Palestinian Christians, a theology of *liberation has developed out of a close association with land, although it is also influenced by a replacement theology, which has arisen from the experiences of Palestinian Christians living in Israel since 1948. Naim Ateek argues that before the creation of the state, the OT was considered an essential part of Christian Scripture, pointing and witnessing to Jesus, but since the creation of the state, some Jewish and Christian interpreters have read the OT largely as a Zionist text to such an extent that it has become almost repugnant to Palestinian Christians. In contrast, some evangelical Christians have proposed that the Jewish return to Zion from dispersion in over one hundred countries is the fulfilment of biblical prophecy. There are many manifestations of this position, particularly among the evangelical and charismatic sections of the church, and adherents are often called Christian Zionists (see *Dispensational theology). While it may appear to be a fairly clear-cut and unified theology, there are many subdivisions. Contemporary Roman Catholic theology is also ambivalent, but has been deeply influenced by Nostra Aetate in 1965 at the Second Vatican Council (and consequent papal documents on Catholic-Jewish relations in 1975, 1985, 1998 and 2001), the exchange of ambassadors in 1993 between the state of Israel and the Holy See and Pope John Paul II's pilgrimage to Israel in 2000.

Zion: the Jewish return

The centrality of Zion for Jews points to the common patrimony of *Judaism and Christianity, but this interrelatedness betrays rivalry conflicts. Ultimately, the dispute over the meaning of Zion as the city of God reflects rival claims to be the true Israel, or people of God.

Three thousand years ago, King David made Jerusalem the religious and national nucleus of the people of Israel so that Zion came to mean a city, a land and a people, whose historical existence is intimately linked with the metropolis, as a child is nurtured by its mother (cf. Isa. 66:10–13). Even when Titus destroyed the temple in AD 70 and Jews lost sovereignty over the sacred city, Jerusalem continued to serve as the pre-eminent symbol of a covenantal bond with the land of Israel. Fervent hope for a future ingathering of the exiles in a restored Jerusalem and the longing for Zion found expression in Jewish religious and communal life. Zionism took its name from the city.

Jews looked towards religious and political renewal in Zion (including, for Orthodox Jews, the restoration of the temple), and an idealized kingdom of David. Redemption was inconceivable without a return to Zion, as the spiritual centre of Jewish existence. Jewish liturgy remains permeated with a longing for Zion, which symbolizes the Jewish people's eschatological aspirations. The will to survive in the Diaspora generated Jewish messianic hopes of redemption, and Zion became a symbol of redress for all the wrongs which Jews had suffered. Thus, modern Zionism is in part the fusion of messianic fervour and the longing for Zion. Christian supporters in the early twentieth century, such as William Balfour and Lloyd George, saw Zionism as fulfilment of an historical mission. In the aftermath of the *Holocaust, Zionism has become a pre-eminent part of Jewish theology and identity, even though Jews continue to argue passionately over its desired future course.

Bibliography

B. F. Batto and K. L. Roberts, David and Zion (Warsaw, 2004); P. W. L. Walker, Jerusalem Past and Present in the Purposes of God (Cambridge, 1992).

E. KESSLER

ZIONISM

Zionism emerged as a political movement from within the liberal-humanist tradition of central and eastern Europe following the Napoleonic Wars. It differed, however, from other contemporary nationalist movements in so far as the Jews were landless as well as persecuted. The term 'Zionism' was coined in 1892 by Nathan Birnbaum, while a student in Vienna. In 1882 he had produced his first pamphlet opposing the idea of Jewish assimilation and in 1883 helped to found Kadimah, the first Jewish nationalist fraternity of students in Vienna. In 1885 he began to publish Selbst-Emanzipation, a journal dedicated to achieving Jewish emancipation. In the 1880s another Jewish philanthropic organization called Chovevei Zion was founded in Eastern Europe to promote a safe haven in Palestine for destitute and persecuted Jews. In 1893 Birnbaum published a booklet entitled The National Rebirth of the Jewish People in Its Homeland as a Means of Solving the Jewish Problem, in which he advocated more nationalistic ideas which Theodor Herzl was to expound later in Der Judenstaat, published in 1896.

Political Zionism

Herzl and Birnbaum articulated the deep longings of many Jewish people for their own homeland at the First Zionist Congress which Herzl convened in Basle in 1897. The secular and nationalist political Zionism of Herzl and Weizmann was opposed by the religious and philanthropic practical Zionism of Mizrahi and Ahad Ha'am who favoured a more gradual assimilation of Jews in Palestine where the rights of the indigenous Arabs would be respected. The former sought national revival, the latter national redemption, exposing the internal dualism if not inherent contradiction within Zionism, simultaneously a movement of national liberation but also one of territorial aggrandizement. Jews in Western Europe, North America and the Arab world were initially disinterested or opposed. Slowly, however, following the Germanic ethnocentric model of nationalism, Zionism became increasingly associated with ethnic identity and territorial expansion.

Messianic Zionism

The most recent form of Jewish Zionism to emerge is Messianic Zionism, associated with individuals like Rabbi Kook and Rabbi Kahne, the Gush Emunim movement, and Gershon Salomon and the Temple Mount Faithful. Religious Zionism developed from within the ultra-Orthodox subcultures of the 'Charedi Bible-belt' around Jerusalem following the 1967 Six Day War. The Charedim were the first to embrace a territorial form of mysticism rooted in the conquest narratives of the book of Joshua. Equating Arabs with the ancient Amaleks and, convinced they have a divinely ordained mandate to destroy the Palestinians, religious Zionists have been in the forefront of the confiscation of Palestinian land, attacks on Muslims and mosques and, in defiance of much international opinion, the systematic expansion of the West Bank settlements, especially in cities such as Hebron and Bethlehem.

Christian Zionism

The largest and probably most influential form of Zionism is actually non-Jewish. Ironically, the Zionist vision was largely nurtured and shaped by Christians long before it was able to inspire widespread Jewish support. The term 'Christian Zionist' was probably first used by Theodor Herzl to describe Henri Dunant, the Swiss philanthropist and founder of the Red Cross. Dunant was one of only a handful of Gentiles to be invited to the First Zionist Congress. Proto-Christian Zionism arose as a movement in the 1820s, principally through the endeavours of Lewis Way, Edward Irving, John *Darby and the Albury Circle. Influential Christian leaders began to speculate on the imminent and literal fulfilment of promises made in the Hebrew Scriptures to the Jewish people. The belief that God would restore the Jews to Palestine as a Christian nation immediately before the return of Christ became a dominant belief and priority among Christian missions to the Jews. The Restorationist movement emerged as influential Christian ministers and politicians in Britain and the USA, such as Lord Shaftesbury, James Balfour, David Lloyd George and William Blackstone, became convinced that it was their destiny to facilitate the return of the Jews to Palestine. As more and more Jews emigrated to Palestine 'in unbelief' and the Zionist territorial enterprise emerged as a largely socialist and secular movement, Christians began to speculate that revival would follow their return rather than precede it.

The events of 1948 in the founding of the State of Israel and 1967 with the capture of the West Bank came to be seen by growing numbers of evangelicals as evidence of the fulfilment of biblical prophecy. Christian Zionist organizations claim a support base of between 50 and 100 million believers who believe it is their destiny to support Israel. They are also active politically in ensuring US foreign policy in the Middle East remains favourable toward Israel. Over 200 Christian Zionist organizations have been founded since 1980 to lobby the US government on behalf of Israel, fund the emigration of Jews to Palestine, adopt the West Bank Settlements, oppose peace negotiations, facilitate the rebuilding of the Jewish temple and so, they believe, speed the return of Christ (see *Dispensational theology; *Millennium).

Zionism as a political system should be distinguished from Judaism and from the traditional longings of the Jewish people to make aliyah and return to the land of their forefathers. The latter is not necessarily incompatible with the aspirations of the Palestinian people for self-determination or with international law.

See also: ZION.

Bibliography

K. Cragg, Palestine: The Prize and Price of Zion (London, 1997); T. Herzl, A Jewish State (London, 1896); W. Laqueur, A History of Zionism (London, 1972); M. Prior, Zionism and the State of Israel: A Moral Inquiry (London, 1999); H. M. Sachar, A History of Israel from the Rise of Zionism to Our Time (New York, 1998); A. Schlaim, The Iron Wall (London and New York, 2001); R. Sharif, Non-Jewish Zionism: Its Roots in Western History (London, 1983); S. Sizer, Christian Zionism: Road-Map to Armageddon? (Leicester, 2004); idem, Zion's Christian Soldiers? The Bible, Israel and the Church (Leicester, 2007); D. Vital, The Origins of Zionism (Oxford, 1975).

S. SIZER

ZIZIOULAS, JOHN D. (b. 1931)

John D. Zizioulas is one of the most important Orthodox theologians of the last century. Having studied at Athens and Harvard, he has devoted himself to the pursuit of Georges *Florovsky's call for a 'neo-patristic synthesis' in contemporary *Orthodox theology.

Although he has contributed to discussions of many issues, Zizioulas' most influential work is in the tightly interwoven doctrines of God, theological *anthropology, and ecclesiology (see *Church, doctrine of). Following the Greek Fathers, Zizioulas insists that the truly Christian doctrine of God is the doctrine of the *Trinity. The doctrine of the Trinity is 'a primordial ontological concept' . . . God 'has no ontological content, no true being, apart from communion' (Being as Communion, p. 17). This leads him to the conclusion that the divine substance is relational: 'love is not an emanation or "property" of the substance of God . . . but is constitutive of his substance, i.e. it is that which makes God what he is, the one God'

(Being as Communion, p. 46). Love is not an abstract attribute that is possessed by God; it is 'the supreme ontological predicate' (Being as Communion, p. 46). The divine persons have their being – are what and who they are – only in this communion of otherness and *love. Communion is an *ontological category; indeed, it is the ultimate ontological category. According to Zizioulas, God's own being is communion; God's own life is the life of love shared between the Father, Son and Holy Spirit.

And what is true of the divine persons is also true of creaturely persons made in the divine image. Human personhood is also relational, or it is nothing. It is not, however, merely relational in the abstract sense so common among various schools of *personalism in the twentieth century; rather, to be truly a human person is to be rightly related to the triune God. But a human person is only rightly related to the triune God (is only in communion with God) as that person is rightly related to the people of God. So for Zizioulas, theological anthropology and ecclesiology that are divorced from trinitarian theology are doomed from the beginning.

The thought of John Zizioulas strikes many theologians as being as promising as it is bold and provocative. He is not, however, without critics, and some important questions await reply: does Zizioulas read *existentialism into his patristic sources? Is his theology attentive enough to the salvation of the distinct person? Is his stout insistence on the radical freedom of God consistent with his fundamental thesis that 'Being Is Communion?' And is a Protestant appropriation of his thought possible – or even preferable?

Bibliography

Works: 'Human Capacity and Incapacity', Scottish Journal of Theology 28, 1975, pp. 401–448; 'On Being a Person: Towards an Ontology of Personhood', in C. Schwöbel and C. E. Gunton (eds.), Persons, Divine and Human: King's College Essays in Theological Anthropology (Edinburgh, 1991); Being as Communion: Studies in Personhood and the Church (Crestwood, 1993).

Studies: A. Papanikolaou, Being with God: Trinity, Apophaticism, and Divine-Human Communion (Notre Dame, 2006); M. Volf, After Our Likeness: The Church as the Image of the Trinity (Grand Rapids, 1998).

ZOROASTRIANISM AND CHRISTIANITY

Zoroastrianism, the Persian religion associated with Zoroaster, is an ancient and complex faith which has evolved through many stages. Its modern adherents, the Parsees (i.e. Persians), who are found mainly in the region of Bombay, India, though numbering only 100,000, exercise influence out of proportion to their numbers because of their cohesion, wealth and education. Their ancestors migrated to north-west India in the seventh and eighth centuries after the Muslim conquest of Iran. About 20,000 Zoroastrian Gabars are still left in Iran, concentrated in Tehran, Kirman and Yazd.

Numerous scholars have argued that Zoroastrianism influenced Judaism in the post-exilic period in the areas of demonology (see *Devil) and *eschatology. Others have seen parallels between the *dualism of Zoroastrianism and of the Dead Sea Scrolls. A few (e.g. J. R. Hinnells) have argued that the Zoroastrian concept of the soshyant ('saviour') influenced Christianity. To assess these claims one must consider the dates of the sources for our knowledge of Zoroastrian teachings.

The sources

Though many scholars have accepted the traditional date from Arabic sources that Zarathustra (Gk, Zoroaster) lived in the Achaemenid era (569–492 BC), a growing consensus has placed his floruit before 1000 BC because of the evidence of the Gathas, the seventeen hymns which are universally acknowledged to originate from the prophet.

The next oldest source is known collectively as the Younger Avesta. These texts may date from either before the Achaemenid era or mainly after it. Handed down orally for centuries, we have perhaps only one quarter of the originally extant traditions preserved. These are mainly works used in the various rituals.

The Zoroastrian works which deal with such subjects as cosmology, demonology and eschatology are written in Pahlavi (Middle Persian) and date from the ninth century, though they are believed to preserve traditions from the Sasanid era (AD 226–651), when Zoroastrianism was made the Iranian state religion. Of the fifty-five Pahlavi texts the two most important are: the Bundahishn (The Creation) and the Denkard (Acts of Religion), an encyclopaedia which includes a legendary life of Zoroaster.

T. MCCALL

Unfortunately, from the Parthian epoch (247 BC to AD 225), the crucial period for both Judaism and Christianity, almost no Persian text survives. Philosophers such as *Aristotle were interested in the Persian doctrines. Greek traditions placed Zoroaster 6,000 years before *Plato.

Teachings

The Gathas indicate that Zoroaster was concerned about the worship of Ahura Mazda ('The Wise Lord') and the care of 'cattle'. Though many have taken the latter in the literal sense, as in the closely related Hindu traditions, some scholars have argued that 'cattle' should be taken metaphorically for the good 'vision'. Whether Zoroaster's teachings were originally *monotheistic or *dualistic, with Angra Mainyu (Pahlavi Ahriman) as the primal evil being, is a matter of dispute among scholars. During the Sasanid period Zurvanism, a poorly attested heresy exalted Zurvan, the god of time, as the father of the twin spirits, Ahura Mazda and Angra Mainyu. The Parsees, who have been influenced by the West and Christianity, emphatically stress the monotheistic character of Ahura Mazda.

Man, who is naturally good, must choose between Angra Mainyu and Ahura Mazda. By choosing the side of truth instead of the lie, man can aid in the eventual triumph of Ahura Mazda. Man is saved according to his deeds. At the day of judgment he must cross the Cinvat Bridge, which expands for the righteous to pass into paradise, but contracts to a razor's edge for the wicked, who plunge into hell.

Ritual is very important to the Parsees. Prayer is constantly offered in the presence of a fire fed by sandalwood, and sacred texts are recited from memory. Parsees must wear the sudreh (a special shirt) and the kusti (a holy cord). When polluted they undergo purification with bull's urine in the bareshnum ceremony. Their dead are exposed to vultures in a Tower of Silence so as not to defile the sacred elements of earth, fire or water.

While the Gathas used the word soshyant to describe Zoroaster and his supporters as 'redeemers', the late Pahlavi texts speak of the coming of a future Soshyant, born of a virgin from the seed of Zoroaster which had been preserved in a lake. He will smite the demons, resurrect the dead and restore paradise.

While many parallels between *Judaism and Zoroastrianism may be noted, the very late sources which must be used to reconstruct the teachings of the latter cast considerable doubt on many alleged cases of Zoroastrian influence upon Judaism and Christianity. One demonstrable case of borrowing is the appearance of the demon Asmodeus in the book of Tobit, formed from the Iranian demon Aeshma.

Bibliography

K. Aryanpur, Iranian Influence in Judaism and Christianity (Tehran, 1973); M. Boyce, A History of Zoroastrianism, 2 vols. (Leiden, 1975, 1982); J. W. Boyd and D. A. Crosby, 'Is Zoroastrianism Dualistic or Monotheistic?', JAAR 47 (1979), pp. 557–588; J. Duchesne-Guillemin, 'The Religion of Ancient Iran', in C. J. Bleeker and G. Widengren (eds.), Historia Religionum I: Religions of the Past (Leiden, 1969); J. R. Hinnells, 'Christianity and the Mystery Cults', Tb 71 (1968), pp. 20–25; idem, 'The Zoroastrian Doctrine of Salvation in the Roman World', in E. J. Sharpe and J. R. Hinnells (eds.), Man and His Salvation (Manchester, 1973); idem, 'Zoroastrian Saviour Imagery and Its Influences on the New Testament', Numen 16 (1969), pp. 161–185; S. Shaked, 'Iranian Influence on Judaism: First Century BCE to Second Century ACE', in W. D. Davies and L. Finkelstein (eds.), The Cambridge History of Judaism, I: Introduction: The Persian Period (Cambridge, 1984); R. E. Waterfield, Christians in Persia (New York, 1973); J. E. Whitehurst, 'The Zoroastrian Response to Westernization: A Case Study of the Parsis of Bombay', JAAR 37 (1969), pp. 224–236; D. Winston, 'The Iranian Component in the Bible, Apocrypha, and Qumran', HR 5 (1965–66), pp. 183–216.

E. M. YAMAUCHI

ZWINGLI, HULDRYCH (1484–1531)

Zwingli, the pioneer of the Swiss Reformation, was born at Wildhaus on 1 January 1484 and received his education at Basel, Berne and Vienna. He emerged with Renaissance enthusiasm, especially for *Erasmus, and perhaps some knowledge of Protestant doctrines of grace, acquired from Thomas Wytenbach. Ordained in 1506, he became rector of Glarus, where he was a diligent pastor, effective preacher, affectionate colleague and industrious student. Chaplaincy service in the papal army brought him a pension but plunged him into opposition to the mercenary system. This caused tension in Glarus that led him to a new charge at Einsiedeln in 1516.

At Einsiedeln Zwingli ministered to the many pilgrims to the famous shrine of Mary. He enjoyed the resources of the Abbey library and had leisure to immerse himself in Erasmus' Greek NT (1516). The study of the original text gave him new insights into the gospel which were to affect all his future life, thought and work.

A vacancy at Zurich in 1519 opened the door to his reforming activity. Appointed people's priest in spite of opposition, he used the Great Minster pulpit for a systematic exposition of the NT, and later the OT. This preaching alerted both preacher and people to the wide gap between Scripture and contemporary belief and practice. A plague in 1519, which claimed Zwingli's brother and almost cost him his own life, added depth to his ministry. Quickly gathering adherents, he initiated the radical programme of reform which rapidly changed the ecclesiastical life of the city, the canton, and neighbouring cities such as Schaffhausen, Basel and Berne. Prominent changes included the ending of the Mass, the rejection of the *papacy and hierarchy, the suppression of the monasteries, the translation of the Bible and liturgy, the pruning of customs and practices according to Scripture, the improvement of theological training, the establishment of synodal ministry, enhancing the role of the *laity and the introduction of a tighter disciplinary system.

After 1525 Zwingli unfortunately found himself not only at odds with Roman Catholic adversaries but also embroiled with the *Anabaptists and *Lutherans. Controversies diverted resources and weakened the force of reform. The growing isolation of Zurich, the implacable hostility of the Swiss Forest Cantons and the possibility of Austrian intervention made the failure of the Marburg Colloquy (1529; see *Eucharist) a serious setback. The Forest Cantons caught Zurich unprepared at Kappel in October 1531, and Zwingli fell in the defeat which halted, although it did not reverse, the Reformation in German Switzerland.

Zwingli lived a busy life during the days of reform and reorganization, but he still found time to publish several important works. The Clarity and Certainty of the Word of God came out in 1522. In 1523 the Sixty-Seven Theses, for which he also composed a commentary, constituted the first Reformation *confession. To the same period belong the sermon On Divine and Human Righteousness and the essay On the Canon of the Mass. Perhaps his most significant theological treatise was his Commentary on True and False Religion (1525). The works On Baptism and On the Lord's Supper marked the beginning of the sacramental debates among the Reformers, each of them followed by further polemical treatises. In 1530 Zwingli published his Marburg address The Providence of God, and also prepared a statement, Fidei Ratio, for the Diet of Augsburg. In 1531 he wrote his very similar final work, Exposition of the Faith, in a vain effort to win over the king of France to the reforming cause.

Zwingli died prematurely, but not before he had launched the Reformation in Switzerland and helped to give it a distinctive stamp. Naturally he shared many of *Luther's concerns: *justification by faith, vernacular Bible translation, correction of abuses, biblical learning and the primacy of Scripture. He went beyond Luther, however, in radical application of the biblical rule. In a less autocratic society, he gave the city's councils a bigger voice as representatives of the church's laity. He devised a simpler liturgy. He acted more effectively to secure an educated ministry by the establishment of a theological college and by the so-called prophesyings at which pastors would study Scripture in the original tongues. He took sharper measures for *discipline, with a special body including lay delegates. He moved toward a *presbyterian system in taking over supervision from the distant bishop of Constance.

Theologically, too, Zwingli steered the Swiss churches into courses which would distinguish the Reformed family. Thus he gave a special emphasis to the primacy of Scripture as the rule of faith and conduct. The Berne Theses (1528) express his point that, as the church is born of God's word, so it can rule only on this basis. Sharing with Luther a firm belief in the efficacy of the word, he asserted with added strength that, although the word has intrinsic clarity, only illumination by the Holy Spirit enables us to pierce the thicket of misinterpretation and know and accept its saving truth. *Prayer is thus a *hermeneutical prerequisite.

In debate with the Anabaptists and Lutherans, Zwingli developed two important doctrines. As regards baptism, he turned to the *covenant theology of the OT, which in turn fed his strong views on election (see *Predestination) and controlled his understanding of church and society. He agreed with Luther in rejecting the eucharistic sacrifice, but saw in the Supper no necessary equation of sign and thing signified in virtue of the presence of Christ's humanity, which is now in fact at the right hand of the Father. Faith alone, he thought, perceives the presence and receives the benefits.

Zwingli is often depicted as a humanist Reformer with little theological perspicacity or spiritual profundity. Overdue reappraisals, however, have noted the crises at Einsiedeln and Zurich resulting from his problems with celibacy, his study of the NT, and his almost fatal sickness, which combined to give him an acute awareness of divine grace and divine over-ruling. He often adopts a rational style of argumentation, but closer analysis of his works reveals a sharper *trinitarian and *Christological focus. The eucharistic teaching initially suggests a weak memorialism, but it was clearly gaining in content as Zwingli came to appreciate the divine presence of Christ, the concept of the visible word and the role of the sacrament in the confirming of faith. Even what might often seem to be a compromise with *civil religion takes on a new aspect when set in the biblical context of covenant and election. If Zwingli did not himself develop all the emphases that characterize the Reformed churches, he sketched many of the outlines both practically and theologically. For this reason his brief and more localized ministry has a broad and lasting significance.

Bibliography

Works: ETs in G. W. Bromiley, Zwingli and Bullinger (London, 1953); E. J. Furcha and H. W. Pipkin, Selected Writings of Huldrych Zwingli, 2 vols. (Allison Park, 1984); S. M. Jackson, Selected Works . . . (New York, 1969[1901]); idem, The Latin Works and the Correspondence . . ., 3 vols. (New York and Philadelphia, 1912, 1922, 1929, repr. Durham, 1981–7).

Studies: E. J. Furcha and H. W. Pipkin (eds.), Prophet, Pastor, Protestant: The Work of Huldrych Zwingli after Five Hundred Years (Allison Park, 1984); V. Gäbler, Huldrych Zwingli: His Life and Work (Edinburgh, 1999); G. W. Locher, Zwingli's Thought: New Perspectives (Leiden, 1981); G. R. Potter, Zwingli (Cambridge, 1976); J. Rilliet, Zwingli (London, 1964); W. P. Stephens, The Theology of Huldrych Zwingli (Oxford, 1986); idem, Zwingli: An Introduction to His Thought (Oxford, 1992).

G. W. BROMILEY

Index of names

- Abelard, P. 1–2, 79, 119, 316, 473, 530–531, 585, 623, 707, 734, 789, 801, 815, 881, 943
Adam of St Victor 943
Adorno, T. W. 8, 352
Adrienne von Speyr 95
Agricola, J. 43, 384, 507
Albertus Magnus 14–15, 63, 121, 264, 815
Alexander of Alexandria, Bishop 59, 74, 618
Alexander, A. 416, 705
Allen, R. 18
Althaus, P. 19
Altizer, T. 244, 690
Alves, R. 519
Ambrose 19–20, 69, 82–83, 85, 97, 108, 205, 234, 643–644, 655, 681, 732, 871
Ames, W. 20, 640, 666, 719–720, 729
Amyraut, M. 21–22, 120, 226
Anderson, G. 172, 756
Andrew of Wigmore 943
Anselm 26, 37–39, 50, 79, 86, 104, 111, 114, 150, 178, 218, 256, 273, 293, 309, 328, 355, 383–384, 423, 555, 562, 603, 672, 674–675, 736–737, 789, 801, 808, 815, 843, 845, 859, 881, 920
Antony of Egypt 68, 220, 590
Aphrahat 655, 883
Aristides 51, 664, 805
Aristotle 15, 41, 62–64, 86, 92, 126, 128, 264, 325, 377, 388, 444, 466, 563, 578, 588, 623, 631, 675, 681–682, 730, 749, 814–816, 848, 857, 859, 868, 880, 885, 903, 906, 908, 912, 918, 925, 943, 984
Arius 59–60, 74, 160, 176–177, 308, 397, 434, 549, 555, 618, 855, 965
Arminius, J. 64–65, 226, 267, 377, 382, 666, 701, 720, 859–860
Arnould, A. 88, 463, 654
Arndt, J. 676
Asbury, F. 66, 565
Athanasius 16–17, 40, 48–49, 59–61, 69, 73–75, 78, 107–108, 115, 177, 241–242, 277, 308, 328, 334, 380, 384, 397, 422, 445, 549, 590, 618–619, 629, 655, 798, 808, 822, 856, 887, 895, 903, 916, 965
Athenagoras 51–52, 285, 664, 765, 965
Augustine 1, 3–4, 19, 25, 28, 31–32, 37–39, 41, 50, 69, 81–88, 97, 114–115, 128, 131, 142, 144, 146, 159, 167–169, 173, 184, 201, 211, 218, 225, 232, 234, 240, 251–253, 265–266, 295, 297–298, 316, 319, 322, 328–329, 335, 361, 363, 370, 375–376, 381, 390, 393, 398, 405, 407, 414, 422–423, 432, 436, 439, 462, 466, 475–476, 480–481, 483, 491, 530–531, 533–535, 548, 562, 571, 578–579, 583, 590, 595, 599, 621, 625, 643–645, 655, 657–658, 664, 666, 672, 675, 678–682, 684, 699–700, 711, 718, 726–727, 732, 736, 753, 757, 771, 778, 783–784, 797, 805, 808, 810, 833–835, 837, 841–842, 844, 850, 860, 867, 881, 887, 892–893, 896–899, 903, 905–906, 908, 912, 921, 923, 935, 941, 943, 945–946, 948, 951, 959, 965, 973
Aulén, G. 78, 88–89, 608, 624, 737, 801, 964
Aurelius, M. 483, 871
Austin, J. L. 195, 312, 763
Averroes 63, 92, 815–816, 906
Ayer, A. J. 293, 430, 528–529, 941, 966
Bacon, F. 417, 818
Bacon, R. 14, 350, 815, 881
Baillie, D. M. 93, 608
Baillie, J. 93–94, 132, 360, 608, 630, 681, 914
Baius, M. 87, 466
Balthasar, H. U. von 25, 36, 94–95, 211, 359, 366, 402, 551, 727, 773, 783, 836, 878
Bangs, N. 96, 568
Barclay, R. 722–723
Barclay, W. 102, 113, 547
Barlaam 404, 645
Barnes, E. W. 513–514, 585
Barth, K. 3–5, 19, 25–26, 37, 50, 73, 79, 88, 90–91, 95, 99, 103–106, 112, 115, 117–118, 120, 125, 128–129, 132, 139, 153, 158, 169, 179, 183, 197, 199, 206–207, 210–211, 226, 230–231, 236, 244–245, 254–257, 262, 270, 289, 298–299, 302, 311, 316, 319–321, 329, 333, 341, 346, 355, 359–360, 366, 370–371, 373, 385, 389, 402, 405–406, 423–424, 426–428, 439, 443, 449–450, 464–465, 475, 477–479, 482, 488–489, 492, 495, 499, 507, 514–515, 517, 519, 530, 533–535, 547, 595, 605, 608, 616, 621–622, 624, 629, 634, 639, 647–648, 673, 675, 678, 692, 699, 701, 708, 712–713, 728, 749–750, 761, 768–769, 772, 779, 781–782, 793, 807, 811–813, 827–828, 836, 843, 849, 851, 859, 866, 874, 885, 889, 892–893, 899, 902, 910, 912, 914–916, 919–920, 924, 936, 939, 944–946, 964, 978
Basil of Caesarea 52, 107–108, 277, 379, 422, 473, 655, 698, 826, 856, 916, 923
Basil the Great 60, 68–69, 107, 277, 403
Basilides of Alexandria 16, 260, 367
Bates, J. 834
Bauman, Z. 364, 692, 756
Baur, F. C. 186, 415, 517, 812, 871, 927–928
Bavinck, H. 108, 117, 310, 750, 885, 951
Bavinck, J. H. 108–109, 174, 758
Baxter, R. 109–110, 155, 406, 644, 721, 851, 859

Index of names

- Baylor, M. G. 206
Beck, J. T. 110, 676
Bede 86, 114
Bellah, R. 189–190
Bellamy, J. 611
Bellarmine, R. 113, 466–467, 639
Belsham, T. 934
Benedict of Nursia 69, 114, 590
Bengel, J. A. 115, 193, 297, 677
Berdyayev, N. 793
Berengar 115–116
Berger, P. 478, 500, 832, 853–854
Berkeley, G. 116, 289, 292, 295, 435, 563, 591, 647
Berkhof, H. 117, 634
Berkhof, L. 117
Berkouwer, G. C. 73, 117–118, 310, 329, 634, 939
Bernard of Clairvaux 2, 14, 69, 86, 114–115, 119, 169, 188, 309–310, 347, 363, 408, 531, 555, 589–590, 599, 664–665, 682, 770, 805, 808, 839
Beza, T. 64, 120, 188, 200, 268, 329, 630, 665, 701, 719, 729, 747, 749, 888, 967
Biddle, J. 934
Biel, G. 87, 121, 225, 887
Biko, S. 122
Billings, J. T. 362
Birnbaum, N. 981
Blackham, H. J. 429
Bloch, E. 685
Bloesch, D. G. 125, 212, 310, 347
Blondel, M. 429, 584
Blyden, E. 121–122
Boardman, W. E. 406–407, 418
Boddy, A. A. 660
Boehme, J. 126, 508, 650, 676
Boethius 63, 126, 295, 681, 815, 881, 906, 912, 923
Boff, C. 127
Boff, L. 127, 182, 211, 351, 519–521, 685, 785
Bonaventura 14, 86, 127–128, 273, 350–351, 363, 450, 466, 599, 815, 961
Bonhoeffer, D. 70, 94, 103, 128–129, 168–170, 245, 279, 302, 359, 443, 600, 621, 673, 713, 765, 807, 859
Booth, C. 418, 665, 802, 806
Booth, W. 418, 665, 802–803
Borromeo, C. 743
Bossuet, J.-B. 129, 415
Boston, T. 130, 847
Boyce, J. P. 857
Bradwardine, T. 81, 87, 131, 381
Briggs, C. A. 131
Brightman, T. 47, 297, 572
Brown, W. A. 131–132
Browne, R. 204, 719
Bruner, F. D. 162, 662
Brunner, E. 98, 104, 132–133, 207, 256, 262, 279, 319, 361, 373, 492, 495, 514–515, 526, 581, 605, 608, 643, 807, 910, 936, 944
Bryan, W. J. 357
Buber, M. 132–133, 319–320, 341, 373
Bucer (Butzer), M. 133–134, 137, 185, 188, 199, 496, 538, 559, 599, 627–628, 747, 888, 942
Buchman, F. 594
Bukharev, F. 792
Bulgakov, M. 792
Bulgakov, S. 136–137, 278, 532, 793–794, 963
Bullinger, J. H. 98, 137–138, 199, 225, 394, 627, 630, 747, 749, 852, 937, 942
Bultmann, R. 50, 103, 138–139, 210, 215–216, 235, 245, 248–249, 254, 256–258, 262, 279, 319, 323, 361, 373, 393, 401, 411–412, 415–416, 443, 468, 478, 486, 488–489, 514–515, 519, 547, 601, 608, 624, 648, 708, 713, 768–769, 782, 803–804, 811, 819, 854–855, 882, 910, 919
Bunyan, J. 140–141, 719
Buren, P. van 244, 420
Bushnell, H. 141, 416, 787
Butler, J. 50, 141–142, 326, 546, 604, 939
Caesar Cremoninus 92
Cajetan, T. de V. C. 24, 265, 538, 909
Callistus 410–411
Calvin, J. 2, 21, 26, 41, 43, 72, 79, 81, 87, 89–90, 98–99, 105–106, 108, 120, 130, 134, 137, 143–147, 152, 156, 167, 169, 173, 181, 188, 199, 201–202, 225–226, 235, 242, 251, 253, 268, 294, 297, 323, 328–329, 332, 346, 361–362, 366, 384, 419, 423, 431, 437, 439, 443, 447, 450, 456, 477, 495–496, 500–501, 505, 507, 534, 559, 562, 604, 621, 626, 628, 630, 634, 639, 641–642, 665–666, 675, 678–679, 699–700, 702, 704, 711, 719, 737–740, 744, 746–750, 752, 758, 765–766, 779, 784, 799, 805–806, 808, 811, 813, 816, 818, 839–840, 851–852, 858–860, 868–869, 885, 888, 896–897, 915, 919–920, 928, 937, 942, 944, 951, 957, 967
Cameron, J. 21
Campbell, A. 149
Campbell, J. M. 149–151, 296, 893
Campbell, T. 149
Canisius, P. 157, 466, 744
Cappel, L. 21
Caputo, J. 302, 393, 690
Carnell, E. J. 50, 153–154, 357
Carroll, B. H. 858
Cassian, J. 69, 114, 590, 655, 664, 833
Cerinthus 367
Chalmers, T. 161, 297, 458, 693–694, 849
Channing, W. E. 934
Chao, J. 165
Chauncy, C. 774
Chemnitz, M. 162–163, 200, 345, 384–385, 541
Cho, Y. 663
Chrysippus 870
Chrysostom, J. 2, 43, 46, 78, 97, 115, 179–180, 225, 262, 277, 297, 405, 552, 627–628, 655, 919
Cisneros, F. X. de 741
Clarke, W. N. 191
Clement 870
Clement of Alexandria 16, 50, 68, 96, 173, 191–192, 234, 251, 369, 565, 589–590, 643, 655, 664–665, 669, 680–681, 704, 757, 797, 805, 871

- Clement of Rome 57, 187, 400, 655, 956
Cobb, J. B. Jr 192, 568, 707–708, 955
Cocceius, J. 115, 130, 192–193, 226, 639, 677, 749, 947
Coleridge, S. T. 126, 193–194, 370, 386, 435, 458, 785–786
Columbanus 69
Comte, A. 122–124, 211, 429, 528, 687, 851, 853
Congar, Y. 203, 519, 783
Conn, H. 214
Conner, W. T. 858
Constans 60–61
Constantine 59–60, 68, 97, 166–167, 208, 265, 434, 440, 476, 505, 618, 643, 789, 791, 866, 896, 980
Constantius 60–61, 550
Contarini, G. 210, 559, 701, 742
Cotton, J. 220–221, 557–558, 721
Coxe, N. 226
Cranmer, T. 28, 43, 189, 199, 228, 431, 626, 712, 750–752, 806, 905, 942
Cremer, H. 235, 677
Croatto, J. S. 519
Cromwell, O. 109, 297, 492, 642, 721, 775, 896, 950, 957
Cudworth, R. 148
Culley, R. C. 873
Cullmann, O. 41, 197, 248, 298, 415, 445, 803
Cupitt, D. 624, 690, 829
Cyprian 54, 84, 97, 173, 240–241, 265, 509, 624, 655, 704, 718, 736, 757, 797, 808, 810, 880
Cyril of Alexandria 16–17, 46, 49, 160, 177, 219, 241–242, 277, 292, 433, 591–592, 609, 629, 634, 655, 788, 878
Cyril of Jerusalem 97, 155, 159, 887
Dabney, R. L. 242, 846
Dagg, J. L. 857
Dale, R. W. 188, 204, 347
Darby, J. N. 43, 47, 243, 259, 297–298, 356, 572, 660, 786, 982
Darwin, C. 53, 231–232, 417, 429, 617, 637, 709, 818, 950
D’Costa, G. 174, 758
Denney, J. 249, 347, 616
Derrida, J. 245–246, 249–250, 361, 393, 551, 571, 668, 689–690, 692, 764, 874
Descartes, R. 41, 148, 250, 269–270, 272, 292, 348, 363, 391, 393, 444, 527, 551, 556, 564, 603, 654, 668, 672, 688, 691, 730, 896, 947
Dewey, J. 163, 255, 361, 430
Dibelius, M. 139, 653
Dilthey, W. 258, 401, 777, 925
Diodore of Tarsus 45–46, 179
Dodd, C. H. 261–262, 298, 333, 412, 488, 608, 875, 975
Dominic 264
Dooyeweerd, H. 266, 310, 415, 750
Dostoevsky, F. M. 104, 257, 268–269, 319–320, 608
Drozdov, F. 343, 792
Dunant, H. 982
Dunn, J. D. G. 56, 162, 311, 468, 482, 568, 662, 976
Duns Scotus, J. 24, 86, 92, 121, 272–273, 328, 350, 371, 405, 449, 555, 672, 726–727, 762, 789, 816, 896, 949, 961
Dupuis, J. 172, 756
Durkheim, E. 34, 274, 301, 755, 832, 853, 952
Dwight, T. 611–612
Ebeling, G. 139, 279, 355, 599, 888
Edwards, J. 26, 73, 287–288, 297, 309, 354, 366, 406, 417, 435, 465, 475, 526, 561, 611–613, 675, 701, 722, 750, 760, 774, 842, 863, 870, 938, 960, 966
Einstein, A. 618, 682, 707, 901, 912
Eliade, M. 669, 755
Ellul, J. 288, 352, 851
Emerson, R. W. 289, 786
Engels, F. 152, 341, 435, 552–553, 775
Ephraim 883
Ephrem 655, 883
Episcopus, S. 65
Erasmus, D. 20, 87, 133, 137, 168–169, 228, 294, 328, 431, 539, 559, 627–628, 716, 744, 783, 816, 937, 984–985
Eriugena, J. S. 86, 115, 295, 600, 650, 655, 681–682, 732
Erskine, T. 295–296
Eugenius III, Pope 119
Eunomius 52, 61, 107, 371, 855
Eusebius of Caesarea 6, 16, 57, 59–60, 68, 78, 158, 208, 260, 275, 280, 308, 414, 483, 549, 618, 655, 684, 866
Eusebius of Nicomedia 59–60, 74, 549
Eutyches 160, 219, 222, 234, 510, 591–592
Faber, G. S. 47
Falwell, J. 357–358
Farel, W. 199, 332
Farmer, H. H. 333, 631
Farrer, A. M. 334, 361
Fee, G. 663
Feuerbach, L. A. 18, 42, 76, 299, 341, 429, 442, 553, 696, 812
Fichte, J. G. 342, 359–360, 391, 516
Finney, C. G. 100, 297, 310, 343, 416, 418, 547, 567, 665, 774, 802, 863
Fiorenza, E. S. 338, 344
Fletcher, J. 96, 100, 302, 566, 806
Florovsky, G. 345, 533, 570, 793, 814, 982
Ford, D. F. 475, 888, 947
Forsyth, P. T. 256, 346–347, 415, 478, 487, 878
Foucault, M. 91, 344, 348, 689–690, 692, 723, 874, 926
Fox, G. 125, 140, 722–723
Fox, M. 232–233
Francis of Assisi 349–350, 443, 460, 599, 861
Francke, A. H. 557, 676–677, 791
Frazer, J. 361, 755
Frei, H. 211, 354, 402, 602, 678, 687, 735, 888, 978
Freud, S. 76, 206, 341, 543, 689, 691, 881
Frith, J. 750–751
Fuller, A. 73, 226, 354, 433
Gadamer, H.-G. 210, 393, 401, 617, 926

Index of names

- Galileo 92, 113, 377, 783–784, 818–819
Garvey, M. 121–122
Geertz, C. 238, 687, 735, 755
Gerhard, J. 541, 638, 676, 790
Gifford, A. 360, 605
Gill, J. 226, 354, 363, 433
Gilson, E. 361, 363, 816, 885, 909
Girard, R. 79–80, 212
Gladden, W. 849
Gogarten, F. 139, 256, 373, 514, 608, 910
González, J. L. 413, 520
Goodwin, T. 347, 373, 720–721
Gore, C. 186–187, 374, 487, 891–892
Gottschalk 86, 295, 375–376, 732
Grant, J. 124, 214, 968
Grégoire, H. 463
Gregory of Nazianzus 52, 107, 209, 370, 379, 421, 473, 799, 856, 916
Gregory of Nyssa 49, 52, 78, 107, 209, 247, 277, 295, 297, 327, 370–371, 379–380, 473, 543, 552, 655, 717, 835, 856, 887, 916
Gregory of Palamas 404
Gregory of Rimini 87, 380–381
Gregory the Great 86, 97, 114, 159, 381, 436, 466, 590, 716
Gregory XIII, Pope 276, 743
Grenz, S. J. 214, 310, 313, 381–382, 690, 902
Gressmann, H. 415
Grosseteste, R. 14, 63
Grotius, H. 65, 79, 382, 506, 527, 629, 913, 934
Guangxun, Ding 165
Gunkel, H. 415, 882
Gunton, C. E. 211, 347, 385–386, 494, 500, 583, 629
Gurney, J. J. 722
Gutiérrez, G. 172, 211, 216, 302, 386, 415, 518–522, 696, 785
Habermas, J. 210, 352
Hadow, J. 130
Hallesby, O. 387
Harmon, E. G., see White, E. 834
Harnack, A. von 84, 103–104, 131, 186, 233, 235, 256, 261–262, 299, 387, 398, 413, 468, 514–515, 517, 583–584, 591, 637, 711, 768, 781, 811
Hartshorne, C. 385, 632, 647, 707–708, 819, 859
Hauerwas, S. 63, 170, 183, 208, 211, 302, 361, 388, 495, 516, 603, 684, 735, 807
Hegel, G. W. F. 18, 91, 257, 298, 301, 323, 327, 341, 352, 359–360, 391–392, 415, 427, 435, 465, 489–490, 512, 514, 516, 553, 561, 564, 586, 605, 648, 650, 673, 696, 708–709, 713, 717, 786, 912, 918, 925
Heidegger, M. 138, 245, 248–249, 258, 316, 319, 392–393, 511–512, 515, 551, 631, 668, 691, 708, 727, 911, 926
Heim, K. 394
Henderson, A. 227–228
Henry, C. F. H. 310, 357, 395–396, 514, 762, 772
Herbert of Cherbury 396
Herrmann, W. 93, 103, 139, 178, 333, 403, 517, 781–782
Herzl, T. 979, 981–982
Hick, J. H. 111–112, 248, 293, 361, 404–405, 450, 515, 713, 877, 898, 936
Hilary of Poitiers 407–408
Hildegard of Bingen 233, 408, 475, 861
Hippolytus 6, 43, 201, 234, 251, 280, 307, 327, 367, 410–411, 575, 589, 704
Hodge, A. A. 417, 705, 735, 750, 950–951
Hodge, C. 329, 377, 416–417, 561, 705–706, 735, 750, 901–902, 910, 928, 950–951
Hoeksema, H. 433
Holl, K. 19, 419
Hooker, R. 154, 167, 187, 425–426, 502, 576, 681, 806, 955
Hopkins, S. 611
Horkheimer, M. 352
Hort, F. J. A. 193, 956
Howard, P. 594
Hromadka, J. L. 776
Hubmaier, B. 428, 869
Hügel, F. von 429, 584–585, 600, 929
Hugh of St Victor 681
Hume, D. 50, 142, 195, 218, 289, 291–292, 301, 429–431, 444, 484–485, 528, 563, 578–579, 605, 646, 668, 691, 734, 767, 846, 877, 898
Hus, J. 224, 432, 538, 712
Husserl, E. 249, 258, 393, 511, 551, 668–669, 911
Huxley, T. H. 14, 232, 429
Iavorsky, S. 790
Idowu, E. B. 10–11
Ignatius of Antioch 54, 56–57, 158, 176, 186, 201, 396, 552, 655
Ignatius of Loyola 437, 466, 600, 728, 742, 861–862
Ilarion 789–791
Irenaeus 3–4, 40, 43, 74, 78, 85, 89, 96, 158, 173, 176, 186, 225, 231, 234, 251, 259–260, 280, 296, 327–328, 366–369, 396–397, 410–411, 423, 446, 456–458, 571, 579, 651, 704, 711, 736, 753, 757, 766, 825, 886, 894, 898, 946, 964
Irving, E. 43, 47, 151, 296–297, 386, 423, 458–459, 786, 843, 893, 982
Iwashita, S. 464
James, W. 14, 163, 342, 361, 430, 462, 755, 761
Jansen, C. 87–88, 462
Jenkins, P. 900
Jenson, R. W. 212, 311, 385, 465, 692, 885–886, 913
Jerome 48, 69, 114, 158, 186, 206, 234, 465–466, 624, 655, 657, 659, 822, 924, 944
Jewel, J. 137, 471, 905, 942
Joachim of Fiore 47, 297, 472, 502, 531
John of Damascus 155, 277, 383, 419, 434, 436, 441, 460, 473–474, 874, 887
Julian of Eclanum 658
Julian of Norwich 479, 600, 861
Julian the Apostate 53, 789
Jüngel, E. 24, 106, 236–237, 479, 535, 713, 878

- Jung-Stilling, J. H. 791–792
Justin 50, 173, 367, 530, 571, 664, 680, 757
Justin Martyr 51, 201, 251, 296, 307, 367, 395, 436, 446, 480, 483, 552, 643, 704, 753, 770, 825, 964
Kähler, M. 110, 139, 347, 468, 484, 677
Kant, I. 7, 25, 50, 91, 111, 194, 218, 290, 293, 301, 318, 326, 341–342, 353, 359–360, 391–392, 435, 441, 444, 484–485, 516, 546, 561, 564, 571, 595, 603, 605, 623, 641, 668, 673–675, 688, 691, 713, 717, 735, 783, 786, 811–812, 841, 896, 898, 925
Kärkkäinen, V.-M. 663
Karlstadt, A. B. von 87, 436, 486, 538, 559, 597, 745
Käsemann, E. 139, 412, 486
Kato, B. 11
Keble, J. 31, 334, 487, 576, 786
Kepler, J. 820
Khomyakov, A. S. 792, 847
Kierkegaard, S. A. 4, 18, 50, 104, 132, 153, 256–257, 269–270, 319–320, 323, 326, 347, 393, 443, 489–490, 551, 608, 713, 878, 926
Kitamori, K. 71, 236, 464, 839, 878
Kittel, R. 415
Knox, J. 199, 496, 749, 752, 775, 821
Koyama, K. 464, 839
Kraemer, H. 174–175, 451, 497–498, 758–759
Kuhn, T. 653, 735
Küng, H. 36, 235, 482, 498–499, 515, 554, 704, 785
Kuyper, A. 8, 108, 117, 266, 275, 310, 377, 493, 499–500, 633, 678, 684, 694, 750, 851, 939, 951
LaCugna, C. M. 500
Ladd, G. E. 298, 804
Lash, N. 761
Law, W. 126, 443, 508, 862, 953
Leach, E. 873
Leech, K. 33
Leibniz, G. W. von 129, 250, 391–392, 509, 563–564, 673, 730, 787, 791–792, 816, 897
Leichuan, Wu 164–165
Leo the Great 510
Leo XIII, Pope 55, 64, 153, 350, 555, 583, 694, 785, 816, 909
Leontius of Byzantium 277, 433–434, 449, 474, 592, 716
Lessing, G. E. 291, 469, 511, 516, 565, 913
Lévinas, E. 689
Levi-Strauss, C. 873
Levshin, P. 791
Lewis, C. S. 26, 50, 334, 512–513, 543, 719
Lightfoot, J. B. 186, 927, 956
Lindbeck, G. 211, 261, 313, 516, 523, 678, 687–688, 735, 902, 926, 978
Lindsey, H. 43, 48, 298
Lindsey, T. 934
Lloyd-Jones, D. M. 73, 526, 722
Locke, J. 26, 289, 292, 326, 430–431, 435, 526–527, 563, 623, 668, 672, 674, 731, 734, 780, 913
Loisy, A. 387, 583–585
Lombard, P. 14–15, 81, 86, 97, 156, 272, 297–298, 380–381, 466, 530–531, 533, 659, 797, 815, 887, 906, 961
Lonergan, B. 467, 531–532, 551, 617, 816, 909, 917
Lossky, V. 53, 278, 532, 599, 793, 963
Lucaris, C. 200, 278, 790
Ludlow, J. M. F. 171
Lull, R. 460, 536–537
Luther, M. 3–4, 19, 43, 70, 72, 79, 81, 87, 89, 98, 121, 125, 130, 133–134, 137, 141, 143, 146, 152, 156, 163, 167, 169, 182, 189, 200, 206, 211, 225, 228, 235–236, 244, 251–252, 256–257, 265, 279, 294, 297, 307, 322–323, 325–326, 328, 341, 345, 384, 400, 405–406, 413, 419, 423, 428, 436, 443, 447, 456, 465, 480–482, 486, 495, 501–502, 504–507, 534, 537–542, 559, 562, 597, 600, 604, 608, 620, 628, 633–634, 638, 640–641, 651, 659, 665–667, 677, 684, 699–700, 704, 711–712, 714, 719, 737–740, 742, 744–745, 747–748, 751–752, 765, 771, 778–779, 782, 784, 801, 805, 808, 813, 816–818, 822–823, 839, 857, 859, 861–862, 867–868, 887–888, 909, 917–918, 930, 954, 970, 976, 985
Lyotard, J.-F. 689, 691–692
Macarius (Pseudo) 403, 543
Macchia, F. D. 663
MacDonald, G. 543
Machen, J. G. 544, 598, 705, 938
MacIntyre, A. C. 63, 544–545, 552, 684, 763
MacKay, D. M. 545–546
MacKinnon, D. M. 546, 735
Mackintosh, H. R. 93, 249, 487, 546–547, 914
Macquarrie, J. 248, 547, 713
Mahan, A. 418, 547–548
Mani 548–549
Marcel, G. 319, 361, 549
Marcellus of Ancyra 60–61, 549–550
Marcion 234, 260, 367, 387, 397, 457, 548, 550, 883, 894
Marion, J.-L. 361–362, 393, 551, 690, 692
Maritain, J. 363, 551, 816, 868, 909
Martineau, J. 150, 193, 934
Marx, K. 18, 53, 76, 152–153, 183, 298, 341, 352, 435–436, 552–554, 556, 694, 696, 775, 832, 851, 853, 868, 971
Mather, C. 557–558
Mather, I. 557, 870
Maurice, F. D. 153, 171, 193, 435, 500, 543, 776, 849, 956
Mauss, M. 361
Maximilia 593
Mbiti, J. 10–11, 123
McCosh, J. 705, 950
McGrath, A. E. 50, 230, 311, 481, 495, 690, 735, 772, 901
Mede, J. 297, 572
Melancthon, P. 5, 81–82, 134, 137, 142, 163, 198, 200, 226, 345, 384–385, 393–394, 419, 431, 481, 505, 507, 538, 541, 559, 561, 627, 638, 640, 738–739, 805, 816, 852, 859, 888, 937

Index of names

- Menzies, R. P. 663
Merton, T. 70, 563, 590, 600, 864
Metz, J. B. 355, 420, 519, 569
Meyendorff, J. 278, 434, 569
Míguez Bonino, J. 182, 519, 521, 568, 570, 685, 696
Milbank, J. 63, 211, 302, 361–362, 570–571, 726, 763, 849, 851
Miller, W. 834
Mingdao, Wang 165
Miyahira, N. 464
Moberly, R. C. 582
Mogila, P. 278, 790
Möhler, J. A. 586
Molinos, M. de 724
Moltmann, J. 71, 80, 181, 211–212, 236–237, 282, 299, 302, 361, 372, 415, 420, 424, 426–428, 445, 475, 519, 536, 586–588, 632, 647, 685, 699, 713, 770, 878, 899, 916, 936, 959
Montanus 549, 593
Moodie, T. D. 190
Moody, D. L. 48, 100, 418, 630, 858
More, H. 148
Mullins, E. Y. 102, 858
Müntzer, T. 22, 597, 745, 813, 897
Murray, A. 100, 274, 418, 597–598, 665
Murray, J. 226, 433, 598, 784
Musculus, W. 598–599
Nero, Emperor 43
Nesmelov, V. 792
Nestorius 17, 45, 160, 177, 222, 234, 241, 292, 555, 591, 609, 634, 884
Nevin, J. W. 416, 561, 787
Newbiggin, J. E. L. 174, 212, 313, 364, 573, 581, 586, 615–616, 699, 758
Newman, J. H. 31–32, 50, 193, 199, 253, 263, 299–300, 374, 413, 576, 616–617, 783, 786, 826
Newton, I. 247, 291, 526, 618, 819, 912
Nicholas of Lyra 619–620
Niebuhr, H. R. 237, 494–495, 573, 608, 612, 620, 853, 861, 918
Niebuhr, R. 88, 153, 167, 361, 415, 493, 515, 554, 608, 620–621, 684, 848, 979
Nietzsche, F. 76, 91, 104, 125, 206, 244–245, 301, 319, 353, 490, 622, 689, 691–692, 695, 918, 926
Novak, M. 153, 500, 520
Novatian 624
Nowell, A. 156
Nygren, A. 88–89, 571, 599, 608, 624–625, 964
Ochino, B. 626, 933, 937
Oden, T. C. 627, 885
O'Donovan, O. 199, 206, 208, 211, 302, 311, 493, 505, 625, 684
Oecolampadius, J. 133, 538, 627–628, 740, 749
Oldham, J. H. 172, 284, 630, 848
Olevianus, C. 156, 226, 394, 630–631, 749, 888
Oman, J. W. 89–90, 333, 631
Origen 16, 59, 68, 97, 107, 148, 173, 191, 253, 280, 295–297, 308, 327, 334, 367, 380, 395, 400, 405, 433, 446, 465, 543, 552, 565, 589–590, 635–636, 643, 655, 657, 669, 680–681, 717–718, 736–737, 757, 770, 808, 825, 856, 874, 887, 912, 923, 935, 965
Orr, J. 232, 299, 327, 413, 637, 951
Osiander, A. 163, 228, 538, 559, 640–641, 779
Otto, R. 631, 641, 669, 782, 838
Owen, J. 79, 188, 386, 423, 640, 642–643, 720–721
Owen, R. 149, 171
Pachomius 68–69, 220, 664
Packer, J. I. 35, 79, 162, 311, 418, 644, 722, 905
Padilla, R. 216, 311, 521, 697
Pajon, C. 22
Palamas, G. 247, 278, 345, 371, 404, 569–570, 645, 946
Paley, W. 326, 604, 645–646, 819
Palmer, P. W. 96, 417–418, 567, 646, 665, 802
Panaetius 871
Panikkar, R. 410, 451
Pannenberg, W. 4, 24, 106, 212, 251, 271, 298–299, 323, 329, 381–382, 415, 424, 426–428, 449, 494, 533–534, 608, 628, 647–649, 709, 713, 767–768, 770, 782, 885, 944
Parham, C. F. 660
Park, E. A. 417, 611
Parker, T. 934
Pascal, B. 50, 77, 88, 326, 342, 347, 463, 595, 654, 731
Paschasius R. 86, 114–115, 295, 655, 732
Paul of Constantinople 61
Paul of Samosata 6, 308, 549, 804
Peckham, J. 156–157
Pelagius 84, 159, 328, 376, 480, 562, 657–658, 700
Pelikan, J. 198, 361, 413, 440, 658
Perkins, W. 20, 72, 156, 220, 595, 634, 640, 665–666, 719–720
Peterson, E. 685
Philo 26, 395, 400, 529–530, 588, 669–670, 680–681, 871, 903, 921
Pickstock, C. 570, 726
Pieris, A. 520
Pinnock, C. 35, 175, 311–313, 629, 677, 709, 759
Pius V, Pope 743
Pius IX, Pope 555, 652, 784, 939
Pius XII, Pope 284, 555, 652, 784
Placher, W. C. 678
Plantinga, A. 50, 112, 361, 671, 674, 678–679, 746–747, 896, 898
Plato 41, 62–63, 86, 148, 194, 334, 395, 400, 441, 444, 534, 563, 588, 623, 631, 669, 679–682, 717, 727, 811, 848, 856, 892, 896–897, 912, 918, 984
Plotinus 83, 148, 316, 647, 650, 680–682, 877, 912, 943
Polanyi, M. 293, 312, 616, 682–683, 901, 915
Polkinghorne, J. 50, 361, 686

- Polycarp 43, 56–57, 186, 275, 456, 805, 956
 Popper, K. 291, 528–529, 941
 Porphyry 83, 125–126, 680, 798, 943
 Posidonius 871
 Praxeas 589
 Preus, R. D. 638
 Prisca 593
 Prokopovich, F. 343, 790–791
 Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite 26, 52–53, 111, 295, 403, 681, 692, 715–716, 917
 Pusey, E. 31–32
- Race, A. 172, 757
 Rahner, K. 36, 95, 127, 211, 236, 263, 323, 355, 359, 424, 450, 467, 519, 551, 569, 599, 629, 727–728, 773, 783–784, 816, 879, 881, 909, 916, 936, 944
 Ramm, B. 310, 728, 828
 Ramsey, I. T. 302, 729, 764
 Ramus, P. 109, 720, 729, 816
 Rashdall, H. 585
 Ratrannus 86, 114–115, 295, 375, 655, 732
 Ratzinger, J. 181, 212, 413, 520, 523, 685, 732, 785
 Rauschenbusch, W. 167, 298, 514–515, 554, 733, 849–850
 Raven, C. E. 514, 733–734
 Reid, T. 195, 671, 734, 747
 Reimarus, H. S. 247, 511
 Reitzenstein, R. 416
 Remigius of Lyons 375
 Richard of St Victor 169, 536, 943
 Richardson, A. 608, 777, 970
 Richardson, H. W. 190
 Ricœur, P. 211, 329–330, 361, 442, 763–764, 777, 881, 901, 978
 Ridley, N. 732, 750–751
 Ritschl, A. 91, 93, 207, 262, 298, 326, 333, 346–347, 403, 435, 517, 547, 561, 637, 675–676, 711, 724, 781–782, 829, 843, 925, 927
 Ro, Bong Rin 71
 Roberts, J. D. 122–123, 520
 Robinson, H. W. 220
 Robinson, J. A. T. 50, 235, 245, 248, 341, 479, 515, 585, 782, 945
 Robinson, J. M. 412
 Rorty, R. 692
 Roscelin 1, 623, 734
 Rousseau, J.-J. 189–190, 291, 429, 787, 846, 914, 948
 Ruether, R. R. 211, 213, 336–340, 787–788
 Rufinus the Syrian 657
 Russell, B. 292, 430, 528, 747, 966
 Rutherford, S. 226–227, 794–795, 949
 Ryle, G. 41, 292
- Sabellius 397, 411, 549, 589
 Saint-Cyran 463
 Saiving, V. 337
 Samosata, Paul of 6, 308, 549, 589, 804
 Sanders, J. E. 175, 311, 313, 759, 859
 Sartre, J.-P. 316, 319–320, 490, 549, 668
 Sattler, M. 198, 813
 Saturninus of Antioch 260, 367
 Saussure, F. de 249, 873
 Schaeffer, F. A. 7, 50, 190, 500, 809
 Schaff, P. 198, 200, 234, 417, 561, 787
 Schelling, F. W. J. 359–360, 391–392, 516, 673, 911
 Schillebeeckx, E. 251, 265, 509, 798, 809–810
 Schlatter, A. 207, 235, 257, 347, 677, 803, 810–811
 Schleiermacher, F. D. E. 4, 26, 91, 103–104, 106, 132, 178, 191, 207, 253, 258, 262, 279, 298–299, 326, 333, 341, 398, 401, 416, 427, 442–443, 450, 485, 514–516, 547, 561, 586, 631, 639–641, 699, 701, 707, 711, 713, 717, 761, 781–782, 786, 811–813, 843, 885, 888–889, 902, 911, 924–925, 935
 Schmemmann, A. 307, 569–570, 814
 Schmitt, C. 685
 Schwegler, A. 927
 Schweitzer, A. 262, 298, 411, 676, 816–817
- Schwenckfeld, C. 745, 817–818
 Seerveld, C. 7–8
 Seng, Kang Phee 165
 Servetus, M. 398, 913, 933
 Sheldon, C. 849
 Shelton, J. B. 662
 Sibbes, R. 220–221, 666, 720–721, 839–840
 Siger of Brabant 92, 815–816
 Simons, M. 22, 98, 560, 745, 840, 869, 897
 Smith, A. 152, 694, 970
 Smith, H. W. 406, 418
 Smith, R. P. 406–407, 418, 665
 Sobrino, J. 172, 444, 520–521, 686, 785, 847–848
 Socinus, F. 398, 745, 852
 Socinus, L. 745, 852
 Socrates 49, 395, 444, 679–680
 Soelle, D. 854–855, 959
 Solovyov, V. 792–794
 Song, C.-S. 71–72, 165
 Spener, P. J. 193, 676–677, 806, 862, 888
 Spinoza, Benedict (Baruch) de 250, 342, 359–360, 392, 563–564, 591, 650, 672, 730, 860–861, 913
 Spurgeon, C. H. 249, 433, 526, 543, 722, 863–864
 Staniloae, D. 278, 864–865
 Staupitz, J. 81, 87
 Stoddard, S. 870
 Storkey, A. 849
 Storr, V. F. 513–514
 Strauss, D. F. 178, 516–517, 601, 776, 871–872, 927–928
 Strong, A. H. 857–858, 872
 Stronstad, R. 662
 Suárez, F. de 24, 466–467, 772, 816
 Swinburne, R. 41, 50, 671, 899
- Symeon Stylites 884
 Symeon the New Theologian 278, 403, 881
- Takakura, T. 464
 Tanner, K. 361–362, 767
 Tareyev, M. 792
 Tatian 51, 835, 871, 883
 Tawney, R. H. 143, 172, 693, 776, 848, 851
 Taylor, J. 154, 302, 595, 890, 953

Index of names

- Taylor, M. C. 692
Taylor, N. W. 417, 611–612
Taylor, V. 412, 568, 875
Teilhard de Chardin, P. 467,
606, 647, 709, 734, 783,
890–891
Temple, W. 172, 183, 284,
361, 693, 848, 851, 891–892,
971
Teresa of Avila 443, 475,
599–600, 741, 861, 893–894
Tertullian 54, 85, 97, 176, 186,
201, 234, 240, 280, 296, 328,
367, 436, 446, 509, 550, 552,
565, 571, 575, 588–589, 594,
624, 643, 651, 655, 659, 684,
704, 718, 753, 765, 770, 797,
805, 808, 825, 835, 856, 871,
874, 894–895, 900, 921, 923,
944, 965
Theodore of Mopsuestia 45,
97, 177, 609
Theodore the Studite 434
Theodoret of Cyrillus 45–46,
805, 884
Theodotus 6, 589
Theophilus of Antioch 52, 231,
964
Thielicke, H. 302, 904–905
Thomas Aquinas 3–4, 7, 14–15,
24, 26, 32, 50, 63–64, 79, 86,
92, 111–112, 121, 125, 128,
201, 206, 211, 230, 233, 253,
262, 264, 273, 300, 328, 350,
371, 377, 383, 388, 405, 436,
441, 446, 449, 466, 473, 495,
505, 531, 535, 537, 551, 555,
558, 562–564, 578, 595, 599,
603, 607, 620, 631, 645, 664,
672, 682, 700, 730, 762, 766,
771, 780, 783, 789, 797, 799,
805, 814–816, 825, 840, 845,
857, 859, 868, 874, 879, 885,
887, 892, 896, 904, 906–907,
909, 912, 939, 946, 961, 980
Thomas, M. M. 451
Thompson, J. L. 900
Thornwell, J. H. 909–910
Thurneysen, E. 104, 373,
910
Tikhon of Zadonsk 791
Tillich, P. 18, 50, 91, 111–112,
153, 207, 210, 235, 245, 319,
323, 355, 361, 393, 515, 517,
547, 608, 647, 681, 714,
762–763, 807, 881, 888, 902,
910–911, 917, 936
Tolstoy, L. 7–8, 644, 693, 792, 914
Tomlinson, D. 312
Torrance, T. F. 106, 150, 230,
311, 414, 618, 682, 735, 750,
878, 893, 901, 912, 914–917
Tracy, D. 210, 361, 917, 978
Troeltsch, E. 93, 248, 415, 429,
515, 613, 829–830, 853, 925,
952
Turner, M. M. B. 662
Turretin, F. 22, 79, 383, 639,
747, 750, 816, 928
Tyconius 83, 265, 571
Tylor, E. B. 34, 239
Tyndale, W. 738, 750–752,
801
Tyrrell, G. 387, 411, 429, 467,
584–585
Tzu, L. 889
Uchimura, K. 464
Underhill, E. 929
Ursinus, Z. 156, 225, 394, 631,
749, 888, 937
Valdés, J. de 933, 937, 942
Valentinus 16, 367–368
Van Mastricht, P. 639, 937–938, 967
Van Til, C. 266, 433, 809,
938–939
Vanhoozer, K. 170, 211, 310,
312–314, 689, 735, 763, 772, 903
Velichkovsky, P. 791
Vermigli, P. M. 747, 749, 888,
937, 941–942
Victorinus, C. M. 571, 681,
874, 943
Voetius, G. 937, 947
Volf, M. 181, 696
Voltaire 247, 291, 415, 429,
689, 787, 948
Vos, G. 117, 536, 598, 938, 949
Waldo, P. 949
Walker, A. 124, 968
Ward, G. 570, 726
Warfield, B. B. 117, 164, 200,
232, 288, 454, 544, 665, 705,
711, 750, 828, 938–939,
950–952
Weber, M. 18, 89, 143, 152,
274, 301, 613, 634, 755,
829–832, 853–854, 925, 952
Weiss, J. 298
Wells, D. 214
Wesley, C. 309, 568, 575, 806,
862, 952–953, 958
Wesley, J. 28, 43, 65–66, 73, 96,
100, 115, 126, 169, 208, 218,
297, 323, 377, 406, 417–419,
423–424, 508, 525, 543,
565–568, 646, 660, 665, 693,
698, 779, 802, 806, 846, 859,
862–863, 893, 901, 953–955,
958
Westcott, B. F. 171, 374, 681, 956
Weston, F. 33, 487
Whichcote, B. 148
White, E. 834–835
White, L. 281
Whitefield, G. 147–148, 309,
423, 526, 565, 954, 958
Whitehead, A. N. 111, 361, 497,
647, 681, 707–708, 819–820,
859
Wiesel, E. 420, 958–959
William of Champeaux 1, 734, 943
William of Ockham 1, 26, 87,
121, 350, 381, 405, 449, 672,
816, 881, 961–962
Williams, C. W. S. 512, 962
Williams, Roger 221, 913,
962–963
Williams, Rowan 570, 768–769,
946, 963
Wingren, G. 88, 964
Wisløff, C. F. 965
Witherspoon, J. 195, 705,
965–966
Wittgenstein, L. J. J. 250, 293,
312, 485, 508, 528, 617, 623,
687, 735, 763, 941, 966–967,
978
Wollebius, J. 967
Wolterstorff, N. 7–8, 111, 361,
453, 671, 746, 763, 912
Woods, G. F. 260
Wrede, W. 411
Wright, N. T. 299, 311, 313,
412, 448, 456, 482, 735, 770,
804, 976–977
Wyclif, J. 43, 115, 131, 432, 751, 977–978

-
- Yaozong, Wu 165
Yifan, Shen 165
Yoder, J. H. 170, 211, 302, 310,
359, 388, 493, 684, 712,
978–979
Yong, A. 311, 663
- Yoshimitsu, Y. 464
Yu, Carver 165
- Zeno 592, 653, 716,
870–871
Zinzendorf, N. von 676,
862
- Zizioulas, J. 181, 211, 385, 414,
424, 916, 982–983
Zwingli, H. 98, 133, 137–138,
225, 307, 328, 428, 431, 437,
538, 540, 627–628, 700, 738,
740, 744–745, 747, 749, 841,
859, 888, 957, 984–986

Index of subjects

- abortion 357
accommodation 2, 301–302, 818
Acts of Thomas 884
Adam 3–5
 last/second (Christ) 4 sin of 4
adiaphora 5
adoptionism 6, 176, 280, 804
aesthetics 6–9
African Christian theology 9–12, 799
African Independent Churches, theology of 11–12 African theology (see also Black theology) 13 agape 534, 624, 848
agape meal 306
agnosticism 14
Albigenses 15
Alexandrian School 15–17, 177
alienation 17–18, 971
allegory 16
amillennialism, symbolic 572
Amyraldism 21–22
Anabaptist theology 22–24, 98, 428, 840
 and church discipline 185
 and church–state relations 897
Anabaptists 501, 740, 745, 813 analogy, of being (analogia entis) 24–25, 32, 371, 762 analytic theology 25–26
androcentrism 788
angels 26–27, 29–30, 112
Anglican Evangelical Group Movement 513
Anglicanism (see also Cranmer; Jewel; Keble) 27–30, 471
 and ministry 576
Anglican–Roman Catholic International Commission (ARCIC) 33, 181, 186, 497
Anglo-Catholic theology 28, 30–34, 374, 576
anhypostasia 433, 449
animism 34
annihilationism 34–35
anomoians/anhomoians (see heterousians) 61 anonymous Christianity 36, 728, 784
 and the fall 328
 and satisfaction 808
 and sin 383
anthropic principle 686
anthropocentrism 430
anthropology 39–42, 649
 and image of God 40–41
anthropomorphism 42
Antichrist 42–43
antinomianism 43–44, 322, 504, 507
Antioch
 Council of 60
 Fourth Creed 60
Antiochene School 45–46, 177
anti-Semitism 420, 476
aphthartodoketai 592
apocalyptic 46–48
apocalypticism 791
Apocryphon of John 368
Apollinarianism 40, 48–49, 397
apologetics 49–50, 153–154
apologists 51, 51–52
apophatic theology 52–53, 533
apostasy 53
apostle 54–56
Apostles' Creed 234–235
Apostolic Church 56–57
apostolic succession 54–55
Arab Christian thought (see also Islam and Christianity) 58
Arianism 19, 58–62, 74, 107, 176, 397, 619, 855
Aristotelianism 62–64, 92, 749
Arminianism (see also Synod of Dort) 64–66, 96, 268, 377, 566
 Wesleyan 65
ascension (heavenly session of Christ) 66–68 asceticism 68
 and monasticism 68–72, 180
assurance 65, 72–73, 667
Assyrian Church of the East 884
Athanasian Creed 234
atheism, practical 76–77
atonement 75, 77–80, 150, 212, 478, 568, 582, 629, 801 and Abelard 1–2 and Arminianism 65
 and evil 317
 and Forsyth 347
 and Gregory of Nyssa 380
 and incarnation 78
 and Islam 461
 and justification 79
 and legal justice 78
 and penal substitution 876 and penalty 79
 and propitiation 78
 and reconciliation 78
 and satisfaction 79
 classic view 78, 89
 extent of 80–81 governmental theory 65, 382 limited 81, 749
 mystical views 78
 ransom theory 78
 subjective theory 79
 universal 80–81
Auburn Affirmation 598
Augsburg Confession 81–82, 198
Augustine
 and amillennialism 571 and Christian Platonism 681–682
 and church–state relations 867
 and eschatology 297
 and evil 316, 897–898
 and faith 480
 and fatherhood of God 335
 and grace 376, 480, 562
 and history 414
 and Holy Spirit 422
 and image of God 439
 and joy 475
 and justification 481
 and kingdom of God 491
 and love 480 and love of God 535–536
 and marriage 837
 and philosophy 672
 and political theology 684
 and predestination 480, 700, 833
 and sacraments 797

Index of subjects

- Augustine (cont.)
and sanctification 805 and sexual differentiation 835
and sin 4, 84, 480
and sinlessness of Christ 844
and the fall 328
and vision of God 946
and will 959
City of God 85, 167, 297, 684, 867, 946
Confessions 82–83
The Trinity 85
- Augustinianism 86–88, 842, 960
authority 89–91
and Scripture 824
divine 89–91
human 89
papal 896
autonomy 91–92, 291
Averroism 92
Azusa Street Mission 660
- baptism 96–99, 201, 739, 753, 930, 946, 974
and grace 376
and Zwingli 985
believers' 23, 97–98, 740, 745
Eucharist and ministry 99, 186, 194, 285, 308, 325, 798, 946 in the Spirit 99–101, 162, 660–661, 802 infant 4, 97, 332, 736, 740, 753
- Baptist confessions 200
Baptist Missionary Society 354
Baptist theology 101–102
Particular (see also Fuller; Gill; Hall) 354
Strict and Particular 433
- Barmen Declaration 103, 183, 197
- Barth, Karl
and analogy 25, 371
and assurance 73
and atonement 79
and autonomy 91
and baptism 99
and the Christian life 169
and Christology 5, 105
and church–state relations 866
and conscience 206
and covenant theology 226
and creation 230–231
and dialectical theology 255–257 and doctrine of man 106 and doubt 270
and evil 316
and the fall 329
and hidden and revealed God 406
and incarnation 179, 449
and judgment 477–478
and justification 482
and law and gospel 507
and love for God 534
and love of God 533–535
and natural theology 104, 231, 605
and philosophy 673
and predestination 701
and resurrection of Christ 769
and sanctification 807
and Schleiermacher 812
and Scripture 828
and systematic theology 885
and theonomy 91 and time 912
and Torrance 914–915
and transfiguration of Christ 920
and Trinity 106, 424, 533, 924
and virgin birth 945 and von Balthasar 95 and Word of God 402, 699
- beauty 94–95, 366
being (see also ontology) 110–112, 392, 549, 604
- Belgic Confession 199
- Benedictine tradition 114–115
- Berlin Declaration 118–119
- Bible Churchmen's Missionary Society 514
- biblical theology 777, 949
- biblicism, radical 12
- black consciousness (see also black theology) 121–122
- Black Consciousness Movement (South Africa) 122
- Black Power 123
- black theology 122–124, 520
black theology, and African theology 123
- Black Theology Project 122, 124
- 'blackness' 123
- blasphemy 125
- Bonhoeffer and the Christian life 168
- Brethren movement 243
- Buddhism 134–136, 317
- calling (see also vocation) 142–143
- Calvin and accommodation 2
and assurance 72
and atonement 79, 81, 799
and baptism 98, 147
and catechisms 156
and the Christian life 146, 169
and Christology 145
and church 739
and church–state relations 147, 868, 897
and covenant theology 225–226
and doctrine of God 144
and Eucharist 146, 307, 740
and the fall 145, 173, 328
and Holy Spirit 423
and image of God 41, 145
Institutes 144, 146, 738, 758, 888
and justification 146, 737
and knowledge of God 143–145, 495, 758
and law 505, 739
and ministry 146, 188
and natural law 505
and natural theology 604
and offices of Christ 628 and prayer 146
and predestination 145–146, 700, 740
and priesthood of all believers 704
and repentance 146, 765
and resurrection of Christ 766
and providence 145
and sanctification 146, 806
and Scripture 143–145
and sensus divinitatis 746
and transfiguration of Christ 919–920
and worship 146
- Calvinism 377, 417, 749–750, 951
- Calvinism, High 363

- Calvinistic Methodism 147–148
 Cambridge Platonists 148–149
 canon, and Scripture 182, 822
 canon law 151, 282
 capitalism 152–153
 Caroline Divines 154–155
 Carthage, Council of 657
 casuistry 20, 155
 cataphatic theology 716
 Catechism of the Catholic Church (1992) 157
 catechisms 155–157, 744
 Catholic Apostolic Church 458 catholicity 158–159
 cause 63
 Celtic Christianity 159–160, 281
 certainty 649
 Chalcedon, Council of 160, 177, 222, 234, 277, 397, 422, 433, 448, 591
 Chalcedonian Definition 46, 53, 234, 468 chance 715
 charismatic movement/theology 161–162, 311, 424, 475, 501 charismatic renewal 577
 Chicago School of Theology 163
 Chicago Statement on Biblical Inerrancy (1978) 164, 454
 Chicago Statement on Biblical Hermeneutics (1982) 164
 Chicago/Lambeth Quadrilateral 29
 China Inland Mission 283
 Chinese theology 164–165
 Christ
 and judgment 477
 and kingdom of God 314
 as last/second Adam 4
 as righteousness of God 778 faith of 322
 human nature 843–844
 offices of 628–630
 sinlessness of 449, 843–844, 893, 945
 suffering of 447, 878
 union with see union with Christ uniqueness of 404, 451, 932
 Christ-culture relationship, typology of 237, 239, 494
 Christendom 166–168, 684, 866, 869
 Christendom movement 167
 Christendom, and post-Christendom 304
 Christian life 168–170
 Christian Social Union 171
 Christian Socialism 171–172
 Christianity and Islam 166, 460
 Christianity and other religions (see also Kraemer) 172–175
 Christian–Jewish relations 420, 477
 Christification 891
 Christology (see also Antiochene School; Apollinarianism; Docetism; Jesus; monarchianism; Novatian) 6, 16, 49, 74, 175, 176, 177–179, 241, 259, 855, 923
 and African theology 13
 and Apostolic Fathers 56
 and Barth 5, 105
 and Clement of Alexandria 191
 and Council of Chalcedon 160
 and Cyril of Alexandria 242
 and Eusebius of Caesarea 308
 and evangelism 314
 and Forsyth 347
 and Gregory of Nazianzus 379
 and Hilary of Poitiers 407
 and Holy Spirit 423
 and Irenaeus 457
 and John of Damascus 474 and Leo the Great 510
 and models 583
 and non-Christian religions 36
 and Pannenberg 648
 and process theology 707
 and Reformers 738
 and Schleiermacher 812
 and Schwenckfeld 817
 and Sobrino 521, 848
 and wisdom 964
 and womanist theology 968
 Byzantine 178, 177
 Christ as mediator 558
 from below 629
 threefold office of Christ 79
 transcendental 728
 church 180–184, 217, 240, 465, 497, 739, 818, 916
 and African theology 13
 and Anabaptists 23
 and Anglo-Catholic theology 33 and Bucer 134
 and evangelism 314
 and family life 332
 and Holy Spirit 424
 and kingdom of God 491
 and Mennonite theology 560 and Mercersburg theology 561 and mission 183–184, 212
 and resurrection of Christ 767
 and Scripture 826
 and society 892
 and tradition 32
 apostolicity 182
 as communion/koinonia 181–182 as family 331
 as sacrament 32
 as Zion 980
 branch theory 33
 catholicity 158, 182
 doctrine of 432, 752
 gathered 869
 holiness 182
 in Methodist theology 567–568 invisible 158, 196, 712
 marks of 182, 703
 mega churches 713
 models of 573–574
 Moravian view 597
 new forms 577
 power of 961
 under communism 868 unity of 182, 287
 visible 158, 196
 church discipline 184–186
 church government 186–189
 Presbyterian 703
 Church of England 187
 and canon law 151
 and confirmation 202
 Church of Scotland 188
 Church of Scotland, Disruption (1843) 161 Church of the Nazarene 418 church praxis 182–183

Index of subjects

- church–state relations (see also Constantine; theocracy) 183, 492, 505, 712, 745, 752
and Anabaptists 23
- civil religion 189–190
- collegiality and conciliarity 194–195
- colonialism 364
- common-sense philosophy 195, 612, 705, 747
- communication of attributes (communicatio idiomatum) 178
- communion of saints 182, 195–196
- conceptualism 623
- Concerned Evangelicals, Evangelical Witness in South Africa 866
- conciliar fellowship 194
- Conciliar movement 222
- conciliarism 189
- Concord, Book of 200, 346, 541
- Concord, Formula of 200 5, 162, 345–346, 541, 638
- Confessing Church 197
- confessions and creeds 198
- confessions of faith (see also Barmen Declaration; Lausanne Covenant) 197–200
- confirmation 201–202, 509, 753
and Christianity 202–203
- Congregational Federation 205
- Congregational Union 204
- Congregationalism 188, 204–205
- congruism 701
- conscience 205–207
- Consensus Tigurinus* 137, 199
- conservative theology 207–208
- Constance, Council of 222, 224
- Constantinianism 308, 683
- Constantinople, First Council of (381) 61, 208, 222
- Constantinople, Second Council of (553) 222
- Constantinople, Third Council of (680) 223
- Constantinople, Fourth Council of (870) 223
- Constantinople, Fifth Council of (880) 223
- consumerism 209–210
- contemplation, and revelation 95
- contemporary theological trends 210–212
- contextual theologies 213–214
- contextualization 13, 70, 213, 215–217, 238, 452
- contingency 217–218
- contraception 785, 837
- conventionalism 623
- conversion 218–219, 753
- Coptic Christianity 219–220
- corporate personality 220
- correlation, method of 515, 902, 911
- cosmological argument 603
- Cosmomic Idea, philosophy of 266
- councils 221–225
ecumenical 222–223, 277
- covenant 534–535, 778, 839
and creation 230
and grace 507
- covenant theology 193, 225–227, 598, 639, 749, 930, 937, 985
- Covenanters 227–228
- creatio ex nihilo* 230–231, 912
- creation 229–231, 271, 300, 767, 858, 894, 964
- creation (see also ecology) 715 and covenant 230
and evolution 231–232, 605
and Moltmann 588
and natural theology 231
pluriformity in 275
and resurrection of Christ 767
and science 230
and stewardship 231
and Thomas Aquinas 908
- creation-centred spirituality 232–233
- creationism 232, 857
- creeds 233–235, 712
- creeds and confessions 702
- creeds, and Ethiopian Orthodox Church 305
- crisis theology see dialectical theology 255
- cross 695
and Anselm 38
and Barth 236
and Jüngel 236–237
and Luther 235–236
- and Moltmann 236, 587
theology of 235–237, 366, 406, 542
- cult(s) 613, 853
- cultural apologetics 809
- culture 7–8, 238–240, 381, 620, 699, 861, 880
- culture, and theology 237–239
- Dalit theology 71
- Dasein* 393
- death 243–244
- death-of-God theology 244–245
- deconstruction 245–246, 689, 692
- deification 246–247
- deism 247, 369, 604, 715, 948
- deliverance see exorcism 321
- democracy 621
- democracy, religion of 163
- demythologization 138–139, 248–249, 412, 488, 601, 803, 819
- dependence, absolute 812
- descent into hell 251
- design argument [teleological] 431, 604, 646, 819
- determinism [inc. scientific/theological/philosophical] 251–252
- devil 78
- devil and demons (see also exorcism) 253–254, 321
- dialectical theology 255–258, 910
- Didache* 57
- différance* 249
- disciples 149
- dispensational theology 258–259
- dispensationalism 43, 258–259, 297–298, 357, 507, 572, 880
- divine energies 371
- divine light 404
- Docetism 259–260, 397
- doctrinal criticism 260
- doctrine 260–261, 523, 929 corruption of 253 development of 252–253
immutability of 253
- dogma 262–263, 290
- dominion 439
- Donatism 83–84, 265–266, 398

- Dort, Canons of 267–268, 666
- Dort, Synod of 267–268, 639, 666
- double effect, principle of 318
- double-truth theory 92
- doubt 269–270, 293
- doubt, method of 1, 250, 269
- doxology 270–271, 366
- dualism 250, 271–272, 610, 680
- Dutch Reformed theology 274–275
- dynamic equivalence 216
- Easter 275–276
- Eastern Orthodox churches, and catechisms 157
- Eastern Orthodox theology (see also hesychasm) 181, 277–279, 281
- and canon law 151
- and councils 221, 277
- and Eucharist 279, 307
- and the fall 279, 328
- and grace 378
- and Holy Spirit 278, 422–423
- and liturgy 525
- and Mary 555
- and Trinity 278, 923
- and World Council of Churches 279, 972
- Ebionism 280
- ecclesiology see church 521
- eco-feminism 340
- ecology 231, 280–282, 303, 708, 788
- economy 282–283
- ecumenical councils 234
- ecumenical movement 283–286
- ecumenical theology 212, 286–287, 499
- and ministry 577
- ecumenism 263, 283
- Eight-Fold Path 135
- election see predestination 740, 859
- election, and Augustine 84
- emotivism 301
- empiricism 289–290, 292–293, 300, 730
- encounter, divine–human 333
- enhypostasia 434, 449
- Enlightenment 50, 174, 178, 262, 290–291, 312, 323, 352, 578, 688, 730, 746, 758
- Enlightenment, and Romanticism 786
- Ephesus, Council of 222, 292
- episcopacy 186–187
- epistemic justification 315
- epistemology 292–293, 679, 908
- Epistle of Barnabas* 57
- Erasmus, Desiderius, and Luther 294, 539
- eros* 534, 624
- eschatology (see also amillennialism; dispensational theology; Joachimism; postmillennialism; premillennialism) 258, 296–299
- and Anabaptists 24
- and Moltmann 587
- and process theology 708
- and prophecy 193
- realized 298
- essence of Christianity 299–300
- essentialism and non-essentialism 623
- Ethiopian Orthodox theology 305
- ethics 106, 300–304, 595, 625
- ethics, and womanist theology 968
- Eucharist 19, 32–33, 305–308, 561, 698, 739–740, 747, 751, 814, 931, 974
- and Bucer 134
- and Council of Trent 921
- and Gregory of Nyssa 380
- and Luther 538, 540
- and Lutheranism 542
- and Schwenckfeld 817
- and Vermigli 942
- and Zwingli 538, 986
- Eutychianism 397
- Evangelical Fellowship of Congregational Churches 205
- Evangelical Rationalists 745
- Evangelical Revival 953–954
- Evangelical Sisterhood of Mary 70
- Evangelical Theological Society 310
- evangelical theology 309–311, 375
- and process theology 708
- and society 851
- and spirituality 312, 863
- postconservative 312–313
- evangelicals, and baptism 99
- evangelicals, and World Council of Churches 972
- evangelism 313–314, 746, 860
- evidentialism 315–316, 746
- evil 38, 272, 316–319, 404, 509, 675, 860, 877
- evil (see also devils and demons; theodicy) 253
- and existence of God 317
- moral 316, 318, 898
- natural 316, 318, 898
- evolution 357, 709, 891
- evolution, theistic 232
- evolutionary theology 734
- exclusivism 173–174, 757–759
- excommunication 377
- existentialism 319–321
- exorcism 321
- experience, appeal to 163
- faith 93, 168–169, 248, 319–320, 322–323, 326, 539, 938
- and history 323–324, 330, 415
- and history, and resurrection of Christ 768–769
- and Lutheranism 542, 930
- and reason 37–39, 104, 325–326, 462, 485, 649, 675, 730
- and revelation 118
- implicit 36
- rule of 322, 894, 900
- saving 324
- seeking understanding 756
- temporary 72
- Faith and Order movement 284, 324–325
- faithfulness 533–534
- fall, the 281, 327–331, 438, 601, 607
- and immortality 445
- falsification principle 764, 941
- family 304, 330–332
- fatalism 715
- federal theology see covenant theology 226
- federalism 226
- fellowship (see also koinonia) 335–336

Index of subjects

- feminist theology (see also Schüssler Fiorenza) 336–341, 402, 708, 787–788, 799
- feminist theology, and Christology 179
- fideism 342, 674
- filioque* (see also Holy Spirit, procession of) 234, 277, 398, 422, 645
- Five Precepts 135
- Florence, Council of 224, 651, 946
- forms, theory of 62, 680
- foundationalism 315, 348–349, 545, 746–747, 902
- Fountain Trust 661
- Franciscans 127–128, 349–351
- Frankfurt Declaration 351–352
- Franfurt School 352
- free choice 546
- Free Church of Scotland 161
- Free Methodist Church 418
- free will 860
- free will, and suffering 318, 878
- freedom (see also grace) 39, 352–353, 670
- and autonomy 353
- and Baptist theology 101–102
- and self-determination 353
- human 360
- free-will defence 898
- French Protestant Academy, Saumur 21
- Fuller Seminary 310
- functionalism 237
- fundamentalism 355
- fundamentalism 207, 310, 356–358
- fundamentalism, and evangelicals 357
- Fundamentals 357
- Gallican Confession 199
- gender 304, 358–359, 969
- gender roles 358–359
- Genevan Confession 199
- German idealism (see also Fichte) 359–360
- ghosts 112
- Gifford Lectures 360–361
- gifts of the Spirit 161–162, 362, 390
- gift, theology of 361–362
- Global Christian Forum 285, 972
- globalization 238, 303, 364–365
- glory of God 365–366, 702
- glory, theology of 406
- Gnesio-Lutherans 345
- Gnosticism 176, 366–369, 396, 457, 716
- God 369–372
- and creation 271
- and gender terms 358
- and Hegel 392
- and process theology 707
- and womanist theology 968
- as pure act 111
- being of 111
- children of 856
- death of 244, 622
- doctrine of 63–64, 470, 632, 738, 748
- essence and activities 404, 645
- essence of 250, 874
- existence of (see also ontological argument) 37, 218, 528, 654, 670, 672, 679, 908
- existence of, and evil 317
- fatherhood of 334–335
- freedom of 273
- glory of 365–366
- hidden 405
- holiness of 372
- image of 3, 40–41, 438
- impassibility of 212, 372, 445–447, 859, 878
- judgment of 477–478
- justice of 778
- knowledge of (see also hidden and revealed God) 75, 106, 128, 341, 360, 405, 485
- love of 372, 478, 533
- nature of 633, 679
- necessity of 112
- perfections of 371–372
- righteousness of 778, 781
- simplicity of 111, 371, 840
- suffering of 447, 479, 632
- union with 246
- vision of, see vision of God 945
- will of 959–961
- God–world relationship 588
- gospel 374–375
- and culture 239
- Gospel of Thomas* 368
- grace (see also Molinism) 119, 320, 361, 376–378, 384, 533–534, 566, 711, 751, 776, 895, 954
- and Augustine 84, 700
- and election 64–65
- and nature 377, 879
- and paradox 93
- cheap 168
- common 378
- means of 376–377
- special 378
- Ground of the Unity 596
- Group Brotherhood 513
- Guild of St Matthew 171
- guilt, and forgiveness 383–385
- guilt, original 842
- Half-Way Covenant 870
- Hasidism 133
- healing 389–391, 662
- Heidelberg Catechism 156, 393–394, 937
- hell (see also annihilationism) 936
- descent into 251
- Hellenization of Christianity 261, 395
- Helvetic Confession, First 137, 199
- Helvetic Confession, Second 138, 199
- heresy (see also blasphemy) 396–398
- hermeneutic circle 401
- hermeneutics 216, 354, 398–402, 777, 812, 824, 901
- and process theology 708
- deconstructionist 402
- feminist 402
- liberation 402
- postliberal 402
- Romantic 401
- hermeneutics of suspicion 338, 401–402, 764
- hesychasm 403–404, 570, 645
- heterousians 61
- hidden and revealed God 405–406
- higher-life theology 406–407
- Hinduism and Christianity 408–410

- historical criticism 291
 historical Jesus, quest for 139,
 411–413, 468, 602, 817, 872, 976–977
 historical relativism 925 historical theology 413–414
 history (see also myth)
 414–415, 648, 777
 and judgment of God 478 and religion 511
 and society 85
 philosophy of 258
 History-of-Religions School
 415–416
 holiness 802
 holiness movement 356,
 417–419, 567, 646, 665,
 806
 Holocaust (see also Wiesel, Elie) 419–421, 958
 holy, experience of 641
 Holy Saturday 95
 Holy Spirit 421–424, 425,
 696
 and Anabaptists 23
 and Athanasius 75
 and Basil of Caesarea 107
 and freedom 353
 and Gregory of Nazianzus 379 and Moltmann 587
 and Owen 642
 and Trinity 162
 and wisdom 964
 procession of 39, 398, 645, 922–923
 homoians 61
 homoiousians 61
homoiousios 60
homoousios 60, 549, 855, 874 homosexuality 304, 358, 712, 837
Honest to God 248, 782
 hope 426–427
 theology of 299, 427–428
 House Churches 576
 human personhood 983 human rights law 506
 humanism 120, 429–430
 modern 430
 Renaissance 430–431 hymns 525, 953
 hyper-Calvinism 432–433
 hypostasis 433–434, 874
 iconoclastic controversies 434–436, 441
 idealism 435, 605, 786
 German 516
 identity and sexuality 836
 ideology 435–436
 idolatry 436–437
 image of God 438–440
 images 440–441
 imagination in theology
 441–443
 imitation of Christ 443–444
 immaterialism 116, 444–445
 immortality of the soul 680 immortality, conditional 35, 445 impassibility of God 446–448 imperialism 364 incarnation (see also Christology) 17, 74–75,
 111, 178, 215, 448–450, 618,
 929–930, 944–945
 and Anselm 38
 and Council of Chalcedon
 160 and extra Calvinisticum 449 and images 441
 and kenosis 450
 and paradox 93
 and resurrection of Christ
 765–766
 and truth 95
 inclusivism 173–174, 757–759
 Indian Christian theology
 450–452
 indigenization 70, 164, 213, 215
 individualism 489–490 indulgences 537, 719
 infallibility, papal 652
 infralapsarianism 701 Intelligent Design 232
 intermediate state 455–456
 International Council on Biblical Inerrancy 164
 International Missionary
 Council 284, 616
 Inter-Varsity Fellowship 514
 Iona Community 70
 and the fall 327
 and heresy 396
 Islam 593
 Islam and Christianity (see also Arab Christian thought)
 459–461, 867
 I–Thou relationship 133
 Jansenism 88, 462–464, 466
 Japanese theology 464
 Jesuits 437, 463, 466–467, 742
 Jesus 467–471
 and Judaism 472
 and kingdom of God 491
 Jewish–Christian relations (see also supersessionism; Zion)
 471–472
 Joachimism 472–475, 572
 Jubilee Group 33
 Judaism 475–477, 592
 human 391, 717
 of God (see also annihilationism)
 477–479, 718
 Julianists 592
 just-war theory 303, 644
 justice, and righteousness 778
 Justice, Peace and Integrity of Creation 282
 justification 212, 285, 322,
 480–482, 499, 562, 640, 751,
 801, 921, 976
 and Luther 538–539
 and Lutheranism 542, 930
 and resurrection of Christ
 766 and sanctification 482, 805, 807
 and Schwenckfeld 817
 karma 136, 409
 kenosis 347
 kenoticism 178, 487–488, 859
 kerygma 488–489
 Keswick Convention/movement
 310, 407, 418–419, 665,
 806
 Kimbanguist Church, Zaire 12 kingdom of God 314, 490–493, 514 knowledge (see also epistemology) 154, 348, 485, 680, 961 analysis of claims 673–674
 and foundationalism 348–349
 as warranted true belief 678 ground of 359
 justification of claims 674 mediated 391
 knowledge of God see God, knowledge of; natural
 theology 76, 360, 493–495
koinonia 497

Index of subjects

- laity 29, 500–501
Landmark movement 858
language 116, 966–967
 metaphorical/figurative 763 religious 670
 univocal 762–763
Lateran Councils 223–224, 425, 501–502
Latitudinarianism 502–503
Lausanne Committee for World Evangelization 503
Lausanne Congress 311
Lausanne Covenant (1974) 239, 503
law 383–384, 426, 504–506, 606, 907–908 and gospel 482, 506–508, 542, 739 biblical 44
 divine 44
 human 44
laws of nature 578, 618, 820
laying on of hands 508–509
lectio divina 590
legalism 504, 507
Leiden synopsis 509–510
Leo, Tome of 510
liberal evangelicalism 513–514
liberal theology 507, 514–516
liberalism 430
 German 516–518
liberalism and conservatism in theology 205, 544 liberation ethics 303
liberation theology 127, 172, 182–183, 211, 213, 386, 402, 518–522, 570, 685, 694, 785
Life and Work Movement 284
limbus 522–523
literary realism 354
liturgical theology 524
liturgy 32, 524–525
 and sacraments 797
 Anglican view 28
logic 63, 527–528
logical positivism 290, 293, 528–529, 564, 675, 764, 940
Logos 51–52, 74, 177, 191, 411, 529–530
logos endiathetos 52, 530
logos prophorikos 52, 530
logos spermatikos 51, 483, 529–530
London Bible College (now London School of Theology) 310
London Missionary Society 283 love, divine 89–90, 533–536
 and assurance 72
 and atonement 79
 and baptism 98
 and catechisms 156
 and the Christian life 169
 and Christology 540
 and church–state relations 538, 684
 and conscience 206
 and covenant theology 225
 and Erasmus 294, 539
 and Eucharist 307, 538, 540, 740, 747
 and faith 930
 and the fall 328
 and hidden and revealed God 405–406
 and image of God 3
 and imitation of Christ 443
 and justification 481–482, 506, 538–539
 and knowledge of God 495
 and law 505
 and law and gospel 506 and Melancthon 559
 and natural theology 604
 and priesthood of all believers 704, 739
 and repentance 765
 and revelation 771
 and righteousness 169, 538, 778–779
 and sanctification 805
 and Scripture 539–540
 and sin 384
 and theology of the cross 235–236 and two kingdoms 867 and vocation 970
 and Zwingli 538
Lutheran orthodoxy/scholasticism 637–639
Lutheran theology 200
 and church discipline 185
 and justification 482, 807
Lutheranism and Lutheran theology 507, 540–542, 747
Lyons, First Council of (1245) 224
Lyons, Second Council of (1274) 224 man, doctrine of 106
Manichaeism 82–83, 368, 398, 548–549
Marburg Colloquy 538 marriage 837
Marrow Controversy 130
Marrow of Theology 20, 719
martyrdom 68, 551–552, 878
Marxism 519–520, 552–554, 685, 793
Mary 554–556
 as Co-Redemptrix 556
 as mediatrix 555
 as mother of the church 556
 as theotokos 555
 Assumption of 555
 immaculate conception 273, 555, 784
materialism 76, 556–557
Medellín Conference 386, 518
mediation 558–559
Mennonite Church 560, 840 mental health/illness 389–390
Mercersburg theology 561
merit 481, 562
Messalians 543 metaphor 442
metaphorical theology 583
metaphysics 563–564, 675
metempsychosis 565
method, theological 531, 901–903
Methodism (see also Calvinistic Methodism) 565–569
Methodist Church in Great Britain 188
Methodist Episcopal Church in the USA 66, 96 Methodist Missionary Society 96 middle axioms 848
Middle Platonism 680
millennium 571–573
mind–body relation 271
ministry 573–577, 711
 and local church 574
 lay 576–577
 nineteenth-century developments 576–577 threefold 186–187
minjung theology 71, 497

- miracle 389, 431, 578–579, 872, 879, 927–928
- missio Dei* 287, 580, 611, 972
- missiology (see also Allen; Kraemer) 23, 109, 212, 459, 579–582, 713, 972
- and apostleship 55–56
- and evangelism 580
- and Islam 461
- and Judaism 472
- missionary movement 29
- modalism 922
- models 582–583
- Modern Churchman's Union (now Modern Churchpeople's Union) 585
- Catholic 583–584
- English 585
- modernity 585–586, 726
- modernity (see also secularization) 831
- Molinism 87, 466, 701
- and creation 588
- and Holy Spirit 587
- and love of God 536
- and Marxism 685
- and theology of cross 587
- and Trinity 587–588
- monarchianism 588–589, 895
- monastic theology 589–590
- monasticism 68–70, 86–87, 664
- monism 591
- monophysitism 17, 219, 397, 591–592
- monotheism 592–593
- Montanism 593–594
- Moral Majority 357
- Moral Rearmament 594
- moral theology 142, 467, 595–596
- morality 320
- Moravian theology 596–597, 862
- motif-research 624
- mysterium tremendum et fascians* 641
- mystical theology 246, 533, 599–600, 931
- mysticism 128, 169
- myth 600–602, 872–873
- Nag Hammadi library 367–368
- narrative ethics 302
- narrative theology 602–603, 763
- Nation of Islam 122
- National Association of Evangelicals 310
- National Camp Meeting Association 418
- National Covenant (Scotland) 227
- natural law 300, 302, 504–505, 607, 780
- natural philosophy 64
- natural theology 605, 104–105, 494–495, 603–606, 674, 848
- natural theology, and creation 231
- naturalism 430
- naturalism, evolutionary 77
- naturalistic fallacy 301
- nature 15, 606–607
- nature, and grace 377, 495, 879
- Neo-Kantianism 301
- Neonomianism 110
- neo-orthodoxy 262–263, 608
- Neoplatonism 83, 295, 680, 715–716, 943
- Neo-Thomism 909
- Nestorianism 45–46, 397, 510
- New Age (see also new religions and alternative spiritualities) 610–611
- New England theology 611–612
- New Haven theology 612–613
- new religions 613–615, 756
- New Theology 346
- Nicaea, Creed of 397, 619
- Nicaea, First Council of (325) 59–60, 176, 222, 397, 618–619
- Nicaea, Second Council of (787) 223
- Nicene Creed 209, 222, 234, 292, 397, 422, 523, 916
- nominalism 121, 604, 622–623, 734, 961
- non-realism 624
- non-resistance 23
- numinous 641
- obedience 168–169, 625–626
- obedience, wilful 23
- Oberlin College 547
- Odes of Solomon* 883
- ontological argument 37, 603
- ontology (see also being) 631–632, 683
- of peace 571
- of violence 571
- trinitarian 571
- open theism/openness theology 211, 311, 632–633, 677–678, 859
- Orange, Second Council of 833
- Oratory of Divine Love 741
- ordination 509
- ordo salutis* 633–634
- Oriental Orthodox theology 219, 592, 634–635
- and World Council of Churches 972
- Orthodox Church of America 814
- Orthodox Presbyterian Church 544
- Orthodox theology, Confession of Dositheus 200
- and church discipline 185
- ousia* 433, 874
- Oxford Movement 30–32, 487
- pacifism/peace 303, 571, 643–644, 979
- paleo-orthodoxy 627
- panentheism 647, 708
- Pannenberg, Wolfhart
- and faith 534
- and the fall 329
- and knowledge of God 494
- and Trinity 533
- pantheism 370, 649–650
- papacy 43, 466, 650–652, 961
- paradigm 652–653
- paradox in theology 93, 653–654
- Parsees 983–984
- patripassianism see Sabellianism 589
- patristic theology (see also Christology) 211, 575, 627, 655–656
- Pauline theology 976
- Pelagianism 84, 131, 398, 480, 657–658, 841, 960
- penance 456, 659
- Pentecostal theology 183, 423–424, 501, 660–664
- Pentecostalism 311, 356, 362, 579, 760
- perfection, perfectionism 567, 664–665

Index of subjects

- perichoresis* 335
perseverance 44, 566, 666–667
persona 895
personalism 667, 772
phenomenology 667–669
Philippist Lutherans 345
philosophy 266
 and ‘theological turn’ 551 and theology 8, 126, 671–673
 modern 391
philosophy of religion 673–676 philosophy of theology 670–671, 716 phthartolatrai 592
pietism 262, 560, 676–677, 862, 888
Pilgrim Holiness Church 418
Platonism 679–681
 Christian 681–682
plerosis 347
pluralism 173–174, 304, 757–758
polemics 683
political ethics 303
political theology 569, 625, 683–686
polytheism 370, 686–687
poor, option for 521
positivism 301, 352, 687
post-foundationalist theology/postfoundationalism 312, 678
postliberalism 170, 516, 602, 678, 687–688, 758, 978
 and hermeneutics 402
postmillennialism 297–298
 Protestant 572
postmodern ethics 302
postmodernism 340, 606, 610, 689, 691–693, 730
 and authority 90
 and systematic theology 688–690, 885
post-structuralism 764, 874
poverty and wealth 180, 693–695
power 695–696
pragmatism 697
praxis 521, 696–697
prayer 347, 403–404, 697–698
preaching, theology of 698–700, 974
predestination 64–65, 375, 406, 463, 700–702, 740, 834 ontological 734 semantic 734 reason 1, 290
 and faith 730
 and narrative 602
 and revelation 272, 731
 and theology 731–732
 and tradition 545
 and understanding 194 limits of 293
rebaptism 735–736 reciprocity 588
redemption 736–737
Reformation theology 506, 737–741
 and confirmation 201
 and justification 507
 and law 507
 and ministry 575–576
 and poverty and wealth 694
 and society 850
Reformation, Catholic Counter- 741–744
Reformational Movement 851
Reformed epistemology 746–747
Reformed Orthodoxy 639–640, 937
Reformed theology (see also covenant theology) 748, 747–750, 501
 and church discipline 185
 and dogma 262
 and sacraments 797
 confessions 200
 English 750–752
 Scottish 752
regeneration 752–753, 938
reincarnation 409, 444, 565
relationality 588
relativism 754
religion 754–756
 and Hegel 392
 and history 511
religions, theology of 172, 174, 756–759
religious experience 194, 255, 293, 462, 674, 759–762, 929, 951
 and Islam 461
religious language 762–764, 908 religious studies 756
Remonstrant Articles 65, 267, 666

- repentance, and conversion 218–219, 764–765
- reprobation 700
- Restorationism 55
- resurrection of Christ 324, 648, 765–769, 977
and immortality 445
general 769–770
- revealed theology 494
- revelation (see also Scripture, doctrine of) 293, 405, 620, 648, 708, 770–773, 901, 949 and contemplation 95
and faith 118
and reason 731
and Scripture 823
general 132, 293
special 132, 293, 675
- reverence for life 817
- revival, theology of 310, 567, 774–775
- revivals 309, 343
- revolution, theology of 496, 775–777
- righteousness 778–780
active 538
and justice 778 distributive 779
external or strange 539
imputed 779
infused 779
of God see God, righteousness of 538 passive 538
- rights human 780–781
natural 780–781
- ritualism 31, 975
- Roman Catholic Church
and baptism 99
and catechisms 157
and charismatic movement 661
and councils 221
- Roman Catholic theology (see also fundamental theology; Mary; Modernism (Catholic); Vatican I; Vatican II) 55, 113, 118, 499, 783–785, 939 and apostolic succession 55
and canon law 151
and catholicity 158
and church 181
and church government 187–188
and church–state relations 868
and dogma 263
and justification 482, 807
and liberation theology 685
and Protestantism 714
and World Council of Churches 972
- Romanian Orthodox theology (see also Bulgakov) 500, 864
- Romanticism, and hermeneutics 401, 785–787
- Russian Orthodox theology 789, 788–794
- Sabbath 795–796
- Sabellianism 397, 589
- sacralization/re-enchantment 833
- sacraments 97, 170, 432, 481, 531, 712, 739, 784, 796–798, 803, 880–881
and justification 481
- sacrifice 798–799
- saint (see also communion of saints) 800
- salvation 242, 800–802
and non-Christian religions 36
history 803–804 order of 806
- Salvation Army 98, 418, 802–803
- sanctification (see also Christian life) 417–418, 566, 598, 779, 804–807, 954
and justification 482, 805, 807
and resurrection of Christ 766–767
entire 96, 418, 806
- Satan 893
- satisfaction 808–809
- Savoy Declaration (1658) 200, 204
- scepticism, philosophical 680
- schism 84, 810
- Schleiermacher and heresy 398
- Schleithem Confession 198, 813–814
- scholasticism 14–15, 37, 86, 589, 814–816
- science 266, 291
and creation 230
and Scripture 728
and theology 304, 545–546, 679, 686, 768, 818–820
- scientism 691
- Scots Confession 199, 821
- scriptural holiness 566
- Scripture (see also accommodation) 676, 821–825, 948
and Anabaptists 23
and canon 182, 822–823
and church 90, 826
and historical criticism 401
and history 323–324
and imagination 442
and Islam 461
and Lutheranism 541–542
and ministry 574–575
and postconservative evangelicalism 312
and Protestantism 711
and revelation 28, 90, 216, 823, 825–827, 920
and Zwingli 985
authority of 90, 311, 326, 632, 737, 751, 824, 828, 951, 955, 977 canonic principle 902
doctrine of 827–828, 938
fourfold sense 400
in Reformation theology 400
inerrancy 453–455
infallibility 453–455, 705 inspiration of 194, 453, 823–824, 951 interpretation of (see also hermeneutics) 46, 51, 399–402, 619, 636, 689, 699, 738, 751, 819, 824 allegorical 395, 399, 590 figural 399
grammatical 399 literal 399
spiritual 399
- New Testament authorship and dating 927
- sola Scriptura* 118, 711, 824, 827 trustworthiness 453
- Sea of Faith movement 829
- sect 853

Index of subjects

- sects 829–830
secular Christianity 830–831
secularity, theology of 129
secularization 831–833, 851, 853
Semi-Arians see homoiousians
Semi-Pelagianism 833–834
sensus divinitatis 747
Seventh-Day Adventism 834–835
Severans 592
sexuality (see also gender; queer theology) 30, 304, 835–837 shalom 644
Shepherd of Hermas 57
Shintoism 838–839
simplicity, divine 840–841
sin (see also temptation) 38, 598, 841–843, 960 and suffering 877
 in Islam 460
 original 4, 20, 84, 841–842
sinlessness of Christ 843–844
slavery 29, 844–847, 910
 abolition of 845–847
 and world religions 845 defence of 846
sobornost 794, 847
social ethics 712, 848–849
 and Methodism 567
Social Gospel (see also Rauschenbusch) 167, 170, 514, 849–850
society, theology of 850, 703, 850–852
Socinus and Socinianism 79, 398
sociology of religion 274, 853–854, 925, 952
Socratic method 680
sonship 855–856
sophia see wisdom in early Christology 137 soul 41, 112, 856–857
soul, pre-existence 856
Southern Baptist theology 857–858
sovereignty of God 858–860
spiritual warfare (see also angels; devil and demons) 254, 590 Spiritualists 745 spirituality (see also New Age; new religions and alternative spiritualities) 12, 347, 832, 861–864 apophatic 861
 cataphatic 861
 Celtic 160
state 691, 865–869
 and kingdom of God 491–492
 authority of 90
 Welfare State 693
stewardship 280–281, 606, 820, 869, 977
Stoics 529, 870–871
Stone-Campbell movement 149 structural analysis 873
structuralism 237, 873–874
Student Christian Movement 514 subordinationism 922
substance 874–875
substantia 895
substitution and representation 875–876
substitution, penal 629, 799, 801, 808, 876 suffering, human 212, 876–878, 948 and bigger picture 877 and free will 318, 877
 and sin 877
 and soul-making 877
supernatural 879
supersessionism 879–880
supralapsarianism 701 symbols 777, 880–881, 911
syncretism 451, 882–883
Syriac Christian theology 882–883
Syrian Christianity 883–884
Syrian Orthodox Church of Antioch 884 systematic theology 886, 885–886
 history of 886–889
Taizé Community 70
Taoism and Christianity 889–890
Tatian, Diatessaron 883
temptation 892–893
Tetrapolitan Confession 198–199
theism 686, 896–897
theodicy 80, 317–318, 509, 787, 897–899
theodramatics 442, 886, 902 theological aesthetics 94
theological exegesis 900
theology 903–904
 and foundationalism 348
 and reason 731–732
 and science 915
 ascetic 862 from above 902
 from below 901–902
 from the side 902
 implicit 12
 mystical 862 pragmatic 462 theonomy 91
theopaschitai 592
Thirty-Nine Articles 199, 905
Thomas Aquinas 906–907
 and analogy 371
 and Aristotelianism 63
 and atonement 79
 and church–state relations 868
 and conscience 206
 and creation 908 and epistemology 908
 and existence of God 908 and faith and reason 730, 908
 and image of God 3
 and impassibility of God 446
 and incarnation 449
 and merit 562
 and metaphysics 908
 and natural law 505, 908
 and perfection 664
 and philosophy 672
 and predestination 700
 and religious language 908
 and resurrection of Christ 766
 and revelation 771
 and sacraments 797
 and sanctification 805
 and the fall 328
 Summa Theologica 815, 885
Thomism and Neo-Thomism 264–265, 907–909
time and eternity 465, 912–913
toleration 746, 795, 913–914
tongues, gift of 162
Toronto experience 661
Tractarians 31
 and reason 545
 and Scripture 920
catholic principle 903

- traducianism 856–857
 tragedy 918
 transcendental experience 727
 transfiguration 919–920
 transubstantiation 115–116,
 377, 655
 Trent, Council of 224, 384, 742, 808, 826, 920–921
 and grace 482
 and Scripture and tradition
 826
 Trinity 75, 211, 330, 370, 385,
 427, 465, 571, 592, 699, 856, 921–924, 943
 and African Independent Churches 12
 and African theology 13
 and Apostolic Fathers 57
 and Augustine 85
 and Barth 106, 533
 and Basil of Caesarea 108
 and Cyril of Alexandria
 241 and Eusebius of Caesarea 308 and fellowship 335–336
 and Gregory of Nazianzus 379
 and Gregory of Nyssa
 379–380
 and Holy Spirit 424
 and hypostasis 923
 and Irenaeus 457
 and Islam 460
 and LaCugna 500
 and Moltmann 587–588
 and Origen 636
 and Owen 642
 and Pannenberg 533, 649
 and persona 923
 and Rahner 728
 and Schleiermacher 812
 and Tertullian 895
 and Torrance 916–917
 and truth 926
 and Unitarianism 934
 and worship 973
 and Zizioulas 982–983
 tritheism 924
 truth 38, 754, 925–927
 and incarnation 95
 and subjectivity 490
 coherence theory 926
 correspondence theory 925–926
 indirect communication of 490
 Tübingen School 516, 927–928
 two kingdoms, doctrine of 684
 Tyndale House, Cambridge 310 ultimate concern 911
 union with Christ 929–931, 933
 uniqueness of Christ 932–933
 Unitarian Universalist
 Association 935
 Unitarianism 398, 924, 933–935
 United Reformed Church 188, 205
 Universal Declaration of Human Rights [1948] 780–781
 universalism 150, 935–936
 utopia 436
 Utrecht circle 947

 Vatican Councils 939–940
 Vatican I 188, 207, 224, 499,
 651–652, 939
 Vatican II 32, 181, 188, 194,
 203, 207, 224, 284, 307, 355,
 499, 554, 556, 652, 757, 781,
 826, 939–940, 970
 and Scripture and tradition 826
 and church–state relations
 868
 Dogmatic Constitution on the Church 554
 verification 290
 and falsification 940–941
 eschatological 293
 verification principle 528, 764, 940–941
via negativa 762
 Victorines 943
 Vienna Circle 528
 Vienne, Council of 224, 946
 Vineyard fellowship 661
 virgin birth 544, 844, 943–945 virtue [and the virtues] 62–63, 388, 870, 909
 vision of God 945–946
 vocation (see also calling) 946–947
 voluntarism 949

 Waldensians 949–950
 Wesley, John (see also Methodism)
 and assurance 73
 and conversion 218, 862
 and perfection 665
 and sanctification 169, 417, 779, 806
 and Whitefield 958
 spirituality 862
 theological method 955
 Wesleyan Methodist Church
 418
 Wesleyan Quadrilateral 568, 955
 Westminster Assembly 956–957
 *Directory for the Publick
 Worship of God* 956
 Form of Presbyterian Church Government 957
 Larger Catechism 156, 628, 957
 Shorter Catechism 157, 957
 Westminster Confession 161,
 198, 200, 325, 860, 951,
 956–957
 Westminster Theological Seminary 544, 598, 938
 Wheaton Declaration 957–958
 will 273, 959–960
 bondage of 960
 freedom of 273
 Willowbank Report (1978) 239 wisdom 886
 wisdom in early Christology 52, 137, 964–965
 womanist theology 124, 214,
 340, 968–969
 women, ordination of 33, 338, 577, 704
 work 969–971
 World Council of Churches
 118, 215, 279, 282, 284–286,
 497, 616, 827, 965, 971–972
 Toronto statement 972
 World Evangelical Fellowship
 (now World Evangelical Alliance) 285
 World Missionary Conference
 (Edinburgh, 1910) 283
 World's Evangelical Alliance
 283, 285, 310
 worship (see also doxology)
 973–975
 and liturgy 973 and pragmatism 975
 and ritualism 975
 freedom of 781
 wrath of God 406, 975–976

Index of subjects

Yale School 978

Zion 979–981

Zionism 133, 978, 981–982

 Christian 980, 982

 Messianic 981

 political 981

Zoroastrianism 983–984

Zwingli, Huldrych 307

 and baptism 98, 985

 and covenant theology 225, 985

 and Eucharist 747, 986

Index of articles

- Abelard, Peter 1
Accommodation 2
Adam 3
Adiaphora 5
Adoptionism 6
Aesthetics 6
African Christian theology 9
African Independent Churches,
theology of 11
African theology: recent developments 13
Agnosticism 14
Albertus Magnus 14
Albigenses 15
Alexandrian School 15
Alienation 17
Allen, Roland 18
Althaus, Paul 19
Ambrose 19
Ames, William 20
Amyraldism 21
Anabaptist theology 22
Analogy 24
Analytic theology 25
Angels 26
Anglicanism 27
Anglo-Catholic theology 30
Animism 34
Annihilationism 34
Anonymous Christianity 36
Anselm 37
Anthropology 39
Anthropomorphism 42
Antichrist 42
Antinomianism 43
Antiochene School 45
Apocalyptic 46
Apollinarianism 48
Apologetics 49
Apologetists 51
Apophatic theology 52
Apostasy 53
Apostle 54
Apostolic Fathers 56
Arab Christian thought 58
Arianism 58
Aristotelianism 62
Arminianism 64
Asbury, Francis 66
Ascension 66
Asceticism and monasticism 68
Asian Christian theology 70
Assurance 72
Athanasius 73
Atheism 76
Atonement 77
Atonement, extent of 80
Augsburg Confession 81
Augustine 82
Augustinianism 86
Aulén, Gustaf 88
Authority 89
Autonomy 91
Averroism 92
Baillie, Donald Macpherson 93
Baillie, John 93
Balthasar, Hans Urs von 94
Bangs, Nathan 96
Baptism 96
Baptism in the Spirit 99
Baptist theology 101
Barclay, William 102
Barmen Declaration 103
Barth, Karl 103
Basil of Caesarea 107
Bavinck, Herman 108
Bavinck, Johan Herman 108
Baxter, Richard 109
Beck, Johann Tobias 110
Being 110
Bellarmine, Robert 113
Benedict and the Benedictine tradition 114
Bengel, Johann Albrecht 115
Berengar 115
Berkeley, George 116
Berkhof, Hendrikus 117
Berkhof, Louis 117
Berkouwer, Gerrit Cornelis 117
Berlin Declaration 118
Bernard of Clairvaux 119
Beza, Theodore 120
Biel, Gabriel 121
Black consciousness 121
Black theology 122
Blasphemy 125
Bloesch, Donald G. 125
Boehme, Jacob 126
Boethius 126
Boff, Leonardo 127
Bonaventura 127
Bonhoeffer, Dietrich 128
Bossuet, Jacques-Bénigne 129
Boston, Thomas 130
Bradwardine, Thomas 131
Briggs, Charles Augustus 131
Brown, William Adams 131
Brunner, Emil 132
Buber, Martin 133
Bucer (Butzer), Martin 133
Buddhism and Christianity 134
Bulgakov, Sergei 136
Bullinger, Johann Heinrich 137
Bultmann, Rudolf 138
Bunyan, John 140
Bushnell, Horace 141
Butler, Joseph 141
Calling 142
Calvin, John 143
Calvinistic Methodism 147
Cambridge Platonists 148
Campbell, Alexander 149
Campbell, John McLeod 149
Canon law 151
Capitalism 152
Carnell, Edward John 153
Caroline Divines 154
Casuistry 155
Catechisms 155
Catholicity 158
Celtic Christianity 159
Chalcedon, Council of 160
Chalmers, Thomas 161
Charismatic Movement/theology
161
Chemnitz, Martin 162
Chicago School of Theology
163
Chicago Statement 164
Chinese theology 164
Christendom 166
Christian life 168
Christian Socialism 171
Christianity and other religions
172
Christology 175
Chrysostom, John 179
Church 180
Church discipline 184
Church government 186
Civil religion 189

Index of articles

- Clarke, William Newton 191
Clement of Alexandria 191
Cobb, John B. 192
Cocceius, Johannes 192
Coleridge, Samuel Taylor 193
Collegiality and conciliarity 194
Common-sense philosophy 195
Communion of saints 195
Confessing Church 197
Confessions of faith 197
Confirmation 201
Confucianism and Christianity 202
Congar, Yves 203
Congregationalism 204
Conscience 205
Conservative theology 207
Constantine 208
Constantinople, Council of 208
Consumerism 209
Contarini, Gasparo 210
Contemporary theological trends 210
Contextualization 215
Contextual theologies 213
Contingency 217
Conversion 218
Coptic Christianity 219
Corporate personality 220
Cotton, John 220
Councils 221
Covenanters 227
Covenant theology 225
Cranmer, Thomas 228
Creation 229
Creation and evolution 231
Creation-centred spirituality 232
Creeds 233
Cremer, Hermann 235
Cross, theology of the 235
Cultural theory and theology 237
Culture 238
Cyprian 240
Cyril of Alexandria 241

Dabney, Robert Lewis 242
Darby, John Nelson 243
Death 243
Death-of-God theology 244
Deconstruction 245
Deification 246
Deism 247

Demythologization 248
Denney, James 249
Derrida, Jacques 249
Descartes, René 250
Descent into hell 251
Determinism 251
Development of doctrine 252
Devils and demons 253
Dewey, John 255
Dialectical theology 255
Dilthey, Wilhelm 258
Dispensational theology 258
Docetism 259
Doctrinal criticism 260
Doctrine 260
Dodd, Charles Harold 261
Dogma 262
Dominic and the Dominicans 264
Donatism 265
Dooyeweerd, Herman 266
Dort, Canons of 267
Dort, Synod of 267
Dostoevsky, Fyodor Mikhailovich 268
Doubt 269
Doxology 270
Dualism 271
Duns Scotus, John 272
Durkheim, Emile 274
Dutch Reformed theology (South Africa) 274

Easter 275
Eastern Orthodox theology 277
Ebeling, Gerhard 279
Ebionism 280
Ecology 280
Economy 282
Ecumenical movement 283
Ecumenical theology 286
Edwards, Jonathan 287
Ellul, Jacques 288
Emerson, Ralph Waldo 289
Empiricism 289
Enlightenment, The 290
Ephesus, Council of 292
Epistemology 292
Erasmus, Desiderius 294
Eriugena, John Scotus 295
Erskine, Thomas 295
Eschatology 296
Essence of Christianity 299
Ethics 300
Ethiopian Orthodox theology 305
Eucharist 305
Eusebius of Caesarea 308
Evangelical theology 309
Evangelicalism, postconservative 312
Evangelism, theology of 313
Evidentialism 315
Evil 316
Existentialism 319
Exorcism 321

Faith 322
Faith and history 323
Faith and Order 324
Faith and reason 325
Fall 327
Family 330
Farel, William 332
Farmer, Herbert Henry 333
Farrer, Austin Marsden 334
Fatherhood of God 334
Fellowship 335
Feminist theology 336
Feuerbach, Ludwig Andreas 341
Fichte, Johann Gottlieb 342
Fideism 342
Filaret (Philaret) Drozdov 343
Finney, Charles Grandison 343
Fiorenza, Elisabeth Schüssler 344
Florovsky, Georges 345
Formula of Concord 345
Forsyth, Peter Taylor 346
Foucault, Michel 348
Foundationalism 348
Francis and the Franciscan tradition 349
Frankfurt Declaration 351
Frankfurt School 352
Freedom, Christian 352
Frei, Hans 354
Fuller, Andrew 354
Fundamental theology 355
Fundamentalism 356

Gender 358
German idealism 359
Gifford Lectures 360
Gift, theology of 361
Gifts of the Spirit 362
Gill, John 363
Gilson, Étienne 363
Globalization 364

- Glory of God 365
 Gnosticism 366
 God 369
 Gogarten, Friedrich 373
 Goodwin, Thomas 373
 Gore, Charles 374
 Gospel 374
 Gottschalk 375
 Grace 376
 Gregory of Nazianzus 379
 Gregory of Nyssa 379
 Gregory of Rimini 380
 Gregory the Great 381
 Grenz, Stanley J. 381
 Grotius, Hugo 382
 Guilt and forgiveness 383
 Gunton, Colin Ewart 385
 Gutiérrez, Gustavo 386

 Hallesby, Ole 387
 Harnack, Adolf 387
 Hauerwas, Stanley 388
 Healing 389
 Hegel, Georg Wilhelm Friedrich 391
 Heidegger, Martin 392
 Heidelberg Catechism 393
 Heim, Karl 394
 Hellenization of Christianity 395
 Henry, Carl F. H. 395
 Herbert of Cherbury 396
 Heresy 396
 Hermeneutics 398
 Herrmann, Wilhelm 403
 Hesychasm 403
 Hick, John Harwood 404
 Hidden and revealed God 405
 Higher-life theology 406
 Hilary of Poitiers 407
 Hildegard of Bingen 408
 Hindusim and Christianity 408
 Hippolytus 410
 Historical Jesus, quest for 411
 Historical theology 413
 History 414
 History-of-Religions School 415
 Hodge, Charles 416
 Holiness movements 417
 Holl, Karl 419
 Holocaust 419
 Holy Spirit 421
 Hooker, Richard 425
 Hope 426
 Hope, theology of 427
 Hubmaier, Balthasar 428
 Hügel, Friedrich von 429
 Humanism (modern) 429
 Humanism (Renaissance) 430
 Hume, David 431
 Hus, John 432
 Hyper-Calvinism 432
 Hypostasis 433

 Iconoclastic controversies 434
 Idealism 435
 Ideology 435
 Idolatry 436
 Ignatius of Loyola 437
 Image of God 438
 Images 440
 Imagination in theology 441
 Imitation of Christ 443
 Immortality 444
 Impassibility of God and human suffering 445
 Incarnation 448
 Indian Christian theology 450
 Infallibility and inerrancy of the Bible 453
 Intermediate state 455
 Irenaeus 456
 Irving, Edward 458
 Islam and Christianity 459

 James, William 462
 Jansenism 462
 Japanese theology 464
 Jenson, Robert W. 465
 Jerome 465
 Jesuit theology 466
 Jesus 467
 Jewel, John 471
 Jewish-Christian relations 471
 Joachimism 472
 John of Damascus 473
 Joy 474
 Judaism and Christianity 475
 Judgment of God 477
 Julian of Norwich 479
 Jüngel, Eberhard 479
 Justification 480
 Justin Martyr 483

 Kähler, Martin 484
 Kant, Immanuel 484
 Karlstadt, Andreas Bodenstein von 486
 Käsemann, Ernst 486

 Keble, John 487
 Kenoticism 487
 Kerygma, kerygmatic theology 488
 Kierkegaard, Søren Aabye 489
 Kingdom of God 490
 Knowledge of God 493
 Knox, John 496
 Koinonia 497
 Korean theology 497
 Kraemer, Hendrik 497
 Küng, Hans 498
 Kuyper, Abraham 499

 LaCugna, Catherine Mowry 500
 Laity 500
 Lateran Councils 501
 Latitudinarianism 502
 Lausanne Covenant 503
 Law 504
 Law and gospel 506
 Law, William 508
 Laying on of hands 508
 Leibniz, Gottfried von 509
 Leiden Synopsis 509
 Leo the Great 510
 Lessing, Gotthold Ephraim 511
 Levinas, Emmanuel 511
 Lewis, Clive Staples 512
 Liberal evangelicalism 513
 Liberal theology 514
 Liberalism, German 516
 Liberation theology 518
 Limbus 522
 Lindbeck, George 523
 Liturgical theology 524
 Liturgy 524
 Lloyd-Jones, David Martyn 526
 Locke, John 526
 Logical positivism 528
 Logic in theology 527
 Logos 529
 Lombard, Peter 530
 Lonergan, Bernard 531
 Lossky, Vladimir 532
 Love 533
 Love of God 535
 Lull, Raymond 536
 Luther, Martin 537
 Lutheranism and Lutheran theology 540

 Macarius (Pseudo-) 543
 MacDonald, George 543

Index of articles

- Machen, John Gresham 544
MacIntyre, Alasdair Chambers 544
MacKay, Donald M. 545
MacKinnon, Donald M. 546
Mackintosh, Hugh Ross 546
Macquarrie, John 547
Mahan, Asa 547
Manichaeism 548
Marcel, Gabriel 549
Marcellus of Ancyra 549
Marcion 550
Marion, Jean-Luc 551
Maritain, Jacques 551
Martyrdom 551
Marxism and Christianity 552
Mary 554
Materialism 556
Mather, Cotton 557
Mather, Increase 557
Mediation 558
Melancthon, Philipp 559
Mennonite theology 560
Mercersburg Theology 561
Merit 562
Merton, Thomas 563
Metaphysics 563
Metempsychosis 565
Methodism 565
Metz, Johannes Baptist 569
Meyendorff, John 569
Míguez Bonino, José 570
Milbank, John 570
Millennium 571
Ministry 573
Miracle 578
Missiology 579
Moberly, Robert Campbell 582
Models 582
Modernism (Catholic) 583
Modernism (English) 585
Modernity 585
Möhler, Johann Adam 586
Moltmann, Jürgen 586
Monarchianism 588
Monastic theology 589
Monism 591
Monophysitism 591
Monotheism 592
Montanism 593
Moral Rearmament 594
Moral theology 595
Moravian theology 596
Müntzer, Thomas 597
Murray, Andrew 597
Murray, John 598
Musculus, Wolfgang 598
Mystical theology 599
Myth 600
Narrative theology 602
Natural theology 603
Nature, theology of 606
Neo-orthodoxy 608
Nestorius 609
New Age 610
New England theology 611
New Haven theology 612
New religions 613
Newbigin, James Edward Lesslie 615
Newman, John Henry 616
Newton, Isaac 618
Nicaea, Council of 618
Nicholas of Lyra 619
Niebuhr, H. Richard 620
Niebuhr, Reinhold 621
Nietzsche, Friedrich 621
Nominalism 622
Non-realism 624
Novatian 624
Nygren, Anders 624
O'Donovan, Oliver 625
Obedience of Christ 625
Ochino, Bernardino 626
Oden, Thomas Clark 627
Oecolampadius, John 627
Offices of Christ 628
Oldham, Joseph Houldsworth 630
Olevianus, Caspar 630
Oman, John Wood 631
Ontology 631
Open theism/openness theology 632
Ordo salutis 633
Oriental Orthodox theology 634
Origen 635
Orr, James 637
Orthodoxy/Scholasticism, Lutheran 637
Orthodoxy/Scholasticism, Reformed 639
Osiander, Andreas 640
Otto, Rudolf 641
Owen, John 642
Pacifism/peace 643
Packer, James Innell 644
Palamas, Gregory 645
Paley, William 645
Palmer, Phoebe Worrall 646
Panentheism 647
Pannenberg, Wolfhart 647
Pantheism 649
Papacy 650
Paradigm 652
Paradox in theology 653
Pascal, Blaise 654
Paschasius Radbertus 655
Patristic theology 655
Pelagianism 657
Pelikan, Jaroslav 658
Penance 659
Pentecostal theology 660
Perfection, perfectionism 664
Perkins, William 665
Perseverance 666
Personalism 667
Phenomenology 667
Philo 669
Philosophical theology 670
Philosophy and theology 671
Philosophy of religion 673
Pietism 676
Pinnock, Clark 677
Placher, William 678
Plantinga, Alvin 678
Platonism 679
Platonism, Christian 681
Polanyi, Michael 682
Polemics 683
Political theology 683
Polkinghorne, John 686
Polytheism 686
Positivism 687
Postliberalism 687
Postmodern theology 688
Postmodernism 691
Poverty and wealth 693
Power 695
Praxis and orthopraxis 696
Prayer, theology of 697
Preaching, theology of 698
Predestination 700
Presbyterianism 702
Priesthood of all believers 704
Princeton theology 705
Priscillianism 706
Process theology 707
Progress, idea of 709
Prosperity theology 710
Protestantism 711
Providence 714

- Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite 715
Punishment 717
Purgatory 718
Puritan theology 719
- Quaker theology 722
Queer theology 723
Quietism 724
- Rabbinic theology 724
Race 725
Radical Orthodoxy 726
Rahner, Karl 727
Ramm, Bernard 728
Ramsey, Ian Thomas 729
Ramus, Petrus 729
Rationalism 730
Ratramnus 732
Ratzinger, Joseph 732
Rauschenbusch, Walter 733
Raven, C. E. 733
Realism 734
Rebaptism 735
Redemption 736
Reformation theology 737
Reformation, Catholic Counter-741
Reformation, Radical 744
Reformed epistemology 746
Reformed theology 747
Reformers, English 750
Reformers, Scottish 752
Regeneration 752
Relativism 754
Religion 754
Religions, theology of 756
Religious experience 759
Religious language 762
Repentance 764
Resurrection of Christ 765
Resurrection, general 769
Revelation 770
Revival, theology of 774
Revolution, theology of 775
Richardson, Alan 777
Ricoeur, Paul 777
Righteousness 778
Rights, human 780
Ritschl, Albrecht 781
Robinson, John Arthur Thomas 782
Roman Catholic theology 783
Romanticism 785
Rousseau, Jean-Jacques 787
- Ruether, Rosemary Radford 787
Russian Orthodox theology 788
Rutherford, Samuel 794
- Sabbath 795
Sacrament 796
Sacrifice 798
Saint 800
Salvation 800
Salvation Army 802
Salvation-history 803
Samosata, Paul of 804
Sanctification 804
Satisfaction 808
Schaeffer, Francis August 809
Schillebeeckx, Edward 809
Schism 810
Schlatter, Adolf 810
Schleiermacher, Friedrich Daniel Ernst 811
Schleithem Confession 813
Schmemmann, Alexander 814
Scholasticism 814
Schweitzer, Albert 816
Schwenckfeld, Caspar 817
Science and theology 818
Scots Confession 821
Scripture 821
Scripture and tradition 825
Scripture, doctrine of 827
Sea of Faith Movement 829
Sects 829
Secular Christianity 830
Secularization 831
Semi-Pelagianism 833
Seventh-Day Adventism 834
Sexuality 835
Shintoism and Christianity 838
Sibbes, Richard 839
Simons, Menno 840
Simplicity, divine 840
Sin 841
Sinlessness of Christ 843
Slavery 844
Sobornost 847
Sobrino, Jon 847
Social ethics 848
Social Gospel 849
Society, theology of 850
Socinus and Socinianism 852
Sociology of religion 853
Soelle, Dorothee 854
Sonship 855
- Soul, origin of 856
Southern Baptist theology 857
Sovereignty of God 858
Spinoza, Benedict (Baruch) de 860
Spirituality 861
Spurgeon, Charles Haddon 864
Staniloae, Dumitru 864
State 865
Stewardship 869
Stoddard, Solomon 870
Stoicism 870
Strauss, David Friedrich 871
Strong, Augustus Hopkins 872
Structuralism 873
Substance 874
Substitution and representation 875
Substitution, penal 876
Suffering 876
Supernatural 879
Supersessionism 879
Symbol 880
Symeon the New Theologian 881
Syncretism 882
Syriac Christian theology 882
Syriac Christianity 883
Systematic theology 885
Systematic theology, history of 886
- Taoism and Christianity 889
Taylor, Jeremy 890
Teilhard de Chardin, Pierre 890
Temple, William 891
Temptation 892
Teresa of Avila 893
Tertullian 894
Theism 896
Theocracy 896
Theodicy 897
Theological exegesis 900
Theological method 901
Theology 903
Thielicke, Helmut 904
Thirty-Nine Articles 905
Thomas Aquinas 906
Thomism and Neo-Thomism 907
Thornwell, James Henley 909
Thurneysen, Eduard 910
Tillich, Paul 910
Time and eternity 912
Toleration 913

Index of articles

- Tolstoy, Leo 914
Torrance, Thomas Forsyth 914
Tracy, David 917
Tragedy 918
Transfiguration 919
Trent, Council of 920
Trinity 921
Tritheism 924
Troeltsch, Ernst 925
Truth 925
Tübingen School 927
Turretin, Francis 928
- Underhill, Evelyn 929
Union with Christ 929
Uniqueness of Christ 932
Unitarianism 933
Universalism 935
Ursinus, Zacharias 937
- Valdés, Juan de 937
Van Mastricht, Peter 937
Van Til, Cornelius 938
Vatican Councils 939
Verification and falsification 940
Vermigli, Peter Martyr 941
Victorines 943
- Victorinus (Afer), Caius Marius 943
Virgin birth 943
Vision of God 945
Vocation 946
Voetius, Gisbertus 947
Voltaire 948
Voluntarism 949
Vos, Geerhardus 949
- Waldensians 949
Warfield, Benjamin Breckinridge 950
Weber, Max 952
Wesley, Charles 952
Wesley, John 953
Wesleyan quadrilateral 955
Westcott, Brooke Foss 956
Westminster Confession and Standards 956
Wheaton Declaration 957
Whitefield, George 958
Wiesel, Elie 958
Will 959
William of Ockham 961
Williams, Charles Walter Stansby 962
Williams, Roger 962
- Williams, Rowan 963
Wingren, Gustaf 964
Wisdom in early Christology 964
Wisløff, Carl Fredrik 965
Witherspoon, John 965
Wittgenstein, Ludwig Josef Johann 966
Wollebius, Johannes 967
Womanist theology 968
Work 969
World Council of Churches 971
Worship 973
Wrath of God 975
Wright, N. T. 976
Wyclif, John 977
- Yale School 978
Yoder, John Howard 978
- Zion 979
Zionism 981
Zizioulas, John D. 982
Zoroastrianism and Christianity 983
Zwingli, Huldrych 984

About the Editors

Martin Davie has lectured at Oakhill Theological College and been theological secretary of the Council for Christian Unity of the Church of England and theological consultant to the House of Bishops.

Tim Grass (PhD, King's College) is lecturer in church history at Spurgeon's College in London, England. He is also a tutor in early and medieval church history at the Open Theological College, University of Gloucestershire.

Stephen R. Holmes (PhD, King's College London) is senior lecturer in systematic theology at the University of St. Andrews, Scotland. He is author of The Quest for the Trinity.

John Mcdowell (PhD, Cambridge) is professor of theology at the University of Newcastle, Australia.

T.A. Noble (PhD, University of Edinburgh) is professor of theology at Nazarene Theological Seminary in Kansas City, Missouri, and also senior research fellow in theology at Nazarene Theological College, Manchester, UK.

More Titles from InterVarsity Press

Global Dictionary of Theology
978-0-8308-7811-6

New Bible Dictionary
978-0-8308-1439-8

New Dictionary of Biblical Theology
978-0-8308-1438-1

For a list of IVP email newsletters, including information about our latest ebook releases, please visit www.ivpress.com/eu1.

Finding the Textbook You Need

The IVP Academic Textbook Selector is an online tool for instantly finding the IVP books suitable for over 250 courses across 24 disciplines.

www.ivpress.com/academic/
